REPRINTED ARTICLES.

MANY articles have appeared in the EXAMINER since its revival in 1871, which seem important to "bring to remembrance" things which strengthen faith and kindle love to God and men. Some of the present readers have forgotten and others have never seen them and will have no means of it unless they are republished. Occasionally one of those articles may appear in the columns of the new form of the EXAMINER, which our old subscribers will not regret, as many of them have not preserved their papers of the two previous volumes, and they now have a Magazine, which is more easily preserved. No one interested in the subject to which the EXAMINER is mainly devoted, will regret to see some of its previous contents placed in a more permanent form than heretofore.

In this matter I hope to receive suggestions from the friends in respect to articles they would like to have reappear. Let it not be supposed, however, that any very large portion of our space will be occupied in this way; but only an occasional re-insertion of some important articles or sentiments.

☞ Should any person wish this number of the BIBLE EXAMINER sent to a friend, I will furnish and forward it on the receipt of ten cents.

EXTRACTS FROM LETTERS.

Mrs. M. S. L., Sandwich, Ill., writes: Luxuries we have not; but we would rather give up a portion of our daily bread than go without the EXAMINER. God bless you in your work of enlightening the darkened minds of dogmatic creed bound and creed burdened church-goers and church worshippers. I have great respect and love for a true church-goer and worshipper; but they are scarcely to be found. The true loving spirit of Christ is put aside for vanity and display.

R. E. LADD, Springfield, Mass., writes: I am much nearer to a cordial belief with you in the doctrine of the future age, as held by you and others, than I was a year ago. I believe our heavenly Father will yet fully justify His Name and work before all men, and make the hearts of all the race "confess that Jesus Christ is Lord to the glory of God;" and that to "Him every knee shall bow, of things in heaven and on earth and under the earth." My heart is full of praise and gladness in Him.

E. W. writes: I thank you for sending me the EXAMINER so long gratis. I take great comfort in reading it, and in sending it to some worthy poor; it comforts them. O, if I had money I would help you much. I pray daily for you; and pray God to bless all the truth. I went, last Sunday, to an Advent meeting. M. said to me, "What is this you have got?" I told him, "Some works of Bro. Storrs." He said, "Do not leave any of that stuff, nor give it to any body. I have organized this church, and Bro. N.'s mouth is stopped, and I cannot have any more of it here." Well, I am free in the Lord, bless his holy Name.

A. B. writes: I feel very much interested in the views you advocate, and cannot see why they are not in accordance with the Bible; and I have no objection to God's saving all our race, even Judas, if in justice and mercy He can. I think it looks just like a God of love. If it is truth I wish to embrace it.

No. 1.

THE BIBLE EXAMINER:

ITS PAST, ITS PRESENT, AND ITS FUTURE.

THE above named periodical was commenced by GEO. STORRS in 1841. First, as an occasional issue; in 1847 as a regular monthly. In 1868 it was suspended while its Editor was called to edit a weekly paper. In 1871 he revived the EXAMINER, believing that his individual responsibility was interfered with by a further connection with the weekly.

For two years past it has been issued as a folio, neat in appearance, and embracing a large amount of matter of no ordinary importance in relation to the character of God, and his government over the children of men. As to the ability with which it has been conducted the readers will judge for themselves.

THE BIBLE EXAMINER, so far as its Editor knows, was the first periodical ever established whose main object was to show that man is not inherently immortal, and that immortality is a superadded gift, bestowed through Jesus Christ—the Second Adam—upon no man until he is first brought into harmony with God, nor until that harmony is so perfected by trial as to render it certain that no possible failure will ever again occur. This truth is now widely advocated by various periodicals in America and Europe.

The Editor of this periodical, two years ago, felt constrained to advance in the theological field to the position which he now occupies, viz., that, The opportunity to come into harmony with God, and secure immortality, will be given to every individual of the race of man; if not in the present life, in a future one, in some of "the ages to come" (Eph. ii. 7); and that such opportunity embraces the "knowledge of the only true God, and Jesus Christ" (John xvii. 3); and for that purpose, God has given his Son "power over all flesh" (verse 3), and has determined that "in due time" the great facts shall be made known to every child of Adam, that there is "One God, and one Mediator between God and men, the man Christ Jesus; who gave himself a ransom for all" (1-Tim. ii. 5, 6). Those who, by unavoidable circumstances, have been deprived of the knowledge of these facts, in this life, will have them made known to them in a future life, and a full and free opportunity granted them to improve it, and so secure harmony with God and receive immortality, and die no more.

Such being the Editor's present faith, he is not disposed to spend the remainder of his days in contending for the idea that the incorrigibly wicked will be blotted out of being,—a truth, as it is,—but to vindicate the character and government of God over the creatures he has made, by showing that none will meet with such a fate as annihilation till they have first had the knowledge of "the only true God, and Jesus Christ," and an opportunity to become reconciled to them, accepting Jesus as the "One Mediator" and their Redeemer from sin and death. Thus they may secure an endless life; or, wilfully rejecting Christ, in these characteristics, they die for their own sin.

That these advanced truths might have a medium for their circulation, the Editor revived the BIBLE EXAMINER two years ago, and published it in a folio. It was formerly, for twelve or fourteen years, a Monthly or Semi-monthly Magazine. He has now determined to restore it to the MAGAZINE form, greatly enlarged, and issue it once a month. Several of its patrons have suggested this course, and others have regretted that this form was not adopted two years ago. The terms will remain the same to subscribers; and it is not doubted but that nearly all its friends will rejoice in its former familiar form, much enlarged,—double the amount of matter of former years, and more finely executed.

Now let there be a response from each one who receives this copy, and send your own subscription, if you have not already done so, and as many new subscribers as possible to begin the volume. Later subscribers may fail of getting the first numbers. "THE STUDY OF THE BIBLE," by HENRY DUNN, of England, is a volume of about 200 pages, and is sold at $1.50. It is intended to give that work entire in the EXAMINER this volume. You will find the first instalment in this number. It is a most valuable work. Extracts from other English works will also be transferred to this periodical; and no pains will be spared to make the EXAMINER what it professes to be, viz., One of the most important monthlies published; especially, on theological subjects. For terms see last page.

"WHAT VIEWS DO YOU HOLD?"

It is right that those who are asked to subscribe for a paper or magazine should know its Editor's position. Though this cannot be stated in full in one article, yet a synopsis can be given that shall prevent any one from being misled as to his real sentiments and object. The Editor of this Magazine has nothing to conceal, and therefore offers the following statement as an outline of his views, and hopes it may induce some to become subscribers with a determination to examine the subjects that will be presented in this Magazine.

On the subject of Immortality no material change has taken place in the Editor's mind for the past thirty years. It was after a special investigation of that subject for several years, by the Bible alone, that he came to the settled conclusion, immortality was not inherent in man, and that it could only be obtained by a union with Christ as a gift of God in Him, and bestowed permanently by a resurrection from the dead at the last day of this dispensation. Such was the conclusion arrived at in 1840, and his faith in that view has never wavered from that day to this; no, not for a moment. As to the final end of the wicked, his mind has remained unmoved during the same period; it is death; a literal end of their existence.

As to who the wicked are, and at what period their final end will come, his mind has undergone several changes. At first, in 1840 and several years after, he held the view that all men would be raised from the dead: the wicked to suffer torment, more or less severe, for a longer or shorter period, and then be destroyed utterly and forever. He held to this view for about fifteen years, when the inconsistency of such an administration led him to conclude they would utterly perish in death, never to be revived from the dead. Both of these positions were the result of the theory that for none of the human family was there a possibility of salvation beyond this present life: the truth or falsehood of that doctrine had never been the subject of his investigation; but it was a tradition received by Protestants generally, or taken for granted, like the heresy of an "immortal soul," both of which are without foundation in the word of God. They are baseless assumptions.

At length "the day-star" arose in his "heart." He saw in the promise and oath of God to Abraham, that in him and his "seed all the families of the earth, all nations, all kindreds shall be blessed," that the Gospel must be preached to "every creature;" and as multitudes have gone down to the grave without that blessing, they must hereafter be made acquainted with God's love to them and the means He has provided by which they should not only be blessed, but that blessing might result in eternal blessedness; hence it is true that "the hour is coming in the which all that are in the graves shall hear His voice" (the voice of the Son of man), "and shall come forth; they that have done good unto the resurrection of life; and they that have done evil unto the resurrection of [eternal] judgment." The first named class are made up of those who have heard and believed the truth concerning Jesus as the LIVE-GIVER and KING of God's appointment. They have believed and accepted Him, and thus are those who have "done good," and have the resurrection of life; so-called because "they cannot die any more" (Luke xx. 36); they are permanently "the children of God," and "heirs of the kingdom which God has promised to them that love Him" (James ii. 5).

The other class is made up of those who have died in ignorance of God's method to do good; and hence have had no opportunity to do otherwise than "evil," or act out their evil or animal nature. Such come forth to judgment, the term being employed to denote trial by a probation proper, which they never had in this life, having, by circumstances over which they had no control, never had the knowledge of "the only true God and Jesus the Christ," which the Son of God was authorized to give, and for which purpose the Father gave Him "power over all flesh"—all the human family; and Messiah's work will never be completed in bruising the serpent's head and redeeming the race, till every one for whom "He gave himself a ransom" shall have had an opportunity to know and accept the love of God in Christ; which not having been accomplished in this life, will be in the dispensation of "judgment" after their resurrection, at the "voice of the Son of God," and is the grand consummating work of Him who has the "power over all flesh to give eternal life to as many as Thou hast given him." To fail of exercising that power, so far as to put every son and daughter of Adam in possession of the means of securing that eternal life, would be to fail of fulfilling the trust the Father had placed in His hands, and a confession of defeat by "him who had the power of death, that is the devil," or d'evil. Such a result no believer in God's promise and oath will entertain as even a possibility.

The conclusion I have arrived at is, that the love of God to "the world," and the love of Christ in "giving himself a ransom for all," is "to be testified in due time" to all men; that is, to every man, woman and child of Adam's race, at some period of their history; if not in the present life or dispensation, it will be in some future one; and that the death which entered into the world by the sin of Adam cannot prevent God's determination to have these facts made known to "every creature" before their final destiny is decided. This view involves the future living, in some form or by some means, of all who have not had, in this life, the means of knowing the love of God and Christ as above stated; because God has but one method of determining the final state of men, viz., faith in Christ, the only LIFE-GIVER or remedial agent that He has provided or furnished for a dying race.

As the BIBLE EXAMINER is now going into the hands of hundreds who have not before read it, and hence are mostly ignorant of its Editor's true position, the foregoing statement is made. The points in his present view of truth are simply as follows:

1. Man is not inherently immortal; and immortality is a gift of God, through Jesus Christ, bestowed only on those who "seek for it by a patient continuance in well doing" (Rom. ii. 7).

2. All men are mortal, and subject to death by the appointment of God; or are "made subject to vanity, not willingly, but by reason of Him who hath subjected the same in hope" (Rom. viii. 20).

3. Christ became the "Mediator between God and men," and "gave himself a ransom for all, to be testified in due time" (1 Tim. ii. 5, 6); and "He hath abolished death, and brought life and immortality to light" (2 Tim. i. 10). And hence,

4. There will ultimately, or in "the ages to come" (Eph. ii. 7), be a revival from the dead of the entire race of Adam (John v. 28, 29), excepting such as have knowingly and willfully rejected Christ when made known to them as the "One Mediator" and "Redeemer" by the appointment of God's love. Such are the only "wicked" in the Gospel sense (John xv. 22-24; Mark xvi. 15, 16; Heb. vi. 4-8; x. 20-29).

5. All the unregenerate, not included in this class of the wicked, who have died in ignorance of the love of God to them, will be placed in a probationary state after the "Anointed" of God shall have actually "abolished death" to which the race had been subjected, "not willingly, but by reason of Him who subjected the same in hope."

6. The present dispensation is a disciplinary one to all men; in which they are to learn the evil of being a mere animal in their aspirations, and thereby prepare them for the presentation of a higher and more noble object of existence, after they have been fully taught the importance of it by the experience of evil. But,

7. In the present and the past dispensations, some men have been and will be prepared, by means specially employed in the wisdom and by the grace of God, to be "joint-heirs with Christ"—after having "suffered with him" (Rom. viii. 17), "in the regeneration" of the race "in the ages to come" (Matt. xix. 28; Eph. ii. 7). In the present dispensation, "God" has "visited the Gentiles to take out of them a people for his name" (Acts xv. 13). When this number is completed then "the regeneration" begins (Acts xv. 16, 17, and iii. 20, 21).

8. Till the regeneration begins, all the dead are in an unconscious state. There is no "work, knowledge nor device" in the death state (Eccl. ix. 4, 10). There is no hope for the regenerate nor the unregenerate except by a revival from the dead, or the actual abolition of death by Him who has "the keys of death and hadcs."

9. The dispensation next to follow this, is that of the "Kingdom of God;" in which Christ and his joint-heirs will take the kingdom under the whole heavens, and all nations, languages, people and kindreds of the earth will be required to serve and obey this new government: and the "King shall reign and prosper, and shall execute judgment and justice in the earth;" and "in His days shall the righteous flourish; and abundance of peace so long as the moon endureth" (Dan. ii. 34, 35, 44; vii. 18, 14, 19, 22, 27; Jer. xxiii. 5; Psa. lxxii. 7; and Rev. xi. 15).

Such is a brief outline of the views of the EDITOR of the BIBLE EXAMINER at the present time; but he does not consider himself stereotyped nor petrified. If he sees cause to modify or change his views, on any point, he will cheerfully do so. For the views of correspondents, he disclaims all responsibility, unless he endorses them; and then his endorsement is not to be construed to cover every expression of the writer but only the general subject. The EDITOR now hopes he will not be held responsible for the misrepresentation of his views by his opponents.

CHANGE OF FORM.

When the BIBLE EXAMINER was revised, two years ago, the EDITOR said, "Necessity has compelled it. We must be buried in silence or speak somewhere. Whether the present form assumed by the EXAMINER shall be its permanent one will depend upon circumstances."

Experience and "circumstances," have led me to conclude that the MAGAZINE form is better than the newspaper one, unless it was to be issued weekly; and that a Monthly is better than a semi-monthly. In the first place, the postage on a semi-monthly is twenty-four cents per year; while on a monthly it is only twelve cents. In the next place, the expense and labor of mailing is double on a semi-monthly to that on a monthly. Then it requires a greater confinement of the EDITOR at home when issued twice a month; though no less labor in preparing it for the press, as the amount of matter will not materially differ, and requires more care in selection and preparation; for, it is not to be supposed that every thing offered can go in. One thing more: A Magazine form is more easily preserved than a newspaper; and a firmer material will be used for paper, as our readers will see by the present issue; and you will take pleasure in loaning it to such as will read, and thereby increase its cir-ulation and usefulness. The expense of the Magazine, for a year, will be very slightly different from the semi-monthly of the past year. The price, therefore, will continue the same, except the subscribers will save twelve cents in postage.

The PRINCIPLES on which this MAGAZINE will be conducted cannot be set forth better than they were in the first issue of the revived EXAMINER, Sept. 15, 1871, as follows:

"We have been asked, 'Will it be a free paper?' It will be free to all candidly written articles, seeking or communicating light on the Bible; but they must be written plainly, so as not to ruin our eyes in attempting to decipher words and sentiments. As a general rule, we shall not permit personalities, or personal attacks on others. Let each writer state his own views of Bible teaching, without directly opening a controversy. Each one can do this, where he controverts the views of others, without calling the person by name. It is personalities that produce evil in controversy. It is easy to controvert a sentiment without naming the person who holds it. These remarks are designed to apply especially to different writers in a free paper.

"A BIBLE EXAMINER should have something of the character of a 'Bible Class,' the object of which is, not to establish a theory supposed to be accepted by all; but to elicit truth on all Bible subjects; not to stereotype what we think now to be truth, but to advance in the knowledge of God and his Christ, and of 'the things pertaining to the kingdom of God.' This will unavoidably lead to changes in some things and modifications in others. Paul saith, 'We know only in part.' If that was true in his case, how much more so in ours, who have but just emerged from the great apostacy which has blighted the truth by corrupting it, and filled christendom with darkness.

"Let us patiently hear what candid men and women may say, however their views may differ from ours. Let all be done in love, which 'is the fulfilling of the law.' When men become irritated because their views are not at once received, or are questioned, it is evident they are not yet as perfect in love as they should be, and before they write more, or speak more, they would do well to retire to their closets, and seek a more perfect conformity to the mind that was in Christ.

"Articles, of which the evident design is to exalt self, instead of God and Christ, will not be acceptable in our columns; nor does a free religious paper imply the insertion of such. The knowledge of God and his government of the world, and the knowledge of Christ as our Redeemer and Lord, to reign upon and over the earth, are the great BIBLE themes. Man's nature and destiny is involved in these, and must have our consideration."

The principles set forth above I expect to adhere to in conducting this MAGAZINE, and hope they may meet with the approval of all its readers and correspondents. Let Truth be the object of all; because it is truth that sanctifieth,— "Sanctify them through Thy truth," prayed Jesus, and added, "Thy word is truth" (John xvii. 17). Let us all lay aside self, and seek only to "know the only true God and Jesus Christ" (v. 3); then may we hope to attain unto that maturity which will secure a "part in the first resurrection" (Rev. xx. 6).

DEATH: WHAT IS IT FOR?

"It is for sin," you say. Very well; but is that all? No, verily! How little do men realize or think of what is involved in that which to them is so terrible. Is not even death appointed "for the glory of God, that the Son of God might be glorified thereby?" (John xi. 4). In the case of Lazarus, the brother of Mary and Martha, we see this fact stated and illustrated. "Lazarus is dead;" but Jesus calls him forth, and thus is manifested as "the Resurrection and the Life;" as "Lord of the dead" as well as of "the living" (John xi. 25, and Rom. xiv. 9).

In the great work of raising the human race into the "image of God," a work determined on before man was created (Gen. i. 26), the Son of God might, for all that we know, have accomplished that work without the intervention of death. But then how small, comparatively, would have been the manifestation of the glorious power and grace of God and his Son to what it now will be, after the race are not only redeemed from sin, but from death itself, which had seemed to blast all man's hope of a future beyond this present life; and when they are raised up under circumstances which may secure immortality, or an endless life, and which will secure that result unless man forfeits it by a wilful and deliberate rejection of the Son of God, his Redeemer, after the truth concerning Him has been fully and clearly set before him, and the redemption freely offered him for acceptance.

Death, then, is not only "for sin," but is an "appointment" (Heb. ix. 27) by which a manifestation of God's power and grace to man, through His Son, will shine on the race and to an intelligent universe in a manner never to be forgotten, and fill all minds with wonder and admiration which would lead them eternally to ascribe "Glory to God and the Lamb," and the Son of God be the wonder and admiration of men and angels for the marvelous work of raising men from sin, death, and corruption, into the "image of God," thus perfecting the great work designed or laid out when God said, "Let us make man in OUR IMAGE" (Gen. i. 26).

This work men generally, in christendom, suppose was completed when Adam was created. They mistake the commencement of a work for its completion. It was commenced when Adam was created from the dust of the earth, and is not yet completed, except in respect to one individual, viz., "The Son of man." The first Adam was but a "figure" of the man "to come" (Rom. v. 14); that man, Christ Jesus, was the perfected pattern after which the race are called to be conformed, and without which they never will come to the standard proposed in the creation of man.

Men would hurry the work of God, and fancy the building of God is completed while only the foundation is prepared, and the "Chief corner stone" is laid, which is Jesus Christ, the second Adam. Ages have past, and an "endless succession of ages to come" (Eph. iv. 21) will follow; at what period in these ages the work of making men in the image of God will be completed, is known only to the CREATOR and to Him who is "the Resurrection and the Life;" but we may be assured that when it is completed, death with its train of evils and their destruction, it will bring eternal "glory to God, and the Son of God will be glorified thereby." Then how will the past inspire confidence in God and his dear Son in all the endless ages thereafter, and fill with perpetual joy and rapture the redeemed race! What a contrast! Man formed of the dust of the earth, brought forward through sin, sorrow, tribulation, sufferings, death, and corruption, to a state where none of these evils exist, and raised into the "image of God." What a wondrous work! Nothing short of wisdom infinite, power without bounds, and love undying and never-failing could ever have accomplished such a work. Truly may it be said, "Great and marvelous are thy works, Lord God Almighty!"

(Rev. xv. 8). Truly then, and not till then, shall we be able fully "to know the love of Christ, which passeth knowledge," and "be filled with all the fulness of God" (Eph. iv. 19); but we may well say, "None unto Him that is able to do exceeding abundantly above all that we ask or think, according to the power that worketh in us; unto Him be glory in the church by Christ Jesus throughout the endless succession of ages" (verses 20, 21,—Macknight's translation).

Death, then, was "appointed for the glory of God, and that the Son of God might be glorified thereby," by undoing all the evil resulting from subjection to it, for a time. True, it has cost the Son of God humiliation, suffering, and death, to accomplish this great work; but for it, God has highly exalted him, and given him a NAME which is above every name; that at the Name of Jesus every knee should bow, and every tongue confess that He is Lord to the Glory of God the Father" (Phil. ii. 6-11.) And this homage is to be paid Him by "all in heaven, and in the earth, or under the earth." And this great glory to God and the Lamb is consummated through death, in spite of death, and by its final and eternal destruction. No wonder, then, that "man was made subject to vanity" (death, though) "not willingly, but by reason of Him who hath subjected them thereto in hope" (Rom. viii. 20).

Let us praise and adore God and his beloved Son, who are now engaged in the accomplishment of this glorious work, which, when completed, will cover them with endless glory, and be the subject of eternal wonder and admiration by all intelligent beings. AMEN. Let all now give glory to this wonder working CREATOR, and his Redeeming SON, through whom "all things" are to be created "new," and a universal harmony with God and each other is to be established.

EDITOR.

MAN'S RESPONSIBILITY.

OUR heavenly Father is not a hard master. He does not reap where He has not sown: He does not require faith nor obedience from beings capable of intelligence, whose organism or unavoidable circumstances prevent their exercise; for, "to him that knoweth to do good, and doeth it not, to him (only) it is sin" (Jas. iv. 17). Man was endowed by his Maker with an organism which the beasts did not possess. Only by the use of this, man obtains knowledge. But the means of knowledge must be placed within his reach. To "know the only true God and Jesus Christ" the truth concerning them must be presented to his mind when that mind is developed so as to be able to grasp this truth. Till this is done, man's responsibility does not really begin. To millions this is never done in this life. None will pretend it is done with respect to such as die in infancy; and it is equally true with regard to any man who has never heard of "the only true God and Jesus Christ." When the presentation of this truth is plainly set before the mind so developed as to be able to grasp it, then it is his responsibility in reference to an endless life begins. By faith in this truth, and in obedience to the demand it makes on the man he touches the fountain of spiritual or Divine life; for, "God hath given to us eternal life," (i. e., to all the race of men), "and this [divine] life is in his Son" (that is the fountain where none it can be obtained). "He that hath the Son," (hath taken hold of Him by faith as the source of the spiritual and endless life) "hath (the) life. He that hath not" (taken hold of) "the Son of God, hath not (this endless) life" (1 John v. 11, 12).

Hence, it is plain, that development and knowledge are both essential to faith and obedience; and at that point alone in man's history does his true trial commence for a spiritual, divine, or endless life. It is not for any one to say that this in all cases is confined to this present state, but it may, with respect to some, be far on in "the ages to come." He who denies this, denies that God ever designed salvation for millions of our race.

EDITOR.

ADMITTING, as we must do, that life is disciplinary and the world a scene at once of probation and education, it is hard to see how man can ever advance except through failures; how he can ever become what God means him to be unless he is permitted to choose his course independently, and then compelled to bear the consequences of his choice. But if these consequences be eternal and irreparable, the liberty given to him is worse than worthless. It can only be of value when it leads him, as the fruit of bitter experience, to choose obedience to God, a choice which, when perfected, necessarily leads to the supersession of law by love.—Selected.

CHAPTER I.

On Biblical Interpretation.

In preparing this work we have simply asked ourselves one question—"Why is it that Christian people read the Bible so differently?" that conflicting Sects alike appeal to it as the sole authority for their respective views? that Doctrines the most diverse are supposed to be equally well sustained by its statements? that as age after age rolls on, each coming generation repeats, to a great extent, the opinions of its predecessors,—follows as a rule, the same lines of thought,—lives nearly the same life,—nourishes the same prejudices, and stereotypes at once old formulas and old divisions?

In searching for an answer we have been led to conclude that the true explanation will be found in that prevailing neglect of the Bible, as a whole, which arises from its being almost always read in fragments; in forgetfulness of the particular purpose for which the Book was given; in confusions regarding its Inspiration; in error relating to the Holy Spirit; in the confounding of revealed facts with human inferences; in bias of one kind or another; in reading, either for "edification," or for the kindling of devout feeling, without first ascertaining the meaning of that which is read: in the habit of accommodating Scripture, or of perverting it, by the exaggeration, projection, or other misapplication of texts; in allegorizing, under the influence of an unbridled fancy; in the abuse of parallel passages and references; in that darkening of the sense which is frequently occasioned by injudicious division into chapters and verses; in the acceptance of interpretations drawn only from hymns; in the neglect and consequent abuse of unfulfilled prophecy; in inattention to the character of the particular dispensation under which we are living; in errors as to church authority, and the value of tradition; in undue reliance on the professed labors of the clergy; in turning helps into hindrances; and, above all, in habitual indifference to the demand Scripture makes on every man for prolonged study, as an essential pre-requisite to the elevation by its means of moral character.

To each of these points we propose to direct attention.

ON BIBLICAL INTERPRETATION, regarded as a Science, we shall offer only a few general remarks.

This Science, like most others, has a history, by the study of which its value and character will best be understood.

It commenced with the Jews, in relation, of course, to the OLD TESTAMENT, and was carried on with amazing learning and ingenuity, by the Rabbis for many centuries. It then comprised, on the one hand, the Traditions of the Church, and, on the other, the Expositions of the Doctors. The former were, for the most part, supposed to have been delivered to Moses while in the Mount, and subsequently transmitted, through Prophets and Priests, to later times; the latter were the result of the accumulated wisdom of the ages.

And now the question arises,—"What was all this worth?" Christ and his Apostles furnish us with a reply. Ye have made, says our Lord to the Pharisees, the commandment of God "of none effect through your tradition" (Mark vii. 13). Ye are "redeemed," says St. Peter, from your "vain conversation received by tradition from your fathers" (1 Pet. i. 18). "Beware," says St. Paul, "lest any man spoil you through philosophy and vain deceit, after the tradition of men" (Col. ii. 8).

After the death of the apostles, and the cessation of the inspired oral teaching, the New Testament became subject to the very same process which had destroyed the value of the Old. Tradition again raised its head. The Apostles, it was said, delivered many things to the Primitive Church only by word of mouth; which things, having been transmitted through faithful men, ought to be regarded, in some cases, as authorized explanations of the written word, and, in other cases, as useful additions to its testimony; a theory which, as before, soon made the commandment of God of none effect. Exposition speedily followed; and under the impression that Truth was to be developed out of the Bible, rather than found in it, men, mighty in intellect, but not above their age in Divine knowledge,—some times ambitious of power, and often superstitious, laid broad and deep the foundations of SYSTEMATIC THEOLOGY.

Three eras in the growth of this Science may be distinctly marked.

The first is that of Origen, who was born about ninety years after the death of the Apostle John, and who, as an expositor, exercised great influence in his day. Regarding him, as we fairly may, as the representative man of his time, we find that now a two-fold sense, and a four-fold application, were supposed to attach to almost every text in Scripture,—a method of interpretation loose enough for the exercise of the most lively fancy, and eminently favorable to the incursions of subtle intellects. Under this treatment the simplicity of Evangelical Truth rapidly disappeared.

The second era is that of Vincent of Lerins (A. D. 440), who, partly in consequence of the interminable varieties of opinion introduced by the Mystics, and partly to prevent the growth of any sentiment unfavorable to Church ascendancy, laid down this rule,—Nothing is to be received as Gospel truth which has not been “believed everywhere, always, and by all.” This formula, which was intended to confine the interpretation of Scripture to the explanation of the more orthodox Ecclesiastics, was generally adopted during the “Middle Ages,” and is still the stronghold of the advocates of what are usually called “CHURCH PRINCIPLES.”

The third era is that of the Reformers, who set out with a profession of adherence to the literal and grammatical meaning of the Word, but were very soon driven into the adoption of most of the views held by those of “the fathers” who lived before the completion of the Romish apostacy, and were generally accounted evangelical. Amongst these, Augustine always held the chief place.

The present rule is, to interpret Scripture according to the creed of the Church to which the expositor may belong,—some inclining to rationalistic methods, others to mystical views, but Protestant Evangelic Christians adhering, in the main, to the doctrines held first by the Reformers, and subsequently by the Puritans.

A revision of the whole subject is now earnestly demanded; sometimes by men who have lost faith in Scripture altogether, but more frequently by those who hope and believe that what is true and good in the expositions of the past will only be the more firmly established by renewed investigation; that mere accretions, the errors and exaggerations which old prejudices and still pending strifes have gathered around the pure Word, will be purged away; and that, under the influence of honesty and common sense, of candor and of calmness, the Gospel in all its simplicity may once more be restored to us, and “a world wearied of the heat and dust of controversy, of speculations about God and man,—weary, too, of the rapidity of its own motion,—may, to some extent, at least, return home and find rest.”

Before this can be done, however, two questions must be settled.

The first is, Whether or no the Bible is to be interpreted like any other book?

The second is, Whether it is to be regarded as having more than one meaning?

On the answer given to these two questions almost everything depends.

We have here nothing to do with what Mr. Jowett or any one else may by some be supposed to wish or mean in saying, “Interpret the Scriptures like any other book;” we simply inquire whether the rule, in its practical application, is a sound and good one?

Properly understood, we think it is. We say properly understood, for it is not fair to say that such a rule ignores the peculiarities which distinguish the Bible from uninspired productions. It does no such thing. As well might it be pretended that its application to Bunyan’s “Pilgrim’s Progress” would prevent that book from being recognized as an allegorical record of Christian experience.

What is meant by the rule is plain enough, viz., that the Bible must be interpreted by the common laws of language, just as every other book must be interpreted. And surely this may be done without ceasing to bear in mind that Scripture is a connected series of tracts, written without concert by men living fifteen hundred years apart; that some things in it are typical, and others prophetic; that there is parable in it as well as poetry; and that much relates to modes of life and conditions of society very different from our own.

What is intended to be forbidden by the rule is, that method of interpreting Scripture which disregards the context; which often makes mere sound “an echo to the sense;” which is ever looking for meanings which the words do not convey; and which ends in transforming the Bible into a book without any definite or proper meaning of its own.

The second question, Whether the Bible ought or ought not to be regarded as having more than one meaning?—viz., that which it had to the prophet or evangelist who speaks, or to the people who first listened, can, in like manner, only be answered as it is understood.

If, by this statement, is meant that the Old Testament prophets always comprehended the depth of their own utterances, or that the people who, at a later period, heard the words of our Lord and his disciples, fully understood the teaching, nothing can be more delusive. For who does not know that Daniel says, “I heard but I understood not;” that the Evangelists frequently confess their ignorance of sayings which were not made plain until after the resurrection; that again and again it is recorded of the multitude that “they understood Him not”?

But is it fair to argue that because prophets, evangelists, or people confess ignorance, therefore Scripture has not one plain and primitive meaning? or to proclaim, with something like exultation, that Parables have two meanings, and Prophecies many? We think not; for the meaning of Scripture is one thing, and its capacity of application, or its expression in figurative language, is quite another thing. It is, in truth, but trifling with serious matters, to maintain, as has recently been done, that if the rule in question be affirmed, the declaration, "Judah is a lion's whelp," must of necessity be construed literally.

The real question at issue is,—“Are we to follow the fathers into the mystical and allegorical explanations of the Word of God, or are we to receive it like little children, in its plain, natural and obvious meaning? In other words, are we to deal with the Holy Scriptures of the New Testament as the Jews dealt with the Old? as the Hindoo has done with the Vedas? as the Mohammedan docs with the Koran?”

Before we decide, let us consider what the decision involves. The mystical method is a two-edged sword, and can cut with equal sharpness in opposite directions. If it can turn the scarlet cord of Rahab into a type of the blood of Christ, it can also convert the voice of the Lord to Abraham into “the fierce ritual of Syria,” bidding, “with the awe of a Divine voice,” Abraham to slay his son. If, in expounding Ezekiel (xxxiv. 23, 24; xxxvii. 22-28), “David my servant” may be changed into Christ the Son, it seems difficult to perceive why the angel who slew the firstborn may not also be transformed into “the Bedouin host,” who were “akin to Jethro, and, more remotely, to Israel.”

One word in conclusion. Let no one say in his “haste” that he has nothing to do with principles of Biblical Interpretation; that the poor and the ignorant, to whom the Gospel was primarily sent, can never be benefited by such inquiries; that simple-minded Christians are, happily, unaffected by discussions which relate to difficulties they have never felt, and into the merits of which they are, in a great measure, incapacitated from entering.

This is not true; for, as been well said, “the healthy tone of religion among the poor and uneducated depends, to a very great extent, on the truthfulness of the doctrines they are taught by their superiors. Truth is to the world what holiness of life is to the individual,—the source of justice, peace, and good.” The Reformation from Popery would never have been achieved but for controversies which must have been to many a pious heart of that day the source of unmixed pain and regret.

The discussions that distress us now will be blest indeed if they lead, as we trust they will, to the conviction that “Biblical Criticism has hitherto hung to the past, and been truer to the traditions of the Church than to the words of Christ;” that he who wants to know, “not what Scripture may be made to mean, but what it really does mean,” may, by “confining himself to the plain meaning of words, and the study of their context, obtain a deeper insight into the original spirit and intention of the New Testament than was ever possessed by the controversial writers of former ages;” that the one great qualification for understanding Scripture is, that moral sympathy with God which overcomes prejudices as well as passions, and makes familiarity with his word essential to happiness. .

CHAPTER II.

The Bible a Neglected Book.

“Our books, well trimmed and in the gayest style,
Like armies standing close in rank and file,
Adorn our intellects as well as shelves,
And teach us notions splendid as themselves;
The Bible alone stands neglected there,
Though that of all most worthy of our care:
This, like an infant, troublesome awake,
Is left to sleep, for peace and quiet sake.”

MANY years ago we wrote and published these words: “No book in the world was ever so generally possessed, and so little comprehended, as an English Bible in the present day. Everything in society is unfavorable to its profitable perusal; the ceaseless activities of the good, and the restless insinuations of the bad,—textual preaching and tormenting criticism,—the multiplication of books, and the mingling of things sacred and profane, all tend to keep men from feeding in green pastures, or reposing by the side of still waters. And so it comes to pass, amid many contradictory things, that while the Bible is more widely circulated than ever, it is much less read than formerly, and scarcely at all understood.

“The result is—for that which affects the people affects the priest,—that while public worship was never so well attended as at present, the pulpit was never so powerless; conduct in the counting-house never so independent of attention in the pew; scepticism never so rampant; and happy Christians never so rare.”

We see no reason either to retract or to modify these sad convictions.

Sad when it is recollected that the Book to which they relate is one to which we are indebted for more than we can well express; for all our knowledge of the greatest fact in existence,— the birth of the world in which we live; for the only authentic account that we possess of the origin and infancy of its inhabitants; for all we know about the introduction of natural and moral evil into it; and for all we can rely upon in relation to the hopes and prospects which await mankind beyond the grave.

Sad when we reflect that this neglected Volume is the great charter of human freedom, and the sole controller of its excesses; that by saving us from discord, revolution and crime, it has more than once proved that our institutions have no permanent basis, and our liberties no safeguard, apart from the virtues it inculcates, and the spirit it fosters.

Sadly we remember that no study is so exciting, expanding, and ennobling, as that of Holy Scripture; that every page is marked by a majesty and purity which belong to no other composition; that no man can long breathe its atmosphere without purifying his taste, enlarging his mind, and improving his heart.

Saddest of all when we think of it as the chief storehouse of Divine truth; the only key to the mysteries of existence; the sure revelation of mercy to sinners; the basis of all practical virtue; the STATUTE-BOOK OF HEAVEN.

WITNESSING AND WORKING.

[The following remarks, by Dr. LEASK, are earnestly commended to the readers of the BIBLE EXAMINER, as I commence this new volume, hoping they may induce action worthy of Christian men and women.—EDITOR.]

THESE are the spheres of action in which the "Lord of all" has placed his chosen followers. Some of them excel in witnessing; others in working. To bear witness is really to work in the most important sense, even though the witness should do nothing but testify by voice or pen; for this testimony is the capital upon which the practical workers draw when they repeat the evidence in support of any given truth, or by their money give it circulation. Division of labor is an acknowledged necessity. Without this it is impossible to carry out any purpose, either in the Church or the world. The head that plans must be supplemented by the hands that toil and the purse that gives. The head, the hand, and the purse are component parts of the concrete scheme.

Here is the quiet student, who thinks on paper, with pen in hand, and a half dozen books lying open before him; or, if you prefer it, one book only—the Book whence issues the spring of all original and glorious thought. He may have lofty and holy communings with the invisible; he may see on the horizon of revelation glimpses and glimmerings of entrancing beauty; or, borne on the wings of hope, his eye may fall on some glorious landscape of prophecy already bright with the herald beams of the descending Son of man; but what purpose, beyond his own comfort and edification, can be served by committing these thoughts and pictures to the press—if willing hands and consecrated gold are not ready to aid in their extensive distribution?

Co-operation in good works should be the joy of those for whom all things co-operate for good. As theirs is a splendid future, theirs should be a useful present. We cannot repay Christ; we shall be in his debt forever; and, unlike the effect of worldly debts, the consciousness of that debt will be a source of joy unspeakable. But there is something that we can do now, not by way of repayment, for that is simply absurd; but by way of testimony to the grace and goodness of our glorious LIFE-GIVER. And he is so marvellously condescending, and so attentive to the smallest things done from the right motive, that "two mites, which make a farthing," have secured for a certain poor widow a niche in the temple of fame far above that of philosopher, poet, or hero in Greek or Roman story. It was a very small thing that you did the other day when you put a farthing tract in the hands of a thoughtless young man; but it contained the amazing words of John iii. 16, and you sent up to heaven this short prayer, "Lord, bless the tract to that youth." What if that small gift and brief prayer should meet you in the kingdom in the form of a friend and companion, who shall say, "The Lord brought me to himself through you."

The truth is, we cannot tell what may be the effect—long continued, and multiplied by new agencies—of any act of ours. The Lord accepts service from consecrated hearts and hands, but does not tell us what its issues are to be. These—concealed from us in the meantime—are controlled and directed by his wisdom and grace so as to secure the result he desires. "For as the rain cometh down, and the snow from heaven, and returneth not thither, but watereth the earth, and maketh it bring forth and bud, that it may give seed to the sower and bread to the eater; so shall my word be that goeth forth out of my mouth: it shall not return unto me void, but it shall accomplish that which I please, and it shall prosper in the thing whereto I sent it." But probable or possible consequences, however pleasant to contemplate, are not the law of ac-vice. That stands in sublime dignity by itself, unaffected by storm or sunshine during the process of service, and uninfluenced by the result, be it failure or success. "Lovest thou Me?" that is the supreme, comprehensive, beautiful law of the Divine Master. It is incomparably the finest thing in the field of motive. "Lovest thou Me?" Then feed my lambs,—feed my sheep,—preach my gospel,—bear witness of me,—keep my commandments,—love one another,—and bring forth much fruit to the glory of my Father, my God and your God.

Who can resist this? Who could even wish to resist it? It needs no argument; for it is every argument in one, summed up and glorified in the person of our beloved Lord, the living, loving, personal Christ. To make known his truth, so far as tongue, and pen, and life, and purse can do it when love to him sways the heart, is not obedience to a stern behest rendered to avoid the penalty of disgrace or punishment; but the enjoyment of a privilege, and an honor which stirs the soul with gratitude. Love does not keep a pen and ink list of her sacrifices, or bear her burdens with groan and sigh, as a poor legalist buying pardon and heaven from a bargain-making God; for her eyes have been anointed, and she sees that slave-work and bargain-making are as utterly opposed to the true Christian life as light and freedom are to night and bondage. The true idea of the Christian life is Christ's life in the believer manifesting itself by holy obedience. This, therefore, precludes the spirit of bondage, with its wearisome and profitless tasks self-imposed in ignorance both of the character of God and the Divine work of redemption. If love makes sacrifices in honor of him whose heart gave her birth—and she often gladly does—the fact ranks among her choice privileges, for which she gives praise. The costly box of ointment is for the Lord; and if he graciously accepts it, the giver is paid a thousand fold; for his radiant smile, which is worth all the spikenard in the world, is a recognition and approval of the motive which sanctifies the deed. It is not what a man does, but why he does it, that becomes the real test of character. Our position in the moral universe is determined by this; and as the appointed Judge of all is also the searcher of hearts, it follows, beyond doubt, that the ultimate decision, in the case of every individual, will be absolutely and eternally right.

But how pregnant with practical impulse is such a thought as this! He whose name we bear and for whom we witness and work, is our Judge. We believe, we profess to believe, that he is the rightful owner and Lord of the world; that he is simply waiting "the time appointed of the Father" to take possession thereof; that in him alone is the possibility of eternal life to any human being; that everything sinks into absolute insignificance compared with his most precious truth; that that truth is terribly misunderstood by the enormous majority of mankind, even in christendom; and that enlightened Christians are the only possible witnesses to whom he looks for the vindication of his character and claims during his absence; and yet how few of us are doing anything like what we might do in the way of testimony and sacrifice for his glorious name! A deep sense of humiliation because of past unfruitfulness should prompt the determination that henceforth we shall speak, and write, and live, and give for the truth, and its claims, and the kingdom of our great Lord as we have never done before.

Besides, it is manifest that the time for action and sacrifice is rapidly passing. The predicted signs of the last days are around us. Rome has filled the cup of her iniquity by assuming the incommunicable prerogative of Jehovah. Spiritualism is flooding the land and bewitching the philosophers. It is pitiful to see how wise men and learned critics grope in the fog concerning the foretold incursion of demonism as the herald of Antichrist. It is an "occult power;" it is "psychical force;" it is a "subtle influence, the law of which we have not yet discovered;" it is "proof positive of the immortality of the soul." Such are a few of the fine phrases without meaning, by which newspapers and quarterlies enlighten their readers. Paul's prophetic testimony goes direct to the heart of the subject, and in a few plain words tells us what the phenomenon means. But our savants have a prejudice against Paul. He is not invited to join a circle of Spiritualists, and his doctrine in Quarterly or Daily would offend the intellectual scepticism of the age. To tell the men of science and polite literature, the men of influence and high social position, the statesmen and crowned heads of Europe, who believe in Spiritualism as a channel of communication between the living and the dead, that they are the victims and sport of demons, would be extremely rude. That would never do. It is true, nevertheless.

It is a special privilege to the faithful Christian to live on the eve of the Lord's return in glory; but a privilege which involves special duties. Faith, hope, fidelity of no common type are demanded to-day. The hosts of evil are gathering strength and preparing for a battle of whose issues they know not, and refuse to be informed. We tell them of the sure word of prophecy, and of the foreordained destruction of all the enemies of the Lord; but they simply laugh at our "weakness," and look with contempt on our "fanaticism." These things, however, give additional force to the argument for clear testimony and active labor. We must warn, expostulate, teach, and scatter the truth with liberal hand, leaving the issue with Him who is at once the witness of our testimony, and the owner of the silver and the gold.

DAVID'S LAST PRAYER.

"Blessed be His glorious name: and let the whole earth be filled with His glory. Amen and amen. The prayers of David, the son of Jesse, are ended."—Isa. lxxii. 19, 20.

It has been said,—and truly, no doubt,—that nothing genuine, superlatively good, exists, of which there is not a counterfeit. And so, it may be reasonably assumed, much is offered as prayer that is only such in name. All prayers, professedly so, are not genuine. A vast number of petitions offered under the name of prayer are never answered, and hence are successful only so far as they constitute an exhibition of sacred oratory, giving an eloquent portraiture of their virtues, and rehearsing what God has done in the ages past. It is safe to say that such prayers are but as "tinkling symbols" in the ears of God.

Nor, again, are all prayers answered which are offered in the true spirit of devotion,—even in the meek, supplicating spirit of the Man of Sorrows,—because, to answer them would require nothing short of the performance of a miracle by God. We are not living in an age of miracles, and, hence, have no warrant to expect such a manifestation of Divine power in answer to prayer.

Successful prayer embraces more than finely worded, eloquent petitions; more, even, than a genuine spirit of devotion. It is that which asks God for what he has promised. It is Bible prayer, for the Bible is the only authentic record we have of God's promises to the children of Adam. He who offers a Bible prayer meekly asks God for what He has promised, with a sense of the need of those things, as well as a desire for them. Hence, successful prayer is the language of the need of and the desire for the things embraced in God's promises. The subjects of prayer we cannot now consider. They are revealed everywhere in the pages of inspiration.

David uttered none but successful prayers, so far as we can know. To deny this would be a denial that his productions were divinely inspired, which, to say the least, would involve the veracity of the Book of Psalms. No Christian will do this; and as we are writing for Christian readers, we will not dwell on this point. We conclude, therefore, that whatever David prayed for is certain of accomplishment.

An important feature of the last prayers of David, as revealed in the 72d Psalm, and one which greatly concerns us, is the fact that he prays with a prophetic spirit. In concluding his wonderful prayers by beseeching God to "let the whole earth be filled with His glory," his mind is apparently electrified by the remembrance of God's promise, long before made: "As I live, the whole earth shall be filled with the glory of the Lord" (Num. xiv. 21). If any think that imitating David's manner of praying we lay undue stress on this promise, let them remember that David's earnest pleading to "let the whole earth be filled with His glory," should form the essence of all Christian prayer, for Christ embodies it in the model prayer of all time, and enjoins us to pray for His kingdom to come, and His "will be done in earth as it is in heaven" (Matt. vi. 10). The earth has not yet been filled with the glory of God,—His kingdom has not yet come, and His will is not yet done in earth as it is in heaven; hence, God's promise remains unfulfilled, and David's prayer is yet unanswered.

The conclusion is unavoidable, therefore, that David looked forward, prophetically, to an age, or ages yet to come,—the glorious "times of restitution,"—when God's promise should be fulfilled; and every one who utters the Lord's Prayer in the spirit in which it was given by the Master, looks forward to the same blessed era.

Let us look at a few characteristics of that restitution age, as revealed in the last prayers of David, then future and still to come.

1. The curse shall be lifted from the earth, and it shall bring forth in great abundance. "A handful of corn in the earth upon the top of the mountains" shall bring forth in such abundance that "the fruit thereof shall shake like Lebanon" (verse 10). And, as the prophet Isaiah says, "Instead of the thorn shall come up the fir tree, and instead of the brier shall come up the myrtle tree; and it shall be to the Lord for a name, for an everlasting sign that shall not be cut off" (Isaiah iv. 55). As another has expressed it: Noxious, poisonous weeds which drink up the earth's substance and choke the growth, and cause the death of better and nobler things, and demand daily the consuming toil and the laborious sweat of the husbandman's brow to keep them in subjection, shall have no congenial soil whereto to grow; for the earth renewed will produce only that which is delightful and profitable to man.—“that which is pleasant to the sight and good for food.” “The earth shall yield her increase, and God, even Israel’s God, shall bless the people.”

2. Christ, the Son of David and heir to his throne, shall be enthroned the sovereign ruler of earth, and reign over all nations. “He shall have dominion from sea to sea, and from the river (Euphrates) to the ends of the earth. They that dwell in the wilderness shall bow before him; and his enemies shall lick the dust. . . . Yea, all kings shall fall down before him; and all nations shall serve him” (verses 8-11). His royalty and merciful sceptre shall be seen unto the ends of the earth, and everywhere shall the blessedness of his righteous, holy government be felt. The curse, under which the whole creation have so long travailed together, shall be removed; and delivered from the bondage of corruption, the earth, and all nations, under the blessedness of the rule of that KING whose right it is to reign, shall celebrate with rapturous joy their long foretold and blissful jubilee. “Nation after nation shall take up the strain; onward and onward the anthem of praise shall roll, till the untiring song of triumph is echoed round our joyful globe, and poured from holy tongues, in all its sweetness, into the ear of Him who will sit upon the throne of David, and rule over the house of Jacob.”

3. Enmity and animosity, the blighting curse of all ages, will be supplanted by peace and righteousness, and there shall be “abundance of peace so long as the moon endureth.” Marshalled hosts shall not be seen in furious battle; the din of war shall no longer be heard, nor men seen with their garments rolled in blood. Fiendish enmity will not nerve man to lift the dagger against his brother. Nay, a fraternal spirit will pervade the world. Love and friendship will burn in every word and be embodied in every action. Nations will beat their swords into ploughshares, and their spears into pruning hooks, and under Messiah’s peaceful reign wars unto the ends of the earth shall cease. Then will the Lord “turn to the people a pure language that they may call upon the name of the Lord to serve him with one consent;” and men will flock to the city of the great King, and say, “Come ye, and let us go up to the mountain of the Lord, to the house of the God of Jacob, and He will teach us of His ways, and we will walk in His paths; for out of Zion shall go forth the law, the word of the Lord from Jerusalem.”

And worship at His feet; all nations come.
Flocking like doves.”

4. David also prays in the prophetic spirit for that age to come that Irael may occupy their true position in the earth, and be a blessing among the nations. The King of Israel shall judge them with righteousness, and “He shall save the children of the needy, and shall break in pieces the oppressor.” And it is added, “They shall fear Thee as long as the sun and moon endure, throughout all generations,” and “precious their blood shall be in His sight.” David reveals the conversion of the Jewish nation in that age to come, and through their instrumentality will come the final conversion of the world. For God will be merciful to the Jewish nation, and “bless” them, and “cause His face to shine” upon them; and then will His way “be known upon earth,” and His “saving health among all nations.” (Psa. lxxvii.) Then will

“One song employ all nations; and all cry, Worthy the Lamb, for He was slain for us!”

O blissful era! David would hasten it with his prayers; even so let us more earnestly pray, “Let Thy kingdom come!”

Such are a few of the characteristics of that age to come for which David prayed. As this period when the whole earth shall be filled with the glory of the Lord, lies beyond the second coming of Christ, hence David prayed for His coming as well as for earth’s redemption and the restoration of paradise. But more than this: David’s prayer is for every individual, that they may taste of and feel the goodness and love of our God; that all, from the highest to the lowest, may see the sunlight of heaven as manifested in His beloved Son; that no part of the earth’s surface shall escape the ineffable light of the Sun of righteousness. Nor did David pray for less than God had promised. Perhaps he had in his mind God’s wondrous promise to Abraham which He confirmed by an oath, viz., “In thee (Abraham) and in thy Seed (Christ) shall all the families of the earth be blessed.”

Heathen darkness may now repel the blessed gospel light, and missionary societies now lament their failure to make any progress toward the conversion of the world; but a mighty change is coming. Gross darkness shall not always cover the earth. Death shall not always hold in its merciless grasp, in heathen lands, nine-tenths of the human family, who never heard of a heavenly Father and His love. No! God has promised and pledged his very existence for its accomplishment, that they shall all “be blessed,” which can signify nothing less than the removal of all disabilities to the exercise of their divinely-given faculties of free agency with reference to their final destiny. Thus, here or hereafter, an opportunity to secure eternal life will be given to all men. Surely, this is a blessed consummation to pray for.

HUMAN REDEMPTION.—No. 1.

[The following is an Extract from HENRY DUNN's work on "The Destiny of the Human Race." It will be followed by others.—EDITOR.]

THE OBJECT OF THE WORK.

WHAT we want to know is simply this;—Whether it has, or has not pleased God to reveal in Holy Scripture anything regarding the final destiny of the human race viewed collectively and as a whole?

I am not supposing that any difficulty exists as to the teaching of the Bible relative to the future lot of those—be they many or few—who, in whatever form, obtain such an acquaintance with the will of God, that the acceptance or rejection of the salvation offered in the Gospel becomes to them a matter of necessity. I am neither directly nor indirectly seeking to uphold what is usually termed "Universalism;" for the probability that some will be finally lost,—whatever that may imply,—seems to me to be an inevitable inference from certain passages of Scripture. It is, at least an unauthorized conclusion to insist that no man can or will utterly destroy himself.

I am not, for an instant, questioning the existence of a redeemed and elect Church, "chosen" in Christ "before the foundation of the world" (Eph. i. 4); for, open the Bible where we may, we find a doctrine of election, running, like a line of light, throughout the entire book, illuminating some of its darkest passages, and only disappearing amid the effulgence of a glory which bathes all around in its unutterable splendors.

The inquiry simply relates to the race considered as a whole; to the men that, in the days of Noah, "filled the earth with violence, and perished amid the waters of the deluge; to the children of Israel, fullen and apostate in the times of the prophets; to the great idolatrous empires which seduced and ultimately enslaved them; to the Greeks and the Romans, the civilizers and lawgivers of modern organized society; to the Jew, peeled, and scattered, and unbelieving, in all lands through more than eighteen hundred years; the countless millions of China and India, and of the North, which every thirty years pass away and repeat their numbers; to Africa, with her endless tribes, and dark and cruel superstitions; to slaves, enslaved either by cupidity or lust; to the Mahomedan everywhere; to that vast mass of humanity, in short, which, at any given period may be estimated at eight hundred or a thousand millions, and which, multiplied by each successive generation as it comes and goes, at length accumulates an amount of sin and sorrow, of superstition, cruelty and blood, at the very thought of which the human mind reels, until relieved by the recollection that to each separate sufferer God has given many animal enjoyments, some pure affections, relative or social, and a capacity, at least, for much that is far higher and nobler than anything that here appears to find birth and development.

The question we want answered, in regard to all this multitude of beings, is, Whither do they go? Christ is the Redeemer of "the world;"—in what sense has He redeemed them? The Gospel is, avowedly, "good tidings of great joy, which shall be to all people" (Luke ii. 10); when and how will it become such to these of whom we speak? Christ is to have the "hethen" for His "inheritance," and "the uttermost parts of the earth" for His "possession" (Psa. ii. 8);—does the "inheritance" referred to include or exclude the countless myriads that are already dead and gone? The Lord Jesus came "to destroy the works of the devil" (1 John iii. 8);—will an incalculably vast majority of all who have ever lived and breathed on earth be given to the great enemy forever?

Indifference, or devout timidity, calling itself submission, may set aside all such inquiries as unpractical, or even dangerous; indolence, under the guise of humility, may refuse to look at them; spiritual selfishness, wrapt in the mantle of its own supposed security, may forbid such investigations as presumptuous; but Christ-like souls can no more be unconcerned as to what may or may not be revelled respecting this vast sum of humanity, than they can stand by unaffected when the destitute perish from hunger, or the dying agonize in pain.

The indifference of modern thought in relation to the future life is as foreign to the spirit of the prophets of the Old Testament dispensation as it is to that of the apostles of the New. John "wept much" when no man was found worthy to open and to read the mystic book of the Apocalyptic vision. The tenderness that thus expressed itself was neither weak nor blame worthy; it was the pity of the child of God. He could not be content till he knew more of the destinies of his race, because the Father of that race would not allow him to be content.

Would not allow him,—I say it reverently,—to be content, as modern Christians are, to leave the matter uninquied into, exclaiming, but in a very different sense from that in which Abraham uttered the words, "Shall not the Judge of all the earth do right?" A virtuous heathen, in his darkness, might have said as much as they do. In the absence of revelation, such a course—the only one then possible—would be piety. In men who have the Bible in their hands, it is but the cloak of indifference.

It is often urged, and by many regarded as a sufficient reason for abstaining from all inquiry into a subject confessedly obscure and difficult, that the existence of evil is the one great, insoluble mystery,—that there is, in fact, no other difficulty in theology beyond: and that until this is accounted for, all investigations, into the character and course of the Divine procedure are vain and futile. I deny such a conclusion altogether. The existence of evil is not the mystery of mysteries. It is made such only as a pretext for deterring men from the examination of theological conclusions as to its eternity and final consequences to the race. It is surely not very difficult to see that to creatures the knowledge and the experience of evil is essential to the knowledge and experience of some of the highest forms of good; that he who, in a world like this, is led by Divine grace voluntarily to choose God as his portion, is higher, far higher, than he who never knew that any other choice was possible.

The grand peculiarity of the Christian revelation is, that it represents God as yearning—if I may so speak—for human affection. Abraham is the friend of God; David is a man after God's own heart; "I call you not servants, but friends," says Christ to his disciples. The appeal to all men is, "My son, give me thine heart." It is this revelation of Himself to men,—perfected in the Incarnation,—that renders love to God possible. For aught we can tell, love to God, properly so termed, can be exercised only by redeemed men. Angels, or other high and glorious intelligences, may adore, or admire,—be filled with awe or wonder,—but we have no proof that they can love God as a redeemed sinner does, or that they can ever be partakers of the Divine nature in the sense of that oneness with God through Christ which is the peculiar privilege of His people. Evil, and its accompaniments, pain and sorrow, alone render this peculiar fellowship in good possible.

We may, indeed, never be able to remove all that is perplexing or oppressive to the heart in the condition of humanity; we may be obliged, again and again, to fall back upon the assurance that every individual man is in the hands of One infinitely wiser and more loving than ourselves; but we should be unchristian, if not inhuman, were we to feel no interest in the inquiry whether the sufferings of the race will terminate with mortal life;—whether in other worlds they will be continued as disciplinary, and therefore conducive to improvement; or whether, being simply punitive, they will be prolonged and intensified through all eternity.

Yes; this is the question,—which Piety has too long considered insoluble, and to which Priestcraft has ever turned as the pillar of its vile pretensions. Reason, indeed, can give us no reply to it; but Scripture, perchance, may do so; for, as Butler wisely remarks, "the whole scheme of Scripture is not yet understood; nor is it at all incredible that a book, which has been so long in the possession of mankind, should contain many truths as yet undiscovered."

All that we know of the Divine character leads us to suppose that some light, at least, is thrown there on this great question. All that we feel of the Divine love within our own bosoms,—the boundless pity it gives birth to, and the benevolence it excites and fosters; all that is involved in the assurance that, while "secret things belong unto the Lord our God, those things which are revealed belong" to us and to our children; that while "it is the glory of God to conceal," it is "the honor" of man (kings) to "search out a matter" (Prov. xxv. 2),—all these alike encourage us, hopefully, earnestly, and humbly, with true and sincere hearts, diligently to employ every faculty in an inquiry which, end as it may, can only lead to fresh assurances that God is love.—that Christ is Lord of all creation,—and that evil with its depths of mystery, is now, and shall be evermore, self destructive, and subordinate to good.

We ask, then, on this, as on every other subject that pertains to the hereafter, simply, "What with the Scriptures?" We seek the response from that holy oracle, precisely as we should seek one from Nature, were we endeavoring to fathom her secrets. Not by any supposed "light within;" not by the help of any imaginary personal insight or semi-inspiration fitted to explain or to override the inspiration of prophets and apostles; not by elaborately drawn inferences, however ingenious or apparently necessary; not by the application, in any form, of a merely human and finite logic to that which has relations with "the Infinite and Unconditioned," can we hope, in this matter, to obtain satisfaction for our souls. Christ-like simplicity (which may God, in his mercy, grant us), dealing with revealed facts just as they stand in the Divine record and interpreting them naturally and by the context, without regard to any system of theology, or to any preconceived conclusion, can alone, we are well aware, lead us to truth and to repose.

Such is the temper and spirit in which we desire to carry on our inquiry. That we shall fail, to some degree, at least, in doing so, is but too probable. We commend ourselves, therefore, to Him who can alone "keep us from falling," and leave in His hand the result of our pains.

Robert Hall says, "The revelation contained in the Scriptures extends only to FACTS; not to the theory of these facts, or their original causes. The most important truths are communicated in a dogmatic, not a theoretic manner. We are taught on the testimony of Him who cannot lie, insulated facts, which we cannot connect with those reasons with which they are undoubtedly connected in the Divine mind. They rest solely on the basis of Divine authority; and we are left as much in the dark with respect to the mode of their existence, as if they were not revealed."

A SCRIPTURE FACT, then, is to us revealed truth, dogmatically communicated; resting solely on the basis of the Divine authority; and viewed apart from any reasons for its proclamation, or any deductions which may be drawn from it. And this, be it observed, whether that which is revealed be an event, or whether it be what is usually termed a doctrine.

Two objections, which some may regard as preliminary, must not however escape notice.

The first is, that the question at issue ought to be regarded as already settled, by the general consent of the Church in relation to the teaching of Scripture; nay, that St. Paul, in the Epistle to the Romans, has, by inspiration, said all that can be said upon it, in telling us that "when the Gentiles which have not the law (i. e., a written law), do by nature the things contained in the law, these, having not the law, are a law unto themselves; which show the work of the law written in their hearts, their conscience also bearing witness, and their thoughts the mean while accusing or else excusing one another;" while, in the verses that precede the parenthesis in which the words we have quoted occur, he states distinctly that "as many as have sinned without law shall also perish without law" (Rom. ii. 12-15).

To this I reply, that while the "general consent" of Christians, either now or in past time, should make us modest in our opposition, it cannot bind us as an authority. Any plain declaration of St. Paul's certainly ought to do so. We are bound, therefore, to show that the apostle, neither in the text quoted, nor elsewhere, has declared that the heathen, remaining such, can not be saved.

As, however, I shall have occasion to examine the passage in question at length, it may be only necessary to say here, that it is erroneous to suppose that St. Paul, in the chapter from which the text is taken, is declaring the final lot of the heathen. He is doing no such thing: he is simply seeking to bring in all men alike guilty before God (iii. 9, 10); showing that neither by the deeds of the law, nor in the absence of law, can any human being be justified before his Maker. He shuts up all alike in sin, that all alike may learn their need of a Saviour;—the Jew, notwithstanding his imagined self-righteousness in obeying the law; the Gentiles, in spite of the plea that he has had no revelation. The one he convicts of having continually violated the law in which he boasts (ii. 17-24); the other he finds equally guilty of offence against the light of conscience and of nature (iii. 13-16). "Therefore," says he, "by the deeds of the law there shall no flesh be justified in his sight" (iii. 20). Considered in themselves, and apart from the redemption which is by Christ, all are alike exposed to wrath, "for there is no respect of persons" with God. "As many as have sinned without law shall (apart from Christ) perish without law;" and "as many as have sinned in the law (if without Christ) shall be judged by the law,"—a rule by which all alike are lost.

As this is followed by the glorious announcement that "the righteousness of God without the law is manifested, being witnessed by the Law and the Prophets; even the righteousness of God which is by faith of Jesus Christ UNTO (or for the benefit of) all, and UPON (or over—i. e., clothing like a garment) all them that believe: for (between Jew and Gentile) there is no difference" (iii. 20-22),—it is clear that the final ruin of the heathen is not his theme.

The second objection is, that investigations of this character only promote doubt; that they are in fact, inconsistent with that childlike and unquestioning spirit which it becomes us, as sinners, to cultivate.

To this it may be replied, in the words of a well-known writer,* "In what was the life of our blessed Lord consumed, but in continual labor to make the multitude doubt the distinctive principles which the highest authorities in their Church had brought them up in?"

"The implicit faith of a child may be very natural and very engaging; but is it the duty of a man to remain a child?—to force himself back to childhood?—to depress the development of that one faculty which constitutes him specifically a man? For what is this child-like (say, rather, childish) credulity which is so bepraised? Remember, it is the quality of a child only because (and just so long as) he is in the stage of mere animal being; while that which constitutes his special humanity is yet undeveloped. We admire this credulity under the term child-like, but its true definition is, that it is animal-like; that it is the instinct of irrational nature,—that instinct which leads all animals to believe without reflection, and even in opposition to experience, that what seems to be is,—even as the hen will sit again and again upon the same deceptive lump of chalk."

* Sewell's "Christian Morals."

To these true and forcible remarks I shall merely add a few additional observations of a more general character, and then close this introductory chapter.

No one certainly can well deny that the exercise of the right of private judgment in matters of religion has sometimes been fearfully injurious to those who have enjoyed it, and not unfrequently proved an occasion of stumbling, by multiplying heresies.

For this reason, or rather on this pretext, it has been maintained by many that, in the search after Divine truth, the guidance of the reason and the understanding should be abandoned; and that, since the path of humility is the path of safety, it is the part of wisdom to accept without question, at the hands of the Church's appointed ministers, those doctrines which, it is assumed, God has committed to her charge, alike for the temporal benefit and eternal salvation of mankind.

This view of the supposed duty of a Christian man is, by the Church of Rome, as every one knows, openly held, and unblushingly defended. By Protestants it is professedly repudiated; but there can be no question that, with various modifications, it is maintained in one form or other by almost all Christian communities who attach vital importance to particular forms of religious thought.

To the Romanist it has generally been deemed sufficient to reply, that any such attempted transference of responsibility, in relation to the discovery of truth, can, after all, only be accomplished by and through an act of private judgment; for if a man, from whatever motive, resolves to abandon his own judgment in relation either to truth or duty, and to place himself without reserve in the hands of others, he is surely as responsible for the wisdom or folly of that resolution, and for all the consequences to which it may lead, as he can be for any other choice or decision.

To the Protestant, who often unconsciously adopts Romanist principles, in consequence of his dread of doubt, his love of system, or his deference to the authority either of dead "Fathers" or living "Brethren," it seems necessary to suggest other considerations, not less important, although very frequently forgotten.

And the first is this,—that the dangers and evils which arise from free thought in matters of religion, do not differ in the least from those which arise from any other exercise of that liberty which is essential to a state of probation, and without which it could not exist. Man, we may rest assured, has not been placed in a world like this, and surrounded by temptations of every kind, without some good reason,—a reason consonant, without doubt, with the highest wisdom and love. The great end of his being unquestionably is, that he may learn, by Divine grace, to choose the good and to reject the evil, to abandon the false and to cling to the true, "to glorify God, and to enjoy Him for ever." But how, it may well be asked, can this be done, unless he is at liberty to inquire freely, to search diligently, and to adopt, in all honesty and integrity, whatever he believes to be the good and the true?

A second consideration, also generally disregarded, is, that the more acceptance on authority of any doctrine, true or false, is not equivalent to faith in that doctrine, but quite a different thing. Faith is not mere assent to truth, but something much higher. It is the reception of it, for a reason, and a reason powerful enough to command submission; it supposes a conviction of truth so deep and profound, that the persuasion of it becomes, in extreme cases, the ground and justification of martyrdom.

For intelligent men to shrink from the investigation of truth of any kind, however specious may be the pretext, whether it be called indolence or timidity, or whether it be baptized by the Christian name of humility, is, in fact, to evade the most important part of their moral discipline, and to render the complete development and perfection of human character impossible; for humility, patience, candor, and charity find very little scope for exercise in the mind of any man who accepts his opinions on the authority of a party, or holds them for any other reason than that they are supported by evidence.

Two things undoubtedly tend to make men prefer half convictions to entire ones, and adherence to a party, to personal and independent inquiry. The one is, the extreme difficulty,— the pain and labor, the weariness and exhaustion, which often attends honest researches. The other is, the imperial demand which truth, thus sought, makes upon a man for submission when it is attained.

So long as a man is only half convinced, so long as he is simply yielding to the views of others, he can easily evade the consequences of his admissions; if they involve anything very self-denying or disagreeable, he can easily put off his obedience to a more convenient season. But if, after a long and anxious investigation, he has arrived at the conclusion that what he professes to have received as Divine is absolutely and eternally true, he has no choice between submission and misery; for if truth, thus received, be not a sovereign good to man, its possession must be a source of constant wretchedness.

In our own day, Christian men shrink from independent investigation, chiefly because they think it inexpedient. Certain forms of thought, right or wrong, have, it is said, for generations been regarded as "worthy of all acceptance;" under these forms men have received spiritual blessings of the highest value; in the belief of them they have lived well, and died happily. Why unsettle such landmarks?

The only answer that can be made to such a remonstrance is this: The forms of thought, of which you speak, are either true or false. If true, inquiry will only strengthen their hold on men, and lead to their being still more generally supported and honored. But if, from whatever cause, the suspicion has arisen that they are, after all, only partially true,—that they are, at the best, only one-sided exhibitions of truth, that they involve fallacies, or that they produce exaggerated, and therefore, inaccurate impressions, they must on no account be shielded from examination; for whatever may be the supposed value of any form of thought, if it involve important error, the support of it, or, which is the same thing, the determination not to undecieve those who hold it, is, in the eye of God, an immoral procedure. The exercise of integrity in this matter may be a sore trial to faith, but we may rely upon it, obedience will, in the end, bring with it its own "exceeding great reward."

The truth is, all the difficulties and dangers that attend upon the exercise of private judgment are specially provided for by Him who has thrown upon us the responsibility of its exercise.

Not, indeed, as some would tell us, by the residence upon earth either of an individual or a Corporation, who, as Christ's Vicar, can solve all difficulties, and prove an infallible guide; not, indeed, by the bodily presence of Christ himself as an abiding court of appeal; but by what is far better, the presence and guidance of His Holy Spirit in the hearts of all those who desire Him.

And for what end is He thus willing to abide amongst us? To strengthen the natural powers, —to illuminate the intellect, to place the sage and the simpleton on the same platform,—to do in reality what the Roman Pontiff only pretends to do,—to solve all doubts, to make us infallible in our decisions, to render it impossible that we should go wrong in our pursuit after truth? Certainly not.

Such a gift would in no important sense differ from inspiration, and if imparted generally, would as completely destroy the character of our probation as that indolent reliance on human authority of which we complain. The only difference would be, that, in the one case, infallibility would be a reality, in the other it is a delusion.

Far otherwise is the intent and end of God's great gift; for it annihilates no distinctions, it supersedes no effort, it counteracts no weakness that is merely intellectual. It is, from first to last, an action on the heart. Under its blessed influence pride departs, prejudice gives way, and selfish passions, in all their endless variety, are weakened and subdued. But it does no more. It leaves us still to search after evidence, to balance probabilities, to be misled if we permit the old enemy to becloud our faculties. For the rest, God has adapted the human intellect to truth, just as surely as He has adapted the eye to outward nature; and, in either case, we see truly, only in proportion as, by his mighty power, films are removed, and the organ of vision is purged and purified from unnatural defilement.

"FOR EVER AND EVER."

SUPERSTITION, ever ready to fabricate or appropriate words and ideas to accomplish its evil purposes, has wielded no weapon more successfully than the baleful error furnished by these few words. The glad tidings of salvation, the Gospel of the grace of God, is either set aside altogether, or mixed up with awful presentations of fire and brimstone, and the substitute or the admixture is always supplemented by the words, "for ever and ever;" and even the word of God, circulated by millions of copies, is falsely made to speak the same language, and is thus shamefully enlisted in the service of superstition.

The phrase itself contains its own stultification, and shows its self-contradictory nature, and ought to awaken in every thoughtful mind the question, "Hath God indeed said so?" Nay, further, this question: "Would any wise man originate, or use for the first time, such a phrase?" What is its meaning, or has it any? If "for ever" means "for ever," according to the popular idea attached to the term, what can "for ever and ever" mean? If "for ever and ever" means "for ever," then the first part of the term "for ever and ever," from which it derives its force, cannot mean "for ever," but must mean something less. The whole must be greater than any of its parts, and no one part can be less than that same part; it cannot be less than itself. Mathematical axioms as strictly apply to time as they do to space; and hence we see the absurdity of the phrase. Lexicographers tell us that it is used for emphasis, but there is no emphasis in nonsense, except it be emphatic nonsense. God never speaks thus. His word never utters nonsense. There is no phrase in the Hebrew or Greek Scriptures that can possibly be so rendered—and, if every word of God is pure, as silver tried in a crucible, purified seven times, perfectly pure, certainly every one attempting to translate that word into another language should aim at purity, and be careful that the rendering is neither false nor foolish.

The Hebrew and Greek phrases which are represented in English by the words to the age, to the age and beyond, to the age of ages, and to the ages of ages, are clear and intelligible. They derive their definiteness or indefiniteness from the subjects with which they are connected; and whatever uncertainty exists in our minds when we meet with them, arises from our ignorance concerning those subjects.

If the word "ever" is derived from the Latin æonum, and through it the Greek aion, it would seem that the phrase "for ever and ever," when first taken into use was less incorrect than it is now;—I say less incorrect, as (1) the expression "for an age and an age" is not found in the Scriptures; and (2) the use of the preposition "for" in connection with the word "age" brings up in the mind a thought as certainly belonging, which may or may not belong to it.

(1.) The etymology of the word has no force in characterizing it as uniformly used at the present day, and for a long time past. There is no doubt in my mind that the idea associated with the words, "for ever" is an acquired idea, which has grown up since the advent of the Eternal Life. The ancients had no use for such an idea. Their hope could not reach out so far. They were "without hope." The Hebrew saints who looked for Messiah approached it by the use of indefinite terms, as "length of days." "The king asked of thee life, and thou gavest it him, even length of days for ever and beyond." The first time the phrase "for ever and ever" occurs in our version is in Ex. xv. 18: "The Lord shall reign for ever and ever" (to the age and beyond).

(2.) The true solution of the difficulty lies in the consideration of the preposition used in connection with the indefinite word "age." The primary and proper meaning of the Greek preposition eis (and the same is true of the Hebrew preposition) is to, as to place, and till, as to time; the signification for, or during, is secondary; and hence the unwarrantableness of the constant use of for in the phrase "for ever," even if the word "ever" were redeemed from its acquired use. We are living now in an age, and the phrase "to the age" must, of course, point to the terminus of it, as we cannot go backward in time; but speaking of an age that has not yet commenced, which is entirely before us, we know that it has two points,—the beginning and the end, and the word eis, used in relation to it, refers naturally and properly to that point of the age at which we shall first arrive, and should be translated till or to. It may point to the termination, and then it acquires the secondary idea of duration through it, and would be properly rendered for, or during. This meaning is, however, quite secondary and somewhat forced, and the authority for its use must be gathered from the subject treated in connection with it. Homer gives us instances of the two-fold use of this preposition in connection with the same noun; e. g. "till summer," and "throughout the summer."

If we thus use the phrase correctly, we shall see that Rev. xx. 9, 10, speaks of a tormenting which will take place very near the close of the millennial age, and will continue till the ages of the ages begin. The smoke of the torment (Rev. xiv.), spoken of as commencing a short time before the millennial age begins, will continue all through that age, till the ages of the ages begin. This smouldering fire will be a memorial throughout the thousand years, containing not living persons, but carcases (Isa. lxvi.), seen and abhorred by those who come up to Jerusalem, time after time, to worship the Lord of hosts.

God's fire is destructive, consuming, devouring both of body and soul (Matt. x. 28); and none but thoughtless men will talk of conserving fire. If the fire conserves, what does it conserve from? There must be some other element of destruction contemplated, from which it conserves. To represent the fire as conserving anything from its own destructive power, is to talk unwisely; it is a contradiction in terms.

Neither this passage nor any other can be made to contradict the hundreds of passages in the Scriptures which assert or imply that the wages of sin is death. Sin and sinners—all the works and workmanship of the devil—the Son of God was manifested that he might destroy; he has virtually accomplished his work, and in due time it will be consummated. The apostle John, in the Revelation, after writing the things he had seen and the things which are, goes on to write of the things which shall be after these; and, in the fifth chapter, gives a brief programme of results up to the time when all evil shall be blotted out, and God shall be all in all. At the thirteenth verse, he gives, as that blessed ultimatum, the song of every creature which is in heaven, and on the earth, and under the earth, and such as are in the sea, and all that are in them, saying, "Blessing and honor, and glory, and power be unto him that sitteth upon the throne, and unto the Lamb unto the ages of the ages;" and as this state of things does not commence till the ages of the ages begin, we know that the phrase here must signify during or throughout these ages; and, as we know that this state of things, asserted of every conceivable place in the universe of God, cannot co-exist with torment of any kind in any place, we learn that, in Rev. xx. 10, the words "to the ages of the ages" can contemplate their beginning only.

After these ages begin, the only Being that will bring sin to remembrance will be the glorified Person of the Son of God. Things there may be, as the gates of pearl, or the sea of glass; but He will be the only Person. Every time the redeemed saints and the angels look on Him in glorified humanity, in whom dwells and will be manifested all the fulness of the Godhead bodily, they will be reminded that the only reason for his condescension out of the absoluteness of Deity to become man was that he might "put away sin by the sacrifice of himself." "He hath made him to be sin for us, who knew no sin, that we might be made the righteousness of God in him." As the serpent of brass was preserved in the ark, in the most holy place, as a memorial of God's saving mercy, so will he preserve that human form, an enduring memorial of God's love to sinners of mankind; but not, like it, to lose its form, and revert to its primal condition when it became an object of idolatrous worship. He is and ever will be worthy of all adoration and worship. He is the supreme object of the Father's love, in whom his soul delighteth, whose will is that all should honor the Son, even as they honor the Father. He will be unto the ages of the ages the abiding memorial of sin, and of God's hatred to sin, and also of His great love wherewith he loved us.—Selected.

"LITERATURE AND DOGMA"

[Some time since I noticed Mr. DUNN's "Brief Notes" on a work by Matthew Arnold on the above named subject. Since then several articles have appeared in the "Christian Union," of this city, written by one of the Faculty of Yale College. As these articles give a more extended view of the subject than the "Notes" above named, I have concluded to give them in the EXAMINER, as the subject is one of interest.—EDITOR.]

MATTHEW ARNOLD: LITERATURE AND DOGMA.

"Sweetness and Light" seem likely to sink to the place of "stock notions" in the hand of Mr. Matthew Arnold. The altered phraseology of "sweet reasonableness" will scarcely save them from this doom. There is certainly no excess of sweetness in Mr. Arnold's disposition towards the Bishops of Winchester and of Gloucester, and his other fancied antagonists, and no excess of light, but only darkness visible, shed upon the important topic which he attempted to elucidate.

The subject discussed in Literature and Dogma is one of the most important and timely that could easily be proposed, and we have to thank Mr. Arnold for introducing it so distinctly and so pronouncedly to the arena of discussion. It is no hard question in fact, though it may seem to be in form. It is, and has been for years, the great question of the times, which, under various phases, or rather manifold masks, is everywhere obtruding itself, and is still waiting for an answer.

Mr. Arnold has the acuteness to see, and the sensitiveness to feel, that this is a problem on which the Zeit Geist is brooding, but he has not the magnanimity to treat it except in a narrowly partizan spirit. It is surprising that he should be content to turn one of the soberest and profoundest subjects for the thoughtful mind into material for the defence of the State Church of England—on the basis of a godless Old Testament and a Christless New Testament—against the Evangelical Low Churchmen, the sanctimonious High Churchmen, the political Puritans, the Philistine Scientists, and the vulgar common people, who might venture to assail the broad platform of comprehensive "Know-nothingism" on which this brilliant essayist chooses to stand. The doctrine—we might say the dogma—of this spirited effusion is as follows: The Scriptures are in matter and form a collection of works of literature; it is preposterous and absurd to treat them as inculcating dogma; to find in them, or to force from them, any of the so-called doctrines of the Christian creed, or even of Natural Theism. The attempt to do this has divided christendom into sects and schools of theology, all of which are necessarily failures, and not failures only, but extravagant or abortive caricatures of the Scriptures when the Scriptures are rightly understood. The instrument of rightly understanding this literature is criticism, and criticism can only be learned by reading the best books of every age. Out of such reading grows a fine sense or tact, by which literature can be interpreted and judged. The total product or growth of the wakeful criticism of the present generation is the Zeit Geist, which anticipates the sentence of the next generation, and pronounces its decisions without the obligation of rendering formal reasons, or of being called to answer before any higher tribunal than itself. This Zeit Geist, whose authorized interpreter is the modest Mr. Arnold, has already decided that in the Old Testament there is no living God who thinks and feels, and loves, and rewards, and punishes. All such conceptions, and the propositions which express them, are the work of reflecting understanding; dogmas of the creeds and the schools; matter for theologians like the Bishops of Winchester and Gloucester to sharpen their wits about and solemnly to emphasize; but entirely strange and foreign to the spirit of the Old Testament as literature. In place of this pure dogma, as Mr. Arnold would have it, he would substitute the following luminous statement of that truth which inspired the life and formed the character of the Jewish people: "The real germ of religious consciousness, therefore, out of which sprang Israel's name for God, to which the records of his history adapted themselves, and which came to be clothed upon, in time, with a mighty growth of poetry and tradition, was a consciousness of the not ourselves which makes for righteousness, and the way to convince one's self of this by studying their literature with a fair mind and with a tact which letters, surely, can alone give."

Of the many things which one would say of this, the first is, that the phrase "the not ourselves which makes for righteousness," is a dogma with an emphasis, not simply theological, but metaphysical in the extreme — a dogma purissimum — a dogma five times distilled; the quintessence of all possible dogmas. Not only is this true, but as a dogma it is not even original with Mr. Arnold, but it was propounded by the elder Fichte in language as eloquent and far more consistent than any Mr. Arnold has employed to disguise it or make it palatable. We are quite willing to concede that the conception of personality is not easy to be defined; we own that there is no attempt to define it in either the Old or the New Testament; we might acknowledge that the attempts of the makers of creeds and their expounders to define it when applied either to man or God, have often been unsuccessful, and that most of them might with advantage be greatly abridged or entirely omitted in the solemn professions of faith, and possibly in much which passes for theological exposition. But this does not touch the point made by Mr. Arnold, and which is the articulus calcantis vel stantis of his volume, viz., the assertion that God, as a person, did not give life and energy to the Jewish theocracy, and is not everywhere prominent in the literature of Israel. To say that the doctrine is not true is not admissible; to say that "man never knows how anthropomorphic he is," and therefore to conceive that the personality of God is unworthy of a man elevated by the Zeit Geist of the nineteenth century is also admissible. But to assert or defend either of these positions is to philosophize in the spirit and in the language of dogma, and just so far to abandon the critical spirit and to cease to judge the Old Testament as literature. It is to judge literature by dogma. It is worse; it is to offend against all the conclusions of criticism itself, which, if it teaches anything, would declare with emphasis that a people in the forming period of the Jewish nation would be utterly unable to begin with such a germ of religious consciousness as "the not ourselves;" a conception which criticism and history both confirm could only be reached and has been reached, by the most attenuated generalizations of metaphysical philosophy. Moreover, both criticism and history confirm a conclusion opposed to that of Arnold's, that the Hebrew literature presents, in its Eternal and its Jehovah, the very opposite of any conception negative to ourselves; defining man by terms negative to God, rather than God by a term negative to man. Mr. Arnold does not aspire to be a theologian, he tells us, but he does claim to be a critic. We cannot understand how he can reconcile his position with such a germ of religious consciousness as is expressed in the following: "The Lord, the Lord God, merciful and gracious, long suffering and abundant in goodness and truth," etc., etc.; or, "God said unto Moses, I am that I am;" or, "Know, therefore, this day, and consider it in thine heart, that the Lord he is God in heaven above and upon the earth beneath, there is none else;" or "Hear, O Israel, the Lord our God is one Lord." Mr.

Arnold is offended in his critical sensibilities, forsooth, because the dogmatists assert that these and other literary declarations teach that God is "a personal First Cause, the moral and intelligent Governor of the universe." Perhaps the dogmatists might wonder with better reason that a critic should find nothing more in them than a "not ourselves which makes for righteousness."

Mr. Arnold lays great stress on the last member in his definition of "the germ of religious consciousness." It is not God's personality, nor his intelligence, nor his oneness that is distinctive of the representations of the Old Testament, but it is God's relation to conduct and the spirituality and purity of the conceptions of conduct as involved. In these Mr. Arnold finds the material for all his Jewish and Scriptural conceptions of God whatever. These relations, he insists, are so distinctive of the Old Testament literature as to overbear and drive out of sight all others. He even resolves the unity of God—of which so much is made in the old literature—into God's seriousness with respect to righteousness.

The critic trained in some other school than Arnold's would suggest that all these representations of God's relations to righteousness are too subjective to find any place in the earlier life and literature of the Jewish people, and in point of fact they are the offspring of a later and more highly developed stage of their culture and life. We cannot praise too highly the keen appreciation and the eloquent portraiture in which he sets forth the fervent faith in righteousness as upheld by the moral force of the universe, which prophets and psalmists attained; but the fact that the prophets and psalmists of no other nation ever attained it, and that the Jewish population held it so tenaciously, would indicate that it resulted from more definite conceptions of the Supreme than of a blind and vague and evanescent something, that was not a man. It would also suggest the question: whether what Arnold suggests was only a rank outgrowth of poetry and tradition upon this indefinite nucleus should not rather be accepted as sober truth, in order to explain the existence and persistence of this singular faith of theirs in God as making for righteousness?

All this is dismissed and disposed of by Mr. Arnold as mere aberglaube, as an overgrowth of superstition. Under this he would include all special promises to the Jews as a selected people, all predictions or intimations of a Messiah, all that was ritual or positive in their political and ecclesiastical life. This is all set aside by the critical Zeit Geist, which measures every objective in revelation or miracle, by a canon taken from the laws and methods which are appropriate to a period in which all the service has been accomplished which could be rendered by revelation and miracle, by prophet and Messiah, by the God who revealed himself to Moses in the bush, and was incarnate in Jesus! We submit that if these conclusions are true they are not established by criticism, as we understand it. We believe that the more fairly the Scriptures are studied as literature, the less will they sanction such dogmas as Mr. Arnold's. N. P.

THE HOLY SPIRIT.

"MADE in Our image" man shall be,
Said God the Lord within His throne:
In man the whole Divinity
Still looks from heaven to find his own.

All is the Father's, all the Son's,
And all of God the Holy Ghost;
But through man's story as it runs
The Spirit's claim has suffered most.

In compass of creative skill,
In uttermost of woe endured,
In majesty of regent will God's image is not all obscured.

But where in finer tenderness,
In loyalty to love and right,
In all that yearns to give and bless Dwelleth the Spirit in His might?

The link is lost, the chain is riven
That should have held this gracious Guest:
Of all the gifts that Christ has given
His Holy Spirit is the best.

Return, O Spirit of the Lord,
And give these earth-bound hearts release!
Fly, dove-like Herald of the Word,
And fill the world with heavenly peace.

HENRY CECIL.

"LOOKING unto Jesus," imparts strength and joy to the soul, but looking unto self is a forlorn hope, and never carries us a step further on the right way. Try the great remedy, Christ and sufficiency, and so look up for help, that the habit will be upward, and not groveling in the weakness of self-sufficiency.

AFFLICTIONS are blessings, when we can bless God for afflictions.

THE GREAT SALVATION.

THIS important subject is introduced to our notice in the epistle to the Hebrews in these impressive words: "Therefore we ought to give the more earnest heed to the things which we have heard, lest at any time we should let them slip. For if the word spoken by angels was steadfast, and every transgression and disobedience received a just recompense of reward, how shall we escape if we neglect so great salvation, which at the first began to be spoken by the Lord, and was confirmed unto us by those that heard him?" (Heb. ii. 1-3.) Can we do better than try to trace the course here pointed out, beginning with what began to be spoken by the Lord, and going on to what was confirmed by his first disciples?

The empire of the Cæsars had reached the zenith of its power, and absorbed into its dominion all the surrounding kingdoms and states, including even the kingdom of Judah, which had for centuries been the peculiar nation of Jehovah—ruled by his laws and worshipping (when faithful) according to his prescribed directions. The rule of a foreign power, whether mild or oppressive, served but to intensify the hopes which the faithful and patriotic among the people cherished regarding the advent of their long promised Deliverer, styled by their prophets "The Messiah." These are spoken of as "they that looked for redemption in Jerusalem" (Luke ii. 38), of whom Zacharias is a good example: for on the birth of the forerunner of the Messiah, he, being "filled with the Holy Ghost, prophesied, saying, Blessed be the Lord God of Israel, for he hath visited and redeemed his people, and hath raised up an horn of salvation for us in the house of his servant David, as he spake by the mouth of his holy prophets, which have been since the world began, that we should be saved from our enemies, and from the hand of all that hate us; to perform the mercy promised unto our fathers, and to remember his holy covenant, the oath which he sware to our father Abraham, that he would grant unto us, that we being delivered out of the hand of our enemies might serve him without fear, in holiness and righteousness before him all the days of our life." (Luke i. 67-75.)

It was in circumstances such as these that this once highly favored, but then deeply degraded people, were visited with a message from their Divine King in the heavens. The subject of this message was termed "the kingdom of God," or "the kingdom of heaven," phrases which the Gospel narratives show to be applied to one and the same thing. The first bearer of this message was "a man sent from God whose name was John." He was shortly followed by the Messiah himself—Jesus of Nazareth—who, being endued with the Spirit of God without measure, was qualified to demonstrate the divinity of his mission, and thus to claim the allegiance of the honest and good-hearted among the people. The message of both these preachers was identical in its terms: "The time is fulfilled, and the kingdom of God is at hand: repent ye, and believe the Gospel."

The proclamation of good news to any people implies the existence of an evil and unsatisfactory state of things at the time among them. We have seen that political and social amelioration was expected by the best of the people at the hands of the promised Redeemer. But there can be no doubt that the Gospel preached by Jesus was good news to Israel in a two-fold sense, — individually as well as nationally. Individually, inasmuch as it promised personal deliverance from sin, and its wages, death, together with a share in the honor and glory to be conferred on the faithful disciples of the Christ when the kingdom should be established. Nationally, inasmuch as the establishment of the kingdom would ensure their freedom from the yoke of Rome, and introduce an era of righteousness and peace.

Looking a little closer into these two phases of the good news, the careful student of the Divine record will find that Israel, in common with humanity at large, were in a position which might lead the thoughtful among them to welcome such a deliverance as that proclaimed in the Gospel of the Messiah. Regarding the pressing need for a way of escape from death and the thousand ills that flesh is heir to, the Bible speaks in language so plain as to be mistaken only by the pre-occupied and prejudiced mind. "The wages of sin is death" is a truth which human philosophy would fain get rid of, but which is the unvarying testimony of Scripture. This truth was intimated to the first man in these terms: "Of every tree of the garden thou mayest freely eat; but of the tree of knowledge of good and evil, thou shalt not eat of it; for in the day that thou eatest thereof thou shalt surely die;" or, margin, "dying thou shalt die." (Gen. ii. 16, 17.) Notwithstanding the easy test thus given for man's obedience, he disobeyed; and any ambiguity which might be supposed to attach to the terms in which the penalty was threatened, entirely disappears in the clearness with which the sentence was pronounced—"Cursed is the ground for thy sake: in sorrow shalt thou eat of it all the days of thy life. Thorns also and thistles shall it bring forth unto thee, and thou shalt eat the herb of the field. In the sweat of thy face shalt thou eat bread till thou return unto the ground; for out of it wast thou taken; for dust thou art, and unto dust shalt thou return." (Gen. iii. 17-19.) If language has any definite meaning, the sentence here passed on man surely consigned him to a state of non-life precisely identical with that of the dust from which he was fabricated by the Creator; a condition of utter obliviousness equalled only by the unconsciousness of the inanimate creation. To say the sentence included more than this, beyond the evils connected with the process leading to the final consummation, is to be wise above what is written: while to say that it contained less, and applied to only a part of Adam's nature, is to "take away from the words of the book."

The severity of such a sentence as that pronounced on Adam has been amply attested by almost universal human experience. "Through fear of death," mankind "have been all their lifetime subject to bondage." Love of life is one of the strongest feelings in the human breast, as it is certainly one of the most powerful instincts of the lower animals. But there is reason to believe that man alone, from his superior intellectual and moral endowments has the susceptibility to be painfully impressed with the certainty of death as the apparent termination of his existence. This foreboding in reference to his own death is greatly intensified by the death of his nearest and dearest friends. While human philosophy has attempted much in the way of accounting for the existence of disease and even of premature death, by attributing these calamities to the violation of certain laws which regulate healthy existence, it has shrunk from a similar solution of the problem of human death at what is deemed the natural boundary of life. Divine philosophy at once removes the difficulty;—thus: "By one man sin entered into the world, and death by sin, and so death passed upon all men" (in whom all have sinned). Rom. v. 12.)

Such then is the grand evil by which our race is cursed through its connection with the first sinner. Surely a gospel which should provide a remedy for so dire an evil as this might well be hailed as good news by all to whom it comes. And such is the Gospel preached by Jesus: "God so loved the world that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth on him might not perish but have everlasting life." (John iii. 16.) "This is the will of him that sent me, that every one that seeth the Son, and believeth on him, may have everlasting life; and I will raise him up at the last day" (John vi. 40). For a man to perish is just to suffer the penalty attached to the first transgression, and contained in the sentence pronounced on Adam; a process fitly described by the inspired Psalmist: "His breath goeth forth, he returneth to his earth, in that very day his thoughts perish." (Psa. cxlvi. 4.) To "have everlasting life" can only mean to live perpetually, which would have been the privilege of our first parents if they had continued obedient, and consequently, obtained access to the tree of life—as it is recorded: "And now, lest he put forth his hand, and take also of the tree of life, and eat, and live for ever; therefore the Lord sent him (Adam) forth from the garden of Eden." (Gen. iii. 22, 23.) Thus does the Gospel of Jesus supply this first pressing want of humanity.

But not alone as a deliverance from death is the Gospel of the kingdom of God needed to bless the world. The populations of the world have long suffered from the misrule of human government. Evils manifold have been and still are inflicted on the peoples by their despotic rulers. From the greatest empire swayed by the will of one absolute sovereign, to the most powerful and extensive republic where the will of the sovereign people is deemed paramount, the evils perpetrated in the name of government are such as to stir to its depths the most unfeeling heart. There is not a well-wisher to humanity but would welcome a Gospel which should afford hope for redress for such evils as these.

But the mission of Jesus was alone to Israel, as he said to his disciples, "I am not sent but to the lost sheep of the house of Israel." And in answer to a question put by the apostles—"Behold we have left all and followed thee, what shall we have therefore?" he replied, "Ye who have followed me, in the regeneration when the Son of man shall sit on the throne of his glory, ye also shall sit on twelve thrones judging the twelve tribes of Israel." (Matt. xix. 27, 28.) To sit on thrones judging is in the Scripture sense equivalent to the exercise of regal authority. An example of this is seen in the request made to Samuel by the elders of Israel: "Make us a king to judge us, like all the other nations." (1 Sam. viii. 5.)

But while national regeneration begins with Israel, it does not end there. Even as early as the time of Abraham the promise was given—"Abraham shall surely become a great and mighty nation, and all the nations of the earth shall be blessed in him." (Gen. xviii. 18.) And the great apostle of the Gentiles, in his address to the Athenians, a Gentile audience, extends the judging or ruling to be exercised by the Messiah to the world—"God hath appointed a day (an era) in which he will judge the world in righteousness by that man whom he hath ordained, whereof he hath given assurance unto all men in that he hath raised him from the dead." (Acts xvii. 31.)

The purpose of God to bless the world by providing a way of deliverance from sin and its consequences, and by bringing back disobedient man to that allegiance due to his Creator and Sustainer, was made known "at sundry times and in divers manners" by Jehovah himself. The first hint vouchsafed was contained in the sentence pronounced, in the hearing of the guilty pair, on the serpent through whose falsehood they had been seduced to disobey the divine law, "I will put enmity between thee and the woman, and between thy seed and her seed: it shall bruise thy head, and thou shall bruise his heel." (Gen. iii. 15.) From this it is manifest that deliverance was to be effected through a person descended from the woman. It would appear from the subsequent history that some additional information had been communicated, seeing that the offering of sacrifices of slain animals was practiced with the Divine approbation, if not, as is most probable, by divine direction and command. (Gen. iv. 4; Heb. xi. 4.) The significance which these sacrifices possessed under the Mosaic institutions might well warrant the belief that the offering of Abel was expressive of his faith in the coming Deliverer, and of his hope of personal deliverance from the evils entailed on the race by the first transgression.

The dim but hopeful intimation thus made to the first pair assumed more distinct shape in the communications made by God to the founder of the Israelitish nation, Abraham. God had called Abraham out of Ur of the Chaldees, at that time sunk into idolatry, to go into a land that he should show him, at the same time giving him the following promise: "I will make of thee a great nation, and I will bless thee, and make thy name great . . . and in thee shall all the families of the earth be blessed." (Gen. xii. 2, 3.) Having arrived at the country pointed out to him by God, he received a further intimation in these words: "Unto thee will I give this land." On a subsequent occasion the Lord said unto Abraham, "Lift up now thine eyes, and look from the place where thou art northward and southward, and eastward and westward, for all the land which thou seest, to THEE will I give it; and to thy seed forever. Arise, walk through the land in the length of it, and in the breadth of it, for I will give it unto THEE." (Gen. xiii. 14-17.)

Personal possession at some future time must have been the sense in which Abraham himself understood this promise, for he afterwards put the question, "Lord God, whereby shall I know that I shall inherit it?" This question was answered in the most solemn manner by God entering into a covenant with him by sacrifice, causing a "smoking furnace and a burning lamp" to pass between the parts into which the sacrifice was divided.

But from the above quotations it appears that the land was also promised to the seed of Abraham. This was fulfilled in a partial and temporary sense to the twelve tribes of Israel descended from Abraham in the line of Isaac and Jacob, and to be completely realized when their restoration shall take place. But Abraham was chosen to be the progenitor of an individual seed, as we are informed by the apostle Paul in his letter to the Galatians: "To Abraham and his seed were the promises made. He saith not To Seeds, as of many, but as of one, And to thy seed, which is Christ." (Gal. iii. 16.) And this was also repeated in connection with the covenant referred to: "To thy seed have I given this land, from the river of Egypt to the great river, the river Euphrates." (Gen. xv.)

But neither Abraham nor his "One Seed," the Christ, have as yet been put in possession of the land promised. Abraham had even to purchase a burying place in it; and the proto-martyr Stephen, in his defence before the Jewish council, distinctly refers to the promise of personal possession to Abraham, and to the fact of non-fulfilment: "God gave him none inheritance in it, no not so much as to set his foot on, yet he promised that he would give it to HIM for a possession, and to his seed after him, when as yet he had no child." (Acts vii. 5.) But there can be no doubt that this promise shall yet be fulfilled; and a certain intimation in connection with the covenant referred to renders it highly probable that Abraham looked beyond the present life for its fulfilment—"Thou (Abraham) shalt go to thy fathers in peace, thou shalt be buried in a good old age." But this is placed beyond doubt by the apostle, in the epistle to the Hebrews: "These all (Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob) died in faith, not having received the promises (in their fulfilment), but having seen them AFAR OFF, and embraced them, and confessed that they were strangers and pilgrims on the earth" (or land). "For they that say such things, declare plainly that they seek a COUNTRY. And truly if they had been mindful of that country from whence they came out they might have had opportunity to have returned. But now they desire a better country, that is, an heavenly. Wherefore God is not ashamed to be called their God; for he hath prepared for them a city." (Heb. xi. 13-16.) This term "heavenly" is evidently used to denote quality, not locality; for the land of promise shall be an heavenly country when, God's kingdom having come, his will is done on earth as it is in heaven. Abraham's idea was clearly personal possession of the land, when the right time should come; for "by faith when he was called to go out into a place which he should after receive for an inheritance, obeyed; and he went out, not knowing whither he went. By faith he sojourned in the land of promise, as in a strange (or foreign) country, dwelling in tents with Isaac and Jacob, the heirs with him of the same promise; for he looked for a city which hath foundations, whose builder and maker is God." (Heb. xi. 8-10.)

It appears from these declarations, then, that, if Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob are personally to inherit the promise, they must be redeemed from death. He who "is not ashamed to be called their God" announced himself at the burning bush to Moses as the God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob. Jesus, in his argument with the Saducees, quoted this as a convincing proof that the dead shall be raised. "Now that the dead are raised, even Moses showed at the bush, when he called the Lord the God of Abraham, and the God of Isaac, and the God of Jacob; for he is not a God of the dead, but of the living; for all live unto him." (Luke xx. 37, 38.) Not that Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob were actually alive in any sense, but considered as alive in relation to God; "all live unto him," in view of their being destined to a resurrection. That is, all the dead who shall be raised in order to "stand before the judgment-seat of Christ," are deemed as being alive unto God; for he "quickeneth [or maketh alive] the dead, and calleth those things which be not, as though they were." (Rom. iv. 17.) The converse of this, where the living are spoken of as dead, affords an apt illustration of the same principle. Thus "God came to Abimelech in a dream by night, and said unto him, Behold, thou art but a dead man, for the woman which thou hast taken." Now Abimelech was alive; but the act he had done was punishable with death, and so he is spoken of as dead. "If thou restore her not, know that thou shalt surely die." (Gen. xx. 3, 7.) The God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob has thus at a very early period pointed out the certainty of these patriarchs living again, and thus being in a position to enter upon the personal possession of the land of promise, along with that One Seed, to whom with them the promise was made.

This coming Seed became an object of sustaining hope to the faithful among Abraham's descendants in the line of Jacob. Thus Moses, "by faith, when he was come to years, refused to be called the son of Pharaoh's daughter, choosing rather to suffer affliction with the people of God, than to enjoy the pleasures of sin for a season; esteeming the reproach of the Christ greater riches than all the treasures of Egypt, for he had respect to the recompense of the reward. By faith he forsook Egypt, not fearing the wrath of the king; for he endured as seeing him who is invisible." (Heb. xi. 24-27.) "The recompense of the reward" is here connected with the One Seed, the Christ; and Moses evidently anticipated later and more distinct revelations, such as that latest of all on this point—"Behold, I come quickly; and my reward is with me, to give to every man according as his work shall be." (Rev. xxii. 12.) This reward must be something superadded to eternal life, seeing it is bestowed in accordance with work, which is a matter of degree: whereas life is a gift bestowed equally upon all the faithful. It is surely not too much to say that the promise of the land to Abraham is the foundation promise of the reward; for, in closing his list of the ancient worthies, the apostle says, "These all having obtained a good report through faith, received not the promise." (Heb. xi. 39.) And in the epistle to the Galatians, already quoted, the apostle associates the faithful with Abraham and his One Seed, the Christ, in these terms: "If ye be Christ's then are ye Abraham's seed, and heirs according to the promise." (Gal. iii. 29.) And in a sense it may be said to be the foundation promise of eternal life, inasmuch as Abraham was promised the land "FOR EVER;" a condition requiring for its fulfilment, by one who was told he should "die in a good old age," that he should "be raised incorruptible" from the cave of Machpelah. May your light and strength increase until immortality shall perfect that which now contains the Divine nature, and a pure Gospel be sounded in the pure "image of God" after we have passed through this rugged pilgrimage highway.

TRAINING FOR DOMINION.

IF there be no resurrection, and no future state of being for men,—MEN, we say, not “ghosts,”—Christianity is a delusion and faith is vain. In all generations the best people in the world have been the greatest sufferers; the most loyal to God have had the hardest lot on earth. Exceptional cases few and far between do but confirm the accuracy of this general statement.

Let any intelligent man read—we do not say ecclesiastical history, for that awful field is too wide, but—the eleventh chapter in the epistle to the Hebrews, and ask himself calmly, seriously, “What does all this mean?” Here is a constellation of the devout, the holy, the God-fearing, the children of faith, and their experience is given in a series of graphic touches terribly suggestive of privation, suffering and agony. Seen in the light of resurrection, and a future world of honor, dignity and unfading splendor, the moral grandeur of this picture gallery of heaven’s heroes is wonderfully imposing; but seen in the light of hard fact only, with the assumption that there is to be no return of the Lord Jesus, and consequently no rising from the dead of those who fell asleep trusting in him, what can you make of it? Only this, the same that a clear thinker made of it eighteen centuries ago: “If there be no resurrection of the dead, then is Christ not risen; and if Christ be not risen, then is our preaching vain, and your faith is also vain. Yea, and we are found false witnesses of God, because we have testified of God that he raised up Christ; whom he raised not up, if so be that the dead rise not. For if the dead rise not, then is not Christ raised; and if Christ be not raised, your faith is vain; ye are yet in your sins. Then they also which are fallen asleep in Christ are perished. If in this life only we have hope in Christ, we are of all men most miserable;” most to be pitied, as we have risked all upon the hope of resurrection when he who is “our life” shall return.

In the chapter referred to, we have this appalling summary of the sufferings of those renowned worthies: “They were tortured; had trial of cruel mockings and scourgings, yea, moreover, of bonds and imprisonment; they were stoned, they were sawn asunder, they were tempted, were slain with the sword; they wandered about in sheepskins; being destitute, afflicted, tormented; . . . they wandered in deserts, and in mountains, and in dens and in caves of the earth.”

And there is a companion picture to this of the Hebrew confessors, representing the first witnesses of Christ. Let us glance at that, too: “For

I think that God hath set forth us the apostles last, as it were appointed to death; for we are made a spectacle to the world, and to angels, and to men. We are fools,—weak—despised. Even unto this present hour we both hunger and thirst, and are naked, and are buffeted, and have no certain dwelling place; and labor working with our own hands; being reviled, we bless; being persecuted, we suffer it; being defamed, we in-treat; we are made as the filth of the world, and are the offscouring of all things unto this day.”

“In labors more abundant, in stripes above measure, in prisons more frequent, in deaths oft. Of the Jews five times received I forty stripes save one. Thrice was I beaten with rods, once was I stoned, thrice I suffered shipwreck, a night and a day I have been in the deep; in journeyings often, in perils of waters, in perils of robbers, in perils by mine own countrymen, in perils by the heathen, in perils in the city, in perils in the wilderness, in perils in the sea, in perils among false brethren; in weariness and painfulness, in watchings often, in hunger and thirst; in fastings often, in cold and nakedness.”

As there is a righteous ruler of the universe, it cannot be that a world in which men suffer for righteousness sake has as yet realised the purpose for which it was created. Nor is it possible for men who think logically from the attributes of a personal God to rest in the conclusion of philosophical skepticism that the doctrine of a future state is simply a sentimental dream; useful, perhaps, in its way, to the common people; but not to be admitted for a moment by the magnates of philosophy. Nor, after prolonged thought on the various aspects of the subject, can we see that the idea of equity—and surely that is a divine idea—is met by the theological assurance that the souls of the righteous are now enjoying perfect happiness in heaven. This doctrine, even if it were scriptural, which assuredly it is not, would necessitate some most puzzling questions, such, for example, as:—What is meant by falling asleep in Christ? What great object is to be attained by the promised resurrection of the righteous? How are the meek to inherit the earth, and to be recompensed therein? In what way are the saints to judge the world? What is the meaning of appointing one over five, and another over ten cities? Is there any intelligence at all in the words, “We shall reign on the earth?” Is “the kingdom under the whole heaven to be given to the saints of the Most High,” a mere figure of speech without any corresponding reality to justify it or make it intelligible? Why did not Paul get the crown of righteousness from the righteous Judge when he died, instead of saying it was laid up for him until the appearing and the kingdom of his Lord? Such questions could be multiplied to any extent, and correct answers to them would be simply impossible either on the theory of philosophical skepticism, or on that of orthodox theology?

God has not done with his witnesses and confessors when they die, as the former assumes; nor are they rewarded then in a disembodied condition, as the latter has so long taught. The skeptic who will not believe what is written, and the Christian who believes more than is revealed, are alike at fault, although in totally opposite directions; but the man who is neither unbelieving nor credulous, will find clear revelation for the faith that when the Lord comes those that sleep in him shall be raised incorruptible, whilst the living saints shall be changed, and both shall be installed in such spheres of permanent dignity and authority as they were fitted for by the discipline of earth. Then it will be found emphatically true, that the "sufferings of this present time are not worthy to be compared with the glory which shall be revealed in us."—DR. LEASK, of the Rainbow.

FROM POLLY G. PITTS.

BRO. STORRS: I am delighted with the BIBLE EXAMINER. I think it grows better and better. There were two articles in No. 22, Vol. 17, that I thank God were written; especially these, tho' I thank Him for all written truths that have thrown so much light on the precious word of God. O, how much light and comfort I received from the article, "Why Evil was Permitted." In the dialogue "W." says, "The real, true, continued welfare of intelligent beings, is closely connected with, and depends upon, their having a correct knowledge of God. 'This is life eternal, to know thee, the only true God, and Jesus Christ whom thou hast sent' (John xvii. 3). God can be made known to us only by His works, and by what he may be pleased to tell us about himself. His works of creation had exhibited his wisdom, power and goodness. But there were attributes not yet exhibited; such as pity, and mercy; or that pitying love which he tells us he delights to exercise. (Micah vii. 18). Now if his intelligent creatures do not know these attributes of God, their knowledge of him will be incorrect, and even erroneous; and this would be to them an element of serious deterioration, which would eventually work their misfortune; perhaps even their ruin; and this neither the wisdom nor goodness of God could allow to arise from such a cause." "D." responds, "I can perceive plainly that, as our permanent welfare and happiness depended upon our correct knowledge of all the attributes of God, so he would necessarily exhibit all of them." "W." replies, "But his pity and love cannot be exhibited except by the exercise of them; and they cannot be exercised or used except upon an appropriate object. Now the only thing that can call forth the exercise of pity is a miserable object; and there can be no miserable object unless there is sin. In other words, unless there is evil in existence." Amen.

O, how much light this throws on creation, and justifies the ways of God to man. I do not wonder that the angels desired to look into the work of redemption; for they saw all of God's glorious attributes exhibited to man, and as "W." say, "Were the better for it." O, bless the Lord, he knows how to work every thing after the counsel of His own will, and eventually creation, redemption, preservation, restitution, shall redound to His eternal glory, and the everlasting good of the race.

The heading of the other article is, "Attempts to stamp out." O, with what feelings I read and re-read, and read again, these few lines from the pen of Henry Dunn. I am old, and have lived long, have seen so many "attempts to stamp out" what they supposed to be error, yes, even, among evangelical Christians, that my heart has oft been sad; and they do it by refusal to hold kindly intercourse with those who are supposed to be under its influence.

An incident has just come to my mind which happened at Lockport, N. Y., in 1845 or '46. There were two powerful (or, called so,) lecturers on the second advent of Christ lecturing there, and I was present to hear. It happened that we met at a Bro. B.'s to stay over night; they believing in the immortality of the soul, and I believing man to be mortal, depending on a resurrection for life. They hardly noticed me, only as their actions said, "You may think as you like, but if you are determined to persist in what you regard as serious error, you must henceforth be an alien among our people." O, what an "attempt to stamp out" error, as they supposed, while I no doubt sat in silence, as if I were tormented with remorse for having believed the truth.

O, sorrowing Church of Christ, when will this stamping, crushing process cease? When will the time come when none of the sorrowing ones shall be treated with coldness and neglect? "Not till Jesus comes."

Bro. Dunn says, "People talk about 'dangerous views.' There is no danger to the soul that lives in Christ and prays in his faith and fear to be emptied of self. Natural independence inflated self-esteem have led many a man into mischief, and made him a false guide; but my own belief is, that the really humble with Christ's own humility cannot be too bold." Amen; so say I. I will say with Bro. Dunn, my own choice is deliberately made up. My life, and its so-called "usefulness," is entirely with my Lord; and He must do with it exactly as it pleases Him, but turn to the right hand or to the left from what I hold to be simply and nakedly the truth, I never will, so long as He shall uphold me in grace and righteousness. I shall hold up the EXAMINER, and do my best to support it, as long as I have strength to read it, praying God to hold it up and abundantly bless its provisions, and bless its writers, and Bro. Storrs with strength as his day with the peace of God continually.

WILLIAM H. SPENCER.

It is well known to most of our readers that this brother went home from his hard labor in New York City, a year ago last June, sick, and for three months was confined to his bed and under the doctor's care. From that sickness he has never perfectly recovered, and it is doubtful if he ever will. On his convalescence he was unable to go into a printing office as a journeyman, and I entered into an arrangement with him to procure printing materials, so that he could work at his family residence, and give him the EXAMINER to print, sending all my copy to Rochester and he returning, by Express, the work ready for mailing in New York. In this way he has done what work his strength would permit, and with great care and economy has been enabled to do something for the support of himself and family. Without this arrangement they must have suffered for the necessities of life. This same course will be continued with Vol. 18 of the EXAMINER; but our brother has had constant expense for medical aid, and not unfrequent prostrations from nervous afflictions, so that he not only has been prevented from performing constant labor, but has become somewhat involved in debt.

I wish now to say, to those who have worldly substance to spare, that I hope you will not forget that it is "more blessed to give than to receive." If the Lord has prospered you, do not forget this needy and afflicted servant of Jesus. May the Lord enable us all to help "bear one another's burdens, and so fulfill the law of love."

His address is "Box 507, Rochester, N. Y."

Send to him direct; or, if you prefer, I will receive and forward for you. GEO. STORRS.

P. S.—I have written the foregoing without solicitation from Bro. Spencer, and without his knowledge. e. s.

THE BIBLE EXAMINER is a Monthly Magazine. Terms, $3 per year, in advance. When postage has to be prepaid, 12 cents must be added for that purpose.

Subscribers' names should be written very plain. Do not neglect this. It is utterly impossible sometimes to decipher names, and mistakes must occur in consequence. As to their address, give us simply the name of the Post Office and State.

All communications to me should be addressed as follows:

GEO. STORRS,
Box 4, 658, New York.

Any person wishing to see me personally should call at 72 Hicks street, Brooklyn, a very short distance from Fulton Ferry. Do not think it difficult to reach my residence. Hundreds come over from New York every Sunday to hear H. W. Beecher; and I reside within "a stone's throw" of his church. "Come and see."

GEO. W. YOUNG (Shipman & Sons), 25 Chambers street, near Centre, will receive money for the EXAMINER, that our friends wish to pay, personally, in New York City.

BOUND EXAMINERS.

Volumes 16 and 17 of the BIBLE EXAMINER, are now bound together in one, in stiff covers, i. e., in boards and cloth. The price for it will be $3.50; but as they will have to be sent by Express the purchaser must pay the Express charges when he receives it. Any person sending me five new subscribers for Vol. 18, with $10, shall have one copy of the bound one, as herein named. Those who wish to avail themselves of the two volumes bound in one should apply soon; as I cannot supply more than about 30 copies. Volumes 16 and 17 can still be had separately in strong flexible covers at $1.50 each.

A VINDICATION OF THE GOVERNMENT OF GOD OVER THE CHILDREN OF MEN: or, "The Promise and Oath of God to Abraham." By GEO. STORRS.

This is a pamphlet of 72 pages. Price—sent free of postage—single copy, 15 cents; 4 copies, 50 cents; 9 copies, for $1.

"GOD IS LOVE." My Sermon on this subject has been partially revised, and an article on "The Past and the Present" is substituted for the "Reminiscence" of the former edition.

Price, free of postage 5 cents; 10 copies for 40 cents.

DEVIL—SATAN—DEMONS. An investigation, showing what these terms properly imply, and their relation to Temptation and Transgression. Scripturally and Rationally Considered, by GEO. STORRS, Editor of the BIBLE EXAMINER. It is a pamphlet of 48 pages with covers.

Price: Ten cents single, free of postage; or, $1 per dozen.

THE EXAMINER AS A MONTHLY.

SOME may feel as if a Semi-monthly would be preferable. But why? If matter is what you want, it can make no difference; for you will have as much of that as if issued twice a month. You may say, "It is waiting too long for the next number." Why so? Will you not have the same amount of reading before you, and be more likely to read it thoroughly if you have the whole month's reading at once? But, "I shall read it all in a few days, and then have to wait so long for the next!" Well, while waiting for the next, read the one you have again; you will probably understand the matter better by a second reading than by the first, because you will read less hurriedly. When you have read it twice, and feel tired of waiting for the next number, read the one you have a third time; and probably you will think, "It is as good as new." Try it. You may think you are getting it three times a month. I am satisfied that a Semi-monthly, or weekly—for getting permanent knowledge—is not as useful as a well conducted Monthly; for, they are usually read in a hurried manner, and before the thoughts, however valuable, have taken permanent hold of the mind, they are driven out by the sudden arrival of a new load to tax its digestive powers.

Let the readers carefully weigh the matter laid before them; take time for it, and see if you do not profit more by a Monthly than a more frequent arrival, even though it were a weekly. Excitement and true knowledge are two very different things. The first produces pleasure, it may be, but is always followed by loss, or depression. True knowledge costs more labor, but gives strength, and enlarges the capacity for usefulness to one's self and to others. What is wanted, in these days, is, more sober and calm study and thinking. Let what we read be worth reading; then digest it well before calling for a fresh supply. Let our investigations be thorough—so shall we be able to give a reason for the hope that is in us, and our faces will not be made ashamed by the sneers, scoffs, or misrepresentations that may be heaped on us or our views.

You are now invited to give all the aid and support you have the means to do, pecuniarily or otherwise, that you conscientiously can to this MAGAZINE. I trust you will not be ashamed of its appearance or its contents. It is not expected that you or any one else will indorse every expression or sentiment you find in it; but you will find food for thought and improvement; and, most likely, you will find your mind freed from theological ideas of the government of God over the human race which have often oppressed you in your hours of reflection on the subject. This will be no small gain in producing in your heart, love to God and our Redeemer; without which, we are but as "sounding brass, or a tinkling cymbal." Love to God and men is the sum of all true religion. This can only be gained by the knowledge of "the only true God and Jesus Christ."

A NEW TRACT.

An urgent request has been made to have the matter on, "WHY EVIL WAS PERMITTED," published in Vol. 17, Nos. 22 and 23, put into a Tract. It will be so issued immediately; and will form No. 7 in the list of "BIBLE EXAMINER TRACTS." It will be 16 pages, and sent free of postage at $1.20 per 100 copies. Funds are solicited to help scatter this, and other tracts in the list, by tens of thousands.

CHRIST DIED FOR ALL MEN.

This truth is practically lost sight of by multitudes, and theoretically by many professed Christians. If it is not the truth, then to "preach the Gospel to every creature" is hypocrisy, or practicing duplicity; pretending to have made provision for all men, that they might obtain life unending; while, in fact, no such provision exists. To deny this truth, is, virtually, to charge the angels who announced the birth of Christ, with a scandalous falsehood,—which the apostle John would call being "a liar," and an "anti-christ." As no true Christian would commit such a sin, the truth must stand that "Jesus Christ gave himself a ransom for all," and "tasted death for every man." Not only did the apostle Paul make these statements to Timothy and to the Hebrews, but presents the subject to the Corinthians in the following language: "For the love of Christ constraineth us; because we thus judge, that if one DIED FOR ALL, then were all dead: and that He DIED FOR ALL, that they which live should not henceforth live unto themselves, but unto Him who died FOR THEM and rose again" (2 Cor. v. 14, 15).

The love of Christ, founded on Christ's love to him and to all men, "constrained" the apostle to make prominent the great truth that Christ died for all; and on this fact to build another fact, viz., that henceforth men should live not for selfish ends, but unto the gracious Person who had subjected Himself unto death for them, that He might deliver them from death and the dominion of sin. No stronger argument can be used to induce men to forsake and hate sin, than that Christ's love for them was so great, that, though "He knew no sin" (verse 21), "He died for all" those who "were dead in sins" (Eph. ii. 5), and "while we were yet sinners" (Rom. v. 8). To proclaim this truth successfully to men, there must be no possibility of deception in the message; for, if there is an exception, and a few or many of the family of Adam are not included in Christ's work in his death "for all," then to ask such to believe in Him is to ask them to believe a lie, because they were not included in the love of Christ which caused Him to die for men: and if He did not die for all men, then, really, faith is impossible in any man; for he may truly say, "I do not know that Christ did for me, as there are some for whom He died not die, and I may be one of them." To tell that man, "If you will believe you may know you are one for whom Christ died," is but to mock him with deceitful words. Faith cannot exist without evidence first presented; and you ask him to believe without evidence, and tell him the testimony will come afterwards.

Such is the folly of any theory that denies or carries with it a doubt as to the fact that Christ gave himself a ransom for all men of every language, tongue, nation and people. The man who does not understand this matter is not qualified to proclaim God's message of "Good tidings of great joy, which shall be to ALL PEOPLE" (Luke ii. 10). The idea, therefore, that there is a portion of those we call "men," who are only "The seed of the serpent, by birth; and that Christ never died for them; and that there is no salvation for them, and God never designed they should have any thing beyond what pertains to things temporal," is to represent God's dealings with men as anything but frankness; yea, it represents Him as acting with a deception which, if found in men we would call them "hypocrites, dissemblers, liars." Shall we be guilty of placing the God of truth among such characters, even by implication, saying that Christ did not die for all men, and that no salvation was intended for a part of those we call "men"? I trust not.

Is it not equally a sin against God and the love of Christ to say, that any man shall finally perish hopelessly, without ever having had an opportunity to "know the only true God and Jesus Christ," and accept the mercy provided? If the provision of God's love is never set before them, and no opportunity to embrace it is ever given, how does it differ from that which affirms no provision was ever made for them? One is just as fatal as the other: both exclude them from the salvation said to be provided for "all people:" both ignore any benefit designed for the mass of the race from the undertaking of Christ or from his death!

The only conclusion, fairly arrived at, is, that God at creation, in "the Lamb slain from the foundation of the world," or "before the world began," provided all the means necessary for the ultimate exaltation to the "IMAGE" of the CREATOR the race about to be brought into existence; and to place those means before each and every individual of that race "in due time," so that none should fail to rise into that "image" except by a wilful and conscious refusal to avail themselves of those means: or, in other words, wilfully, knowingly, and persistently rejecting "the Lamb of God" as their Redeemer and "Lord, to the glory of God the Father."

To carry out this scheme of Divine love to the race, "the ages to come" were ordained, that "God's good pleasure, which he hath purposed in himself, that in the dispensation of the fulness of times He might gather together in one all things in Christ, both which are in heaven, and which are on earth, in Him" (Eph. i. 9, 10). Thus shall Christ "see of the travail of his soul and be satisfied." (Isa. liii.) He who can say or believe otherwise would do well to show why the Saviour "died for all," expecting and knowing the mass would perish hopelessly! "A multitude which no man can number" will yet "wash their robes and make them white in the blood of the Lamb" (Rev. ix. 9-14); and then will He, who redeemed them, "be SATISFIED." ED.

CAN LAW GIVE LIFE?

The assumption that the heathen can obtain life by obedience to a "law written in their hearts," is contradicted by the testimony of the Bible in what seems to be the plainest language. Yet some persons insist that the heathen will be judged and destroyed or saved by "the law written in their hearts." That is: Those who have by unavoidable circumstances remained in utter ignorance of Jesus Christ and the salvation of God by him will receive eternal life or be doomed to eternal death by their obedience or disobedience to "the law written in their hearts."

A worthy and excellent friend has written me on the subject, and asks, "Was there ever a law given that could give life without the knowledge of Jesus?"

The conclusion I have arrived at is, that the love of God to "the world," and the love of Christ in "giving himself a ransom for all," is "to be testified in due time" to all men: that is, to every man, woman and child of Adam's race, at some period of their history; if not in the present life or dispensation, it will be in some future one; and that the death which entered into the world by the sin of Adam cannot prevent God's determination to have these facts made known to "every creature" before their final destiny is decided. This view involves the future living, in some form or by some means, of all who have not had, in this life, the means of knowing the love of God and Christ as above stated; because God has but one method of determining the final state of men, viz., faith in Christ, the only LIFE-GIVER or remedial agent that He has provided or furnished for a dying race.

To avoid my conclusion, opposers affirm that such as never hear of God's method of redemption by the REDEEMER will be saved by a law, or the law in themselves: if they conform to that law. The assumption contradicts the plain testimony of the Bible, as a few texts will show: "By the deeds of the law there shall no flesh be justified in his sight" (Rom. iii. 20). "If there had been a law given which could have given life, verily righteousness should have been by the law; but the Scripture hath concluded all under sin, that the promise by faith of Jesus Christ might be given to them that believe" (Gal. iii. 21, 22). "This is the Stone (Jesus Christ) which was set at nought by you builders, which has become the head of the corner: neither is there salvation in any other; for there is none other Name under heaven given among men, whereby we must be saved" (Acts iv. 11, 12).

Such is a sample of the teachings of the Bible as to God's method of saving men from sin and its ultimate consequences. To talk, therefore, of those being saved by obedience to a law within themselves is "to preach another gospel" than "the gospel of God," and expose themselves to the curse Paul invoked on such, Gal. i. 8-9. Let persons who are so ready to over-ride God's method for the salvation of our race be careful lest they be found fighting against Him in their defense of men's traditions; affirming that this present life is the only time and place where any man can secure salvation, no matter how entire or how great his unavoidable ignorance of God's remedial plan for a dying world.

The attempt to make salvation by law, or the "deeds of the law," is to make faith in Christ void and useless; for, if some men can be saved by law, so can others, and "faith is made void" (Rom. iv. 14). If it is God's established order, or plan, that salvation is by believing in Jesus Christ, then it is certain that no possible obstacle can prevent the final communication of that plan, or the Name of Christ, to every child of Adam and Eve: the plan will be made known to all "in due time;" and the hands of God are not shackled by death nor any of the other inventions or traditions of men.

By law, at the most, is only "the knowledge of sin" (Rom. iii. 20); but law reveals not its cure; it does not show salvation nor encourage hope. But the Gospel is for "every creature"—all for whom Christ died, and "He gave himself a ransom for all." So sure, then, as God's plan does not fail—and it will not—every man has heard or will hear, in this life or in a future dispensation, the "good will toward men" which the angels proclaimed to the shepherds on the plains of Bethlehem at the birth of the world's REDEEMER; and no law dispensation can ever supplant or supersede the Gospel of Jesus Christ.

But in opposition to my views expressed above, the text Rom. ii. 12-16 is quoted, viz: "For as many as have sinned without law shall also perish without law," etc. This text is the only one found in the Bible that gives countenance to the idea that men can be saved or eternally perish without the knowledge of the REDEEMER. If it can have no other construction than that put upon it by the advocates of salvation by "the law written in their hearts," then, truly, the apostle is made to contradict himself, and his whole testimony is made worthless; for he expressly says, in the next chapter, "By the deeds of the law there shall no flesh be justified in His (God's) sight" (Rom. iii. 20): he, also, assures us that "If there could have been a law given which could have given life, verily righteousness should have been by the law: but the Scripture hath concluded all under sin, that the promise by faith of Jesus Christ might be given to them that believe" (Gal. iii. 21, 22).

Nothing, then, can be plainer than that, whatever Paul meant by the language Rom. ii. 12-15, he did not mean that the final state of those ignorant of Christ would be determined by any "law written in the heart." That God's present dealings with them might be regulated by that, may be admitted; for, so it was by the law given to Israel,—it was a law not by which their final state was to be determined; it was only "a school-master unto Christ, that we might be justified by faith; but after that faith has come, we are no longer under a school-master" (Gal. iii. 24).

No law then (unless it be "the law of faith") can determine any man's final destiny. Law may and does inflict pains and penalties even unto death, as was the case under the law given by Moses, but not necessarily proving that the final state of the individual was fixed thereby.

HENRY DUNN, of England, remarks on the text, under consideration, that "The point of the apostle's teaching, it is admitted by all, is that God will judge all men justly, and according to the advantages they have enjoyed. But if they who have sinned without a rule of duty, and those who have transgressed against light and knowledge, are alike to perish everlastingly, in the sense commonly attached to that phrase, the distinction drawn is an idle one, and the argument unmeaning. The fact is,—and the recognition of it is essential to the comprehension of the Epistle,—the apostle here is not declaring the final lot of any one. He is simply bringing in all men alike guilty before God, and shutting up all to the need of that Saviour whom he is about to announce (iii. 20-23)." . . . "Still keeping to his point—the vindication of God's righteous dealing with all men—he maintains that a Gentile, obeying the light of conscience, is as pleasing in God's sight as a Jew obeying the law (verses 14, 15). Both alike are regarded as 'justified,' in the sense of being accepted as true men. He is neither affirming nor implying that either the one or the other can be saved by works. Nor shall we here fail to observe, that it is a part of Paul's gospel, or good news, that the world is to be judged 'by Jesus Christ,' one 'who can be touched with the feeling of our infirmities.'"

BISHOP MIDDLETON remarks on the passage Rom. ii. 12-15, that Paul, "In order to show that by the Gospel alone can a man be justified, and that the Mosaic revelation is, in this respect, of no more avail than the light of nature, a proposition, the proof of which is the main object of the whole Epistle, he has occasion to refer to the different rules of life with which the Gentiles and Jews had respectively been punished; to the latter more than one revelation had been granted; for from the earliest ages to the time of Malachi, the Almighty favored them (the Patriarchs and Prophets) with repeated indications of his will." The Bishop adds, "With respect to the present passage, I am of the opinion that the Apostle meant to reprove the presumption of the Jews, who thought themselves sure of eternal life, because God had favored them with a revelation of his will; in which case the reasoning will be—'As many as have sinned without a revelation shall be punished without incurring the additional penalty which such a revelation would have enacted; and as many as have sinned under a revelation shall suffer the severer punishment which that revelation, whatever it be, has denounced against their crimes."

But if "perish" in the text means a final and eternal destruction, or death, what distinction or difference is there in the punishment between the Jew and the Gentile? It is manifest that "perish" in the text means no more than that they should suffer loss; but the nature of the loss is not the subject of the discourse. The term translated "perish" is from apollumi, and variously translated in the New Testament, and is spoken of "the lost sheep of the house of Israel,"—of the prodigal son, who "was lost but is found,"—of those Christ came to save, "I am come to save that which was lost," and many like passages; so that the expression in the text proves only that sin is disastrous, and brings loss under all circumstances.

VALUABLE ACCESSION TO THE CAUSE.

BRO. STORRS: When I wrote to you the last time, I could only hope that your advance views were true; but I felt as if I could never have the same firm conviction of their truth, that I felt in the Life views. Within the last year, however, I can say, and I rejoice to be able to say, in all sincerity, that I am fully convinced they are the undoubted teachings of the Bible, and harmonize with justice as well as mercy. I am very unwell at present, and scarcely able to write, but expressive of how I feel on this subject, I will relate a little conversation between my minister and myself, only a few days since. Some time ago, in consequence of a casual remark, he said, with apparent surprise, "You don't believe in any probation after death, do you?" I replied, that I would let him know in a few days what I believed on that subject. Last week we were walking together, when I remarked, "Doctor, I asked a question twenty-five years ago of Bro. B. (then our minister), which he could not answer, and I have never been able to answer it myself until within the last two years; now I can answer it to my entire satisfaction. You remember when Sarah sent off Hagar, with her son Ishmael, God met with her, and to comfort her, promised,—undoubtedly as a great blessing,—that Ishmael should become a great nation; which promise he afterwards repeated to Abraham. Now where was the blessing, if nearly all Ishmael's descendants, who have been either heathen or Mahomedans, have gone down to the Hell of orthodoxy, to be tormented forever?" Without attempting to answer the question, the Dr. said, "You say you can answer it, how do you do it?" I replied, "God promised, and confirmed his promise by an oath, that in Abraham and his seed, all the nations, and in another place, all the families of the earth should be blessed. Now, Doctor, you know this promise has never been fulfilled; but it certainly will be, or God's promise and oath will fail. I believe in some future age or dispensation, all who have not heard the glad tidings of Christ's mission, will be raised from the dead, and Christ offered to them, and their final and eternal destiny will depend upon their acceptance or rejection of Him as their Saviour.

"Do you find anything in the New Testament to confirm that view?" he asked. I do, a great deal. The angel said to the shepherds, "The glad tidings should be to all people."—"God will have all men to be saved and come to the knowledge of the truth."—"A propitiation for our sins, and not for ours only, but also for the sins of the whole world."—"A ransom for all to be testified in due time."—"A light that lighteth every man that cometh into the world," etc., etc.

We had now reached the end of our walk, and the Dr. left without expressing any opinion. Our minister is regarded by good judges as fully equal, if not superior, to any minister in the northwest.

J. K. FINLEY.

Niles, Mich., 1878.

REMARKS BY THE EDITOR.—The foregoing gives me great pleasure; because it comes from a man of mind and thought; one who has had much experience in the "things pertaining to the kingdom of God;" formerly an Elder in the Presbyterian church, but a number of years since became a firm believer in the doctrine that immortality is the gift of the God of grace, and not inherent in man. When such a man advances from his previous views it gives strength to those advanced views, because it is certain he has not done so without a thorough investigation and a full conviction of the truth of his position. I praise the Lord, therefore, for the added influence of Dr. FINLEY to that blessed truth which has for two years past filled my own mind with inexpressible joy and peace, and which I regard as vital to a clear understanding of the character and government of our gracious God and the work of Jesus Christ; without which, the "perfect love" which "casteth out fear" that "hath torment" can hardly find a constant lodgement in a thinking and intelligent mind.

So far as my own experience goes, my present views of the character and government of our CREATOR have given a rest and peace for which I longed for near sixty years of my Christian life, but never found till mine eyes were opened, two years ago, to see the light that now shines on my mind; for which I give "glory to God and the Lamb." No feeling of enmity exists in my heart toward those who oppose these views; knowing that no one has any light or grace but what he has "received" through the mercy of God. And while such an one is striving to communicate to others, he must not forget that the time was when he himself was in the same state as those who now refuse the message he desires them to receive. Pity, and not enmity, should rule in our hearts for those who see not what we regard as important truth to promote our highest perfection in the divine life.

May brother FINLEY be greatly blessed in the manifestation God has graciously given him of the boundless mercy that the CREATOR has in store for the race He has brought into being, and for whom Christ has given "himself a ransom," even "for all, to be testified in due time." With meekness and patience may we all, who have been enlightened on this glorious subject, be enabled to bear our testimony, to the glory of God the Father and the praise of His grace in Jesus Christ, who has said, "Blessed are the meek, for they shall inherit the earth:" and again, "Take my yoke upon you, and learn of me; for I am meek and lowly in heart; and ye shall find rest unto your souls." Precious words! May we all lay them to heart and find the promised REST, and ultimately possess the promised inheritance.

"LET GOD BE TRUE."

BRO. STORRS: I have received a Tract entitled "The all for whom Christ died: or, The oath and promise of God to Abraham." You, of course, have seen it, and can tell me whether the views presented therein are identical with those held by the "Age-to-come" brethren in the past. If the position taken in this tract is the same as theirs, I do not wonder it is so nauseating to the taste of many. The position, as I understand it, is this: As the consequence of the fall, a race of men and women has been produced—a sort of surplus seed—as indicated by the expression, "I will greatly multiply thy sorrow and thy conception."⁵ This race is called "The seed of the serpent," for which there has been no provision in the plan of redemption: while from the same parents, another race was produced, called "The seed of the woman." These will have the offers of salvation either in the present or some future ages, and will finally be all saved in the kingdom of God. These are the ALL, or, as I should say, the PAIR for whom Christ died. A theory as derogatory to God as any I ever heard advocated.

I believe we are all "children of wrath even as others" (Eph. ii. 3). "But God, who is rich in mercy, for His great love wherewith He loved us, even when we were dead in sins, hath quickened us together with Christ" (verses 4, 5). I believe every human being has had or will have a fair trial for an endless life. I think I can see plainly where I would have been to-day, had my opportunities of hearing the Gospel, and the influences thrown around me been no better than the great mass of the human family have possessed. With me, it has been "line upon line," and influence upon influence that has brought me to the feet of Jesus. S. C. LOCKWOOD.

Saratoga, N. Y.

REMARKS BY THE EDITOR.—I have been a firm believer in an age to come, of probation to some of our race, ever since March, 1844; but never knew nor heard of the doctrine, that friend LOCKWOOD speaks of, as being held by any believer in the "Age-to-Come" theory till very recently. I fully agree with the sentiment that it is "A theory as derogatory to God as any I ever heard advocated:" with it I have no fellowship, and regard it as the quintessence of fatalism; dishonorable to God and his government, in all its aspects; representing Him as insincere, hypocritical, bearing false witness of Himself, pretending to "love the world," and give his Son to "taste death for every man" (Heb. ii. 9), etc.. when, for a large portion of men, He never had even an intention of putting salvation within their reach on any terms.

From a theory justly chargeable with such a representation of the Divine character and government, I trust thinking men and women will "turn away" as they would from "the old Serpent" himself: it is "evil, and only evil, and that continually." No wonder the author of the tract, spoken of, should have said, in a "Note" to it, "The Editor of the Bible Examiner" had put "three of the series, which he had been publishing from" (his) "pen, into the pigeon-hole." Surely the appearance of the tract justifies the Editor's course; and he discontinued those articles none too soon. The pages of the EXAMINER will not be open to any communication that sets at naught the DIVINE veracity in His professions of love to "every man," and of Christ's giving himself a ransom for all men, without regard to class or parentage. Men may become the seed of the serpent—not by birth—but by a wilful rejection of the "Seed of the woman" after he has been made known to them, and freely and honestly been offered to them as their REDEEMER. Till then, no man is nor can be the seed of the serpent.

The theory of the tract, noticed by friend LOCKWOOD, is old fashioned Calvinism, revived, revamped, and attempted to be passed off as a new discovery. The reprobates, under the old theory, were doomed from all eternity to be "damned," do what they would. With my own ears have I heard the minister, in the pulpit, say, "God sends the Gospel to some nations and some people on purpose to increase their DAMNATION." Such was the theology taught sixty years ago by a minister who preached in my native town; and shall I now be told, such blasphemous is a veritable fact? Of the same character, only worse if possible, is the doctrine of a seed, or part of the human race, for whom Christ never died, and for whom God has no love; and yet Christ commanded the Gospel to be preached to them, because he commands it to be preached to "every creature."

I say nothing of the character or motives of the publishers of the theory: that I leave with Him who knoweth all hearts; but the theory is fatalism in its worst form, and calculated to destroy all confidence in God's word; and lead some to fancy they are the favored ones who are to be saved, at all hazards, whatever risks they may run.

By this theory Cain is supposed to be the first of the "surplus," or "Serpent's seed." But the record says that Cain was the son of Adam (Gen. iv. 1); and Eve says, at Cain's birth, "I have gotten a man of the LORD:" and the record further says, "And she again bare his (Cain's) brother Abel" (verse 2). So the two are brothers. Are the seed of the serpent and the seed of the woman brothers? Cain was wroth because his offering to the LORD was not respected, as Abel's was: "And the LORD said unto Cain, Why art thou wroth? and why is thy countenance fallen? If thou doest well, shalt thou not be accepted?" What! the seed of the serpent, can they do well and be accepted! Truly a marvellous utterance to a seed foredoomed, before they were born, to be a cursed seed, and placed at birth out of the pale of salvation on any terms! Is not the LORD justly chargeable with dealing deceitfully with Cain, if he was the foredoomed being the "serpent's seed" theory represents him to be? Does not the theory charge God himself as the producer of this class of men thus doomed to wickedness and ruin? for the text, on which theory is built, reads, "I will greatly multiply thy sorrow and thy conception." God, then, is the author of the birth of this imaginary "serpent's seed," and makes them what they are, a hopeless and cursed seed, regardless of any acts of their own, simply because mother Eve had sinned! Surely, such a view represents JENOVAN as swearing to an untruth, when He says, "Say unto them, As I live, saith the Lord God, I have no pleasure in the death of the wicked; but that the wicked turn from his way and live" (Ezk. xxxiii. 11). It also represents the Saviour as using deception, and as acting under false pretences when He said to certain Jews, "Ye serpents, ye generation of vipers, how can ye escape the damnation of hell" (Matt. xxiii. 33). Did he know they were the "serpent's seed"—"the surplus seed"—that God brought into existence, foredoomed to hell, and their salvation impossible by the Author of their existence? If so, why tantalize them with their birth and doom? Plainly, He reproached them with their own wicked and unavoidable conduct, by which they had justly merited the character and doom He sets before them.

The "two seeds," says the author of the tract, are "not related to each other." Yet is seen that they were both born of the same parents,—Adam the father, Eve the mother; and God himself says they were "brothers." After Cain slew Abel, "The Lord said unto Cain, Where is Abel thy brother?" And again, the Lord said unto him, "The voice of thy brother's blood crieth unto Me from the ground." The apostle John says, Cain "slew his brother." "Not related to each other," says the tract! God says, Cain and Abel were brothers, and John says the same.

The tract asks, with an air of triumph, "Can you make a sheep out of a goat, or wheat out of tares, or disciples of Jesus out of vipers?" I might ask in reply, Can you make a man out of dust? or, Can you make a saint out of a sinner? Saul of Tarsus was a goat and a viper; the chief of sinners; a blasphemer; but Jesus Christ made him a sheep, and removed his viperous spirit; and Paul declared, "This is a faithful saying, and worthy of all acceptance, that Christ Jesus came into the world to save sinners; of whom I AM CHIEF" (1 Tim. i. 13-15). Because the Scriptures call men goats and vipers, does that prove they are not men of the same nature and constitution by birth as other men? Who does not know that the expressions are to denote characters, like goats and vipers,—not that they are not truly men, capable of developing the opposite characteristics as any other men.

But says the author of the tract, "If a person possesses the latent germ of rectitude, trial will bring it out into the likeness of God in Jesus Christ." Here God is charged with creating Adam and Eve without a "germ of rectitude;" for trial did not "bring it out into the likeness of God." Again, he says, "There is no way known by men or angels, neither has God revealed any way to get that out of a man which is not in him." Here is another charge against God of acting the hypocrite. Who made these men which the tract calls the "Surplus seed"? Did the CREATOR make them without a "germ of rectitude," and thus make it impossible for them to serve Him; and yet pretending He blames and condemns them for not performing His will, and saying to Cain, "If thou doest well, shall thou not be accepted?" But enough of this theory: the theory itself looks like the "serpent's seed." May the Lord extend mercy to the sowers of it.

THE STUDY OF THE BIBLE.

BY HENRY DUNN.

CHAPTER III.

For what Purpose was Holy Scripture Given?

"Lamp of our feet, where we trace
 Our path, when wont to stray;
 Stream from the fount of heavenly grace!
 Brook by the traveler's way!
 Word of the ever living God!
 Will of His gracious Son!
 Without thee, how could earth be trod?
 Or Heaven itself be won?"

BERNARD BARTON.

EVERY book has, or ought to have, a distinct object. What, then, is the object of the Bible?

The answer is at hand. It professes to enlighten us as to our true relation to our Creator; as to our duties in this world; and as to our destiny in the world to come.

It has sometimes been said, and urged too, as a reason for neglecting Divine revelation, that the Bible deals with things beyond our experience and comprehension; that it has little to do with the every day work of a practical man's life; that it is a book full of mysteries; and that it treats of matters regarding which nothing certain can be by any possibility be known.

But this is not true. Nor would it be asserted but for certain mistakes that men fall into, in confounding the things which it reveals with the things which it merely hints at.

Properly speaking, the Book reveals only that which belongs to man—the present, which is his possession, and the future, which is his inheritance. To many things if only incidentally refers; speaking, for instance, of other beings and other worlds, with much beside, simply to the extent, and no further, than seems to be needful in order to our true comprehension of the position we occupy in the universe. To fix our attention on these mere accessories; to create difficulties out of them, and to neglect the immediate object of the revelation, is, to say the least of it, unpractical and absurd.

We would not for a single moment, underrate, even in the slightest degree, the importance of these incidental communications. On the contrary, we receive them with a thankful wonder. For we cannot forget that we have no other account, besides that given in the Bible, of the most important events that have educated the race, and made men what they now are.

But we say again, as these things are not the object of the Book, so difficulties relating to them, however formidable, can afford no good reason for neglecting or rejecting its immediate message to ourselves, as creatures of God, destined, in one form or other, to fulfil the ends of our existence, whether in this world or in that which is to come.

Further, the Bible always presupposes other and prior revelations.

NATURE is a revelation. "The heavens declare the glory of God; and the firmament sheweth His handywork. Day unto day uttereth speech, and night unto night showeth knowledge. There is no speech nor language, where their voice is not heard. Their line is gone out through all the earth, and their words to the end of the world" (Psa. xix. 1-4).

It was the neglect of Nature's voice which rendered the idolatry of the heathen inexcusable. "For the invisible things of Him from the creation of the world are clearly seen, being understood by things that are made, even His eternal power and Godhead; so that they are without excuse" (Rom. i. 20).

The PROVIDENCE of God is, again, a continual revelation. Paul in addressing the Athenians, could appeal on this ground to heathen poets: "As certain also of your own poets have said, For we are also His offspring."

Forgetfulness of this truth plunged the ancients into ever deepening error. "When they knew God, they glorified Him not as God, neither were thankful; but became vain in their imaginations, and their foolish heart was darkened" (Rom. i. 21).

The peculiarity of the later revelation, that of God in Christ, is that it was embodied in a Person, and that it exists for us as a WRITTEN BOOK.

To its presentation in this shape, many persons fancy they see insuperable objections. We can scarcely imagine, however, that it could have been given otherwise. A direct revelation to each individual personally and separately would, if effectual, offer such violence to human nature, that freedom, both of choice and action, would be destroyed by it; while if otherwise—making no deep and strong impression on the mind,—a communication would soon come to be regarded as unreal, the result of natural causes, and the mere effect of a disturbed imagination. Imposition under such a state of things, would be sure to abound, and enthusiasm would supersede reason altogether.

The mode actually adopted, that of first qualifying individuals, by indisputable credentials to instruct others as the will of God, and then preserving their teachings in writing, is obviously the best, if not the only method in which the work could have been accomplished. It is plainly a more secure method for conveying truth than tradition could ever be; it is freer from liability to suspicion of fraud or contrivance; it throws that which is taught open at all times to the investigation of every man; and it has this advantage,—it is the only natural and human method. "Everything that is of consequence man desires to have in writing. By its means laws are promulgated, arts and sciences spread, and titles and estates are secured. All that we know of History comes down to us in books; tradition passes away like the morning cloud, but books may live as long as the sun and moon endure."

Add to these considerations the fact that God, although invisible, is ever bearing witness to the truth of this written revelation by a voice within; that without other evidence than that which is internal, its revelations are at once recognized as realities by "the lowly heart and pure;" that it is the only key that fits the wards of human consciousness; that, to the poor and uneducated it comes home like a familiar thing,—and we are forced to confess that, stereotyped as it is in paragraphs and in letters, it yet bears about with it all the characteristics of perpetual life, and is capable of being made the common property of all the children of men.

We are not quite sure that the Bible was intended to be so direct an instrument in the conversion of the world as is usually supposed. That work seems rather to be the peculiar responsibility of Christians; to be accomplished by the living voice, and the power of a holy example. The Bible, regarded as a book, is not so much intended for the unbeliever as for the believer. Its chief aim and end is to elevate the Christian; to bring him closer to Christ; to teach, and to enable him, by faith in the Redeemer, to live a higher life than others,—a life of self-denial, of unworldliness, and of disinterested love. This seems to be the view taken of Scripture by St. Paul, when he speaks of it to Timothy, as "profitable for doctrine, for reproof, for correction, for instruction in righteousness, that the man of God may be perfect, thoroughly furnished unto all good works" (2 Tim. iii. 16, 17).

Happy indeed shall we be if permitted to enjoy however small a measure of success, in calling attention to its claims; in removing obstacles to its comprehension; or in restoring it to that supremacy which is its rightful place, and apart from which it can never accomplish the great purposes for which it has been bestowed.

In contributing what little we can toward this result, may the Father of Lights be pleased to vouchsafe His holy guidance and benediction.

CHAPTER IV.

Was the Bible Intended to be Understood by the Unlearned.

"The Sacred Book,

In dusty sequestration held so long,
Now takes the accents of our native tongue;
And he who guides the plow or wields the crook,
With understanding spirit now may look
Upon her records, listen to her song,
And sift her law, much wond'ring that the wrong
Which faith has suffered heaven could calmly brook."

WORDSWORTH.

If the great principle of our Protestantism be of any practical value, the Bible must be a popular book, written for and addressed to the masses of mankind.

Further, if, as we profess, it is the gift of One who never deludes us by unrealities, it is impossible that it should need for its comprehension—so far, at least, as all practical purposes are concerned—anything beyond moral sympathy and that common sense which is pre-eminently the inheritance of the people.

The history of the Book justifies this supposition. The words of Moses were chiefly addressed to semi-barbarous tribes; the utterances of the prophets were proclaimed to their countrymen without distinction of class; the songs of David were embodied in public worship; the words of Christ were spoken to the fishermen and artisans of Judea; and the Epistles were written to persons who were, probably, in the main, uneducated.

It will, we know, be said in reply, that the utterances of the prophets, the teaching of the Lord, and the letters of His apostles, were all given forth in the language of the people to whom they were addressed; that the figures, allusions, and illustrations, which are so numerous in Scripture, were all taken from their daily life; and that it by no means follows that what was familiar to them must of course be intelligible to persons in totally different circumstances.

We grant this fully. Neither common sense nor moral sympathy with God will enable a man either to translate for himself, or to correct the errors of translators. But we are not speaking of the Bible as it was originally written, either in Hebrew or in Greek, but as presented to the English people in the Authorized Version. We are not supposing that version to be faultless,—far from it; but we are certainly taking for granted (and few will dispute the fact) that it is, in the main, singularly faithful and fair. And it is in relation to this volume, regarding us, on the whole, a true presentation of the contents of the Bible, that we affirm Scripture to be intelligible to ordinary understandings, and suited to ordinary wants.

We maintain that the same God who has adapted the Bible to the mind of man has adapted the mind of man to the Bible. The apostolic authors constantly assume this. They assume "the existence in all men of a spiritual discernment, entering the mind when unclouded by appetite or passion, to recognize and distinguish the Divine voice, whether uttered from within by the intimations of conscience, or speaking from without in the language of inspired oracles. They presuppose that vigor of reasoning may consist with feebleness of understanding; and that the power of discerning between religious truth and error does not chiefly depend on the culture, or on the exercise of the argumentative faculty. The especial patrimony of the poor, the Gospel has been the stay of countless millions who never framed a syllogism."

To slaves and peasants, and to the uninstructed generally, explain it as we may, the Book carries its own evidence with it, and truth, like the sun, is by them seen in its own light. There is, without doubt, a sense of certainty, in relation to Scripture, which belongs to the simple-minded, and to such alone; a conviction which is neither the offspring of reason nor the result of culture, but, like life itself, a direct inspiration of the Almighty. Such persons, independently of all study or learning, and apart from all reasoning, are, in the state of the heart alone, amply furnished with defences against falsehood, and are able to discern betwixt truth and error.

If it were not so, he would be the firmest believer who enjoyed the greatest advantages for obtaining and weighing proofs; truth would be the property of few; and the multitude, if they believed at all, could only do so on the authority of those who were favored with opportunities for research. But the very reverse of all this is the fact. The doubter is commonly the man of high attainment, of cultivated understanding, and of varied learning. The peaceful and happy believer is he who has the witness in himself, and who cuts through the web of all sophistry with the simple exclamation, "I know it and feel it to be true."

Strange, then, indeed is it that so many teach and believe that the acceptance of the Bible alone, however sincere and heartfelt, can in itself inspire no Christian confidence, since such a profession may mean anything or nothing; that the Book is one from which doctrines of all kinds, even the most contradictory, may be, at least, plausibly supported; and that, apart from a more definite expression of the truth it involves than is given in the Sacred Page, it can convey no certain sound; that it is, in short, only to be regarded as truly received when it is understood in a given sense, and expounded in harmony with the confessions of the Church, whatever that term may be supposed to mean.

Such we believe to be, at the present day, the accredited opinion of the Christian world; and we are disposed to regard its frequent assertion as the expression of a conviction which is partly honest, and partly dishonest: honest, however mistaken, when it proceeds from self-distrust,—from undue veneration for accomplished commentators,—from the overruling power of hereditary teaching,—or from the perplexity which is naturally engendered by diversities of judgment and multiplied sects; dishonest, when it is adopted from a desire to prop up any existing ecclesiastical organization,—when it springs from a disposition to exalt human creeds, catechisms, and formularies, over Divine teachings,—or when, as is often the case, it is made an excuse either for the neglect or disbelief of Scripture altogether.

But whether honest or dishonest, nothing is more certain than that such a persuasion is in itself singularly mischievous; since it furnishes, on the one hand, the most plausible of all arguments in support of modern assertions that a revelation from God, by or through a book, is impossible; and since it sustains, on the other, the contemptible assumptions of those who pretend that the Bible was never intended to be read without an authorized interpreter, and that the Church, or the Pope, as the case may be, should be regarded as the representative of Christ on earth for this purpose.

Further, this notion of the indefiniteness of Scripture, when regarded apart from a given interpretation, is as senseless as it is mischievous; for no delusion can be greater than to suppose that we do really give a more explicit character to Gospel truth, and that we bind men more firmly to it, when, having exchanged the Divine for a human expression, and transferred, as we fondly imagine, the spirit of Scripture into the substance of theological propositions, we demand adherence, in some form or other, to "the idol," we have set up. It never seems to occur to us that the absence of any such compendium in Scripture clearly indicates its undesirableness; that in that which is omitted, as much as in that which is included, we ought to see the Divine wisdom; that in this, as in many other things, "the foolishness of God is wiser than men, and the weakness of God stronger than men."

The truth is, the moment we attempt to condense or translate words that are "spirit and life," into forms of thought which are neither the one nor the other, we more or less change their meaning, and insensibly become expositors of the Word. And since we do this, only that we may more effectually "judge" as to the reality of one another's faith, God frowns on our devices by confounding our language; so that it comes to pass that the very words and phrases in which we express our convictions, and by which we hope to promote oneness, are changed into "traps and snares," amid which we "fall, and are broken." Nothing more is needed to explain the endless divisions of christendom than the general abandonment of the "unity of the Spirit," gathered from the Word itself, for the false lights of an imaginary and impracticable uniformity, sought in the more definite expression of truth by theological propositions.

Away, then, with the God-dishonoring notion that Divine Revelation is either unintelligible or indefinite. "There is no reason whatever, in the nature of things, why Holy Scripture should not be as well and as uniformly understood by those who read it, as any other book of similar date, now chiefly known through translations."

Granting, as we cheerfully do, that some peculiarities attach to the Old Testament which make its actual interpretation difficult, and which have "encouraged critics to take such liberties with Hebrew as they could not venture upon with languages of which we have more ample remains,"—the New Testament Scriptures are absolutely free from any difficulty which is not common to all ancient books. "Other writings are preserved to us in dead languages,—Greek, Latin, Oriental,—some of them in fragments, and all of them originally in manuscript. Difficulties occur in them similar to those which attach to Scripture; these are found equally in sacred and in profane literature. But the meaning of classical authors is known with comparative certainty; and the interpretation of them seems to rest on a scientific basis. It is not, therefore, to philological or historical difficulties that the greater part of the uncertainty in the interpretation of Scripture is to be attributed. No ignorance of Hebrew or Greek is sufficient to account for it."

What the hindrances to its profitable comprehension really are, will become more evident as we proceed with our allotted task.

God of all grace, whom rightly to know is life eternal; grant us so to receive Thy Son Jesus Christ as the Way, the Truth, and the Life, that, following in the steps of Thy holy Apostles, we may steadfastly walk in the way that leadeth to everlasting blessedness, through the same, our Lord and Saviour.

CHAPTER V.

With what Authority does the Book Speak?

"It is the Book of God. What if I should Say God of books?

Let him that looks

Angry at that expression, as too bold,

His thoughts in silence smother,

Till he find such another."

GEORGE HERBERT.

We regard the Bible as possessing Divine authority.

The proof of this, however, opens up a field of inquiry into which we cannot here enter. It is an investigation for which the multitude are, in many respects, unprepared; which few can tread with an independent step; and which in any case demands an expenditure of time and energy far beyond the available resources of ordinary men.

But it does not thence follow that everything must be taken on trust; for the results of the labors of many generations in this department are now open to every eye, and may be mastered without difficulty.

Short of this degree of research, the simplest course is—in the absence of that internal evidence which is a later result of experience—to allow the mind to fasten on some one great tangible proof of Divine superintendence, such as the fact that, in the Bible, "a series of more than thirty writers, speaking in succession along a vast line of time (sixteen hundred years), and absolutely without means of concert, all combine unconsciously to one end; lock, like parts of a great machine, into one system; conspire to the unity of a very elaborate scheme, without being at all aware of what was to come after." This one argument, when well worked out in the mind, becomes unanswerable; it places the Bible in a position altogether distinct from that of any pretended revelation; and, apart from all theories about the modes, justifies the assumption that its Divine Inspiration, and consequently its Divine Authority, is, in some sense or other, and in a very high sense, too, a great fact.

Or, the question may be looked at in this way:

Christ and His apostles everywhere take for granted the veracity of the Old Testament Scriptures. They constantly appeal to these writings as authoritative and Divine. If, therefore, the New Testament be genuine; if such persons as Christ and his apostles ever existed; and if the account given of them by the Evangelists be trustworthy, they must,—on the supposition that the Old Testament is unworthy of belief,—have been either deceivers or deceived.

In relation to the first supposition,—the possible non-existence of Christ, or the untrustworthiness of the Gospels—it is only necessary to observe there is far stronger proof of the existence of Jesus Christ; than there is that such persons as Alexander or Julius Cæsar ever lived; that the Gospels are received as genuine for the same and much stronger reasons than those on which we receive the writings of Tacitus, or any other heathen author; and that the older infidel writers, such as Hobbes, Chubb, and Bolingbroke, readily grant this much at least. Lord Bolingbroke says: "It is out of dispute that we have in our hands the Gospels of Matthew and John, who gave themselves out for eye and ear witnesses of all that Christ did and taught."

In relation to the second,—that of Christ and his apostles being either deceivers or deceived,—it is enough to say that if they were deceived, they were in common with the Jewish nation, which to this day maintains with scrupulous anxiety the Divine authority of its ancient records.

As to their being deceivers, that is absolutely incredible,—for their entire teaching is based on principles utterly inconsistent with such a supposition. Two of these "pillars" of the Faith only need be named. The first, fatal to all untruthfulness of whatever kind, is, the utter worthlessness of the outward, when it does not truly represent the inward; the second, fatal to mere ritualism and superstitious formality, is, that men may have the noblest of all spiritual ancestry; may belong to the purest and best of churches; may form part of a community chosen by God Himself; and yet, if they are personally practically insincere and unholy, it will avail them nothing. We say it is impossible even to imagine impostors inventing, or deluded fanatics promulgating, principles like these.

The miracles of the New Testament must stand or fall with the character of Christ and his apostles. Those of the Old,—allowing for possible interpolation,—with the veracity of the men who narrate them. The sacred writers are pledged to these marvels so deeply, that the overthrow of the miraculous element in either Testament involves of necessity the overthrow of the moral also.

Nor does the modern sceptical theory,—that these things, though false, are represented by the writers, in all purity of intention, as they conceived of them; that the words of the Bible may be (notwithstanding their falsity), regarded as true words, inasmuch as they express "the conceptions of the times, and the measure of knowledge or of faith, to which every one of the writers, in his degree, had attained,"—at all mend the matter. For if this theory be true, the authoritative character of the Book is quite as effectually destroyed. If the miracles it records did not take place, the narrators, whether deluded or deluding, are altogether unworthy of respect.

No folly can be greater than to say that the words of Christ and his apostles when faithfully recorded were true words, if they were not really so; nay, if they were not inspired words in a very different sense from ordinary human utterances; for the speakers always assume this to be the case, and perpetually ground thereupon claims which, if unfounded, are either wicked or absurd. We may call such words fanatical, if we will; weak or blasphemous, if we must; but true words they can never be.

Nothing can be more unreasonable than to regard the Bible as being at once true, and yet full of falsehood; pure, and yet defiled by credulity and prejudice. As if a thing really of the heaven and heavenly, could be tainted by the breath of delusion and deceit. Eject the miraculous from the Bible and the Book unquestionably falls into contempt. If it be not authoritative and Divine it is clearly not worth the trouble of perusing,—except, indeed, as a literary miracle, a monster of good and evil, which, having first slain the falsehoods of Paganism, now waits, in turn, to be devoured by higher truth, to which it has itself given birth and development.

Finally, it may not be amiss to think where the rejection of the Bible lauds us. With the Book, the God revealed in the Book departs also. What then remains for us? Clearly, neither more nor less than self-worship. The grosser forms of Paganism,—the cruel and revengeful demons of uncivilized idolaters,—would, in such a case, of course, find no place amongst us. A more refined Polytheism might; but this is only the embodiment, in beautiful forms of idealized human power or passion, heroism or virtue. Pantheism, whenever it becomes objective, can take no other shape. For since man is greater than either sun or stars, storm or river, bird or beast, the highest manifestation of God, on this showing, must be MAN.

The moral results of such a conclusion are obvious. Every man, at his best, is, or aims to be, what he conceives his God to be. He may sink far below that conception, but he can never rise above it. Without a Divinity better than himself man is incapable of moral advancement.

Such are the necessary results of the rejection:

of Scripture, when fully worked out. To be a sceptic in the midst of Christian influences, and with the results of a Christian education continually acting on the character and conduct of a man, is one thing. To be a sceptic in the midst of universal scepticism, with all traces of Christianity withdrawn, and nothing left but the results of unbelief, is quite another thing. The first, notwithstanding its blind ingratitude, may consist with much that is amiable and honorable; the last must terminate in moral debasement, and in unmitigated selfishness.

We now only observe that abundant proof can be obtained.—That the various books which form the Bible embody all that God has been pleased to reveal of Himself to man; and further, that they have been transmitted to us without any important omissions, or interpolations.

We say "important," because it cannot be disputed that, from whatever cause, errors do exist in the Bible. Sometimes figures are erroneous; and sometimes words. Sometimes a translation is not quite accurate, and what are called "readings" of the text frequently vary. Interpolations are rare, but they may be found nevertheless.

The great question, however, is—What doctrine or important truth do these errors affect? Of what importance are they? Safely may it be replied, of none at all. As the Bishop of London has well remarked, "When laborious ingenuity has exerted itself to collect a whole store of such difficulties, suppose them to be real, what on earth does it signify? They may quietly float away without our being able to solve them, if we bear in mind that there is a human element in the Bible."

They are, however, certainly fatal to those who assert that not only is the word of God in the Bible, but the Bible is itself, in the strictest and fullest sense, in every particular of its contents, and in every expression which it uses, the infallible word of the one living and true God. This cannot be proved, and therefore ought not to be asserted. The treasure is in earthen vessels in more senses than one, and this simply because it is, on the whole, best that it should be so.

"The spiritual element in Scripture—that is, everything in it which concerns our relation to God and to eternity,—though combined with other elements, such as historical details, genealogies, and documents taken from the public registers, is plainly distinguishable from them, and wholly independent of them; and since the evidence of Christianity attaches infallibly only to the spiritual element, the discovery of errors in the Bible does not touch Christianity."

GOD'S BLESSING TO ABRAHAM.

[How long since the following was written, I do not know; and whether the author holds the same views still, I am not prepared to say. I venture to give the sentiments to the readers of the BIBLE EXAMINER with slight omissions and some change in the style.—EDITOR.]

INTRODUCTION.

"But though we, or an angel from heaven, preach any other gospel unto you than that which we have preached unto you, let him be accursed."—Gal. i. 8.

THE GOSPEL is the power of God unto salvation to every one that believeth. It is the only means by which we can be justified in God's sight. Without faith in the Gospel, it is impossible to please God. But faith in the Gospel comes by hearing, and hearing by the word of God. The Gospel and the things pertaining to it, are not self evident propositions. They must be studied to be understood; they must be understood to be believed; and they must be believed in order to be saved. If we ought to believe the Gospel, we ought to understand it. If we ought to understand the Gospel, we ought to investigate it. Therefore, if we would believe the Gospel, we must do all that is requisite for such a faith.

Our text is an index pointing to the true source of information on the subject, "The Gospel which we preach." It shuts us up to this one Gospel, and excludes every other. "If any man preach any other Gospel" than that which Paul preached, "let him be accursed."

The Gospel may be perverted. It had already been perverted. "I marvel that ye are so soon removed from him that called you into the grace of Christ, unto another Gospel, which is not another, but there are some that trouble you, and would pervert the Gospel of Christ." This text was written because the Gospel had been perverted, and was a caution against its perversion. I have chosen it for the same reason. The Gospel has been and is now perverted. And this perversion enters into and guides all the interpretations of the Bible, to the extent to which the Gospel is perverted.

The belief of the Gospel unites us to God, to his purpose, and to his plan. The belief of a perverted gospel separates us from God, from his purpose, and from his plan.

In one case the Gospel becomes the power of God unto salvation. In the other; the perverted Gospel becomes a snare and lures on to destruction those deceived by it, while they "verily think they are doing God service."

My object in writing upon this subject is, to show exactly what the Gospel is, so that we need not be mistaken or deceived on a subject of such vital importance. To show its purpose, its plan, and its adaptation to the wants of the world. In the first place I will inquire—

HOW MAY WE KNOW, WITH CERTAINTY, WHAT THE GOSPEL IS?

Just as we know, with certainty, any other enterprise. First: By its purpose. Second: By the means to be used to accomplish that purpose.

In all the enterprises in which we engage, we ascertain, first, what we want, and, second, how to obtain it. These questions being satisfactorily answered, we are prepared to engage in, or reject any enterprise to which they relate. This process is essential to determine our choice, or conclusions. We cannot enter into any business whatever without it. It is a rule of universal application, without exception. First: What do we want to do? Second: How shall we do it?

The thing we want, suggests and controls the means by which to attain it. The means are used only for the sake of the end. Without the end, the means would not be needed. To illustrate. I want a home. This suggests the necessary means to procure one. I want means because I want a home. If I did not want a home, I would not need the means. Again, I want to be in New York. To reach this end I must go there. I want to go to New York because I want to be there. If I did not want to be in New York I would not want to go there. Again, I want a trade, a profession, or a position. These ends suggest appropriate means by which to reach or attain these ends. I use the means to obtain the ends. But if I did not want the ends, I would not need to use the means. Thus it is in all that we do. And what we do, can be understood with certainty, by others, only as the end is understood which we have in view.

Thus it is that we may understand with certainty what the Gospel is. The rule which never fails when applied to what man does, will be equally certain when applied to what God does.

We must, in the first place, understand what object God wants to accomplish by the Gospel. What does God want to do? What will be when the Gospel is consummated? What is its final end? Whatever this end may be found to be, it will suggest, call out and control means exactly appropriate for its accomplishment. Every means will be for the attainment of its one final end. When we understand definitely, first, what God wants to do, and, second, the means by which he will reach that end, we shall understand with certainty what the Gospel is. I will now proceed to the examination of my subject.

PAUL PREACHED THE ONLY TRUE GOSPEL.

What did he preach? He preached the promise made to the fathers, Abraham, and Isaac, and Jacob: "and we declare unto you glad tidings, (the Gospel) how that the promise which was made unto the fathers, God hath fulfilled the same to us their children, in that he hath raised up Jesus again." The resurrection of Christ, and all things pertaining to it, was in fulfilment of the promise made to the fathers. (Acts xiii. 32, 33.) Again he said, "And now I stand and am judged for the hope of the promise made of God to the fathers." The hope of Paul, and all things pertaining to it, rests on the promise made of God to the fathers. (Acts xvi. 8, 22.) Again he said, "For the hope of Israel I am bound with this chain." The hope of Paul and the hope of Israel are the same, being based on the same promise. (Acts xxvi. 7; xxviii. 20.) Again he said, "For when God made promise to Abraham, because he could swear by no greater, he swore by himself. Wherein God, willing more abundantly to shew unto the heirs of promise the immutability of his counsel, confirmed it by an oath, that by two immutable things in which it was impossible for God to lie, we might have a strong consolation who have fled for refuge to lay hold upon the hope set before us." In this passage, the apostle represents that the hope of all Christians, and all their consolation and comfort, rest upon two immutable things. First, The promise made to Abraham; and, second, the oath by which it was confirmed. (Heb. vi. 13-18.) Again he said, "Now to Abraham and to his seed were the promises made. He saith not and to seeds as of many, but as of one, and to thy seed, which is Christ." He said also to Christians, "If ye be Christ's then are ye Abraham's seed and heirs according to the promise." In this passage Christ is the seed of Abraham, and as he is the seed of Abraham he is heir to the promise, and because Christians belong to Christ, they are also the seed of Abraham, and joint-heirs with Christ to the same promise. Then Christ, and all that pertains to Christ, and all that pertains to Christians are the result of the promise made to Abraham. (Gal. iii. 16-29.)

Christ did not originate the Gospel, but the promise which gave Christ his position in the plan of the Gospel, was to Abraham. This promise was the hope of Paul, and the hope of Israel, and is the hope of all Christians. According to the testimony of him who said, "If any man preach any other Gospel than that which we have preached unto you, let him be accursed." And who said farther, that this promise of which he made so frequent mention, is the Gospel, and is comprehended in the saying, "In thy seed shall all the nations of the earth be blessed." Thus it is that Paul preached the Gospel. He did not preach a code of laws given to Abraham, or to Moses, or to any one else, but he preached the promise made of God to Abraham.

THE PROMISE.

"In thy seed shall all the nations of the earth be blessed" (Gen. xxii. 18). This promise was made to Abraham. "God said, And I will make of thee a great nation, and I will bless thee, and make thy name great, and thou shalt be a blessing, and I will bless them that bless thee, and curse him that curseth thee, and in thee shall all the families of the earth be blessed." This promise was repeated again, and confirmed to Abraham by an oath. "And the angel of the Lord called unto Abraham out of heaven the second time, and said, By myself have I sworn, that in blessing, I will bless thee, and in multiplying I will multiply thy seed as the stars of heaven, and as the sand which is upon the sea shore, and thy seed shall possess the gate of his enemies. And in thy seed shall all the nations of the earth be blessed." This promise, made to Abraham, and confirmed to him by an oath, was renewed, and confirmed to Isaac. "And in thy seed shall all the nations of the earth be blessed" (Gen. xxvi. 34). And again the same promise was confirmed to Jacob. "And in thee and in thy seed shall all the families of the earth be blessed" (Gen. xxviii. 13, 14).

This is the promise, in fulfilment of which Christ was raised from the dead. This is the promise for which Paul hoped. This is the promise made to Abraham, and confirmed to him and to his seed by an oath, that all the heirs of this promise might have strong consolation who flee for refuge to lay hold upon this hope set before them. It is this promise which made Christ the heir of the world, and it is this promise which Paul says is the Gospel.

What the Gospel was in the days of Abraham, the same was the Gospel in the days of Christ, and the same is the Gospel now. For the Gospel is immutable. Thus far we are safe. We have found the Gospel which Paul preached. It is comprehended in this promise, "In thy seed shall all the nations of the earth be blessed." To understand the Gospel then, is to understand the import of this single promise. It is simple, comprehensive, and definite.

THE IMPORT OF THE PROMISE.

It comprehends the elements of God's purpose concerning this world.

1. That all the nations of the earth shall be blessed.

2. That the seed of Abraham shall bless all the nations of the earth.

The first represents His ultimate purpose to bless the world.

The second represents the instrumentality to be used to accomplish that purpose.

These two objects, the first the final end to be reached; the second as the means or instrumentality by which to reach the final end, comprehend the whole Gospel. The one purpose to bless the world, is the one object of the Gospel. The seed of Abraham is the one instrumentality to be used for this end. The instrumentality is for this end. It is adapted to this end. It is limited to this end. It cannot extend outside or beyond the accomplishment of this end. We cannot claim more than is expressed in the promise, but we may claim, as implied in the promise, everything necessary to its fulfilment. We cannot claim on a note of $100 more than $100, but we may claim that the maker of the note bound himself to procure every dollar up to the 100. So with this promise. The nations must be blessed, and the means must be sufficient to meet that demand.

THE PROMISE CONTAINS ALL THE ELEMENTS OF THE GOSPEL.

1. The seed represents the instrumentality to be used in the Gospel for the accomplishment of its object, and all that pertains to it.

2. The nations represent the objects to be blessed in the consummation of the Gospel.

3. The earth represents the place where the nations live, and from which their wants will be supplied.

The blessings represent the work of the seed, in the consummation of the Gospel.

THE PROMISE CONTAINS ALSO, ALL THE ELEMENTS OF THE KINGDOM OF GOD.

1. The seed are to be the rulers.

2. The nations are to be the subjects.

3. The earth is to be the territory.

4. The blessing is to be the administration of this government.

Thus, the import of the promise may be easily understood. It comprehends the whole of God's purpose concerning this world. It comprehends all things pertaining to the Gospel. And it comprehends all things pertaining to the Kingdom of God.

The promise is unlimited, therefore its purpose embraces all nations, securing blessings the most remote, as well as those which are immediate. There can be nothing outside of it, or beyond it.

THOUGHTS ON 2 PET. III. 10.

DOES A GENERAL CONFLAGRATION AWAIT THE EARTH?

THAT a general conflagration awaits the earth was unquestionably the belief of King James and his translators, hence Peter's words in the Common Version does appear to teach that the world shall be "burned up." But that such is the meaning that the inspired writer designed to convey by his words in the passage above noted, there are substantial reasons for doubting.

One reason, which has much influence on my mind, is, I cannot believe that Peter, speaking by inspiration, meant to teach that which is antagonistic to and subversive of the utterances of those "holy men of old" who "spake as they were moved by the Holy Ghost." Divinely inspired writers cannot contradict each other, for where a contradiction exists between two writers both cannot be right. Because mortals, blinded with theological mist, do not perceive the harmony that must exist between Scripture writers, proves nothing against acknowledging it, and recognizing as essential to a correct understanding of God's word. Now the general tenor of the Holy Scriptures disproves the notion of a general conflagration of the earth; and hence, as Peter was an inspired writer, he could not mean to teach it, however fallible mortals may understand his words. God himself has said that he will not "again smite every living thing" as he had done, which emphatically disproves a general destruction by fire, and therefore we must not construe Peter's words to contradict Jehovah himself.

We must not say a word disparagingly of Peter's language. None can safely deny that he spoke by inspiration of God. But men's interpretations cannot be too thoroughly tested. None can well disregard Bishop Whately's rule which he so wisely insists upon, that of "not interpreting single texts by themselves, but judging them partly by the general drift and tenor of the whole discourse, examining what goes before and what follows, and partly from a comparison of one passage with another, so as to reconcile each part of Scripture with the rest." The author of "The Theology of the Bible" says, "How necessary this rule is in reading the English version, the reader is competent to judge. And if any passage could be found either in what we call the original, or in any version, which seems or might be construed so as to conflict with the general tenor and system of the Bible, it should, if it cannot be construed consistently with such tenor and system, be rejected as incorrect, or as an interpolation in support of men's inventions."

These remarks from such eminent biblical scholars, regarding interpretation of single texts of Scripture, commend themselves to all unprejudiced minds. This rule of interpretation emphatically condemns the popular mode of construing the passage in Peter to teach a general conflagration of the world, and requires us to interpret the passage in harmony with the general tenor and system of the Bible; and if the third chapter of the Second Epistle of Peter be taken as a whole, it cannot be interpreted consistently otherwise.

This chapter, which is supposed to teach the burning up of the world, Peter prefaces by saying, "This second epistle, beloved, I now write unto you, in which I stir up your pure minds by way of remembrance." In remembrance of what?

Let Peter answer: "That ye may be mindful of the words which were spoken before by the holy prophets." Let those who are prone to expound this chapter by ignoring the words of the holy prophets, as found in the Old Testament Scriptures, bear in mind that Peter's design in writing the Epistle in question was to call to remembrance their words. It is very evident from Peter's language that he had in his mind specially two significant portions of the Old Testament Scriptures, viz., the destruction of the ungodly world by the flood in the days of Noah, and also the promised restitution, recorded by Isaiah.

Peter enjoined us to be mindful of the words which were spoken before by the holy prophets, who spake on this wise: "Behold the days come, saith the Lord, that I will raise unto David a righteous BRANCH; and a King shall reign and prosper, and shall execute judgment and justice in the earth. In his days Judah shall be saved, and Israel shall dwell safely; and this is his name whereby he shall be called, THE LORD OUR RIGHTEOUSNESS" (Jer xxiii. 5, 6). The prophet Isaiah also speaks of this Branch, which, I believe, is generally admitted by biblical scholars to mean Christ. He says: "There shall come forth a rod out of the stem of Jesse, and a Branch shall grow out of his roots, and the Spirit of the Lord shall rest upon him, the spirit of wisdom and understanding. . . . He shall not judge after the sight of his eyes, nor reprove after the hearing of his ears (as rulers now do): but with righteousness shall he judge the poor, and reprove with equity for the meek of the earth, and he shall smite the earth with the rod of his mouth, and with the breath of his lips shall he slay the wicked" (Isa. xi. 1-4).

Will any one say that Peter was ignorant of these predictions, or that he meant to teach that which would disprove their fulfilment? The fact that he referred directly to one of the prophetic utterances of Isaiah proves beyond doubt that he was acquainted with those prophecies that relate to the second coming of Christ and the glorious future of our earth; and the fact that he would put his brethren in remembrance of those prophetic utterances shows conclusively that he looked forward for their fulfilment.

He says that men shall come in the last days "walking after their own ungodly lusts," who should scoff at the message that Christ is coming to execute judgment upon those who obey not the Gospel, saying, "Where is the promise of his coming?" etc. He says they will do this in wilful ignorance that the world "being overflowed with water (in the days of Noah) perished"—not the earth, but the world of ungodly men perished. Peter would have us also to be mindful that "the heavens and earth which are now . . . are reserved unto fire against the day of judgment and perdition of ungodly men," i. e., as an unbelieving world once perished by water, so a "day of judgment and perdition" awaits these latter-day scoffers.

But an objector may ask, As "the heavens and the earth which are now" are "reserved unto fire," must he not mean a literal burning of the heavens and the earth? Admitting Peter's words in their broadest import, they by no means prove destruction. The heavens and the earth are destined to occupy three distinct stages of existence, and he speaks of "the heavens and the earth which are now" as second in point of time. The first heavens and earth passed, so to speak, with the destruction of the ungodly world by water; so the second heavens and earth will pass away by the "perdition of ungodly men" by fire; but Peter says, "We according to His promise, look for new heavens and a new earth,"—a new dispensation,—which shall constitute the third. The apostle Paul was favored with a vision of this third heaven, or paradisiac state, and heard unspeakable words. The first heavens and earth passed away by a change to the second;

so the second, "which are now," will pass away by a change to the third; and I might easily show from the Scriptures that the change which now awaits the heavens and earth, will be less destructive than the one of the past. The expression, "The works that are therein shall be burned up," the author of "Bible vs. Tradition" says should read, "The works that are therein WILL BE DISCOVERED (kri go kai ta en ante erga eureshetai—Vatican MSS.), and not katakusetai, 'burned up.'"

Again it is said, The "heavens being on fire" must mean a literal burning. I reply, Fire is used in the Bible in a number of senses, and in this case it may mean, as Prof. Robinson says, "tried with fire, purified, inflamed," and "may be considered as having its import in this place, exhausted by a condition of the atmosphere in which it is heated, filled with fiery, volcanic emissions, and lit up with lightnings." Though Peter speaks of the heavens being on fire and of passing away with a great noise, yet it is evident that by such highly wrought figurative expressions he only meant that which the heavens and earth were to undergo was the renewal, repairing or restoration of the heavens and the earth, and they would thus become "the new heavens and new earth."

It should be borne in mind that fire is a purifier as well as a destroyer. The author of "The Theology of the Bible" says: "The Greek pur, is fire; and our word purify is from the Gr. pur, fire; so that purify means firefy; fire being a purifier as well as a destroyer." So, indeed, in that great day of which Peter wrote, God will employ fire for the destruction of evil doers, but beyond that He may employ it for a very different purpose than as a destroyer. Nor must we conclude that the destruction of any portion of the human race at the setting up of Christ's kingdom and the introduction of "the times of restitution," is final in their cases, and irrevocably fixes their doom. It is a well established fact that about the time of which Peter speaks, there will be a grand earthly combination against the Messiah and his kingdom which he shall come to establish; but He shall rebuke them, and dash them to pieces as a potter's vessel. (See 1'sa. ii. and Rev. xix.) Paul especially speaks of this event. He says: "The Lord Jesus shall be revealed from heaven with his mighty angels (margin, 'angels of his power'), in flaming fire, taking vengeance on them that know not God, and that obey not the Gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ: who shall be punished with everlasting destruction (i. e., age-lasting destruction) from the presence of the Lord and from the glory of his power" (2 Thess. i. 7-9). This destruction is their punishment for joining in the mighty crusade against Messiah and his kingdom, and continues only during the millennial age. They thus suffer exclusion from the blessedness of the Lord's presence and from the glory and power of His millennial reign, at the conclusion of which they live again in "the second resurrection" for probationary purposes.

For additional confirmation of the views herein set forth, let us briefly consider the promise to which Peter refers and desires to put us in remembrance of. He says, "We according to his promise, look for new heavens and a new earth." This promise is found in Isaiah lxx. 17-19: "For behold, I create new heavens and a new earth; and the former shall not be remembered nor come into mind. But be ye glad and rejoice forever in that which I create; for, behold, I create Jerusalem a rejoicing, and her people a joy. And I will rejoice in Jerusalem, and joy in my people." Again, in the 68th chapter it is recorded: "Behold, the Lord will come with fire, and with his chariots like a whirlwind, to render his anger with fury and his rebuke with flames of fire. For, by fire and by his sword will the Lord plead with all flesh: and the slain of the Lord will be many. . . . I will gather all nations and tongues; and they shall come, and see my glory. . . . And I will also take of them (verse 20, 'children of Israel') for priests and Levites, saith the Lord. For as the new heavens and the new earth, which I will make, shall remain before me, saith the Lord, so shall your seed and your name remain." The prophet Isaiah speaks of fire in nearly as strong language as Peter, referring, undoubtedly, to the same event; but what has been quoted shows positively that he could not have meant such a destruction as many profess to believe.

The author of "The Theology of the Bible," thus renders Isa. lxx. 17: "For, behold, I produce, or fashion, (the) heavens renewed, repaired, or restored, and the earth renewed, repaired, or restored." I believe this expresses the full sense of God's promise to which Peter refers; hence it is a gross misapprehension and misapplication of his words to construe them to teach the destruction of the heavens and the earth, for he contemplated their renewal, repairing, or restoration; and thus we see that the promised "restitution of all things which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his holy prophets since the world began," affects the heavens (whatever may be understood by that term) as well as the earth.

MAN A SINNER AND A SUFFERER.

THE fall of man is the one great fact on which all the further revelations of the Bible hang.

Not to man as man, but to man as a sinner,—as fallen, depraved, alienated by wicked works, and in captivity to satan,—is the word of the living God addressed.

The message it delivers is, from first to last, REMEDIAL; it is a message of grace,—the announcement of a provision for the restoration of the lost.

Into the origin of evil it is vain for us to inquire. All we know on this point is, that it existed before the creation of man. Of its ill effects experience is but too constantly our teacher. Its bitterness no human pen can describe.

The end it is intended to subserve—for without an object and purpose its permission is inconceivable—may, more or less, be learned from the pages of Holy Scripture. It is, under God, THE GREAT EDUCATOR of the human family. It is the instrument by which man learns how frail, how helpless, how dependent he is.

Therefore it was that our first parents were introduced into a world where evil existed. This fact alone is surely evidence enough that not for unconditional happiness, but for a relative one, more or less connected with moral trial man was created; that it was as much foreordained that "the first man Adam," should struggle with as that by "the second man, the Lord from heaven," it should be destroyed and made of none effect.

Sin, like night, is a great REVEALER. Through it man advances to a more intimate acquaintance with the character of God than, so far as we know, he could gain in any other way. Without its agency it is hard to see how he could ever be enabled voluntarily to choose God as his portion, and goodness as his chief joy; could ever be fitted to rise higher than the angels; or, as we have already intimated, here attain to that peculiar affection for his Maker which so strangely, and yet so lovingly, intermingles awe and filial confidence, shame and exultation, abasement and hope. This kind of love, unknown, probably, to other beings, is the fruit of sin and sanctification, of guilt and pardon, of the loss and the recovery of the Divine favor. And thus it comes to pass, as Luther well puts it, that "prayer and temptation make the Christian."

But what a costly educator sin is! The humiliation of the Glorified,—the suffering of the Sinless One,—is, in itself, a dreadful price to pay for its removal. Yet even this is not all; for there are those (God only knows how many) who by it are ruined for ever. In no aspect whatever is it possible to contemplate the wickedness, the cruelty, the crime to which sin has given birth,—the sickness, the sorrow, the pain and misery which have followed in its train,—without feeling that it is indeed a stern teacher and a hard master.

One thought only is permissible. Evil is subject to, not independent of God. In no sense whatever can sin reverse the decisions or disturb the equanimity of the Lord of all. Anger, wrath, and jealousy, as connected with sin and sinning, are indeed attributed to God in Scripture, as well as love and grief, long-suffering and repenting. But these are only translations into human speech of things that cannot be conceived of by us except under a phraseology adapted to finite beings.

Confidently may we assume that the Fall can never permanently derange the purposes of God; that the ultimate design He had in view in the creation of man, whatever that might be, will be eventually carried out; that evil can do nothing which, if it should seem good, God cannot utterly undo; that, under any circumstances, the Divine intentions, however accomplished, will finally be brought about with the least possible amount of loss consistent with the honor of the Creator and the welfare of the creature.

More than this we do not know; less than this it is impossible to believe, without something like an implied reflection on the wisdom and goodness of the Father of us all.

CHRIST THE REDEEMER OF HUMANITY.

The promise involved in the mystic prophecy that the seed of the woman should bruise the serpent's head, in due time found its fulfilment in the birth of the Redeemer.

Ancient seers had long anticipated the advent of this Deliverer, in language glowing with expectation and delight. His coming is to them the restoration of the Paradise that was lost. "They shall beat their swords into ploughshares, and their spears into pruning hooks: nation shall not lift up sword against nation, neither shall they learn war any more" (Isa. ii. 4). "The government shall be upon his shoulder; and his name shall be called Wonderful, Counsellor, The mighty God, The everlasting Father, The Prince of Peace. Of the increase of his government and peace there shall be no end." "Righteousness shall be the girdle of his loins, and faithfulness the girdle of his reins. The wolf also shall dwell with the lamb, and the leopard shall lie down with the kid; and the young lion and the fatling together; and a little child shall lead them. They shall not hurt nor destroy in all my holy mountain: for the earth shall be full of the knowledge of the Lord as the waters cover the sea" (Isa. xi. 5-9).

The angels announce his birth to the shepherds as "good tidings of great joy, which shall be to all people." Heaven re-echoes with the song, "Glory to God in the highest, and on earth peace, good will to man." He is "a light to lighten the Gentiles, and the glory of his people Israel" (Luke ii. 32). He is "the Lamb of God which taketh away the sin of the world" (John i. 29).

Such is the gladdening and UNIVERSAL ASPECT of man's redemption.

But it has also an INDIVIDUAL AND EXCLUSIVE side,—one for the believer only.

"He that believeth is not condemned; but he that believeth not is condemned already, because he hath not believed in the name of the only begotten Son of God" (John iii. 16-18). Not to all, but to "as many as received him, to them gave he power (or privilege) to become the sons of God, even to them which believe on his name: which were born, not of blood, nor of the will of man, but of God" (John i. 12, 13). "No man," says Christ himself, "can come unto Me, except the Father, which hath sent Me, draw (attract) him" (John vi. 44). And yet, "except a man be born again, he cannot see (know or perceive) the kingdom of God" (John iii. 3).

Further,—the privileged must also be the perfected. They are to be "poor in spirit," "meek," "merciful," "pure," "peacemakers," the "salt of the earth," the "light of the world." They are relatively few,—everywhere the minority; for the gate is "strait," the way "narrow," and "few there be that find it" (Matt. vi. and vii. 14).

To these belong the higher mysteries of the Gospel.

"Unto you (the disciples) it is given to know the mystery of the kingdom of God: but unto them that are without, all these things are done in parables: that seeing they may see, and not perceive; and hearing they may hear, and not understand; lest at any time they should be converted, and their sins should be forgiven them" (Mark iv. 11, 12).

For these—we had almost said for these alone—the Redeemer prays.

"These words spake Jesus, and lifted up his eyes to heaven, and said, Father, the hour is come; glorify thy Son, that thy Son also may glorify thee; as thou hast given him power over all flesh, that he should give eternal life to as many as thou hast given him." "I have manifested thy name unto the men which thou gavest me out of the world. I pray for them: I pray not for the world, but for them which Thou hast given me; for they are thine. Holy Father, keep through thine own name those whom thou hast given me, that they may be one, as we are" (John xvii).

Such, and so striking, is the apparent contrast between the two sides of redemption,—between the anticipations of those who waited for the advent, and actual experience of those who witnessed it.

It seems impossible for any candid man to read the Scriptures fairly without being struck by the fact, that everything revealed prior to the introduction of Christianity would lead to the expectation that the triumphs of the Redeemer would be immediate and universal; while every thing relating to its development, either in its earlier days, or during the eighteen hundred years of its existence, as clearly indicates delay and limitation.

Theories in explanation have never been wanting; but they are all utterly unsatisfactory. We turn from them to THE BOOK. There if any where, shall we find the true solution of the problem that oppresses us. From no other quarter can even a solitary ray of light fall upon our darkness. We ask, therefore, for a purged eye and a purified heart, to enable us to discern in Revelation itself the hidden harmony which unites the Elder Brother of the Elect with the Redeemer of the Race.

THE WORLD OF PROBATION.

Temptation, the Fall, sin, suffering, and Redemption, all alike suppose the present condition of mankind to be probationary and educational. The language of Moses to the Israelites seems to embody the great principle which underlies all human existence. "The Lord thy God led thee these forty years in the wilderness, to humble thee, and to prove thee, to know what was in thine heart; that He might make thee know that man doth not live by bread only, but by every word that proceedeth out of the mouth of the Lord" (Deut. viii. 2, 3).

What other ends the TEST to which God subjects His creatures may be intended to subservise beyond this, it may not be easy for us to decide. Butler, in his great work, regards the probation of man as analogous to that early education and discipline by which he is fitted for the obligations and services of mature life; and intimates that it may probably be intended to preserve us from falling in other states of existence,—a supposition founded on the admission of at least a possibility that such future state may not be free from temptation; and that it may demand the exercise of tempers akin to, if not identical with, resignation, submission, and faith.

Whether this be so or not, or for whatever service in other worlds man may now be fitting, it seems at least clear that, in some form or other the application of a test is, in this world, essential to his development and training as an intelligent and responsible creature.

We judge thus, because we have a right to suppose that otherwise God would not expose His children to the dangers involved in trial; and we partly see the reason of this proceeding in the apparent impossibility of revealing man to himself, and making him fully conscious of his weakness and dependence, without a test.

Yet, on the other hand, nothing is plainer than that a large portion of the race, dying in infancy, or in an otherwise irresponsible condition, escape everything in the form of a trial here, and pass into the unseen world without having had any opportunity of developing, even in the slightest degree, the nature and tendencies connected with their birth.

Again, it is quite certain that the probation of those who live to mature years in the enjoyment of unimpaired faculties, differs so widely both in kind and extent, that it is difficult, if not impossible to speak of mankind generally as subjected to trial in any sense which carries with it the notion of a common discipline. Everywhere Probation comes before us as a thing of degree, involving more or less, according to the various conditions and circumstances of different men.

Facts like these, regarded by themselves, in the absence of any revelation to the contrary, would certainly seem to imply that in other worlds Probation may be extended to those who have not been subjected to it here, or continued in the case of others who have but imperfectly been brought under its influence.

Further, since all probation implies risk,—the risk of failure, with its attendant consequences,—it would seem equally evident that its all but infinite diversity in character and extent must carry with it a corresponding diversity in the actual responsibility and future condition of those who are subjected to the discipline it involves.

In the retirement of the closet, thoughtful and devout men rarely shrink from admitting that "the Divine standard of man's accountability is a scale of all but unlimited graduation; that the place of every man in the future world will be the exact counterpart of his moral character here; that while some will be "beaten with many stripes," there will be for the minimum of guilt the minimum of punishment;" and such like.

But it is otherwise in the pulpit. There, or on the missionary platform, it seems to be accounted dangerous to admit this diversity; for the appeal, whether to the individual sinner or on behalf of the heathen world, is almost always made on the assumption that every child of Adam is destined either for heaven or hell; that the only alternative in the case of each separate man is, everlasting blessedness or eternal misery.

But opposite views cannot be equally true. Either the conclusions of the closet are erroneous or the declamations of the platform are unwarranted. Surely it becomes us to inquire which is right and which is wrong; or—if the two apparently conflicting modes of thought are both scriptural, and therefore reconcilable—whether that reconciliation is to be sought, as so many are now seeking it, in the denial of an objective hell altogether,—the mind being regarded as its own place, and therefore making its own hell; or whether it is not rather to be found in those portions of Divine Revelation which seem to teach that the destinies of the Elect Church and those of the World are, in many important respects, different; that the one class is intended to form the court, and the other the commonality, of the world (or age) to come; that the former, in glory, is to be identified with its Lord at His coming, and therefore with Him to judge both men and angels; while the latter, each one according to his works, is to be placed in that position which will form the appropriate retribution of his belief or unbelief, of his love or scorn of the Gospel, and of his kindness to, or hate of, the little flock while on earth. That retribution may involve degradation or death, few stripes or many stripes, grievous loss or the lake of fire,—all but the irreparably lost being, on this supposition, again brought under influences involving further and probably less severe probation, terminating either in restoration or the second death. "Less severe," because good government, and that in the highest sense, will then be established; because wiser and better teachers than can now be met with will then abound; and because many, if not all, the outward temptations, which now overcome man will then have disappeared.

I pass no opinion, at present, either on the one view or the other. I desire to commence the inquiry with an earnest endeavor simply to ascertain the truth so far as it is recorded in Holy Writ, and, unless greatly deceived, with a perfect willingness to bow at once and for ever to the decision of that sacred record, whatever it may be.

One word only would I add. An indolent, careless, or superficial inquiry will be of no avail to any one. It has been well said, in relation to natural science, that "safe conclusions can only be founded on the most microscopic examination, since Nature never proclaims her secrets with a loud voice, but only whispers them." It may with equal confidence be affirmed of many things in Divine Revelation, that they can only be known by "searched out,"—sometimes amid dangers which call for incessant watchfulness, humility, and prayer, and always with labor concentrated and severe. Distinctly are we told in the Divine Record itself, that he who would find truth or wisdom there must, as the condition of its discovery, seek it "as silver," and search for it "as for hid treasure" (Prov. ii. 4).

RE-EXAMINATION OF THE VISION.

"At the time of the end shall be the vision."—Dan. viii. 17.

As this text locates the time of the fulfilment of the vision; and as much has been written of late upon the subject, making the periods of Daniel and Revelation literal days, and yet future, and applied to a literal Anti-christ, an anti-type of the beasts of Revelation xiii. and xvii., I have been stirred up to a re-examination of the whole subject, with the following results, which are commended to the prayerful consideration of all lovers of truth.

In Daniel ii. we have it clearly revealed, that the powers symbolized by the iron, the clay, the brass, the silver and the gold, will all be in existence in some form, and destroyed by the kingdom of God after the second advent of Christ. As the powers represented by the four wild beasts of ch. vii. are the same as the four parts of the metallic image, it follows, that they too will also have an existence in the same way, in that form of government when thus broken and destroyed.

We will now look into the book of Revelation and see what is there revealed upon this point. In ch. xiii. 2 we have this testimony: "And the beast which I saw was like unto a leopard, and his feet, as the feet of a bear, and his mouth as the mouth of a lion; and the dragon gave him his power and his seat, and great authority." This beast unquestionably represents papal Rome for a period of 1260 literal years; and was during that time, a likeness of those ravenous beasts; and was made so by the dragon, or imperial Rome; hence those three beasts were preserved in that likeness to the close of the last century, when that period closed in the wars of Napoleon I. on the papal beast, which was wounded or killed by a sword and carried into captivity. By reference to verses 11-14, it will be seen that this same ten horned beast, thus wounded and killed, lives again, under the two horned beast. These facts demonstrate this point, that the rise of the two horned beast is this side of the ending of the 1200 period; and hence the likeness of the leopard, the bear, and the lion, are all carried forward and are parts and parcels of this two horned monster.

Again: By reference to chapter 17th we have these additions, viz., that the ten horns, or kingdoms, of Daniel vii., have an existence under the eighth head or last form of the Roman kingdom, and belong to the scarlet beast, and are to stand up against Christ in the battle of the final day. Of the heads of this beast, in verses 9 and 11, it is thus recorded: "The seven heads are seven mountains on which the woman sitteth. And the beast that was, and is not, even he is the eighth, and is of the seven" (not the seventh, as is often quoted), "and goeth into perdition." The language of the 9th verse is definite, and expressly teaches, that the woman sitteth upon all of those seven heads. Now, as those heads are interpreted by the angel to denote seven forms of government, and that five were then in the past and the one that then was, being imperial, constituted the sixth, and when papal Rome came up, it was called by the Revelator the beast for 1200 years; it follows to a certainty that the harlot woman never sat upon one of them; unless it be this side of the close of the last century.

Again: The peculiar phraseology of the 11th verse, "is of the seven," conveys these thoughts; that this eighth form is made up of, or includes in it, all the preceding seven, and that this head will control the entire body of the beast; which body is to include all of "the many waters, or multitudes and peoples, and tongues and nations" of earth over which the papal harlot assumes to have a kingdom above, or superior to them all. I see not how these and kindred prophecies can be otherwise fulfilled.

We will now examine and see if there is in existence a form of government on the earth, that bears rule over the prophetic world answering to the foregoing conclusions. If there is, where is it to be found, and when did it arise? If these questions can be answered affirmatively I see not why we may not claim to have found a solution of these mysterious symbols.

As a people, we claim Rev. xiii. 10, was fulfilled (as noted above), in the wars of Napoleon at the close of the last century, when the forty-two months ended upon papal Rome, as attested by the history of those times. The historians that recorded those events, recorded also the following facts, viz., At the downfall of Napoleon in 1814, the nations of Europe assembled, representatively, in what is called the Vienna Congress, and re-adjusted the chaotic state of Europe into which it had been thrown by the French revolution; followed by the wars of Napoleon on the surrounding nations. The work accomplished was in part as follows:

The papacy was restored, ecclesiastically and politically, to the position she occupied from that day, to her downfall in 1870. 2. Order was restored to Europe. 3. International laws were adopted, political and commercial, preserving to each nation their own internal laws and religious institutions. 4. Those laws have been continued with various modifications to the present, and have been acknowledged by the other nations of earth as the law of nations. Those that were refractory have been coerced into subjection by those allies. 5. A new era then dawned upon Europe and the Holy See. 6. All the various forms of European governments were represented. 7. In those forms there was the full significant Bible number of seven all of which aided in or consented to the restoration of the papacy: It was however, the imperial and regal forms that took the lead in that work.

I will now apply these facts to the prophecies, beginning with the last paragraph.

1. When the papacy was thus restored, she, for the first time, took her seat upon the scarlet beast.

2. Prior to that time, in the symbols of Daniel and Revelation, it is called "the beast," "the little horn;" the masculine gender is used; and, why? Because it was a governing power of the fourth kingdom, having "power over all kindreds and tongues and nations" for 1200 years. (Rev. xiii. 5-7; Daniel vii. 25.) The hire and the sword were united in the hands of the popes.

3. The body of this scarlet beast included the many waters upon which the woman sitteth, viz., all "of the multitudes and peoples, and tongues and nations" of the prophetic world (xvii. 15).

4. Those seven heads unitedly constituted the eighth, the one that governs the entire body of the beast, at, and just prior to the judgment, being of all the seven preceding restored.

5. Since the time of that restoration, the harlot woman has been sustained by all of those forms; and hence the appropriateness of the language, "The seven heads are seven mountains on which the woman sitteth." They are now living realities; parts and parcels of the fourth kingdom, under the supervision of those allies.

6. This leadership (the allies), has governed the prophetic world since that day.

7. The four parts of the metallic image are all in positions to be broken as follows: The feet and the toes of iron and clay are to be found in Eastern and Western Rome, "partly strong and partly broken." The Grecian brass and Persian silver are living powers. As to the golden part, this must be found in the one apocalyptic Babylon which is the last power to be destroyed, and "comes into remembrance before God" under the pouring out of the seventh vial, Rev. xvi. 17. All of these are under the supervision of those allies.

8. The leopard beast, of Rev. xiii. 2, has also an existence and a place in this last form, having been restored and caused to live again by those allies, and is still "making war against the saints and prevailing." The "feet as of a bear" are found in the northern bear of Russia, now rapidly approaching the open "mouth" of the English "lion," for the purpose of wresting from his iron teeth his ill-gotten Indian possessions.

9. As to the number of his name, I will repeat a suggestion often made, that the names of the kingdoms, included in the body of the beast, go to make up the number 666, and are the same as the names of blasphemy of which the scarlet beast is full. I never have had "wisdom to count them;" and now after about thirty year's study upon the subject have come to this conclusion, that this number is mystical or legion, and includes not only the names of the nations, but also all of the "peoples, and multitudes, and tongues," over which Great Babylon reigns. Now, as the pope is in reality the vicc-gerent of the devil, (instead of Christ), in this number may be included all of his subjects, "led captive at his will," viz., "all whose names are not written in the Lamb's book of life."

These events, having transpired in "the time of the end," when many are running to and fro, and knowledge is increased, occupying some seventy-five years, why may we not accept of them as a fulfilment of the text, "For, at the time of the end shall be the vision?"

This harmonizes the visions seen by Daniel and the Revelator, including the past history of the world as measured off by inspiration by the periods of years, with a reproduction of the ancient powers and forms of government preparatory to their final speedy overthrow and destruction by the King of kings. THE PARABLES OF CHRIST.

Let us glance at the parables of Christ. Truth half betrayed in beauty, half shrouded in mystery, is the essence of a parable. It is a truth wishing to be loved ere it ventures forth to be worshipped and obeyed. The multitudes of Christ's parables is not so wonderful as their variety, their beauty their brevity, and the sweet or fearful pictures they paint at once and forever upon the soul. Here we see the good Samaritan riding toward his inn, with his wounded brother before him. There lingeringly, doubtfully, like a truant boy at evening, returns the prodigal son to his father, whose arms, at his threshold, stretched out, seem wishing for wings to expedite the joyous meeting. In that field stalks the sower, graver than the sowers are wont to be in the merry season of spring. On the opposite side, the fisherman, with joyful face, is drawing ashore his heavy-laden net. With yet keener ecstacy depicted on his countenance, you see the merchantman lighting on a pearl of pearls, while across from him is the treasure-finder, with circumspection and fearful looks, hiding his precious prize. And lo! how under the dim canopy of night, shadowing the barely budding field of wheat, steals a crooked and winged figure, trembling lest the very darkness see him—the enemy—scattering tares in huddled abundance among the wheat. The morning comes, but, while revealing the rank tares growing among the good seed, it reveals also the large mustard tree which has shot up with incredible swiftness "so that the fowls of the air do hide in the branches thereof." Here you see a woman mixing leaven with her meal till the whole lump is leavened; and there another woman, sweeping the room, how fast, yet intensely, for her lost piece of silver. There the servant of the marriage host is compelling the wanderers from the hedges to come in, his face all glowing with amiable anger and kindly coercion; and yonder in the distance, with anxious eyes and crook in his hand, lies the shepherd into the twilight desert, in search of his "lost sheep." And hark! as the marriage-feast has begun and the song of holy merriment is just rising on the evening air, there comes a voice, strangely concerting with it, hollow as the grave—a whispered thunder. It is the voice of Dives, saying, "Father Abraham, have mercy on me, and send Lazarus, that he may dip the tips of his fingers in water, and cool my tongue for I am tormented in this flame."

In such figures, Jesus has exhausted life, earth, eternity. The small seed from which all greatness buds; the supreme beauty of compassion even when found in foreign and uneducated breasts; the touch of nature, making the whole world kin; the joy and glory connected with the recovery of the lost; the unseen but awfully real agency of evil counteracting good in this present world; the all embracing and pains-taking love of the great Host and Father; the fact that men must sometimes be driven to their own happiness; the feelings connected with finding a truth, and wrapping it up as too precious or bright for the present time; the yearning of the Father over his vagrant children, and his joy at their return; the reception the Saviour was to receive when he came to save the lost;—such are the fancy wrought and fine written lessons of the parables of Jesus Christ.

The marriage of the highest truth and human interest was never so fully celebrated as here. Hence, while divines find these parables to sink into a profundity into which they cannot follow, children hang them up, like pictures, in their fancies and hearts.—Selected.

THE MIGHTY DIFFERENCE.

The difference between a Gospel which only relates to one's personal salvation, whether it is a salvation from endless torments, or from the second death, or a salvation from the grave, (meaning a resurrection), and the salvation which relates to the work of blessing our race, under the government of Christ, the Second Adam, in "the ages to come," is a difference no tongue or pen can describe. The first is made up of selfishness and fancy, mingled, it may be, with a degree of love to God; the other is Christ-like, which, while it looks to "the joy set before us is actuated by love to the race for whom Christ died, and willingly endures present crosses and trials that thereby they may be fitted to reign with Christ in blessing "all the families of the earth" when the kingdom is established on the earth and under the whole heaven.

This latter view expands the heart, exalts God, fills its possessor with love to God and to those whom God so loved (viz., "the world") as to give His Son, that by faith in Him they might have eternal life. It rises far above the narrow selfishness which cares but little for the rest of the race, for whom Christ died, if they can only be made happy themselves. Like the Jews, of old, such cannot bear the idea that the ignorant people and nations, who never have had their advantages, should have the means of knowing and being benefited by the Gospel they have possessed, because, possibly, those people have died without the knowledge God has, of His grace, favored themselves with. It is time this narrow spirit was banished from christendom: a spirit which dishonors God, reproaches His government, and ties up the hand of the immutable JENOVAN, who has sworn, by himself, that He has no pleasure in the death of the sinner, and who has given His Son "a ransom for all, to be testified in due time." To multitudes, it will be declared in "the ages to come," and will be done by those who have so improved the present and past ages as to be prepared to be "kings and priests" in the future. Ed.

WHAT IS THE CHARACTER OF GOD?

"The Lord thy God is a merciful God, he will not forsake thee, neither destroy thee, nor forget the covenant of thy fathers which he sware unto them" (Deut. iv. 31). "The Lord thy God, He is the faithful God, which keepeth covenant and mercy with them that love Him and keep his commandments to a thousand generations" (Deut. vii. 9). "The Lord your God is God of gods, and Lord of lords, a great and mighty, a terrible God, which regardeth not persons nor taketh rewards" (Deut. x. 17). "He is wise in heart and mighty in strength. Who has hardened himself against Him and prospered" (Job ix. 4)? Behold "God is mighty and despiseth not any. He is mighty in strength and wisdom" (Job xxxvi. 6). If I interpret Psa. vii. 11 with the foregoing passages, I must read it, "God judgeth the righteous, and is grieved with the wicked every day." "God is our refuge and strength, a very present help in trouble" (Psa. xlvi. 1). The following texts are quoted without noting the places where found. "God is in the midst of the city of God. God will help her, and that right early. God is king in all the earth; sing praises. God will be our guide. This God is our God for ever and ever. God is a father of the fatherless. Truly God is good to Israel. My flesh and my heart faileth, but God is my strength and my portion forever. God is my king of old, working salvation in the midst of the earth. God is greatly to be feared in the assembly of His saints, and to be had in reverence of all them that are about Him." (Why is He greatly to be feared? Because to us He has given light, and our responsibility to Him and to our fellowmen is fearfully great.) "Gracious is the Lord; yea, our God is merciful. God is the Lord who hath showed us light. The Lord of hosts shall be exalted in judgment, and God that is holy shall be sanctified in righteousness. God is my salvation, I will trust and not be afraid: the Lord Jehovah is my strength, my song, and salvation."

The following are a few texts from the New Testament, and if they show that "God is one," and if so in character, purpose and spirit, then the character of the Father and Son are one. God is the God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob: not of the dead, but of the living: hence, is the God of the resurrection. But the Son saith, "I am the resurrection." He that hath received his (Christ's) testimony hath set to his seal that God is true." God's testimony proved true in the testimony of Jesus Christ, "My words are spirit and are life." "God is a spirit, and they that worship Him must worship Him in spirit and in truth." God is glorified in Jesus Christ: "He that hath seen Me hath seen the Father." Christ is "The Image of the invisible God." "God is faithful by whom ye were called unto the fellowship of His Son Jesus Christ our Lord." "God is faithful, who will not suffer you to be tempted above that ye are able to bear." "God is in you of a truth." "This is eternal life that they might know thee, the only true God and Jesus Christ whom Thou hast sent" to do God's will. "It is one God who shall justify." "There is none other God but me." "But to us, one God; the Father, of whom are all things, and we in Him; and one Lord Jesus Christ, by whom are all things, and we by Him." Can oneness be more perfect in character? "The same God which worketh all in all." "One God and Father of all, who is above all, and through all, and in you all."

Is not the "Body of Christ" the Divine nature (in which there is no sin, 1 Cor. vi. 18, 19)? and has this nature changed in its character? Is it not impossible to soil, corrupt, tarnish or dilute it? and the character of its fruit is always the same, viz., love, love, LOVE, now and forever. Amen.

BRO. STORRS: The BIBLE EXAMINER in its new dress is a welcome visitor; it is I think a great improvement in many respects, and will be more easily preserved for future usefulness. The more I read and reflect on the subject of future probation for those who have never heard the Gospel of the Kingdom, the more reasonable and God-like it appears, and I sincerely hope it may be true.

Taking the Old and New Testament as one revelation of the Divine will, the exceeding great and precious promises therein contained, and the power, faithfulness, and love of God, who retaineth not his anger forever, because he delighteth in mercy; we may surely believe that the great majority of our race were not made in vain, or for the triumph of sin and death over Christ, which popular opinion and credism seems to indicate.

I have been much interested lately in reading Edward Beecher's "History of Opinions in the First Centuries." The doctrine of final restoration appears to have prevailed extensively in the first Christian churches, and not until priestcraft gained the ascendancy, did the awful dogma of eternal torment infect the churches with its baleful influence, that has not yet subsided.

The Evangelical Alliance I expect will prove but a rope of sand to unite the conflicting opinions of the great theologians of our day. The rulers and D. D.'s take counsel together, to forestall the work of Christ, and bring peace on the earth, before the Prince of Peace comes to reign, and make all one in Him. Then, and not till then, shall we see eye to eye, and Ephraim shall not envy Judah, and Judah shall not vex Ephraim.

The good work in which you are engaged seems to be committed chiefly to men of age and experience; and I doubt not you were raised up from a bed of sickness for this very purpose, at evening-tide to spread the light of truth. May you be spared to see that you have not labored in vain;—but the harvest is not yet; it will be at the resurrection of the just. I have entered on my eightieth year. I do not know for what purpose I have been spared so long; but I thank God for the light he has given me in these last days, and pray that it may shine more and more until the perfect day.

Your brother in the hope of life.

J. PARRY.

BRO. STORRS: I rejoice in the light of the glorious gospel, or the "glad tidings" of the coming kingdom of our Lord Jesus, the Christ. O how darkness covers the earth and gross darkness the people! I have been an expectant of the coming King since 1843. My bark has steered clear of some of the breakers caused by false lights and waymarks set up by erring mortals such as definite time, shut door, etc.; but I got into the 7th day Sabbath for a time; but always held the age to come views; hence, was held off as a dangerous man by that party. I could not see how the third angel's message could be given till after the first, Rev. xiv. 6. The first is not given till the King and His cabinet stand on Mount Zion. I soon got out of that eddy in the gospel channel again; and if ever my Redeemer looked glorious, it was when I understood that "Christ is the end of the law for righteousness to every one that believeth." I have had no misgivings since. But I have had some things that I could not harmonize with the character of an impartial God; such as, leaving sinners, and all those ignorant of the way of life, in sheol to perish like the beasts, or to raise them again to be killed the second time without an opportunity for repentance and faith. But, thank the Lord, Paul says, "As in Adam all die even so in Christ shall all be made alive; but every man in his own order: Christ the first-fruits; afterwards they that are Christ's at his coming;" and then, when the time is due, the remainder; for, He gave himself a ransom for all, and has tasted death for all men. Here all is plain.

Sin came into the world, and death by sin; but the Lamb of God will take it away; for he came to seek and to save that which was lost. Glory to God! It is so plain and simple that the great men of earth have failed to see that Christ must bring all men from the region of death and restore Paradise and the tree of life in the midst; and if Adam was on probation before he fell, all who have not had the offer of life by means of the gospel, or the good news of salvation, will, by doing his commandments, have a right to the tree of life, and enter in through the gates into the city. This looks like a restitution.

How my heart rejoiced when I saw Bro. Richard's letter in the EXAMINER. Those tracts he spoke of came by me; also, the tracts that Bro. Von Eschen said came from an unknown hand. God has blessed those little messengers which are on their way, John the Baptist like, to herald the coming of the great RESTORER. Even so, come, Lord Jesus.

WM. B. PUTNAM.

Tunnel City, Wis.

REMARK BY THE EDITOR.—The foregoing was accompanied by an order for fifteen copies of the EXAMINER for the present volume.

BRO. STORRS: I attended the Wyandot Camp-meeting the first three days and a half, and should have remained to the close, but was called home by sickness in my family. I heard a good brother preach from this text, "If any man love not the Lord Jesus Christ, let him be Anathema Maranatha" (1 Cor. xvi. 22). He said, "The true meaning of this text is, that all who do not love our Lord at his second coming will be accursed with the second death." This same preacher has often published to the world that "the wicked dead do not live again for a thousand years." So, according to his own published creed, they escape the curse for a thousand years at least. Here he teaches "yea and nay." We know the Scriptures represent men as twice dead and plucked up by the roots, and still alive. And a woman who lives in pleasure is dead while she liveth. But a little closer to the point: Paul says, Rom. ix. 3, "For I could wish that myself were accursed from Christ for my brethren, my kinsmen according to the flesh." Did Paul wish to die the second death? If so, he believed the Hebrews could be saved afterwards. How then, my good brother, about your curse? Have the angels in heaven died once? See Gal. i. 8. "But though we, or an angel from heaven, preach any other gospel unto you than that which we have preached unto you, let him be accursed." Did Paul teach that the angels in heaven could die the second death? "Cursed is the ground for your sake." What does "for your sake" mean? For your harm or for your good? For your good, of course.

There is a great deal said about Adam's fall. But he was blind. Yes, blind to what? is the question. Blind to good, as well as to evil, and never would have been known either had he not eaten of "the tree of the knowledge of good and evil." As much better as is Jesus, so the last Adam is better than the first: good, better, best. Glory to God forever; yes, and more—all the way along in the ages without end; when the glory of God fills the whole earth, and all flesh see it together. Glory, hallelujah. No more curse, nor cursing. GEO. W. FOSTER.

Victoria, Ill.

BRO. STORRS: I feel to praise God for the grand plan of redemption brought to view in his word, and brought to light through your paper. It is a glorious thought, to me, that our heavenly Father purposes ultimately to recover the race as a whole (with the exceptions). I love Jesus and my heavenly Father more than ever; and it is through belief of his word, as advocated in your valuable periodical. I do not know that I believe all that you and Bro. Blain advocate; but in the main I accept it, and as it is revealed in plain language in the Bible. I believe it without fear of consequences; and I know that I have the conscious assurance that God loves me, and that Jesus gave himself for me.

I have learned this truth, that we must have an intelligent faith before we can have permanent peace. Believing, as the mass do, that the majority of the race will be lost and suffer eternal torments, (although many may live in the enjoyment of religion, still) the thought will ever harass them and cast a gloom over their hopes. I am glad that I launched out on a belief of God's eternal truth, and believed that my blessed Saviour died for all. I can see in this a plan worthy of our kind Creator, and bringing to our notice His exceeding love, unmeasurable and illimitable. I am convinced that the only correct way of obtaining the peace of mind that pass-ether understanding is to appreciate more fully the blessings that are yet in store for a lost and ruined world, and the means that God has ordained for their recovery through Jesus Christ our Lord, and when the song of victory is sung and the work of redemption is complete, then will the millions of the race see that God moves in a mysterious way, his wonders to perform.

T. W. RICHARDS.

Augusta, Wis.

G. B. STACY, Richmond, Va., under date of October, after speaking of the financial troubles then existing, writes: Still I am endeavoring, day by day, to do what turns up as present duty, leaving the results and the future at the disposal of our indulgent heavenly Father; and in hope, I wait, looking forward with confidence. My heart is with you and all my sympathies. I am much pleased with the EXAMINER in its new form, as also with its matter; and I earnestly hope that its usefulness will be increased and enlarged, and that its friends will be able to sustain it. But the Lord will direct your movements and provide the means for every agency and instrumentality that He needs; and we may safely commit every work to Him after we are careful to perform our own part to the best of our ability. It seems, in the wisdom of our heavenly Father, not desirable to dispense much of this world's goods to any of His legitimate children, who constitute the heirs of His own kingdom; because, chastisement after chastisement seems to be the only medium of purification and perfection; and if we are not thus chastised and corrected it is because our conception and birth are illegitimate. We must, therefore, learn to rejoice in tribulation, "knowing that tribulation worketh patience; and patience, experience; and experience, hope; and hope maketh not ashamed; because the love of God is shed abroad in our hearts by the Holy Ghost, which is given unto us." In relation to the future, it looks to me as if the whole world is in a dilemma. There are so many conflicting elements in laborious conflict in the political cauldron, that men stand abashed and confounded. "Men's hearts failing them for fear, and for looking after those things that are coming on the earth." If these, then, be the beginning of those signs which should come to pass, let us "lift up our heads and look up, for our redemption draweth nigh."

ELD. JOHN G. WILSON, Philadelphia, Pa., writes: I find much of interest in your paper, and am pleased to see that you are breaking away from former theories and gaining clearer perceptions of Bible truth. I might find time occasionally to write an article for your paper, if it would be acceptable, notwithstanding I should differ from some of the views advocated in your columns. The name of your magazine implies that the Bible alone is recognized as authority, and its teachings are to be examined, definitely ascertained and received, as against all human theories whatever. All traditions and creeds must give place to God's word, which is the truth itself, and not as most use it, a mere stepping-stone to the truth, or a means of finding the truth. Jesus said, in his prayer to his Father, "Thy word is truth." Believing this, we should examine the Bible simply to ascertain what is therein revealed as the Word of God: and then receive it with all meekness. I hope you may be enabled to continue your publication. It is out of my power to render any pecuniary aid. My congregation is composed of poor people, and their contributions are not sufficient for my support, though the deficiency is made up by marriage fees, etc., so that though gathering little I have no luck.

REMARKS BY THE EDITOR.—Friend Wilson will receive my thanks for works of his, published some years since on prophecy, etc.; and be assured that the columns of the EXAMINER will be open for articles from his pen, though, like himself, too poor to reward him peculiarly. His "Discourses on Prophecy" I have never seen. "A Vindication on the Scheme of Redemption contained in his Discourses," I ought to have acknowledged as received the past summer. His address is, "1409 Hanover St., Philadelphia, Pa." The "Discourses" go to show that, "The Dominion of the WORLD will be given to the Saints of God, and that all the rest of mankind will be subject to their Government." Price, bound in cloth, $1; in cloth, extra gilt, $1.20.

HENRY J. SWEETLAND, Springfield, Mass., after the August Camp-meetings there, writes: I distributed the EXAMINERS and Tracts you sent me to the best of my judgment. Some received them very freely; others seemed to have a little prejudice, yet promised to read. There are many who express great respect for you, but think you have become too liberal in your views with regard to the final salvation of many more than what has been supposed can be saved. It is truly strange to me to hear men, in the present day, preach as they do after the opportunity they have had to obtain light, stating that Christ is the only king in the future state, and that immortal saints are the only subjects of the kingdom. The Adventists, as a body, do not yet understand that the Scriptures treat of, at least, three classes, viz., the Church, Israel, and the nations. They mix them all up together. No one is to be saved, in their estimation, except those who are made immortal at the second Advent. There are points I do not yet understand, but I am searching for light and truth on these great subjects. I see the love of God unfolding more and more in my investigations in this matter, and hope yet to understand more perfectly the great plan of salvation as revealed in the word of God.

ELIZA ANN B. BENTON, Vergennes, Vt., writes: I have been a very interested reader of the BIBLE EXAMINER for several months past. I love the spirit of it, and in most of its teachings think I see it in harmony with the precious Bible. Some things are not so clear. One is, If "death and hell delivered up the dead which were in them and they were judged every man," how can it be true that any one can remain eternally in the grave, and never have a resurrection? Will you please give your views of this for the benefit of several who are seeking for truth?

REMARKS BY THE EDITOR.—I do not affirm that "any one" will "remain eternally dead without a resurrection." But if any do so remain it will be such as have "sinned wilfully after they have received the knowledge of the truth," having "tasted the good word of God, and the powers of the world to come, and were made partakers of the Holy Ghost" (Heb. vi. 4, 5, and x. 26). Such, having committed the sin against the Holy Spirit, which "hath never forgiveness" (Mark iii. 28), may, possibly, be left in the dominion of death, though I do not affirm that they will: but, if they should, it is no more untrue that every man will be judged than the saying of Paul that "death passed upon all men," while Enoch and Elijah did not die, and the saints that are alive at our Lord's return from heaven will not die, but "be changed" without dying. The few who will have committed the sin of blasphemy against the Holy Ghost will probably be less than the number who will not die at all. In a statement of death and of the resurrection, those few do not invalidate the general statement: it is the masses that are spoken of; other statements may show a few exceptions. Please read my pamphlet on the "DIVINE DISPENSATIONS."

Mrs. L. R. K. BISHOP, Eatontown, N. J., writes: Allow me to say, that without indorsing everything I find in the columns of the EXAMINER, I yet regard it as eminently adapted to the enlargement of our mental vision, and to the opening up of new channels of thought to the mind. And when the next age shall be introduced, and its relation to all other ages stands clearly revealed in the wondrous light that will then be shining, I can but think that the position of the EXAMINER, in relation to it, will be found much nearer the truth than its opposers have ever dreamed. That age, I am confident, is just about to open up before us, to be ushered in by the second coming of our Lord and Saviour. The last items of prophecy seems to be fulfilling before our eyes. The ten horns, who in the days of Napoleon I., agreed and gave their power and strength unto the beast (France, which was the divinely appointed agent to visit the first installment of judgment upon the "Harlot," in 1798) are now, while reigning as kings one hour (a short season) after the beast, "doubling unto her double according to her works. In the cup which she hath filled they are filling to her double:" thus inflicting the last installment of judgment, making her naked, eating her flesh, and burning her with fire. And the merchants that deal in her goods, are "standing afar off" bewailing her in every Catholic Church and Cathedral in the land; and soon the prophets and apostles will be permitted to rejoice over her. Your sister, looking for the mercy of our Lord Jesus Christ unto eternal life.

BRO. STORRS: The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ be with you. "The BIBLE EXAMINER." Blessed EXAMINER! may the Lord continue to bless this periodical. It ought to be on the table of every minister, and read by every one who can read English, and rendered into every tongue into which the Bible has been translated.

Numerous and excellent are its Editorials—
Precious its Selections—

Interesting its Letters.—Highly did we, and do we, value it in its old form,—and highly, we are almost sure, shall we value it in its new form. What a mass of light does it cast on glorious truths!

I sometimes think that the so called orthodoxy of the present day is like a very dark night, with here and there a pale star faintly seen: and the truth is that man is not inherently immortal, but becomes immortal through Jesus Christ, is like a bright moon-light night with its twinkling stars: and the promise and oath of God to Abraham, together with the words of the great LIFE-GIVER—"For God so loved the world," etc., IS LIKE THE REFRESHING, GLORIOUS MORNING OF A MOST SPLENDID DAY.

AMBR. ROUTHALER.

Bethlehem, Pa.

A. S. WHITNEY, Clinton, Mass., writes: I am greatly pleased with the new form in which the BIBLE EXAMINER now makes its appearance, and can but hope that it will meet with the approbation of all who may peruse its pages. I shall try to do all that I am able to help support it in its mission of love and good will to all men.

NOTE BY THE EDITOR.—Bro. Whitney takes and pays for fifteen copies of this volume. About fifty new subscribers have been received since the close of the last volume. Let all the friends see how much they can extend its circulation. New subscribers will be supplied from No. 1 of this volume till notice is given to the contrary. Do not forget, you are to get the whole volume of HENRY DUNN's work on the "STUDY OF THE BIBLE" if you commence with No. 1 of the EXAMINER, besides a vast amount of other important matter; and the whole will make you a book of about 350 pages, royal octavo, at the end of this volume, and all for only $2.

LEVI BOUGHTON, Victor, N. Y., writes: I am glad that you are able still to go forward with the EXAMINER, as it is a great light in the land where the darkness is dense. It seems to me you have a mission from God to fulfil in your old age; and notwithstanding some say, (for lack of sound arguments to meet your exposition of Scripture), "He is old and infirm, and has lost his keen perception of truth," yet it commends itself to the conscience of some of the best minds in the land and I believe is filling up the number of the kings and priests to reign with Christ on the earth. O the glorious day when He shall make up the number of the elect, and open up the next age of glorious rule, and put down all this ungodliness and tyranny of men, and make "the place of his feet glorious." Your old friend and brother in tribulation on the earth and looking for the Kingdom of God.

JOSEPH LINGLE, Harrisburg, Pa., writes: I am pleased with the present form of the EXAMINER, and like it much better than the newspaper: should have been glad to have had all of them in the present form so as to bind and preserve them. Some of your writings are too deep for me, but I wish for all the light I can get. I call no man "Master;" but wherever I see the truth I embrace it; no matter from whence it comes, if it is Bible doctrine. I cannot gainsay your writings, and hope they are all correct; for I assure you I desire the happiness and welfare of all my fellow-men.

S. BATTY, Marion Center, Kansas, writes: The EXAMINER for October is received. I am much pleased with the change of form. I like the principles it advocates and the bold stand it has taken, speaking the truth as revealed in the Scriptures without fear or favor. Receive my thanks for the precious truths it contains. I will try to get subscribers. I am alone here in these principles: have been giving away my paper to such as would read, and hope the seed scattered will bring forth fruit.

BRO. STORRS: I had about made up my mind to not take any paper for the coming year, but devote ALL my leisure time to the study of the Bible alone. But on receiving the first No. of the EXAMINER, in its new form, I thought I would renew my subscription on the condition that you felt willing to continue to send it to me on my promise to send the money as soon as I could. I cannot send it just now. Winter is coming on, and my little folks are barefoot, not suitably clothed for the cold weather. I must tend to that first. I would say, "Stop the paper for a month or two until I could spare the money;" but I am afraid I could not get the back Nos., and I do not want to miss any of the articles by Bro. Dunn—"The Study of the Bible."

Yours, in the hope of deliverance from the bondage of corruption shortly.

CLARENDON KELLY.

Downagiac, Mich.,

NOTE BY THE EDITOR.—Most cheerfully your "promise" is accepted, and do not hurry yourself in the matter.

C. H. writes: It appears to be the will of our loving Father that I should live and walk alone. Sister W. is 18 miles from me; so I have no one to speak to: but thank God for the Bible, and for the EXAMINER which gives increasing light. May it be continued till our elder Brother comes.

EMELINE WOOD, Albany, N. Y., writes: How blessed it is to feel that God is no respecter of persons, but whosoever honors him, He will honor. His words are sure, and his promises never fail. He will take care of his own cause; and when one agent fails, He raises up another. His work must go on. When I think how easy it is for the Lord to do everything, I think of poor mortals who set themselves up to tell us what we may say or do; and they seem to suppose themselves to be "lords over God's heritage," it looks awful to me. I tell them, I would be afraid the Lord would cut me off. I believe our heavenly Father will teach the meek and lowly ones wisdom, and give them understanding. If we love Him as we ought, He will manifest himself to us. I would rather take my place at Jesus feet than to feel that no one is right but my dear little self. God is our Judge, and not man. When I came out from the nominal church I resolved to take God's word for my counsel; and what I cannot understand, now, I trust will be made plain hereafter. I wish to believe and do right, and I feel that God will do just what is right and none can hinder him; so I commit my all to him. I should love to help you; but it is very hard for me to get along. I fell and got hurt, and lost four months, and work is now dull. I thank you for your kindness in sending me the EXAMINER so long: it was more than I could expect. My heart goes out to God for his blessing upon you.

REMARK BY THE EDITOR.—I know this sister's poverty; but she is rich in faith; and I value her prayers above any pecuniary aid from her, knowing she has all she can do to support herself. I shall be glad to send any others of the Lord's poor the EXAMINER gratis, if I have evidence they are truly such.

Eld. H. R. writes: O how my heart longs for the continuation and more extensive circulation of the sublime and loving truths which are found in that heaven-born and God-honoring periodical—the BIBLE EXAMINER. Not on my own account, for I feel that I am fast wasting away, but when I look around and see the multitudes that have never heard those sweet words heralded by the angelic hosts on the plains of Judea, long time ago. How sad it makes my heart as I approach one who professes to be searching for truth, and ask him to take the EXAMINER, to see him turn from it disdainfully without a look at its contents. Well, brother, be not disheartened, for, saith Jesus, "If they have hated me, they will hate you also: if they have believed my words, they will believe yours also." Go forward then in the name of the Lord, for truth will prevail.

H. writes: We think the BIBLE EXAMINER the best paper in the world. It is full of light. But "gross darkness covers the people." Sister C. rejoices with us in the light and truth that we receive from its pages; and when we meet we read over the pieces in it to each other, and we are edified and grow bolder in defence of and to recommend the truth to others.

Should any person wish this number of the BIBLE EXAMINER sent to a friend, I will furnish and forward it on receipt of ten cents.

THE BIBLE EXAMINER is a Monthly Magazine. Terms, $2 per year, in advance. When postage has to be prepaid, 12 cents must be added for that purpose.

Subscribers names should be written very plain. Do not neglect this. It is utterly impossible sometimes to decipher names, and mistakes must occur in consequence. As to their address, give us simply the name of the Post Office and State.

All communications to me should be addressed as follows:

Geo. Storrs,
Box 4,658, New York.

Any person wishing to see me personally should call at 72 Hicks street, Brooklyn, a very short distance from Fulton Ferry. Do not think it difficult to reach my residence. Hundreds come over from New York every Sunday to hear H. W. Beecher; and I reside within "a stone's throw" of his church. "Come and see."

Geo. W. Young (Shipman & Sons), 25 Chambers street, near Centre, will receive money for the EXAMINER, that our friends wish to pay, personally, in New York City.

BOUND EXAMINERS.

Volumes 16 and 17 of the BIBLE EXAMINER, are now bound together in one, in stiff covers, i. e., in boards and cloth. The price for it will be $3.50; but as they will have to be sent by Express the purchaser must pay the Express charges when he receives it. Any person sending me five new subscribers for Vol. 18, with $10, shall have one copy of the bound one, as herein named. Those who wish to avail themselves of the two volumes bound in one should apply soon; as I cannot supply more than about 30 copies. Volumes 16 and 17 can still be had separately in strong flexible covers at $1.50 each.

A VINDICATION OF THE GOVERNMENT OF GOD OVER THE CHILDREN OF MEN: or, "The Promise and Oath of God to Abraham." By GEO. STORRS.

This is a pamphlet of 72 pages. Price—sent free of postage—single copy, 15 cents; 4 copies, 50 cents; 9 copies, for $1.

BIBLE EXAMINERS—ODD NUMBERS.—I have several hundred copies of the EXAMINER, of volume 17, which I will be glad to have scattered gratis. Any person wishing to distribute them shall be supplied with such number as desired by paying the postage, which will be one cent on each two copies; or ten cents on 20 copies. These, together with a few of our tracts, will help to open many eyes. Can friends do better than to scatter a quantity of these messengers at the present time?

Something has been done by sending out numbers one and two of the present volume. I will continue to send either of those numbers on receipt of ten cents per copy, to any person you may desire to see the Magazine.

Many persons are idle, just now, through "hard times." Give them something to read that shall rouse their minds to a consideration of the glories of "the ages to come," soon to open.

It may stir them up to secure a treasure where "no thief approacheth," and no robbers of the poor will be found; but each may "sit under his vine own and fig tree, and none shall make him afraid" (Micah iv. 4).

It gives me pleasure to know, the interest in the views of this Magazine is increasing. Nearly a hundred new subscribers have been received since the commencement of the present volume. This is encouraging when it is considered what opposition these advanced views have had to encounter and the scarcity of money, so embarrassing to all classes. Some old subscribers have not yet paid on this volume; but there is no doubt they all intend to do so, or they would have said so before this time. Not one to whom this volume has been sent has requested a discontinuance. Some have asked credit till they could raise the funds to pay; which is cheerfully given, only do the best you can to make it as early as may be.

THE EDITOR of this Magazine expects to spend Sundays the 7th and 14th of December in Philadelphia, and speak on "THE DIVINE CHARACTER AND THE GOVERNMENT OF OUR RACE,"—the first Sunday, in what is called "Sunny Side Hall," 17th and Coates Sts.; and possibly both Sundays in that place. Notice will be given in the City papers.

"THE MAN OF SIN:" A QUERY.—Will some one who believes the Papacy is Paul's "Man of Sin" tell me how he can be "consumed by the Spirit of Christ's mouth and destroyed by the brightness of His coming," as Paul says, and also be "taken" by Him and "cast alive into a lake of fire burning with brimstone" (Rev. xix. 20. 21); "and the remnant were slain" (implying the beast was not), but was really alive: and after a thousand years passed, subsequent to the "first resurrection," he is yet in "the lake of fire and brimstone" (Rev. xx. 10)?

"AGE TO COME," AND "AGES TO COME."

THE DIFFERENCE.

THERE is an age to come; and there are "ages to come." Some persons seem not to know the difference nor the distinction between the two theories. Those properly known as "Age to Come" believers carry their views of restitution no farther than through the next age, or millennium age; and the restitution itself only so far as to embrace, of mankind, those who are left alive of the nations after the judgments with which that age opens; and many of that faith teach that the restitution consists in restoring men and things to that state which existed before Adam sinned; and that salvation will be placed then on the basis of obedience, the same as Adam's was; and that continued living existence is the salvation. I presume that many of those who are classed as "Age to Come" believers differ from the views thus set forth in some particulars.

As a believer in "The Ages to Come" (Eph. ii. 7), I differ from them in several particulars: First—In the extent of the restitution. (1.) It is not all completed in the millennium age; or, "Age to Come." (2.) It embraces the dead of all ages as well as those living in that age. (3.) The salvation is by faith in the Redeemer; for, "By the deeds of the law there shall no flesh be justified in His sight" (Rom. iii. 20). But "being justified by faith they have peace with God through our Lord Jesus Christ;" then, by continuing obedient, they live on by having access to the tree of life. (4.) The restitution itself is not simply to the Adamic state; for that would leave them all naked and in the garden of Eden, having no "knowledge of good and evil," which is to suppose they never did sin and had no experience of evil. (5.) The restitution is to "be of all things, which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his holy prophets since the world (aiōnes—ages) began" (Acts iii. 21). The term apokatastasis, here translated "restitution," signifies a restoration; but implies, for the better; and denotes the CONSUMMATION of all things spoken by the holy prophets; a deliverance from sin and all its consequences. Thus spake Zacharias, who was "filled with the Holy Ghost," saying, "Blessed be the Lord God of Israel; for he has visited and redeemed his people, and hath raised up a horn of salvation for us in the house of His servant David, as He spake by the mouth of his holy prophets, which have been since the ages (aiōnos) began: that we should be saved from our enemies, and from the hand of all that hate us; to perform the mercy promised to our fathers, and to remember His holy covenant: the oath which he sware to our father Abraham, that He would grant unto us, that we being delivered out of the hand of our enemies might serve Him without fear, in holiness and righteousness before Him all the days of our life" (Luke i. 67-75).

Such is the restitution spoken of, and which God has promised in "His holy covenant," and confirmed it by "the oath which He sware to Abraham." It differs widely from mere "Age to Come" theory; far more than that theory differs from the "burning of the world" theory at the coming of Christ from heaven. The restitution of Peter, in Acts iii., clearly includes the fulfilment of the promise and oath of God to Abraham; for, he explicitly adds, "Ye are the children of the prophets, and of the covenant which God made with our fathers, saying unto Abraham, And in thy seed shall all the kindreds of the earth be blessed" (Acts iii. 25).

If the age to come theory of restitution—a mere setting all things and the living men back to the Adamic state—is true, then the living saints, instead of being changed to immortality, must go back to the Adamic state; and if the dead saints are raised and made undying, then restitution, as explained by a class of age to come believers, does not put all things back to the Adamic condition. Thus it is a self-evident fact that their construction of restitution is defective and untrue; and that the true idea is that of the consummation or completion of all things which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his holy prophets since the ages began. When Christ returns from heaven "the times" commence for the completion of all those great and precious promises which God has made, till the age arrives when the word shall be fulfilled, "Behold I make all things new." . . . "And He said unto me, It is done" (Rev. xxi. 5, 6). And this is after "the rest of the dead lived again;" or after the millennium age, or "age to come."

Let us not attempt to tie up the Lord's hands to consummate His glorious scheme of human redemption to one thousand years in the future; but let us take in the "endless succession of ages" (Eph. iii. 21,—McKnight's Trans.)

Ed.

A DIFFICULTY.

A candid friend suggests whether the promise of blessing all the families of the earth necessarily covers any more than the living when the promise is to be fulfilled; and he urges as an objection to a more extended application the case of Abraham's seed, of whom God said, they should be in bondage, in a land not theirs, four hundred years: "and afterward shall they come out with great substance" (Gen. xv. 13, 14). Now, asks my friend, "Did that promise cover any except the living ones at the end of the time specified?" and he adds, "None others came out at that time."

In reply to this difficulty: Joseph took an oath of his brethren that they should carry his bones up out of the land of Egypt, when God should visit them to fulfil his oath to bring them into the land which he promised to Abraham; which, at least, was expressive of his faith that the promise would be literally fulfilled to all Israel. But observe, the promise of God does not fix the exact time of His bringing them out of the land of bondage. He says, they shall be afflicted four hundred years; "and AFTERWARD they shall come out," etc. (Gen. xv. 13, 14.) As a matter of fact, none of them came out for thirty years after the four hundred expired. The record says, "The sojourning of the children of Israel, who dwelt in Egypt, was four hundred and thirty years" (Ex. xii. 40, 41); and Paul tells us, "the law was four hundred and thirty years after the covenant" made with Abraham (Gal. iii. 17). Stephen, speaking of the bondage and deliverance, says, "The nation to whom they shall be in bondage will I judge, said God: and AFTER that shall they come forth, and serve Me in this place" (Acts vii. 7).

Thus it is seen the time of the deliverance of Israel is not immediately at the end of the four hundred years; nor were all to be delivered at one time: the dead, of course, were not delivered at the end of the four hundred and thirty years. But are they, therefore, never to be delivered? Is God's promise to fail, that "afterward,"—after He had judged that nation (Egypt),—Israel should come out and serve Him in the land promised? Let it be remembered, "God is not slack concerning His promise, as some men count slackness" (2 Pet. iii. 9); but will make good His word "in due time;" for, "one day is with the Lord as a thousand years, and a thousand years as one day."

Now let us see if the dead of Israel, who died in Egypt, will not come out and serve God in the promised land. We turn to Ezekiel and look at "the valley of dry bones." What do we see? The bones are moving. Who do they represent? Let God answer: "These bones are the whole house of Israel." . . . "Prophecy and say unto them, Thus saith the Lord God; Behold, O my people, I will open your GRAVES, and cause you to come up out of your graves and bring you into the land of Israel: and ye shall know that I am the LORD, when I have opened your graves, O my people, and brought you up out of your graves, and shall put my Spirit in you and ye shall live, and I shall place you in your own land: then shall ye know that I the LORD have spoken it, and performed it, saith the LORD" (Ezek. xxxvii. 12-14).

Thus, the promise that after God had judged that nation (Egypt), He would bring Israel, "the whole house" thereof, out of the land of their bondage, and "they shall come forth and serve Him in this place;" in the promised land, as Stephen says. Death is not in God's way in the fulfilment of his promises; though men have magnified death as if it were a monster too strong for the Almighty to overcome, and as if it could defeat all His designs towards our race. Let us cease to regard death as a god, and remember Christ has the keys of DEATH and HADES.

Do we err, then, in saying that God's promise to Abraham to bring his seed—his literal seed—out of Egypt, even though they have been in their GRAVES thousands of years, will be fulfilled: "Is anything too hard for God?" Has He said it, and will He not do it? The promise that the literal seed of Abraham shall come out of that bondage and "serve Him in this place"—the land of promise—is as certain as it is that Abraham shall ever possess it. Abraham knew the promise to himself could not be fulfilled without a resurrection; and he as well knew that in four hundred years many of his seed would die in their bondage; and that God's promise covered their resurrection as truly as his own. The promise secured the resurrection of all who died in Egypt, and could not be fulfilled without. If God's promise failed in that respect to Abraham's seed, it might fail to Abraham himself; and where is any ground left for faith? But God is faithful who has promised, and will perform all His words, though thousands of years may intervene between the promise and its fulfilment, for, "a thousand years in His sight are but as yesterday when it is past" (Psa. xc. 4).

We are prone to forget, or to overlook the fact that promises and prophecies which seem to embrace events immediately connected, may, and sometimes do, cover an extended period, and events far apart. That the prophecies of Messiah's sufferings and reign seem to imply close connection will not be doubted: and yet the fact shows that near two thousand years have already intervened between them. So of other promises and prophetic utterances: a partial fulfilment may take place at an early period and the main portion remain to be accomplished at a much later period. If these facts were kept in view, we should not so often stumble at what some times seem impossibilities in the declarations of Scripture.

Abraham's faith was severely tried by the delay in the birth of a promised son; nor did the event occur till, according to the course of nature, it was impossible to take place at all. This delay led him to take a course, as he supposed, to have a fulfilment of the promise, and Hagar was put in the place of Sarah. Such a displacement of promises and prophecies is often made in these days in the hurry to find their fulfilment in the past; but the result is not unlike Abraham's mistake in taking Ishmael for the promised son. All such hurried applications of prophetic utterances are as futile and inappropriate as the taking of Hagar for Sarah, and Ishmael for Isaac. God's words are to be received without doubting: and whatever difficulties may seem to stand opposed, let us rest assured that God will, "in due time," see that they are only in our imagination or fears. Abraham learned this lesson after Isaac was born: for, when God called him to offer up this child of promise, he unhesitatingly obeyed, "accounting that God was able to raise him up even from the dead" (Heb. xi. 19). So, doubtless, he believed all his seed that lived or died in the four hundred years of bondage, in a land not theirs, would "afterward" be brought out into the promised land, and "serve God" there, as Stephen said, Acts vii., and, to my mind, such will be the fact, as Ezekiel has clearly declared by the authority of the God of Abraham, and Paul confirms the testimony when he says, "What shall the receiving them be, but life from the dead?" (Rom. xi. 15.) And again he says, "Blindness in part is happened to Israel, until the fulness of the Gentiles be come in: and so ALL Israel shall be saved: as it is written, There shall come out of Sion the DELIVERER, and shall turn away ungodliness from Jacob: for this is My covenant unto them, when I shall take away their sins;" . . . "for, as touching the election" (God's choice of them as a nation) "they are beloved for the fathers' sakes" (Abraham's, Isaac's, and Jacob's sakes; "for the gifts and calling of God are without repentance:" God does not repent, or change His mind as to what He promised to those fathers in regard to themselves and their literal seed; but all will be fulfilled "in due time.")

"Oh the depth of the riches both of the wisdom and knowledge of God! how unsearchable are his judgments, and his ways past finding out! For who hath known the mind of the Lord? or who hath been his counsellor? or who hath first given to him, and it shall be recompensed unto him again? For of him, and through him, and to him, are all things: to whom be glory for ever. Amen" (Rom. xi. 33-36). Ed.

"NO MAN HATH HIRED US."

CAN there be any better excuse for not having performed a work than that of having had no opportunity to do it? Jesus said, "The kingdom of heaven is like unto a man that is a householder, which went out early in the morning to hire laborers into his vineyard." Also he went out at the third, the sixth, the ninth, and the eleventh hours; which hours correspond with our nine and twelve o'clock A. M., and three and five P. M. The question was asked those found at the eleventh hour, the reason why they were not employed: and the answer was, "Because no man hath hired us." This answer was satisfactory. They had sought employment, but the sun was near its going down, and despair was setting in; but just then the "Husbandman appears, and accepts their excuse for standing 'all the day idle'" (Matt. xx. 1-16).

So is the kingdom of heaven, or of God. No man is condemned for non-improvement who has never had the means or opportunity to improve: and no man can use means till they are placed within his reach. God has provided a field and ample means to employ every soul of man; but He does not expect any man to labor therein till he is called to the work; and he has his "due time" to make that call; also, "The times and the seasons the Father hath put in his own power" (Acts i. 7.) It is not for men to determine these, any more than it is to determine, when and where a man shall be born, or come into the world. It is enough for us to know that the CREATOR of all men has "Purposed in Himself, that in the dispensation of the fulness of times, He might gather together in one all things in Christ, both which are in heaven, and which are in earth" (Eph. i. 9, 10).

That all have not been thus gathered, in any age or dispensation past or present, is a self-evident truth: and that God did not design that such an event should be accomplished in those ages, is, also, a self-evident truth, unless the blasphemous idea is inculcated that He is incapable of carrying out His designs. But He has said, "My word . . . shall accomplish that which I please; and it shall prosper whereto I sent it" (Isa. lv. 11).

God's "due time," then, to make known to all men the truth concerning himself and his Son, the Redeemer, "Who gave himself a ransom for all" men, has never yet come to all men. Hence, as it is "impossible for God to lie," the time or dispensation is yet in the future for that truth to be made known to the multitudes who have lived and died without that knowledge. Till that takes place, all men are but standing idle in the market-place: nothing is being accomplished except to intensify their desire for deliverance, but without the knowledge of the time or manner in which it will occur; and the apostle tells us, "The whole creation groaneth and travaileth in pain together," and "waiteth for the manifestation of the sons of God" (Rom. viii. 19, 22).

The present and the past ages or dispensations were designed only for a selection of instruments to carry on the work of regenerating the mass of the race of men; and while "the many are called" to be regenerated, (i. e., to be reconciled to God), "few are chosen" to be the instruments in accomplishing the work of "reconciling the world" to God (2 Cor. v. 19). The great mistake with many is, They suppose the reconciliation is all to take place in this life, or never be accomplished at all: which is about the same as to say, God's purpose has failed; and because men have "stood idle all the day" of life, "no man" ever will employ them in the service of God, the good "Husbandman." That may be true if they have been offered work and have refused to "go and work in the vineyard;" but it is not true of such as can say, "No man hath hired us;" their excuse is valid, and our Lord accepts it, and they receive a reward as if they had worked all the day, because the reward, in all cases is of grace. True, some who had worked all the day, and "borne the burden and heat of the day," murmured that grace was so abundant toward those who had stood idle so long. So it is now; some think it a dreadful idea that those who have never had an opportunity to know "the only true God and Jesus Christ," in this life, should have such an opportunity "in the ages to come." These murmurers seem to feel as if some wrong were done to themselves if others, hereafter, should receive grace from the hand of the Lord. Our answer is, These had stood all the days of this life idle because no man had hired them; and possibly some of these murmurers had the knowledge that multitudes were standing idle all the day long, but were too indolent to go themselves or to send others to call them into the vineyard. Surely, such will be justly rebuked by being told, "I will give unto these last, even as unto you. Is it not lawful for Me to do what I will with my own? Is thine eye evil, because I am good?" (verses 14, 15.)

Let us call all into the Lord's vineyard we possibly can; and be comforted with the thought that such as we cannot reach, God will, "in due time," see to it that they have an opportunity to become reconciled to Him by the manifestation of His Son unto them, with the glorious company He had brought to God; who were as much, "by nature, the children of wrath as these others: but God, who is rich in mercy, for his great love wherewith he has loved us, even when we were dead in sins . . . made us sit together in heavenly places in Christ Jesus; that in the ages to come He might show" (to such as had been destitute of the knowledge) "the exceeding riches of his grace in his kindness toward us through Christ. Jesus: for by grace are ye saved through faith; and that not of yourselves; it is the gift of God" (Eph. ii. 3-8).

God's mercy and love manifested toward those saved in this life, when manifested to those who have been deprived of an opportunity of knowing it in this life, is to be a mighty and powerful instrumentality in "reconciling the world to Himself." Bigotry, superstition, self-worship, idolatry in all its forms, and ignorance in regard to what the truth is, will all be swept away when Christ shall "manifest the sons of God" to the sight of those who have lived and died in ignorance of God's love and mercy for a world of sinners, and they see before their eyes the wondrous work the "grace" of God has wrought on those who "were by nature children of wrath even as" themselves. How will those to whom this manifestation is made, "in the ages to come," wonder, and be subdued by a sight so glorious! How will they abhor sin and themselves in view of such a manifestation of Divine power and love! How will "a great multitude, which no man can number, of ALL nations, kindreds, and people . . . wash their robes and make them white in the blood of the Lamb" (Rev. vii. 9-14), after they shall have that exhibition of the wonders God's grace had performed "in the ages" before! Will they not say, with Paul, "The unsearchable riches of Christ?" Will they not add, with him, "Now unto Him that is able to do exceeding abundantly above all that we ask or think, according to the power that worketh in us, Unto Him be glory in the Church by Christ Jesus throughout the endless succession of ages" (Eph. iii. 8, 20, 21)?

Men will then understand the truth of the expressions, "To make all men see what is the fellowship of this mystery, which from the beginning of the ages hath been hid in God, who created all things by Jesus Christ . . . according to the purpose of the ages, which he purposed in Jesus Christ our Lord" (Eph. iii. 9-11).

Let not the name of God be any longer blasphemed by a system of theology which represents the CREATOR as bringing into being innumerable human creatures, with professions of love to them all, and as giving His only begotten Son a "ransom for all; and yet condemning the mass of them to eternal torments or death without ever having placed within their reach the means He had been at such immense cost to provide; nor ever allowed them to know that any means had been provided for them. Such a representation of the Divine government must shock all intelligent minds in the universe, if their eyes are not incurably closed against honesty and truth. May all our eyes be opened to see the character of the "just God and Saviour" (Isa. xlv. 21) in its true light; so shall we be led to love and adore Him; and his wondrous love and mercy will lead us, if anything can do it, to yield ourselves up to His blessed service, in entire submission to His will in all things. That period will arrive "in due time;" and glory will arise, from every living being, to God and the Lamb (Rev. v. 13). Let us lift up our heads with joy in the blessed anticipation; and now heed the apostolic "exhortation," that "First of all, supplications, prayers, intercessions, and giving of thanks, be made for all men" (1 Tim. ii. 1); . . . for "God will have all men come to the KNOWLEDGE OF THE TRUTH." ED.

IMMORTAL-SOUL THEOLOGY:

OR, HENRY WARD BEECHER ON DEATH.

"Our habitual contemplation of death should be changed from sadness and melancholy. I know that nature will have its way, and it is not possible to break off rudely the ties of life and not suffer; but I would not have the sufferers look into the grave for those who are gone. I would to God that mothers who visit their children's graves might look up and not down. My children twinkle above me like stars. I never have once gone purposely to the place where they are laid. I never shall look in the dust for them—they rose and are with God, and my thoughts will not follow them through the ground."

So spake the Pastor of Plymouth Church, Brooklyn, N. Y., as reported. Doubtless he imagines he speaks truly. But truth, as to the future, needs evidence more substantial than "imagination" to sustain it. Where is Bible evidence that children, dead, are now "twinkling above like stars?" Can any higher evidence than fancy be found for such an assertion? Does not the intelligent mind of him who uttered the above discover a lack of symmetry in his language? Look at it: "I have never once gone purposely to the place where they are laid." Were they laid "above, with God?" and does he not go "purposely" to God daily? But he means, he does not go to their graves. But why say, "The place where they are laid," if they were not laid in the grave? If they were laid in the grave, they had not gone "above to twinkle like stars" when laid in the grave. "I never shall look in the dust for them," says the preacher. But one asks, Why not? He answers, "They rose and are with God." What is the evidence of that assumption? Where is it? Who said so that some things are now unintelligible to us, or, if not unintelligible, to some extent unprofitable only because they belong to the distant past, and had reference mainly, if not exclusively, to the time when they were penned. Under this head may clearly be ranged the list of names in the First Book of Chronicles, and all the genealogies, whether in the Old Testament or in the New. Why need we shrink from saying that the time for verifying them is gone by, and that they never could have been of much practical value to any but to those who had the opportunity of comparing them with the public registers?

In like manner, the darkness which gathers around many of the prophecies is attributable solely to the fact that the time is not yet come for their full comprehension. This is as true of the Old Testament as it is of the New. Both contain predictions which, in all human probability, will only find their complete fulfilment under another economy, and after the resurrection.

Neither any nor all the difficulties so frequently paraded by the sceptic—although sometimes incapable, with our present lights, of satisfactory adjustment—are really of much moment; many of them are difficulties which press equally on natural religion and on the facts of life; and some of them at least supply satisfactory proof of the honesty of the writers, by establishing the absence of collusion. Those that are unremovable teach at least this lesson, that God's ways are not as our ways, nor his thoughts as our thoughts—that faith is but the highest reason, and that, as Pascal has beautifully observed, "the last step of reason is to know that there is an infinitude of things which surpass it."

CHAPTER VII.

On the Blindness of the Natural Man.

"Bread of our souls! whereon we feed;
True manna from on high!
Our guide and chart! wherein we read
Of realms beyond the sky;
Pole-star on Life's tempestuous deep!
Beacon! when doubts surround;
Compass! by which our course we keep;
Our deep-sea lead, to sound!"

BERNARD BARTON.

It is often said, and not always in a devout temper, that the Bible differs from all other books, not only by the fact of its inspiration, but—which is of still greater moment—by the circumstance that it can only be read with advantage by persons who have received special grace from heaven to enable them to understand it. To a man who has not this new and Divine faculty, whatever it may be, we are told all labor in relation to Scripture is vain, or, as it is usually expressed, that to such the book is sealed; since "the natural man receiveth not the things of the Spirit of God: for they are foolishness unto him: neither can he know them, because they are spiritually discerned" (1 Cor. ii. 14).

This statement, as it is generally put, involves two things—a truth and an error. We shall endeavor to separate them.

The truth which underlies the statement, and which, be it observed, is by no means peculiar to the Bible, is this,—that moral sympathy is more or less essential to the full and accurate comprehension of any virtue or duty. A proud man cannot, properly speaking, understand the true character of humility, nor a churl the charm of liberality. They can misunderstand these virtues easily enough, counting the one contemptible and the other folly; but they cannot, in any enlarged sense of the word, comprehend either till they are in a state of mind to practice them. To say, therefore, as so many do, in broad and general terms, that an unrenewed man cannot understand the Bible because he is unrenewed, is not only foolish, it is false; for the statement, put in any form, is only partially true, and it is almost always grievously misunderstood. It is commonly supposed to imply a sort of tacit admission that such an one is very much to be pitied for his condition, and that perhaps he may not be altogether so responsible for it as is generally imagined.

The text we have quoted (1 Cor. ii. 14), which is the one always advanced in support of this supposed inability, has only to be regarded in connection with the train of reasoning of which it forms a part in order to see that the apostle has no such meaning as that attributed to him. He is not speaking of plain practical duties, such as repentance, or faith, or love to God, as if such obligations were incomprehensible to the natural man, but of deep Christian mysteries,—of "wisdom" for "the perfect;" "the wisdom of God in a mystery, even the hidden wisdom which God ordained before the world unto our glory," which "eye hath not seen, nor ear heard," but which God hath "revealed" to the apostles "by His Spirit;" and it is these things which he says, and truly enough, "the natural man receiveth not."

But does it follow because a special spiritual condition is essential to the understanding of special spiritual mysteries, that therefore something more than belongs to man generally—something above and beyond what is given to the world—is essential to the understanding of God's message to all mankind! Certainly not; and it is a delusion to imagine it.

The Bible, although bearing a special message to the believer, is not given to man as renewed, but as a sinner. It is indeed peculiarly addressed to "the man of God," that he may be thoroughly furnished thereby to every good work; but it has also a message to the thoughtless and ungodly. It is intended to show such an one what he needs, and to lead him, by prayer and supplication, to ask that he may obtain.

The mischief that is done by careless and unscriptural statements regarding Divine influence is incalculable, and never greater than when such views are made, as they constantly are, a ground of apology for sinful ignorance; as if it were the work of the Holy Spirit either to give a new faculty to the mind, or to furnish it with new light, without which its perpetual darkness is certain and irremediable. The "fruit of the Spirit," says St. Paul, "is love, joy, peace long-suffering," and such like; but where are we told that it is mental power, clearness of understanding, ability to comprehend, or, and to say, as Dr. Chalmers has incautiously put it,—what the telescope is to the naked eye, or what reason is to an idiot!

That love, in its results, is as enlightening as it is purifying, no one will dispute; for sympathy is the great quickener of the perceptions, and purity the chief refiner of the intellect; but it is a gross perversion of these sacred truths to reverse their lesson, by making a sovereign gift of God essential to a knowledge of any duty, for the non-exercise of which man is justly held to be responsible.

Do we then, it will be said, deny the work of the Spirit? Assuredly we do not. We but maintain that Divine light, so far as it is needful to the comprehension of duty, and, therefore, to the completion of responsibility, is already given to every man according to his position—i. e., according to what will finally be required of him. What other intelligible meaning can be attached to our Lord's own words,—"When He (the Comforter) is come, He will reprove (or convict) the world of sin, of righteousness, and of judgment"? (John xvi. 7, 8.) As well might we deny that "the Lord has risen," as affirm that the Spirit, in this sense, has not been given. Nor can we imagine in what part of Scripture a justification is to be found for the constantly recurring assertion that the Holy Spirit is given to, or withheld from the world, according to the faith or faithlessness, the earnestness or otherwise, of the intercessions of the Church.

So long as errors of this magnitude are, either directly or by implication, generally taught, it is obviously impossible that the Bible can be read as intelligently as any other book, or the most important part of every man's moral probation—the duty of seeking after truth as the supreme good, in the exercise of humility, candor, and patience—he fully acknowledged.

CHAPTER VIII.

On Special Light from Heaven.

THE notion of a special light being vouchsafed to the prayerful reader of Scripture is as destructive of the Divine Record itself as it is of man's responsibility in rejecting it; for if God, by His Holy Spirit, communicates directly with the minds of men now, as an Interpreter, such communications will assuredly control any words given to mortals eighteen hundred years ago.

So men, who hold to this sort of Divine aid, are already beginning to reason. "Are we," it is now said—not by sceptics only, but by evangelic! teachers,— "to bring down the word inspiration to a use merely narrow and technical, asserting it only of prophecy and other Scripture writings, and carefully excluding from it all participation by ourselves, in whatever sense it might be taken?" Are we to "become a class unprivileged, differing from the anointed men of Scripture and Scripture times—shut down to a kind of second-hand life, feeding on their words?" Is it to be believed that "they were inspired, while we in no sense can be? If so, there is no relief for us but in a recoil against inspiration itself, even that of the Holy Scriptures; for who will credit that men were inspired long ages ago, when now any such thing is incredible?"*

The recoil thus spoken of as inevitable, finds its expression in those later forms of criticism which are now issuing from our great seats of learning, according to which the inspiration of the first century is to bow before that of the nineteenth; the miraculous is to be expurgated; and if, as a necessary consequence, the Bible loses its authority, the result may be regretted, but it must be considered as inseparable from progress.

The root of these terrible errors, whether men will hear it or not, is the notion that the Holy Spirit enlightens the mind by other means than by the purification of the nature. This is evident from the ground taken by one of the leading writers in the "Essays and Reviews," † who boldly asserts, not only that "inspiration is a permanent power in the Church," but that the Bible always supposes in its readers "an illumination kindred to its own." In explaining what he means, he quotes, as authority, St. Basil, who speaks of the Holy Spirit "as an intellectual light, affording illumination to every rational faculty in the investigation of truth; the light which clears mental perplexities, and the secret energy through which every organ discharges its functions aright." In the faith of this doctrine of the indwelling Spirit in the Church, it is asserted the creeds were developed, doctrine was drawn from doctrine, liturgies were collected, and Gentile customs were adopted.

[This is not the doctrine of Scripture. The "illumination" there supposed is a spiritual, not an intellectual gift. It is light proceeding from love. It is moral sympathy leading to the recognition of the Divine word. "My sheep," says Christ, "know my voice." It is what John calls "an unction from the Holy One," by which Christians "know all things." It is the "verifying faculty" which is identified with the "anointing" believers receive from Him who abideth in them. It is, in short, reason enlightened and sanctified by the Holy Spirit, and thus made capable of appreciating Divine truth when it is presented to the mind.]

But what follows! Why, of course, this: that as "the Comforter at present acts within the bounds of our capacities, leaving us liable to error, and the shortcomings of our generation," so "it is in harmony with the Divine dealings to suppose that while apostles and prophets enjoyed a larger measure of illumination, they, too, were left liable to shortcomings in knowledge, or humanity in reasoning." The argument culminates in the question, "What, then, is the authority of mere SCRIPTURALNESS apart from what good men approve, and from what fair historians think credible?" The answer implied is, Nothing at all.

Such are the consequences involved in a doctrine which is to this day cherished with the utmost tenderness by, we believe, all evangelical churches. The difference, on this point, between the Society of Friends and other Christians, is simply one of degree. The doctrine itself is held in common.

We lay it down then as a fixed principle, that he who would understand the Bible must believe first, that God, in giving it, has not withheld anything necessary for its comprehension, so far, at least, as present duty is concerned; secondly, that to seek to control the inspiration of prophets and apostles by any fancied inspiration of our own is a miserable delusion; and thirdly, that as a consequence, whether we approve or not, we must either feed on the words of men who wrote as they were moved by the Holy Ghost eighteen hundred years ago, or wither in our pride. And this not because "the apostles and Scripture writers are set between us and God to fence us away," but because the action of the Spirit of God on man, when not exercised miraculously, as at the planting of the Christian Church, and as in the case of the apostles and inspired writers of Scripture, is on the moral nature only, and never directly on the intellect; that the Holy Ghost enlightens, not by a process of addition, but by one of subtraction; not by giving to the intellect any light or power of which it would otherwise be deprived, but by removing moral obstacles to the free and healthy action of the natural faculties.

The contrary view, however spiritual or consoling it may seem, destroys all tangible distinctions between inspired and uninspired communications; favors mysticism; lowers the authority of the written Word; and justifies, so far as any thing can do, the most fanatical interpretations of Scripture. For it is evident that if a man's understanding of Holy Writ depends on anything else than the right use of the faculties God has given him (which of course implies their non-perversion by dislike and prejudice), the Bible cannot be regarded as occupying the same position as any other book, but must be interpreted by a light which, try to explain it as we may, can never be more or less than a personal inspiration, in which case, as related to any written document, such personal teachings must be supreme.

It is both curious and instructive to observe how error changes its form without changing its nature. It would really seem as if Protestants, like Romanists, believed that A DIVINE REVELATION, without AN INFALLIBLE INTERPRETER, WAS no revelation at all. Dr. Whately has well shown that this "craving for infallibility, than which there is no more powerful principle in human nature,"—and of which the views we have combated in relation to the Holy Spirit are but one manifestation,—not only "predisposes men towards the pretensions, either of a supposed unerring church, or of those who claim or who promise immediate inspiration," but becomes by consequence, as we have seen, the parent of no small amount of infidelity. It is an error "that falls in at once with men's wishes and with their conjectures; it presents itself to them in the guise of a virtuous humility; and they readily and firmly believe it, not only without evidence, but against all evidence.

Vain, however, is it to hope that by any such means we can evade our responsibility. What we really want is, that blessed indwelling of the Holy Spirit—the only influence we are authorized to seek and to pray for,—which is not intellectual, but moral; which is inseparable from candor, love of truth, and obedience generally; which manifests itself in growing sympathy with the Divine character; and which therefore involves clearer perceptions of, and a deeper insight into, the Divine mind and will, as exhibited in the Bible, than can be obtained in any other way. For saith the Lord himself, "If thine eye be single, thy whole body shall be full of light."

GOD'S BLESSING TO ABRAHAM.

IMMUTABILITY OF THE PROMISE.

The promise and the oath, are two immutable things, in which it is impossible for God to lie. Therefore the promise must not be changed. The terms must remain the same. And their relation to each other must continue while the promise is of force. Every part of the promise must remain unchanged until the whole shall be fulfilled. The seed, the nations, the earth, and the blessing are in the promise, therefore they must be in its fulfilment. The seed must bless the nations, and the nations must be blessed of the seed. The seed must remain one class, and the nations must remain another class. The seed must sustain the relation to the blessing of the nations, that the means do to an end. These relations must not be changed while the promise is of force. All the terms of the promise are essential to its existence.

Remove the seed, or the nations, or the earth, or the blessing and the promise is destroyed. It cannot be changed without destroying it. Nothing besides the promise will answer in its stead. If the seed should be saved in heaven, it would not fulfil this promise. If saved on earth without the nations, it would not fulfil this promise. If the seed should be saved and then appointed to any other business or purpose than to bless the nations, however good that purpose might be, it would not fulfil this promise. This promise, like every other promise, cannot be changed without destroying its value. The one ultimate thing promised is, that all the nations of the earth shall be blessed. The means by which this end will be reached is the seed of Abraham. The promise and the oath by which it was confirmed, are two immutable things.

THE BLESSING.

All the nations of the earth shall be blessed. This is the object promised in this Gospel. All else are only means to this end. The blessing: what is it? To what extent will the nations be blessed? We will let the Scriptures answer. "Whom the heavens must receive until the times of restitution of all things which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his holy prophets since the world began." The blessing, then, will be such as the prophets have foretold.

1. God's Oath to Abraham. "By myself have I sworn, that in blessing I will bless thee. . . . And thy seed shall possess the gate of his enemies, and in thy seed shall all the nations of the earth be blessed" (Gen. xxii. 17, 18). This promise is unlimited, and therefore must be taken in its broadest sense. The blessing must be complete. It must take the place of every annoyance. It must remove every curse. Instead of bad government, there must be a good government. Instead of war, the nations must learn war no more. Instead of fear and danger, the nations must dwell in safety. Instead of oppression and injustice, righteousness must prevail. Justice and judgment must be executed throughout the earth before all nations can be fully blessed. Instead of sterility of soil, the earth must yield its increase. The people must not plant and another reap; they must not build houses and others inhabit them; but they must plant vineyards and eat the fruit of them, build houses and inhabit them. Instead of the nations having no fear of God before their eyes, all the ends of the earth must fear him. Instead of so many languages which now interrupt and embarrass the intercourse of nations, there must be a pure language. Instead of a scattered few who worship the Lord, all the nations whom God has made must come and worship before him. Instead of one band worshipping one way, and another band worshipping in another way, they must all worship, speaking the same thing; they must see eye to eye. Instead of ignorance, superstition and bigotry, the knowledge of the Lord must cover the earth as the waters do the sea. And instead of irreverence, profanity and infidelity, the whole earth must be filled with the glory of the Lord. Instead of crying, there must be no more crying. Instead of tears, all tears must be wiped from all faces. Instead of sickness, there must be no more sickness. Instead of pain, there must be no more pain. Instead of universal death, there must be no more death. And instead of the curse everywhere and on everything, there must be no more curse. Thus it is the blessing will be complete in its extent.

The promise under consideration is not only unlimited in reference to its extent of blessing, but it is also unlimited in regard to perpetuity of the blessing. Therefore the blessing, great and complete as it is, must be perpetual. It must be continued as long as the sun and moon endure, throughout all generations, and throughout all ages, world without end.

Thus we have shown the extent, and the perpetuity of the blessing promised in Abraham, and confirmed to him by an oath. Surely the promise and oath of God, which was to be the hope of his people through all the future, can mean nothing less. It contains and reveals God's purpose to bless the world. It must be complete. It must be perpetual. It must provide for the necessities of the world. It is the central promise which runs through the whole Bible. Without it the Gospel is without a purpose and its means without an end.

2. God's Oath to Moses. "As truly as I live, all the earth shall be filled with the glory of the Lord" (Numb. xiv. 21). What does the "glory of the Lord" mean? "All the nations whom thou hast made shall come and worship before thee and glorify thy name" (Psa. lxxxvi. 9). Then the oath is the same as if he had said, As truly as I live all the nations whom I have made shall come and worship before me, and glorify my name. Will not this bless all nations, as God promised to Abraham?

3. God's Oath to David. "I have made a covenant with my chosen. I have sworn unto David my servant, Thy seed will I establish for ever, and build up thy throne to all generations. His throne shall endure as the sun before me" (Psa. lxxxix.) In fulfilment of this oath "Christ was raised from the dead to sit on David's throne" (Acts ii. 30). His dominion was to be "from sea to sea, and from the river to the ends of the earth. In his days shall the righteous flourish, and abundance of peace as long as the moon endureth. . . . Yea, all kings shall fall down before him. All nations shall serve him. . . . His name shall continue so long as the sun. And men shall be blessed in him: all nations shall call him blessed. . . . And blessed be his glorious name for ever: and let the whole earth be filled with his glory. Amen, and Amen." (Psa. lxxii.) Will not this oath to David secure for the nations all the blessings promised to Abraham?

4. God's Oath to Isaiah. "Look unto me and be ye saved all the ends of the earth, for I am God and there is none else. I have sworn by myself, the word is gone out of my mouth in righteousness and shall not return, that unto me every knee shall bow, and every tongue shall swear" (Isa. xlv. 22, 23). Now when every knee shall bow, and every tongue shall confess that Jesus is Lord to the glory of God the Father (as this oath reads in Phil. ii. 11), will not this oath to Isaiah secure for the nations all the blessings promised to Abraham? And when "he shall judge among the nations, and shall rebuke many people, and they shall beat their swords into ploughshares, and their spears into pruning hooks, and when nation shall not lift up sword against nation, neither shall they learn war any more." I say, when this promise shall be fulfilled, will not the nations be blessed as God promised to Abraham?

5. Description of the Kingdom by Daniel. "And in the days of these kings shall the God of heaven set up a kingdom which shall never be destroyed, and the kingdom shall not be left to other people. But it shall break in pieces and consume all these kingdoms, and it shall stand for ever" (Dan. ii. 44). The object for which this kingdom is to be set up, is more particularly described in the 7th chapter of Daniel. "To one like the Son of man, who came with the clouds of heaven, there was given dominion, and glory, and a kingdom, that all people, nations and languages should serve him: his dominion is an everlasting dominion, which shall not pass away. And his Kingdom that which shall not be destroyed." In verses 18, 22, 27, the same Kingdom is given to the saints. On these descriptions of the Kingdom I will remark:

First, The Kingdom which God has promised to set up, is to be a universal kingdom. Its jurisdiction is to be over all dominions, and people, and nations, and languages under the whole heaven. It is to take the place of all the kingdoms of the world, and consume them. It is never to be destroyed, or be left to other people, or to pass away. It is to stand forever.

Second, This Kingdom is to be given to one like the Son of man, who came with the clouds of heaven, and to the saints.

Third, The object for which God is to set up this universal kingdom, which is not to pass away. The object for which he will give it to one like the Son of man, and to the saints: I say, the object for which this will be done, is that all dominions, and people, and nations, and languages under the whole heaven might serve and obey him.

This Kingdom is the kingdom to which the Gospel refers, and shows to what extent all people, nations, and languages will be blessed. This kingdom shall not pass away. Can the Rulers, or the subjects, or the territory, or the blessings of this kingdom pass away? Can they be changed, so that the Rulers will not be the seed of Abraham, or that the subjects will not be all the nations of the earth, or that the territory will not be the earth, or that the blessing will not be the administration of this government? If not, then this kingdom answers completely to the promise made to Abraham.

6. The New Testament. "And Jesus went about all Galilee preaching the Gospel of the Kingdom" (Matt. iv. 23). When Christ began to preach, he did not preach a new Gospel, or a new Kingdom, but he preached the Gospel of the Kingdom of which the prophets had spoken. The Kingdom of God which is to be set up over all dominions, people, nations, and languages under the whole heavens, and which is to stand forever. Therefore he preached the Gospel of the Kingdom which will bless all nations, as God promised to Abraham.

"Thy Kingdom come, thy will be done in earth as it is in heaven" (Matt. vi. 10). In this prayer we are taught that God's Kingdom will come, that his will will be done in earth as it is in heaven. This condition of the world is the final object of the Gospel. When this end is reached all nations will be blessed.

"For he must reign till he has put all enemies under his feet" (1 Cor. xv. 25). When all things shall be subdued unto him, then all nations will be blessed as God promised Abraham.

"For thou wast slain, and hast redeemed us to God by thy blood, out of every kindred, and tongue, and people, and nation, and hast made us unto our God kings and priests, and we shall reign on the earth" (Rev. v. 9, 10). Thus those that have been redeemed by the blood of Christ, out from all nations, will be made kings and priests unto God, and they will reign on the earth; they will have power over the nations; they will judge the world. When the nations are brought under such a Rulership, will they not be blessed as God promised to Abraham?

"Saying, the kingdoms of this world have become the Kingdom of our Lord and of his Christ, and he shall reign for ever and ever." When Christ who was found worthy to be raised from the dead to sit on the throne of his father David, and who was to have dominion from sea to sea, and from the river unto the ends of the earth, and who was to rule in righteousness. I say, when he shall reign over the kingdoms of this world for ever and ever, will not the nations be blessed as God promised to Abraham?

"Who shall not fear thee O Lord, and glorify thy name, for thou only art holy, for all nations shall come and worship before thee, for thy judgments are made manifest" (Rev. xv. 3, 4). When God's judgments are so made manifest in the earth that all nations shall come and worship before him and glorify his name, surely the nations will be blessed as God swore to Abraham.

"And the nations of them which are saved shall walk in the light of it, and the kings of the earth do bring the glory and honor of the nations into it" (Rev. xxi. 24-26). "And there shall be no more curse, but the throne of God and the Lamb shall be in it, and his servants (the saints) shall serve him, and they shall reign for ever and ever" (Rev. xxii. 3-5).

Bless the Lord. The nations are saved in fulfilment of God's promise and oath. They are completely blessed. There is no annoyance left—all the things spoken by the prophets have been restored. The completeness of the blessing has been reached. Its perpetuity only remains to be accomplished by the unspent force of the promise made to Abraham. Glorious and exhaustless promise!

Thus, the Scriptures set forth the object which God has in the Gospel. Thus we have traced the blessing promised to the nations through the whole Bible to its consummation in the redeemed and uncursed world. The Bible is perfectly one on this subject, therefore Christians should be.

SIX, FROM THE CHRISTIAN STANDPOINT.

BEFORE proceeding further with our task, it seems desirable, if not necessary, to state most distinctly that the inquiry is commenced under the deepest conviction—held, indeed, to be indisputable—that every individual of that great aggregate, which we call the race, has within him a spirit capable either of happiness or misery in that world to which all souls are tending; and that its possessor, whether heathen or Christian, is justly responsible to the God who made him, both for the beliefs and for the conduct that have here tended to fashion the character of that soul and to make it what it is.

Such is undeniably the teaching of the Bible. It becomes us therefore, first of all, to direct our attention to what is revealed there regarding sin, and concerning the state of mind, so to speak, with which God is said to contemplate it.

"Sin is the transgression of the law" (1 John iii. 4). "All unrighteousness is sin" (1 John v. 17). It is so because the law is a righteous law, "holy, just, and good" (Rom. vii. 12). It is so because the law is emphatically a law of love. "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy mind; and thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself. On these two commandments hang all the law and the prophets" (Matt. xxii. 35-40). And yet so infatuated is man in his disobedience, that wrong-doing is at once his habit and his joy.

The Saviour came to put an end to this state of things; and though, to human eye, He seemed to pass away without accomplishing His purpose, it was not really so. For among the latest words that he uttered to his sorrowing disciples before he left them, were these: "When he (the Comforter) is come, he will reprove (or convict, margin,) the world of sin, and of righteousness, and of judgment: of sin, because (or rather, since or seeing—oti) they believe not on me; of righteousness, since I go to my Father, and ye see me no more; of judgment, since the prince (or ruler—o archon) of this world is (has been—kekritai) judged" (John vii. 7-11).

To understand this saying of our Redeemer's aright, it is necessary to bear in mind that it was uttered to the disciples for their consolation,—to impress them with the conviction that it was better for them, and therefore for the cause they all had at heart, that he should go away.

They, naturally enough, had imagined otherwise. If He leave us, they might well say, who is to show mankind their sinfulness? for who but He can unmask the heart of man? Who is to set forth real worth, since He alone can infallibly distinguish it from innumerable counterfeits? Who is to awaken men to a sense of their responsibilities, and to bring before them the certainty of a judgment to come, when He has departed in whom all judgment vests?

The answer of the Master to these natural disquietudes is simply this,—I go, in order that the objects you desire may be accomplished. He cometh who will achieve the victory. "I beheld Satan as lightning fall from heaven" (Lk. x. 17, 18). "How can one enter into a strong man's house, and spoil his goods, except he first bind the strong man?" (Matt. xii. 29.) Heard ye not the voice from heaven, which "came not because of me, but for your sakes? Now is the judgment of this world: now shall the prince of this world be cast out" (John xii. 30, 31).

Such were the words of the Saviour. Yet how imperfectly have they been received! Is not Satan, it is urged, still the prince of the power of the air, ruling as despotically as ever in the hearts of the disobedient? (Eph. ii. 2.) What evidence have we that either his power or his malignity is diminished? Is it not plain that the reproof spoken of is simply judicial?—that the Spirit convices the world of sin, of righteousness, and of judgment, only that He may thereby the more strikingly manifest the hardness and impenitence of the human heart? Is it not but too clear that the only result is greater condemnation?—aggravated ruin?

I reply, if it were so, it is difficult to see how the disciples could have received comfort from the intelligence; since it would, in that case, have merely confirmed all their fears, by announcing the hopeless ruin of mankind. If this be all, they might well have said, Where is the "glad tidings" that were to be to "all people?"—where the remedial character of the dispensation of mercy? No! words must change their meaning, and the heart of the Saviour change too, before tidings so dismal can be called consolation, or such a result be entitled a victory over satan.

Let us accept, then, the standpoint Christ has given us, as that from which a Christian man should now look upon a sinful world and its wicked ruler. The usurper is dethroned; the world is not abandoned to its iniquity; the advent of the Redeemer has changed all the relations of sin and humanity.

At first sight this may not appear to be very obvious; for truly enough iniquity still abounds, and man too often seems to be as much as ever under the power of evil.

Admitting, as every Christian must, the broad distinctions which, in the eye of God at least, separate the Church from the world, the regenerate, the "new creature in Christ Jesus" from the man "dead in trespasses and sins," it is impossible to deny the fact, that, outside the Church—extend the term Church as we may,—among persons whom it would be folly to speak of as converted, to whom no one, with even the appearance of propriety, could apply such terms as "holy brethren, partakers of the heavenly calling," there does exist an amount of virtue, goodness, reverence, awe, trust in and recognition of Christ as a Saviour, which cannot scripturally be accounted for on any supposition save that of a work of the Spirit.

I am quite aware that some persons will be startled by this assertion. Nevertheless, it may fearlessly be said—whatever theological difficulties may seem to be created thereby,—that men do thus feel, and that, in a country like our own where the light of Christianity is so widely diffused, it is no uncommon thing to find men whom it is impossible to regard as “regenerate,” exhibiting in their daily life many of the virtues which are recognized in Scripture as “fruits of the Spirit,” although too often in sad combination with much more that is as obviously worldly and sensual.

Let us not tremble or be timid in making such an admission. The great facts of the world never really contradict the great truths of Scripture. If they ever seem to do so in any particular, it is time for us to re-examine our views, in order to see whether we have not either misapprehended the supposed fact, or mistaken Scripture in relation to the point in question.

The excellence of which I speak must have a root. It either springs out of unrenewed human nature, and is apart altogether from grace,—which is inconsistent with the teachings of the Gospel respecting man's fallen condition; or it is inspired by Satan,—which is to make Beelzebub divided against him; or it is the work of that blessed Spirit from whom “proceedeth every good and perfect gift.” Hesitation, in such a case, seems treason to God and goodness. But if it is his work, it has an object, and will have a completion.

Now that which is true of individuals in favored Christian communities is, in degree, true also of mankind at large. A consciousness of sin, and feelings of sadness arising therefrom; the recognition of a righteousness extending far beyond mere conventional morality; and thoughts of a judgment to come, already flinging its shadows before, now pervade every nation, and, more or less, find a home in every heart. Superstition may overlay, or philosophy try to undermine these convictions,—the world may laugh, or pleasure administer its opiate,—but there they are still; in silence and in sorrow ever rising up to witness against the transgressor, making many a Felix tremble, and many an Agrippa to exclaim, half in terror and half in scorn, “Wouldst thou persuade me to become a Christian?”

Few, probably, now love evil for its own sake. Perhaps it is not too much to say that within almost every man, if he could but be withdrawn from the influences of the flesh, from the passions and their objects, there is something,—a kind of better self,—which acknowledges the supremacy of right. The history of the civilized world, since the days of the apostles,—its moral life, its manners, its laws and institutions, form one grand and continuous illustration of the Spirit's influence as exercised in society at large. “It has made Christ the recognized Lord of every people eminent either for knowledge or power.”

Are we, then, to conclude that all this is in vain and for nought?—aimless and objectless, unless it be to aggravate guilt and to deepen condemnation? We must do so if we set out with the persuasion, utterly incapable, however, of being sustained by any comprehensive view of Scripture, and deriving all its plausibility from the isolation and exaggeration of particular texts that because Christ has a redeemed Church, “chosen from the foundation of the world,” therefore none else can be benefited by the redemption He has wrought; that because “he that believeth shall be saved, and he that believeth not shall be condemned,” therefore they that have never heard, and they that have heard amiss, shall be all alike involved in one common, widespread, and everlasting ruin; that because he that is in Christ is a “new creature,” therefore all who do not become new creatures here are for ever shut out from hope, denied mercy, and finally abandoned to Satan and his angels.

Such are the conclusions to which we are forced; not, indeed, by any statement of Scripture, for then it would become us simply to bow before the awful mystery; but, as I have before said, by the isolation and exaggeration of particular texts, or by that inexorable logic which has for ages usurped dominion over thought, and trampled at once on the heart of man and the character of God.

We do not question our Lord's own words,—“No man can come to me, except the Father, which hath sent me, draw [i. e., attract] him” (John vi. 44); but if any man found thereon the assertion that the sinner has no ability to seek his Redeemer, and so lead others to infer further, that men cannot be justly condemned for neglecting such a duty, we feel no scruple whatever in declaring both conclusions to be erroneous.

We know that by a similar process, and by a logic apparently as faultless, nothing is easier than to demonstrate that man, as a creature governed by motives and influenced by circumstances, cannot be responsible either for his opinions or his conduct. But when the process is complete, and the demonstration perfect, we feel assured that the result cannot be trustworthy. It is not that we dispute the great dialectical maxim that logical inferences must be true, if legitimately deduced from what is true; but we deny the legitimacy of the deduction: and we do this, not because we can point out the flaw which invalidates the reasoning, but because the whole subject is beyond the reach of the human faculty; because truth never violates the moral instincts of the heart, which conclusions such as these certainly do; because, as Archer Butler somewhere beautifully remarks, "our liability to error is extreme, when we become immersed in the holy obscurity—the cloud on the mercy seat—of the Divine mysteries;" because it becomes us to remember that the conditions of human thought do not, on sacred subjects, admit of our apprehending the length and breadth of the questions involved in the decision.

Mysteries abound on every side. That one man should be born in a savage, and another in a civilized community; that one should inherit health and competence, and every mercy that a loving God can give, and another be born to sickness and poverty, to ignorance and evil example; that children should suffer for their parents' sins, and vice entail misery on the innocent; these, and many other things, are to us unquestionably mysterious and perplexing: but they are difficulties which may be met by the remembrance that "things are not as they seem;" that He who, like the "potter," fashions all, has, and ought to have, power over the clay, to make one vessel to honor and another to dishonor; that happiness and misery are much more equally divided than we sometimes imagine; that mankind are not isolated individuals, but a race; that this world was only preparatory to another; that human probation is as diversified as the human countenance; and that all things, under the control of infinite and everlasting love, are working together for the glory of God, and the best interests of the creature: but darkness and blackness, and infinite despair, is the only and inevitable result of theories which contemplate, as irreversible facts, the endless wickedness and everlasting misery of the myriads who now live, or have in times past lived, on the face of the earth.

Happily these theories are only human. Not such is the teaching of Scripture. There all things ripen in their times,—the wicked for destruction, the righteous for glory, the world for judgment. Truth is, indeed, there seen imparted to one, and withheld from another; but love rules over all. Some, to whom neither conversion nor healing can suitably be conveyed by the Lord while on earth, are spoken to "in parables;" while to others, who can both "hear and understand," it is "given to know the mysteries of the kingdom." Over the first the Saviour mourns tenderly, for they are as "sheep without a shepherd;" the last He has continually to rebuke for the hardness of their hearts; but in relation to the lot of both it may be said with equal certainly, "mercy and truth meet together, righteousness and peace embrace each other."

CHRIST'S RETURN FROM HEAVEN.

CHRIST'S return from heaven in royal majesty, sovereign power and Divine glory, is not a temporary visit. He comes to remain. He comes, as the rightful heir to David's throne, to establish his kingdom "under the whole heavens." He comes as the Divinely-ordained ruler of this earth, to "put down all rule, and all authority," and thus extend his dominion "to the ends of the earth."

But while He will be hailed with joy by His chosen people, His return will meet with opposition from the world. "The kings of the earth" will "set themselves" against His authority, and "the rulers take counsel together" to extirpate his kingdom, and attempt to triumph again as they did in Gethsemane; but all in vain. "He that sitteth in the heavens shall laugh; the Lord shall have them in derision." Man once triumphed over God's Anointed; but He is the Conqueror now.

Angels, methinks, must have wept when they witnessed the agonies of Calvary; heaven must have felt the gloom that shrouded the sorrowful scenes of Gethsemane. But when God shall set his King upon "the holy hill of Zion," the heavenly welkin of joy will announce the dawn of another age—a day of triumph. When the earth shall quake and the mountains tremble in acknowledgement of His sovereignty, as He sets his feet upon the Mount of Olives, this dispensation will have ended,—"the times of the Gentiles" will have expired,—"the times of restitution" have fully commenced,—Jerusalem be released from her long trodden-down state,—and the blindness which has so long veiled Israel's eyes, be mercifully removed, and they shall look upon Him and "mourn for him" with the bitterness and anguish of one who mourneth for his only son.

Oh, what love God hath for his chosen people who now appear to be cast off! "In that day shall there be a fountain opened to the house of David, and to the inhabitants of Jerusalem for sin and for uncleanness" (Zech. xiii. 1). In that day shall "the Spirit and the Bride say, Come. And let him that heareth say, Come. And let him that is athirst come. And whosoever will let him take of the waters of life freely" (Rev. xxii. 17).

Surely, the contemplation of these things which are just before us, should inspire all to diligent, prayerful watchfulness, for the rising of the Morning Star.

THE HEART OF CHRIST.

Heart of Christ, O cup most golden !
 Taking of thy cordial blest,
 Soon the sorrowful art folden
 In a gentle, healthful rest;
 Thou anxieties are easing,
 Pains implacable appeasing;
 Grief is comforted by love;
 Oh, what wine is there like love !

Heart of Christ, O cup most golden !
 Brimming with salvation's wine,
 Million souls have been beholden
 Unto thee for life divine.
 Thou art full of blood the purest,
 Love the tenderest and surest;
 Blood is life, and life is love;
 Oh, what wine is there like love !

Heart of Christ, O cup most golden !
 Out of thee the martyrs drank,
 Who for truth in cities olden
 Spake, nor from the torture shrank:
 Saved they were from traitor's meanness,
 Filled with joys of holy keenness:
 Strong are those that drink of love;
 Oh, what wine is there like love !

Heart of Christ, O cup most golden !
 Liberty from thee we win;
 We who drink, no more are holden
 By the shameful cords of sin !
 Pledge of mercy's sure forgiving,
 Powers for a holy living—
 These, thou cup of love, are thine:
 Love, thou art the mightiest wine !

Heart of Christ, O cup most golden !
 To remotest place and time
 Thou our labors wilt embolden,
 Unpresuming but sublime;
 Hearts are firm, though nerves be shaken,
 When from thee new life is taken;
 Truth recruits itself by love;
 Oh, what wine is there like love !

It is a grand thing to feel that Christ's fidelity is pledged to his saints. He will keep them: asleep or awake they are his.

"LITERATURE AND DOGMA"

SECOND PAPER.

We have already noticed the general characteristics of this volume, and particularly its judgments of the Hebrew Scriptures, when estimated as literature, by means of criticism as applied by Mr. Arnold, the hierophant and interpreter of the Zeit Geist.

Were it our sole or chief design to expose some of the shortcomings and inconsistencies of this volume, we should not need to return to it again. But this essay is more than a caprice or extravaganza of Mr. Arnold or any individual writer. It is significant and representative of a class of opinions and principles which are enforced by the spirit of the times, and which are likely to gain extensive currency, and, as we think, to constitute one of the most formidable of the anti-christs of the present, and perhaps of the next generation. It also contains the germs of many important truths; which truths, by excess and perversion, are likely to give countenance and excess to extravagance and error. There are truths that are overlooked by many interpreters, and consequently give currency and plausibility to the extravagant uses to which they are applied.

But before we reach this part of our discussion we must notice how Mr. Arnold disposes of the New Testament when considered as literature, i. e., how he interprets Christ and Christianity by the solvent of criticism. It is not easy to state his view in a few brief propositions. We are not absolutely certain that he would know how to state them himself. Nevertheless, we will attempt thus briefly to express them.

We need not ask, we ought not to ask, says Mr. Arnold, who Jesus was, nor whether he was human or divine, natural or supernatural. Questions of this sort are as of little consequence as the inquiry whether "the Eternal," "the not ourselves," is or is not a person. As in respect to the last, all that we need to notice is that the not ourselves makes for righteousness. So in respect to Jesus. All with which we have any special concern is the improvement which he wrought in the conception which the Hebrews attained in respect to righteousness. Such questions might be somewhat interesting as matters of speculation, but inasmuch as speculation, as compared with conduct, is as one to six, we may dismiss them as of no serious moment. Jesus improved upon the Hebrew conception of righteousness in that he gave it inwardness, that is, carried it more entirely and thoroughly into the heart, in that he warmed and fired it with love, and thus made out of what was in danger of being a rigid, an external and a self-righteous morality, a plastic, an inward, and a self-sacrificing religion. Jesus also found a doctrine of the Messiah in the Old Testament, which doctrine was the natural outgrowth and product of the Aberglaube, or the self-conceited ideas of the Jews that their nation was the favored people of God, and was appointed to a special destiny. The Messiah, in their view, was to be the chosen deliverer and the triumphant king of this favored people. Jesus found also mention made of another servant of God, spiritual, suffering, and self-sacrificing, delivered unto death and triumphant by sacrifice—whose kingdom was not to be of this world. No Jew could or did unite these conceptions in one person. Indeed, it is inconceivable that they should have been true of one person, could be logically united even in our ideal personality, inasmuch as the first class of characteristics was the offspring of obvious superstition, and had no root of truth in themselves.

But Jesus, finding this superstitious expectation concerning the temporal Messiah, and this spiritual idealistic servant of God, had the genius to connect the two by giving honor to the last, and by claiming that he fulfilled its characteristics, did, in the true and universal sense, deserve to be accepted as the true Messiah—the rightful king of the spiritual Israel. It is uncritical to suppose there were any proper prophecies of either the one or the other Messiah, much less of one Messiah as uniting in the single person the incompatible characteristics of the two. Indeed, every one of the alleged predictions of any Messiah whatever turn out to be no predictions at all.

The question, however, will return, leaving aside all questions about the Messiah of the Old Testament. What did Jesus say of himself, whom did he claim that he was? This question is nowhere stated very distinctly, and is never fairly answered by Arnold. He seems rather to avoid stating or answering it squarely, and in this seems singularly unjust to the demands of the subject and of the Zeit Geist. This last, if it asks any one question for which it insists upon an answer, persistently asks of all the critics, "What think ye of Christ? Whose Son is He? Once or twice Arnold finds himself so caught by this question that he is forced to answer it, and answers it thus: It is quite certain that Jesus called himself the Son of man; it is very doubtful whether he calls himself the Son of God; or if he did, that he attached to the appellation any high significance. But neither the question nor the answer has any special importance. They are subjects of speculative curiosity, merely, and have little relation to character and conduct. Besides, if we concern ourselves with such matters, we find that the means for answering such inquiries are scanty and untrustworthy. The records of what Jesus said of himself, to a very large extent, give us not his own sayings, but his own sayings in the words, and after the conceptions of his reporters, who, if they were altogether honest, judged of and reported every saying in their own conceptions and their own language, and both were full of after-thoughts and Aberglaube. When we have strained out all admixtures of their superstition and their metaphysics, the sayings that we are sure of are those which relate to Christ's method and Christ's secret. By Christ's method we attain to his type of righteousness. This is the metanoia, or the return to a right inward disposition of heart. The secret of Christ is the happiness or peace which comes from this metanoia. The method and the secret, taken separately, each lead to a one-sided perversion. The union of both gives sweet reasonableness, which is the glory of Christianity.

It is true that in order to accomplish and perfect this sweet reasonableness Christ lays great stress on the duty of coming to himself, but this means only that he called man to himself as the one being who himself exemplified humbleness, meekness, and self-sacrifice, but otherwise had no special pre-eminence of person or authority.

As to the records of what Christ did, they are of little importance. This much is certain, that Christ never performed a so-called miracle. Faith in miracles is slowly but surely passing away, because, under the progress and power of the Zeit Geist, men are seeing more and more clearly how faith in miracles, in certain credulous and excited generations, is always certain to arise. As to the resurrection, and the disciples' belief of it, it is obvious that there was an afterthought, nothing being more natural than that the believers in such a prophet as he should, in such an age, refuse to believe that he was dead, and then should believe that he was seen after death, and subsequently seen to ascend to heaven. The doctrine of any sacrifice of the Son of God is simply the truth that the servant of God always conquers by dying; the doctrine of redemption by his death is, that, by enduring to the end he established all his followers in their allegiance to good. The doctrine of resurrection is that Christ's death makes an epoch of victory for his cause.

This being, according to Arnold, the "sincere milk of the word " when carefully separated by criticism, this being "the simplicity of the doctrine of Christ" as distinguished from the Aberglaube which was foisted upon it, he proceeds to explain how what is called Christian doctrine was superadded. This is accounted for by a second invasion of the old Aberglaube, similar to that which had corrupted the pure doctrine of the New Testament literature. But the second superstition is more complicated and serious than the first, for it was built upon it and grew out of it. The new superstition took the old superstition of a reigning and judging temporal Messiah and attached it to the person of Jesus, and forthwith proceeds the doctrine of Christ's second coming, and the other manifold forms of church dogmas, both Catholic and Protestant.

Our statement of Arnold's theory of Christianity is very curt and bare, and is singularly contrasted with the enlarged and brilliant expansion which is spread over the plausible pages of this essay. But it is not unjust to his opinions, nor to the arguments by which he would defend them.

The author claims that this interpretation of the New Testament literature is justified and enforced by criticism. To us it seems to be eminently uncritical, and for the following reasons. First of all, Arnold differs from every eminent historical critic and student of the New Testament, in seeming to be utterly unconscious of the nature of the problem which he attempts to solve. Strauss, Baur, and even Renan neither ignore nor deny that if the ordinary supernatural interpretation of the claims of Christ for himself, and of the history of Christ by his disciples, is to be set aside there rests a grave obligation upon some one to show how these claims were ever made by Christ or put into his mouth by others—i. e., how the record of his resurrection was ever written or believed. To answer these questions, they contrive elaborate theories, which they attempt to justify by a careful and detailed study of the history and chronology of the Gospels and epistles. The solutions which they give are expanded into volumes. All such inquiries, and the duty to make and answer them, are discussed by Arnold in a flippant sentence. They go through the New Testament, verse by verse, and slowly scrutinize and compare the meaning of word and phrase. Arnold quotes here and there a passage, extemporizes here and there a violent and false translation, and forthwith announces that his theory is sustained. Because, forsooth, he emphasizes the subjective meaning of a few of the teachings of our Lord, he leaps to the conclusion that all else which he says is of no significance. To one who is moderately familiar with what is called the higher criticism of the New Testament, it is most obvious that Mr. Arnold is not even moderately acquainted with it. A critic who refers to the conversation with the woman taken in adultery as decisive of a mixture of afterthoughts with the actual sayings of our Lord, in entire innocence of the notorious fact that the whole record is rejected as not genuine by many textual critics, can hardly deserve confidence as having attained to that criticism which results from reading the best books on a subject. A writer who makes so much of the spuriousness of the text, or the heavenly witnesses, deserves no very advanced degree among New Testament interpreters. A writer who disposes of the prophetic Messiah of the Old Testament and the interpreted Messiah of the New, after a hasty and unreflective reading of Antony Collins, is not, in the best sense of the word, an accomplished critic, and can scarcely deserve to be called a conscientious critic. The son of Dr. Arnold of Rugby might have found, in a pregnant sentence recorded in the diary or letters of his father's memoir, the answer to pages of flippant positiveness about the Messianic question. The sentence relates to the difference between the oriental and the occidental minds in respect to what is called the logical faculty. It is most pertinent to the very question which is the theme of the essay of the son—viz., How should both Old and New Testament be interpreted as literature? But Arnold the son seems not to have remembered at all.

We have read this essay with no little care. We are not unaware of the difficulties which attend some of the topics of which it treats. Whatever merit of thought or diction it possesses, it labors under this most serious defect—that, pretending to treat the Scriptures as literature, in order to emancipate them from dogma, it is itself one of the most eminent examples of capricious and superficial dogmatism that modern literature can furnish; and that, assuming to be both the champion of the application of criticism as the mellowed product of reading the best books on any and all subjects, it is itself one of the most distinguished examples of the attempt by an unqualified critic to judge of a literature which he has not decently mastered in either text or comments. It will be no credit to the Zeit Geist of English-speaking readers if they accept such a critic as its chosen interpreter, and expounder of the best books in its best literature. There is much that is good, or rather which might have been good in this volume, if it had been turned to a better use. N. P.

THE "LITTLE HORN."

WHAT is it? It is a king (see Daniel vii. 24). "And the ten horns of this kingdom are ten kings, which shall arise; and another (king) shall arise." What does he do? He subdues three kings. He is the eleventh king on the head of the fourth beast, also the eleventh horn, for he shall do the same work of the king (see verse 9) . . . three of the first horns were plucked up by the roots.

Then, is it not plain Daniel's little horn is a king, one king and no more? What does he do? Makes war on the saints (see verse 21). When does it end? When the saints possess the kingdom (see verse 22). The 21st reads, "I beheld, and the same horn made war with the saints and prevailed against them, until the Ancient of days came, and judgment was given to the saints of the Most High, and the time came the saints possessed the kingdom. How long does the war last after it begins? (and do not forget it ends when the saints possess the kingdom; see verse 25). And they (the saints) shall be given into his hand (power) until a time, times, and the dividing of time." How many days is this? (See Rev. xii. 6). "And the woman fled into the wilderness . . . that they should feed her there a thousand two hundred and three-score days." This same time, in verse 14, is called a time, and times, and half a time: so we see the saints are given into the hand of this king 1290 days. Three years and a half, and thirty over as its dividing of time; thirty days to each month. Not 1280 years. O no. I only need to show the great error of the year-day theory, here, by asking, can this king live 1290 years? I cannot say this little horn, who is explained to be a king, will not live 1290 years; but this I do say, we need not look for Christ's second coming this year, nor till 1260 has passed, if this is so. For we believe the revelation of this king is still in the future; if not, we think it would have been recorded by some historian. I ask, right here, are the saints in the hand (or power) of a king now? If not, this king with his power is in the future. For when he begins the war on the saints it does not end till the saints possess the kingdom. But, I believe, we are told, This little horn is the Papacy, and is in the past. If so, the saints possess the kingdom. It takes some men to tell what the Almighty means, and others to tell what He says. Who takes away his (the little horn's) dominion? (See Dan. vii. 26). "They (the saints) shall take away his dominion to consume and to destroy it unto the end." They cannot do this until his power fails to keep them in his hand; and as this takes place whenever the saints possess the kingdom, his dominion, by them, is taken away after they possess it. (See Rev. xix. 14 to end of chapter; and in Dan. viii. 25)—"He shall stand up against the Prince of princes" (Christ, King's son of king's son), "and he shall be broken without hands." In this chapter the little horn is seen, (see verse 9.) What is he said to do? (Verse 11.) By him the daily sacrifice was taken away. When this is done, how far are we from the cleansing of the sanctuary? (or the time when the saints possess the kingdom, for, I think when this is done they will possess it) "1290 days;" not years; for this king lives that time and more. At the time the daily sacrifice is taken away and the abomination that maketh desolate (margin, astonisheth) is set up, (see chapter xi. 31.) "Arms shall stand on his part, and they shall pollute the sanctuary of strength, and shall take away the daily sacrifice, and they shall place the abomination that maketh desolate. And Daniel says, from that time there shall be 1290 days. (See chapter 12, verse 11.) If we read carefully from verse 31, chapter xi., to verse 3, chapter xii., we shall see that he who does what is said to be done in chapter x. 31 (who, we believe is the little horn, a king) lives to the resurrection. Now, if these 1290 days mean years, then some one is to see an old man; not only 1290 years old, but 2300, as he pollutes the sanctuary 1010 days before it is removed; this added to 1290 makes 2300.

The 2300 days, not years, commence when the sanctuary is polluted (see Daniel viii. 13.) How long the vision concerning the daily sacrifice (or commencing with the daily sacrifice)? So, we see, the 2300 do not measure the whole vision (as some try to make us believe), but begin with the sacrifice and end with the cleansing of the sanctuary, (or the time the saints possess the kingdom). Christ says (Matt. xxiv. 15), When ye therefore shall see the abomination of desolation, spoken of by Daniel the prophet, stand in the holy place, etc. The first time Daniel uses the word "abomination" is in chapter x. 31. "They shall place the abomination that maketh desolate." When this takes place, how long to the end of the age? (See Dan. xii. 11): "There shall be 1290 days," not years; "for a king or a man lives the time and more. Christ says when this abomination stands in the holy place. Has there been any holy place since the year 70? If not, then there must be one built; and as it was in Jerusalem, called "the holy place," it must be built there, a house or a part of a house, before it can stand in it. When John the Revelator wrote in the year about 96, twenty-six years after Jerusalem was destroyed, he was given a rod to measure the temple, and says (Rev. xi. 2), "But the court, which is without the temple, leave out. . . . And the holy city shall they (the Gentiles) tread under foot forty and two months." This time in the third verse is 1260 days; 1290 shortened to 1260 for the elect's sake. Then, if there is no holy city now, one is to be built in which will be the holy place; for there must be one for the abomination to stand in.

If these things are so, then the abomination Christ refers to is in the future, and the great tribulation spoken of in verse 21 and 22; also, the darkening of the sun and the moon, and the falling of the stars. (See verses 29, 30.)

John the Revelator, I think, was shown this tribulation in Rev. vi. 10, 11, where he sees the souls under the altar, and hears them cry, and it was said unto them, that they should rest for a little season until their brethren, that should be killed as they were, should be fulfilled. Immediately after the tribulation of those days the sun shall be darkened, and the moon shall not give her light, and the stars shall fall from heaven, and (or, for) the powers of heaven shall be shaken. I understand the shaking causes the darkening of the sun, and moon, and falling of the stars: 1290 days from the beginning of the tribulation, when the abomination is set up in the holy place to the time the saints possess the kingdom; 1260 to the darkening of the sun, etc. Now Christ comes in this 30 days, raises the sleeping saints, changes the living ones, and gives them possession of the kingdom; so the day or hour of His coming will not be known, but the month. The other 45 days to make the 1335 are beyond this age, and at their end Daniel and others, it is likely, will stand in their lot, or receive their rulership in the kingdom.

THOUGHTS ON THE CREATION.

"Known unto God are all his works from the beginning of the world" (Acts xv. 18). "Remember the former things of old: for I am God, and there is none else; I am God, and there is none like me, declaring the end from the beginning, and from ancient times the things that are not yet done, saying, My counsel shall stand, and I will do all my pleasure" (Isa. xlvi. 9, 10).

If God knew from the beginning all his works: and can declare the end from the beginning; then He knew that all things would be just as they have been. So when He made Adam He knew just what the consequences would be by such a creation. He knew, also, just what step Eve would take when He created her: for, "He saw the end from the beginning." God, in creating the first man, Adam, did it upon a natural principle: He purposed in himself to create the second Adam upon a spiritual principle. As God created a bride for the first man; so will he create a bride for the second man. The first man is natural, and from the earth. The second man is spiritual, and will come from heaven. As the first man had a natural bride of the same nature as himself; so the second man will have a spiritual bride, of the same nature as himself. Paul says, Adam "is the figure of Him that was to come." He also says, to the church at Corinth, "I have espoused you to one husband" (2 Cor. xi. 2, 3). Many professors, though, will be beguiled by the enemy, as Eve was, and will not be in the number that will be presented as a chaste virgin to Christ. After God created man of the dust of the ground, He placed him in a good condition by putting him in reach of the tree of life, which would perpetuate his existence. God placed Adam under a law to bring out a spiritual nature; for the law is spiritual, just and good, (Rom. vii. 4-14). Adam failed to bring such a development; but the second Adam did not fail to develop the spiritual nature. So we are taught that "the seed of the woman," which pointed to Christ, "shall bruise the serpent's head." Christ is emphatically the Seed of the woman. And also the promise made to Abraham, "In thy seed (which is Christ), shall all the families of the earth be blessed." These promises were renewed to David, "Thy seed will I establish forever, and build up thy throne to all generations" (Psa. lxxxix. 4). Peter confirms this promise on the day of Pentecost, by saying, "Therefore he (David), being a prophet, and knowing that God had sworn with an oath to him, that of the fruit of his loins according to the flesh, He would raise up Christ to set on his throne" (Acts ii. 30). The above promises will be fulfilled in Christ, and his glorified church, in the future ages.

Jesus, in bringing out the spiritual nature, learned obedience by the things which he suffered, and being made perfect, became the author of eternal life. This Jesus, who is called the Seed of the woman, the Seed of Abraham, and the Seed of David, did God raise up from the dead, to die no more. So when the creation of the second Adam was perfected, God seated him at His own right hand until "the bride,"—"the church,"—is glorified, and presented to him perfect, and spiritual, of the same nature as himself; "not having spot or wrinkle, or such any thing;" but holy and without blemish. Well might the Revelator in his vision exclaim, "Alleluia: for the Lord God omnipotent reigneth. Let us be glad and rejoice, and give honor to him: for the marriage of the Lamb is come, and his betrothed has made herself ready," etc. (Rev. xix. 5-9).

So Christ will take the church—"the bride"—to himself when finished, and made perfect. But she is now in her formative state, being moulded under the hand of God, by "trials" and "tribulations." If we suffer with Christ, then we shall reign with him (2 Tim. ii. 12). We must overcome in order to reign with Christ on his throne (Rev. iii. 21). The church in her glorified state will become kings and priests unto God, and will reign on the earth (Rev. v. 10). But before entering upon this reign, she must be made immortal; which is the work of God, to bring her to this perfected state. She will then be presented to the Man of heaven, "arrayed in fine linen, clean and white." So when the Second Adam and his Bride take the government of the world, they will be of the same nature—spiritual. Then they will be prepared for the great work of restitution. Here the preparation will end, and the restitution of all things will begin. The first man and his bride were to multiply and replenish the earth; but the second man and his bride will restore all things spoken by the mouth of all the holy prophets since the world began. Amen and Amen.

WAS MOUNT SINAI A VOLCANO?

[Bro. STORRS: The following is from the "N. Y. Sun," of October 15th. As the region spoken of will soon force itself on the attention of mankind, I deem the article of sufficient importance to claim an insertion in your valuable Magazine.]

W. H. HANFORD.]

It is a noteworthy fact that at this late epoch in the world's history the locality of Mount Sinai remains a mystery. We have discovered, or think we have discovered, the source of the Nile, yet the identification of the Mount of God in Horeb, where was delivered "in fire, in darkness and tempest that divine law which to this day forms the basis of the legislation of all civilized nations, and the rule of their religious and social conduct," still remains uncertain and involved in the gravest doubt. As we write an expedition is preparing in England, under the leadership of a distinguished traveler and scholar, to determine the true position of this famous mountain.

The northern extremity of the Red Sea is fork shaped, separating into two branches, the Gulf of Suez on the west, and the Gulf of Akaba on the east. Between these gulfs is the triangular peninsula of Akaba. In the southern portion of this peninsula rises the group of mountains to which the name of Sinai is usual given. Although tradition places Mount Sinai in this region, biblical scholars have been unable to agree upon any particular summit as that whence Moses received the law. At least four different peaks of the group have been regarded by respectable authorities as the true "Mount of God." It should be noted that the traditional location of Mount Sinai in the Akaba peninsula involves the assumption that the Gulf of Suez was the Red Sea of the Bible, through which the Israelites made their miraculous escape from the army of Pharaoh.

A strong argument has lately been advanced by Dr. Charles T. Beke, the English geographer and explorer of Abyssinia, to prove that Mount Sinai is nowhere within the peninsula to which students of the Bible have heretofore assigned it. but is in reality a volcano, now extinct, situated far to the eastward, near the Great Arabian Desert. He believes it will be found in a rugged tract of igneous origin, lying at no great distance east of the head of the Gulf of Akaba. If his theory is correct, it was this branch, and not the Gulf of Suez, that the Israelites passed through in their exodus from the land of bondage. The reasons offered by Dr. Beke in support of his views are interesting and worthy of consideration, and his sincerity is attested by the avowal of his intention—in spite of his advanced age of seventy years and upward—to make a personal exploration of the volcanic region referred to at an early day, for the purpose of completing his identification of what is perhaps the most remarkable spot on the face of the earth.

The volcanic districts of Arabia are called hararas by the natives of the country, meaning "tracts covered with rugged black stones that look burnt with fire." The position attributed to the true Mount Sinai by Dr. Beke is some where about 29° 30' north latitude and 36° east longitude, in one of these wastes, known as the Harra Radjla. It is doubtful whether any European has ever penetrated this wilderness, though Burekhardt and other travelers must have skirted its borders on the route from Damascus to Mecca. The location of Mount Sinai here renders it impossible that the biblical kingdom of Mizraim—the scriptural land of bondage—should be identical with the Egypt of profane history. Dr. Beke expressly contends that it is not. At the time of the exodus it was a powerful and populous monarchy, situated, as he believes, altogether to the northeast of the realm of the Ptohnies, near the Philistine country. It was from this land that the Israelites fled on that wonderful journey in which we are told “the Eternal went before them by day in a pillar of a cloud, to lead them the way; and by night in a pillar of fire to give them light.”

The language of this and many other passages is cited to show that at this period Mount Sinai was an active volcano, which blazed like a beacon before the Israelites on their perilous path. In the nineteenth chapter of the Book of Exodus we read that when the children of Israel were encamped before the Mount of God in Horeb, “it came to pass on the third day in the morning, that there were thunders and lightnings, and a thick cloud upon the mount, and the voice of the trumpet exceeding loud; so that all the people that were in the camp trembled. And Mount Sinai was altogether on a smoke, because the Eternal descended upon it in fire; and the smoke thereof ascended as the smoke of a furnace, and the whole mount quaked greatly.” The narrative relates, in the next chapter, how “all the people saw the thunders and the lightnings, and the noise of the trumpet, and the mountain smoking; and when the people saw it, they removed and stood afar off.” Further on, in the same book of the Scriptures, it is said that “Moses went up into the mount, and a cloud covered the mount. And the glory of the Eternal abode upon Mount Sinai, and the cloud covered it six days; and the seventh day He called unto Moses out of the midst of the cloud. And the sight of the glory of the Eternal was like devouring fire on the top of the mount, in the eyes of the children of Israel.”

There is an undeniable similarity between these figurative expressions and the language used to describe volcanic action in later ages. Pindar speaks of Mount Ætna as “by day a burning stream of smoke, but by night a ruddy eddying flame.” Pliny the younger, in his celebrated account of the first eruption of Mount Vesuvius, by which his uncle, the distinguished Roman Admiral, was killed, describes the mass of matter thrown out from the crater by day as “a cloud rising upward in appearance and shape resembling a tree,” and in the evening “vast sheets of flame and large bodies of fire were beheld rising from Mount Vesuvius, the glare and brilliancy of which were seen in bolder relief as night drew on apace.” Many more modern descriptions to the same purpose are quoted by Dr. Beke. An African, of the Somali country, who witnessed the first eruption of a volcano on the Abyssinian coast in 1861, saw nineteen craters, of which, he said, eighteen still “smoke in the day time and at night give light like a lamp.” These rude words, says Dr. Beke, are meant to describe, and by every reasonable person would be understood as describing what in the figurative language of Scripture is styled “a pillar of cloud by day and a pillar of fire by night.”

It is asserted, then, that Mount Sinai was a volcano in active eruption when the children of Israel began their wanderings; that it was by the light of the eruption, principally, if not entirely, that they passed through the Red Sea; and that the mighty earthquake that accompanied the volcanic outburst caused the rising of the waters whereby the pursuing host of Pharaoh was overwhelmed.

Dr. Beke is by no means a skeptic in religion. On the contrary, he is a firm adherent of the Christian faith. He believes, however, that the doubts and difficulties concerning the exodus, which have in late years been employed to discredit Old Testament history should be definitely set at rest by just such scientific investigations as that which he now proposes to make; and no doubt many Christians will agree with him.

“HAVING NOTHING AND POSSESSING ALL THINGS.”

This is one of Paul's cluster of enigmas in 2 Cor.: as they are full of most important truth let us give a few thoughts to them.

The first member of the sentence will be admitted by all, for it is an historical fact that the apostles of our Lord were poor men. “Silver and gold have I none,” said one of them, and doubtless the same thing was true of the rest. It is probable that Saul was a man of considerable social position, with bright prospects in life from his ability, learning, and high character as a zealous Pharisee of the strictest kind; but when he was called to the apostolate, he had to pay the severe penalty imposed upon all men who obey the voice of conscience in the pursuit of pure truth. He himself tells us the result of his obedience to the faith upon his worldly circumstances. “But what things were gain to me, those I counted loss for Christ. Yea, doubtless, and I count all things but loss for the excellency of the knowledge of Christ Jesus my Lord; for whom I have suffered the loss of all things, and do count them but dung that I may win Christ, and be found in Him, not having mine own righteousness, which is of the law, but that which is of the faith of Christ, the righteousness which is of God by faith."

The context shows that the loss referred to was that of his position and privileges in connection with orthodox Judaism; but every one knows that apostasy from the ritual of Moses involved social degradation, contempt, and poverty. Paul's secular prospects were hopelessly ruined when his spiritual convictions caused him to accept the crucified Nazarene as the King of Israel, the Anointed of God. Henceforth he was ostracised, a heretic, a heathen man, a blasphemer, for whom no sympathy could be felt, and upon whom no eye of pity would fall even in the deepest sorrow of nakedness and hunger. His own conduct in relation to the Christians, before he was called by the "heavenly voice," is the best illustration of Jewish sentiments respecting the disciples of the Lord. "I verily thought with myself that I ought to do many things contrary to the name of Jesus of Nazareth. Which things I also did in Jerusalem; and many of the saints did I shut up in prison, having received authority from the chief priests; and when they were put to death I gave my voice against them. And I punished them oft in every synagogue, and compelled them to blaspheme; and being exceedingly mad against them, I persecuted them even unto strange cities."

So far as the bare fact is concerned, it is manifest that the Lord's apostles were very poor in the good things of the world—they had nothing. But why is this a fact? Was there any moral necessity for it,—that is to say anything in the nature of the doctrines they were elected to teach,—that made personal poverty appropriate? If a dozen men are commissioned by one whose authority they recognize as imperial, to revolutionize society by the introduction of a new religion which gives no quarter to its vices, and ignores the very existence of its gods as an absurdity, surely their Master will furnish them amply with the gold which the world finds essential in the conduct of any great enterprise. So one would have reasoned beforehand, for the nations will not forsake their gods and their sins without a terrible contest. But the actual facts of the case are as much beyond the ordinary sphere of human reasoning, as the gospel itself is sublimely above all human religions. Here are the startling instructions for the first mission:—"And he called unto him the twelve, and began to send them forth by two and two, and gave them power over unclean spirits; and commanded them that they should take nothing for their journey save a staff only; no scrip, no bread, no money in their purse; but be shod with sandals, and not put on two coats."

What is the meaning of it? They were to trust in their Master for the supply of their wants. They preached faith, and practised it, and they "lacked nothing." It was a glorious testimony to the Divine faithfulness; it was meet that the world should understand that He who commissioned this ministry would see to its support; and it was in beautiful harmony with the doctrine of faith that the men who preached it should themselves illustrate its meaning by trusting God for their daily bread. The Lord knew, and said, that "the laborer is worthy of his hire," and "the Lord hath ordained that they who preach the gospel should live of the gospel;" and when hearts full of love to Him give of "their carnal things" to his servants, who "minister in spiritual things," we have inspired assurance that it is "an odor of a sweet smell, a sacrifice acceptable, well-pleasing to God."

But this is not all. Men have forgotten in these days the meaning of "a Christian profession" in the days when Paul lived and labored. It was not then the poor, unmeaning, conventional thing that it so often is now. At that time it meant voluntary poverty, the loss of property and social reputation, the rupture of domestic ties—with all its miserable torture of the heart—the endurance of persecution in any or all of the forms which Jewish malignity or Gentile barbarity could devise, and in all probability a death of agony by wild beast or fire. A Christian? What was the man you call the Christ? A pretender to the throne of David, an impostor, a winebibber, a companion of publicans and sinners, a rebel against the authority of Caesar, and a blasphemer of Moses and of God. To say that you accepted that man as the son of David, the promised Deliverer, your Lord and Saviour, through whom you looked for the resurrection to eternal life, was sheer madness, and you must take the consequences. Bravely, nobly, heroically, they did take the consequences—confessing Christ in the face of all these desolating storms. That is what was meant by "joining the Church," when Paul wrote his immortal letters. If the "rejected of men" is to have any followers, they must share their Leader's fortunes and be rejected too.

He told them so. The first Christians were not deceived. There was no temptation of ease, or affluence, or honor held out to them. On the contrary, the Lord spoke thus:—"If any man come to me, and hate not his father, and mother, and wife, and children, and brethren, and sisters, yea, and his own life also, he cannot be my disciple. And whosoever doth not bear his cross, and come after me, cannot be my disciple. . . . So, likewise,"—like the man who counted the cost of the building or the war—"whosoever he be of you that forsaketh not all that he hath, he cannot be my disciple. (Luke xiv. 26, 27, 33.) "And the brother shall deliver up the brother to death, and the father the child; and the children shall rise up against their parents, and cause them to be put to death. And ye shall be hated of all men for my name's sake. . . . The disciple is not above his master, nor the servant above his lord. It is enough for the disciple that he be as his master, and the servant as his lord. If they have called the Master of the house Beelzebub, how much more them of his household? . . . He that loveth father or mother more than me is not worthy of me; and he that loveth son or daughter more than me is not worthy of me. And he that taketh not his cross, and followeth after me, is not worthy of me." (Matt. x. 21, 22, 24, 25, 37, 38.) "If the world hate you, ye know that it hated me before it hated you. If ye were of the world, the world would love his own; but because ye are not of the world, but I have chosen you out of the world, therefore the world hateth you. Remember the word that I said unto you, The servant is not greater than his lord. If they have persecuted me, they will also persecute you; if they have kept my saying, they will keep yours also. But all these things will they do unto you for my name's sake, because they know not him that sent me." (John xv. 18-21.)

Such were the conditions of discipleship! Surely we have quoted enough to show that the Master held out no tempting inducement of secular, social, or temporal kind: he indicated no flowery path for the feet of his followers; no prospective exaltation to posts of honor or emolument; and no "ecclesiastical prizes" to stimulate ambition and to shape their policy "when brought before kings." No! "Having nothing" tersely describes the state of their banker's account, and suggests that obedience to the precept, "When persecuted in one city, flee ye into another," would not be prevented by delays in the settlement of property, however difficult it might be from the pressure of poverty. Alas! those grand times are gone, and with them the wondrous beauty of the Bride, the Lamb's Wife, when, in her loyal purity, she disclaimed the hollow attractions of the world, and lived upon the love of her glorious Lord.

But, strangely enough, the men who describe their wordly estate by the two words, "having nothing," and seem to accept the fact as involving neither hardship nor mystery, nevertheless add the apparently absurd and extravagant assertion, "and yet possessing all things." Here is the pith of the enigma, the soul of the apostolic riddle. How can it be solved? There seems little idea of possessing anything but sorrow in the following words of Paul respecting himself and his apostolic brethren: "For I think that God has set forth us the apostles last, and made us sentenced to death: for we are made a spectacle unto the world, to angels, and to men. . . . Even unto this present hour we both hunger and thirst, and are naked, and are buffeted, and have no certain dwelling-place; and labor, working with our own hands: being reviled, we bless; being persecuted, we suffer it; being defamed, we intreat: we are made as the filth of the world, the offscouring of all things unto this day." (1 Cor. iv. 9, 11-13.) It was a life-long experience; and as they lived they died,—utterly poor: yet, to do justice to the words, the possession must be as real as its contrasted privation; and so, in fact, it was: "For all things are yours, whether Paul, or Apollos, or Cephas, or the world, or life, or death, or things present, or things to come: all are yours, and ye are Christ's, and Christ is God's."

That is the secret of Paul's enigma; Christ God's Son, is the Heir of all things; and Christians, the men who follow—it may be in poverty and rejection—the poor and rejected Redeemer, are heirs with him of a wonderful and durable inheritance. The possession is real, because the property is God's, and he has promised it to His Son and his sons. They have it not in actual possession yet, and cannot until the second advent of the Lord; but they have the earnest and the promise, and firmly grasping both they say, "All things are ours."

But as neither mortal men nor dead men can possibly enjoy the abundant wealth set apart for the children of God, the realization of his purpose in its actual bestowment upon them involves their resurrection from the dead. This is indeed a necessity of the Divine arrangement. "Flesh and blood cannot inherit the kingdom of God;" hence the righteous are to be raised with a spiritual body, in power, in glory, and in incorruption. The event is as certain as if it were transferred from the region of prophecy and promise to that of history, which it will be at a day not now far distant. The men who accepted Christ with poverty, and persecution, and scorn, will appear with Christ in wealth, and power, and glory. This is the way in which he speaks to them.

"Verily I say unto you, That ye which have loved me, in the regeneration when the Son of man shall sit on the throne of glory, ye also shall sit upon twelve thrones, judging the twelve tribes of Israel. And every one that hath forsaken houses, or brethren, or sisters, or father, or mother, or wife, or children, or land, for my name's sake, shall receive an hundredfold, and shall inherit everlasting life." (Matt. xix. 28, 29.) "Fear not, little flock; for it is your Father's good pleasure to give you the kingdom." (Luke xii. 32.) "Ye are they which have continued with me in my temptations; and I appoint unto you a kingdom, as my Father has appointed unto me; that ye may eat and drink at my table in my kingdom, and sit on thrones, judging the twelve tribes of Israel." (xxii. 28-30.) "Blessed are they which are persecuted for righteousness' sake: for theirs is the kingdom of heaven. Blessed are ye when men shall revile you, and persecute you, and say all manner of evil against you falsely, for my sake. Rejoice and be exceeding glad: for great is your reward in heaven." (Matt. v. 10, 11.) "And he lifted up his eyes on his disciples and said, Blessed be ye poor: for yours is the kingdom of God. Blessed are ye that hunger now: for ye shall be filled. Blessed are ye that weep now: for ye shall laugh. Blessed are ye when men shall hate you, and when they shall separate you from their company, and shall reproach you, and cast out your name as evil, for the Son of man's sake. Rejoice ye in that day, and leap for joy: for great is your reward in heaven." (Luke vi. 20-23.)

These golden sayings of the King are balm to the wounded heart and music to the spirit. The cloud that hangs over the loyal will be lifted some day; the footsore pilgrims of faith will rest by and by; and the temples that now ache under the burden and heat of the day will be crowned when the Master comes back. It seems that men may be poor, and yet very rich; may have nothing, and possess all things: the solution of this mystery, like the solution of all mysteries, is found in Christ. The Father delights to honor Him; let that be our delight too; and we may calmly leave the rest until the heavens open and the Son of man descends.—DR. LEASK.

A GREETING TO THE NEW VOLUME.

WELCOME, thrice welcome, blessed pages of light and truth, which have long lit up our pathway, and cheered us in our pilgrimage. When we look back to the time when we commenced the perusal of thy pages, and contrast it with the present, we can but exclaim, "What hath God wrought!" Much has been accomplished in dissipating the fogs of papal superstition, heathen philosophy, and human traditions. So clear shines the light through thy pages that the believing heart "rejoices with joy unspeakable and full of glory." Thy precepts are pure, and therefore lovely: many by thee are made pure, and shall see God: thy pages are peace, for no wrangling controversies let in their invectives to defile thy columns: but, on the contrary, the broad principles of charity or love have characterized all thy teachings; without which, all other gifts are as sounding brass and as tinkling cymbals. We trust this new volume will bear aloof the same principles of purity, truth and love, making the Divine word its authority.

Long has your venerable EDITOR labored for these objects. Wonderfully did the MASTER BUILDER fashion him for the work,—took him out of the quarry, chiselled and made him into a pillar. May he continue to control thy pages and add to thy columns until the Master shall say, "It is enough; come up higher; the Sun of Righteousness has risen with healing in His wings, and the darkness has fled away; the glory of the Lord is revealed, and all flesh see it together, which the mouth of the Lord hath spoken."

LUCRETIA B. LAMB.

St. Paul, Minn.

WHAT I THINK IN AUTUMN.

Sadly fall the faded leaves,
And the soft wind moans and grieves,
While the pale and mellow rays
Of the autumn sun displays
Mounds of grass where faded lie
Hearts as hopeful once as I.

Sleep within thy narrow cells,
For each hour most truly tells
We all soon must join your number,
And so strangely then we'll slumber,
Side by side within the tomb,
Sharing too its loathsome gloom.

Hateful death! so cruel, greedy,
Sparing not the lone and needy,
Pressing to thy heart sweet flowers
That have soothed us in the hours
Of affliction, lone and deep:
Scornful death, you cannot keep.

Clasp your icy fingers 'round,
Lay low in the dark, cold ground,

Hold fast in your stiff embrace
 Our poor fallen erring race,
 Smile as rude winds fiercely blow
 Down the white and wintry snow,
 Hiding grass, and shrub, and mound,
 Leaving neither trace or sound
 Of the ones that lie below,
Monster death, thy power we know!

But can winter always last?
 And the tempest sweep its blast
 O'er the bud, the blossom, bloom,
 Holding all within the tomb?
 Shall the evil conquer good,
 The warm sunshine be withstood
 By the cold, the false, untrue,
 God be revered by the few?

Nay, stern death; the time will be
 When eternal spring we'll see;
 God will put you down forever,
 You will conquer, then, no, never!
 Then the sunshine of His love,
 Pure and warm from Him above,
 Shall dispell the chill and blight,
 Chase away the long dark night,
 Melt the icy fetters through,
 Make us free, and fresh, and new:
 Earth shall blossom and rejoice
 At the sound of His dear voice;
Every one shall bow the knee
 When His glory they shall see.
 Love shall blossom as the rose,
 And sweet spring shall never close.

MISS ELIZABETH SMITH.

Lapeer, Mich., Oct. 1878.

Correspondence.

O. F. YALE, Terryville, Conn., writes: As regards the EXAMINER, it is to me the "present truth;" the "meat in due season," and a very welcome guest. It solves the question which would stand up before my mind, and, it seems to me, must come before all reflecting minds. Why am I favored with these "glad tidings," and multitudes of others of God's creatures, in this and past generations, as worthy at least of his love, and more capable of ascribing unto him "the honor due unto his name," left in ignorance and darkness to perish? And it solves it gloriously and honorably to His character: and not as that other theory, which certainly seems to be "another gospel" from that Paul preached, which would leave out of the pale of salvation the mass of mankind as being the seed of the serpent. Nevertheless, I was long in seeing clearly that redemption could reach back to restore "and save that which was lost." But if God has promised that the "seed" shall bless all nations; and if He so loved the world as to give his only begotten Son; and if the glad tidings of this shall be to all people; and if He will have all men to be saved, and to come to a knowledge of the truth, I can conceive of nothing except lack of power and ability to perform His promises which could prevent His acting in accordance with His love, and having His will in the matter. As regards the EXAMINER's change of form, I like it better than before. It is compact, convenient, and more easily preserved. Yours in the hope of the promise.

COHA M. CLEMENCE, Farmington, Ct., writes: I cannot tell you what a welcome visitor the EXAMINER is in our home. I have never had 2 Pet. iii. defined so satisfactory to my mind as in the article by Bro. Spencer in No. 2. Many think the burning will be a literal fire. I have listened to different opinions, but none gave the satisfaction that the above named did. How cheering the letters that come from all parts, filled with good wishes for the spread of this glorious theme—this new light and life in the eternal ages; and how many prayers are daily ascending to our promised King and LIFE-GIVER that health and length of days may be given you to proclaim these glad tidings until the day dawns that will usher in that blessed era when the promised Heir shall come and reign with the chosen of "every nation" on the earth. Jesus says, "If any man hear my words, and believe not, I judge him not" (John xii. 47). This morning, while reading these words of Jesus, I thought, If Christ did not judge or condemn those who did hear Him, can it be possible He will suffer those who have never heard of Him to sleep on and perish? It does not seem possible in the God I love and worship. No, I believe and know that "Christ died for all." Happy thought; for all includes me. If it were not for that precious word I should often despair. The trials of this life are so many. I often think, Can I endure to the end of this dispensation, and then be worthy to receive life eternal?

G. B. STACY, Richmond, Va., writes: I am delighted with the EXAMINER in its new and elegant form, and heartily wish you a largely increased subscription list, trusting the Lord will open its way into hearts that it has never found hitherto. The Lord will use us and ours whenever He needs us; and until the Lord opens the hearts of persons, argument is inoperative.

ELIZA A. B. BENTON, Vergennes, Vt., writes; We like the present form of the BIBLE EXAMINER very much; also, to find choice articles from back numbers in the newspaper form. There are many in Vol. 16 and 17 (the only ones we have read) that are worthy a second reading, and should be preserved.

As I become acquainted with your views; the more I am convinced they are Bible truths. O! I hope they are; all is so glorious, and fills my heart with praise and thanksgiving continually.

In years that are past, my soul has been burdened with the desire to show to poor illiterate "Priest-bound" worshippers of the "Virgin Mary," "Tables," etc., that the Bible was the only safe guide, and Jesus Christ the only name by which we can be saved; and in trying to do so, met with cold reserve or open persecution; and my love for them grew cold as I felt they were to be eternally lost. But now, the consoling thought that the truth will, "in due time," be so presented that all will see and understand it, rekindles my love towards them. enlarges my heart with faith and love to God, and our Saviour Jesus Christ. Surely, a doctrine that fills the soul with love to God and man cannot be other than of Divine origin. My prayer is. That you may be filled with all wisdom and knowledge, and health, and grace, from the "good Master," to continue to feed his body, the church, till He comes to reign.

We have read, lent, circulated, and given away, nearly all the papers, tracts, etc., that we have received: still there is room for more of the like faithful reading.

I. N. WILFONG, Philadelphia, Pa., writes: The two numbers of the BIBLE EXAMINER (Vol. 18) came to hand, and I am much interested in reading them. My mind has been much exercised the past six months on the future age and the views you advocate. I begin to see new light in God's word, and also see that God gave his Son a ransom for all; not a part; and that He will complete his great begun work in "the ages to come." I do believe you have God's truth, and also the Divine approval. Be encouraged, and go on in the good work, and you will receive the approbation of your heavenly Father and his Son.

FROM ELDER JACOB BLAIN.

BRO. STORRS: Poor health has delayed giving to brethren a statement of my travels and labor the past season, and not being yet well I must give but a brief outline.

In July I visited Chicago, and Harvard, seventy miles beyond, where there is a church brought to embrace our views by the labors of Eld. H.

V. Reed. I arranged to have our works sold and given, specially at the office of "The Restitution," published by Wilson, Pierce & Co., 182 South Clark St., Chicago. In August I went East, and returned in October. I attended the Camp-meetings at Springfield, Mass., and Alton Bay, N. H., and stopped at different places, coming home by New York, where I spent ten days. Had a pleasant interview with Bro. Storrs, consulting on the best means of spreading our glorious truths with which God has blessed us. I had opportunities to lecture only eight times; but, by conversation with hundreds, more was done than by preaching many sermons; as this, next to printed matter, is the best way to wake up attention to a new subject. The greatest object I had in view, in traveling 2,500 miles, was to introduce our works into as many places as possible, so as to set the leaven at work. I gave, sold, and left for sale, 350 of "Hope for our Race;" 100 of Bro. Storrs' pamphlets, and many of the BIBLE EXAMINER, with about 3,500 of our tracts—over 4,000 in all. Besides being given to individuals, these works were put into some 400 tents, thus reaching at least 500 families.

I was much more encouraged at our Camp-meetings than in the two past years. Only one, in brief authority, ventured to forbid my giving out our works, and that was at the close of the Springfield meeting, and so was in vain. Many more took our works gladly, and more were willing to pay for them. New ones have embraced our views, and several preachers are preparing to proclaim them. We have learned, by experience, and by writers in the EXAMINER, that it takes cautious men (and all should be such) considerable time to become confirmed in our doctrines. Many seem to feel as if the theory was "too good" to be true; not seeing that nothing is too good for a loving Jesus to do, seeing he even died to redeem a lost race. We see we have need of patience to wait for results; but gratitude to God should prompt us to get the truth before the minds of all, so they may comprehend it in due time. This object has led me to run in debt, toil and make sacrifices as I have for five years past. I name not the persecutions leaders in reforms have to experience, as any part of my burden: for it is a "blessing" to have them, as Matt. v. 11-12 plainly informs us. They "cost me out" of the General Advent Society this year; but it cost me not a tear nor a groan. It will work for good to our cause in the end; as many good members opposed their action. Many need strongly faith in God's promises to the persecuted for truth's sake, and they would not shun reproach as much as is done.

And now, if I would ask each brother and sister who enjoy the light we are spreading, if they are glad to learn it is thus being spread and received? I believe they would say, "Yes," heartily. Well, I must remind such that it costs money, as well as time and toil to do such work. My traveling expenses this year were about $60. In all reforms of vital and general importance, (and we know ours is such), works must be given in traveling, or the work will languish, if not die out by opposition. I have felt it duty to give far the largest share of the works I have published, believing brethren would approbate and sustain me. Being forbidden to sell them at Camp meetings, for two years, increased the necessity of giving them. The times being hard, the past year, and the crash in money matters, have made donations to our cause few and mostly small. The 2,000 of the first edition of my work being gone, I revised and printed 1,300 more in July last: so added $275 to my debt, and have been able to pay but $85 on it. Owing $150 before, I am $400 in debt. A good brother, who paid $150 on my first edition, promised to pay half for second: but the times may frustrated His plans, as they have many. When I decided, last May, to publish another edition, my hope was, that by the liberal help of this brother, and an appeal to brethren for aid this fall I should be able to pay all up, and have 1,000 of my work to deal out the coming year. Whether my hopes will be realized or not, I leave with my Master, not regretting the course I have taken.

In view of my wants, I affectionately invite brethren to examine their feelings, and ask themselves, what the consolation is worth which they have obtained by new light on the future of themselves and of our race: then inquire if they do not owe a debt to God and those He has raised up and moved to give them this light and consolation? But two of us, Bro. Storrs and myself, have, as yet, in this country, ventured to publish largely to spread our precious truths. Shall we be supported, and enabled to go on with our work? I want to pursue the course this winter I did last, when I sent to new readers, by mail, 5,000 tracts with 1,500 BIBLE EXAMINERS. This work, and my traveling increase subscribers, and so helps support our paper. This must and will be sustained, as it grows more and more important to the cause of truth. If God has blessed any with means and hearts to help me in a time of temporal perplexity, they can send by mail, directing to Buffalo, N. Y., and it will be sure to reach me.

Buffalo, N. Y., Nov. 17, 1878.

BRO. STORRS: I shall continue my subscription to the EXAMINER, and recommend it to others. It stands on a broad foundation, as I behold it from my standpoint. Hold on, brother, when you find truth: for man is a progressive creature. It is but a few hundred years since the potato was cultivated for its flower, and the tomato hung up for an ornament. Now they are known as a dainty food. The leaven of truth is working. I do not expect to comprehend the whole truth in this dispensation. The ages to come (eternity is a vast field) will afford something to learn; perhaps we will find the dozen and one ideas may be compounded, with a little sifting, into one whole, whereby we being one shall see eye to eye in that glorious day of the Lord. Vast are the works of God: and vast are the plans by which they are produced. Why should man suppose he fully understands the mind and will of the Lord? It is enough to know the Saviour is our Saviour. The acme of knowledge is yet future to man.

THE BIBLE EXAMINER is a Monthly Magazine. Terms, $2 per year, in advance. When postage has to be prepaid, 12 cents must be added for that purpose.

Subscribers names should be written very plain. Do not neglect this. It is utterly impossible sometimes to decipher names, and mistakes must occur in consequence. As to their address, give us simply the name of the Post Office and State.

All communications to me should be addressed as follows:

GEO. STORRS,
Box 4,658, New York.

Any person wishing to see me personally should call at 72 Hicks street, Brooklyn, a very short distance from Fulton Ferry. Do not think it difficult to reach my residence. Hundreds come over from New York every Sunday to hear H. W. Beecher; and I reside within "a stone's throw" of his church. "Come and see."

GEO. W. YOUNG (Shipman & Sons), 25 Chambers street, near Centre, will receive money for the EXAMINER, that our friends wish to pay, personally, in New York City.

BOUND EXAMINERS.

Volumes 16 and 17 of the BIBLE EXAMINER, are now bound together in one, in stiff covers, i. e., in boards and cloth. The price for it will be $3.50; but as they will have to be sent by Express the purchaser must pay the Express charges when he receives it. Any person sending me five new subscribers for Vol. 18, with $10, shall have one copy of the bound one, as herein named. Those who wish to avail themselves of the two volumes bound in one should apply soon; as I cannot supply more than about 30 copies. Volumes 16 and 17 can still be had separately in strong flexible covers at $1.50 each.

VISIT TO PHILADELPHIA, PA.—The Editor of this Magazine spent two Sabbaths in the above named city during the month of December, and spoke to a good assembly, of most attentive listeners, five times during his stay. His reception by old friends and new ones was most gratifying. Six years had passed since he was last in the city, and great changes had taken place. His visit, he trusts, was blessed not to himself only but to many others; and much regret was expressed that he could not remain longer; also, a unanimous request by the congregation, the last evening, was made that he be invited to visit the city again at an early day.

During the week he visited the aged and venerable Dr. WILLARD, at his residence in Haddonfield, N. J., where, for the first time, he had a personal interview with his family, who are rejoicing together in the full belief that "Jesus Christ gave himself a ransom for all" men, "to be testified in due time."

THE BIBLE EXAMINER.—I will supply volume 17 in sheets (perfect sets) on the receipt of sixty cents. Also, odd numbers of that volume (or broken sets) for one cent for each two copies, which is simply to pay the postage. Who will scatter them?

I will still supply Nos. 1, 2, or 3, of the present volume, for ten cents per copy to any one who wishes to send a sample to a friend; or all three for 25 cents.

CORRESPONDENCE.

ELD. T. K. ALLEN, Winona, Minn., writes: I am much pleased with the BIBLE EXAMINER in its present form and dress; also, with its being issued monthly. I have taken it for the two years past in a newspaper form, and have read it with much interest and care, and can say, although I do not see everything it advocates, connected with the promise and oath of God to Abraham, yet it has my warm sympathy and prayers. Of the enclosed, $2 is to help you in publishing the glorious message that "Jesus gave himself a ransom for all, to be testified in due time," as you may think best.

L. VON ESCHEN, Bloomer, Wis., writes: I like the form of the EXAMINER, but much better its contents, and feel to thank God that I have ever been permitted to learn of His love. I have much that I would like to write. I would like to see you and talk with you; but I suppose that will never be till after Jesus comes. I hope and pray that God may bless you and direct you to do much good, and make you a partaker of all He has promised. I feel to thank God for the Christian's hope.

AMOS SANFORD, Esq., Columbus, Kansas, writes: The BIBLE EXAMINER, in its new form, is splendid. I like it and the doctrine it advocates better and better. I am obliged to cut off some of the many papers I have been taking, but I must "somehow and in some way" hold on to the BIBLE EXAMINER. Will help you with some funds as soon as I possibly can. Yours for the truth.

D. C. BLAKEMAN, Jessup, Iowa, writes: I am almost alone here, as concerning the faith; but the good Lord is with me, and I feel to bless His name for the light I have received in reading the EXAMINER. Your brother, looking for the great King.

THE FINAL SALVATION OF ALL MEN.

LIGHT CLAIMED.

BRO. STORRS: There seems to be but one point that troubles you in relation to the redemption of the race; and that is, the sin against the Holy Ghost. Will you allow me to give you a little light on that point? First: That language was spoken to the Jewish Sanhedrim only. When Jesus came up out of the water, the Holy Ghost descended from heaven in a bodily shape like a dove: and a voice came also, saying, "This is My beloved Son: hear ye him." They refused to hear him after having ocular demonstration as to who he was. It was the only time the Holy Spirit was ever seen in a bodily shape, and an audible voice heard from heaven directed to any people to hear God's Son. This they refused to do; and this was the sin against the Holy Spirit. No other people ever had a chance to commit that sin: and Paul wrote to the Hebrews about it, and to no one else.

Now mark: It was the Law Age yet; and to the Jew it was to-day: and the Gospel was not given to the Gentiles until the day of Pentecost; it is still the Gentile Age, or world. Blindness still rests on the Jew's world, and will till the Gentile world ends; then the Deliverer will come out of Sion, and turn away ungodliness from Jacob: for this is God's covenant unto them when He takes away their sins; and then all Israel will be saved: for God hath concluded all under sin that He may have mercy on all. O the depth of the riches, both of the wisdom and the knowledge of God. For of him and through him are all things: to whom be glory in all ages, Amen.

Geo. W. FOSTER.

Mt. Pleasant, Iowa.

RESPONSE BY THE EDITOR.

It becomes me, and all others, to be thankful for any honest attempt to give us "light" on the Scriptures of truth. I thank friend FOSTER for his work of love. Before replying, directly, a few mistakes in his statements must be corrected.

1. If there was a "bodily shape" of the Holy Spirit, there is no evidence in the record that the "Sanhedrim" saw it, or any other person except John the Baptist. The sight was given him as the proof of the Messiahship of the person to be manifested. Read John i. 29-33.

2. The voice which came from heaven, at that time, said, "This is my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased;" but did not say, "Hear ye him." This command was given "only" to Peter, James, and John, out of the cloud on the Mount of Transfiguration (Matt. xvii. 3, and Mark ix. 7). The command was not addressed to the Sanhedrim, as my friend supposes; no "ocular demonstration" was given to them at Jesus' baptism.

3. The discourse of Jesus in relation to the sin against the Holy Ghost does not appear to have been addressed to the "Jewish Sanhedrim" at all. It was a general discourse, though occasioned by some of the Scribes and Pharisees accusing Him of casting out demons by the prince of the demons; or, in other words, doing it in league with an evil power. There seems no more reason for confining that discourse to the Jews than any other of Jesus' instructions about sin. To my mind, it is clearly a lesson for all people wherever and whenever the Gospel should be preached "with the Holy Ghost sent down from heaven," whether in the Jewish age or any other of "the ages to come." To suppose otherwise, is to conclude that, "whatsoever things were written aforetime were" not "written for our learning" (Rom. xv. 4); and much of what is recorded of the teachings of inspiration is useless to us.

My friend's remarks were evidently designed to enlighten me to see that the ultimate end of all the human race is to be saved, as commonly understood by Universalists; and he seems to think, if he can succeed in confining the unpardonable sin to the "Jewish Sanhedrim," his object will be accomplished. Could he confine it there, universal salvation would not follow; for the persons composing that "Sanhedrim" would "never be forgiven" (Mark iii. 29).

Apparently, to ward off the force of the argument that some of the race will ultimately be hopelessly lost, my friend refers to the fact that the Epistle, which seems clearly to set forth that result, was written to the "Hebrews, and to no one else." Were the Hebrews, to whom Paul wrote that Epistle, a part of the "Jewish Sanhedrim?" Were they not "holy brethren, partakers of the heavenly calling?" (Heb. iii. 1.) And did he not exhort to "go on to perfection, . . . for, it is impossible for those who were once enlightened, and have tasted of the heavenly gift, and were made partakers of the Holy Ghost, and have tasted the good word of God, and the powers of the world to come, if they shall fall away, to renew them again unto repentance," etc.? (Heb. vi. 1-8.) And, furthermore, did not Paul say, "If we sin wilfully after that we have received the knowledge of the truth, there remaineth no more sacrifice for sins; but a certain fearful looking for of judgment and fiery indignation, which shall devour the adversaries?" (Heb. x. 26, 27.) Do all these testimonies relate to the Jews, and to them "only?" Are they not clearly addressed to all men who have professed faith in Christ, and who have been "made partakers of the Holy Ghost?" How, then, dare I tell men that "no other people ever had the chance to commit the sin" against the Holy Ghost? Those who do so must act on their own responsibility; I cannot share it with them.

That every son and daughter of Adam will have a fair and honest opportunity to gain an ultimate or final salvation into an endless life, I have no doubt. That view vindicates the character of God as honest, just, and good, to every soul of man to whom He has given life; and further, if any soul of Adam's race has, by unavoidable circumstances, been deprived of the opportunity to secure an endless existence, while in the present life, they have secured to them by the promise and oath of God such an opportunity in a future state. This view gives no license to carelessness or neglect in the use of means now granted us of knowing the "only true God and Jesus Christ;" and it recognizes man's responsibility to God for the use he makes of the means before him.

Till final salvation can be proved to be unconditional, I cannot accept the doctrine of what is called "Universalism." If man is a responsible being, possessed of freedom of will, then a liability to fail is inevitable. If he is not responsible, and a failure is impossible, then law seems a mockery, and grace is only an act of justice, which the CREATOR is bound to exercise; and man is but a machine, for the working of which the Creator alone is responsible; and all threatenings and promises are a mere pretence, the same as they would be to any other machine; and no blame or praise belongs to man in any event. Such a condition of things is fatalism; and "whatever is, is right;" and to call any thing sin is a misnomer; because sin is impossible, or the Creator is the only sinner.

But if the Bible is our guide, man is responsible, and is liable to fail, and the CREATOR asks, "Why will you die?" and says, with an oath, "As I live, I have no pleasure in the death of the wicked, but that the wicked turn from his way and live" (Ezek. xxxiii. 11). "But God is long-suffering, not willing that any should perish, but that all should come to repentance" (2 Pet. iii. 9); yet, "the day of perdition of ungodly men" will come (verse 7). But there can be no ungodly men if man is not responsible, and has not a free will; and the great and final sin for which men will ultimately perish, is a wilful rejection of the truth concerning "the only true God and Jesus Christ," confirmed by the Holy Ghost. Such sinners will never have "forgiveness, but are in danger of eternal condemnation" (Mark iii. 29). If there is no such condemnation, no man can be "in danger" of it; and it would be an absurdity to use such an expression.

As to the word "all," of its primary meaning there can be no doubt; and unless there are exceptions made, or the circumstances forbid it, it must have its unlimited sense; as when it is said, "Christ gave himself a ransom for all." There being no limitation, nor any circumstances limiting the application to "all men," it has its primary signification, and embraces the entire race; and this sense is confirmed by many other testimonies of the Scriptures. In a multitude of other cases it is necessarily limited to the mass, or multitudes; as when Paul says, "Death passed upon ALL men, for that all have sinned" (Rom. v. 12). Now, it may be a fact that the latter "all" has no limitation; but the first "all" has a limitation, or has exceptions, though none are expressed in this text. As a fact, however, we know Enoch and Elijah are exceptions, and that the saints who "are alive and remain unto the coming of the Lord," will also be exceptions; they will not die.

So when Paul says, "All Israel shall be saved," it is manifest he speaks of the mass, and not of every individual of Israel; for there are those of Israel (the "Jewish Sanhedrim," if you please,) who have sinned the "sin unto death" (1 John v. 16), even "blasphemy against the Holy Ghost," which "never hath forgiveness." The prophets, also, who "spake as they were moved by the Holy Ghost," have clearly spoken of exceptions of some of Israel who will not be forgiven. Please read Ezek. xx. 33-38, where it is clearly shown that there will be "rebels," at the final gathering, who will be "purged out from among" the mass, and "shall not enter into the land of Israel." Thus Paul's "all Israel shall be saved," has its exceptions; but the salvation of the mass of Israel is a certainty, both from the prophets and from the New Testament utterances. But, as I regard the matter, we have no authority to encourage any man that his final salvation is infallibly secured. He must and will have his trial; and a fair and impartial opportunity to secure an endless life; but he must secure it by an improvement of the means and opportunity granted him as a responsible creature, or utterly perish at last. For, "It shall come to pass that every soul which will not hear that Prophet," [the Christ; the "prophet like unto Moses"], "shall be (exolothreutheetai) utterly exterminated from among the people" (Acts iii. 23). No language can more strongly express a hopeless and final extirpation than this; and my friend FOSTER must admit that the "Jewish Sanhedrim" have committed the sin here spoken of, whether any other men "of the race" have done or will do it; hence, I cannot accept what he calls his "light;" and must still maintain that we have not authority to affirm that every individual of the human race will finally be saved. Let us rejoice that every one will have an opportunity to secure that result, and can only fail by a wilful rejection of the LIFE-GIVER when made known to them.

A QUESTION ON MATT. XXIV. 14

The Saviour said, "This Gospel of the Kingdom shall be preached in all the world for a witness unto all nations," etc. I would like to see an article from you on the testimony. What does it witness of, or testify to? What is the aim, object, or purpose of this testimony? Please tell us your understanding of the passage.

G. W. STETSON.

Edinboro, Pa.

It is not always possible to tell with certainty what the object of a command or testimony is. In this case it is said, the Gospel of the Kingdom of God should be preached in all the oikoumenee, —translated, world; but its real meaning is, the then Empire,—the Roman Empire. In this sense the word is used in Luke ii. 1, where it is said, "There went out a decree from Cæsar Augustus that all the world (oikoumenee) should be taxed."

The expression "all nations," is, in the original, all ethnei—heathen; which term in Scripture was used to signify any people not Jews, and in this case relates to all persons or communities in the Roman "Empire;" and not to those outside of it; though doubtless some outside did hear that proclamation. "For which signification of oikoumenee (says Dr. Bloomfield in his 'Notes, edited by Prof. Stuart,') there is valid authority." The testimony was "concerning the kingdom of God and those things relating to Jesus" as the "Anointed" King. See Acts xx. 25, and xxviii. 23, 31. The witness, then, was concerning a kingdom to be set up, next to follow the last of the four kingdoms represented in Daniel 2nd and 7th.

The next inquiry of friend STETSON is, "What is the aim, object, or purpose of this testimony?" It would be folly for me to attempt to explain fully what the "purpose" was; but though it was in part "to take out of the (ethnoos) Gentiles a people for His name" (Acts xv. 14), that does not seem to be all. The words of Jesus were spoken in answering the disciples' question concerning the destruction of the Temple and "the end of the (aiwos) age." They said, "Tell us, when shall these things be," etc. Jesus warns them to "take heed that no man deceive you;" and goes on to state certain things that would first occur, and concludes that part of His discourse in this language, "And this gospel of the kingdom shall be preached in all the Empire "for a witness unto all" men, not Jews only: "then shall the end" of the Jewish "age come," when "there shall not be left one stone upon another, that shall not be thrown down," and their age, or dispensation, shall end. Luke's record of the same discourse reads, "There shall be great distress in the land and wrath upon this people: and they shall fall by the edge of the sword, and shall be led away captive into all nations: and Jerusalem shall be trodden down by the Gentiles until the times of the Gentiles be fulfilled" (xxi. 23, 24).

Thus we see the destruction of the Temple and the overthrow of the Jewish nationality, was the "end" spoken of; and as this was one of the important prophecies uttered by Jesus to be fulfilled by the Roman Empire itself, before its fulfilment commenced it was an "object" to have the whole Empire filled with the knowledge that He who was to be King of the "Kingdom of God" had expressly foretold the destruction the Roman Empire would bring upon the Jews, their City and Temple; and this destruction came upon that people because they rejected and crucified their King; and Pilate had caused to be written on His cross, "THE KING OF THE JEWS," mortifying as the inscription was to the Jewish officials, who begged Pilate to alter it to, "He said I am king of the Jews." But Pilate persisted, and said, "What I have written I have written." Thus a high Roman officer bears testimony to the truth.

By preaching the Gospel of the kingdom in all the Empire, all these matters would come before the people, and would be a witness of the truth that the crucified One was yet to be King of nations as well as King of saints; and the overthrow of the nation of Jews, and the destruction of their City and Temple, in the manner described by Jesus, would prove a powerful and convincing proof that He is yet to rule the world, and establish the kingdom of God on earth. Such, at least, appears to have been one grand "object, or purpose" of preaching the Gospel of the kingdom in all the Roman Empire before the end of the Jewish age, which, in fact, did not end till the destruction of their Temple and of the service in that place; for we find that even the believers in Jesus, among the Jews, continued their offerings there, and were "all zealous of the law" (Acts xxi, 21); and this language about their attachment to the law and its ordinances, was used by James some twelve or fifteen years after the memorable council recorded Acts xv., and only a very few years before the destruction of the Temple, at which time that age (aitonos) ended, and with it all Jewish rites and ordinances among believers in Jesus and the Kingdom of God.

Jewish believers, themselves, now looked only for the return of Jesus from heaven, and the establishment of that kingdom of which He would be the King. They looked, too, for "the end" of that Empire (oikoumene) which would be superseded by the establishment of the Kingdom of God. In the meantime, believers in that event would continue to publish the glad tidings that a righteous government was to be set up on the earth, and to encourage each other to live in a state of preparation for it, and a constant "looking for" it; endeavoring to induce "all men, everywhere," to do the same, "because God hath appointed a day (or time) in the which He will judge (rule or govern) the world in righteousness by that Man whom He hath ordained (or anointed); whereof He hath given assurance unto all, in that He hath raised him from the dead" (Acts xvii. 30, 31).

The Jews and Romans together crucified God's anointed King. God defeated their united act by raising Him from the dead; thereby showing that His counsel would stand, and that He would yet "set His King upon His holy hill of Zion" (Psa. ii. 6); and the heathen (the nations) should be made subject to Him; and that the kings and rulers of the earth, who refused submission, would be "dashed in pieces like a potter's vessel" (verses 9, 10). The resurrection of this King from the dead was demonstration that God's purpose of the establishment of His kingdom on the earth could not be defeated. Eu.

AN UNAUTHORIZED DOCTRINE.

THE doctrine of eternal death, or of hopeless torments in a future life, without ever having given the person the means and opportunity to know "the only true God and Jesus Christ," is at war with the character and attributes of God, and is irreconcilable with what He has revealed of Himself and His regard for the race. Because—

1. It makes a man responsible for not improving means and opportunities which he never had, and of which he was deprived by unavoidable circumstances. Every human intellect, sufficiently developed to "discern what is right," cannot but condemn such an administration of government as unjust and an outrage. Suppose the CREATOR had determined that Adam should die if he eat of the tree of the knowledge of good and evil, but gave him no knowledge concerning the matter; and Adam, in his ignorance, had eaten of that tree: Could there have been any justice in arraigning and condemning him to death for the act? But says one, "The CREATOR cannot do wrong: whatever he does must be right." How do I know that except by His acts? How can any man know that He is just, if He does that which all sense of justice, implanted in us, cannot avoid regarding as an outrage and unreasonable? The claim of responsibility rests upon benefits conferred and the knowledge of them. If a man has no knowledge of benefits bestowed, how can he be expected to improve them? To make a man responsible for the use of a thousand dollars which you have placed in some bank for his benefit, but never gave him any information concerning it, and he knows nothing of it—Would that be just? There can be but one answer. To inflict pains or punishment upon him for non-improvement would show the worst form of injustice, and prove the author an unscrupulous tyrant. "Where there is no law, there is no transgression" (Rom. iv. 15). This must be true under all just government.

2. The theory under consideration is irreconcilable with what God has revealed of Himself. He has proclaimed a love for "THE WORLD" vaster than we can have any adequate conception of; so great that He gave His only begotten Son to humiliation, sorrow, and death, for their salvation, and to win them to His love and service. Will it be pretended, at the same time, He determined that vast multitudes should live and die without knowing anything of His love or the sacrifice He had made for their redemption? Is any such idea at all in harmony with the Divine veracity in the professions of His love? Ed.

THE TWO-FOLD UNION WITH CHRIST.

UNION with Christ is two-fold. First, Christ has united himself with the race, as such. Without this He could not have been our Kinsman, or have the right to redeem. But now "the head of every man is Christ" (1 Cor. xi. 3); and this union can never be dissolved except by a personal and wilful rejection of Him. This union is a pledge to "every man" that "the gospel" shall be "preached to every creature;" else it would be mockery for Christ to give "himself a ransom for all" (1 Tim. ii. 6), unless he was "to be testified in due time" (God's time) to all. Any other construction of this and similar language, it appears to me, makes God's great expenditure of the blood of his Son an inexplicable mystery. Why all his agony, sufferings and death for the untold millions whom God foreknew would never hear of him, nor have a chance to believe on his name? Why "taste death for every man," when only a few could ever have any benefit from His death? He was united to "every man" and is "the head of every man," till a wilful severance takes place after men have "received the knowledge of the truth" of God's love to them, and of Christ's death for them, "that they might have life, and have it more abundantly" (Heb. x. 20, and John x. 10); even an endless life. Men will have life—who have not wilfully rejected Christ after He has been proclaimed to them—and they may have "it more abundantly" by its being made eternal, if they improve God's offer, in his Son, when proclaimed to them.

To say no man can have a resurrection from the dead unless he has, in this present life, had a union with Christ's divine nature, or a spiritual union, or union by the Holy Spirit, is to leave all infants, dying in infancy, in eternal death; for a spiritual union can only be formed by faith, and faith cannot be exercised in one of whom we have never heard. Hence, all who take the ground that a future life can only be had by a spiritual union with Christ, must of necessity—when pressed on the subject—take the position that none can have salvation who die in infancy; and any position or argument that can bring such to life is equally good to give a life in the future to all others who have never committed the sin of rejecting the LIFE-GIVER.

"Non-Resurrectionists," as they are called, must meet this question. I have been burdened with it, in time past; but truth has delivered me from that load; for which I am thankful to our heavenly Father, and go on my way rejoicing that "GOD IS LOVE."

Those who now receive Christ, and form a spiritual union with Him, will rise from the dead immortal, and can not die any more. They are pre-eminently blessed; and shall live and reign with Christ on his throne, as He has overcome and set down with his Father on his throne. (Rev. iii. 21.) Ed.

SUICIDISM.

"I would like them to show some authority, first, for splitting the Abrahamic blessing at all, and secondly, for saying that the 'antecedent' is to have a great, big 'ALL,' and the 'consequent' but a little 'all,' measured and circumscribed by faith."

Such is the utterance of a contributor to the "Non-Resurrection" theology, and an opposer of my present views. I have been asked to respond to it. It is sufficient to say, it needs no response; for it is a mere attempt to separate what God has joined together; and should result only from a mind insensible to argument. A common laborer knows the difference between "antecedent" and "consequent" blessings; and knows that the sun, the soil, and the rain are

"antecedent" blessings given to "a great, big ALL;" and he knows, as well, that unless he improves upon these he will "consequently" have "but a little all," and that "measured and circumscribed by faith" in the improvement of the antecedent blessings.

If the aforesaid writer has logic and religion enough to see the point of his sneer, he will ultimately discover that it resolves itself into this:

"Christ gave himself a ransom for all,—tasted death for every man,—is the propitiation for the sins of the whole world" (1 Tim. ii. 6; Heb. ii. 9, and 1 John ii. 2); "a great, big ALL;" an "antecedent blessing."

"A little all" is an absurdity, because "measured and circumscribed by faith" in Christ!

Therefore: The "big ALL" will be saved, whether they believe or not.

Such an attempt Paul might characterize as "another Gospel." The idea that it is "a little all" who will be blessed with the "consequent blessing, measured and circumscribed by faith," is no part of the theory advocated in this Magazine. So far from it, I maintain "a great multitude, which no man can number," will have "washed their robes and made them white in the blood of the Lamb" (Rev. vii. 9-14), as the consequence of having improved antecedent blessings; and the "great, big ALL" might have done the same but for the lack of "FAITH," for which they will have no excuse, because they were blessed with all necessary means and opportunities, which were the "antecedent" blessings, or blessings without which faith was impossible. Ed.

AN INQUIRY.

Are you sure there is a single passage in the Bible, when speaking of the nations of the earth, that has any reference to the dead? Is there a single passage that intimates, even, that any class of the inhabitants of the earth will be made alive to enjoy a second probation? J. A.

RESPONSE BY THE EDITOR.

If we consult human philosophy we are perhaps not "sure" of anything. If God has promised to do a work which necessarily involves another work, though that other work is not named, yet it is as certain to take place as the one that is named. For example, God promised Abraham to give him all the land which he saw for an everlasting possession; yet He said nothing to him of a resurrection. Was a resurrection less certain because not mentioned? The everlasting possession of the land involved it. So the seed of the woman shall bruise the serpent's head, of which the promise and oath of God to Abraham was only a repetition and confirmation, involves the certain abolition of the death that came by Adam; and no man can be holden in that death except by a personal rejection of the Second Adam—the LIFE-GIVER, who "tasted death for every man." In this respect "Christ hath abolished death, and brought life and immortality to light" (2 Tim. i. 10). So that, "as by the offence of one, judgment came upon all men to condemnation; even so by the righteousness of one the free gift came upon all men unto justification of life" (Rom. v. 18). I repeat it—no man is held by necessity in the death by Adam. Christ is the LIFE-GIVER; and until a known and wilful rejection of him, none can be held in bondage to death. Death, as a penalty and finality, is for personal sin; and that sin is unbelief in God's promise relating to a Redeemer one who should come, or has come, to bless the race for whom He died, or was to die. That promise covers the whole of Adam's posterity, or we can have no assurance that it reaches any of us in particular.

As to a "second probation" for individuals, I know of no such, nor do I teach any such doctrine. No man is on probation for eternal life till such life is, in some manner, set before him, and the means pointed out by which he can secure it. The very idea of probation implies this. Such probation multitudes of the human family never have had; and if they die eternally without this knowledge, they die without ever having had a probation. God is pledged, in a thousand ways, to see that they are "blessed in Abraham and his seed" with a probation for the life he offers. To deny this, to me, would be to reproach their MAKER.

WE may safely conclude that the entrance of evil into the world can never permanently derange the purpose of God; the ultimate design he had in view in the creation of man, whatever that might be, will eventually be carried out. Evil, be that evil what it may, can do nothing which, if it seem good, God cannot undo. The Divine intentions, however accomplished, will finally be brought about with the least possible loss consistent with the honor of the Creator and the highest interests of the creature. Implicit faith in God can accept no theory which contradicts these conclusions.

THE STUDY OF THE BIBLE.

BY HENRY DUNN.

CHAPTER IX.

On Distinguishing Between Scripture Facts and Human Inferences.

"The bigot theologian has an art,—
A kind of hellish charm, that makes the lips
Of truth speak falsehood; to his liking turns
The meaning of his text; makes trifles seem
The marrow of salvation, and to a word,
A sect, a sound, gives value infinite."

POLLOCK.

Thus far we have treated the Bible simply as a Book, and altogether irrespective of the particular teaching it is supposed to contain. We now proceed to deal with impediments to its comprehension which spring up in our path after we have fully recognized the authority of the revelation, and are prepared to study Scripture as a Divine repository of Truth, intended for our practical guidance and spiritual advancement.

The first to which we would draw attention is that which arises from the confusion engendered by mixing together facts and inferences.

We are quite aware that an illustration or two will be needful to render the distinction we are drawing intelligible to ordinary readers; for popular attention has not been much directed to this point. Few are probably aware of the extent to which, in the exposition of Scripture, facts and inferences are blended; or how frequently, by this process, that which is merely human is, by theologians, placed on a level with that which is Divine. Few remember, that while theology is "the science of inferences," the Bible is merely a revelation of facts.

But it is necessary, before proceeding further, to explain what we mean by a Scripture fact. And perhaps we cannot do better than by calling attention to the following passage, which occurs in Robert Hall's well-known sermon on "the glory of God in concealing a matter."

These are his words,—"The revelation contained in the Scriptures extends only to FACTS; not to the theory of these facts, or their original causes. The most important truths are communicated in a dogmatic, not a theoretic manner. We are taught, on the testimony of Him who cannot lie, innulated facts, which we cannot connect with those reasons with which they are undoubtedly connected in the Divine mind. They rest solely on the basis of Divine authority; and we are left as much in the dark with respect to the mode of their existence as if they were not revealed."

A SCRIPTURE FACT, then, is to us a revealed truth, dogmatically communicated; resting solely on the basis of the Divine authority; and viewed apart from any reasons for its proclamation or any deductions which may be drawn from it. And this, be it observed, whether that which is revealed be an event, or whether it be what is usually termed a doctrine.

By an INFERENCE we simply understand a deduction from some revealed truth. Such deduction may be right or may be wrong; for it is, at best, but the result of a process carried on by a finite mind, dealing with that which has relations to the Infinite.

The following examples will show what we mean:

(1.) "Jesus looked round about, and saith unto his disciples, how hardly shall they that have riches enter into the kingdom of God!" (Mark x. 23); using the term "riches" apparently in a very extended sense, and applying it, probably, to all who, having full barns and provisions laid up for many days, were likely to forget their dependence on Him from whom they received their daily bread. This saying of our Lord's we call the DIVINE FACT.

The apostles, "astonished out of measure, said among themselves, Who then can be saved?" or, How few will be saved! That was the INFERENCE they drew; and it seemed to them a necessary, nay, an unavoidable one.

The Lord practically replies, Your finite minds are not capable of dealing with matters which have relation to the future world, when he adds, "With men (or, according to the deductions of human reason from my words) it"—an extended salvation—"is impossible, but not with God: for with God all things are possible" (ver. 27).

(2.) Jesus, according to the narrative of the evangelist (Matt. xxviii. 19), meeting the eleven on a mountain in Galilee soon after His resurrection, spake unto them, saying, "All power is given unto me in heaven and in earth. Go ye therefore, and teach all nations, baptizing them in (or into) the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost." This is the Scriptural Fact; and since "all nations" meant the Gentiles (for their work among the Jews had for some time been going on), whosoever goes to heathen lands, or among any people where "the Father" is not known, as revealed in "the Son," and ever present by "the Holy Ghost," and there teaches and baptizes his converts, obeys the injunction. He baptizes them into the belief of the one God, revealed as Father, Son, and Holy Ghost; just as John baptized the Jew into the belief that Messiah was at hand; and as the apostles baptized both Jews and Gentiles into the belief in a triune Jehovah.

THE INFERENCE, now all but universally drawn from this fact, is, that therefore baptism is to be administered, either to infants, the children of Christian parents, who come into the world under the relationship in question (for, says the apostle, "now," i. e., by their birth, "are they holy;" meaning by the term, they are no longer in the condition of the heathen, 1 Cor. vii. 14); or to adults, on their profession of a supposed renewal of heart, indicated in a special quickening of the spiritual life, by virtue of which they claim to be recognized in a new capacity, that of living members of the living Head; the theory being that, until this change takes place, men, however virtuous, and however firmly believing in Divine revelation, are not, in the sight of God, Christians.

Now it is simply because the views of each party in the controversy between Baptists and Prebaptists rest merely on an inference, neither being able to furnish a single scriptural example in point, that division in relation to it has become permanent, and reconciliation hopeless.

[We say "in point," because the case of the three thousand at Pentecost—of Cornelius—of the jailer—of the Ethiopian eunuch, are not so; all these being instances of baptism on conversion either from Judaism or heathenism. What we want, in order to settle the controversy, is an instance of the baptism, either as child or adult, of any person born of Christian parents. As the sacred records stretch through two generations, during which thousands of children must have been born and brought up in Christianity, it is, to say the least of it, singular, on the supposition that the rite was, in their case, essential to membership, and introductory to the communion of the Lord's Supper, that not a single reference to its administration, either to child or adult, is to be found in the New Testament. Baptism, as administered in the Apostolic Age, was such a public profession of Christianity as involved liability to persecution for Christ's sake. It is so in India still. It is so amongst the Jews everywhere. A man unbaptized may be a Christian by conviction without suffering loss, so long as he does not make a public profession of it by baptism. Hence it is said, "He that believeth, and is baptized, shall be saved." From some letters of the late Mr. Jay, of Bath, it appears that John Foster, the Essayist, although until his death a Baptist minister, took somewhat similar views to those we have stated. His most intimate friend (Mr. Hughes, of the Bible Society), says Foster never dispensed the ordinance of baptism, or attended the ministration of it.]

Who does not see that, if the question is made to rest entirely on Scripture, it is quite possible that both parties may be wrong; since, for any thing that appears to the contrary, baptism might be intended to have relation only to persons, whether Jews or heathen, entering into the Christian Church, and so first recognizing, by a public act, with all its attendant risks, their belief in God as their Father, revealed in Christ, and ever present by the Holy Spirit? That such a profession carried with it, as a matter of course, the baptism both of slaves and children, we do not for a moment doubt, since the household was then subjected to the head of it, and would be immediately brought under Christian instruction.

Surely, in a controversy carried on under such conditions, forbearance is a primary duty, and candor in judging others an imperative obligation. Far be it from us to imagine that God is displeased, either when parents dedicate their children, or adults themselves, to Him and to His Church by baptism with water; but surely it is highly offensive to Him for brethren in Christ to question each other's honesty, when conclusions adverse to their own, in relation to any such obligation, are arrived at.

(8.) St. Peter teaches most distinctly that Christ "hath once suffered for sins, the just for the unjust, that He might bring us to God" (1 Pet. iii. 18); that "His own self bare our sins in His own body on the tree;" that "by his stripes we are healed" (1 Pet. ii. 24); while St. Paul with, equal distinctness, asserts that Christ "redeemed us from the curse of the law, being made a curse for us" (Gal. iii. 13); the author of the Epistle to the Hebrews, that "without shedding of blood there is no remission" (ix. 22); and our Lord himself, that "the Son of man came to give His life a ransom for many" (Matt. xx. 28).

These are the great revealed FACTS on which the doctrine of the atonement rests; and happy is he who, receiving them in the spirit of a little child, believes and lives.

The INFERENCES ordinarily deduced are various and commonly relate rather to the philosophy of the Atonement, than to the fact of its having been made.

They are such as these:

(i.) God could not, in accordance with His justice, have accomplished the salvation of man in any other way.

(ii.) Christ propitiated God's wrath by His blood.

(iii.) Christ was punished in order that Law might be satisfied, and so God be free to pardon, —and such like.

Now it is quite clear that these, and all similar inferences, whether right or wrong, are of little value compared with the fact to which they refer; since a man may honestly hold all that Scripture reveals as to "the necessity" of the sacrifice of Christ for the salvation of mankind,—all that is really included in such terms as "propitiation," "oblation," "satisfaction," and "sacrifice" (so far as Scripture informs us what these terms include), without feeling himself at liberty to accept any one of the conclusions we have enumerated. Why, then, should I call my brother an unbeliever, if he is unwilling to admit the inferences I, perchance, may feel obliged to draw? Why should I separate from him as heretical?

True it is that many, when first awakened to a sense of the evil of sin, and to an apprehension of its penal consequences, can find peace only in such a contemplation of the cross of Christ as is involved in the thought that He, as the substitute for the sinner, literally bore the penalty of our transgressions. But this is rather the result of particular teaching than the impression naturally left by Scripture. And if it be equally true, as it unquestionably is, that there are others who habitually dwell much more on the sad fact of their natural alienation from God, than on their exposure to His condemnation; who contemplate far more frequently the holiness and love of their heavenly Father than his justice or his threatenings; and who, therefore, only see in Calvary a transcendent mystery, before which they bow with awe, who shall justify us in concluding that to such the Cross is of none effect? God forbid that we should consent, for a moment, to stake the great verity of man's redemption on any particular mode of explaining either the principle on which it rests, or the process by which it is accomplished.

(4.) Christ explicitly declares, in the Gospel, that He has a Church given him of God, for whom, exclusive of the world, he on one occasion prays (John xvii.); and St. Paul speaks distinctly of such persons as "elect," and "chosen in Christ before the foundation of the world" (Eph. i. 3-5). These are SCRIPTURE FACTS; and to deny them is to fly in the face of the clearest revelation.

The INFERENCES deduced by some is, that God has "foreordained the rest to dishonor and wrath, to be for their sin inflicted, to the praise of the glory of His justice." (Assemb. Catech., Q. 13). By others, holding different views regarding human freedom, the conclusion is, that although "all" are called, in a sense which leaves them without excuse for not coming to Christ, only "the elect," or, as some would put it, "few," will be saved; since, however free the human will, the resistance of the depraved heart is never overcome except by special grace. In either case the inference, being purely human, is of small value; for who can tell whether both may not be altogether erroneous, and experience prove that the doctrine of Election perfectly harmonizes with a much more extended salvation? The truth is, that nothing short of a new revelation could substantiate half the conclusions of theologians.

But let us not be mistaken here. We are not denying the propriety of drawing inferences at all,—for the process is a mental necessity; reason itself must depart before we shall cease to deduce one truth from another. Neither are we seeking to support the extravagance of those who will not admit any doctrine to be scriptural which is not expressed in Scripture language; for every one knows that a mere string of texts may be made to prove almost anything. We are simply urging the importance of separating the fact, whatever it may be, from the inference ordinarily deduced therefrom; and so of escaping the folly involved in giving to the one an authority which belongs only to the other. The one (the Scriptural fact), we hold to be Divine, and, therefore, authoritative; the other (the inference), however probable, is but human, and has, therefore, no right to lay claim to anything beyond probability. The inference may be more or less reasonable, and, therefore, more or less likely to be true; but it can never justly be urged upon any man's conscience as "necessary to be believed."

The opposite supposition forms the basis on which all the creeds, formulas, and confessions of christendom build their high pretensions. The Church of England and the Church of Scotland, and we believe all the Continental churches, alike hold that the articles of faith, which are to be regarded as "requisite or necessary to salvation," are not only "what is read in Holy Scripture," but "what may be proved thereby." The Church of England, therefore, binds her ministers to declare that the three creeds, "the Nicene, the Athanasian, and that which is commonly called the Apostles' Creed, ought thoroughly to be received and believed" (Art. vi. and viii.); while the Church of Scotland, the Free Church, and the Presbyterians generally, impose a Confession of Faith, the length, and breadth, and assumptions of which are perfectly astounding. The reason given for the imposition is the same in all cases, because "they may be proved by most certain warrants of Holy Scripture."

We are, of course, writing only for Protestants, who hold, or profess to hold, in utter abhorrence the Romish notion that a Bible, even at the best, is but "a vulgar and imperfect vehicle of truth; that doctrine is treasured up far more sacredly in the bosom of the priest, and far more safely dispensed by oral communication; that tradition must explain the New Testament, or that creeds possess an authority independent of the Scriptures." And it is with this protest fully in view, that we lay it down as a cardinal rule in the study of the Bible, that Scripture facts, and inferences deduced therefrom, are never to be confounded; that Christian verities must always be carefully separated from theological propositions; that no human deduction from Scripture, however venerable by age, or however honored by the support of great names, is ever to be insisted upon as if it were a matter of Divine Revelation; that Scripture truth, and human expositions of it, are on no account to be placed on the same level; that the doctrines of God's Word must always be distinguished by the broadest line of demarcation, from the commandments of men, however wise or good such commandments may be.

It was the neglect of this great principle which led to the formation of that vast system of logical theology which, like Romanism, has survived the wreck of empires, only to form the greatest of all obstacles to the union and peace of the Church of Christ; and to become a chief cause of the infidelity which now so frequently finds a home in the minds of speculative men.

To class our human interpretations of religious truth, our inferences from it, or our formulas in expressing it, with the great Revealed Facts on which such truth alone rests, is to sap the foundation of all intelligent belief, and to betray the Gospel with a kiss. It is so, because it confounds the essential with the unessential; makes both doubtful; and so destroys all hope of attaining to certainty in religious truth.

CHAPTER X.

On Bias, as Occasioned by Undue Reverence for Great or Good Men.

By the Bias of REVERENCE, we mean that which arises from an exaggerated regard for the many great men who have preceded us in the search for truth, and whose conclusions have been received for ages as authoritative. These conclusions, in relation to Scripture, are, for the most part, embodied in the expositions of the Fathers, the Reformers, or the Puritans; they are presented to us in every variety of shape in standard commentaries and other religious writings; they are enforced, in one form or other, Sunday after Sunday, in the pulpits of almost every religious denomination.

An influence of this character is, from its very nature, all but overwhelming; for it is wielded by men who have every claim on our sympathy and respect, and it presses upon us, like the atmosphere, from infancy to age, without disturbing our equanimity. To modest and humble inquirers, who distrust their own ability to judge, and long for guidance, it is commonly irresistible; since submission to the decisions of others is by such always regarded as essential to piety. It is supported from within by delusions which have long separated lay responsibility from those of the ministry; it is buttressed from without by indolence and carelessness; it is defended by the pretext that independent research might lead on the one hand to painful doubt, or on the other to irregular zeal. Priestcraft, wherever it exists, always encourages a state of mind favorable to the influence of authority; for its pretensions suppose that the people may advantageously be kept in a state of perpetual dependence.

To get rid of this bondage it is only necessary to trace it to its source. The moment we begin to do so our chains fall; for it then appears that with the same devotion with which we follow our pious forefathers, they in turn followed theirs; that the Puritans were really but the pupils of the Reformers; that the Reformers, while rejecting much that had been said and done by the Fathers, bowed with the most surprising humility before the theological opinions of Augustine; and that Augustine, with all his genius and piety, was so far from being a safe guide, that he notoriously supported nearly every superstition of his time.

Having thus reduced, as we fairly may, theological past—so far, at least, as it affects evangelical churches—to the authority of a single great mind, we must deal with Augustine precisely as Lord Bacon dealt with Aristotle; we must subject him to facts. In doing this, we shall quickly find that we have the same errors to encounter in theology that Lord Bacon had in philosophy, and that the remedy for the one is the only remedy for the other.

The errors in question are of two classes,—first, those which belong to THE RELIGIOUS, which almost always sum themselves up in the declaration that all that can be known of Scripture is known; that nothing now remains to be discovered; and that since whatever is new cau-not be true, independent inquiry is useless. The second belong to THE SCEPTICAL, who, proceeding to the other extreme, are ever proclaiming, in spite of abundant evidence to the contrary, that the little we think we know is untrustworthy; that the world is really in darkness both as to its past and its future; and that little or nothing worthy of a rational man's confidence can, by any possibility, be made out of the Bible.

The remedy, in each case, may find its expression (merely substituting Scripture for Nature) in the very words which Lord Bacon uses in reference to philosophy. "Man," he says, "the servant and interpreter, can only understand and act aright in proportion as he observes or contemplates God's order; more he can neither know nor do." His favorite phrase is, "We must be content simply to stand before Nature and ask questions." In like manner, the Christian must stand before Scriptures, and feel that he can do little more than observe and carefully note its facts. Whoever faithfully follows out such a method will soon find, in the words of the great father of modern philosophy, "how wide is the difference between the idols of the human mind and the ideas of the Divine mind."

But to do this it is absolutely necessary, first, to free ourselves from the vassalage of great names, then to fear God and take courage. Our progress, when thus left alone to work out truth, may be slow, but it is a comfort to be assured that it is certain of ultimate triumph. Yet not without difficulty. Whoever enters upon this course must lay his account with the endurance of no small share of obloquy; he must be content to suffer for follies and pretensions not his own; he must be willing to endure the very natural remonstrances of those who have spent their lives "in reducing theology to order;" and he must be prepared to meet the suspicion which inevitably falls upon every man who is bold enough to disregard the force of prevailing prejudices.

We do not, of course, pretend that any one can now read the Bible as if it had dropt but yesterday from the clouds; nor do we think it desirable that he should do so, even were it practicable. We are not among those who despise the opinions of the wise and good, either of our own or of past times. We rate the laborious researches of many of our commentators, both ancient and modern, at a value above all price. So far as these laborers have tended to promote purity in the text, or thrown light on any matter calculated to render that text better understood, no gratitude can be too deep to be awarded to them. It is with their inferences alone we quarrel; and above all, with the dogmatism which would force these inferences on mankind, as if they had a right to stand side by side with Inspired Truth.

It is the opinion of many, that a new and far more extensive reformation than that which was accomplished in the sixteenth century is at hand. If it be so, the best preparation we can make for its approach will be found in the extension to Truth of that deeper sense of responsibility which has of late years come over us in relation to Life; in a growing conviction that he who is "of the truth" only rightly hears Christ's voice; and by a corresponding assurance that truth cannot be reached by any process short of a laborious, self-denying, and independent search for it, in the spirit of the martyr, and under the purifying influence of the Holiest in the heart.

CHAPTER XI.

On Bias, as Arising from the Affections.

By the Bias of AFFECTION we understand that impulse in any given direction which the mind has received, either from early education and training, or from associations connected with the first steps of the spiritual life.

We by no means regard such bias as in itself an evil. We are far from denying that truth is, to all of us, a prejudice before it is a personal conviction. We think with children it ought to be so. But only during childhood. The passive must in due time be exchanged for the active, and the objective form must become a subjective reality, or that which has been received, however humbly, will not prove of much service in the struggle of life, or be found to stand firm when exposed to the pressure of temptation or doubt. This is emphatically true of Scripture, which must be "inwardly digested," as well as read, before it can come to be a part of ourselves, or, like food, strengthen and sustain us.

At this stage it is that the Bias of Affection often operates unfavorably. It seems to many of us such a great sacrilege to cast aside anything that has been sown in our hearts by the bedside of infancy, and watered by the tears of those whom we can never again behold on earth, that we naturally shrink from undertaking any investigation which we foresee may perhaps lead to the breaking up of associations so inexpressibly precious to us. And yet, as we all admit, it must frequently be done before truth can become a reality, or faith in God a living power. It is in such cases that we are made to feel the force of the declaration, "he that loveth father or mother more than Me is not worthy of Me."

Care, however, must always be taken to avoid the influence of mere reaction. Many a man who has been religiously,—perhaps we should rather say strictly brought up,—when he becomes free from parental or other control, flies to an opposite extreme of theological opinion, sometimes for no better reason than because it is opposite. He has seen, it may be, weakness and inconsistency associated with certain professions,—perhaps even dominant selfishness or flagrant hypocrisy,—and so he flings himself off to the greatest possible distance from all his early associations, and thinks that in so doing he is acting wisely and honestly. But this by no means follows. He may be doing the very reverse. He is certainly guilty of folly, and probably of sin, in forsaking the faith of his fathers, if he has no better reason for doing so than a vain desire to manifest independence of thought, or mere disgust at what he may consider vulgarity or insincerity in some of those who belong to it. Principles are not to be so dealt with. Right and wrong, truth and error, are not questions of taste, or interest, or conventional convenience, but solemn realities, on faithfulness to which character both for time and eternity frequently depends. In avoiding Scylla, therefore, in this matter, let us beware of Charybdis.

But early instruction is by no means the only form in which human affection is apt to bias the views we take of Divine Truth. "A man," says a recent writer, "may have been converted from a sinful life by hearing an Evangelical preacher, or by intercourse with an Anglo-Catholic priest. He is filled with gratitude and enthusiasm, and is eager to communicate to others the blessing he has received. He attributes his conversion to the particular phase of revealed truth which was brought before his own mind,—whether it be a strong feeling of the heinousness of sin, and the doctrine of salvation through the Atonement, or whether it be union with Christ through the blessing of the sacraments and the Church. Believing himself to be saved by the influence of these doctrines, he naturally dwells on them almost exclusively, sees them everywhere in the Bible, is blind comparatively to other portions. Hence his bias in interpreting the document which gives him a title to the kingdom of heaven." "This," says he, "I am persuaded, is one principal cause why very earnest men take such different views of the interpretation of God's word,—pure gratitude for salvation received."* Add to this, affection for the individual by and through whom the Gospel has been imparted, and love for the religious community with which the new convert has been brought into connection,—involving, as it almost invariably does, participation in its prejudices and party spirit,—and we shall then perhaps be able to perceive the vastness of the hindrance thus cast in the way of candid inquiry.

* "Idealism Considered," by Rev. Wm. Gresley.

But is there no remedy for this? We think there is,—in the recollection that in all matters of truth and duty the human must bow before the Divine; that God uses all kinds of instrumentality, from the Romish priest to the city missionary, and every shade of doctrine, from the highest Calvinism to the lowest Armenianism, to bring sinners to himself; and that therefore no authority whatever in favor of any particular agency or doctrine can properly be drawn from the mere fact that God has made use of it for the conversion or spiritual awakening of the children of men.

Agencies and particular doctrines—regarded as forms of thought, and separated, as such things easily may be, from that which is "Spirit and Life,"—are at best but instruments through which attention is arrested, thought excited, and reflection deepened.

TRUTH, as the pabulum of the soul, and GRACE as the gift of God to sinful man, are above them all.

GOD'S BLESSING TO ABRAHAM.

THE SEED.

THE blessing the nations is the object of the promise. The seed are the means by which to accomplish that object. The work of the seed is to bless the nations.

WHO ARE THE SEED?

1. Christ is the Seed. "The book of the generation of Jesus Christ, the Son of David, the Son of Abraham" (Matt. i. 1). The Son of David is also the Son of Abraham. "And the angel said unto Mary, Thou shalt bring forth a Son, and shalt call his name Jesus. He shall be great and shall be called the Son of the Highest, and the Lord God shall give unto him the throne of his father David" (Luke i. 30-33). "For he took not on himself the nature of angels, but he took on him the seed of Abraham" (Heb. ii. 16). "Now to Abraham and his seed were the promises made. He saith not, And to seeds, as of many; but as of one, And to thy Seed, which is Christ" (Gal. iii. 16).

Christ then is the seed. His name represents all the means by which the nations will be blessed. As the vine represents the branches, or as the head the body, or as the king the government.

2. Those who are Christ's are also the seed. "If children, then heirs; heirs of God and joint-heirs with Christ" (Rom. viii. 17). "I am the vine, ye are the branches" (John xv. 5). "Now ye are the body of Christ" (1 Cor. xii. 27). "And if ye be Christ's then are ye Abraham's seed and heirs according to the promise" (Gal. iii. 29). "The children of the promise are counted for the seed" (Rom. viii. 9).

The joint-heirs with Christ. The branches of the vine which is Christ. The body of Christ, and those that are the seed of Abraham, because they are Christ's will share whatever inheritance Christ receives, and whatever position he occupies. The children of the promise are those that believe the promise.

To him that overcometh will Christ grant to sit with him on his throne. If Christ reigns they will reign. Whatever He does they will do. Then Christ and those that are Christ's are the seed. They will bless the nations.

THE QUALIFICATION OF THE SEED.

If the seed are to bless the nations, they must be qualified for such a work.

1. Christ's moral character. He loved the Father so that he always did those things that pleased him. He loved the work his Father gave him to do. He loved the world with a love stronger than that of life. He was faithful to his appointed work. He did no sin, neither was guile found in his mouth. He went about doing good. He endured the contradiction of sinners. He was tempted in all points like as we are, yet without sin. He can therefore be touched with the feeling of our infirmity, and succor them also that are tempted. He blessed though He was rejected and cursed. He was true to His purpose, although it cost him his life for the life of the world. Thus, He was competently qualified morally to bless the nations.

2. Christ's physical character. Of himself he said, "I am he that liveth and was dead, and behold I am alive for ever more." He was raised from the dead so that he can die no more. He now ever liveth. He now has life in himself. He lives by the power of an endless life.

Thus He is qualified physically to bless the nations perpetually.

3. The work to which the seed will be appointed. The seed was to bless the nations. He was to possess the gate of his enemies. He was to sit on David's throne. God appointed unto him a kingdom. The government was to rest upon his shoulders. He was to have authority to execute judgment. All power in heaven and earth was to be given unto him.

Thus, by appointment the seed will be qualified to bless the nations, and thus Christ will be perfectly qualified, morally and physically, and by the appointment of the Father, to bless all people, nations and languages, as God spake to Abraham.

THOSE THAT ARE CHRIST'S.

1. Their moral character. They were enemies in their minds by wicked works, but now they have become reconciled to God. They have believed the Gospel. They have repented of their sins. They have confessed their sins to him who is just and faithful to forgive them their sins and cleanse them from all unrighteousness. They have become members of Christ's body, by being baptized into his name. They have denied themselves of ungodliness and worldly lusts, and have lived soberly and righteously and godly in this present world, looking for that blessed hope. They have made God's purpose their purpose; God's plan their plan. They have loved the things which God loved, and hated the things which God hates. They have been faithful in little. They have been blessings wherever they have lived. They have borne the fruits of the Spirit. They have endured temptations. They have overcome that wicked one. They have purified themselves even as Christ is pure. They were Christ's, and thus they become the seed of Abraham and heirs to his promise.

Those that are Christ's, then, are qualified in their moral character to be joined with Christ in his work of blessing the world.

2. Their physical character. They will be raised from the dead. They that are found worthy to obtain that world will be raised from the dead so that they can die no more. In the world to come they will receive everlasting life. At the last trump the righteous living will be changed, the worthy dead will be raised. They will put on immortality. Their vile bodies will be fashioned like unto Christ's glorious body. They will bear the image of the heavenly.

Thus, those that are Christ's will be qualified physically to be joined with him in his work of blessing.

3. Their appointment. As the Father appointed unto the Son a kingdom, so Christ will appoint unto them a kingdom. He assured them that it was their Father's good pleasure to give them the kingdom. Christ appointed them to sit with him on his throne, and to have power over the nations. Thus, those that are Christ's, are qualified by appointment to share with Christ the Rulership in the Kingdom which is to bless all nations.

Thus it is, that the seed of Abraham, Christ and those that are Christ's, will be perfectly qualified in their moral character, and in their physical nature, and by the appointment of God, to bless, in the highest sense of blessing, all the nations of the earth, as God promised to Abraham.

THE SEED HAVE NOT YET BLESSED THE NATIONS.

Christ, at his first advent, was despised and rejected of men. He came unto his own, but his own received him not. He blessed, but was in return himself cursed. He went about doing good, but was accused of the worst of crimes. He was arrested, tried, condemned, and crucified. He did not bless his own nation, but it became cursed. He occupied no position in which he could bless the nation.

They that are Christ's, have been as sheep in the midst of wolves. They have been hated of all nations for Christ's sake. They have been accused before kings and governors, and condemned to death. They have not blessed the nations. They have never occupied a position in which they could bless the nations.

WHEN WILL THE SEED BLESS THE NATIONS ?

They will bless the nations when they inherit the promise that they shall bless the nations. But they are now only heirs to that promise. Christ has gone into heaven to receive for himself a kingdom and to return. But he has not yet returned. Those that are Christ's have died, not having received the things promised. They are asleep in Jesus. But when Christ does return, having received the Kingdom, he will raise the dead that are found worthy to obtain the Kingdom, and change the righteous living, and give them a position in which they can bless the nations. Then the seed will bless the nations.

HOW THE SEED WILL BLESS THE NATIONS.

The Seed will bless the nations by ruling over them.

1. Christ, the Seed, will occupy the throne of his father David.

If the seed are to bless the nations, they must occupy a position in which they can bless the nations. The position of rulership is perfectly adapted to such an end.

"I have made a covenant with my chosen. I have sworn unto David my servant, Thy seed will I establish forever, and build up thy throne to all generations" (Psa. lxxxix. 8, 4). Rulership is here promised to the seed. "For unto us a child is born, unto us a son is given, and the government shall be upon his shoulders: of the increase of his government and peace there shall be no end upon the throne of David" (Isa. ix. 6, 7). This is another promise of rulership. "The angel said to Mary, Thou shalt bring forth a son, and shalt call him Jesus. And the Lord God shall give unto him the throne of his father David" (Luke i. 30-33). Mary said this promise was in remembrance of God's mercy, as he spake to our father Abraham, and to his seed for ever. Zachariah said, "that God had raised up a horn of salvation for us in the house of his servant David, to perform the mercy promised to our fathers, and to remember his holy covenant, the oath which he swore to our father Abraham." And Peter testifies that "David being a prophet, and knowing that God had sworn with an oath to him, that of the fruit of his loins, he would raise up Christ to sit on his throne, spake of the resurrection of Christ, for this very purpose to sit on his throne. Pilate said unto Jesus, "Art thou a king then ? Jesus answered, To this end I was born."

Thus, we have the testimony of David, of Isaiah, of the angel who spake to Mary, of Mary, of Zachariah, of Peter, and of Christ, all testifying that Christ, the seed of Abraham, shall sit upon the throne of David. The birth of Christ, his life, his death, and his resurrection from the dead, were all for this end, that he might occupy the throne of David. This is the position which is to be given to the seed of Abraham, that they may bless the nations.

THE DOMINION OF THE SEED.

The seed shall bless the nations. Then they must have dominion over the nations. He shall have dominion from sea to sea, and from the river to the ends of the earth. He shall have the heathen for his inheritance, and the uttermost parts of the earth for his possession. He shall have the dominion, and the glory, and the kingdom, where all people, nations, and languages dwell. He will be King over all the earth. He will inherit the promise, which made Abraham the heir of the world.

The position, then, that will be given to the seed, will be the rulership of the world. In such a position the seed can bless all the nations of the earth.

JOINT-HEIRS WITH CHRIST.

2. Those who are Christ's will share with him this rulership.

They are the stones in the same building of which Jesus Christ is the "chief corner stone." They are the branches of which Christ is the vine. They are the member of the body of which Christ is the head. They are heirs of God, and joint-heirs with Christ. If they suffer with him they will also reign with him. As Christ receives a kingdom from his Father, so they will receive a kingdom from him. Christ will share the same kingdom that he receives from his Father with his saints. They that overcome will sit down with Christ in his throne, and also have power over the nations. They that have been redeemed by the blood of Christ out of every kindred, and tongue, and people, and nation, will be made kings and priests unto God, and they will reign on the earth, over all nations. They that are found worthy to obtain that world, will be raised from the dead so that they can die no more, and to them will be given the Kingdom and dominion, and the greatness of the Kingdom under the whole heavens. They will be complete in Christ, which is the head of all principality and power.

If Christ inherits the Kingdom, they will inherit it. If Christ is King, they will be kings. If Christ is a priest, they will be priests. If judgment is committed to Christ, it will be committed to the saints. If Christ will execute judgment in the earth, the saints also will execute the judgments written. If Christ judges the world, the saints also will judge the world. Thus it is that Christ, and those that are Christ's, are perfectly joined together in their position and work.

They are the seed of Abraham, and constitute a complete rulership for the world. It is under this rulership the nations will be blessed.

For intelligent men to shrink from the investigation of truth of any kind, however specious may be the pretext, whether it be called indolence or timidity, or whether it be baptized by the Christian name of humility, is, in fact, to evade the most important part of their moral discipline, and to render the complete development and perfection of human character impossible; for humility, patience, candor, and charity find very little scope for exercise in the mind of any man who accepts his opinions on the authority of a party or sect, or who holds his opinion for any other reason than that they are supported by evidence.

The Bible is a river of truth and love that flows from God.

HUMAN REDEMPTION.—No. 4.

THE REVELATION OF THE WRATH OF GOD.

It may, perhaps, be said that the view taken, in the preceding chapter, of sin is inconsistent with those portions of Scripture which declare, in the most unequivocal manner, that "the wrath of God resteth on the children of disobedience."

I propose, therefore, in the present chapter to inquire into the precise teachings of the Bible on this point.

The word "wrath," as expressive of the Divine indignation, occurs first in connection with the death of Nadab and Abihu (Lev. x. 6). It finds expression there in an awful judgment on the sons of Aaron, which comes forth from God as the theocratic Governor of Israel, on account of disobedience. Similar examples are recorded in the Book of Numbers (xvi. 32-35; xxi. 6), and in other places.

In the Book of Joshua (x. 20), in the Second Book of Chronicles (xix. 2), and in other portions of the Pentateuch, judgments of a like character are seen to fall on the Canaanites, on Jehoshaphat, and on various offenders.

In the prophets, the word "wrath" is applied to different degrees of punishment, whether inflicted, or only threatened. Isaiah speaks of "a little wrath" (liv. 8), as he looks forward to the time when Israel shall again enjoy the Divine favor. He implies the same thing when he represents God as saying to Israel, "In my wrath I smote thee, but in my favor have I had mercy upon thee" (lx. 10). Jeremiah, describing the scattering of the people, calls that judgment "great wrath" (xxxii. 37). Zephaniah, looking forward to a special punishment about to fall on Judah, regards its approach as "a day of wrath," and "the great day of the Lord" (i. 14, 15). Habakkuk, under similar circumstances, prays God "in wrath to remember mercy" (iii. 2); and the Psalmist, looking forward to the second and triumphant coming of Messiah, says, "He shall strike through kings in the day of His wrath," and that "His enemies shall perish from the way, when His wrath is kindled but a little" (Psa. ii. 12; cx. 5).

In all these places we observe the wrath spoken of is temporal, and inflicted in this world. Even that which is to be executed by the triumphant Messiah is regarded as poured out upon persons who are in the flesh, and in arms, so to speak, against His authority. It is judgment proceeding against a people who, in their "rage," are vainly imagining they can break loose from the rule of a visible Christ, and cast away His

It is difficult to see that these passages have any relation to the judicial decisions of the world to come, or that they can be justly applied to the careless and ignorant around us. Yet Sunday after Sunday are they used, in all earnestness and sincerity, as if they did.

That they involve a great principle, belonging alike to all times, and to all worlds, viz., that the law of God cannot be trifled with; that sinners are, in one way or other, and in one world or other, as surely punished as that saints are blessed; and that no man is able successfully to contend with his Maker,—cannot be doubted; but they throw no light whatever on the question, What is the precise condition of an unrenewed man, as such, in the sight of God?

Perhaps the only passage in the Old Testament in which Divine judgment is exhibited to us as affecting man in a future state, is that in which Isaiah, speaking of "the new heavens and the new earth," in which the "seed" and "name" of Judah shall "remain" before God, says, "They shall (then) go forth, and look upon the carcasses of the men that have transgressed: for their worm shall not die, neither shall their fire be quenched; and they shall be an abhorring to all flesh" (lxvi. 24). The criminals, whoever they may be, are here represented as dead,—their corpses perpetually corrupting and perpetually consuming,—the objects not of pity, but of abhorrence. It is the loathsomeness of corruption, symbolizing the loathsomeness of the sin, which had deprived its victims of eternal life, and made them everlasting objects of disgust and dislike. It is this passage which our Lord quotes when He would teach the Jews what He meant by "hell," or Gehenna.

There is not a syllable in the Old Testament which leads us to suppose that the nations outside of Israel were all without hope and without God—simply condemned criminals. The history of Abimelech, of Melchizedek, of Laban, of Joseph, of Jethro, of Balaam, and others, all teach a different lesson. Everywhere we discover traces of a pure worship, although too often mixed up with different forms of corruption and idolatry. These outside nations are not, indeed, like Israel, the elect of God; but they are neither disowned nor deserted by their heavenly Father.

The first passage in the New Testament in which "wrath" is spoken of as future is in Matthew (iii. 7), where John the Baptist is represented as calling upon the people to "flee from the wrath to come." But there is no reason to suppose that the Forerunner here spoke of the judgments of eternity. It is obvious that he used the phrase in the sense in which our Lord afterwards applied it, viz., as a warning of the approaching ruin of the nation: "These be the days of vengeance, that all things which are written may be fulfilled. There shall be great distress in the land, and wrath upon this people" (Luke xxi. 22, 23). Dean Alford says, "John is now speaking in the true character of a prophet, foretelling the wrath soon to be poured on the Jewish nation." So also Dr. Gill and others.

The precise word "wrath," as indicative of the Divine displeasure, does not appear again in the New Testament until we find it used by St. Paul, when writing to the Romans. It occurs in that epistle repeatedly. It is here said to be "revealed from heaven against all ungodliness and unrighteousness of men, who hold [or, rather, keep back] the truth in unrighteousness"—those to whom God hath "showed" what may be known of His Being and character, but with no other result than the production of greater wickedness (Rom. i. 18-32). In harmony with this teaching, the apostle goes on further to affirm that practically bad men, whether professing Christianity or not; men who addict themselves to the vices of the heathen ("doing the same" ii. 3);—men who "despise the riches of God's goodness and forbearance," and cherish "hard and impenitent hearts," treasure up unto themselves "wrath against the day of wrath,"—the day when they that reject the truth, and "obey unrighteousness," shall suffer "indignation and wrath, tribulation and anguish" of soul (Rom. ii. 5-9). Nothing can be clearer than his assurance that retribution is in reserve for the wicked; and that judgment shall fall with peculiar emphasis on the idolatrous, the immoral, the persecutor, the despiser of grace, and the concealer of truth in unrighteousness; but not a syllable to lead us to conclude that the worshipper of the true God, the virtuous and the just, if careless, and unspiritual, and unrenewed, are involved in precisely the same condemnation.

The twentieth verse of the first chapter is, indeed, commonly quoted to prove that the heathen everywhere—the benighted African and the idolater of the South Seas—are "without excuse," inasmuch as in creation and providence alone a revelation may be found clear enough to involve all alike in responsibility and ruin. But this is not the meaning of the text. It refers clearly to men who have known the truth, and still know it, but keep it back by unrighteousness. The guilt of these persons is aggravated by the fact that God has, for their warning, witnessed to the truth, both in their hearts, by "showing" it to them; and in nature, by His wondrous works. Whatever may be the fact of the case, it is certainly not asserted here that creation and providence are adequate to instruct a heathen in the knowledge of the "invisible."

In relation to the race generally, the apostle argues thus: By law—the law given from Mount Sinai, both moral and ceremonial, (for he does not separate them)—viewed simply as law, and apart from any work of Christ, cometh "wrath" (or judgment); "the law worketh wrath;" for "sin is the transgression of the law;" hence, "where no law is, there is no transgression" (Rom. iv. 15). But from this general condemnation (for "all have sinned, and come short of the glory of God") Christ saves: "While we were yet sinners, Christ died for us" (v. 8).

On this general redemption of humanity, whatever it may involve, he finds an argument in favor of the special blessedness of the elect. If, says he, Christ died for us all, while in sin, and impenitent, "how much more" shall believers, who are "justified through His blood, be saved from wrath (judgment) through Him." "For if, when we were enemies (in our unconverted state) we were reconciled to God by the death of His Son, much more, being reconciled (i. e., conscious of reconciliation by and through faith) we shall be saved by His life" (verse 10). And then he goes on to rejoice in the fact that as "the many" were made sinners by Adam, so, by the obedience of Christ, shall "the many" be made "righteous;" while they which receive "abundance of grace and of the gift of righteousness shall reign in life by one, Jesus Christ" (verses 17–21).

To me it seems clear that Paul teaches that God does not now look upon mankind as condemned in Adam, but, on the contrary, as brought by Christ—even while enemies and in an unconverted state, into a new relationship, "reconciled to God by the death of his Son."

In only one other place in this epistle does the word "wrath," as applied to God, occur, viz., in the ninth chapter (verse 22), where the unrepenting Jews, then on the eve of their destruction as a nation—for the apostle was writing only a few years before the event took place,—are spoken of as "vessels of wrath fitted to destruction,"* by whose condemnation the riches of God's glory, in calling of the elect Church, would be made known both to Jews and Gentiles; or, as it is expressed by our Lord himself, that the Gentiles might see, and the Jews be blinded (John ix. 39).

In the Epistle to the Ephesians, renewed men are bidden to remember that they are "by nature the children of wrath, even as others" (ii. 3); and in that to the Colossians they are further reminded that once (viz., in their un-renewed state) they walked and lived in the indulgence of the very vices and abominations on account of which "the wrath of God" fell upon them (Col. iii. 6).

Two things are here distinctly taught us. The first is, that by nature (i. e., apart from Christ's redeeming work) all men are alike condemned by law and liable to judgment; or, as it is expressed elsewhere, "dead in trespasses and sins." The second is, that "the wrath" of God is poured out upon men, not on account of their natural corruption through Adam; not on account of their being thoughtless, careless, or unspiritual; but on account of actual vice and idolatry; "for which things sake the wrath of God cometh on the children of disobedience" (Eph. v. 6). What ever may be the condition of the un-renewed in heart, as such, it is clearly unwarrantable to say that here the wrath of God is revealed as resting upon them.

In the First Epistle to the Thessalonians the Jews are again spoken of in reference to the coming ruin of their nation, as a people upon whom "wrath is to come to the uttermost" (1 Thess. ii. 16).

Let us next notice what is emphatically called "the wrath of the Lamb" (Rev. vi. 16, 17). This phrase, which is found only in the Apocalypse, is essentially connected with the second advent of the Lord, and is exclusively used to express the judgment which, at that period, will fall upon the men who are in direct conflict with the authority of the Redeemer. It is of this day that the apostle Paul speaks, when, recognizing the possibility of Christ's immediate return, he says to the Thessalonians, "God hath not appointed us to wrath, but to obtain salvation by our Lord Jesus Christ." "For ye, brethren, are not in darkness, that that day should overtake you as a thief" (1 Thess. v. 9, and verse 4). It is to this day, or to its immediate precursors, that those passages must be referred which speak of the filling up of "the wrath of God" upon the earth, of the "pouring out of the wrath of God" and of the "treading the winepress of the fierceness and wrath of Almighty God" (Rev. xv. 1; xvi. 1; xix. 15).

* So Doddridge and others. The best commentators, both ancient and modern, are agreed that the Jews are here meant. There is not a shadow of reason for supposing that the expression, "vessels of wrath," is to be taken as indicating individuals intended by God for eternal punishment.

In all these cases, let it be observed, the wrath falls upon men in the flesh, and while on earth; and the persons who experience it are the active opposers of Christ's rule.

A careful review of the words translated "damnation," "condemnation," or "judgment," do not lead us to any different conclusion.

The Scribes and Pharisees—"hypocrites"—are told by our Lord himself that they shall receive "the greater damnation" (Matt. xxiii. 14); that it is difficult to see "how" they can escape Gehenna; that he who blasphemeth against the Holy Ghost is in danger of eternal condemnation; and that they who have done evil shall at the last day "come forth unto the resurrection of damnation" (John v. 29); but there is not a word to intimate that this is, after all, the lot of the entire race, with the exception only of the Church. In John v. 29 Christ clearly refers to men such as were those to whom He was speaking,—Jews who "sought to kill Him" (verse 16-18), persons who had rejected and hated light, "because their deeds were evil."

St. Paul tells us, regarding those licentious Christians who, in his day, said, "Let us do evil that good may come," that "their condemnation is just" (Rom. iii. 8); and of the apostates who shall be on the earth at the second coming of the Lord, that "God shall send them strong delusion, that they should believe a lie: that they all might be damned who believed not the truth, but had pleasure in unrighteousness" (2 Thess. ii. 11, 12). I do not say that in any of these cases the word "damnation," "condemnation," or "judgment" necessarily means the highest form of it,—the damnation of hell, or Gehenna; although in some of these declarations it seems undoubtedly to have that interpretation. The fact that our Lord adds the words, "of Gehenna," when He speaks of the Pharisees, alone shows that the word "damnation" does not always and necessarily imply that doom. Be that as it may, it is clear that, in relation to men generally—to the race—Paul says that "the ministration of death" (that of the law, given from Mount Sinai) is "done away" (2 Cor. iii. 11); that it has now "no glory, by reason of the glory that excelleth;" and that "with open face"—without reserve of any kind—he seeks to manifest this truth "to every man's conscience in the sight of God" (iv. 2).

I am not inclined to dispute that many an amiable but unconverted man is practically an unbeliever, and that, as such, he has too often "pleasure in unrighteousness;" but no one, surely, can pretend that this is what St. Paul means either in the Epistle to the Romans or in that to the Thessalonians.

On what, then, it will be said, does a doctrine which seems to lie at the very root of our evangelical theology—forming, in fact, the basis on which Christ is commonly preached—really rests?

I reply, certainly not on any direct and explicit scriptural declaration faithfully interpreted but on inferences; on inferences, I allow, that are supposed not only to be legitimate, but necessary; on conclusions which are drawn chiefly from the words of Christ himself; but still on human inferences. The doctrine in question is one which, like many others, although not to be read in Holy Scripture, may, it is believed by Christians generally, be clearly proved therefrom.

I do not say that anything is to be rejected simply because it cannot be found in so many direct words in Scripture; or that nothing should be believed which is arrived at only by a process of deduction. But I do say that no doctrine which is based on inference can ever have the same authority as that which rests on fact,—using that term as indicative of direct and explicit revelation.

The reason is obvious. In all inferential conclusions a human and therefore imperfect element is introduced, which carries with it, of necessity, the liability to err. I hold, therefore, that all conclusions thus arrived at are open to question, in a sense which by no means applies to any plain declaration made either by Christ or his apostles.

HOPE.

Strength to bear the ills of life,
Doubts, bereavements, toil and strife,
Yieldeth hope with balm for pain
Till the Master comes again.

Hope that in the azure sphere
His fair sign may soon appear;
Hope that to the midnight cry
Love expectant may reply.

Strength it gives whate'er we do
That to zealously pursue,
Seeking not one task to fly,
Though it were for Him to die.

Since was formed the wondrous plan
Eden to restore to man,
Hope and Love through tears behold
Gates of pearl, and streets of gold.

"LITERATURE AND DOGMA."

THIRD PAPER.

We have criticized freely, though briefly, a few of the more salient defects in Matthew Arnold's Essay. We turn to the more grateful task of commenting upon one or two of its striking excellences. These excellences account for its popularity and its power, but do not, for this reason, make it less dangerous. We ought to say rather that the more truth there is in it the greater is its capacity to do evil, by reason of the plausibility lent to its earnest extravagances from the important principles which the author recognizes so clearly and relates so forcibly and eloquently.

The first point which we notice is the truth that the Scriptures are a series of productions in literature, and in no sense a collection of dogmatic propositions or arguments. This truth cannot be stated too strongly, nor can it be conceived too vividly by any writer. All the eloquent reiterations of it in this essay are not excessive. Every book in the Scriptures, both in matter and form, every line even, is conceived and expressed for the popular mind and the popular ear. To a large extent, if not uniformly and universally, the writers think and write in the modes of thought and speech which are entirely estranged from the schools. The beliefs are conceived very largely in conceptions and terms which are appropriate to men in common life. The language employed is any thing but abstract and precise. It is very frequently the language of excited and poetic feeling. Illustrations are used with the most liberal carelessness of their being misunderstood and misapplied. Assertions, which in form and phrase are self-contradictory, are freely hazarded. The language of the schools is abstract and dead; that of the Scriptures is concrete and living. The language of the creed and confessions of faith is painfully exact; the language of the Scriptures is painfully careless, at least to theologians. The atmosphere of the Scriptures is warm, sunny and exhilarating; that of church dogmas and theological systems is cold and gloomy and depressing, at least to the common mind.

The truth is fruitful in its consequences and applications. The first and most comprehensive inference is that the Scriptures should be interpreted as literature and not as a collection of scientific propositions. This literature is poetry, history, parable, exhortation and counsel. It should be interpreted as each of these forms of literature require to be interpreted, according to the genius and structure which is appropriate to each of these forms of writing. To treat the language of a poetic figure or a parabolic illustration as though it were the diction of sober and scientific truth is the height of unreason. To find a logical argument or a precise definition in a word-play, an allegory, or a casual coincidence, is to sin against common sense, and the sin is none the less heinous because it is committed in the service of a sacred cause. That these rules of interpreting and applying the Scriptures have been frightfully overlooked and violated is obvious to any moderately well-informed student. The proof texts that garnish our catechisms and bolster our creeds; the weak commentaries that so weakly dilute so many grand and glorious, solid and sober Scripture texts; the misapplied parables and imagery that illustrate nothing so much as the empty minds of preacher and exhorter; and the traditional spirit which quotes by the sound to the ear rather than by sense to the mind, are all examples of the frightful abuse to which the Scriptures are subjected by overlooking the truth, that being written as literature, they can be rightly interpreted only as literature. More than this is true. As long as examples of these offences abound, the Scriptures and the cause which their expounders are given to defend must continue to suffer in the judgment of a large number of cultivated men, who are unhappily more familiar with other literatures and the principles by which they are interpreted than they are independent and earnest students of the Bible. We do not assert that the cultivated critics, who are repelled and disgusted by these weaknesses of the expounders of the Scripture literature, are not themselves at fault. We do not contend that the opposition of many to Christian truth is not something deeper and more deeply mortuate than opposition to the form and accidents under which it is set forth; but we do assert that the interpreters and defenders of this literature are none the less greatly at fault in the ignorance and stupidity, the self-conceit and dogmatism which very largely occasion these misconstructions. A heavy woe may rest upon the world because of the offenses which it finds in the Word, but the woe is no less heavy upon that man by whom the offense cometh. The Pharisaism which perverts the Word by its illiterate or metaphysical dogmatism, or which crushes its living and potent spirit by pompous pretenses of form, by histrionic or hysterical excitements of ritual or spectacular displays of millinery, is none the less deserving of the perpetual woe which the Master originally pronounced against it, because the unbelief that exposes its delusions fails to discern and to honor the truth of which this Pharisaism is the caricature. As long as there are such theologians as the Bishop of Winchester, we must expect to find such satirists of their ignorance and pretension as Matthew Arnold.

The mistakes of Arnold are transparent. Conceding, as we do, that the Scriptures are literature, it by no means follows that they assert no objective truth of both sorts—truth of historic reality and of scientific verity. The Greek epos and drama are literature, but when criticism has done its utmost upon both it finds in each a residuum of most important facts and principles. Not only does it find both, but it is forced to search after both, as the explanation of the literature itself. To conclude that because the Scriptures are literature they contain no objective truth is to offend against the teachings of criticism itself. To infer that because this objective truth is not stated in the forms of dogma it cannot be recast and restated in the forms of scientific definition and argument, and so be made to reappear as the theology of creeds and confessions, is to commit an error of extravagant inference which the spirit of enlightened criticism not only fails to justify, but positively reproveth and condemns. To infer that none of these facts can be supernatural and none of these truths can be revealed is to beg the question, not on the ground of impartial literary criticism, as enlightened by the true and penetrating Zeit Geist, but as such criticism is misled by the partial reading of scornful satire and the superficial thinking of a shallow philosophy.

Against this charge that he finds no positive import in the Scriptures, Mr. Arnold would protest most emphatically by pointing to the subjective truth, on which he lays such emphasis. We are not unaware of the emphasis which he gives to this subjective truth, and are not disposed to deny its importance. We find in the honor which is paid to conduct and character one of the great merits of this essay. But we protest against giving it such exclusive prominence as would exclude objective truth.

We agree with Mr. Arnold that the character and conduct are the main thing, and, in some sense, the sole thing with which the Scriptures concern themselves. We would affirm as emphatically and as persistently as he could wish that doctrinal and theological truth are in themselves of no consequence whatever, and certainly are of no possible importance when contrasted with spirituality and integrity of character and life. We have no hesitation in affirming that an intellectual assent to an orthodox creed has in itself no virtue whatever. We would concede that a creed that is seriously defective, or in many points erroneous, may be so received as to be far more effective for good to the recipient than a creed that is faultless in every possible particular of thought or diction.

The great merit of this essay—its power to do good, and, incidentally, its power to do harm—lies in the honor it puts upon character, and the hearty appreciation which it renders to the scriptural conceptions of character both in the Old and the New Testaments. In his genial appreciation of the conceptions of character which are found in the Old Testament, Mr. Arnold shows that he is not too old to learn, and that he is held by no rigid bonds to his own consistency. If we do not misremember, it is not many years since the severe and uncompromising ethics of Hebraism were a grievous offence to his taste in comparison with the facile and æsthetic Hellenism of modern literature and modern life. The glowing language and hearty power with which in this essay he sets forth the sensitive spirituality of the Hebrew saint is not only fervent testimony to what in itself is most worthy, but is most honorable to his own allegiance to truth. It is also interesting to see how, as he passes from the Old Testament to the New, he is impressed with the deeper and sweeter morality that is taught by Jesus and exemplified by the early disciples. There are passages concerning both these topics which almost lead us to forget and pardon the hasty and bitter utterances and the extravagant reasoning with which the volume abounds.

One defect we ought to notice, which is a defect at which we ought not to be surprised, and that is the feeble emphasis which is laid upon personal responsibility and individual guilt. With all the emphasis which Arnold places on purity of aim and unselfishness of love, he fails to do the fullest justice to the emphatic sense of responsibility and guilt by which the Old and New Testaments are so distinguished. Mr. Arnold is fond of searching out a theological tendency in the Bishops and other theologians whom he so freely criticises. We would not be treating him unfairly to find in his pantheistic bias the explanation of his failure to sympathize with the intense sense of the "sinfulness of sin," which the theistic interpreter never fails to discover in the Scripture literature, even in spite of sundry scholastic dogmas of predestination and grace which have almost if not altogether a pantheistic sound.

But without pressing this point, and taking Arnold's interpretations of the character and conduct set forth in both Scriptures to be open to no exception, they suggest a word of emphatic commendation and a word of critical inquiry. The commendation has already in part been adverted to. More fully expressed, it would read as follows: Religion, whether as a matter of faith or science, is of value only so far as it tends to purify and reform the character, and to make the conduct more just and more beneficent, more true and more clear. Whatever be a man's faith or his creed, whatever his zeal or his worship, whether he believes in one God or many, whether he accepts a personal and knowable Deity, or an impersonal or unknowable force, just so far as what he believes in is held by him, in Arnold's phrase, "to make for righteousness," and just so far as the quality and intensity of that righteousness is pure and fervid, just so far is the religion of value. For practical purposes every man's religious faith and every man's religious creed takes up into itself its relations to character and conduct. Not only does it take this element into itself, but it makes it to be the most important constituent of itself. It, so to speak, takes up this and nothing more. While orthodoxy of faith is of no slight importance, as we shall insist, while exactness, consistency and completeness of theology even can be shown to be of supreme necessity, this importance and necessity all turn upon the relations to life and character which are involved in our objective belief.

It follows that there is a wide range in tolerance among the advocates of different creeds. The follower of one system of theology is very free to say to the advocate of another, your God is my Devil, but in doing so he overlooks the truth that his opponent connects with the phrases and words which are such an offense to himself a meaning in respect to character and conduct which seems to him the reverse of what they ought to have. Charity and tolerance require, in such cases, that the most favorable construction should be accepted as possible. It does not follow, however, that because charity and tolerance not only allow but require this in individual cases, they forbid us to attach supreme importance to theological truth, and even to theological controversy, for the reason that although conceptions and phrases may have a different import in their meaning as construed and applied by individuals, and even by communities, from what they will have when fairly interpreted by many communities after long periods of time. We have distinguished between an objective faith and a scientific or theological creed. As both of these derive all their importance from their relations to righteousness, that is of greatest consequence which has the most direct relation to character. As between the two, there can be no question that that which is of supreme concern is what is expressed in literature as contrasted with dogma. The hymns and prayers of the church are of greater immediate importance than are its creeds and confessions. Its creeds and confessions are important, because, in the long run, they affect its prayers and its hymns. The creeds and confessions which it uses for worship and devotion should be written in the language of literature, and uttered as offices of worship, as prayers and hymns.

If Matthew Arnold had said this and no more, he would have rendered a greatly needed service, not only to the Bishops of Winchester and of Gloucester, but to the whole Protestant Church.

We marvel that he chose to utter such one-sided extravagances as that because the Scriptures emphasize conduct, they are indifferent to everything besides. We marvel, also, that, while he does such eloquent and fervent justice to the transcendent conceptions of character which are furnished in the Old Testament and the New, he does not notice that these conceptions were connected with and created by the very faith in a personal God and a supernatural Christ which he dismisses so cavalierly as scholastic and worthless dogmas, because, forsooth, the Scriptures are to be interpreted as literature. There is no end to the curiosities of literature, but among them, none seems to us more paradoxical and bizarre than the mixture of sense and paradox, of wisdom and extravagance, which we find in this essay. We doubt not that the second thoughts of most considerate readers will teach them to separate the wheat from the chaff, and to value the wheat none the less because the chaff is so empty and so light.

HOUSEHOLD CHRISTIANITY.

To the Christian Church of Eastern Virginia in State Convention Assembled, at Richmond, Va.:

DEAR BRETHREN: Permit me, "who knoweth in whom he hath believed, and is persuaded that he is able to keep that which he hath committed unto him against that day," as a member of the one body, which constitutes the church, to offer a few thoughts for your consideration.

You appropriate the name "Christian Church"—the name which belongs to "the general assembly and church of the first born written in heaven," and which it derives from the fact of its having been constituted "the body of the Christ," and as a consequence of which it also becomes "the house of God, the pillar and support of the truth." If you have rightly appropriated the name, then, truly, we can lay our hand on that congregation of individuals which stand out conspicuously, as owned and acknowledged of God, as His House, His Habitation, His Temple; and it is our Christian privilege to be built into that organization, for each of us are constituted by that change wrought on us and in us, at our regeneration, "living stones," and by consequence of our being made "living stones" the life thus imparted builds us into and constitutes us individually integral parts, or stones in God's "spiritual house." Of course, as God is Spirit, his house must of necessity be like him; and so whatever is predicated of God, must of necessity be spiritual. Thus, His children are only such because they are born of Him, and, therefore, possess His nature, and consequently are living stones; and cemented and compacted together they constitute a "spiritual house."

These are all necessary and inevitable consequences of the change which God works in us when he adopts us into His family, or when he "begets us of his own will by the word of truth, the gospel of our salvation," or when he "creates us anew in Christ Jesus." They are not results to be sought after after we have entered the family relationship, but they are the inevitable consequences of the creation of these relationships. So that it is an unquestionable truth, an undeniable fact, that "the church is the body of Christ." It does not remain, that it should now, or at some future time be constituted such, but it now is, and has always been such, since the first of Adam's race was "baptized into the Christ." Here we stand on established truth—ground not debatable,—the impregnable fortress of revelation. And from hence we are forced to suggest some of the consequences that necessarily flow from these premises.

I. Then, the adopted, the begotten, or born, and those "created anew in Christ Jesus," are by the change thus severally expressed in these and other processes constituted in reality "children of God."

Paul affirms, We "are all the children of God by faith in the Christ Jesus. For as many of you as have been baptized in the Christ, have put on the Christ." Again, "As many as are led by the Spirit of God, they are the sons of God. . . . The Spirit itself beareth witness with our spirits that we are the children of God; and if children then heirs; heirs of God, and joint-heirs with the Christ." We see, then, that our title to the future inheritance is absolutely dependent upon the establishment of the fact of present childhood, and therefore it is that the apostle John is so emphatic, when he says, "Behold! what manner of love the Father hath bestowed upon us that we should be called the sons of God; therefore the world knoweth us not, because it knew him not. Beloved, now are we the sons of God; and it doth not yet appear what we shall be; but we know that, when he shall appear we shall be like him, for we shall see him as he is."

Nothing can be added to the completeness,—the fulness,—of these testimonies; they could not be stronger or more conclusive. The truth is established beyond question; its consequences must follow. As, therefore, God is Spirit, so are his children spiritual, for like begets like, and they are "begotten of his own will by the word of truth." Again: their sonship is a new creation consequent upon the putting to death of "the old man,"—his crucifixion with his affections and lusts. It is true that our fellows never lose sight of our old man, and never having seen (because they cannot discern or see spirit) the new man, they only recognize him as manifested in the fruits of the Spirit developed in every day life. Thus, John saith, "the world knoweth us not, because it knew him not." It knew Jesus of Nazareth, but it never recognized his relationship to the invisible God, simply because its sense cannot discern spirit, and therefore it persistently denied that he was "the Son of God,"—"It knew him not."

II. Heirship is dependent upon sonship. If we should have been unable to establish our sonship, then we could by no possibility have gained any title to anything beyond the original "kingdom prepared for Adam at the foundation of our world," namely, Have "thou dominion over the fish of the sea, and over the fowl of the air, and over every living thing that moveth upon the earth." To subdue physical nature and rule the lower creation is the extent of the jurisdiction that man is capable of, or that God has ever conferred or promised to confer on the sons of men as such. But to those of the sons of men who by faith have become supplanters of their natural birth-right, and by consequence have been "created anew in the Christ Jesus," God hath given sonship, and consequently made them heirs with himself, and joint-heirs with his elect Son to all his own inheritance, for he has already seated him "at his own right hand," and given him "all power in heaven and earth." He hath also promised to give to him a personal throne from whence he shall rule till he hath

Is it indeed true that such is the glorious royal dignity to which our Elder Brother has been called and exalted? no less than the subjugation of the rebellion of our race, all rule, all authority, all power, yea, he shall "put all enemies under his feet," and in this prostrate condition they shall acknowledge their subjection to him; for "every knee shall bow to him and every tongue shall confess him Lord, to the glory of God the Father." And thus John declares, "He was manifested that he might destroy the works of the devil,"—and so "the last enemy death shall be destroyed," for "He shall destroy him that hath the power of death, that is the devil." Glorious consummation, involving consequences to our race that "eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, nor yet hath it entered into the heart of man" to conceive what is involved in the utter and complete destruction of the works of the devil. Can we begin to estimate the glorious advantages that shall flow to the race, when every vestige of the works of the devil, which necessarily involves all the consequences flowing from those works, shall be utterly, completely, and perfectly destroyed. Well may He be called the Saviour,—the Deliverer. And what a glorious assurance the prophet Isaiah hath given us, "He shall see of the travail of His soul, and shall be satisfied."

Surely, then, to be called to partake in such a glorious destiny is motive strong enough to prompt to the most noble self-sacrifice and devotion. And that we are, James affirms, in the council at Jerusalem, when he says, "Simeon hath declared how God first looked to take out of the Gentiles a people for His name." And with this the words of the prophets harmonize; as it is written, "After this," (namely, after he had taken a people from among the Gentiles to bear his name, to be his sons and heirs, and joint-heirs with his elect Son,) "I will return, and I will rebuild that tabernacle of David which has fallen down; and I will rebuild its ruins, and will re-establish it; in order that the remainder of men may seek the Lord, even all the Gentiles upon whom my name has been invoked."

Here, then, we find the plainest statement of the apostle that, it is the unalterable purpose of the heavenly Father to give to his first-born Son the throne of his fleshly father David, on which he shall reign as His own throne, so that, as He at present sits on his heavenly Father's throne, because He overcame, so shall He have the privilege of giving to his own brethren, who like himself overcome, (overcome what? The world, the flesh, and the devil,) the privilege of sitting down with Him "on his own throne, even as he overcame and sat down on his Father's throne." Thus, we who are by the Father constituted his own heirs, and joint-heirs with His first born Son, will be gladly welcomed to a joint inheritance of the First-born's throne and kingdom. Well might the apostle speak of the redeemed as perpetually rejoicing with joy unspeakable and full of glory. What greater joy can fill the heart of fallen but redeemed man, than to contemplate from his position and surroundings these unspeakable provisions of his Father's love? Where is the mind of man that can fathom or grasp intelligently the magnitude of this incomprehensible provision for the exaltation of poor redeemed humanity? Truly, "eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, neither hath it entered into the heart of man the things that God hath prepared for them that love him." But "our light afflictions work out for us a far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory."

But, if we who, because of our child-like submission, are constituted children, are called to his kingdom and glory, to possess and enjoy this "far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory." James tells us that it is only that we may be the channels through which the unbounded and immeasurable grace of our heavenly Father may be conferred upon the nations; even that the blessing of Abraham may come upon them, or "the restitution of all things, written in all the holy prophets since the world began." Such then, is one of the consequences of sonship: but I would call your attention to only one of the many others named in the blessed word.

OUR views of God react upon ourselves. By an eternal law, we are more or less changed into the likeness of the God we worship. If we think Him hard, we become hard. If we think Him careless of men's bodies and spiritual interests, we become careless also. If we think He hates unregenerate men, we hate them also. If we think "God is Love," we shall reflect some thing of his loving-kindness. To produce in us holy tempers and dispositions of mind, God gave us his image in his beloved Son, that we, as it were, "with open face beholding as in a glass the glory of the Lord, might be changed into the same image" (2 Thess. iii. 18). False notions of God's character and government are injurious if not ruinous.

CONFESSION OF THE KING.

A great number of Englishmen—dukes, earls, barons, merchants, mechanics, and peasants—were at one time out of harmony with the existing rule, and looking for another monarch in whose divine right they believed most devoutly.

Their position was false and dangerous, the claims of their saintly hero to the throne was very questionable, and the grace and glory with which they invested him purely imaginary. But still the worship was profound, and the aspiration fervent; they nourished an intense though an unholy and devouring fire, by speaking to each other of the grand time when the king would have his own again.

We have a better standing, a loftier hope, which nourishes a finer fire and a nobler enthusiasm; for the King, whose presence we desire, has in his person and character all the elements and attributes which are beautiful or sublime, which are saintly, heroic, or God-like. The righteousness of his claim to the throne is beyond controversy, and the power in reserve for enforcing such claim beyond all limit.

The present visible kingdom is the kingdom of darkness, where the god of this world bears rule. Men do not perceive this, because, there is a veil spread over all nations. It is, however, the dread and sober certainty; the purple, gold, and fine linen, the diplomacy, war and commerce, the art, science, and philosophy, the power, majesty, and glory, are all at present of the world, and of that evil spirit, who rules for a season its destinies.

But "there is another King, one Jesus," supposed by some to be dead in a "lone Syrian town," affirmed by others to be alive, yea, Prince of Life, righteous claimant of David's throne, and true Lord of all thrones, forces, and dominions. We are among those who believe in the words which peal so clear, so audible, so solemn, and so inspiring, through the halls of time, and the abysses of eternity, "Fear not; I am he that liveth, and was dead; and, behold, I am alive for evermore, amen: and have the keys of hell and of death."

A rapid glance at a few of the passages in which the King was confessed, may occupy us profitably for a season. "Now when Jesus was born in Bethlehem of Judea, in the days of Herod the king, behold, there came wise men from the east to Jerusalem, saying, 'Where is he that is born King of the Jews? for we have seen his star in the east, and are come to worship him'" (Matt. ii. 1, 2). The wise men were Gentiles. Their insight and their journey growing out of it indicated that the King whom they came to reverence, though born King of the Jews, would have a dominion wider than Palestine, and gather under the wings of his regality princes and subjects with other blood than Hebrew. We get a glimpse of the comprehensiveness of the salvation provided, and the breadth of the descending empire, and the glory of the golden gates of the true holy city, beginning to shine forth. While the entranced shepherds, amid celestial radiance and song, receive with gladness the new-born King—on the Jewish side—the wise men receive him as representatives of Gentilism. We see the walls of partition falling down, and a new temple rising where men of all races and languages may worship with one consent the Ancient of days, and the Father of all spirits.

The wise men were astrologers. The knowledge of the period, though wonderfully various, and far more inspiring than the present, had not assumed methodic or scientific shape. It cannot, however, be reasonably questioned, that the prevalent faith of that time, that all fields of information had connection with the mystical and the spiritual, gave grace and glory, charm and rapture, to the study of plants or stars, which we miss in modern days.

While the magi were busy in their sublime work of midnight meditation, traveling on wings of wonder and ecstasy among countless worlds of light, there shines forth a NEW LUMINARY. The calculations of Ideler and Kepler render it probable that in connection with the conjunction of Jupiter and Saturn, a new star was actually visible to observing eyes, about the time of our Lord's birth.

But it matters little. We could perhaps as easily prove that there was a natural eclipse when our Lord was crucified. It seems to me we are in a region where Kepler and Newton have no more light than the rest of us, unless the insight of the spirit be deeper. The new star belongs to spiritual astronomy. Whether it burn out, or shine in some higher heavens, or whether it may be wandering, we cannot tell. The star is gone, but the Lord remains, in undiminished brightness. He is Lord of all the stars; all things were made by him, all things were made for him, and in him all things consist, or stand together.

After our Lord had fed the Jewish people by miracle, which revealed creative power, they wanted to take him by force and make him a king. But he departed and hid himself. He would not be made a king; he was born one. "Where is he that is born King of the Jews?" It is easy to clothe a person with Tyrian purple, to give him a throne blazing with precious stones, to blow trumpets before him in solemn and imposing procession. But it is no easy matter to find royalty in the spirit. In the last bad days of the Roman Empire, the throne was several times sold to the highest bidder by the degenerate pretorian guards; but the wretches who bought the name were never kings, for they could buy no inward glory, and there was no regnancy of soul to shine forth in outward majesty.

Strauss, and others among the devil's advocates, have urged that it was wrong to enlist fiction in the cause of truth, to make astrology subservient to Christianity. This is passing strange. What ever would become of the world, if all its moral scenery and circumstances were not continually made subservient to something higher? The birds of prey consume the carrion, the scavengers remove the uncleanness. Sennacherib may blaspheme, and Pilate sneer, and Julian fling dust in the air, but all are in some way laborers for God. The most tremendous crime of Jerusalem and its rulers opens a fountain of life, and the saintly blood of martyrs running in rivers nourishes the church.

It seems to be one of the laws of human nature that love shall be testified by gifts. The law has operated in all ages, in all places, and among all the races of mankind. Each true man can speak of some dear one for whom, or to whom, he would give his heart and his life. If power were equal to good-will, whither would we not wander to find things rare and costly for the beloved one? The secret treasures of the deep, the shells and jewels of Indian shores, the silk in purple of Tyre, the gold and rubies from the mine, would all be gathered and laid down in secret joy at the feet of the beloved one. The same powerful love, with like spontaneity, works in the higher and deeper region, and the magians were under its inspiring potency. It was equally made manifest in the journey and the offering. Owing to the immense distance, and the nature of the roads in the remote east, such a pilgrimage was no slight matter. It has been considered probable that they began their journey about the time of the conception of our Lord, and only arrived at Bethlehem to find the young child lying by his mother. But no distance, or danger in the path, or weariness of the flesh, could daunt the eastern travelers. It was not scientific ardor, or political interest. Victorious love was there, and so they gather the richest things which their country could produce, and resolutely travel on laden with their treasures; for the service is one of love, profound and absorbing, and all labor is sweetened on the road, and rewarded at the end with fulness of content.

We need not be discouraged if we have no frankincense or gold, or anything very costly or glorious, to bring into the service of the Lord. The poorest can bring their whole nature, body, soul, and spirit, and what richer offering can be presented? Only let us feel, whatever our circumstances may be, that all we are, and all we have, are his. Give him freely in love, being, property, and time, and receive his fulness in return.

The offering of the wise men was homage rendered to a king. Such homage was customary among the people of the earth when they drew near to sovereign power, and so the magians testified their allegiance to a monarch high above all the kings and princes of the earth. It was predicted, "He shall be great, and shall be called the Son of the Highest; and the Lord God shall give unto him the throne of his father David, and he shall reign over the house of Jacob for ever; and of his kingdom there shall be no end." The wise men knew that he was born King of the Jews, and he himself, when he witnessed his good confession before Pontius Pilate, acknowledged that such monarchy was his. It is indeed true, and the precious truth, that the rule of Christ begins in the inward man; he lays the deep foundations of his sublime kingdom in willing, human souls; but it is equally true, that his empire would be wanting in one essential point, if it failed in subordinating to itself the external world, and becoming finally realized in the glory of perfect transfiguration and visible dominion.

It is quite possible that there was more in the nature of the offering than the worshippers were able to perceive. The informing and guiding Spirit of God was in the matter from first to last. In the composition of the holy anointing oil, pure myrrh was the principle ingredient. With that holy oil, the tabernacle, the ark of the testimony, the table and all the vessels, the altar, the laver, the priest, and all his helpers, were to be anointed, that all might be sanctified as most holy. Frankincense, pure, was the chief ingredient in that confection, which was beaten into ashes or powder, and which, from the altar of incense, rose up in clouds morning and evening, as prayer and worship would arise on prevailing wings, in a nobler dispensation. As to gold, almost every thing about the mercy-seat was made of pure gold. "And he made the mercy-seat of pure gold;" "and he made two cherubims of gold, beaten out of one piece, made he them, on the two ends of the mercy-seat. These golden cherubims spread out their wings on high and covered over the mercy-seat, with their faces one toward another, and both gazing down towards the mercy-seat." (Exod. xxxvii.) The church at Laodicea is counselled to buy of the Lord pure gold, tried by fire, that she may have the true riches. The streets of the Holy City are to be pure gold. It seems from these and kindred passages that gold, in the natural world, symbolizes truth in the spiritual. All the glorious work of pure gold in the ancient time anticipated Him who was truth absolute and truth essential, and to hold fast the truth as it is in Jesus is the crowning glory of man.

If, then, we consider gold as symbolizing truth, frankincense as representing worship, and myrrh as setting forth holiness, we catch the living spirit of the transaction. The magicians were led by the Spirit of God to present an acceptable and significant offering before the Great King. Into a world where the murderer of human souls was deceiving by his corrupting lies the Great One had come, who was himself truth—divine, perfect, unchangeable; who would give himself as the food of famishing humanity, that the new life might ascend on the triumphal wings of worship to the throne of God, and flow out in the beauty of holiness before men.

We have another remarkable confession of the King on record in the first chapter of John. "Jesus saw Nathaniel coming to him, and saith of him, Behold, an Israelite indeed, in whom is no guile. Nathaniel saith unto him, Whence knowest thou me? Jesus answered and said unto him, Before that Phillip called thee, when thou wast under the fig-tree, I saw thee. Nathaniel answered and said unto him, Rabbi, thou art the Son of God, thou art the King of Israel!" In reply to this explicit and solemn confession, the promise is made by the Lord, "Verily, verily I say unto you, hereafter, ye shall see heaven open and the angels of God ascending and descending upon the Son of man." The men of guile, in the midst of opulent revelation of power and goodness, were inclined to give Satan the honor, though a little more thought and a little less wickedness, would have shown them that the Anarch, the spirit of evil, would surely not shake his own kingdom, and cast out his own retainers. But the man without guile has eyes for the signet ring of the King—for the sign manual of the Lord—a scintillation of evidence is sufficient to flash conviction into his open heart. "Thou art the Son of God, thou art the King of Israel." We are irresistibly led back to the memorable vision of the patriarch Jacob. He lighted on a certain place and tarried there all night, because the sun was set, and took the stones of that place for pillows, and lay down to sleep. "And he dreamed, and behold a ladder set up on the earth, and the top of it reached to heaven, and behold the angels of God, ascending and descending on it." After the patriarch awoke he exclaimed reverentially, "Surely the Lord is in this place, and I knew it not." "How dreadful is this place; this is none other than the house of God, and this the gate of heaven." We are better pleased now with pillows of down or feathers, but some of us would be willing to try the stones, if in compensation we could have visions so glorious. It was quite time for Jacob to learn that God was in all places, and that the connection between heaven and earth was certain and well established. Man in league with the evil spirit had done his utmost to destroy such connection, but God in the promise of the life-restorer had reserved the earth unto mercy. But we reach the true Jacob's ladder when we come to the Life indeed made manifest in visible glory. As Son of God he touches heaven, which is his native place, for he was in glory with the Father before the worlds were; as King of Israel he touched the earth which will be his territory when he cometh to reign. Then, and not till then, shall we see the angels of God ascending and descending upon the Son of man. He is the one who substantially unites heaven and earth with golden chains, and brings the divine and the human into rich and indissoluble union.

As the chestnut tree is wrapped up in the nut, or the oak tree in the acorn, so all offices were wrapped up in our Lord when on earth. A man might say with the nut in his hand, potentially this is a magnificent chestnut tree, but it wants development by contact with sun and soil, and all the auxiliary ordinances of nature. In regard to Jesus, the Anointed, or Christed, there were comprehended the prophetic, the priestly, and the kingly functions to be successively developed. It is true, an objector might say, was there not royalty revealed in the stupendous works of the Lord, in the very splendor of power, and in the perfectness of beneficence? And was his sacrifice not at least a priestly work, and even the intercessory prayer, in which he held up the apostles, and in them, all Christian humanity before the throne of God? All this may be granted, and yet it remains in substance true, that the offices were to have successive development, to be unfolded in fine stages. He was revealed as a Prophet or Teacher in Judea, and his great works were mainly to show forth his authority to expound. He could not have been a Priest had he remained on earth, for there were priests who offered sacrifice according to the law.

He has had development as a Priest at God's right hand by the golden altar, pleading the value of his own most precious blood.

He will be revealed as King, when he bows the heavens and comes down, when we see him as he is, with his eyes like lamps of fire, and many crowns on his head. There is a blessed and only Potentate, King of kings and Lord of lords, and the time comes for the revelation of his august power and his eternal glory.

Oh, how we yearn and long for the brightness of his appearing! "For our life is hid with Christ in God; and when he who is our life shall appear, then shall we also appear with him in glory."

Come, Lord, for darkness surrounds us, which like that of Egypt may be felt. The supreme leaders of human thought are all drifting into godless regions, where there is neither light nor life. The Church visible has no sublime unity, but is a discordant rabble of warring sects, not much above the world in either faith or holiness.

Anointed and holy One! descend in thy chariot of light and power, revealing that kingdom for which we continually pray.

G. GREENWELL.

AN INTERESTING STATEMENT.

EDITOR OF BIBLE EXAMINER—

Dear Sir and Brother: As you will see by the date, this is the day set apart by those in authority, as a day of "Thanksgiving, humiliation, and prayer." While all of us, as a nation, as separate commonwealths, as communities, as families, or as individuals, have had very much in the past and are enjoying very much in the present, for which we ought to be thankful and continually praise our Creator for his love, goodness and mercy, which he constantly manifests towards us, I feel as though I had quite recently received a blessing for which I trust I am truly thankful. If I know my own feelings, I know that I am happier; that I have clearer and more appreciative views of my heavenly Father than I had two weeks ago.

I have for years been striving to serve my God, and have ever believed in and leaned upon the Lamb of God, trusting in him entirely for salvation. Have been for years a communicant at His table, and fully believe that it will be well with me when He shall come to judge the world.

About two weeks ago I was taken sick, so I had to be confined to the house, but not to my bed. My next neighbor, a good friend of mine, wishing to add to my comfort, handed Nos. 1 and 2 of the BIBLE EXAMINER, and said I might find some very interesting and instructive reading matter therein. He asked me to read without any orthodox prejudice, accepting what commended itself to my judgment, and harmonized with the Bible, as I understand it. I told him I would do so. I have read both of them through carefully, and it is for the good derived thereby that I feel so thankful to-day: for I feel elevated in perceptions of Deity: I have clearer views of His love, mercy, and justice. I can see how he can be just and the justifier of him who believes in Jesus. There are some points which I am not fully prepared to endorse; but I will not condemn simply because I do not understand a given theory. But I desire to read, study and know more of the will of God towards his creatures. I will continue to love Him, praise Him, and will give Him all the glory of my salvation through the Lord Jesus Christ, who became a ransom for all who open their hearts to him.

Go on, dear brother, in your good work; and may you long be spared to spread the glad tidings to millions, who, as yet, have no clear, intelligent, saving views of their Creator and his only Son, who is the only Mediator between offending man and an offended God.

Yours, in search of more truth,

H. A. HOYT.

Buffalo, N. Y., Nov. 27, 1873.

FROM ELD. J. S. WHITE.

BRO. STORRS: I have read the EXAMINER with a great deal of interest, though I do not endorse all that has been written.

I am led to the conclusion, either that all the human family that come under the head of accountability will have the offer of salvation through Christ, or that God did from the beginning predetermine that some portion of our race should not be saved. God has made provision for the salvation of all, or he has not. If he has not, then that was his purpose, and, of course, he purposed to leave them out; and it follows that they cannot be saved.

If Christ tasted death for every man, that is, for all men, and if this means that provision is made for the salvation of all, then this was his purpose; and it follows, that if he has not made provision for all, it was his purpose not to do so. If the atonement was made for all, and God in his providence has left a great part of the race in a condition in which they could have no knowledge of Christ in this life, and if they must believe in Christ in order to be saved, it follows that the provision made for them is useless, and it follows that God did purpose that some should be lost though he has made provision through his Son to save them. There can be no difference between making provision to save man, and then placing man in a condition so that he cannot be benefited by the provision, and making no provision for him at all.

There is no way brought to view in the Scriptures by which man can be saved, as a condition on his part, except by receiving Christ. If man cannot be saved without faith in Christ, and if God has placed him in a condition in this life so that he cannot believe in Christ, it follows that God will give him an opportunity to comply with the conditions of his salvation, or else the doctrine of predestination is true. That is, God did intend to save some by making provision and by giving them the means to accept the provision, and that He did purpose that others should perish by giving them no opportunity to comply with the conditions of salvation.

The subject is, to me, narrowed down to this point, Either God did predetermine that a great portion of the human family should not be saved, inasmuch as he has given them no chance to be saved, or he has purposed to give all an opportunity to comply with the provisions he has made through his Son for their salvation. I do not know which is the truth. But our friends, who oppose the views you advocate, must either receive them in the main, or receive the doctrine of election in the sense of foreordination and predestination.

Some say that God has given man a law in his nature by which he is to be judged, and by obedience to which he can be saved. "If there had been a law given which could have given life, verily righteousness should have been by the law. But the Scriptures hath concluded all under sin, that the promise by faith of Jesus Christ might be given to them that believe."—Paul.

East Boston, Mass., Dec., 1873.

FROM T. J. HARRIS.

BRO. STORRS: I agree mainly with the doctrines of the EXAMINER, and hope it may all be true; although I cannot say I understand it all. I have believed in probation after Christ comes since 1843; and I neither see nor hear anything to make me change that opinion. If Christ should come, shortly, and all would be destroyed that do not believe the Gospel, and probation end, there would be more lost than saved. I can not believe that; yet I hope and believe there will eventually be more saved than lost; for Christ did not die in vain; and He tasted death for every man—for the whole world; and God has given him all flesh; and he will see of the travail of his soul and be satisfied. I think He would hardly be satisfied if the devil should get the majority. I do not believe in universal salvation; but I believe there will, eventually, be more saved than most people believe. If Christ should come now, and probation end, there would be a great many prophecies unfulfilled; and I believe all that are not fulfilled in this age, will be in the age or ages to come; for God says that his word will not return unto him void, but will accomplish that to which it is sent.

Who the "little flock" are (Luke xii. 32), that are to possess the kingdom, I cannot tell, but always believed that it included all the saints, from Abel down to the present time; and I was requested (by Bro. Lingle) to ask you, if it included all the saints, or only a select few.

Yours, in hope of meeting you in the kingdom.

Harrisburg, Pa., Dec., 1873.

RESPONSE BY THE EDITOR.—I can only say, in response to the closing question, that all who have on the "wedding garment" will constitute the "little flock;" but must add the words of Jesus, viz., "Strive to enter in at the strait gate: for many, I say unto you, will seek to enter in, and shall not be able, when once the Master of the house is risen up and hath shut to the door." The door into the inheritance of the kingship and priesthood will close, so far as I can see, with the return of Jesus from heaven; for then "the times of the restitution" begin; and the workmen must be prepared before that can begin.

Those who have entered at the strait gate and walked in the narrow way, with their lights burning, will be heirs of the kingdom, and enter into the inheritance at their Lord's return. Worldly minded Christians, who are unwilling to bear reproach and suffer for Christ and his cause, will not have attained to that maturity which will fit them for the kingly and priestly offices; and hence will be excluded from that "high calling," and will "suffer loss;" yet they may be saved, "so as by fire" (1 Cor. iii. 11-15); which implies deep sorrow and affliction for past negligence: the amount and continuance of which I do not pretend to determine. All professed Christians will find that entire consecration to Christ and his cause is the wisest, the safest, the most blessed course. Let Christ be our pattern—our example, and strive, first of all, to be like Him, meek and lowly, till we attain to that maturity of grace which shall enable us to say, "I delight to do thy will, O God." Then we need have no fear that we shall not have "an abundant entrance into the everlasting kingdom of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ" (2 Pet. i. 11).

FROM RANDOLPH E. LADD.

BRO. STORRS: I am delighted with the change in the style and form of the BIBLE EXAMINER, from a Semi-monthly to Monthly, and from the large sheet to the octavo 32 page size; it so forcibly reminds me of its old time history, when its earlier battles were being fought with traditional errors, and its sometimes startling new positions were being taken. I think you have never printed a volume or a number that I have not read its contents, and I mean, by the mercy and favor of God, you never shall while I live.

To say that I am profited by the reading of it, is not sufficiently strong and comprehensive: I am much more than that; I am educated, enlightened, and every way better qualified to perform my duties as a servant of Jesus Christ. Coming monthly they afford me a "Thanksgiving feast," and fully as much as I can enjoy and digest and incorporate into my intellectual and spiritual being.

It has been my fault or misfortune that I am very slow to take advanced positions, and especially where it requires the re-adjusting or retracting of former ideas. But when the truth upon any point is made clear and unmistakable, my love for it will not allow me long to hesitate in embracing it.

I look back with pleasure over the past history of over thirty years that your labor of pen and tongue have been familiar and a delight to me, and I can most truly say, that more than any other man, living or dead, you have been my safest and best teacher.

I have never been so interested and profited by the EXAMINER as I am now. My whole being is full of hope that your present views, as therein set forth, are true, and I long to be as fully satisfied and convinced of their truth as I am that Jesus Christ is the Son of God and the Saviour of the world. I have no opposition to it in my heart, and but very feeble and few objections upon my tongue; and yet, you will allow me to say, that I have difficulties that will arise and cross my path, though they are sensibly diminishing as I continue to read, pray, think, and compare Scripture with Scripture.

Said a good sister to me, a few days since, to whom I had given some of the papers to read, "O, I do hope it is true with all my soul:" and the thought occurred to me, "Well, if the subject so strongly appeals to the sanctified heart of a servant of Jesus Christ, is it not an evidence in favor of its truth?"

I never read a more interesting and profitable series of articles than those by Henry Dunn on "The Study of the Bible:" every article is worth a year's subscription to the paper. But I will not specify where all is so intensely interesting and good.

May the blessed God preserve you and enable you to let the light shine forth through the BIBLE EXAMINER, until Zion's King shall come. Your brother in Christ.

THE BIBLE EXAMINER is a Monthly Magazine. Terms, $3 per year, in advance. When postage has to be prepaid, 12 cents must be added for that purpose.

Subscribers names should be written very plain. Do not neglect this. It is utterly impossible sometimes to decipher names, and mistakes must occur in consequence. As to their address, give us simply the name of the Post Office and State.

All communications to me should be addressed as follows:

GEO. STORRS,
Box 4,658, New York.

Any person wishing to see me personally should call at 72 Hicks street, Brooklyn, a very short distance from Fulton Ferry. Do not think it difficult to reach my residence. Hundreds come over from New York every Sunday to hear H. W. Beecher; and I reside within "a stone's throw" of his church. "Come and see."

GEO. W. YOUNG (Shipman & Sons), 25 Chambers street, near Centre, will receive money for the EXAMINER, that our friends wish to pay, personally, in New York City.

BOUND EXAMINERS.

Volumes 16 and 17 of the BIBLE EXAMINER, are now bound together in one, in stiff covers, i. e., in boards and cloth. The price for it will be $3.50; but as they will have to be sent by Express the purchaser must pay the Express charges when he receives it. Any person sending me five new subscribers for Vol. 18, with $10, shall have one copy of the bound one, as herein named. Those who wish to avail themselves of the two volumes bound in one should apply soon; as I cannot supply more than about 30 copies. Volumes 16 and 17 can still be had separately in strong flexible covers at $1.50 each.

Editor's Notices.

THIS MAGAZINE has now been sent five months to quite a number of persons who have made no response nor excuse for not remitting anything in its support. That "the times are hard" has been the excuse the Editor has made for this neglect; and he is willing still to wait on such as notify him of their determination to pay at the earliest possible period; but without such notice or a remittance, the regular issue of the EXAMINER will be embarrassed. Those, also, who have made "pledges" for its support will much oblige by an early remittance of the whole or a part of their pledge. Others who have made no pledges, who feel able and willing to help in this work, are invited to lend their aid. Let all please give an early response.

THE RAINBOW, ("New Series"), January, 1874, is received, filled with good and interesting matter. Dr. LEASK, its editor, holds on his way bravely, battling against the corrupt theology of the age, and in favor of Life and Immortality only by Christ, the Redeemer of our race. I hope to find more room for extracts from his Magazine soon.

GEO. W. YOUNG, 25 Chambers St., New York, still acts as agent for it. I presume, also, GEO. A. BROWN, 114 North 4th St., Philadelphia, Pa., is agent for it, as he is of the firm which, I understand, now publish it; and he is spending some time in this country soliciting orders for various Biblical works published by their firm in London, and has an office in Philadelphia, as above named.

"THE RESPONSIBILITY OF A CREATOR."—I have been repeatedly urged to publish in a Tract the article, by H. H. DOBNEY, on the above subject, which appeared in the BIBLE EXAMINER some eighteen months since. All I can now say is, No funds are on hand to do such work; and I shall not venture to publish tracts till there is a surplus beyond what is necessary to carry on this Magazine. If tracts are wanted, funds must be supplied. I have gone to the full extent of my duty in the matter.

THE BIBLE EXAMINER.—I will supply volume 17 in sheets (perfect sets) on the receipt of sixty cents. Also, odd numbers of that volume (or broken sets) for one cent for each two copies, which is simply to pay the postage. Who will scatter them?

I will still supply Nos. 1, 2, 3, or 4, of the present volume, for ten cents per copy to any one who wishes to send a sample to a friend; or three of either for 25 cents.

THE "SURPLUS SEED" THEORY.—Those who wish an antidote to the above named theory will find it in the BIBLE EXAMINER for November last, pages 39 and 40, under the head, "LET GOD BE TRUE." Please read it again and loan it to others, and send for more of that number, if you want them.

MRS. D. C. CORWIN, Chicago, Ill., writes: I am much interested in the contents of the BIBLE EXAMINER. It is a great help to me in reading and looking out what the LORD says to his people. He blesses and will uphold his own truth. To Him be all the glory. We will hold on and wait for Him: and if He tarry, we will wait for Him. Amen. Your sister waiting for the crown.

"One Mediator between God and man, the man Christ Jesus, who gave himself a ransom for all, to be testified in due time."—1 TIM. II. 5-6.

VOL. XVIII.

NEW YORK, FEBRUARY, 1874.

No. 5.

THE PRAYER OF JESUS, JOHN XVII.

This prayer of our Lord naturally divides itself into, at least, four parts: (1) for Himself; (2) for His disciples; (3) for those who should believe through the words of the disciples; and (4) for "the world."

I do not propose to examine it in detail. It occurred immediately after one of the most familiar and protracted discourses with His disciples, running through the three preceding chapters, and opens with this declaration, "These words spake Jesus, and lifted up his eyes to heaven, and said, Father," etc., (verse 1). That part which relates to the power given him, and the knowledge requisite to obtain life eternal. I pass for the present, and also the general prayer for himself.

2. He prays especially for His immediate disciples, whom He is about to leave, and for none others. That part being in verses 6 to 8, inclusive. "The world," or mass of men, were not included in those petitions, but expressly excluded at verse 9.

3. At verse 20 commences a more general supplication, viz., "For them, also, who shall believe on me through their (the disciples) words. The disciples form the first class; and believers in Jesus, through their teaching, form a second class; and what is specially prayed for them is, "That they may be one, as thou, Father, art in me, and I in thee, that they also may be one in us;" (what for?) "that the world may believe that thou hast sent me." He adds, "That they may be one, even as we are one; I in them, and thou in me, that they may be made perfect in one," (what for?) "and that the world may know that thou hast sent me, and hast loved them as thou hast loved me."

4. "The world," thou, are the subjects of Jesus' prayer; and all the petitions relating to His disciples and other believers are that they may be so prepared that "the world may believe and know that" the "Father want the Son to be the Saviour of the world" (1 John iv. 14); and this, says John, "we have seen and do testify."

But at present, "We know that . . . the whole world lieth in wickedness" (1 John v. 19). Is this to be the case always? Is Jesus' prayer never to be answered? He said, on another occasion, "Father, I thank thee that thou hast heard me; and I know that thou hearest me always" (John xi. 41, 42).

Two things, then, are certain: (1) Believers in Jesus are "all to be made perfect in one," (2) The world are to "believe and know" that the "Father sent the Son to be the Saviour of the world." Have either of these events ever yet taken place? Can they ever take place in this present life? But one answer can be given to these two questions; and that a negative one. Believers in Jesus never have been "perfect in one," in the sense of the prayer of Jesus. The world has never yet been led to believe or know, through that unity of believers, that Jesus was the "Sent" of God. All christendom to-day is witness that no such union of believers exists, and no such faith nor knowledge exists, in what is called "the world," as the prayer invokes, not even in christendom: much less in the millions of heathendom.

I ask again, Did Jesus ever ask of his Father anything that will not be granted? Did Jesus say, "All things, whatsoever ye shall ask in prayer, believing, ye shall receive" (Matt. xxi. 22)? and shall His own prayer be unanswered? Forbid such a blasphemous thought! Then the perfect oneness of Jesus' friends will yet be accomplished; but it has not been done and cannot now be done in this life, any more than the promise to Abraham that he should inherit the land can be fulfilled without a resurrection from the dead. It is not till the saints are raised from the dead that the unity prayed for will ever take place; and it follows, that not till after that will "the world believe and know" that the Father sent the "Son to seek and to save that which was lost."

Thus we perceive the prayer of Jesus carries us forward into "the ages to come;" and the past ages and the present one are only preparatory to the work of the glorious future: or, to the work to be performed in the kingdom of God, under a perfect King, with perfected, subordinate rulers, who are all made of one mind, seeing "eye to eye;" they being conformed to Jesus' prayer, "That they all may be one, as thou, Father, art in me, and I in thee, that they also may be one in Us." What a Rulership! What a government! What can withstand such a perfect administration? Then begins the world's true trial which is to determine each one's final state or destiny: and "a great multitude, which no man can number, of all nations, kindreds, people, and tongues" will "have washed their robes, and made them white in the blood of the Lamb," and will cry "with a loud voice, saying, Salvation to our God who sitteth upon the throne, and unto the Lamb." (Rev. vii.)

These are not the "few" who entered by the "strait gate;" nor "the little flock" to whom it was the "Father's good pleasure to give the kingdom;" they are another class; blessed and saved under the administration of the perfected class who had all become one in the Father and the Son; and so "the world" is made to "believe and know" that Jesus is the rightful Lord and Redeemer of the world; and, hence, they ascribe praise to "God which sitteth upon the throne, and unto the Lamb." When this is accomplished, and not till then, Jesus' prayer will have its full answer, and the great Jubilee will come, "shadowed" forth by the law; and the final "ingathering," or harvest, will follow the "first-fruit" at a later period. The first-fruits are to be "Christ, and they that are his at his coming" (1 Cor. xv. 23); for, says James, "Of His own will begat he us with the word of truth, that we should be a kind of first-fruits of his creatures" (i. 18). Jesus, his disciples, and all that "believe on Him," through "the word of truth," in this life, make up the first-fruits from among the dead; being reconciled to God, in the life that now is, by the word of truth; which word of truth "God will have all men come to the knowledge of," so that such as have not had that knowledge in the past nor present age will have it made known to them "in the ages to come;" then to be set forth to them by "the manifestation of the sons of God" (Rom. viii. 19); or, as says the Apostle, "God, who is rich in mercy, for His great love wherewith He loved us, even when we were dead in sins, hath quickened us together with Christ . . . that in the ages to come He might show the exceeding riches of His grace in His kindness toward us through Christ Jesus" (Eph. ii. 4-7); thus demonstrating to the hitherto untaught millions, or masses, of the human race, the "riches of His grace," and encouraging them to "trust in Christ" (chap. i. 12, 13) for a deliverance from sin and all its consequences, when "the word of truth is clearly exhibited to them, and Christ with his glorified and united saints "shall make all men see what is the fellowship of the mystery, which from the beginning of the ages hath been hid in God, who created all things by (or, for) Jesus Christ" . . . "according to the purpose of the ages, which He purposed in Christ Jesus our Lord" (Eph. iii. 9, 11).

Thus we see a fulness in our blessed Lord's prayer that is but little thought of even by Christians, so prone are they to confine the great work of redemption to the present life; and giving infidels and all untaught men to think, that God's work for the race is a small affair, far more of evil than good, and unworthy of a Being professed to be infinite in wisdom, power, goodness and love. Let our hearts be enlarged to comprehend more of "the unsearchable riches of Christ;" and better understand the great idea of the apostle when he says, of "God our Father," He "having made known unto us the mystery of His will, according to His good pleasure which He hath purposed in Himself: that in the dispensation of the fulness of times He might gather together in one all things in Christ, both which are in heaven, and which are on earth; even in Him" (Eph. i. 9, 10). How long shall the character and government of "Our Father in heaven" be dishonored by His professed friends, and who are really such, but whose minds have been blinded by the corrupters of the truth and bound by the traditions and creeds of men? May God soon take away this "vail that is spread over all" christiandom, and the "Sun of righteousness arise with healing in his wings."

THE TERMS OF FINAL SALVATION: OR, THE POSSESSION OF AN ENDLESS LIFE.

GREAT MISTAKES have been committed in relation to this subject. Since the failure of Adam, no one of the human race has ever been put "under law," as a condition of endless life; for, "If there had been a law given which could have given life, verily righteousness should have been by the law" (Gal. iii. 21). "Therefore, by the deeds of the law there shall be no flesh justified in His sight" (Rom. iii. 20). Law is an Educator. Says Paul, "I had not known sin, but by the law: for I had not known lust except the law had said, Thou shalt not covet" (Rom. vii. 7). "The law is holy, and the commandment holy, just and good" (verse 12). The law exhibits the purity and excellence of the Divine character; hence, "Sin is the transgression of the law" (1 John iii. 4); and, therefore, is opposition to the character of God. Hence the law is to educate men, or to give them a sense of the Divine purity and of their need of Divine interposition in order that the original design of raising man into the "IMAGE" of his CREATOR may be accomplished.

In order to raise man into the image of God, he must first be made sensible of his present unlikeness to his Creator. For this purpose the Divine character is set before him in law. Thus his education begins, and man soon finds he is unlike God, and of course lacks harmony with Him. The law acts as "a schoolmaster" (Gal. iii. 24): it teaches us our utter inability to come into harmony with God and attain to the Divine image without a new creation, which no finite arms can produce. When man is thoroughly convinced that he must seek aid outside of himself, he cries out, "O wretched man that I am! who shall deliver me from the body of this death" (Rom. vii. 24). Now the law has accomplished all it can do: it has educated the man up to the extent of its power. Here he is led to look about to see if any provision has been made for his deliverance from this "bondage of corruption" (Rom. viii. 21): to see in what way, if, any, he can become a child of God, and bear His image. He is now prepared to receive that grace which is manifested in Jesus, the "Anointed" of God to bring up the race to the Divine image—to a perfect harmony with God—and so be fitted to live forever, or eternally.

The law has now done its work as an Educator, but is not able to do more: the man now takes "Christ as the end of the law for righteousness" (Rom. x. 4), and the work of God is established and an endless life secured.

I now repeat what I said at the outset, "No one of Adam's race has ever been put under law as a condition of endless life." This is not saying that men are not under law for any purpose; they certainly are for some purpose, and for a wise one. We have seen what that purpose is. Under law they receive according to their deeds such pains and penalties as the law specifies, and such as naturally result from their conduct; and the ultimate, so far as the present state is concerned, is death: they return to the ground from which man was originally taken. But we have no authority from God's word for saying that is the final state of those who die without the knowledge of God and Christ; for all men are born "under grace;" i. e., under a dispensation of love and mercy; and their eternal destiny is to be decided by their acceptance or rejection thereof; and not by any law dispensation. This decision cannot be made in relation to one soul of the human family till the object of "faith," or of acceptance, is placed before that soul, so that it cannot be mistaken; then if it is rejected there is no excuse; and such individual will utterly perish as the result of a wilful and conscious refusal of salvation as an act of the grace of God in Jesus Christ.

I have said the death which has passed upon all men is not final; for, Christ hath redeemed all men from it; not by preventing its occurrence, but by restoring all men from it by a resurrection, or making them alive again: thus destroying the works of the devil—the d'evil. All the evil introduced by sin is to be removed by the Second Adam; and no one will eternally perish except such as wilfully and knowingly reject the Redeemer after they have come to a clear and full knowledge of the truth that "He gave himself a ransom for" them; which work of Christ will be made known in God's "DUE TIME;" which time He has "put in His own power" (1 Tim. ii. 6, and Acts i. 7). We are certain however that it has never yet come to millions on millions; but God has appointed "the ages to come" to make known "the riches of His grace;" and is now, and has been for near six thousand years, preparing "a people for His name," who, as "joint-heirs with Christ," shall bless every son and daughter of Adam, or "all the kindreds, or families of the earth" with the knowledge of His love and mercy, and present the Son of God to them as their Redeemer and "Lord, to the glory of God the Father" (Phil. ii. 11). This presentation will not be in vain: for "A great multitude which no man can number, of all nations, kindreds, people and tongues" will join in the cry, saying, "Salvation to our God which sitteth upon the throne and unto the Lamb;" yea, they will "have washed their robes and made them white in the blood of the Lamb" (Rev. vii. 9-14).

This does not look like the "little flock" who shall "inherit the kingdom," nor like the "few" who "enter in at the strait gate." Clearly, there are two classes of the finally saved: the first, few indeed, who are to be "kings and priests unto God and the Lamb," and "reign on the earth" to bless and save the multitudes which no man can number, who form the second class of saved ones, and are the fruits gathered in "the ages to come:" a great harvest to the glory of God the Father and the praise of His grace in Jesus Christ and the honor of His chosen Bride.

THE USES OF EVIL.

"Who did sin, this man or his parents, that he was born blind? Jesus answered, Neither hath this man sinned, nor his parents" [that he should be born blind]: "but that the works of God should be made manifest in him" (John ix. 2, 3).

We too hastily conclude where we see evil endured by our fellow men that it is the consequence of sin, either in the person himself or of his progenitors, and so it has become a theological dogma that all the evil in the world resulted from Adam's sin. That much evil has resulted from the misconduct of our progenitors cannot be denied; but that all evil thus resulted is unsupported by proof and contradicted by the Saviour in the text before us. Evil, during a disciplinary state, is as essential as good, and without it good could never have been known. "Good and evil" were joined together in the first man's trial: one could not be known without the other: the same tree bear both fruits; if man ate of the tree at all he necessarily became possessed of the knowledge of both at the same time. That man should possess the knowledge, "in due time," was clearly his Maker's design, or that tree would never had a place in the Garden of Eden. But the man was to wait the "due time," which "the Father had put in His own power" (Acts i. 7). The prohibition about eating of that tree was, clearly, only for a time, and a trial of man's faith in his CREATOR, or his reliance on His wisdom and goodness. "The knowledge of good and evil" was learned by eating of the tree; and the evil was increased by an act of disobedience; it brought death in its train, and thereby increased the evil. As a penalty, however, death did not come upon one of Adam's posterity for his sin. Paul settles that question when he says, "For the creature was made subject to vanity, not willingly" (i. e., not by his own act), "but by reason of Him who hath subjected in hope:" and he adds, "The creature itself also shall be delivered from the bondage of corruption into the glorious liberty of the children of God" (Rom. viii. 20, 21).

Subjection to a short life, death, and corruption—so far as Adam's posterity was concerned—was not for his sin: our progenitor's sin did not bring death to us as a penalty; we were subjected to it, "that the works of God should be made manifest in" us. This will be done by a reversal of death through and by God's Son, "Jesus Christ, who hath abolished (annulled, or abrogated) death, and hath brought life and immortality to light" (2 Tim. i. 10).

"Neither hath this" race "sinned, nor," our progenitor, "that" we should be subjected to the death that has come upon all the posterity of Adam; but "that the" wonderful "works of God," in his wisdom, knowledge, love and power, "should be made manifest in" us by a new creation; bringing all the race back, out of death that we may live endlessly if we will accept such a life, by our own personal act, by the acceptance of the LIFE-GIVER, Jesus the Redeemer, when He is clearly presented to us as such. He it is who will "work the works of God," and manifest the glory of the Father; in the first place, by delivering all the race "from the bondage of" physical "corruption;" and, also, "from the bondage of" moral "corruption" to "as many as receive Him:" to all such will "He give power to become the children of God" (John i. 12, and Rom. viii. 21).

Thus shall evil—like "the wrath of man" (Ps. lxxvi. 10)—be made to manifest the glorious works of God; and its final and utter removal from the race will lead all intelligences to join in saying, "Great and marvellous are thy works, Lord God Almighty; just and true are thy ways, thou King of saints" (Rev. xv. 3). Ed.

THE TWO-FOLD UNION WITH CHRIST.

I have said this two-fold union has been entirely overlooked by the advocates of the Non-resurrection theory. Though they had not considered the fact of this two-fold union, they had almost uniformly based the doctrine of the non-resurrection of any one on unbelief.

In order to an exclusion from a future life, the truth "concerning the kingdom of God, and the name of Jesus Christ" (Acts viii. 12), and the love of God to the world in making "the man Christ Jesus a ransom for all," must be "testified" to men in this life, or they cannot, in a gospel sense, be guilty of unbelief. Therefore such persons as have not had this testimony in this life, are entitled to a future life to hear these truths on the ground of God's promise and oath that all families of the earth shall be blessed in Abraham and his seed; and because the seed spoken of had a fleshly or human union with all men, or all the race of Adam; being "the seed of the woman," who should bruise the serpent's head, and "destroy death" (viz., the death that came by the first Adam). No man, therefore, can be holden of that death (because Christ has "tasted death for every man"), and can only be enslaved to death by wilful unbelief in God offered mercy after that offer has been distinctly made to him.

That Christ Jesus was united to the race—a partaker of human nature in all its attributes—is clearly set forth in the Scriptures of truth. We shall at this time notice only a few texts in proof of this position. God said to the man Moses, "I will raise them up a prophet from among their brethren, like unto thee," etc., (Deut. xviii. 18). "Unto us a child is born, unto us a son is given," etc., (Isa. ix. 6). "Thus speaketh the LORD of hosts, Behold the man whose name is the BRANCH," etc., (Zech. vi. 12, 13). "The man Christ Jesus" (1 Tim. ii. 5). "Forasmuch as the children are partakers of flesh and blood, he also himself likewise took part of the same," etc., (Heb. ii. 14).

We might multiply texts to any extent, showing that Christ Jesus took on him our nature, with all its liabilities and infirmities, and "was tempted in all points like as we are, yet without sin" (Heb. iv. 15); but those we have given sufficiently establish the fact that He had a human union with our race, a union which can only be dissolved by a wilful refusal to hear and obey him: "It shall come to pass, whosoever will not hearken unto my words which He (that prophet) shall speak in My name, I will require it of him" (Deut. xviii. 19, and Acts ii. 22, 23). No man can refuse to "hearken" to the words which "that prophet shall speak" till he has heard them, and is not an unbeliever, in a gospel sense, till then; hence the union with Jesus' humanity remains; and Christ went down under death "that He might be Lord both of the dead and the living" (Rom. xiv. 9).

It was in Christ's humanity he made atonement, or the reconciliation; for, "having made peace through the blood of the cross" (Col. i. 20),

He is set, of the Father, "to reconcile all things unto himself." Glorified humanity is to carry on the work of reconciliation, and to this end is pledged to see that "every creature" shall hear the gospel message. This human union, death did not and could not dissolve; that union can only be dissolved by a wilful rejection of the words of "that Prophet" who speaks God's words of love and truth. No obstacle, not even death itself, can prevent "all men, everywhere," from hearing those "words," by the acceptance or rejection of which their final state will be determined.

The divine union, or union by the Spirit, far exceeds the human one; because it secures immortality and an endless life; while the human one secures life, but not necessarily an unending one, though it may be made so by faith when the knowledge of God and his Christ is made known to those for whom Jesus "gave himself a ransom," viz., "all men." E.D.

A QUESTION.

"I wish to get your answer to a question I have had on my mind some time. viz., What truth, if any, was brought out in the doctrine of "Life only in Christ?" E.

ANSWER.—The "truth" of man's natural and inherent mortality, and consequent exposure to utter extinction of being, in opposition to the heresy of inherent immortality and liability to eternal torments. Also, it exalted Jesus as the author of all future "life and immortality" by "abolishing death," and thus opening the way into life and immortality" (2 Tim. i. 10).

ANOTHER QUESTION.

"Can the masses about us be said to have had Christ and the Gospel testified to them in the false Gospels and God-dishonoring doctrines of the present day? How many there are, in youth and early manhood and womanhood, who are brought to death, who have been putting off accepting Christ, but who have had it in their thoughts sometime to attend to it. Who shall say how much tradition and the commandments of men, dispensed from the pulpit, has had to do in darkening their minds to a better knowledge of a kind and merciful Creator?" E.

RESPONSE BY THE EDITOR.—It is extremely doubtful if "the masses," in what are called "Gospel lands," have had much more knowledge of "the only true God and Jesus Christ" than the pagans. True, they have heard these names; but the true character and work of God, or of the Christ, they have remained ignorant of through false teaching: they have been stumbled by the "vain conversation received by tradition from their fathers" (1 Pet. i. 18); so that their conceptions of the God and Christ, preached to them, were anything but attractive: indeed, multitudes have had no higher conceptions of the service of God than that it would save them from a hell of eternal torments, which they were led to suppose an angry and revengeful God would inflict on them. No wonder such persons should delay the service of such a God to the latest period of life in which it would be possible to escape His vengeance.

But I pretend not to determine who has had the knowledge of "the only true God and Jesus Christ;" of that, God alone is the judge; but I do know that each and every soul of the human race, at some period, in this age or "the ages to come," shall have that knowledge; for "God will have all men . . . come to the knowledge of the truth" (1 Tim. ii. 4); and death, nor any other agency, can not defeat His will in this matter: "For there is one God, and one mediator between God and men, the man Christ Jesus, who gave himself a ransom for all" men, "to be testified" to all men "in due time." That "due time" is God's time, and is in "the Father's own power" (Acts i. 7).

THE QUESTION AT ISSUE.

THE question at issue, in my view of the promise and oath of God to Abraham, is not, How many will finally be saved? Nor, How many will finally perish? It does not relate even to the means God may employ in fulfilling that promise and oath, whether by a resurrection or otherwise; but it is a question as to whether the promise and oath secures to all the posterity of the first Adam the knowledge of God's Remedy for sin and death; thus placing every man, woman and child in a true probationary state with the means of improving the remedy so as to secure final salvation from sin and death.

Let all, who oppose this view, keep this issue in mind, if they expect to get a reply from me. I cannot be drawn away by side issues. Let opposers prove, if they can, that such a probation as I contend for is not embraced in the assurance of God in Eden and His promise and oath to Abraham. Then, and not till then, do they touch the question at issue.

I maintain and affirm that, A Remedy has been provided for every individual of the human race; and that God has pledged himself that every one of them shall have the benefit of it, so far as that all shall have the knowledge of it, some time and some how, with the means necessary to an improvement of it; and that nothing but a wilful rejection of it will prevent their final deliverance from sin and death.

Again, I say, how many will improve it, or by what means God will communicate the knowledge to each individual of the race, has, in fact, nothing to do with the question at issue. That may be one of the "secret things" which belong unto the LORD our God" (Deut. xxix. 29): but the "Promise and oath of God," being "revealed, belong unto us and to our children forever."

Ed.

WHAT IS THE WORD OF FAITH?

It is, "If thou shalt confess with thy mouth the Lord Jesus, and shalt believe in thine heart that God hath raised Him from the dead, thou shalt be saved; for with the heart man believeth unto righteousness; and with the mouth confession is made unto salvation" (Rom. x. 9, 10). Paul informs us, this was the teaching of God by Moses; and, in proof of it, refers to Deut. xxx. 12-14, which read and compare with Rom. x. 1-11. Faith in a promised DELIVERER to come or already come has always been God's method for salvation; but in order to such faith that DELIVERER must be proclaimed to "every creature;" and God has pledged Himself by promise and oath that it shall be done; and no man can annul His word to make it of "none effect" ultimately, by any theory of his own. "Let God be true" if it makes every "man a liar." Faith in a promised or given Redeemer—"the seed of the woman—the seed of Abraham"—is essential to salvation; but such faith can never be exercised where that promise or that fact has not been proclaimed: hence no soul of man can be hopelessly condemned till the promise or fact has been made known to him; and it follows, inevitably, that some time in this life the Redeemer will be made known to "every creature," or such a revelation will take place in a future life; for Death cannot annul God's promise and oath. "The word of faith" is the word relating to God's provision for man's redemption; or, His remedy for sin and death.

THE STUDY OF THE BIBLE.

BY HENRY DUNN.

CHAPTER XII.

On Bias, as Arising from Personal and Ecclesiastical Interests.

"By what unseen, and unsuspected arts,
The serpent, Error, twines round human hearts."

COWPER.

THE BIAS OF INTEREST is so much manner in its nature than that of affection, and so much less worthy of respect than that which arises from reverence for great men and past ages, that, however powerful its influence, people rarely acknowledge themselves to be under its sway. And yet without attributing any special baseness, who can deny that, as a fact, "the interpretation of Scripture has got mixed up with worldly interests and parties, and passions and feeling, and is influenced as much by these causes as the view taken by Radicals or Conservatives of an Act of Parliament, or of an historical document, is influenced by their respective opinions."

To suppose that such influences act only in connection with national establishments and permanent endowments, is simply absurd. The property of voluntary associations, as secured by trust-deeds; income, likely to be withheld on any material change of sentiment; status in a sect; trade derived from a congregation; professional connections, and possible alliances,—all have their weight,—sometimes in deciding the choice a man makes of his spiritual home, and much more frequently in preventing the adoption of opinions likely to be offensive, or even distasteful, to others.

Such are the terrible hindrances from BIAS, which now stand in the way of a full and fair investigation as to what is or is not, religious truth.

But are we, then, to conclude that to interpret Scripture like any other book is simply impossible; that every man who is of age to set about such a work, must of necessity do so either under the influence of authority or interest, or else in blind subjection to the prejudices of his birth and education? By no means. The same forms of truth may not indeed adapt themselves to all classes of minds. They never have done so yet, and they probably never will. It may be, for aught we know, undesirable that they should. But of this we may be assured, that when it pleased God to make known his mind and will to man by and through a book he meant that book to be understood; that if it is not understood, the fault is ours, and not His; that the hindrances to its comprehension are moral and not intellectual; and that it is impossible for us to say to what extent unity of judgment in relation to its teachings might be realized were men but honestly disposed to study its contents with no other object than to ascertain what it says.

Eternal Spirit! who alone canst enable us to rightly apply Thy Holy Word, grant that we may derive from it those lessons only which Thou didst intend it to impart; that so, being preserved from all the errors and inventions of men, we may evermore walk in Thy light, through Jesus Christ our Lord.

CHAPTER XIII.

On what is Often Called, Reading the Bible for "Edification."

THE late Dr. Maitland, in an ingenious essay on impediments to the right understanding of Scripture, introduces a man of business, who, with a certain sort of self-satisfaction, apologizes for his own shortcomings thus,—“I am a plain Christian, worried with the cares of my business and family, and glad to catch half an hour to read my Bible. I must make the most of it. I must employ the little leisure I can snatch at intervals in devotional reading, and my object must be my own edification.”

The reply made to him is,—“To be sure, you must read for your edification; but what is the distinction which you seem to draw between reading for your edification, and reading with a view to learn all that God offers to teach?”

He answers,—“Why, I mean that I must read the Scriptures with application to myself, to my own circumstances, to my own soul. If I come to a part which I do not understand, I have not time and learning to investigate its meaning; and when I attempt it, I often find that the time, which should have been employed in devotion, has been wasted in turning over commentators, from whom, after all, I get, perhaps, no satisfaction as to the real meaning of the passage, though some of the more pious and practical among them may assist me in applying it to myself. Now, if I do not thus derive a personal application to myself, what use is there in my reading such a part of Scripture at all?”

The rejoinder which follows—and it expresses the one great lesson we are anxious to impress in the present chapter, is this,—“To speak plainly, I do not know that, with your views and ideas, there is much use in your reading such a part of Scripture, because, as soon as you have found that you cannot understand it, or make it apply to yourself as it stands, you set to work to make some meaning which you do not yourself believe to be the real meaning, and to fetch out some doctrine or precept which the text does not contain; and this habit is so prejudicial, that I believe it would be better for you only to read such parts as you cannot doubt do really apply to your own circumstances. It is not likely that you will reap any benefit from reading the rest of the Scriptures, sufficient to counterbalance the injury which must arise from the habit of setting aside all inquiry as to the real meaning of the Word of God, and fancying that any imaginations of your own are more profitable than the mind of the Spirit."

If this method of treating Scripture, so graphically described, be common, and we fear it is, we may cease to wonder that so much of God's Word is unintelligible to the general reader. Any book, thus handled, must necessarily become so; for the moment we allow ourselves to read with any other aim than to understand the meaning of the writer, we darken that which is before us so thoroughly, that it is all but hopeless to expect it can ever become clear.

In reading Scripture, we are bound, and that most emphatically,—no less by reverence for its Author than by integrity of heart, to ask but one question,—“What does it say?” And if, to get this question answered, it is necessary to ascertain not only what the precise words are, but when and to whom they were spoken, to observe the connection in which they stand, and to note the circumstances under which they were uttered, we must neither grudge the labor that may be involved, nor imagine that we can evade its necessity by indulging in our own fancies, however ingenious they may be, or by prolonging mere meditation, however spiritual or devout. When the true meaning of a passage is made out, and not till then, shall we be able to apply it with simplicity of purpose, or receive and realize as living words that which has been written or spoken.

In doing this, a thoughtful and intelligent reader will gladly avail himself of such help as he can obtain. For the meaning of words, he will pay attention to the marginal readings given in the Authorized Version; he will consult intelligent commentators; he may, perhaps, think it worth while to learn enough Greek to enable him to study such “Notes” as those of Dean Alford.

For the rest, ordinary sagacity will generally suffice. The Bible always takes for granted that readers are possessed of common sense; that they will give the same kind and amount of attention to inspired statements which they are in the habit of bestowing on ordinary writings; and that they will read its communications continuously, and as a whole.

CHAPTER XIV.

On Reading to Ascertain the Sense.

No one who has not tried the experiment, can imagine what a flood of light falls upon a Pauline Epistle, when it is read through at one sitting, with quickened attention to its scope and purpose. In no other way can we perceive its lights and shadows, its tone and perspective, or get above the one-sided interpretations which are continually thrust upon us both from the press and the pulpit. And that which is true of the Epistles, is true also in relation to other parts of the Divine Record.

Instead of treating Scripture in this way,—supplicating the Holy Spirit for a right state of heart, and in harmony with that supplication, struggling manfully against the impulses of prejudice and pride,—too many never read the Bible at all, excepting under the limitations imposed by chapter and verse; and then, for the most part, with an utter disregard of the connection subsisting between that which they peruse, and that which they omit. Prayer for Divine Light seems, to such persons, all that is required in order to arrive at truth, however idle, or uncandid, or bigoted they may be.

The tendency which textual preaching has to foster this habit of reading Scripture merely in disjointed fragments, has frequently been adverted upon. We are now, however, only speaking of the private reading of the Word; and in relation to this, we say deliberately that, if we would be honest before God,—if we would shrink with righteous susceptibility from sacrificing a true thought, in order to gain thereby the use of mere words in favor of some doctrine or practice to which they were never intended to apply,—we shall feel that nothing can justify the use of any portion of God's Word apart from a consideration of the context, or in a sense different from that which it bears in the portion of the record from which it is taken.

It is this carelessness about truth in the application of Scripture that has made the fathers, with all their eloquence and piety, such untrustworthy interpreters. It is this which compels us in perusing their writings, to pause and doubt; since passing events, party interests, or the hope of polemical triumphs, were, to them, a continual excuse for the most outrageous violations of the original meaning of the Inspired Volume. It is this which forces from us the exclamation, "The words that are used are the words of the Prophet or the Evangelist, but the preacher stands behind them and adapts them to his own purposes."

Hence it is that patristic writers so often support a great cause "in a spirit alien to its own;" sometimes adopting arguments that are unchristian in their ultimate grounds; sometimes "resting upon errors the refutation of errors;" and sometimes "drawing upon the armories of darkness for weapons that, to be durable, ought to have been of celestial temper;" now, it may be, trespassing against "affections which furnish to Christianity its moving powers;" and now against "truths which furnish to Christianity its guiding lights." On behalf of God "they often seem determined to be wiser than God; and, in demonstration of spiritual power, they do not scruple to advance doctrines which the Scriptures have nowhere warranted." * The issue of it all was,—THE ROMISH APOSTACY.

The dangers of the present day are not so very dissimilar as they may at first sight appear. It is chiefly through misapplications of inspired words, that so many are now led to choose startling rather than Scriptural modes of doing good; sometimes to adopt language, both in prayer and preaching, which would almost seem to imply that the speaker loves the ignorant and the wretched more than Christ does; and sometimes to talk as if they forgot that the most enlightened spiritual convictions are those which are most habitually held in submission to our Maker, and which are least tinged by self-seeking or display. Nor is the fear groundless that in proportion as the Church sanctions any kind of extravagance in the use of Scripture, will the ground of faith itself be nullified; certainty in Bible interpretation be destroyed; and arbitrary principles be established, which must eventually lead either to ignorant credulity or to universal scepticism.

We lay it down, therefore, as a rule which should never be violated, that he who would understand his Bible must beware of throwing false associations around true words, or of applying the truths of Revelation in any way not in harmony with the aim and object of the Revealer.

CHAPTER XV.

On the Accommodation of Scripture.

THAT accommodations of Scripture are, to a certain extent, sanctioned both by our Lord and his apostles, cannot be questioned; yet, be it observed, always under conditions which prevent misconception. In no instance that we are of does a quotation made on inspired authority aware darken the primary or literal meaning; on the contrary, in most cases, a clear and distinct recognition of the original sense is involved; and in all, the citation, whether allusive, or illustrative, or intended to indicate parallel circumstances, is simple and natural.

* De Quincey and Dr. Jowett's Essay.

Hindrances are occasioned whenever the words of Scripture are so used as to cloud their true meaning; when the reader, instead of being enlightened, is misled by biblical quotation; and when the mind of the Spirit, though professedly expressed, is really neglected or perverted.

Such is unquestionably the case when texts intended for one purpose are applied to another; when the messages of the Prophets to Israel of old are read as if they were addressed to the men of this generation; when warnings of temporal calamity are silently changed into threatenings of eternal woe; when promises of earthly good are transformed into predictions of spiritual blessing; and when Christ is supposed to be referred to, in passages which clearly indicate that no such thought was in the mind of the inspired speaker or writer.

The examples we propose to give must be regarded only as specimens of a class; they are furnished chiefly for the purpose of illustration.

(1) "Prepare to meet thy God" (Amos iv. 12) is frequently used in public discourse as if the Prophet, in these words, called upon all men to prepare for death and judgment. Yet this is not the fact. The sacred writer is not referring to death at all, but to the temporal judgments which God had inflicted, and threatened still to inflict, on the rebellious Israelites. The passage that ought to be quoted for the warning of the ungodly is Acts xvii. 31, since this is unquestionably addressed to such persons, and is, moreover, a distinct, revelation of the New Testament.

(3) "The harvest is past, the summer is ended, and we are not saved" (Jer. viii. 20). This text is constantly quoted as if it implied that for the parties spoken of the day of grace was past; and then the words that immediately follow,— "Is there no balm in Gilead; is there no physician there?" are regarded as prophetic of Christ. Yet, taken as they stand, and in connection with the circumstances under which they were uttered they simply mean, "One year after another,—one campaign after another,—passes, and we are not saved from the enemy." (Matt. Henry.)

(8) "Thine eyes shall see the king in his beauty: they shall behold the laud that is very far off" (Isa. xxxiii. 17). How often have these words been whispered in the ear of the dying believer, in the sense of a promise that he shall soon see Christ, and find rest in heaven. And yet (like 1 Cor. ii. 9) it has no such reference. The true meaning is, "The king (Hezekiah) shall put off his sackcloth, and shall appear in his beautiful and royal robes; and, the siege being raised, they (the people) shall go abroad, the empire of Hezekiah shall be extended, and distant parts be thrown open to them." (Henry, Loeth, Boothroyd, and others.) It is quite true that the Christian looks forward to a period when his eyes shall see Christ, his King, in His beauty, and enjoy a bliss greater than eye hath seen, or ear heard, or the heart of man conceived; yet nothing can excuse the persersion of texts, in order to express a truth capable of being well supported by legitimate means.

(4) "And Gallio cared for none of those things" (Acts xviii. 17). This passage is frequently expounded as if it meant that the Deputy of Achaia was a man equally regardless of right or wrong,—too indolent or careless to take the trouble even to be just. The reverse is, however, the fact. It was because he was an upright Roman magistrate, and felt that his jurisdiction did not extend to questions relating to the Jewish law, that he refused to allow himself to be mixed up with the senseless prejudices and passions of an excited mob. To call a man, who is careless about spiritual things, a Gallio, is as absurd as it is misleading.

We have very recently heard of a sermon having been preached, on the death of a most excellent chief pastor of the Church of England, from this text, "And his Bishopric let another take" (Acts i. 20), in utter forgetfulness that it applied to Judas; and also of a popular Romanist writer having defended the rapid utterance of "Masses" by the Catholic Clergy from the passage, "That thou doest, do quickly" (John xiii. 27). Absurdities like these seem scarcely credible, and yet there is no limit to them if once we allow ourselves to be guided by sound, rather than by sense.

We quote two more instances in point,—

(1) "I have trodden the wine-press alone; and of the people there was none with me" (Isaiah lxiii. 3). This passage, in consequence of its frequent accommodation, is commonly understood to refer to the sufferings of the Saviour. Bishop Heber, and other hymn writers, use it in this sense, as if they were quite unconscious of its true meaning. And yet the slightest attention to the context will show that it really refers to Christ's coming in triumph, to take vengeance on His enemies. No other meaning can be attached to it, except by stopping in the middle of a verse. The text, as a whole, thus reads,—"I will tread them (not be trodden upon by them) in mine anger, and trample them in my fury; and their blood shall be sprinkled on my garments, and I will stain all my raiment. For the day of vengeance is in mine heart, and the year of my redeemed is come" (ver. 3, 4). Compare with this passage Rom. xvi. 20; Rev. xiv. 19; and xix. 11-13, and all is plain.

(2) "The whole head is sick, and the whole heart faint. From the sole of the foot even unto the head there is no soundness in it; but wounds, and bruises, and putrefying sores" (Isa. i. 5, 6), is a text constantly used in prayer to express the doctrine of the depravity of human nature. The slightest attention to the context would suffice to show that the words in question simply refer to the condition of Israel as stricken by punishment. She is compared to one who has been beaten from head to foot.

Again, "An inference or a lesson may be very scriptural, and yet not justly derived from the text we quote for it. When Ehud said to Eglon, 'I have a message from God unto thee' (Judges iii. 20), he uttered some striking words; but his message was a dagger, and his intention murder. Is a minister justified in making these words the text of a Gospel sermon? We think not; because Ehud told a falsehood, whereas the preacher tells truth, and comes with a message of love for men's salvation."

Further, "In the words of a verse in the Prayer-book Version of the Psalms, Christians often pray they may be 'like giants refreshed with new wine.' The expression (Psa. lxxviii. 65) is a bold simile, applied, not to man, but to the Lord,—refers to his wrath upon his enemies, and suggests no Christian graces whatever."

Is it needful to say that such a method of quoting Scripture,—in accordance, not with truth, but with our own preconceived notions,—is every way misleading and mischievous? Is it not clothing our human thought in a Divine garment, and then demanding for it an authority to which it has no claim? Never should it be forgotten that Scripture is Inspired Truth only in the sense in which it was originally given; in no other form whatever can it, with any propriety, be termed the Word of God.

On this subject, the late Dr. Pye Smith has some admirable observations in his "Principles of Interpretation." Speaking of the evils which arise from thus accommodating Scripture, he observes,—“It may be said, indeed, that the citation is merely made in the same way in which men often quote a line of poetry, and apply it to any new occasion. Yet it should be recollected, that in so applying a fine passage of Virgil or Milton, for instance, we can do no harm; we can lead no man into error by it; the new application is never supposed to have been the original intention of the author. But since the Scriptures are the repository of God’s Revelation, it is evidently a far more serious matter for us to quote scriptural passages, even in an incidental way. It is almost certain that most hearers and readers will imagine, that the transient citation or allusion is mentioned as evidence in the particular respect for which it is adduced.

“The habit of quoting passages of Scripture in ways which imply a meaning and application exceedingly remote from their genuine design is not a trifling evil. It is pregnant with injuries to the cause of scriptural knowledge and practical edification. It encourages among Christians a widely prevailing practice of reading the Scriptures with little attention, and of applying detached passages in sentences entirely foreign to their proper meaning.”

Let the object we have in view in writing these chapters be steadily kept in mind,—the promotion of a more intelligent reading of Holy Scripture, by pointing out and seeking to remove the various hindrances which at present interfere with our so doing,—and it will be seen at once that the “accommodations” of which we complain, whatever may be the intentions of those who make and defend them, do really “darken counsel,” and so far tend to destroy the Divine testimony. Read with the impressions produced by such expositions as those we have referred to, the Bible instead of being felt to be, as it really is, the most interesting book ever penned, becomes to the reader dull, because mads dark; and hard to understand, because treated as if it were a mere collection of disjointed fragments to be interpreted by the aid of devout fancy or spiritual caprices.

GOD’S BLESSING TO ABRAHAM.

[Concluded from the last number.]

TO WHAT EXTENT WILL THE SEED BLESS THE NATIONS?

To the extent of their necessity. The great necessity of the world is a righteous rulership. Every department of society needs a head, a righteous headship. Every individual needs a head. Every family needs a head. Every school district, every town and every county and nation needs a head. The world itself needs a head, a righteous rulership, and always will need it. To meet this necessity, God has provided that the saints shall be complete in Christ, the head of all principality and power. This is the great necessity of the world. Almost in vain do we strive to reform the world, while wicked rulers bear rule.

The nations of the earth now are independent sovereignties. They acknowledge no higher government. Therefore each must provide for its own defense. They are as much as the United States would be without the general government. Each State would have to provide for its own defense. But under the general government, each State has no occasion to provide for its own defense, as the general government provides for the protection of all the States. So of the world, there being no universal government, each nation must learn war for its own protection. But when God shall have provided through the Gospel a universal Rulership that shall be morally qualified, and physically competent to govern the world, then the nations will have no occasion to learn war any more for their own protection and defense. Under this reign the nations will receive all the blessings they need. Justice and judgment will be executed in the earth. The nations will learn war no more. All people, nations and languages will serve him. Yea, all the nations whom God has made will come and worship before the Lord, and glorify his name. The knowledge of the Lord will cover the earth as the waters do the sea. The whole earth will be filled with the glory of the Lord. In this reign the righteous will flourish abundantly. They will speak the same thing, and see eye to eye. Then will the eyes of the blind be opened, and the ears of the deaf be unstopped. Then shall the lame man leap and the tongue of the dumb sing. Then will be restored a pure language. In this reign, the leaves of the tree of life will be for the healing of the nations, and all maladies will be removed, so that the inhabitants will not say, I am sick. Then will the earth yield its increase. In the wilderness shall water break out, and streams in the desert, and the parched ground become a pool, and in the thirsty land springs of water. The hills shall be covered with flocks, the valleys shall abound with corn, and the floors shall be full of wheat. Pencilfulness shall reward the husbandman for his labors. They shall plant vineyards and eat the fruit of them. They shall not labor in vain, nor bring forth for trouble. Under this reign these blessings will be continued until there shall be no more pain, nor crying, nor death. There shall be no more curse.

These are some of the blessings with which the seed of Abraham will bless all the nations of the earth. They are the blessings of the Kingdom. These blessings are the result of the restitution. They will be as extensive as the necessities of the world.

HOW LONG WILL THE SEED BLESS THE NATIONS ?

As long as the Promise is of force. The promise contains the seed, the nations, the earth, and the blessing. In its fulfilment, and during the whole time of its fulfilment, the seed, the nations, the earth, and the blessing must exist, and not only exist but they must sustain exactly the same relation to each other that they do in the promise. The ultimate object of the promise is to bless the nations. The means to be used for this end is the seed of Abraham.

To change the promise, or to change the relation of its terms to each other, would destroy the promise. The promise will be of force as long as the seed shall bless the nations. The seed, the nations, the earth, and the blessing, must stand or fall together. They must be of equal duration.

The promise is unlimited; therefore each part of the promise is unlimited, and must be as long as the promise itself. The blessing promised is without limit, therefore it must not only be complete as I have shown, but it must also be perpetual,—as long as the promise is of force. The means provided to bless the nations show this.

We do not provide large means to attain a small object. We do not provide means for a long journey when we only wish to go to the next town. So God's instrumentalities to bless the nations will be adapted and limited to that particular work. They will not extend infinitely beyond the work which they were created to perform. But they will be just extensive enough to do the work assigned them and no more. The means will not extend beyond the object for which they exist.

THE DURATION OF THE MEANS WILL SHOW THE DURATION OF THE END.

The Seed will bless the nations. They are to exist for this end. They will live long enough to accomplish this work. Christ was born to fulfil the promise made to Abraham. He lived to bless. He gave his life for the life of the world. He was raised from the dead to sit on David's throne to execute judgment and justice in the earth, and thus bless all people, nations, and languages. Being raised from the dead he ever liveth. He is to live for ever more. He lives after the power of an endless life. He thus lives that he may sit upon his throne as long as the sun and moon endure, that of his kingdom there shall be no end. The object, then, for which he lives, is endless,—the blessing the nations. The seed will have an endless life, that he may reign an endless reign, that the subjects of his kingdom may fear him, and flourish as long as the sun and moon endure. The duration of the means shows the duration of the end.

THE EARTH.

The earth was made to be inhabited. It was made for the nations. It abideth forever. It is to be as permanent as God's oath to David. It is to be a world without end. This world is to be given to the seed for an eternal inheritance, for an everlasting possession. The heathen will be given him for an inheritance, as well as the uttermost parts of the earth for a possession. The dominion of the whole earth will be given to the seed for an everlasting dominion, which shall not pass away. Under the government of the seed, the curse will be removed, and the fertility of the earth restored. Then, from that time onward, the earth will yield its increase while the earth remaineth. Now for what object will the earth be given to the seed? That all people, nations and languages should serve him. Why is this dominion to be an everlasting dominion, and not pass away? That all nations may continue to serve him as long as the dominion continues. Why will the fertility of the earth be restored? That the nations may be blessed. Why will this fertility be continued while the earth remains? That the nations may be blessed while the earth remains. Thus it is, that the earth as a means of blessing the nations shows how long the nations will be blessed.

THE GOVERNMENT.

The government which God has promised to establish in the earth, is for the nations. If there were no nations, the government would not be needed. It is the necessity of the nations that has called out the government. The government is to meet that necessity. If the nations are to exist only a short time, the government will be needed only for a short time. If the nations are to continue for a long time, then the government would be needed for a long time. But if the nations are to exist as long as the earth remains, as long as the sun and moon endure, without end, then the government must correspond in duration with the duration of the nations. It is the extent and duration that determines the extent and duration of the government.

The Kingdom which God has promised to establish under the whole heavens, over all people, nations and languages, is an everlasting Kingdom. It is never to be left to other people. It is never to be destroyed, or pass away, but it is to stand for ever and be without end. Thus the duration of the Kingdom shows how long the subjects of the Kingdom, (which are the nations,) will be blessed. Thus our question, How long will the seed bless the nations? is most conclusively answered. The seed are to have an endless life. They are to have an endless inheritance, which will be a dominion over all people, nations, and languages, that shall not pass away. And the government which God has promised to establish through the seed, over all nations is to be without end. Therefore the blessing the nations which is the object of all these means must be endless.

WILL THE NATIONS ALWAYS NEED A GOVERNMENT?

The nations will need a government as long as the blessings provided for them continue. In the restitution the fertility of the earth will be restored. This restored blessing will be in the new earth. It will continue while the new heaven and new earth remain. To regulate the increased business of the world, growing out of the increased fertility of the soil, the nations will need a righteous government. They will need it as long as seed time and harvest continue.

Every duty and every doctrine taught in the Gospel, is for its ultimate end,—the blessing the nations.

God saw the world in ruin, gone away from him, without God and without hope. He saw it in its degradation, and wretchedness, without a righteous government. He saw it under the prince of the power of air. He saw its every necessity, immediate and remote. He resolved to save and bless the world. He revealed his purpose in the Gospel. He determined to provide for the world a righteous government, which shall bless all nations. This government must continue as long as the blessing is needed. He saw that the necessity of the world required such a government to be without end. He chose the seed of Abraham to be rulers in this Kingdom. To secure this end the seed must be qualified for such a position. They must have everlasting life. To secure this life, they must be raised from the dead, so that they can die no more. To secure this resurrection, they must become worthy to obtain that world, to inherit the Kingdom. To secure this worthiness, they must believe the Gospel of the Kingdom. To secure this faith in the Gospel, the Gospel of the Kingdom must be preached among all nations to take out of them a people for his name.

If unto us a child is born, a son is given, it is that the government may rest upon his shoulders. If the Gospel is preached, it is the Gospel of the Kingdom, which is to bless all nations. If Christ is preached, it is done by preaching the things pertaining to the Kingdom of God. If faith is enjoined it is that we may become heirs of the Kingdom. If repentance, it is because of the Kingdom. If we suffer with him, it is that we may reign with him. If faithfulness be urged it is that we may overcome, be raised from the dead, sit with Christ in his throne, and have power over the nations. And if any are redeemed by the blood of Christ, out of every kindred, and tongue, and people, and nation, it is that they may be made kings and priests unto God and reign on the earth. If we are to wait for God's Son from heaven, it is that he may sit upon the throne of his father David, that he may raise the righteous dead, and change the righteous living, that they may sit with him in his throne and have power over the nations. That he may establish his Kingdom, and by it restore all things spoken by the mouth of all the holy prophets since the world began, and thus bless all nations of the earth, completely and perpetually, as God promised to Abraham, saying, "In thy seed shall all the nations of the earth be blessed."

CONCLUSION.

We have shown, 1st, that the Gospel is the Promise which God made to Abraham, and to his seed, and confirmed the same by an oath, that the promise is comprehended in this saying, "In thy seed shall all the nations of the earth be blessed." That this promise comprehends the whole of the Divine purpose in the Gospel.

2. That the thing promised in the Gospel is, that all the nations of the earth shall be blessed, as an ultimate end. That this promise to bless the nations comprehends the whole of God's ultimate purpose in the Gospel, and will be fulfilled according to all that the holy prophets have spoken.

3. That the seed of Abraham shall bless all nations as the means or instrumentality. That the seed of Abraham comprehends the whole of the means to be used for the accomplishment of that purpose. That Christ, and those that are Christ's, are the seed of Abraham and heirs to the promise. That the seed will be qualified for the position and work assigned them. First, morally; second, physically; and third, By appointment. That the seed have not yet blessed the nations. But that they will bless the nations when they inherit the promise.

4. I have shown that the seed will bless the nations by ruling over them. That as rulers they will do all that the prophets have said shall be done. That they will reign until all nations shall serve the Lord. Until all things shall be subdued unto him. Until the will of God is done in earth as it is in heaven. Until there shall be no more curse. That to such an extent the seed will bless the nations.

I have shown that the seed will continue to bless the nations as long as the promise is of force. That it will continue of force as long as the seed, the nations, the earth, and the blessing, exist. That the promise is unlimited and therefore the blessing must be not only complete in its extent, but also in its perpetuity. That God's instrumentalities to bless the nations will be adapted and limited to that particular work. Therefore that the duration of the means will show the duration of the end.

That the seed which are to bless the nations will live forever, they can die no more. That the earth which is to bless the nations by its increased fertility, will continue as long as God's oath to David, a world without end. That the government which was to bless the nations, will continue without end. That the seed, the earth and the government will be endless, therefore the object for which they exist, the blessing the nations, must be endless.

I have shown that the nations will need a government as long as the earth yields its increase, to regulate the business growing out of the earth's productions.

5. That every duty, and every doctrine taught in the Gospel are for the accomplishment of its ultimate purpose—the blessing the nations.

If the Gospel is preached, it is that we may understand it, and believe it. If we believe the Gospel, it is that we may become worthy to obtain that world and the resurrection from the dead. If we are raised from the dead, it is that we may have eternal life, and sit down with Christ in his throne and have power over the nations. If we inherit jointly with Christ the Kingdom, it is that we may bless the nations as God promised to Abraham.

I repeat my conclusion:

1. The Gospel is the promise which God made to Abraham and to his seed, and confirmed the same by an oath. This promise was renewed to Isaac and to Jacob.

2. The thing promised in the Gospel is, that all the nations of the earth shall be blessed. This is the ultimate end of the promise.

3. The seed of Abraham will bless all nations by ruling over them. This is the instrumentality by which the object of the Gospel will be accomplished. This will be the Kingdom which shall not pass away.

4. Every duty, and every doctrine taught in the Scriptures are for this end.

Thus we have given an outline view of the Gospel of the KINGDOM, which we believe can never be materially changed and be truthful. Hence we believe that we may know with certainty what the Gospel is which must be believed in order to be saved.

THE CURSE LIFTED.

A BIBLE VIEW OF THE PROMISED RESTITUTION.

BY WILLIAM H. SPENCER.

CHAPTER I.

God is the best of beings,—the most impartial, benevolent, and righteous in dealing with the children of men. Hence, whatever truths He has revealed in the Holy Scriptures are for the good of all, without respect of persons, position, mental attainments, or nationality. Divine revelation was given for our instruction and good. This is demonstrated by the fact that, as benevolence is the ruling attribute of God's character in dealing with the children of Adam, He could give them nothing but what will, in due time, be for their good, for He must act in harmony with himself.

Nor, indeed, are the pages of inspiration covered with a veil which the Church of Rome, or any other Church or their expositors, are authorized to remove. It is a CREATOR'S revelation to the human family; and to it we must go as to a light shining in a dark place, and as the only perfectly reliable light we have regarding the future.

We learn from Scripture that "the world, and all things that are therein," came from the creative hands of God. "The cattle upon a thousand hills," and "all the fowls of the mountains" are His, and "the world and the fulness thereof." But yet, we are forced to confess, when we view the world in the morn of creation, blooming in Edenic beauty, purity, and fertility, that it is not now what it once was; and it is equally as conclusive that it is not what it shall be, either in its physical, animal, or moral aspect. Hence, the conclusion is unavoidable, that it does not now, in its sin-cursed condition, meet the Divine purpose in its creation.

But for sin the sad history of the past six thousand years would not be before us. Man's fall seems to have jarred every thing into discordance; and the curse that followed the first act of rebellion, man feels painfully at every step. Instead of the abundance of paradise to supply every want of man, he must obtain and eat his bread "in the sweat of his brow." He is doomed to a life of toil. Thorns and thistles are in his path struggling for the mastery of the soil, and he grows gray and wrinkled in the life-long effort to subdue the noxious weeds that would rob him of his daily bread. As a writer has expressed it, "Cold, storms, earthquakes, volcanoes, barren fields, pestilential airs, smiting sunshine, tearing briars, and noxious things, combine in the terrible accusation against man." His days, few and full of sorrow, end in the silence of death and the corruption of the grave. "All his days are sorrows, and all his travail grief; yea, his heart taketh not rest in the night" (Ecc. ii. 23). "Although affliction cometh not forth of the dust, neither doth trouble spring out of the ground: yet man is born unto trouble as the sparks fly upward" (Job v. 6).

But especially is seen the consequences of the introduction of evil into the world in its universal moral corruption. "By one man's disobedience [the] many (all men) were made sinners" (Rom. v. 19). "The whole world lieth in wickedness" (1 John v. 19). "There is none righteous" by nature, "no, not one." And as Paul further says, "Now the works of the flesh are manifest, which are these: Adultery, fornication, uncleanness, lasciviousness, idolatry, witchcraft, hatred, variance, emulations, wrath, strife, seditions, heresies, envyings, murders, drunkenness, revelings, and such like" (Gal. v. 19, 21).

There is no need to dwell upon the present sad condition of the world. That the whole creation groans under the mighty curse of evil needs no further demonstration than to open our eyes upon the world in all departments of human life. It would indeed be a dark cloud did it not have a silver lining. Though the deep and awful darkness of moral corruption envelopes our earth, yet let us rejoice in God that it does not obscure the Sun of Righteousness. But for this hallowed ray of light all would be darkness in the extreme.

CHAPTER . II.

BEFORE proceeding to examine what God has revealed regarding the future of our earth and the final destiny of the human race, let us briefly consider the primeval condition of the world, and some of the circumstances which brought it into its present cursed condition.

That the existence of the curse, and the present deplorable condition of the world in consequence thereof, are in any way or degree the result of the least defect in the work of creation, no intelligent Bible reader will assume. Whoever puts forth such an assumption, has not a shadow of evidence for its support. After God had completed the work of creation, He "saw everything that he had made, and behold it was very good." This expression of Divine satisfaction assures us of the perfection of all the works of creation. God is perfect in all his attributes. "His work is perfect," and "His way is perfect." He is "perfect in knowledge" as well as being "just and right."

We must conclude, therefore, that as all that comes from the creative hand of God is perfect in its created condition, so man, in his original state, was the embodiment of all animal perfection, possessing all the faculties requisite for attaining moral perfection.

Made "in the image of God," man was the crowning work of creation,—a perfectly intelligent earthy being. Although man was the masterpiece of all created perfection, yet, as a moral agent,—possessing a perfect free will,—he could only attain moral perfection, upon which depended eternal existence, by the development of a perfect moral character under the discipline afforded by probation. Nor are we left without a pattern of such perfection. Christ in his sermon on the Mount sets before us the character of God as in all respects the pattern of perfection; and tells us that "the pure in heart" shall be "blessed" as privileged to "see God."

But further: We must admit, (1) That God had a well-formed purpose in creation; (2) that He has not lost sight of that purpose for a single moment in the permission of all that has occurred since the first act of creation; and (3) that evil in all its dire consequences can do nothing to defeat that purpose. God will finally be the victorious party in the fullest sense.

No rational mind can believe that God engaged in the work of creation without having in view a well-defined object. Nor need we remain in ignorance of the nature of that design. What that object was can be definitely learned by the record of what God has done, and is unmistakably indicated by what He has pledged His word to yet perform; for He is immutable in character, and His revelation is for man's instruction. When God, in reviewing his work of creation, "saw everything that he had made," and pronounced it "very good," we may infallibly conclude that all the works of creation were in every way and degree perfectly adapted for the purpose the Creator had in view.

What the Divine purpose was in the creation of man is clearly apparent. In "the image" of the Creator, he was designed, in his relation to the earth, for universal "dominion" over the world (Gen. i. 28). All grades of animals were to be subject to his authority, and all the productions of the earth were for his good (Gen. i. 29, 30.) Placed in a Divinely-prepared paradise for his abode, there was before him "every tree that was good for food," as well as "pleasant to the sight" (Gen. ii. 9). God prepared everything essential to man's supreme happiness. But to retain this state, where all the works of creation would contribute to his happiness, depended upon his own conduct. Possessed of a free will, he could not evade a personal responsibility as to his future. Had he been created without a will of his own, as a mere machine, incapable of voluntary acts for good or evil, he would have been as irresponsible as the beasts that surrounded him.

Although man was made for dominion, for endless being and happiness, yet, according to the manifold wisdom of God, as a condition precedent to their possession, he must develop a character in harmony with his CREATOR. Man must show that he possesses a will in harmony with his Maker before he can exercise universal dominion. This was an essential condition to man's continued existence. Otherwise the Creator might fail of his object in creation. Hence, God, in familiar intercourse with man, placed him on trial, under a law of restriction. Except in one particular his liberty is not abridged. All the beauties and blessings of paradise are his to enjoy so long as he does not put forth his hand and pluck the forbidden fruit. But alas!—the sad history need not be repeated here. Man failed to develop a will in unison with his Maker. Hence, man's probation for endless being and universal dominion ended in exclusion from the tree of life, and condemnation to return to the dust from whence he was taken.

Man being the chief object in creation, when he decided his probation against himself, and lost the dominion of the world, from which was designed to spring blessings innumerable, a curse fell heavily upon everything. He who had just declared that "every thing he had made" was "very good," now pronounces a dreadful curse. "Cursed is the ground for thy sake. Thorns also and thistles shall it bring forth to thee."

Thus we see that Adam's probation terminated not only in his condemnation and exclusion from Eden, but in bringing the world under a curse. But for God's perfect foreknowledge and wise provision for such an emergency, His purpose in creation would have been frustrated at the very moment when He had apparently achieved His greatest triumph.

ORIGIN AND HIS AGE.

[THE following is one of a series of articles by "Edward Beecher, D. D.," published in the "Christian Union," being a "History of Opinions on the Scriptural Doctrine of Retribution," and will be read with deep interest as showing from whence came the corruptions of Christianity so terrible since Origen's days.—ED. OF BIBLE EXAMINER.]

We have taken the age of Origen as a point of vision from which to survey the course of opinion as to the doctrine of retribution. It was the age of the first development of scientific theology, and of the extensive establishment of theological schools. In this age began the extended movement in behalf of the doctrine of universal restoration, which continued until the sixth century in two forms, that of the Alexandrian, and that of the Antiochian school. Origen is on the dividing line between this movement and that of the school of Asia Minor, which can be traced back to the Apostle John, and in which Melito of Sardis, and Irenæus, the disciple of polycarp, were the most celebrated teachers. Irenæus taught the annihilation of the wicked, agreeing in this with Justin Martyr. But this movement was interrupted by Origen and his successors, and for centuries the doctrine of universal restoration took its place, so far as the doctrine of eternal punishment was not held. The only exception to this statement is found in Arnobius, who wrote a little after Origen. We propose to give an account of the leading theological schools that were developed in this age, and of the influence exerted by them on the great question of future retribution.

But before doing this it is indispensable to take a more particular view of Origen himself, for he stands in relations to the whole church such as are sustained by no other one of the early Christian teachers.

GREAT FACTS.

Two great facts stand out on the page of ecclesiastical history. One that the first system of Christian theology was composed and issued by Origen in the year 280 after Christ, of which a fundamental and essential element was the doctrine of the universal restoration of all fallen beings to their original holiness, and union with God.

The second is that after the lapse of a little more than three centuries, in the year 544, this doctrine was for the first time condemned and anathematized as heretical. This was done, not in a general council, but in a local council, called by the Patriarch Menno at Constantinople, by the order of Justinian.

During all this long interval, the opinions of Origen and his various writings were an element of power in the whole Christian world. For a long time he stood high as the greatest luminary of the Christian world. He gave an impulse to the leading spirits of subsequent ages, was honored by them as their greatest benefactor. At last, after all his scholars were dead, in the remote age of Justinian he was anathematized as a heretic of the worst kind. The same also was done with respect to Theodore of Mopsuestia, of the Antiochian school, who held the doctrine of universal restitution on a different basis. This, too, was done long after he was dead, in the year 553. From and after this point the doctrine of future eternal punishment reigned with undisputed sway during the middle ages that preceded the Reformation.

ORIGEN AND HIS AGE.

To prepare the way for our history, we propose to set forth the character of Origen and his age, and also of the age in which he was condemned.

The time of Origen was a great turning-point of opinion on a practical question that lay at the foundation of all theological and social development. Before him the conversion of the Roman Empire to Christianity was not expected. It was generally believed that it was to be destroyed by the coming of Christ, and that his millennial reign was to follow. Origen first developed the idea of the conversion of the empire to Christianity, exposed the chiliastic illusions, and with wide-reaching views, undertook to prepare Christianity for its future destinies.

The great facts of Christianity had been proclaimed and recorded in the gospels, and the canon of the New Testament had been substantially completed.

The assaults of the Gnostics on the Old Testament were, to a great extent, on rational and moral grounds. For example, the conduct of God, in hardening Pharaoh's heart and then punishing him for hardness of heart, was assailed by them as unjust and unworthy of the true God of the universe. Many of the assaults of Celsus were of a like kind, and had not been fully answered. In particular, he had assailed, as unworthy of God, the doctrine of eternal punishment in unquenchable fire.

ORIGEN AT ALEXANDRIA.

At Alexandria also, his native place, and the seat of the great Catechetical school, in which he was a teacher, there was a great concourse of pagan philosophers, Gnostics, and other heretics, to be encountered and refuted, or to be converted. Origen was in fact instrumental in the conversion of many, especially of Ambrose, a wealthy nobleman of Alexandria, once a Gnostic, but ever after his zealous patron and supporter.

FOUNDER OF SCIENTIFIC THEOLOGY.

It ought not to surprise us that under such a pressure on all sides Origen felt the need of rising above the mere detail of facts, and of developing some fundamental principles out of which might spring some system of the universe which could be defended on rational and moral grounds.

This was his object in his work on the fundamental principles of Christianity (Peri Archon), which was the first system of Christian theology ever issued.

The two great foundations of this system were pre-existence and universal restoration. Without pre-existence he could not explain and defend the state of things in this world in accordance with the benevolence and the justice of God. Without universal restitution he could not bring the system to a final issue worthy of God.

He based his whole system on a real and not nominal free agency, which could never be lost.

On this basis he defended God's dealings with Pharaoh with a keenness and sagacity that have not been exceeded since his day.

He considered, also, the attributes and relations of the three persons of the Trinity, and their action in the general system.

It deserves notice how deeply imbedded in his scheme is the doctrine of universal restoration. Without it the whole system falls to pieces.

Other topics, as to eternal creation and future systems, were included, and also as to the resurrection. Kurtz, in view of his labors in this department, says that notwithstanding his errors are rejected, he is justly honored as "the founder of scientific theology." But this was but a small part of the work undertaken and executed by him.

OTHER LABORS OF ORIGEN.

The whole science of textual criticism, of commentary, and exposition, and homiletical application, was as yet undeveloped. Origen entered this wide field, and labored with an energy and learning that stimulated, excited and instructed the whole Christian world.

Of him Dr. Schaff says: "Origen was the greatest scholar of his age, and the most learned and genial of all the ante-Nicene fathers. Even heathens and heretics admired or feared his brilliant talents. His knowledge embraced all departments of the philology, philosophy and theology of his day. With this he united profound and fertile thought, keen penetration, and glowing imagination. As a true divine, he consecrated all his studies by prayer, and turned them according to his best convictions to the service of truth and piety."

Those who recall the impulse communicated to Biblical studies in this country by Professor Stuart can form some conception of the still greater work effected by Origen in his Hexapla, his commentaries, homilies and notes and reply to Celsus.

Of him Dr. Schaff says again: "He may be called, in many respects, the Schleiermacher of the Greek Church. He was a guide from the heathen philosophy and the heretical gnosia, to the Christian faith. He exerted an immeasurable influence in stimulating the development of the Catholic theology, and forming the great Nicene fathers, Athanasius, Basil, the two Gregories, Hilary and Ambrose, who, consequently, in spite of all his deviations, set great value on his services."

MORAL CHARACTER OF HIS AGE.

Notice now the moral peculiarities of this and the preceding ages. Lecky, after a careful survey of the history of morals in the Roman Empire, says: "There can be little doubt that for nearly two hundred years after its establishment in Europe, the Christian community exhibited a moral purity which, if it has been equaled, has never for any long period been surpassed. Completely separated from the Roman world that was around them, abstaining alike from political life, from appeals to the tribunals and from military occupations; looking forward to the immediate advent of their Master, and the destruction of the empire in which they dwelt, and animated by all the fervor of a young religion, the Christians found within themselves a whole order of ideas and feelings, sufficiently powerful to guard them from the contamination of their age."

At this time, too, there was no intervention of imperial despotism in religious questions, no ecumenical councils called by imperial authority, and the only valid appeal was to Scripture and to reason. It was during the close of this age, and before the imperial age was developed, that Origen lived and wrote.

PIETY OF ORIGEN.

And it is conceded by all that he was as eminent for piety and for a truly Christian spirit as any saint of any age.

Of him the dispassionate and judicial Mosheim says, whilst faithfully exposing what he deems his errors: "Origen possessed every excellence that can adorn the Christian character; uncommon piety from his very childhood; astonishing devotedness to that most holy religion which he professed; unequaled perseverance in labors and toils for the advancement of the Christian cause; untiring zeal for the Church and for the extension of Christianity; an elevation of soul which placed him above all ordinary desires or fears; a most permanent contempt of wealth, honor, pleasures, and of death itself; the purest trust in the Lord Jesus; for whose sake, when he was old and oppressed with ills of every kind, he patiently and perseveringly endured the severest sufferings. It is not strange, therefore, that he was held in so high estimation, both while he lived and after death. Certainly if any man deserves to stand first in the catalogue of saints and martyrs, and to be annually held up as an example to Christians, this is the man, for, except the apostles of Jesus Christ and their companions, I know of no one, among all those enrolled and honored as saints, who excelled him in virtue and holiness."—(Historical Commentary on Christianity before Constantine, vol. ii., p. 149).

DEFENDER OF FREE INQUIRY.

One thing deserves special notice. The influence of Origen was always exerted by and in favor of free investigation and argument; and in a number of cases he effected what has rarely been done—he convinced errorists by kind personal argument so thoroughly that they renounced their errors and returned to the truth.

REJECTS MATERIAL FIRM.

Before we come to the age of Justinian, in which Origen and his doctrine of restoration were finally condemned, one thing more should be made exceedingly prominent. It is that Origen utterly rejected the idea of punishment, by literal fire. He taught that there would be punishment, intense, fearful and long continued, but that it would be by intellectual and moral forces, adapted as a final result to reform the sinner. He thus never passed out of the region of intellectual philosophy and moral influence into the region of brute force.

AGE OF JUSTINIAN.

Let us now pass from the age of Origen to that of Justinian. It may be thus briefly characterized. It was an age in which all free inquiry was utterly proscribed, in which all questions were settled by authority, and in which unreasoning credulity, falsely called faith, was regarded as the crowning Christian grace. It was an age in which the keys of heaven and hell were in the hands of the hierarchy through the exclusive power to administer the sacraments, and to admit or exclude from the church. It was an age in which the fires of hell were held to be material, and thus not dependent for their punitive power on moral character, but mere instruments of despotic force. In the hands of the clergy the doctrine of eternal punishment had thus become an instrument of degrading terrorism, to extort money or to enforce the belief of doctrines at war with the most sacred moral convictions implanted by God in the human mind. It was an age, too, in which the moral degeneracy of the church had reached an extreme point of degradation.

Moreover, the manner in which Origen and Theodore were condemned and stigmatized as heretics was in keeping with the character of the age, as a simple narrative of the course of events in the councils would clearly prove.

Had we time we could easily confirm all these statements by abundant testimony. But two witnesses must suffice. We shall refer to Dr. Schaff and to Mr. Lecky.

DR. SCHAFF.

Dr. Schaff tells us that even before the days of Justinian all free inquiry had been destroyed by the results of the assaults on Origen of Epiphanius and others. Of these he says, "They show the progress of orthodoxy under the twofold aspect of earnest zeal for the pure faith, and a narrow-minded intolerance towards all free speculation. The condemnation of Origen was a death-blow to theological science in the Greek Church, and left it to stiffen gradually into a mechanical traditionalism and formalism." Vol. 2, p. 698.

MR. LECKY.

In the days of Justinian old Rome had fallen before the barbarians, and the centre of the Roman Empire was in Byzantium. Lecky, after a careful survey of the Pagan Empire, says of this Christian Byzantine Empire, "The universal verdict of history is that it constitutes, without a single exception, the most thoroughly base and despicable form that civilization has yet assumed. Though very cruel, and very sensual, there have been times when cruelty assumed more ruthless, and sensuality more extravagant aspects: but there has been no other enduring civilization so absolutely destitute of all the forms and elements of greatness, and none to which the epithet mean may be so emphatically applied. The Byzantine Empire was eminently the agent of treachery. Its vices were the vices of men who had ceased to be brave without learning to be virtuous. Without patriotism, without the fruition or desire of liberty, after the first paroxysms of religious agitation, without genius or intellectual activity; slaves, and willing slaves both in their actions and their thoughts, immersed in sensuality and in the most frivolous pleasures, the people only emerged from their listlessness when some theological subtlety or some rivalry in the chariot races stimulated them into frantic riots." It will be remembered that at this time, in this Christian Empire, the Church and the State were essentially one. Of this period, and of the Catholic period, of the Middle Ages, he says, "Credulity being taught as a virtue, and all conclusions dictated by authority, a deadly torpor sank upon the human mind, which for many centuries almost suspended its action, and was only broken by the scrutinizing, innovating and free-thinking habits that accompanied the rise of the industrial republics in Italy." Vol. 2, 16.

THE INTERVAL.

Between the age of Origen and this degraded age in which he was condemned and stigmatized and in which future eternal punishment was developed in its worst and most despotic and debasing form, there is a wide interval of time, as well as a wide moral influence.

During this period there was the action of theological schools, as well as of prominent leaders in the church, with reference to this doctrine of universal restoration.

Believers should know what they believe.

THE CHARACTER OF GOD.

HOWEVER much some of us may feel constrained to deprecate the strong language and to dissent from the extreme conclusions of the very remarkable and interesting article which appeared in the May number of "Fraser's Magazine," from the pen of Miss Florence Nightingale; we do at least feel that no small debt of gratitude is due to the writer—whose noble, successful, and unwearied labors for the alleviation of many forms of human suffering have made her name a "household word,"—for the clear and forcible manner in which she has drawn attention to the great truth—fundamental indeed if anything is to be regarded as fundamental—that all our hope for time and for eternity depends ultimately and absolutely upon the character of God. Thus she writes:

"'Because I am God and not man,' said One a few thousands of years ago. Then surely, is it not the most important and at the same time the most neglected point in theology, to determine what God is—what His character is like?"

"Reams of sermons are written on every point but this. And yet this is the foundation of all.

"It may seem a little too familiar an illustration to say that in marriage it is a constant reproach brought against continental nations, that they do not let the woman know what her husband is like, nor the man his wife, before they are married.

"A poet who is gone from among us said that 'love' was 'fellow service.' That is just what it is. And how can there be 'fellow service' in the way in which men and women meet now?"

"And how much more is this the case with regard to him whom we (some of us) say we serve?"

"Yet Him we have always with us and we make no effort to know Him.

"Indeed, it does not seem to be included as a part of theology, as a point of inquiry, as a basis of all sermons—the knowledge of, the acquaintance with God.

"The same poet writes:

"It fortifies my soul to know
That, tho' I perish, Truth is so;
That, howsoe'er I stray and range,
Whate'er I do, Thou dost not change.
I steadier step when I recall
That, if I slip, Thou dost not fall."

"It always seems to be a fact ignored, or put out of sight, that for no one of our beliefs, religious, physical, moral, scientific, have we any dependence but—the character of God.

"And this seems to most people to be a very poor dependence. At least few take the pains to find out what is the character of God.

"Is it not a simple impertinence for preachers and school-masters, literally ex cathedra, to be always inculcating and laying down what they call the commands of God, and never telling us what the God is who commands, often indeed representing Him as worse than a devil? 'Because I am God, and not man.' But you represent Him as something far below man, worse than the worst man, the worst Eastern tyrant that was ever heard of.

"'Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and with all thy mind, and with all thy strength.' Ah, from the mouth of Him who used those words, they were indeed 'the first and greatest commandment.' He who went about doing good, who called all of us who are weary and heavy laden to come to Him—who towards His cruel torturers and murderers felt nothing but, 'Father, forgive them; for they know not what they do'—He might well say, 'Thou shalt love the Lord thy God,' for He needed not to explain to us His character.

"But—and what a descent is here!—for us to lay it down as a command to love the Lord God! Alas! poor mankind might easily answer: 'I can't love because I am ordered—least of all can I love One who seems only to make me miserable here, to torture me hereafter. Show me that He is good, that He is lovable, and I will love Him without being told.'"

This testimony is surely true. It may seem a strong thing to say, but really it is questionable whether we should have much reason to deplore the sweep of a great and swiftly moving wave of Atheism over the world, if only it buried for ever beneath its dark and deadly waters the many gross and hideous forms in which the blindness and ignorance of men have embodied their conceptions of the Deity. Alas! how often is "all that is called God and that is worshipped," even amongst Christians, as unlike Him who is the living and loving God as any shameful idol in heathen temple. And how truly may it be said, that we have made an image of Moloch and worshipped it as Jehovah.

Of this at least we are profoundly convinced—that as a new Reformation is the great religious necessity of our day, so the banner under which its army must advance to such victory as may yet be won, must be a truer and diviner conception of God. This, and this alone, as it seems to us, is the two-edged sword which can slay at once the twin serpents of superstition and scepticism in whose deadly coils the Divine Lacoön of Christianity is in danger of being crushed to death.

"They that know THY NAME," says the Psalmist, "will put their trust in Thee" (Psa. ix. 10). And what is the name of God? Surely the sum of His Divine attributes; each attribute forming, as it were, a letter in that glorious name, while the initial which stands for and comprehends them all—is Love! "God is love." Twice is this sublime and glorious declaration repeated by the Apostle John, and it is instinctively recognized by the moral consciousness of the renewed heart as the only true portraiture of the Divine character. Let it once be suggested; let it really be apprehended, and it becomes the deepest, the most precious, and, moreover, the most unchangeable conviction of the soul: a light of comfort and assurance which no storms of earth or hell can ever quench; a ground of immovable confidence which can alone enable its possessor to say with Job: "Though He slay me, yet will I trust in Him."

But while the character of God, as Love, is thus revealed in Scripture, and accepted by our moral consciousness, an awful difficulty seems to be presented to us by the contemplation of Nature. The God of the Bible, the God of the spirit of man, the God who "so loved the world that He gave His only begotten Son that whosoever believeth in Him should not perish but have everlasting life," is also the God of Nature. Yet Nature does not reveal God to us in an aspect of pure benevolence—of universal love. Its voice is that of Law,—stern, harsh, inexorable, yea, sometimes it would seem wantonly cruel;—rather than that of Love. "It is said to us (and not unjustly)—I know it is said—You tell us of a God of flowers and sunshine, of singing birds and little children. But there are more facts in nature than these. There is premature death, pestilence, famine. And if you answer, Man has control over these; they are caused by man's ignorance and sin, and by his breaking of natural laws: what will you make of those destructive powers over which he has no control; of the hurricane and the earthquake; of poisons, vegetable and mineral; of those parasitic entozoa whose awful abundance and awful destructiveness in man and beast, science is just revealing—a new page of danger and loathsomeness? How does that suit your conception of a God of love;"*

The answer to this difficulty is that Nature does not, and was not intended to reveal to us the whole character of God. As Dr. Chalmers said long ago: "We hold that the material universe affords decisive attestation to the natural perfections of the Godhead, but that it leaves the question of His moral perfections involved in the profoundest mystery. The machinery of a serpent's tooth, for the obvious infliction of pain and death upon its victims, may speak as distinctly for the power and intelligence of its Maker as the machinery of those teeth which, formed and inserted for simple mastication, subserve the purposes of a bland and beneficent economy. An apparatus of suffering and torture might furnish as clear an indication of design, though a design of cruelty, as does an apparatus for the ministration of enjoyment furnish an indication also of design, but a design of benevolence. Did we confine our study to the material constitution of things, we should meet with the enigma of many perplexing and contradictory appearances." †

It must never be forgotten that to the moral and spiritual vision, a dark and well-nigh impenetrable cloud hangs over this present fallen world, and the lips of indignant nature seem sternly closed against the rebel race in whose works she is cursed.‡ The silence is only broken by "the thunder of God's power," and the darkness made visible by the lightning flash which reveals the handiwork of a wisdom as immeasurable as the power which subserves it. But in the midst of this mysterious night of silence and darkness the Cross of Jesus is set up, and at once, as by the kindling of an eternal dawn, the the darkness of Nature becomes illuminated, and her silence vocal with the sweet echoes of its voice of infinite love. Truly has Pascal said: "God is not known to advantage but by Jesus Christ." He, and He alone, is the Divine mirror in which we may see "the brightness of the Father's glory and the express image of His Person." Christ not only supplements the revelations of God in creation and providence, but He alone renders them really intelligible. As but now we compared the Divine attributes to the letters which compose the "name" of God, the initial being love, so may we further say that as a name cannot be read, and has indeed no meaning without its first initial letter, even so without that "LOVE" of which Christ alone is the full and clear manifestation, the character of God would be to us as a name lacking its initial—a mere collection of letters having no connected meaning. For while Nature reveals to us attributes, Christ alone reveals God.

True, doubtless, it is, as St. Paul declares, that "the invisible things of God from the creation of the world are clearly seen, being understood by the things that are made, even His eternal power and Godhead" (Rom. i. 20). But let it be observed that the Apostle, as with a designed reticence, speaks here only of the Divine existence and almightiness; while, on the other hand, St. John writes, "No man hath seen God at any time" (though the open volume of creation has ever

THE LOVE OF GOD.

In nature's ample rounds,
Where'er we turn our eyes,
The Love of God abounds,
And fills us with surprise:
The warming sun, the healthful breeze,
The fruitful earth, the blooming trees;
All testify that God above,
Is truly endless—boundless Love.

Go to the distant poles,
Where frost eternal reigns,
And in its chilling folds,
The earth and air retains:
The furs and game, the fire and wood,
The skin-lined hut, the wholesome food;
All testify that God above,
Is truly endless—boundless Love.

Go to the tropic Isles,
Where Sol's bright scorching rays,
The human skin defiles,
With fervent, melting blaze:
The richest fruit perpetual grows,
And every needed blessing flows;
To testify that God above,
Is truly endless—boundless Love.

Go where the thoughts may lead,
O'er ocean, earth, or air,
A sure supply for every need,
Meets every creature there:
The great Creator's goodness shines,
And with his wisdom close combines;
To testify that God above,
Is truly endless—boundless Love.

But when the Gospel shines,
Declaring God's free grace,
In pure immortal lives,
To all the human race:
It brings to view eternal life,
The end of sin and carnal strife;
It testifies that God above,
Is truly endless—boundless Love.

HUMAN REDEMPTION.—No. 5.

ON THE DOCTRINE THAT EVERY UNCONVERTED MAN IS A VESSEL OF WRATH, FITTED ONLY FOR DESTRUCTION.

In relation to this question, I propose now to examine, carefully and reverentially, those texts which are supposed to imply—nay, to involve as of necessity—the doctrine that every unconverted man is to be regarded as a sentenced criminal, daily and hourly in danger of eternal woe.

They are the following:

(1) "He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved; but he that believeth not shall be damned" (Mark xvi. 16),—a declaration of Christ himself, immediately following the command, "Preach the Gospel to every creature."

(2) "He that believeth on the Son hath everlasting life: and he that believeth not the Son shall not see life; but the wrath of God abideth on him" (John iii. 36),—words addressed by John the Baptist to the Jews.

(3) "He that believeth on Him (the only begotten Son) is not condemned: but he that believeth not is condemned already, because he hath not believed in the name of the only begotten Son of God" (John iii. 18),—part of our Lord's discourse to Nicodemus, and to be taken in connection with the declaration (ver. 3). "Except a man be born again (born from above—marg.), he cannot see the kingdom of God."

(4) "For in Christ Jesus neither circumcision availeth anything, nor uncircumcision, but a new creature" (Gal. vi. 15).

(5) "According to His mercy He saved us, by the washing of regeneration, and renewing of the Holy Ghost" (Tit. iii. 5).

These passages, with many others that might be named, will be sufficient to show the ground on which the Church of Christ has come to the conclusion that, apart from the regeneration of his nature by the Holy Spirit, no man can escape the damnation of hell; that, in short, if he that believeth hath everlasting life, and shall not come into condemnation, but is passed from death unto life (John v. 24), then he that believeth not cannot have life, but remains in the death from which he might, if he would, by faith, have passed.

This inference, of course, carries with it the further conclusion that, as unconverted, the virtuous and the vicious stand, in the eye of God, on precisely the same platform; that, Dr. Chalmers puts it, "a character distinguished by all that is lovely and soothing in humanity,"—a heart "furnished, not merely with the finest sensibilities of our nature, but with its most upright and honorable principles,"—a man "whose every word carries security along with it; who, amid all the varieties of fortune, has nobly sustained the glories of an untainted character,"—is, if not renewed in the spirit of his mind—endowed with a new nature, and so made a son of God,—the subject of "entire and unmitigated depravity," a hater of God, and a child of hell.

How can it, it is said, be otherwise, since "the Bible everywhere groups the individuals of our species into two (and only two) classes,—vessels of wrath and vessels of mercy; since it employs these terms in a meaning so extensive, that "by each couplet of them it embraces all individuals;" since there is no trace of any middle department (i. e., between the elect Church and the eternally lost) to be met with in the New Testament; since every man will, at death, "be pronounced meet for the fellowship of God through eternity, or be turned into hell?"

Nothing can be more brilliant than the declamation in which Dr. Chalmers, with regal eloquence, maintains this ground; regarding the conclusion at which he arrives as a necessary consequence of "the emptiness of natural virtue, and the natural enmity of the mind against God."

But is it a true conclusion? Is it Scriptural? That is the question.

If it be, Christ can bestow no blessing upon any child of Adam short of absolute union with Himself; His redemption is, practically, of no avail to any but to the elect; He is in no sense whatever the Saviour of the world; Bethsaida and Tyre, Capernaum and Sodom, the young ruler whom the Redeemer loved, the children whom He blessed, the multitude over whom He mourned, and the hypocritical Scribes and Pharisees whom He denounced, all if unrenewed stand on one level, and are, in the eye of the Judge, alike.

Now, I frankly say, Scripture does not leave this impression upon me. Everywhere I see, in the Divine Record, God's wrath executed on earth, and, in the future state, threatened against vice and wickedness as such. Most distinctly are we taught there, that degrees, both of reward and punishment, will mark the decisions of the last day. But there can be no degrees of sorrow in hell; nor can there be any shades either of honor or happiness in heaven, worthy of consideration, if each individual man becomes, at death, the companion either of angels or of fiends.

On this point, the sort of self-deception that men pass upon themselves is singular. They believe, or think they do, that everlasting torment in hell, and eternal absence from God, is consistent with "few stripes." They imagine that every man becoming as happy as his nature will admit of, is the result of being "saved so as by fire;" that the difference between the greatest saint and the most inconsistent professor—on the supposition of both being kept out of hell—is, that the one has a higher capacity for bliss than the other; that the difference, in short, is that which may be observed in individuals here; the difference, for instance, between the happiness of a child and that of an adult. And on this follows the supposition, that the future lot of a very inconsistent Christian taken to heaven, and that of a virtuous heathen in hell, may, after all, be very much alike. The confusion of thought, the absolute incapacity of realizing either the one state or the other, which this sort of reasoning implies, would be incredible, if it were not witnessed every day.

Further, in no other sense than that of a future discriminating retribution, exactly apportioned to the opportunities and privileges enjoyed, is it possible to understand such declarations as these,—"The men of Nineveh shall rise in judgment with this generation, and shall condemn it: because they repented at the preaching of Jonas; and, behold, a greater than Jonas is here" (Matt. xii. 41); or again, "Woe unto thee, Chorazin! woe unto thee, Bethsaida! for if the mighty works, which were done in you, had been done in Tyre and Sidon, they would have repented long ago in sackcloth and ashes" (Matt. xi. 21—24).

I say, it is impossible to reconcile statements like these with a theology which proceeds on the assumption that every man who is unconverted is a vessel of wrath, and will, at death be adjudged to perdition; for, unless violently explained away, the language of the Lord plainly teaches that future judgment will affect the inhabitants of certain cities as such,—a declaration by no means strange to persons who believe in a "new earth, wherein dwelleth righteousness;" but utterly beyond the comprehension of those who hold that each separate individual, who dwelt in the cities spoken of, is at this moment either in heaven or hell.

Equally impossible also is it, on this showing, to make anything at all intelligible out of St. Paul's assertion, that "all Israel shall be saved;" for it is clear, from the context in connection with the passage, that the apostle does not mean a "remnant." It is equally clear, from the entire tenor of Scripture, that in relation to the retributions of the world to come, the Jew and the Gentile will be dealt with on precisely the same principles; and while it is asserted again and again that Christ is the Saviour of the world and a propitiation for its sins, I, for one, can find no sanction in the teachings of revelation for the belief that no man can be lost.

What, then, can we conclude, but that "all," as used by St Paul in reference to Israel, means, as it does almost everywhere else, the whole?—with such exceptions only as cannot be got rid of without a violation of the principle that man is voluntarily wicked, and, therefore, personally responsible.

But THE TEXTS,—there they stand, and who shall question their truthfulness or force? Certainly I shall not. I shall deal only with the inferences drawn from them, and the application made of them by mortals as weak and as erring as myself.

First, then, let it be observed, that the ordinary interpretation always proceeds on the supposition—taken for granted as unquestionable—that "the Bible everywhere groups the individuals of our species into two (and only two) classes, vessels of wrath and vessels of mercy (i. e., receivers of favor and endurers of judgment); that by each "couplet," as Dr. Chalmers says, it "embraces all individuals;" that "every man will, at death, be pronounced meet for the fellowship of God through eternity, or be turned into hell."

This may surely be disputed in its professed character of fact. It is not true that the Bible teaches any such doctrine. It is nowhere asserted in so many words; and it cannot fairly be deduced from a careful and accurate survey of the entire teaching of Scripture relative to the future.

The evidence on which I rely runs through the whole revelation: it is in harmony with the tenor of the entire Book; it is sustained by a careful examination of the very texts which are usually adduced to prove a contrary doctrine. Scripture, when accurately and calmly weighed, is found everywhere to teach three things. First, that Christ has an Elect Church, composed of the renewed of all ages, who shall be one with Him through eternity. Secondly, that there are those who deliberately and resolutely reject Christ—a rejection which arises out of the fact that they love darkness better than light, because their deeds are evil, and for whom, therefore, there is no further hope. Thirdly, that the race, regarded as a whole—man, as separated, on the one hand, from those who, by grace "receive power or privilege to become sons of God," and on the other, from despisers and persecutors—man, therefore, regarded as embracing, in all ages, the ignorant, the captives of superstition, the careless, the indifferent, and the ungodly, is, in relation to Satan, a redeemed creature; that everything that is involved in that deliverance depends, not on his actual reconciliation, but on the RECONCILER; not on the faith exercised by the sinner, but on the work of THE SAVIOUR, wrought for every man while he was yet an "enemy by wicked works."

But it will be said, does the New Testament anywhere speak of a deliverance apart from personal faith in the Deliverer? Is it possible to conceive of a salvation which needs not, as a condition of its taking effect, to be received by the sinner? I simply reply, Scripture teaches that Christ's redemption is of avail "for the remission of sins that are past, through the forbearance of God" (Rom. iii. 25). Dean Alford interprets "sins that are past—"The sins of the whole world before the death of Christ." In this case, without doubt, there is a salvation irrespective of personal faith. I need scarcely add that, on any other supposition, infants must be regarded as lost.

The more reasonable question is, In what does such a redemption consist? What does it involve as a practical consequence? I venture to think a future probation, in some respects corresponding to that probation of grace which the elect of earth have enjoyed here; in other respects different. Similar, inasmuch as it will involve the power voluntarily to accept of the Redeemer, or wickedly to reject Him. Dissimilar, inasmuch as it will be under more favorable auspices; since, then, men will be delivered from the "captivity" of Satan; the great enemy will be bound: and trial will show that it is but too possible for man to fall, even apart from the influence of outward temptation. Probation now is for a kingly crown; probation then will be simply for citizenship. Then, we trust, the fallen will be free; for "the veil of the covering," that is now over all nations, will be taken off, and "death will be swallowed up of victory" (compare carefully Isa. xxv. 6—8 with 1 Cor. xv. 54, 55).

Need I say that such a deliverance, accomplished only through and by death, must, from its very nature, be totally distinct from that high and blessed union with the Redeemer which is effected by the Holy Spirit here; which is, in fact, "a present salvation;" the passing from death unto life now; a precursive victory over Satan: the pledge and the foretaste of a blessedness which will be consummated when, as perfected co-workers with God and with Christ, in the love and service of the world to come, such saved ones enter upon that joy of their Lord, which they have, in some slight degree, anticipated while on earth. Perhaps we might say the difference is like that which is shadowed forth, in the parable of the Prodigal, between the "son" and the "hired servant." The one is loved and trusted in the father's house; the other is only permitted to serve.

Viewed in this light, the texts become clear, and are seen to harmonize with every other portion of Holy Writ. For, first, they all take for granted that the persons of whom they are spoken have heard the Gospel, and either accepted or rejected it. He that "believed not" is the antithesis to "he that believeth;" neither the one phrase nor the other applying to those who have never known the Gospel in such a sense as to have either loved or hated it, accepted or rejected it. Secondly, the wrath that abideth—the condemnation already pronounced—is as evidently that which is incurred or confirmed by an actual rejection of grace. The man is condemned, it is expressly said, "because he hath not believed." These words were addressed to men who, with the Scriptures of the Old Testament in their hands, and professedly honoring the prophets, whose predictions they misread, were daily witnessing miracles of beneficence; men on whom overwhelming evidence only produced ever-deepening hate; men who not only rejected and crucified Messiah, in spite of His undeniable claim to their homage, but consciously and deliberately persisted in the wrong, because their deeds were evil. There is nothing whatever to show that the passages referred to are intended to distinguish the regenerate from the unregenerate, or the spiritual from the worldly. On the contrary they distinctly point to the wicked persecutor, and to the hater of light. Thirdly, the "new birth," and "the kingdom,"—the "new creature," and "eternal life,"—the "renewing of the Holy Ghost," and freedom from liability to judgment with the world,—as evidently go together. They indicate the blessedness of those who, in the age to come, shall be one with Christ, kings and priests, sharers alike in His throne and in His priesthood. To this dignity Nicodemus, who probably regarded it as his birthright, could not attain without the new birth. Israel as a whole may, indeed, be "saved," but nowhere are we told that it shall attain to the position that it might have occupied had the nation made its "calling and election sure."

Other passages of Scripture indicate this distinction still more clearly. "To as many [i. e., of the Jews] as received Him, to them gave He power [or privilege—miry], to become the sons of God, even to them that believe on His name: which were born, not of blood, nor of the will of the flesh, nor of the will of man, but of God"

(John i. 12, 13). To such "there is now no condemnation" (Rom. viii. 1). "Who shall lay anything to the charge of God's elect? It is God that justifieth." "Who shall separate us from the love of Christ?" "In all things we are more than conquerors through Him that loved us" (verse 33-37). "When we are judged, we are chastened of the Lord, that we should not be condemned (judged) with the world" (1 Cor. xi. 32). To apply these texts indiscriminately to every man who escapes the final doom of the impenitent, is to destroy their force, and to deprive them of meaning.

The true inference to be drawn from the passages we have been considering, and from Scripture generally, is, in my view, not that the Divine vengeance still impends over the race; not that man, as man, regarded apart from the enjoyment of a special indwelling of the Holy Spirit, is simply a vessel of wrath; not that the mere fact of the Atonement aggravates the guilt of those who never heard of it; not that Paul's Gospel—yea, the very substance of it"—consists in his teaching how "wrath might be averted, and God pacified;" not that Divine grace is but an expression of the mercy that snatches here and there a sinner from the horrors of interminable woe; but there is "a prize of our high calling in Christ Jesus," which may be gained or lost; that there is, for every man, a world of dishonor, or one of honor; a freedom from judgment, or a being liable to it; a future bliss or a future sorrowing; a present salvation, or a future condemnation; a hell for the irreclaimably impenitent, a heaven for the new-born sons of God: a probation, yet to come, for the helpless and the weak; a world of retribution no exact, that no diversity of character, no accident of position, no favoring or unfavorable circumstance, shall, in the slightest degree, affect the justice of its decisions, or the integrity of its awards.

Far be it from me to deny that an element of fear mingles with the element of grace in the Gospel. If it were not so, it would be a gospel out of harmony with the moral instincts of the sinner. For whence the anxiety which distinguishes him in life, or the prospective alarm which no casuistry can shut out in death, if it comes not from the deepest convictions of his soul, however neglected or crushed, that life, viewed without reference to futurity, is a failure, and that man is both a sinner and an exile? Whence, but from the instinctive consciousness that earth is but vanity, and the world that is invisible the only reality, comes that "sublime home-sickness," as it has been well called, which makes the young, as a rule, die so happily?

I repeat, "a religion altogether dissociated from fear" must be, "man being what he is, emasculate and unavailing;" but, on the other hand, a religion based on fear, or one the chief element of which is terror, can, in itself, never bring forth better fruit than a selfish dread, or an equally selfish hope. That much, very much, of our popular Christianity is of this kind can scarcely be doubted; but I firmly protest against the Bible being made in any way responsible for so monstrous a result.

It may fully be admitted that much secular excellence often exists where the love of God, as the supreme good, is wanting; that moral beauty in the character by no means necessarily implies the possession of a new heart and a right spirit; that it is in itself, no evidence whatever that the man thus rendered lovable to his fellows is also one with Christ, or could, in any fitting sense of the term, be styled "a saint," a "faithful brother in the Lord," or one "chosen from the foundation of the world," and predestinated to "eternal life."

But I do hold that such are not to be confounded with the opposers of all righteousness, or the persecutors of the Church; that we have no right to assume that, in the production of a lovely character, the Spirit of God has had no part; or that because, in such, there may be an obvious unfitness for the higher employments of the unseen world, they must therefore be fit for nothing better than the eternal companionship of the devil and his angels.

HOUSEHOLD CHRISTIANITY.

(Concluded from the last number.)

III. The triumphal song of the redeemed contains this beautiful stanza, "Unto him that loved us, and washed us from our sins in his own blood, and hath made us kings and priests unto God and his Father: to him be glory and dominion forever and ever. Amen."

He hath made us kings and priests. And so Peter reasons, "Ye also as lively stones, are built up a spiritual house, a holy priesthood, to offer up spiritual sacrifices acceptable to God by Jesus Christ." These testimonies establish the fact, that each member of the Father's household is invested with a participation of the priesthood of the Elder Brother, as well as his Kingship; and that, consequently, they are individually priests "after the order of Melchisedec," with priestly functions to perform and sacrifices to make.

It is further manifest, that each and all of the household are equally royal priests, and as in their sonship, so in their priesthood there is no gradations, but all, all are alike equally priest, as all alike are equally brethren. The argument to be drawn from this is, that none of the household have the right, power or privilege, to make void the priestly functions of any of his brethren by the performance of extra priestly functions. Nor can the Lord's priests be executed for the non-performance of their priestly functions. The Lord makes us priests that we may perform priestly service.

Now priestly service is performed at the altar and in the temple. But where now is the temple and the altar?

As long as God would be served by obedience to law, He placed His name and the symbols of his presence first in the tabernacle, then in the temple. But when He had demonstrated the utter inability of legal and moral considerations to move the human heart to obedience, inasmuch that by the mouth of Paul he pronounced this sentence, namely, "The carnal mind is enmity against God, it is not subject to the law of God, neither indeed can be." He also told us, "For what the law could not do in that it was weak through the flesh, God sending his only begotten Son in the likeness of sinful flesh, for sin condemned sin in the flesh; that the righteousness of the law might be fulfilled in us who walk not after the flesh, but after the Spirit." Thus he constituted the Lord Jesus the only temple in which, and through which, he could be acceptably worshipped or served. For through him alone we have access unto the Father, and in him alone are we accepted, and upon him as the chief corner stone all the building fitly framed together groweth unto an holy temple in the Lord. But the consequences of being built upon this chief foundation stone is the reception of its own life, the participation of its own nature and properties, and therefore, says the apostle, "Know ye not that you are the temple of God, and that the Spirit of God dwelleth in you?" Again He says, "For ye are the temple of the living God: as God hath said, I will dwell in them, and walk in them." Thus each individual saint and priest has with him and in him the altar at which he can and must perform spiritual and acceptable service, nor is he at liberty to suffer any one to officiate in his place, or perform his service. It cannot be performed by proxy. There is no provision for proximal service, and he or they who by their acts or teaching theoretically displaces the priestly services of any of their brethren, or discourages their performance, incurs a responsibility that no poor frail human being can sustain.

This thought burdens my heart and presses my soul for pointed and energetic utterance. I see that the true temple of the Lord is forsaken; there is little evidence that priestly service is performed there. The burden of all public teachings labors to magnify what are called "the means of grace" in connection with congregation assemblies, so there remains neither time nor disposition on the part of the household priest to perform his own service. He seems too glad to have his service performed by proxy, in the pulpit, by the minister who is recognized as paid and engaged especially to do that which the individual priest persuades himself he has neither time nor ability to perform; and thus the family altar is abandoned and forsaken, and his offspring observe that the whole of his religion is concentrated in his congregational service. And let me tell you, and would that my voice could reach the utmost bounds of christendom. The effort to make the people believe that the service of God is now, in and during this dispensation of favor, connected with any house, or building, or congregation of individuals, is the greatest delusion, the greatest snare of the adversary. The Lord himself hath said, that "neither in Jerusalem or the mountain of Samaria, (that is no locality particularly,) shall you worship God, but he that worshippeth God, must worship him in Spirit and in truth, for He seeketh such only to worship Him." And this worship can only be performed in His holy temple, namely, His "living temple" which each individual saint represents, and when the saint is the head of a family his hearthstone constitutes his family altar; but where the saint is an isolated individual, then his closet is the scene of his priestly worship. And all congregational effort must of necessity occupy its own legitimate ground, namely, an expedient to direct human effort, possessing no divine authority whatever. True, in the first introduction of Christianity congregations were gathered and officered and ruled by an appointed eldership. But consider the circumstances. The Christian revelation—the New Testament was not written. The Old Testament was not adapted to govern and direct the new organization. Hence, the then imperative necessity of supplying the place of the subsequently communicated New Testament. Infallible revelation, with inspired apostles, prophets, teachers and rulers, who of necessity were compelled to gather the new converts into communities, in order that they should impart their instruction, direct their movements, and rule their actions. But the perfect Canon of Scripture is complete and distributed through the household, and each and every saint can "see eye to eye" and the written word alone is now the only rule of faith and practice.

The household being equally royal priests, none can impose his dictum upon another, or sit in judgment upon his brother; "to his own master he stands or falls;" the word alone being the sole arbiter of all questions. Hence, several of the admonitions that were pertinent and applicable to the first churches are no longer applicable, save the cessation of the inspired gifts around which the congregational condition of Christian existence centred, have been removed by death. It follows, therefore, that Household Christianity is the only Divinely authorized visible form of Christian organization now recognized in the New Testament.

One other consideration I beg to press earnestly upon your attention, namely, When you superinduce the belief that congregational Christianity is the Divinely-appointed form of Christian existence, you superinduce in children the disposition to overlook the fact, that their own Christian fathers are the priests to whom their Christian allegiance is due.

It is a fearful responsibility for a preacher to intervene his influence between a parent and child, and by his teaching lead that child to disregard his parents' royal priestly prerogatives.

In conclusion: your own personal observation justifies the affirmation, that genuine household worship is the most potent of all motives in the Christian warfare with the world.

I urge the consideration of these important questions by your Convention, that you may justify fully the appropriation you have made of the Christian name, and if your organizations are placed in their true relations as simply human conveniences, then it will be my pleasure to cooperate heartily with you.

With my warmest devotion, I am your brother in the Lord,
G. B. STACY.

Correspondence.

FROM D. J. ELLSWORTH.

BRO. STORRS: You may have wondered how I was getting along, and how I liked the EXAMINER, its present form, etc. Perhaps I might offer somewhat as an apology, for having said and written so little the past two years, that I have been unlearning a good deal of what I had been led into; and am rather disposed now to "make haste slowly," to use the mind the Lord has given me to carefully study a subject for myself, and not to swallow down any dose that may be offered, which manner is a great characteristic of the Advent people, myself among the number.

I like the BIBLE EXAMINER very much, and its present form is a great improvement. I fully agree with you in making it a Monthly. It is not simply a paper to be read through and laid aside. It being a new theme, and of such tremendous importance, requires to be studied over and over again. We are living in such a rushing time, months come and go, seemingly, no longer than weeks were in our earlier years.

That a great and grand truth is coming out, in the vindication of God's government and good will over and toward the whole human race, I have been convinced from the first. What modifications, with more light, will be necessary—what definite shape it will take in all its aspects, after years of study, none I think can tell. That a great and good God, who saw "the end from the beginning," should have created man, that by a process of generation, human beings innumerable should pass through a brief existence of ignorance, wretchedness and sin, and then to pass away forever, is, as you say, abhorrent to all ideas of wisdom and goodness.

We have, doubtless, all shared in a mistaken notion about the present and coming age. Our Saviour came preaching the Gospel of the Kingdom, and went away, that a people might be prepared who should aid in subduing the nations to Himself in the coming age. Because a person was not fitted at his coming, or was with the generation gathered, their feet beneath the sod, is no reason why that at some future time, he should not stand among the living, and be brought to the knowledge of Him, who "tasted death for every man."

We, in our day, can see, as did the apostle Paul in his, the reason why the Jewish people did not receive their King. And some of us can see the reason why so few are drawn to Him by the "Gospel" which is preached. No wonder there is the inquiry among the "Orthodox" as to the cause of the waning power of the pulpit; or that the Gospel seems to lose its power to move upon the minds of men.

"The Gospel!" Well might the Saviour repeat from heaven, in thunder tones, this fearful accusation, "In vain do ye worship me, teaching for doctrines the commandments of men."

What darkness and doubt enshrouds the minds of men, while skepticism and infidelity are recruiting their forces for the greatest apostacy the world has ever known.

"The morning cometh," as also the shades of night are settle down, ere it dawn, that this corrupt and wicked world may prepare for the coming of "the man of sin," to terminate in the great day of battle and wrath of almighty God. This will take time, and meanwhile the harvester—Death—will gather in, and one by one we fall beneath his power; and I think the refining process of the grave will need to be added to the preparation of many who thought to see the Lord in "set times" in the past.

I must not further prolong my remarks; but, as I began to write, thoughts, long kept back, came rushing through my mind, and I have given utterance to some of them.

Windsor, Conn., Dec. 28, 1873.

FROM ELDER E. OWEN.

BRO. STORRS: The saints of Christ, in the coming dispensation, are all to be like a "Basket of Baldwin apples," so far as size and quality is concerned, I have been unable to believe for a long time.

That they are to attend a "great, grand, general campmeeting," through all eternity, and devote a large portion of the same to singing good tunes, seems to me rather beneath the destiny which may be assigned immortal saints, "priests of God and of Christ."

That all the dealings of God in the past with men have been with reference to conveying blessings through his own chosen people to those not sustaining that peculiar relation to himself, I think the Scriptures abundantly prove.

That we may judge of the future from the past, respecting the purpose of God in his people through Christ, is not an unreasonable judgment; but when His word clearly teaches such sentiments, is it heresy for us to believe it?

I am of the opinion that much abused and illy understood passage of the Saviour (Mat. xi. 11), where he affirms, "He that is least in the kingdom of heaven is greater than John the Baptist," very clearly teaches the above heretical sentiments: Because, first, the nature of the conversation must determine the ground of the comparison. And the sense of greatness must depend upon the character of the subject which was occupying the mind.

We read (ver. 7), And as they (the messengers of John) departed Jesus began to say unto the multitudes concerning John, What went ye out into the wilderness to see? etc. Observe, he speaks to the multitudes. Then the multitudes he was addressing were the very ones who went out to see John, together with all the land of Judea and they of Jerusalem, and were all baptized of John in Jordan confessing their sins. (See Mark i. 5.) Not that every man, woman, and child, were absolutely thus drawn into the wilderness and baptized; but comparatively so.

Now, as to the query, "What went ye out for to see?" The Saviour affirms, A reed shaken with the wind was not the occasion of their going: nor was the view of some who were well dressed the occasion of it: but the opportunity for seeing and hearing a prophet—John. Hence the comparison lies between the power John possessed to draw the multitude to listen to his teaching, and the power the least one in the kingdom of heaven will possess, (when the kingdom shall be established), in the very same direction. Hence we read (Rev. ii. 26), "And he that overcometh and keepeth my works unto the end, to him will I give power over the nations," etc.

"Behold the days come, saith the Lord God, that I will send a famine in the land; not a famine of bread nor a thirst for water, but of hearing the words of the Lord" (Amos viii. 11). When that time obtains, the least one in the kingdom will exert a greater influence over men without, than John the Baptist, in the days of his prophesying.

FROM MRS. T. H. FORD.

BRO. STORRS: The BIBLE EXAMINER comes to us glowing with rich and loving thoughts of our heavenly Father: thoughts that require something more than just a cursory reading. To us it steadily increases in interest,—the last one seemingly better than any previous one. Other periodicals lie about unread: but the EXAMINER never. If possible, as soon as it arrives, the family assemble to read, or hear it read. One member of which, an aged lady, who scarcely reads anything besides her Bible, finds strength and comfort in its pages, that she finds nowhere else. I save in her Bible and her God.

Again: Its type, paper, and general appearance are such, that I am never ashamed to offer it to intelligent men and women. Its matter is so varied, its Christian courtesy and deference to the opinions of others, its solid sense, and logical clearness commends itself to the candid consideration of thinking minds. So far as my means of knowing extends, there is less opposition felt by members of the different churches than by our Advent people to the great truths it advocates. It has been with pain, that I have heard from the pulpit misrepresentations of some points of our faith; and those misrepresentations held up to ridicule, and congregations warned against "age to come" doctrine, as though it were some mushroom affair, or fungus growth, upon the great truths of Christianity, that must be severed, cut off, not named; and as being highly pernicious, etc. Surely, our brethren must know that many eminent and good men, on the other side of the water, and also in this country, have believed and taught these doctrines, before Advent people had an existence. Some one has said, that although he had felt obliged to assent to the generally received opinions, in regard to the final destiny of man, yet he had never a hard thought of the Lord. I would that every one could say as much. And though we now believe in "a day of judgment and perdition of ungodly men," and that "all the wicked will God destroy," as much as we ever did, yet the unchangeable (or eternal) priesthood of Christ, as declared by the apostle (Heb. vii. 24), as well as other abounding scriptural testimony, and assurances, warrants us in entertaining the belief, that every human being, who has lived in former dispensations as well as the present, shall have a (one) chance to accept the Redeemer as their King, or to reject him.

I have sought for truth upon this great subject as for "hid treasure;" and my faith intensifies and strengthens that we are fast approaching the opening of a grand age of prophetic fulfilment. And for this, we will pray and wait. And while waiting can well afford to bear denunciation and ridicule the little time that remains. "Come, Lord Jesus, and come quickly," is the prayer of thy weary church, who are heart-sick with hope deferred. Arise, thou blessed Sun of Righteousness, and chase away the darkness and the shadows, and gather thy people, to enjoy thy glorious personal presence forever. Your sister, Concord, N. H., 1874.

FROM ELD. JACOB BLAIN.

BRO. STORRS: When I made an appeal to brethren for help, in the EXAMINER for Dec. 1873, I stated that an able brother had promised to pay half the cost publishing my second edition of "Hope for our Race," being about $140. As things have changed since I made that statement, I feel it needful to further explain my circumstances. This brother, being a heavy land agent in Chicago, has lately written me that he has been frustrated in his plans, and the crash in money matters will render it impossible for him to help me, as his purpose was; or, at least, till a change of times enables him to make up heavy losses. Being thus providentially disappointed in making extra efforts to spread truth, I can but hope brethren will make a more special effort to relieve me from the burden of a $400 debt. I conclude 500 or more take the BIBLE EXAMINER; and if all who have means do something, the object will be accomplished, and distress no one.

I have 800 of my work on hand; worth $200; but with present opposition, especially by Advent preachers, I cannot hope to sell them short of two years; and rather than have them lay idle, a large share will be given to willing readers. This was the course taken when the life and death question was young like our theory; and experience tells us it has given a heavy if not fatal blow to the torment theory. More than 100,000 Advent brethren have been delivered from its galling power. Bro. Storrs and myself, I believe, gave many more works in that reform than any other two in our country. We say this not to boast—"we did that which it was our duty to do."

Another matter I forgot to state in my request in December. When my age and health allowed me to travel and preach, as well as sell books, I obtained partly enough for support; but now the mass of old friends condemn my views; and being shut out of most places, even when able to preach, I am perplexed for means to support myself and wife.

It is unpleasant to thus present my wants, but I am relieved in doing so by finding God has blessed me with the views and feelings of Paul, as seen in Phil. iv. 17—"I desire fruit that may abound to your account." Our new and glorious views of God's government in this and the future ages, show, more plainly than ever seen before, the importance of "building with gold, silver, precious stones." Some will give enough "cups of cold water" to obtain the "five and ten cities." Buffalo, N. Y., Jan., 15, 1874.

"Our Hope:" A Magazine Bearing on Prophetic Enquiry. Edited by WILLIAM MAUDE. Published by Elliot Stock, 62 Paternoster Row, E. C., London, England. Price, four pence.

This new Magazine was commenced in October last. The "Prospectus" I did not receive; nor did I know of its existence till No. 2 came to hand, and now No. 3. No. 1 never reached me, if sent from England. Eld. Blain has since supplied me with it. It is a Magazine of 32 pages, with cover; containing something less than half the amount of matter of the BIBLE EXAMINER. Its matter, the want of time has prevented my examining fully. The "Prospectus," now received, states:

The object of this Magazine will be to present more comprehensive and consolatory views of the revealed future of the Church and the world than those usually taught by popular theology; and to direct attention to certain questions of most solemn interest which are generally ignored in the pulpit and neglected by the religious press.

Among these may be mentioned especially:

1. THE "HIGHER CALLING" OF THE ELECT CHURCH of the present dispensation, as expressive of the peculiar obligations resting (whether recognized or not) upon all those who regard themselves as competitors for "the prize of the high calling," and who, as "joint-heirs with Christ," anticipate reigning with Him in His manifested kingdom.

2. THE PRE-MILLENNIAL COMING OF CHRIST to establish on this earth that sacred government to which the glowing language of the ninety-eighth Psalm so exultingly refers.

8. And lastly, THE DESTINY OF OUR RACE, viewed in reference to the revealed extent and results of Christ's mediatorial work as set forth in certain great passages of Scripture; the New Testament doctrine that "God hath given to us eternal life, and that this life is in His Son;" and the not obscure intimations that God's universe shall ultimately be delivered from all sin and sorrow.

As to the reasons of this new Magazine being started in England, I know nothing. I supposed "The Rainbow" was a free medium, into which any communications now appearing in "Our Hope" could have been inserted, and knew Mr. Maude had largely occupied its columns. Perhaps both periodicals are needed there. Of that, however, the parties concerned must be the judges. When I get more light on the subject it may be noticed again.

Editor's Notices.

THE EDITOR of this Magazine will visit, and speak in "Vindication of the Divine Character and Government," such places as will furnish a convenient Hall or other place not connected with any sect or party; his object being not to help build up any such, but to show that the dealings of our CREATOR are in love to all His creatures. Persons in any place wishing such teaching will please inform me, and I will, as I have time, visit them. GEO. STORRA.

THE LORD'S SUPPER; OR CHRISTIAN PASSEOVER.

The anniversary of the above named "feast" occurs this year on the evening of March 31st. It is known, by those familiar with my views, that I regard this as a feast commemorative of our Lord's death; and, therefore, to be kept, like all other celebrations, on its anniversary, and not at other times. As to the place of keeping it, it may be in company with others or alone, as may be convenient. It is not the number nor place that gives it efficacy; nor does it need a professional priest to consecrate the bread and wine for the occasion; for, each member of Christ is of the "royal priesthood," and is competent to consecrate for himself or herself; only, "Do this," and all that relates to it, "in remembrance of Christ." I shall probably attend to it in my residence with my family at 8 o'clock on the evening above named. Any brethren or sisters,—lovers of Jesus,—will be welcome to partake with us, if they desire. ED.

To SUBSCRIBERS.—Any one receiving an imperfect copy of this Magazine, will oblige by giving me notice at once. I shall be glad to replace it by a perfect copy. The imperfection is the fault of the party who fold, stitch and trim them. In putting up to subscribers it is impossible to detect it without examining each copy.

THE BIBLE EXAMINER.—I will supply volume 17 in sheets (perfect sets) on the receipt of sixty cents. Also, odd numbers of that volume (or broken sets) for one cent for each two copies, which is simply to pay the postage. Who will scatter them?

I will still supply Nos. 1, 2, 3, or 4, of the present volume, for ten cents per copy to any one who wishes to send a sample to a friend; or three of either for 25 cents.

P. ALLING, Norwalk Ohio, writes: In regard to the doctrines advocated by the EXAMINER, I will say, I am becoming more and more confirmed in their correctness; and thus far they have borne the test of a critical examination, and appear like "pure gold which shines the brighter by much rubbing." I see not how any Bible Student, who loves the truth, can raise an objection. This is the only view that I have ever seen that harmonizes the attributes of justice, love, and mercy of God towards the creatures of His creation in this their low and fallen state; and at the same time accords with the testimony of both the Old and New Testament Scriptures. May the good Lord bless you, in your labors of love, in my earnest prayer.

All derision against the word of God is folly; and all opposition to it is madness.—Beveridge.

VOL. XVIII.

NEW YORK, MARCH, 1874.

No. 6.

"UNIVERSALISM."

This term is applied to that class of men who hold the doctrine that all mankind will ultimately be saved. They may and do differ as to the time when and the means by which this result will be reached. It has been said that some of the writers for this Magazine promulgate Universalist sentiments. That is true; but the Editor does not hold himself responsible for the sentiments of correspondents. He differs with them as to the extent of the ultimate salvation. If he could divest his mind of the fact that man is a responsible and accountable creature he might agree with them: but the idea that the CREATOR "must compel" belief, or faith, destroys all idea of responsibility: for the creature may safely wait till such compulsive power is exercised on him, and cannot be blameworthy for not believing at any previous time, nor worthy of praise when he does believe, for he was compelled to do it—faith was forced on him. In other words, His salvation is that of an irresponsible machine, for the working of which only the Inventor is responsible.

The idea of making laws, imposing penalties, or making promises to machines is a strange one and hardly consists with the notion of a sane mind; and much less with a mind infinitely wise.

But one asks, "Is a man who is dying—going out of life—saved when the bread of life is proffered him? or, must he accept of said proffer, and so it become a gift?" This is a specious presentation of the subject, but very fallacious. It is no less a gift because the man refuses to eat when the bread is set before him without money or price; and he is saved from the necessity of dying. Must the donor's gift depend on the dying man's reception of it? If so, and the man dies, his death may be chargeable to the want of benevolence in the person who furnished the food: he should have forced it down the man's throat. Is that the way we reason about gifts?

"God hath given to us eternal life, and this life is in his Son: he that hath the Son hath life: he that hath not the Son of God hath not life"

(1 John v. 11, 12). Such is God's "record:" and "he that believeth not God hath made Him a liar, because he believeth not the record that God gave of His Son" (verse 10). Shall we now be told, God has not given (or, made a gift) unless He "compels belief?" The gift is there; but it is in God's Son; and in order to actual possession of the eternal life we must be in His Son by faith: and he who will not receive the Son hath not the life that is in Him. Here is a gift, and God has made it so, for all men: but the gift must be accepted and appropriated by a responsible and accountable creature; not by a forced faith; for "he that believeth not shall be condemned" (Mark xvi. 16). Condemned for what, if faith comes not till it is compelled, or forced, upon him?

Faith may be forced on a man to a certain extent; but it is not rewarded till it is tried. Even the most desperate case, that of persecuting Saul, who may be said to have been forced to believe that Jesus of Nazareth was the Messiah, yet he was still to have his faith tried in a most terrible manner; and he said, in his trial, "I keep under my body, and bring it into subjection; lest that by any means, when I have preached to others, I myself should be a castaway" (1 Cor. ix. 27). How so, Paul? "For it is impossible for those who were once enlightened, and have tasted of the heavenly gift, and were made partakers of the Holy Ghost, and have tasted of the good word of God, and the powers of the world to come, if they shall fall away, to renew them again to repentance, seeing they crucify to themselves the Son of God afresh, and put him to an open shame" (Heb. vi. 4-6).

These persons were "blessed;" yea, they had believed and tasted the "gift," and yet Paul shows they might fail of an ultimate salvation: yea, that their salvation was "impossible." What then shall we think of the idea that all men are to be forced, or compelled, to the belief that shall result in their ultimate salvation? Is it not clearly shown, by the word of the Lord, to be a mistake? and a dangerous one, too, seeing the natural result of such an idea is to lead men to wait for the compelling power to make them believe, and to quiet their minds in sin by thinking themselves excusable for living in unbelief, because no such power has ever been bestowed on them!

God's free gift and man's free agency must meet in the work of a final salvation: neither must be displaced; they must unite, or no soul of man will ultimately be born into the kingdom of God. Man could not move in that direction without the free gift first moves upon him; and God's free grace can never force man's free will to accept the salvation of ultimate redemption; that would be for God to "deny himself," and confess that He made a mistake in the creation of man with a free will. That man's free will may oppose God's free gift and refuse to accept it is as plainly taught in the Bible as any other doctrine. Our Lord Jesus Christ, who is one of God's free gifts, said to Jerusalem's inhabitants, "How oft would I have gathered thy children together, even as a hen gathereth her chickens under her wings, and ye would not" (Matt. xxiii. 37, and Luke xiii. 31). And again He said, "Ye will not come to Me that ye might have life" (John v. 40).

No forced belief is hinted at as the thing needful for their redemption and salvation; but their ruin is the result of setting their free will in opposition to Him who came to save them, and thus their responsibility is manifested, and God's ways are vindicated,—they are without excuse; for, says Jesus, "If I had not done among them the works which none other man did, they had not had sin: but now they have both seen and hated both Me and my Father" (John xv. 21). Where is the "compelling faith" to be seen in this language? Man's responsibility is every where recognized in the Bible: every command, threatening, prohibition, and promise implies man's responsibility and liability to a failure; and let no soul of man flatter himself that his ultimate salvation is somehow secured against a possibility of a failure; but let us "So run that we may obtain" (1 Cor. ix. 24); and remember, that "He that overcometh shall not be hurt of the second death" (Rev. ii. 11). If victory is not achieved by free-will taking hold of free-grace there is no escape from "the second death." Heaven invites, promises, entreats, encourages, counsels, warns, suffers long, not willing that any should perish; but Heaven never compels, or forces, final salvation. No! "Why will ye die?" is Love's last agony over the obstinate rejecter of God's free grace: nothing has been left undone, on God's part, that could be done to secure an ultimate salvation for every son and daughter of Adam; so that, if any one perishes, utterly and forever, the God of all grace and mercy can truly say, "What could have been done more to" that soul, "that I have not done" for it? but it "will not come unto" My Son that it "might have life" (Isa. v. 4, and John v. 40).

Let us be wise betimes, and lay hold on the hope set before us, that we may become "heirs of the kingdom;" or, at least, subjects in the kingdom; and thus have a share in the glory to be revealed when "the sons of God are manifested;" but first, seek to be of those glorified at the appearing and kingdom of Jesus Christ. To that honor we are now called. Let us "make it sure." Ed.

"THE TIMES OF IGNORANCE."

PAUL says, "God in times past suffered all nations to walk in their own ways" (Acts xv. 18). Again he says, "And the times of this ignorance God winked at,"—upereidon,—"overlooked, looked above, to pass over, to bear with, not to punish." Such is the true sense of the expression in Acts xvii. 30. Not that men were not punished for their wrong doings in any sense: but in the times of ignorance of "the only true God and Jesus Christ," God so far overlooks the idolatry and other sins as not to suffer man's final state to be determined by them. This ignorance must first be removed by "the knowledge of the truth;" which God will all men shall have (1 Tim. ii. 4) as the test of their fitness for an endless life: and "He now" (in this age) "commandeth all men everywhere to repent; because he hath appointed a day" (a time, or period), "in the which He will judge" (rule) "the world in righteousness by that man whom He hath ordained: whereof He hath given assurance unto all men, in that He hath raised him from the dead" (Acts xvii. 30, 31).

The whole of this language goes to show that the final state of man is not to be fixed while in ignorance; but when truth does come to men, then commences their true probation for an endless life; then, to every such soul, the command comes to repent,—to change their views, their ways, to turn from their vanities, follies, and sins; and believe in Jesus Christ, who is to rule, act as Judge in the world, that "righteousness" shall be established in the earth; for God has determined to "give" unto his Son "the throne of David" (Luke i. 32); and not only that, but to give him the "dominion" over "all people, nations, and languages," that they "should serve him" (Dan. vii. 14); and "He shall have dominion from sea to sea, and from the river to the ends of the earth" (Psa. lxxii. 8); and, "Of the increase of His government and peace there shall be no end, upon the throne of David" (Isa. ix. 7); for, "saith the Lord, I will raise unto David a righteous ΒΑΣΙΛΕΥ, and a King shall reign and prosper, and shall execute judgment and justice in the earth" (Jer. xxiii. 5).

Such is the day God has appointed, "in the which He will judge, or rule, the world in righteousness." It is the day in which "The kingdoms of this world are become the kingdom of our Lord and of his Christ" (Rev. xi. 15); the rule which the prophet describes as "a stone" which smote the image Nebuchadnezzar saw in vision, representing various worldly kingdoms, which are to give place to the kingdom "the God of heaven shall set up" on earth, and which "shall never be destroyed" (Dan. ii. 44). In this kingdom Jesus Christ is to be the Judge, or Ruler, of the world; and of this fact "God hath given assurance unto all men in that He hath raised him from the dead."

But the vast majority of the human race have lived and died in "ignorance" of all these facts concerning Jesus and his rule of the world; and until the knowledge of them comes to their understandings "God overlooks" their wrong doings so that they are not imputed to their final condemnation: but when the knowledge of the truth does come to them, no matter who they are nor where they are, they will be required to exercise "Repentance toward God, and faith toward our Lord Jesus Christ" (Acts xx. 21).

It is when the Kingdom of God shall come on earth that all the ignorance which has hitherto kept men in slavery to sin and evil will be done away; for God has said, by the prophet, "He will destroy the face of the covering cast over all people, and the veil that is spread over all nations" (Isa. xxv. 7). Then the "Watchman shall see eye to eye" (Isa. lii. 8). Then ignorance cannot be pleaded as an excuse for the absence of obedience and faith. Then if men sin it must be willfully, and they shall die for their own avoidable iniquity; and God's ways will be vindicated as righteous and equal; for "the whole earth shall be filled with the knowledge and glory of the Lord as the waters cover the sea."

To suppose man's final state is to be fixed for sins committed in unavoidable ignorance of "the only true God and Jesus Christ," and the Divine claims upon them, is a violation of all sense of justice the CREATOR has planted in the human breast; and is, virtually, accusing Him of deception in affirming His "ways are equal," and that He hath "no pleasure in the death of the wicked," and "will have all men come to the knowledge of the truth." Christ has "tasted death for every man,—gave himself a ransom for all men,—and "is the propitiation for the sins of the whole world" (Heb. ii. 9; 1 Tim. ii. 6; 1 John ii. 2); and God is pledged that these facts shall be "testified in due time" to all men; and no limitation is made in the Bible as to the time when this testimony shall be given to any man; the time of doing it "the Father hath put in his own power" (Acts i. 7): and let religionists of all classes be careful that they do not limit God's work to their own narrow ideas or vision.

The fact is made certain that "every creature" is to hear the Gospel of the kingdom, and of the grace of God in Christ, before he can or will be condemned for unbelief,—the only sin, known in the Gospel, which excludes any man from an endless life. The ignorance of the only true God and of Jesus Christ, therefore, must and will be removed from every human mind, either in this life or in some of "the ages to come;" and God's character and government vindicated; not by assent to an inexplicable administration; but by a clear exhibition of God's impartial love to every human soul and of the equality of His dealings with them all, so that "every creature which is in heaven and on earth, and under the earth, and such as are in the sea, and all that are in them" shall be "heard saying, Blessing and honor, and glory, and power, be unto Him that sitteth upon the throne, and unto the Lamb for ever and ever"—or, for the age and the ages (Rev. v. 12). Blessed, glorious day! The Lord hasten it in its time. Then shall "the knowledge and glory of the Lord fill the earth as the waters do the sea:" ignorance will pass away for ever; the darkness will have passed and the true light shine for ever more; and "all shall know the Lord from the least to greatest" (Heb. viii. 11).

There is in the human intellect a power of expansion—I might almost call it a power of creation—which is brought into play by the simple brooding upon facts.—Dr. Tyndall.

"UNBELIEF:" THE EXAMINER.

BRO. STORRS: I see it stated in the EXAMINER that unbelief is the only sin that will consign any man to endless death; and that any one who is guilty of that sin will be left in the dark Gulf of annihilation. I wish to offer friendly objections to that view. If true, it will annihilate multitudes of our best men and women. In this vicinity live some very honest and pious people who do not believe. They have heard all denominations preach and are still unbelievers. If they should die in unbelief, according to the EXAMINER, they must hopelessly perish. F.

The EXAMINER does not hold the doctrine of unbelief as here set forth by "F." It holds that "God will have all men come to the knowledge of the truth" (1 Tim. ii. 4); when this is done, in this life or a future one, then a wilful unbelief, or rejection of the LIFE-GIVER—Jesus Christ—involves them in the death which is "the wages of sin." A man may hear "all denominations preach" without having "come to the knowledge of the truth;" for what truth is taught by them is so mixed with error that the wonder is that any believe, in these days. How any one can be said to be truly "pious" and "still be unbelievers," as "F." affirms, is an unsolved mystery. True piety never can exist without faith; for it consists in a "filial sentiment felt toward God; dependence upon him; and a disposition to know and do his will;" and, "This is the work of God, that ye believe on him whom he hath sent" (John vi. 29). Till a man has heard of Jesus Christ, or the "Seed of the woman," he cannot possibly believe on Him. He may have heard of Him, but His character and work be so misrepresented to him that it proves an unavoidable hindrance to belief; and, hence, unbelief is not wilful; and though he may suffer loss by it, it is not a "hopeless" case. Friend "F." goes on to make "queries" and answer them, which he supposes are opposed to the position of the EXAMINER. Let us see. He asks:

"Can any one believe at will? Emphatically, No!"

Suppose this is true: What does it prove? Just nothing; for the EXAMINER does not hold that any one can believe without evidence. "F." goes on, and asks:

"Can any one keep from believing when the evidence is made clear? No."

F.'s answer does not harmonize with Jesus' declaration, "If I had not come and spoken unto them, they had not had sin; but now they have no cloak for their sin." . . . "If I had not done among them the works which none other man did, they had not had sin; but now they have both seen and hated both me and my Father" (John xv. 22, 24). Men can and do sin against the clearest light and evidence. They allow their prejudices, passions, appetites, and traditions, to rule them and shut up their minds against the truth, so that they will not accept it as a ground of action. The mere assent, that a thing is true, does not, of itself, constitute faith: "Wilt thou know, O vain man, that faith without works is dead?" (Jas. ii. 20). Belief is something more than assent to the truth that Jesus is the Christ. It accepts him as the Redeemer and Saviour of myself, as an individual, and as my King to rule me in all things. Friend "F." goes on to say:

"These honest and pious skeptics cannot believe, because they think the evidence is wanting. They are willing to believe, but demand evidence that will not admit of a doubt. Now if they perish hopelessly God is to blame for not giving overwhelming evidence of his truth."

Friend "F." reminds me of the crucifiers of our Lord. In derision they said, "Let Christ the King of Israel descend now from the cross that we may see and believe" (Mark xv. 32). "No matter if He has healed the sick, cast out demons, given sight to the blind, and raised the dead, we will have just such evidence as we please, or we will not believe: God is to blame if He does not force us to believe!" Is such the language of "honest and pious skeptics?" Have these "pious" souls carefully and prayerfully examined the evidence God has already given? Or, have they only taken the evidence as corrupted by others? Let them take the Bible and study it for themselves, cultivating a sincere desire to know the truth, and they will not be long in finding the evidence "overwhelming;" and nothing but a wilful spirit will prevent their conviction of the truth. The murderers of our Lord professed that they wanted clearer evidence; when, in fact, their hatred of Jesus and his teachings was the real ground of their unbelief. Let "honest and pious skeptics" see to it that their pride of heart is not the real cause of their skepticism; and not any lack of evidence. "F." goes on to say:

"If God will in some future age give overwhelming evidence of his truth, then universal salvation is sure to follow; for, no sane man will act contrary to his interest in such a case: self-interest would call loud upon them to accept Christ; and if they did not accept him, then they would act different in that matter from what they do in all other matters pertaining to life."

The EXAMINER does not teach that God has or ever will give such "overwhelming evidence" as shall make it impossible for a free agent, such as man is, to do otherwise than to accept Jesus as their Redeemer and Lord: that would be to "deny Himself," and to make His government a farce; pretending to be governing responsible and accountable creatures, when, in fact, He himself is the only responsible agent; and if there is a failure He alone is in fact, or to blame. If doubt were absolutely impossible there would be no virtue in faith; and if man cannot believe till he is absolutely "overwhelmed with evidence," then he is not to blame for unbelief. Such a theory removes all praise or blame from man; and the idea of rewards and punishments is only an imaginary notion; as well talk of rewarding or punishing any other machine. My friend "F." concludes his plea in the following manner:

"Is there a greater unbeliever to day than Thomas was in the days of Christ? Thomas knew Christ: was personally acquainted with him. Hence; had better opportunities to believe than any man has at the present day. Why did Thomas refuse to believe that Christ had risen when told by the other apostles? Because their word was not sufficient evidence. Why must a man now perish for not believing the same evidence that Thomas refused to believe? And if the evidence was made overwhelming to Thomas in order to make him believe, why not give the same chance to every son and daughter of Adam?"

Thomas was given this evidence because he was one Christ had chosen to be a "WITNESS of his resurrection;" for, says Peter, "God raised up Jesus, and showed him openly; not to all the people, but unto witnesses chosen before of God, even to us, who did eat and drink with him after he rose from the dead" (Acts x. 41). Thomas was one of these witnesses; and a witness must know the facts of which he is to testify. Thomas' faith on seeing Jesus had nothing to do with his ultimate salvation; it related to a fact concerning which he was to testify. But must a jury see a murder committed before they can believe? and if twelve men testify that each of them saw the murder, must the jurymen say, "Why not give the same chance to every one" of us, to see the murder, you had, and then we will believe it was committed? otherwise we will acquit the accused! Where would society be if such a course should prevail? and what would be thought of such a jury?

But, let it be remembered, Jesus reproved Thomas for his unbelief: "Because thou hast seen me, thou hast believed: blessed are they that have not seen, and yet have believed" (John xx. 20). Faith in Christ's resurrection is one thing; and faith in Him as our Redeemer and Lord, "who gave himself a ransom for" us, and to whom we owe an entire consecration and obedience, is another thing. Though both are essential to a final salvation; yet, the first may be produced by sight; but it does not follow that the latter is or ever has been; for even in Thomas's or St. Paul's case. Trial must always follow to produce the latter; and "he that endureth unto the end shall be saved," saith Jesus; and Paul says, "Whose (Christ's) house are we if we hold fast the confidence and the rejoicing of the hope firm unto the end" (Heb. iii. 6).

One fact more. "F." says, "Thomas refused to believe, because the testimony of the other apostles was not sufficient." Why then, I ask, did Christ "upbraid" the eleven "with unbelief and hardness of heart, because they believed not them that had seen him after he was risen?" (Mark xvi. 14). Only the women and the two going to Emmaus had before seen him;—why condemn them all for not believing the testimony of a few, if the testimony of all the "apostles was not sufficient evidence" to convince Thomas? Shall we assume that God must or should "give all men the same chance" that He has given some? That He has or will give "every son and daughter of Adam" an opportunity to secure an endless life, I have no doubt. But that all must or will have "the same chance," there is no warrant to affirm or believe; yet none will perish but such as wilfully misimprove their opportunity. "How shall we escape, if we neglect so great salvation?" (Heb. ii. 3.) Ed.

INQUIRIES BY MRS. D. O. HOPKINS.

BRO. STORNS: I send herewith a selection that I cut from a paper, and would like your opinion of it. Is there not much truth in it? Will you please tell me what, in your opinion, constitutes a chance to be saved? Is it to be born of Christian parents, reared under religious influences, and attend, year after year, the preaching of the so-called Gospel; as thousands do without a thought of accepting or rejecting it? or, must the truth be set home to the heart by the Spirit of God so that they feel they must decide? It has been urged, by some, that every one under such training as I have named, and every one who has access to the Bible has a chance; but it does not seem so to me. Please let us know your views upon it.

North Foster, R. I.

REMARKS BY THE EDITOR.—I may not be able to give a satisfactory answer to the above inquiries. I have, heretofore, stated my views as fully as I know how to do. They are simply, that every person, brought into this world, will, in this life or a future one, have an opportunity, including all necessary means, to secure an endless life: and that these necessary means include a knowledge of "the only true God and Jesus Christ;" and also the Holy Spirit's action on the heart. Without these, I cannot conceive it possible that any one has had an opportunity to secure an endless life. But who, in christendom, has had such an opportunity, I pretend not to know or determine; God only is the judge in that matter: yet, I do know that the mass of the human race, in any age of this world, have not had it; and therefore must and will have it in some of "the ages to come;" that is, in God's "due time," for "God will have all men to . . . come to the knowledge of the truth" (1 Tim. ii. 4-6). No power in the universe can defeat what He wills to be done; for, He says, "My counsel shall stand, and I will do all my pleasure" (Isa. xli. 10). Again He says, "I am the LORD, I change not" (Mal. iii. 6): and again, James says, "With the Father of lights is no variability, neither shadow of turning" (i. 17). Thus is secured, beyond the possibility of failure, the truth that "all men shall come to the knowledge of the truth," in God's "due time," or "the times and seasons which the Father hath put in His own power" (Acts i. 7). When that "due time" comes to any of our race, it is the time in which their final state is fixed, and not till then; and, "If we sin wilfully after that we have received the knowledge of the truth, there remaineth no more sacrifice for sins" (Heb. x. 26).

The following is the "selection" our friend, Mrs. Hopkins, sent. It has some "truth in it;" but, possibly, a mixture of error also; yet, I leave it to speak for itself, deeming what I have said above is sufficient to show my view of the matter.

The Necessity of Redemption.

The act of creation lays on us a duty. We bring a child into the world, and the absolute imperative of God is on us to feed, educate and love to the end, that to which we have given life. We do our best for the child, but we suppose that all goes wrong. We expend our love upon him, he rejects it; we punish and he hardens under the punishment and leaves us; we go after him, and he refuses to return; we give him up to himself for a time, and he grows worse and dies impenitent. But, if we are of a true human nature, we cannot forget him. Our first thought in the other world is our erring son, and if we can—and I for one do not doubt it—our one effort in the eternal life will be to find him out and redeem him to our heart by any sacrifice which love can prompt. And even could love not move us, duty would call us to this righteous quest. We must bring our wanderer home. And it is so, I firmly believe, with God and men. By the very act of creation, God has laid upon himself the necessity of redemption. We wander from him and he punishes us through spiritual laws; we reap that we have sown; we fill our belly with the husks which the swine eat. He lets us eat of the fruit of our own devices; the day of retribution comes, and our pleasures turn to gall, our irritated desires become our hell—lower and lower still we sink, and suffering is hard on us, for impenitent man must touch the abyss of God's chastening tenderness before pride and self be conquered into penitence. But God waits and works. "Them also must I bring," speaks the necessity which flows from his Fatherhood. All through our deepest ruin God's victorious love is opposed to man's reluctant hatred and despair; till at last they, being of the finite, and of the dead things of the universe dead, are shattered to pieces by persistent love; and the child comes to himself, calls out, from the depths of a divine misery, I will arise and go to my Father! Far off his Father sees him, and in triumphant joy receives him: "This my son was dead, and is alive again; was lost, and is found." It will be thus within eternity, till, in the fullness of charity, there shall be at last one flock and one shepherd.

HAD the Germans understood their true mission, they would have been contented with having simply brought to light the truths of Christianity, freed from all human conditions, and shewn the relation in which mankind stands to the Deity and His eternal purposes, after they had been obscured so many ages. There was no need for them to lose themselves in dialectic subtleties, and to cover the newly-discovered gold with fresh heaps of rubbish.—RANKE.

If we confess our sins, He is faithful and just to forgive us our sins and cleanse us from all unrighteousness.—1 John i. 9.

THE STUDY OF THE BIBLE.

BY HENRY DUNN.

CHAPTER XVI.

On Perversions by Projection.

"A critic on the Sacred Book should be Candid and learn'd, dispassionate and free :
Free from the wayward bias bigots feel,
From fancy's influence, and intemperate zeal."

COWPER.

WE regard Scripture as projected, when passages which relate to the apostles only, or to the miraculous state of things which obtained during the planting of the Christian Church, are used as if they were intended to apply to ourselves, or, at least, to institutions which had no existence when the words in question were uttered. That Scripture, when subjected to this process, becomes perverted, will be seen clearly enough when particular instances are brought under examination.

A few only can here be cited.

(1) "Except a man be born of water and of the Spirit, he cannot enter into the kingdom of God" (John iii. 5). The application of this text to Christian baptism is by no means uncommon; some maintaining therefrom the absolute necessity of baptism by water to salvation, while others, who shrink from the consequences involved in this conclusion, affirm that through baptism alone can any man become a member of Christ's Church, or a partaker of "covenanted" blessing.

Yet nothing can be clearer than that when these words were uttered, Christian baptism was unknown; that they refer exclusively to the baptism of John; and that the lesson they were intended to teach was, that Christ must be openly acknowledged, as well as inwardly believed in; that confession before man, whatever reproach or danger might thereby be incurred, was essential to discipleship; and that the conduct of Nicodemus, and that of the class he represented (for he came as a representative man), was incompatible with fidelity (Luke vii. 30; John xii. 42, 43).

(2) "Except ye eat the flesh of the Son of man, and drink His blood, ye have no life in you" (John vi. 53). These words, with others that precede and follow, are ordinarily regarded as applying to the "Holy Communion;" some (as the Romanists) founding thereupon, in connection with the later Institute of the Redeemer, the doctrine of Transubstantiation; and others (as the High Lutherans) that of Consubstantiation.

Where, however, we may ask, is the connection to be traced between the conversation here recorded, and the subsequent appointment of the Lord's Supper? As no such ordinance then existed, it is utterly impossible that those who heard Christ speak could have imagined anything of the kind. Nor does his teaching imply it. The comparison our Lord draws is between "the meat which perisheth" (ver. 27), and that "which endureth to everlasting life" (ver. 40, 50); and the lesson imparted would have been just as important and intelligible as it now is, had the Eucharist never been instituted. It was the revelation of that new and wondrous Life,— "life unto life," which, greater than the life He gives "unto the world," they, and they only, enjoy, who become here spiritually united to the Redeemer by a living faith, and to whom His flesh and His blood,—His life and His death,— are as "manna" to support, and as "wine" to gladden and refresh. This doctrine naturally appeared to many of the disciples—then very imperfectly acquainted with His nature and dignity—so monstrous, that they could not bear the saying, but "went back, and walked no more with Him" (verse 66).

To pretend, as some have done, in order to support High Sacramentarianism, that those who went away were revolted at what they considered a sort of cannibalism, is either dishonesty, or unmitigated folly. The Jews were conversant with the imagery Christ employed (Ezek. iii. 1-3), and could not, therefore, mistake His meaning; the response of Peter clearly shows that the Twelve understood Him aright, for when asked, "Will ye also go away?" they reply at once, "To whom shall we go? Thou hast the words of eternal life" (ver. 68). He had Himself just told them, "The flesh profiteth nothing; the words that I speak unto you, they are spirit, and they are life" (ver. 63). We ourselves colloquially employ very similar language when we bid men not only "mark and learn," but "inwardly digest" Divine truth.

There seems to us nothing whatever in the text to justify even the association of this discourse with the Supper, however strongly that institution may recall and illustrate its teaching. Projection here leads inevitably to perversion.

(3) "The prayer of faith shall save the sick" (Jas. v. 15). There can be no doubt that this text is often regarded as a promise; that expectations of the recovery or sick persons are frequently founded upon it; and that, when disappointment follows, a painful sense of doubt comes over the soul, although concealed, as much as possible, by exclamations on the inscrutable and mysterious providence of God.

But is it given to us as a promise? Certainly not. The context clearly shows that it applies only to a certain class of sick — those who were judicially punished by sickness for special sin. The reference to Elias, as having by his prayer brought rain, is alone proof that a special, and not an ordinary state of things, was in the mind of the apostle.

Hezekiah certainly had his life lengthened in answer to his prayer; but the whole transaction was peculiar, and connected with the Theocracy. The king seems to have regarded the particular sickness in question in the light of punishment (Isa. xxxviii. 12, 13); he pleads his integrity as the reason why his life should be prolonged (ver. 3); and God confirms the promise to raise him up by miracle (verse 5-8).

David, under similar circumstances, prays for the recovery of his child, but—in vain (2 Sam. xii. 16-19).

Paul says nothing about special prayer for Trophimus, whom he leaves sick; and while he gratefully acknowledges the mercy of God in raising up Epaphroditus, lest he should be crushed by over-much sorrow, he receives his recovery, not as an anticipated reply to the prayer of faith, but as a sovereign and unexpected mercy. Absolute and happy acquiescence in the Divine will is always our duty, and should be one of our highest privileges.

One or two additional illustrations will, perhaps, tend to show still more clearly, the extent of the evil we are endeavoring to point out.

(4) "When He, the Spirit of Truth, is come, He will guide you into all truth" (John xiv. 13). Here, again, we have words spoken to the apostles which are commonly, by projection, applied to ourselves. But it will be said, Do they not so apply? One would think it was enough to answer by asking two other questions,—First, Are we, as a fact, in the present day guided by the Holy Spirit "into all truth?" Or,—explain it as we may,—are we left to flounder amid errors of all kinds, quarrelling perpetually about religion, almost doubting whether any reply can be obtained to the question,—What is Truth?

Then, secondly, were the apostles guided, in such a sense, and to such a degree, that they were thereby qualified to be the teachers of mankind through all ages? Most assuredly they were. Why, then, should we doubt the true application of the text? As well might we say that the Spirit brings to our "remembrance all things whatsoever" that Christ taught when He was on earth, or that He shows us "things to come" (John xiv. 26; xvi. 13).

It is surely a blessed thing to know that the inspired teachers of the Church were directly and authoritatively taught of God; but to imagine that we are thus instructed is to destroy the value of Scripture altogether, by claiming for ourselves communications from heaven of a character which, if real, cannot be other than infallible. When shall we learn that the action of the Spirit of God on the mind of man, if direct, is inspiration, whether the recipient be a good or a bad man,—a Balaam or a Paul?

All other light is simply moral; enlightening the mind only by and through the purification of the heart; and this, whether the man so illuminated be an Augustine, a Luther, a Calvin, or an English peasant. To all such, the voice of Scripture is,—"If thine eye be single, thy whole body shall be full of light." He that "doeth the will of God shall know of the doctrine."

The fruits of the Spirit are "love, joy, and peace," not mental illumination, except in so far as these Divine qualities necessarily produce it. Too long have we fancied that the Spirit of God will enlighten us, in spite of cherished prejudices, bigotry, and want of candor. Little need is there, under such circumstances, for our marveling that Inspiration should be so often misunderstood, or that it is so frequently confounded with genius, or spiritual intuition.

The only text that, superficially viewed, seems to justify the ordinary notion, is 1 John ii. 20, "Ye have an unction from the Holy One, and ye know all things," on which Dean Alford justly remarks, "The expression explains itself, as referring to all things needful for right action in the matter under consideration—the ability to detect antichrists" (verse 18, 19). The "unction" is love and purity, which, as we have already said, is the means and weapon by which alone error can be detected and resisted.

(5) "If two of you shall agree on earth as touching anything that they shall ask, it shall be done for them of my Father which is in heaven. For where two or three (of you) are gathered together in my name, there am I in the midst of them" (Matt. xviii. 19, 20).

"I hesitate not" (says the Professor of Theology in the Free Church College, Aberdeen) "to build upon this promise the following proposition: That the more extensively we can organize an agreement among all that love the Lord Jesus to ask for specific things in prayer, and the more symphonious those prayers are, the more assuredly will those things be done for us of His Father which is in heaven." Hence money is raised, and machinery created, to secure what are called "concerts" in prayer.

We should be the last to discourage social and united supplications for mercies of any kind, but we cannot help asking, Is there no mistake here? If the words quoted, apply to Christians generally, those which immediately precede them must do so too; and in that case, any Christian community, meeting as "a Church," may say, "Whatsoever (we) bind on earth shall be bound in heaven; and whatsoever (we) loose on earth shall be loosed in heaven" (verse 18).

Again, "James and John" did agree to ask our Lord an important favor; and they put it in these words,—“Master, we would that thou shouldest do for us whatsoever we shall desire;” but the only answer they received was, “Ye know not what ye ask” (Mark x. 35-45). Yet the request was a spiritual one; for although “the ten” were angry with their two brethren for putting it, the Lord was not. He does not rebuke the petitioners, but the ten, for their want of charity and humility in misjudging the two sons of Zebedee. Still, as we have already seen, it was not granted. What can be clearer, then, than the fact that the particular promise in question related exclusively to matters essential to the apostles in the accomplishment of their work as His inspired servants?

To us it is said,—“Beloved, if our heart condemn us not, then have we confidence toward God. And whatsoever we ask, we receive of Him, because we keep His commandments, and do these things that are pleasing in His sight” (1 John iii. 21, 22). And again,—“And this is the confidence that we have in Him, that, if we ask anything according to His will, He heareth us: and if we know that He hear us, whatsoever we ask, we know that (in the highest and best sense) we have the petitions that we desired of Him” (1 John v. 14, 15).

We very much doubt whether there is any reason to believe that, as a fact, God listens with more regard to united prayer than to solitary supplication; that Christ is, in any higher sense, present in the large assembly than in the lonely closet of the believer; or that, as we are now, although in various phrase, perpetually told, “the avenues of God’s grace to man are narrowed,” because Christians do not meet in crowds to pray.

We might multiply these examples to almost any extent, were it desirable so to do. Passages relating to the Jewish Sabbath are in this way unscrupulously applied, without the slightest authority, to the Lord’s day of the Christian; texts relating only to the successive priests of the Levitical Law (such as Heb. v. 4) are quoted in support of “an order” which has no such pretensions; exhortations to submission, founded on the possession of extraordinary gifts, apostolic choice, or, it may be, inspired qualifications (Heb. xiii. 7, 17), are applied in relation to men who are in no way whatever distinguished above others, except by the possession of an “office,” to which they have been presented or elected by mortals as fallible as themselves; and claims the most transcendental, involving the power of giving the Holy Ghost, of binding and loosing, and even of remitting or retaining sin, are defended by perversions of Scripture not one whit more respectable than those which are constantly brought forward in defense of Romish superstitions.

Abuses of this kind are now, unhappily, so common, that they excite but little attention, and, when noticed, are generally regarded as unimportant. We trust, however, that the day is coming when these things will be endured no longer; when it will be thought as unjustifiable, in interpreting Scripture, to project the past into the present, as it is to reverse the process, by insisting, as many do, that the echo of the New Testament is the voice of the Old, and that the entire Gospel pervades alike the Psalms, the Proverbs, the Song of Solomon, and the history of the Jewish kings.

CHAPTER XVII.

On the Exaggeration of Scripture.

“Pure oracles of Truth Divine!
Unlike each fabled dream
Given forth from Delphos’ mystic shrine,
Or groves of Academe!
Childhood’s preceptor! manhood’s trust!
Old age’s firm ally!
Our hope, when we go down to dust,
Of immortality!”

BERNARD BARTON.

By the exaggeration of Scripture we understand the use of passages in a sense stronger than that they were originally intended to bear; whether such “adding to” the Divine Testimony,—for it is nothing less,—arise from mistranslation, from the erroneous interpretation of imagery, or from general misconception as to the limits under which any given statement is to be received.

The misfortune is, that these exaggerations prevail most on subjects in relation to which it is of all others important that the exact line of Truth should not be overstepped; that they are often winked at, if not encouraged, from an undue anxiety to produce immediate and salutary impression; and that commonly all discussion in relation to them is deprecated, on the ground that, as men are already far too little affected by the evil of sin, and far too careless respecting its consequences, anything which *seem*s to lessen the terribleness of disobedience, even though it should be by the removal of error, must be practically injurious.

The result, in accordance with that great law of retribution which operates as surely in religion as in everything else, is, that at the present time Infidelity plants its foot on these very exaggerations as the first step to confirm unbelief; insinuates that, as a rule, the assertions of the pulpit and the calm conclusions of the scholar do not harmonize; that Truth, both in books and sermons, is commonly sacrificed to effect; that things are not exactly as represented; and that the most alarming appeals may be divested of much of their power by a careful examination of the words in which they are embodied, and the texts by which they are enforced. So true is it that exaggeration,—whatever may be its immediate effect,—invariably weakens the cause it is intended to support.

Scripture is sometimes exaggerated by mere emphasis being placed on words that are not in the original emphatic. "Often have we been pained to hear persons say of a passage, 'It is I will;' and when the Lord wills, who can withstand?' for 'He doeth according to His will in the armies of heaven, and among the inhabitants of the earth.' What is this but a Protestant cabala, putting a meaning upon the Sacred Word which it was not intended to express?"

Little better is it to quote such a passage as Psa. vii. 11, in order to show that "God is angry with the wicked every day;" since the words in italic form no part of the inspired original. The Prayer Book version of the text is, in this case, the true one,—"God is provoked every day."

For the same reason,—i. e., to avoid practical untruthfulness,—the word Sheol, which is commonly translated in the Old Testament "Hell," should never be used as if it implied the place of future punishment. When the Psalmist says, "The wicked shall be turned into hell" (Psa. ix. 18), why should we shrink from admitting that he simply means the grave? It is the same word which is used prophetically of Messiah, "Thou wilt not leave my soul in hell" (Psa. xvi. 10.) It is the same word that Jacob uses when he speaks of his "gray hairs" being brought "with sorrow to the grave" (Gen. xlii. 38).

Let us not be mistaken here. It is not that we wish to diminish the force of any threatening that we thus write. On the contrary, it is because we have an unshaken faith in the plain declarations of Scripture that we maintain the absolute necessity of neither adding one word, nor striking off one particle, from the testimony of Revelation. Exaggeration is treason to truth.

With these feelings, we venture to call attention to the following passages:

(1) "Knowing therefore the terror of the Lord, we persuade men" (2 Cor. v. 11). This text, which is frequently brought forward to justify what are called "alarming" sermons, is the stronghold of men who, with the best intentions, but with mischievous results, are continually denouncing sinners as "in the hands of an angry God,"—every hour on the brink of endless and unutterable woe.

Yet the apostle does not really refer to the terror of the Lord at all. The word wrongly translated "terror," is precisely the same word as that which St. Paul uses a little further on (vii. 1), in the passage, "Perfecting holiness in the fear of God." Dean Alford interprets the text thus,—"Being conscious of the fear of the Lord, we are free from double dealing;" and that is no doubt what the apostle means.

(2) "For every one shall be salted with fire, and every sacrifice shall be salted with salt" (Mark ix. 49).

Nearly all the older commentators assert, although without the slightest warrant, that the phrase "salted with fire" is intended to apply to wicked men, who will be "seasoned with fire itself, in order to be eternally tormented." Baxter is, however, an exception, as he considers the fire intended to be that of "affliction on earth."

The context, if carefully examined, demonstrates that this is the true meaning. Our Lord had been teaching the disciples,—for it is to them He is speaking, that, as in cases of gangrene, it is frequently necessary to lose parts of the body in order to preserve life, so, in relation to the soul, it is needful to cut off, at whatever cost, everything that would, if not thus separated, occasion eternal ruin.

What more natural after this than the unexpressed, but not unfelt inquiry on the part of the disciples, "Why such severity?" The words that follow supply the answer,—"For (because) every one (who enters my kingdom) shall be salted with fire" (purified by discipline); "and every sacrifice" (as under the Old Testament dispensation) "shall be salted with salt,"—seasoned with grace, Col. iv. 6 (to render it acceptable; see Lev. ii. 13). He, therefore, who will not submit to this purifying process, who will not consent to the removal of all that hinders life and growth in the soul, chooses death rather than life, and practically prefers the loathsomeness of corruption to eternal purity and blessed- ness. Then follows the exhortation (verse 50),—"Have salt" (wisdom and grace) "in yourselves, and have peace one with another." For the conversation had originated in a dispute as to who should be the greatest.

(3) "Who among us shall dwell with the devouring fire? who among us shall dwell with everlasting burnings?" (Isa. xxxiii. 14.)

Every one knows that these words are constantly used as if they referred to the punishment of sinners in the world to come; yet not a single commentator of any repute ventures so to interpret them. Matthew Henry, who in this case represents others, shows clearly enough that the fire referred to was that occasioned by the Assyrian Army, and that no reference whatever is made to the world that is to come. Dean Alford (in a note on Mark ix. 49) seems to think that in any case, the fire is to be regarded as purifying; since the answer to the question is,— "He that walketh in righteousness;" he alone can endure these calamities, because he sees the hand of God in all.

On such a text as Mark ix. 44,— "Where their worm dieth not, and the fire is not quenched," considering its awful import, we would rather say no more than this: It is a quotation from Isaiah (lxvi. 24), where the words are used, not in connection with living and sensitive beings, but with dead carcases. Read, therefore, in the sense in which Isaiah wrote them,—the sense, as we believe, in which Christ quoted them,—they fully harmonize with other passages of Scripture which teach that the wilfully impenitent lose all the blessedness of Eternal Life, endure all the pangs of the "second death," whatever that may mean, and become eternally loathsome, an abhorring to all flesh."

What right have we to change the meaning altogether, and turn "the worm" into remorse of conscience, and the "unquenchable fire" into the undying torment of the sinner who is cast into it? We may think we deepen thereby the horrors of eternal woe, and by that process deter men from sin. Greatly is it to be feared that by these devices we but pave the way for the more rapid advance of Popery and infidelity.

(4) "But I say unto you that every idle word that men shall speak, they shall give account thereof in the day of judgment" (Matt. xii. 36).

It was in consequence of misconceiving the true object of this saying of our Lord that the Puritans in England, and the Covenanters in Scotland, inculcated a severity of manners which has often, although unjustly, laid them open to the charge of hypocrisy. They thought that Christ spake of the many trivial observations and levities which, especially among the young, mark social intercourse in all parts of the world, and so they frowned upon all mirth, however innocent. But this was an error. True indeed it is, that a man's responsibility extends to every action he performs, every word he utters, and every thought he encourages. Nor would it be difficult to show that, on any other supposition, responsibility itself would be altogether destroyed. Still this is not the meaning of the passage under consideration.

The warning of the Lord, from the context, is evidently directed against the senseless accusation of the Pharisees,— "This fellow doth not cast out devils, but by Beelzebub the prince of the devils." The charge was but an idle one,— a mere malicious taunt,—for the men who made it did not believe what they asserted. Yet the accusation, notwithstanding its levity, involved the sin of blasphemy. It was an "idle word." In like manner profane oaths, in which the most awful denunciations are frequently expressed without the slightest intention of affixing any serious meaning to the phrases uttered, are "idle words" which fall under the special condemnation of the text.

(5) "I keep under my body, and bring it into subjection: lest that by any means, when I have preached to others, I myself should be a cast-away" (1 Cor. ix. 27). So writes the apostle; and many tell us that he here intimates that, so far from being assured that he was safe in Christ, he trembles, lest, after all his labors and sufferings, he should fall into some sensual snare, and be eternally lost. But this is not his meaning. What Paul really felt so anxious to secure was, (notwithstanding all its sorrows and trials,) the continuance of his apostleship, and its exceeding great reward. He disciplines himself, lest carelessness should lead to a fall of any kind, by which his character would be injured, and he become thereby a vessel unfit for the Master's use. "Know ye not," he says, "that they which run in a race run all, but one receiveth the prize?"

Instead of furnishing more instances, we submit the following general observations:

(a) It is an exaggeration to expound passages of Scripture which declare the total depravity of man, as if they were intended to teach that every one of his thoughts and feelings are, by nature, base and bad; that all men, in the sight of God, are equally wicked; or that the children of Adam are actually destitute of everything that can be spoken of as morally lovely. Scripture says no such thing. It speaks only of man's natural desecration of all that is worthy of the name of holiness; of everything that could serve for his justification in the sight of God.

(b) It is a familiar exaggeration to talk as if every person, young or old, was bound to consider or to speak of himself as "the chief of sinners," because the apostle Paul, reflecting on the melancholy fact that he had once been a persecutor of the Church of Christ, so designates his own condition. By the phrase in question, St. Paul simply gives us to understand that he regarded his own lot as special, his sin as peculiar, and his filling the office of apostle as a more wonderful display of mercy than any other man could boast of. Such expressions, when they occur in the diaries of persons who, by Divine grace, have been singularly preserved from temptation to evil, seem to involve more or less of unreality.

(c) It is but an exaggeration to say, as many of the old divines used to do, that "sin is an infinite evil, and deserves an infinite punishment, because it is committed against an infinite God." No such method of making men sensible of the aggravated character of their guilt is sanctioned by Scripture. It is there deemed enough to say, and with a far deeper impressiveness, "that it is an evil thing and bitter" to forsake the Lord (Jer. ii. 19); that "it is a fearful thing" (by rebellion and impenitence) "to fall into the hands of the living God" (Heb. x. 31); that the great aggravation of human guilt is, that it is always committed against a law of love. "For this,"—because it is contrary to the law of love,— "Thou shalt not commit adultery, Thou shalt not steal" (Rom. xiii. 8, 9).

(d) The broad distinction usually drawn between the Old and New Testament dispensations, relative to rewards and punishments, is commonly an exaggerated one. It is not true to assert, as is frequently done, that the retributions threatened to the Jew were temporal, while those of the Christian are eternal; for it would probably be found, if the secret histories of Christian men could be exposed to view, that many of them are now as severely punished on earth for their sins as ever the Israelite was. The Psalmist's difficulty as to the prosperity of the wicked, could find no solution until he went into the temple of God and considered their end. Under the Jewish dispensation, the righteous were constantly in affliction; and under the Christian, "Godliness is profitable unto all things, having promise of the life that now is, and that which is to come" (1 Tim. iv. 8).

It is in this spirit of exaggeration that doctrines are often pushed to consequences which Scripture, to say the least, does not sanction, and which, by their extravagance, often greatly promote dangerous reaction.

By a similar one-sided exaggeration of particular truths, good men sometimes bring themselves practically to deny that "godliness is profitable unto all things, having promise of the life that now is," as well as of "that which is to come" (1 Tim. iv. 8); and hence fancy they ought to denounce as evil, philanthropic associations, government, and magistracy—everything, in short, that seeks to improve the world by other means than the preaching of the Gospel.

Teaching of this character cannot be otherwise than hurtful. What we need is more faith in Scripture, and less in Theology; more confidence in the calm thoughts of the Inspired Volume, and less in the excited utterances of fallible men. Till we get this, the serious students of the Divine Word will be few, and the hasty acceptors of extravagance, many.

Once more, therefore, we warn all honest students of Holy Scripture to "take heed how they read;" to beware of interpretations which, however popular, can neither be sustained by the scholar, nor justified by the devout; to dread especially those forms of unbelief which disguise themselves under the robe of earnestness; but which are really nothing better than expressions of that want of faith in Scripture as it is, which is the curse of the Church, and the ruin of the world.

THE CURSE LIFTED.

A BIBLE VIEW OF THE PROMISED RESTITUTION.

BY WILLIAM H. SPENCER.

CHAPTER III.

HAVING shown that the world now groans under the mighty curse which followed man's failure in Eden, it is important for us, in this chapter, to briefly consider the object for which the curse was inflicted.

In an examination of this matter several considerations appear plain: (1) That God had a purpose, such as really becomes His character, in the infliction of the curse, no fair minded Bible student will deny. In fact, He does nothing without a purpose. (2) That His purpose, in the permission of evil, was formed before the foundation of the world, and, therefore, was no afterthought, must also be conceded, if we recognize God's foreknowledge, "declaring the end from the beginning." (3) That this is an unchangeable purpose is amply proven from the immutability of God's character. And (4) that in the permission of the curse for the past six thousand years, God has a merciful design,—a design for man's good,—we are forced to admit in view of the oft-repeated declaration that "God is Love." God said to man, "Cursed is the ground for thy sake." It was not cursed with a design of evil to man; it was for his "sake," and, therefore, for his good.

From all we can learn of the Divine character, we know that "God is Love." His whole nature is Love. In this respect we contemplate Him in a three-fold aspect. (1) God is an infinite Being possessed only of infinite attributes and perfections, and therefore, His love is infinite. (2) That God's love is immutable is rendered certain by the revealed fact of the unchangeableness of His character. "He is of one mind, and none can turn Him; the same yesterday, to-day and forever." (3) God's love is universal, which is evident from the fact that He is presented to us as impartial in His dealings with man as He is immutable in purpose. That the universality of His love is predicated upon the immutability of His character, needs no further proof than the fact that He gave His only begotten Son as a "ransom for all,"—to taste death "for every man,"—that "whosoever believeth on Him might not perish;" for God expresses his unwillingness "that any should perish," but desires that "all should come to repentance." Hence, we are justified in speaking of God as Love, infinite, immutable, and universal.

Love is the supreme attribute of His being, and the ruling motive of His actions. He acts upon eternal principles,—based upon the immutability and impartiality of His character,—of which Love is the mainspring. Hence, it is through love that He both blesses and curses. If we would rightly apprehend God we must recognize this principle in the Divine government. Until He ceases to be Love, and hence ceases to be the God of the Bible, a spirit of vindictiveness never prompts Him to a single act. We are aware that the Scriptures represent Him, often, as being wroth, as acting in wrath, and as being clothed with the garments of vengeance; but he always acts with a merciful design. It follows, therefore, that, in the morn of creation, when He pronounced a curse for man's sake, it was for man's good ultimately.

But the question naturally presents itself, just here, In what way will the curse be productive of good?

Admitting, as we must, that God's love is universal as well as immutable, we cannot evade the conclusion that, in the permission of the curse, God had a design of mercy toward the hapless pair in Eden. It is well to notice that after man had committed his great act of disobedience, the curse had been pronounced, and his expulsion from paradise was at hand, his Creator did not forsake him. As a convincing evidence of His unchangeable love for the unfortunate pair, he made them "coats of skins," and "clothed them." Though they were to go forth from Eden to grapple with the thorns and thistles of a cursed world till they should return to the dust, yet they had constantly before their eyes this evidence of their Maker's love for them. Can we reasonably suppose they did not profit by this exhibition of His love? As they learned more and more of the goodness of God, by the contrast of good with evil, can we reasonably conclude that they utterly failed to profit by the lesson they thus learned? I cannot so believe; nor can I believe that He who clothed them with coats of skins in their fallen condition, has utterly shut them off from all mercy in "the ages to come," of which Paul makes mention.

We must recognize the fact that God had a merciful design in the infliction of the curse, and also that this purpose reached far out and beyond the Adamic age. The apostle Paul calls it an "eternal purpose" to manifest "unto the principalities and powers in heavenly places," . . . "by the church, the manifold wisdom of God." Thus we see plainly that the permission of the curse was for an EDUCATIONAL PURPOSE, which would be productive of good not only to the race of Adam, by the contrast thus created, but even extended to "principalities and powers in heavenly places;" for the apostle informs us that the angels desire to look into these things. The conclusion is unavoidable, therefore, that everything has transpired, and will transpire, "according to the purpose of Him who worketh all things after the counsel of His own will," . . . "that in the dispensation of the fulness of times He might gather together in one all things in Christ."

We thus perceive that God's "eternal purpose," in the creation of the earth and man, and permitting the world to groan for six thousand years under the curse of sin, was to make Himself known, through the works of creation, grace, and judgment, to all created intelligences, and finally consummate an eternal unity of "all things."

In the accomplishment of this we can readily perceive how the curse should subserve an educational and disciplinary purpose. By dealing with evil in every conceivable form, and with man in the various phases of human existence, God is unfolding His character, in all its benevolent loveliness, to all intelligences, and is thus forming faith in the inhabitants of this sphere that will finally elevate all who recognize His love, by walking in harmony with His will, to personal association with God himself, and to a union, happy and glorious, with those heavenly intelligences who are learning the lesson which is now being taught by a groaning creation. Of the greatness of the lesson now being taught we can but feebly conceive. But undoubtedly "in the dispensation of the fulness of times" we shall know more of the "manifold wisdom of God," and of "the unsearchable riches of His grace."

When the human race have been educated, by the disciplinary means God has chosen, to that knowledge of Himself and faith in Him that His will shall "be done in earth as it is in heaven," then shall that grand and glorious unity with His will be attained which He purposed in the beginning. Then, indeed, will the curse be lifted. Then will it be found that this terrestrial system, instead of a hopeless wreck, is a perfected, glorified habitation of a regenerated race.

CHAPTER IV.

We have briefly seen the purpose that the Creator, in his manifold wisdom and foreknowledge, had in view in the permission of the curse, and the grand, glorious end to be attained; and now let us candidly and dispassionately consider some of the Divine pledges for the lifting of the curse.

Man no sooner developed a will at variance with his Creator, and forfeited his right to the tree of life, and lost the bounties and beauties of paradise, than God commences the development of a scheme of redemption, by which he will fully accomplish His purpose in creation.

1. The lifting of the curse is clearly foreshadowed in that germinal promise, given in Eden, that the Seed of the woman shall bruise (literally crush) the serpent's head. (Gen. iii. 15.) Man fell, and the present state of disorder was introduced by the serpent's influence; and therefore, when God reveals His determination to destroy the agent of the evil, it is in substance a promise of the removal of the evil which came thereby. In other words, in this germinal promise God reveals his purpose to finally achieve a complete victory over evil, which can only be accomplished by its utter destruction. In just so far as evil fails of removal will God fail of triumph over it. But we cannot for a moment think of failure on the part of God; hence, the conclusion is forced upon us, that whatever evil has come into the world through the serpent's influence "the Seed of the woman" (Christ) will utterly destroy. The first Adam has done nothing that the second Adam will not completely and forever undo. "For this purpose the Son of God was manifested, that He might destroy the works of the devil" (1 John iii. 8). Therefore, unless the Son of God fails to accomplish the purpose for which he came into the world, evil will finally be eradicated from the universe, and thus the curse be lifted.

2. Passing on from Eden, in the history of the world, we find an emphatic pledge of the lifting of the curse,—a pledge confirmed by the oath of Jehovah himself. "By myself have I sworn, saith the Lord, . . . that in blessing I will bless thee; . . . and thy seed shall possess the gate of the enemies; and in thee shall all the nations of the earth be blessed." God had previously told Abraham that he should "be a blessing," and that in him "shall all the families of the earth be blessed." Hence, "all nations," in this promise, means "all families," according to God's own words; and surely we cannot find better authority to establish its meaning. This same promise was renewed to Isaac, and confirmed to Jacob, thus, "In thee and thy seed shall all the families of the earth be blessed."

This promise conclusively proves the lifting of the curse, inasmuch as a universal blessing of the race is promised, and this promise is based upon the oath of God himself.

I am aware that some strive to evade the evident force of this promise, to save a favorite theory, by assuming the promised blessing is "limited" in its operation "to such as have faith." But God says,—if He says anything we can understand with certainty,—that, if the promise in Abraham embraces any advantages, they will flow to "all the families of the earth."

If God did not mean what He said, how may we with certainty know what He did mean? Until it can be proved from Holy Writ that God's words, "all the families of the earth," are not to be understood literally, we are obliged to understand the "blessing" of universal extent, and we have no warrant for a different construction of it. To interpret it otherwise than literally would establish a precedent which would nullify every promise God has made, and thus destroy the whole foundation of Christian hope. Therefore, God clearly reveals in His promise and oath to Abraham, the complete removal of all the consequences of Adam's disobedience. Nor must this universal lifting of the curse be construed to be Universalism, as that term is usually understood. As regards the human race, it is placing all men in a salvable state, and they are accountable, as Adam was, for the use they make of their moral agency. The lifting of the curse promised to Abraham is the unconditional removal of every obstacle to "all the families of the earth" having, sometime in God's probationary dispensations, a full knowledge of Christ and everything needful to their securing eternal life through Him. The great majority of the human race have lived and died in utter ignorance of the only name under heaven by which they can be saved. But God "wills that all men shall be saved and come to the knowledge of the truth" (1 Tim. ii. 4); and Christ "gave himself a ransom for all" (Titus ii. 11). And the fact should be borne in mind that God never wills a thing without providing all needful means for its attainment.

But further: God assured Abraham that his seed should "possess the gate of the enemies." This implies dominion over them. The nations round about Israel were their enemies. Hence, God promises Abraham that his seed shall have dominion over the nations, and this dominion is for the purpose of blessing them. The literal posterity of Abraham failed to accomplish this. But God's promise and oath will not fail of the most exact accomplishment. Therefore, it yet remains for Christ and "those that are Christ's," the spiritual seed of Abraham, to bless all the families of the earth in the lifting of the curse.

Passing over the prophecies of the Old Testament, for the present, we will notice a few portions of the New, pertinent to the object in view.

3. We have very strong evidence of the lifting of the curse in the promise of Jesus, "Blessed are the meek, for they shall inherit the earth." Surely, to inherit the earth in its present cursed condition would be anything but blessedness to the saints of God. Paul tells us "the whole creation groaneth and travaileth together in pain." Hence, Christ's promise looked forward to the time when the groaning creation shall be "delivered from the bondage of corruption,"—looked forward to the glorious "regeneration" (Matt. xix. 28), the "new heavens and new earth," pointed out to us in the Old and New Testament, when it will be "blessed" to "inherit the earth." In harmony with this is the words of the Psalmist, "The meek shall inherit the earth and delight themselves in the abundance of peace" (Psa. xxxvii. 11). To this glorious era we look forward with joyous expectancy.

4. In further consideration of this part of our subject we have only to refer the reader to the delightful vision of the Revelator. He beheld that glorious era when "there shall be no more curse" (Rev. xxii. 3). And he says, "Every creature which is in heaven, and on the earth, and such as are in the sea, and all that are in them, heard I saying, Blessing, and honor, and glory, and power, be unto Him that sitteth upon the throne, and unto the Lamb forever and ever" (Rev. v. 18).

This depicts the glorious consummation, the contemplation of which may well make the Christian heart pulsate with joy untold, and long for the blessed time to come when the curse shall be lifted, and the throne of God and the Lamb shall be in "the earth, and his servants shall serve Him; and they shall see His face, and His name shall be in their foreheads." "Amen. Even so come, Lord Jesus."

In the foregoing we have given the subject of the promised restitution only a general examination. We have seen the purpose God had in the permission of the curse, and learned the certainty of its final removal. An examination of more definite scriptural evidence on the subject is reserved for future chapters.

HUMAN REDEMPTION.—No. 6.

ON THE DOCTRINE OF THE ATONEMENT.

THE Atonement is a great fact. The philosophy of it is a profound mystery. It is with the fact alone that, as sinners, we have to do; the philosophy involved we may safely leave to higher intelligences and other states of being.

The word "atonement" occurs but once in our English version of the New Testament (Rom. v. 11), and there only through a mistranslation; for katallage unquestionably ought to have been rendered reconciliation. It is so rendered in other places (e. g., 2 Cor. v. 18, 19; Rom. xi. 15), and should have been in this also, since no argument whatever as to the method of reconciliation can honestly be founded upon it. To ordinary readers, "atonement" conveys the idea of substitution by sacrifice, and so far its use is, without question, misleading.

Other words, however, supposed to imply the doctrine in question, frequently present themselves, such as "propitiation," "oblation," and "sacrifice,"—words which, like the announcement of John the Baptist, "Behold the Lamb of God, which taketh away the sin of the world" (John i. 29), and the declaration of St Paul, "Christ our pasover is sacrificed for us" (1 Cor. v. 7), become unintelligible if they are not to be regarded, in some measure at least, in connection with the bloodshedding of the Old Testament economy.

Unhappily, theologians will not allow us to rest on Divine facts. They insist that it is as necessary to hold a true philosophy of the Atonement, as it is to believe in the fact of one.

"The doctrine," says a recent prominent defender of the faith, "is the inference from the fact, and without the doctrine the bare dry fact is nothing. The question is, in what way Christ's death effects its purpose? Upon our answer to this depends the nature of our religion."

It never seems to occur to such reasoners that the revealed fact is alone Divine; that all inferences deduced therefrom, true or false, are purely human; and that, therefore, on their theory, "the nature of our religion depends," not on the simple reception or otherwise of a Divine testimony, but on a purely logical process, which, owing to the unfitness of the human mind to deal with matters stretching into the infinite, is at least as likely to be wrong as right.

Into the various controversies that have arisen out of this perverse disposition to be "wise above that which is written," it is needless to enter.

I assume, as undeniable, that the Old Testament prophets predict a coming Messiah, and that they describe Him in two aspects: first, and chiefly, as "a priest upon a throne," under whose glorious reign all nations shall be blessed; and secondly, as a "man of sorrows," humiliated and suffering, yet not for any sin of His own (Jer. xxiii. 5; Isa. liii. 3-12).

The fortieth Psalm, taken as it must be, in connection with its exposition in the Epistle to the Hebrews (x. 5-14), is perhaps, of all these prophecies the most remarkable, since it gives us the reason for Christ's coming,—the inefficiency of the blood of bulls and of goats to take away sin; and the result of the coming,—the honoring of the law: "Lo, I come to do Thy will, O God." "He taketh away the first" (sacrifice and offering), "that He may establish the second" (perfect obedience). To this remarkable prophecy, and its inspired exposition, we naturally look for an explanation of the facts of the Gospel history, so far, at least, as explanation is needful.

These facts are simple, and speak for themselves.

A Jewish maiden, miraculously conceiving by the Holy Ghost, becomes the mother of a child born without sin,—free from the slightest hereditary taint of evil. This child, subject to all the weaknesses and infirmities of humanity, grows up, like any other child, obedient to his parents, faultless in life, and marked by a moral thoughtfulness rapidly deepening into a wisdom far above His age.

For thirty years He lives in obscurity; toils, as other young men toil; and, so far as the sacred narrative informs us, is in no way distinguished from His contemporaries, except by wisdom and goodness.

At length a great prophet (John) appears, declaring himself to be the forerunner of Messiah, and calling on all men to repent, and be baptized into the belief and expectation of this great event. In obedience to the call Jesus approaches, is recognized by John in His true character, yet submits to the rite, and is by a voice from heaven proclaimed to the Baptist the "beloved Son," in whom God is ever well pleased.

For three years more He moves about Judea, words of wisdom dropping like pearls from His lips, and miracles of beneficence thickening about His path. At length, betrayed by a familiar friend, He falls into the hands of His enemies and finally expires in the agonies of a shameful and cruel death. The sun darkens at the sight, and an earthquake rends the veil of the temple: but Gentiles alone (the centurion and his band) fear greatly, and say, "Truly this was the Son of God" (Matt. xxvii. 51-54).

So far, and to the outward eye, nothing appears beyond the advent of a great Prophet, and the commission of a great crime.

But this is not all. The teaching of Christ is as peculiar as His life. John, as we have before observed, announces Him as the Lamb of God, that taketh away the sin of the world; "Cainphas, apparently unconscious of the weight of his words, utters a mysterious prophecy, "that it was expedient that (this) one man should die for the people" (John xviii. 14); He himself declares that "after three days" He will "rise again;" His disciples have been taught that He but goes before, to send "gifts," to found "a kingdom," and "to prepare mansions" for His faithful followers; and yet the garden of Gethsemane is the scene of a mighty and mysterious struggle, and the cross is connected with the cry, "My God, My God, why hast Thou forsaken Me?"

Connecting these things with other revealed facts,—such as that He came "to give His life a ransom for many" (Matt. xx. 28); that He laid down His "life" for His "sheep" (John x. 15); that He shed His "blood" for "the remission of sins" (Matt. xxvi. 28); that He "redeemed us from the curse of the law, being made a curse for us" (Gal. iii. 13); that "with His stripes we are healed" (Isa. liii. 5); and that through eternity the song of the redeemed will be, "Thou art worthy: for Thou wast slain, and hast redeemed us to God by Thy blood" (Rev. v. 9),—nothing surely can be plainer than that He died vicariously—for others; that He died voluntarily,

—"I lay down My life of Myself;" that death was most unwelcome to Him, and submission to the cross the severest of trials,—“Father, if it be possible, let this cup pass from Me;” that all this pain, ignominy, and suffering might have been avoided by a wish —“Thinkest thou that I cannot now pray to My Father, and He shall presently give Me more than twelve legions of angels?” and, finally, that there was such a necessity for the endurance, that under the united pressure of duty and love, “He sweated as it were great drops of blood” in resisting the temptation to avoid it.

All this we gather from the narrative; but there is no assertion that He was in any sense whatever punished; that He endured anything at the hand of God as a divine infliction; or that He was ever looked upon by the Father in any character save that which really belonged to him as the Holy and the Blest.

That He was, in a sense, “stricken of God and afflicted,” is as certain as that He was made “perfect through sufferings” (Heb. ii. 10); that in all, He “bare our sins and carried our sorrows,” is as true as that He redeemed us; that without the endurance of this cruel and ignominious death—without the actual laying down of His life, the shedding of His blood—the work of redemption could not have been consummated, is a clearly revealed fact; but that this was the effect of “Divine anger,” or that it was “necessary to the avenging of the violated law,” is a conclusion which, whether true or false, is the result of human reasoning, and not the direct teaching of the Bible.

If it be said—as it probably will,—Why, then, was Christ, a sinless and unfallen Being, ushered into a world of fallen creatures, and made subject to the consequences of a disobedience in which He had not participated? Above all, why was He the Son of God as well as man? we have not far to go for an answer.

To the first of these questions it may be replied, in the words of our Lord himself, “Even so, Father, because it seemed good in Thy sight.” Enough is it for us to know that the Redeemer lived and loved, and suffered and died, to do the will of God.

Whether, in any sense, He bore the penalty of the violated law, we know not. Whether vengeance was needed, in order to its vindication before the universe, we do not presume to affirm. But of this we are quite sure—it required to be obeyed. Broken and dishonored before all creation vain were the penalties by which, in all ages, it has avenged itself on offenders, to restore the dignity it had lost. Obedience, perfect and sinless obedience, made manifest in the flesh, could alone restore it to honor. This Christ achieved, and, in achieving it became to man a “second Adam,” the head of a redeemed people, the Saviour of a lost and ruined world.

In relation to the second question, it is surely enough to observe that no (mere) creature could do for man what Christ has done, or be to man what Christ is, without becoming the object of idolatry. It was needful that the work of redemption should be a Divine work—that the deliverer of man should be his Creator—that his Saviour should be his Judge; since He who secures, on man's behalf, such blessings—who is to him “the way, the truth and the life,” and who obtains for him everything that renders life desirable,—could not be other, either to the eye or to the heart, than the incarnate [Son of] God; if not the proper object of worship, would necessarily become to myriads the overpowering occasion of sin and shame.

To me it seems a strange conclusion that, because Christ came into the world to die; that because it is His blood which cleanseth from all sin; that because He is our “sacrifice,” our “pass-over,” and our “propitiation,” therefore the virtue of His sacrifice lies in the material blood shed on Calvary; its efficacy, in the assumption that He died under the “anger of God;” or that reconciliation with the Father was not possible without the crime and the cruelty of the wicked men by whose evil agency the Lord of life was “crucified and slain.” That it pleased God to admit this agency is certain; that Jesus was delivered into the hands of His murderers “by the determinate counsel and foreknowledge of God,” is true also (Acts ii. 23); but that this wicked act had anything to do with the redemption of man, beyond consummating at once the Saviour's work and the judgment of the Jewish nation, is nowhere taught in Holy Writ.

Dean Alford has truly said, “Never do we find in Scripture, Old Testament or New Testament, any such expression as the Father was propitiated concerning our sins, on account of the death of His Son; or, Christ propitiated God or God's wrath by his blood; never, God was reconciled.” (Note on Heb. ii. 17.)

Why, then should we theorize at all on a subject so much above us? Why should we be so afraid to admit that the sacrifice of the Redeemer, while in one sense a counterpart, is in another a contrast to those of the Old Testament economy? that it is at once the substance and the suppression of the sacrifice of animal life, by the higher sacrifice of the spirit,—“Thou shalt make His soul an offering for sin” (Isa. liii. 10)? that it is the putting away of material blood, to make room for the shedding of a life spent in holy and spotless obedience? that it is the establishment of "Lo, I come to do Thy will," in the place of mere deliverance from the consequences of sin by the substitution of a victim? "The sacrifices of God are a broken spirit; a broken and a contrite heart, O God, thou wilt not despise" (Psa. li. 17). This surely is the sense in which Christ, "the perfect Son," becomes "the perfect sacrifice," and "the Saviour" of that mystical "body," the members of which He is ever drawing by His grace into sonship with Himself.

But let us check ourselves, for we are on "holy ground." Good Richard Baxter truly says, "The things of God are like snow, and man cannot touch them without leaving on them the print of his handling."

That a question should ever have arisen as to the extent of the Atonement; that Christian men, with the Bible in their hands, and its plainest statements before them, should ever have ventured to assert that Christ died only for the elect; that if He "bought" others, such "purchase" is for them "no ransom or redemption, fairly so called;" that He has bought them, only "that He may so dispose of them, as to glorify the retributive righteousness of God in their condemnation;" that faith is the act of "a new faculty," a Divine act, "implying the communication of a Divine capacity," and yet that all who do not possess it are irrecoverably lost, is to me a melancholy proof of the tendency of the human mind to claim for its own weak and erring inferences an authority which really belongs only to the direct teachings of God.

The true solution of the theological difficulty which has led to these sad aberrations from truth will, I am satisfied, ultimately be found in the simple reception of the apostolic declarations to Timothy, when instructing him as to what he was to teach: "This is a faithful saying, and worthy of all acceptation, that Christ Jesus came into the world to save sinners; of whom I am chief" (1 Tim. i. 15); that "God our Saviour will have all men to be saved, and to come unto the knowledge of the truth" (ii. 4); and that while He is "the Saviour of all men," He is "specially" so "of those that believe" (iv. 10). "These things," says the apostle to him, "command and teach," (iv. 11).

God has adapted the human intellect to truth, just as surely as he has adapted the eye to outward Nature. In either case, we see truly only in proportion as, by Divine aid, films are removed and the organ of vision purged and purified from unnatural obstructions.

CHRIST AND THE SECTS.

[The following article is by H. BRITAIN, of Birmingham, England, and sent me by the "author" in tract. I thank him for it, and most heartily endorse the sentiments, which have been my own for thirty years past.—Ed.]

THERE are, as you all know, surrounding us numerous sects calling themselves by the common title Christians; and still more numerous around us are those who are not identified with any of the sects. Year after year vast numbers are born—live—and die, without apparently being touched by any sympathy with any of the religious bodies of the present day. How are we to account for this fact? How is it that the vast mass of our fellow beings keep aloof from association with the sects? A dull, settled gloom continually seems to hover over this mass of humanity. True, it seethes constantly; and well it is that this is so; but even then, it may boil at last. The perpetual agitation, in commercial, in political, in religious, and other matters, alone preserves from utter stagnation; and amidst all this agitation, the sects, powerless to arrest separately the strong indifference of the mass, are content to form each a smaller or larger eddy of its own—to divide, and not combine—no proportionate result to agitation by the sects ever being attained.

A feeling similar to that of Stephen Blackpool, in Dickens' "Hard Times," has come over the mind of many a working man, and many a thoughtful man that the aspect of the sects is "aw a muddle! Fro' first to last, a muddle!" Let us not, like him, find only in the hour of death the Redeemer's rest, but while in life let us find Him and try to lead others to this rest—in life.

Now there is one remarkable thing in connection with the sects that will not escape your notice; it is the uniform desire (there are rare exceptions) to proselytize. "Whatever you do, increase in numbers; assume some dogmatic shape, adopt some kind of organization, but above all things let your strength and vigor be made known in the number of your proselytes. Should any one be found who opposes your organization, or assails your dogmatism, measure the truthfulness of his position by numbers; certainly, numbers are mighty and should prevail!"

No greater evil was or could be inflicted on any body of truth-seeking men than the love of proselytism. Muirice, in his "Lectures on the Ecclesiastical History of the First and Second Centuries," (Lect. VII., pp., 384-5), has ably pointed out this evil. He says, speaking of the period when "the Bible ceased to be received as a book of life, and as a divine teacher," "You do not at first perceive the alteration. Texts are quoted as respectfully; the apostolical authority seems to be as much heeded by the doctors, who are busy in constructing an anti-Pagan or anti-Jewish system, as by those who are declaring a Gospel for the renewal of mankind. But look more closely, and you will observe that the main diligence of the former class is employed in shewing that such and such passages of Scripture confute adverse opinions; that such and such passages do not confute theirs, though they seem to do so. Now, a text is a sharp stone which can be hurled at an enemy—how can he withstand that? Now it has an inconvenient, awkward edge, which must be smoothed away lest it should do mischief. Every page of Tertullian almost would illustrate what I am saying, and would furnish terrible instances of the irreverent torturing of Scripture to his own purpose—of a resolute determination that it shall never contradict or weaken any purpose of his—all the while that he professes to take it as his guide and his judge.

"But the most serious consequence of this habit of mind—closely connected with the one to which I have just referred—was the loss of truthfulness and of the love of truth among those who yielded to it. When once it supposed that the Spirit of truth had not come to guide men into all truth, but to build up a new scheme, by attaching themselves to which they secured the favor of God and the salvation of their souls, it was scarcely possible that fraud should not be thought as prudent, and as lawful, and as necessary by Christian teachers as it was by heathens. When your first thought is, how you may convert a man from darkness to light, fictions are awful and intolerable for you; your only trust is in Him who is true, and in Whom is no lie. When your first thought is how you may get proselytes, you will hate facts, you will resort to fictions, you will do things that a plain man of the world will blush at and think shameful, to compass so great an object. And when you have compassed it, remember who told us the result—I dare not use such words if He had not used them—We make our proselyte two-fold more the child of hell than ourselves. The seeds of this frightful evil were sown, and began to spring up in the second century."

Weighty words these, and worthy your thoughtful consideration. I think, however, the seeds of this proselytizing spirit were sown in the apostle Paul's days; so soon as they said, "I am of Paul, I of Apollos, I of Cephas, and I of Christ." It was an evil epidemic caught from the old sectarian spirit of the Jews, and developed in intense power and bitterness in the after days of the professed Christian Church. It has been a terrible device for hiding Christ from the view of the seekers after Him. And, to use a simile, recorded by Montalembert in his "life of Locordaire," the proselyte is often "like the centurion on Calvary, who, whilst recognizing Jesus Christ, turned executioner, instead of striking his breast."

What, then, is the base on which this love of proselytism is founded? Let us seek for an answer in one of the oldest of the sects. You will doubtless remember that in the year 1870, there was gathered together in Rome one of the largest assemblies of the leaders of the Roman Church that has been seen for many years. Met to promulgate new dogmas, and to rivet the bands of the old; and amongst the proposed canons laid before that council were several that anathematized all who affirmed that the Church of Christ is composed of various and dispersed societies forming collectively a universal Church; all who hold that the true Church of Christ, out of which no one can be saved, is any other than the "Holy Roman Apostolic Church." Do you fully comprehend the meaning of this assertion, that we, who are now present, do not belong to the true Church of Christ because we are not part of the Roman Church; and, being out of it we cannot be saved? In other words, salvation depends upon our belonging to this Holy Roman sect. If this be true, it is time we retraced our steps, or examined into the nature of this claim upon us. The question is, Does the salvation of any man or body of men depend upon his or their alliance to any particular body of men calling themselves a Church? The answer is, no!

"Other foundation can no man lay than that is laid which is Jesus Christ." This foundation has been laid for many years. And on this you and I may build, but it behooves us to take heed how we build upon it. Those who believe that this is the foundation, are in no haste to build upon it. Rather preferring to be able to turn out good work, though they be longer about it, than to risk having their work destroyed as wood, hay, and stubble.

Search the Scriptures through and through—note the sayings of the apostles after the resurrection, and you will find that this foundation is the tried one—the sure one—the only one on which we can build with absolute safety. The Apostle Peter, addressing the Jews could say, "Neither is there salvation in any other." To the people who wondered at the healing of the lame man, "the faith which is by him hath given him this perfect soundness in the presence of you all." And soundness is salvation. Paul, after the Jews had rejected the word of salvation, turned to the Gentiles and offered to them the salvation through Christ, and in his letter to Timothy reminds him of the salvation which is in Christ Jesus. And writing to the Hebrews, tells them, that "the Captain of their salvation" was made perfect through sufferings. And, further on in his letter, that Christ became "the author of eternal salvation unto all them that obey Him. There is no need to accumulate passages. The whole import of the Book is to the same effect. And, the affirmation in reply to the Roman Church is, that salvation does not depend upon our union with a sect, but upon our union with Christ.

If we are in Christ—if we be found in Christ—if we hope in Christ—if we trust in Christ—if we are wise in Christ—if our faith is in Christ—if our life is in Christ—if we die in Christ—it matters little else. But, remember, that you indeed reconcile yourselves to God through Christ.

Nor is it alone against the Roman claim that we stand. It is against the claim of any and every sect which stands between our fellow-being, or between you, and I, and Christ.

Let us look at a statement made by one of the most gifted members of the English Church. Speaking of dissenters from that Church, he says, "Now in the Church [the English Church of course] we have the full blaze of all God's truth, but in the other bodies of Christians there is only a little light." * And he again states, as to these dissenters, "They will not occupy their position in the Church of God, and fight where God has called and placed them; but they go off after their own fancies, and level their guns anywhere but where they are required of God. One goes as a Baptist, one as an Independent, one as a Wesleyan, one as a Quaker, one as a Bible Christian, one as a Reformed Calvinist, anywhere but to his place in the army of Christ. †

How any one can be a Christian and not be in the army of Christ, I cannot understand. But, mark, it is not enough in this writer's opinion to be a Christian, i. e., to belong to Christ, but you must belong to his Church. And this opinion is not confined to him or the Church he so ably represents, but is the confirmed opinion of those whom he points at as Dissenters; the only difference being, that they, more or less, strongly claim to be THE Church under whose wings we must shelter. Their common cry is, rest in the building which we have erected, ours is the place of refuge, others may possibly be the secure shelter, but ours is the absolute, the real one.

Perish the sects—and live—Christ! Perish the sectarian spirit—and live the spirit of Christ!

Let us lay hold in these latter days of the old paths and return to the old foundation—Christ Jesus the Lord. In these perilous times, when all things appear getting out of course, and new sects spring up on the right hand and on the left, what can we do better than teach men to swim to the ark of refuge set before us—CHRIST JESUS THE LORD. The declaration is—"One God, and one Mediator [not one sect] between God and men, the man Christ Jesus."

And the invitation is; not to form sects, to join sects or take up the yoke of the sects, but it is—"Come unto Me, all ye that labor and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest. Take my yoke upon you, and learn of Me; for I am meek and lowly in heart! and ye shall find rest unto your souls. For My yoke—easy; and My burden—light."

May God grant that these words may be spirit and life to all here, and go all of you to Christ, and find in Him the true rest of God.

The sum of the whole matter is: Life through Christ precedes development in those who unite themselves to Christ. And that no individual responsibility can be borne by assumed responsibility of the sects.

MINISTERING MOTHERS.

"MOTHER!" O word how sweet, how tender! What a fountain of disinterested love is in it! It is gentleness embodied. It is the child's heaven. "I'll tell my mother!" That is enough. There is peace in the very thought. There is no room for doubt. She will succor, she will help, she will shield her little one. The faith of that young heart is perfect; there is no room in it for the faintest shade of unbelief, no thought of the bare possibility of indifference to the welfare of her child on the part of the mother. Children are true believers. Our Lord selects them as illustrative models of Christians who would enter the kingdom. We say they must be converted and become like us—for that is what we mean, although we are too modest to say so;—but Christ says we must be "converted," and become like them,—a doctrine which the teachers both of adults and children would do well to look at again. Doubt is the troublesome companion of grown men. Reason kindles her brilliant lamp, and lo! it is questioned whether the All-Reason has spoken at all,—the fact being that the poor taper has died in the light of the sun, whilst its owner thinks that the sun himself has gone out; but children receive with gladness the precious and beautiful things which they hear at the mother's knee about Jesus the Good Shepherd, the Lover of the lambs, and about the loving Father in heaven, with his house of many mansions, and his paradise of ever fruitful trees. The young heart, wondering and rejoicing over this new world of love and beauty, believes every thing perfectly. All is reality to the Christian child; and it is therefore a matter of unspeakable importance that mothers should teach their darlings only what is true.

* Page 5, "Village Conferences on the Creed," by the Rev. S. Baring Gould, M. A. London: J. Masters, 1873

Of course it is not supposed for a moment, notwithstanding this pointed way of putting the case, that any Christian mother will teach her child something which she knows to be unscriptural. That is absolutely out of the question. "If a son shall ask bread of any of you that is a father, will he give him a stone? Or if he ask a fish, will he for a fish give him a serpent? Or if he shall ask an egg, will he offer him a scorpion?" No parent, however foolish he may be in other respects, can do anything so heartlessly cruel and unnatural. But is it not possible to take for granted as divine doctrines, opinions which commentators and sermon writers have been presenting to the public for generations,—opinions in the belief of which we and our fathers have been trained since childhood,—but which, notwithstanding, are entirely opposed to the Holy Scriptures, the character of God, and the nature of man? Yes, alas! this is not only possible, but, as a matter of fact, it is done everywhere to the terrible injury of the young heart, and the deep dishonor of our loving Father in heaven; and we cannot help imploring Christian mothers who may read these pages, to avoid, as they would the deadly pestilence, the fearful mistake which has blasted the joy of many a young loving soul, filling it with such dread of the very name of God that has either sunk it into hopeless melancholy, or driven it, as years advanced, into bitter scepticism. Our sisters will surely forgive our profound earnestness in this matter when we assure them that we are not speaking from hearsay, or from what common sense teaches us must be the result of those terrible misrepresentations of the Divine Father, but from actual personal knowledge of too many cases of religious despair, or determined infidelity.

Alas! it is bad enough and cruel enough to harrow the young heart with lying ghost stories, until the extremely sensitive nervous system is stretched upon a rack of anguish; but it is immeasurably worse to tell it that the Almighty God, whose will is law, and whose power is irresistible, will send the "souls" of men, and even those of children, to a dungeon of fire "to be tormented for ever," without the faintest hope of either death or deliverance. This hideous lie has made life miserable in countless instances. It has driven thousands upon thousands to despair, madness, atheism, or suicide; and it has spoiled existence to some of the finest and gentlest minds that ever came from the hands of the Creator. The compilers of our catechisms who have made this falsehood one of the ingredients in their "milk for babes," have much to answer for, and the preachers and teachers who perpetuate it are simply, without knowing it, making our heavenly Father the terror and scourge of the universe!

Mothers! help us to diffuse God's pure, loving, exquisitely beautiful truth, unadulterated with pagan and popish cruelties! We are doing what we can—and, thanks to our blessed Lord, no without rich fruit—to drive the withering abomination from the Christian Church; but it is obvious that our hope must be in the young. If the next generation is to look back with amazement on the fact that the word of truth was so amazingly misunderstood, we must teach the children the great Gospel revelation of immortality only in Christ. Those precious ones who are now playing and prattling around the mother—the beautiful blossoms which God has sent to sweeten home—must be educated in the atmosphere of divine tenderness. O how blessed it is to tell those we love that "God is Love!" How delightful to speak these most gracious words in the listening ears of childhood.—"God so loved the world that he gave his only begotten Son that whosoever believeth in Him should not perish, but have everlasting life." To perish means to die, to go out of existence, to cease to be. To have everlasting life means—O wonderful thought!—to have union with the beloved Son of God, close as the branch to the stem—the same vitality animating both—the eternal life thus possessed by the believer, child or man, being not at all a natural, but a purely supernatural thing; not an inherited possession, but a glorious "gift of God." Let young hearts, through the teaching of ministering mothers, feel that Jesus loves them; and let them grow up, not in a region of terror, but in one of peace, and joy, and hope!—DR. LEASK.

No prophecy of the Scriptures is of any private interpretation.

RESTFUL FAITH.

BY MARIECHEM.

I have a precious faith in God above,
Which takes from outward things all power to move,
And puts within this restless weary breast,
A sense of peace, and love, and perfect rest.

My will is often crossed in every way,
The bitter cup I hold through many a day,
But still there fills this weary, aching breast,
That sense of peace, of trust, and perfect rest.

For years I've prayed that if it were God's will
This cup might pass. I hold it still,
And yet there's growing in my baff'd breast,
That sense of peace, and hope, and trustful rest.

This unknown path seems long from day to day,
To feet which fain had gone another way, Faith whispers, "God has found this way the best,"
And then there comes such peace, such perfect rest.

O, wondrous power which makes my path seem bright
When really it is hung with clouds of night;
And makes the stones and thorns seem soft and sweet
When most they wound my tired and bleeding feet.

God walks by heavenly light above my head;
I walk in earthly dark beneath his tread;
But down this guiding line of faith I hold,
Come messages of rest and peace untold.

NON-UNIVERSALISM AND UNIVERSALISM.

BRO. STORRS: As attempts to confound the main views advocated in the BIBLE EXAMINER with those held by Universalists have been unsuccessfully made, I thought I would try and offer for the consideration of those who have tried to do so, what I deem to be the difference, although enough has been written by abler pens than mine to satisfy the most incredulous.

1. That it is God's will that all men should be saved, in the sense that He has made ample provision for their final salvation, is Non-Universalism. But to conclude that all men will be saved just because it is His will that all should be saved, is Universalism; for the same record that informs us what the will of God is, also informs, in other portions of it, that final salvation is to be obtained upon conditions complied with by the recipients.

2. That Christ is the Redeemer of all men is Non-Universalism. But to conclude that all men are to be finally redeemed because He is the Redeemer of all men, is Universalism; for final redemption is predicated upon conditions just as much as final salvation.

3. That the man Christ Jesus is the one Mediator between God and men, is Non-Universalism. But to conclude just because He is the one Mediator that the final state of all men is to be affected without some action upon their own part, is Universalism.

4. That Jesus Christ gave himself a ransom for all men is Non-Universalism. But to draw the conclusion that just because He did give himself a ransom for all men that all men will be finally ransomed is Universalism.

5. That Christ tasted death for every man, is Non-Universalism. But to conclude that the death of Christ secures the ultimate salvation of all men, just because He has tasted death for all men, is Universalism.

6. That Jesus Christ is the propitiation for the sins of the whole world is Non-Universalism. But to conclude that because He is the propitiation for the sins of the whole world, that the sins of the whole world are to be unconditionally blotted out, is Universalism.

7. That the living God is the Saviour of all men is Non-Universalism. But to conclude that because He is the Saviour of all men, that all men will finally be saved, is Universalism; for, to my mind, it is just as impossible for the Saviour of all men to benefit all men (so far as their final state is concerned), without some action upon their part, as it would be for a physician to help any one who would not go to him nor send for him, nor consult him in any way whatever; and it would be as easy for any one to convince me that all men are to be finally saved unconditionally, as it would to convince me that literal bread would save people from starving to death without their partaking of it; or, that water would quench one's thirst without their drinking it; or that the brazen serpent, which Moses lifted up in the wilderness, would have benefited any of the children of Israel if they had refused to look upon it.

But, in conclusion, let me say, that there is a vast difference between the advocacy of the view that God's method for the final salvation of all men being made known, universally, and the one that all men are universally and unconditionally to be saved without let or hindrance. Amen:

so let it be.

A. S. WHITNEY.

Clinton, Mass.

NOTE BY THE EDITOR.—Perhaps it is due to our friends who hold to the universal salvation of all our race, to say, They would deny holding that "final salvation" is "unconditional;" but they maintain that all men will, by some means, be made to comply with the conditions; and that God will continue a system of discipline with them till they do willingly submit to the conditions, and so are finally saved.

If the Scriptures teach such discipline is God's method to save all men, ultimately, then they carry their point; but, on the other hand, if the Bible teaches that some "will not come to Christ, that they may have life;" and God asks them, "Why will ye die?" and that some have "tasted the good word of God, and been made partakers of the Holy Ghost, and have fallen away," and that it is "impossible to renew them again to repentance;" and that for such "there remaineth no more sacrifice for sin, but a fearful looking for of fiery indignation that shall devour" them; then Universalism cannot be true. But better far is Universalism, with all its mistakes, than the theories held by most in the sects of religion. that God condemns men to eternal torments or a hopeless death without ever having given them an opportunity to know the truth and a capacity to embrace it when presented to them. From such blasphemy, "Good Lord, deliver us," and the world.

FROM POLLY G. PITTS.

BRO. STORRS: I would once more say, "Bless the Lord for the BIBLE EXAMINER;" and I bless His holy name for holding you up and putting it into your heart to revive it again. How much light it throws on the Oath and Promise of God! O I feel like Mary, when she exclaimed, "My soul doth magnify the Lord, and my spirit doth rejoice in God my Saviour; for hath he not regarded the low estate of his people?" Yes, surely.

I am often pressed in spirit while seeing and hearing many that profess to be the church of the living God, and the last remnant of it, yet ignoring the promise and oath of God to Abraham, that in him and his seed (Christ) shall all the nations and families of the earth be blessed, but tremble before the interpretation of a fallible mortal. O when I muse upon these things the fire burns.

I was thinking to-day of the glorious prophecy of Zacharias after John was born, the forerunner of our Lord. Zacharias was filled with the Holy Spirit, and prophesied, saying, "Blessed be the Lord God of Israel; for he hath visited and redeemed his people, and hath raised up a horn of salvation for us in the house of his servant David; as he spake by the mouth of his holy prophets which have been since the world began; that we should be saved from our enemies and from the hand of those that hate us; to perform the mercy promised to our fathers, and to remember his holy covenant: the oath which he sware to our father Abraham, that he would grant unto us, that we, being delivered out of the hand of our enemies, might serve him without fear, in holiness and righteousness before him, all the days of our life." Bless the Lord! here is the oath and promise of God to Abraham and his seed; here is the horn, the seed to whom the promise was made that in him should all the families of the earth be blessed. Here is the great deliverance from their enemy, death, the glorious resurrection brought to view. Let us look and see what some, at least, of these holy prophets have said about these promises and seed.

"For unto us a child is born; unto us a son is given; and the government shall be upon his shoulder: and his name shall be called Wonderful, Counsellor, The Mighty God, The Everlasting Father, The Prince of Peace. Of the increase of his government, and peace, there shall be no end, upon the throne of David, and upon his kingdom, to order it, and to establish it with judgment and with justice from henceforth. The zeal of the Lord of Hosts shall perform this" (Isa. ix. 6, 7). Amen. O bless God for his oath and promise to set Jesus on the throne of David; and to say that it shall endure as the days of heaven; that his kingdom shall have no end.

Here is our great High Priest King; for the Lord sware, "Thou art a priest forever after the order of Melchizedek." Forever, when applied to God or Christ, is as long as they exist. O my heart says, Alleluia; here is our King, whose kingdom and priesthood must endure as long as he shall exist! He was not made a priest after a carnal commandment; no, but after the power of an endless life. Bless God for his oath to build up Christ's throne to all generations; and that the "increase" of his government shall have no end. Well, let it increase, world without end. Amen.

Some may ask, How can it increase without end? This question brings to my mind an incident that I read of. A gentleman once standing on one of the great safety valves of the earth, Mount Vesuvius, and looking abroad, it seemed almost that the world itself lay in his sight; there was drawn up to his feet the might rivers, the boundless forests, reaching far away to the horizon; and he could but admire the greatness of the works of God; but when he looked at himself and his own conceptions, what was his exclamation? "Pompous littleness."

I do not wonder that David, when viewing the works of God, exclaimed, "What is man, that thou art mindful of him?" God is not dependent on man for a universe to people. O, our narrow views! our feeble conceptions of God, and what He can do!

But let us look at a few promises of God, and see if there is a foundation for faith to stand upon, that Christ's government shall increase. "Behold, the days come, saith the Lord, that I will raise unto David a righteous BRANCH, and a King shall reign and prosper, and shall execute judgment and justice in the earth. In his days Judah shall be saved, and Israel shall dwell safely; and this is the name whereby he shall be called, The Lord our Righteousness" (Jer. xxiii. 5, 6). "And there shall come forth a rod out of the stem of Jesse, and a BRANCH shall grow out of his roots: and the Spirit of the Lord shall rest upon him," etc. "And righteousness shall be the girdle of his loins, and faithfulness the girdle of his reins. The wolf also shall dwell with the lamb, and the leopard shall lie down with the kid; and the calf and the young lion and the fating together; and a little child shall lead them. And the cow and the bear shall feed; their young ones shall lie down together; and the lion shall eat straw like the ox; and the sucking child shall play on the hole of the asp, and the weaned child shall put his hand on the cockatrice's den. They shall not hurt nor destroy in all my holy mountain (or kingdom); for the earth shall be full of the knowledge of the Lord, as the waters cover the sea," etc. (Isa. xi.)

Please read Isaiah ix. "Arise, shine; for thy light is come, and the glory of the Lord is risen upon thee." I cannot write the whole chapter, but it is plain, God is speaking of the glorious state of the Zion of God after the resurrection; for the glorious state, here described, never has been; and if we are right in looking for Christ's coming soon, or at hand, it must be in the ages to come. The eleventh verse says, "Therefore, thy gates shall be open continually; they shall not be shut day nor night; that men may bring unto thee the forces of the Gentiles, and that their kings may be brought. For the nation and the kingdom that will not serve thee shall perish; yea, those nations shall be utterly wasted. The glory of Lebanon shall come unto thee, the fir tree, the pine tree, and the box together, to beautify the place of my sanctuary;" (bless the Lord), "and I will make the place of my feet glorious." Amen; God will walk among them. "For brass I will bring gold, and for iron I will bring silver, and for wood brass, and for stones iron; I will also make thy officers peace, and thine exactors righteousness." O, who would not be trained for service in the ages to come! "The sun shall be no more thy light by day; neither for brightness shall the moon give light unto thee; but the Lord shall be unto thee an everlasting light, and thy God thy glory. Thy sun shall no more go down; neither shall thy moon withdraw itself: for the Lord shall be thine everlasting light, and the days of thy mourning shall be ended. Thy people also shall be all righteous: they shall inherit the land for ever, the branch of my planting, the work of my hands, that I may be glorified. A little one shall become a thousand, and a small one a strong nation: I the Lord will hasten it in his time." Whose time? The times of the Messiah.

Surely here is increase, and it is when Christ is governor among the nations. I hardly know where to begin this glorious theme, and I hardly know where to leave off; but I, like Abraham, am fully persuaded that what God has promised He is able to perform.

O let us work while the day lasts; soon the Master will be here; let us not be slothful, but followers of them who through faith and patience inherit the promises. For, when God made promise to Abraham, because he could swear by no greater, he swear by himself, saying, Surely blessing I will bless thee, and multiplying I will multiply thee. And so, after he had patiently endured, he obtained the promise. For men verily swear by the greater; and an oath for confirmation is to them an end of all strife. Wherein, God willing more abundantly to show unto the heirs of promise the immutability of his counsel, confirmed it by an oath; that by two immutable things, in which it was impossible for God to lie, we might have a strong consolation, who have fled for refuge to lay hold upon the hope set before us. Which hope we have as an anchor to the soul" (Heb. vi. 12).

Let us live by every word that proceedeth out of the mouth of God. Thy kingdom come, Thy will be done in earth as it is done in heaven.

FROM H. YOUNG.

BRO. STORRS: While reading what is written under the word "Introduction," and the text, Gal. i. 8, on the 40th page of the EXAMINER, No. 2, some thoughts, which have for many months rested with much weight on my mind, came with such renewed force that I feel constrained to write a few lines. I will make it as plain as I can.

While so much that is excellent has been written on the promise of God to Abraham, making the blessing promised extend to every individual of the human family, and while many who read are made joyful and glad at the "glad tidings of great joy which shall be unto all people," a suggestion has been made, that "this is nothing short of universal salvation," and, lo, those who seemed to be foremost in the argument are afraid; they pause and then reply—"We do not say that all will finally be saved; we only say, that salvation is proffered to all, either in this age or in the ages to come."

Now the only object I have in writing—the only thought which stirs my mind at this time, is to ask and to answer the question, Is a man who is dying—who is going out of life—saved when the bread of life is proffered to him? or, must he accept of said proffer, and so it become a gift? My object is to distinguish between a proffer and a gift. Is life a blessing? Yes. Well, if one is dying for the want of bread, and I have the bread he wants, and proffer it to him, and he does not accept of it, will he not die just as certain and as soon as if the proffer had not been made? The proffer is changed to a gift by the acceptance, on his part, of the bread which must save him. So the things stand thus,—Life is the blessing God promised to Abraham, and the same life is the blessing he has promised through Abraham and his seed to all the nations and families of the earth. The question then is, Will God make good his promise? will he give the life which is the blessing promised? Then remember that He must do more than to proffer the life, the blessing. He must make it a gift. How is this done? Answer: By the acceptance on the part of every individual of the life proffered. We have said, with emphasis, God must do more than proffer life to the race. He must also make it a gift. He must win the acceptance of every individual of the human family or his promise will fail.

Now shall this be done? "Faith is the gift of God," is it not? Well, when we know how God gives a man faith, then we shall know how He wins the acceptance of the life He has proffered in the case of every man; for when a man has faith, he has salvation. How, then, does God give a man faith? Listen while Paul shall answer: "And it shall come to pass that whoever shall call on the name of God shall be saved." Here is a calling which brings salvation. But what are the previous steps to be taken before men shall thus call on the name of the Lord, and so be saved? Listen again: "But how shall they call on him in whom they have not believed? and how shall they believe on him of whom they have not heard? and how shall they hear without a preacher? and how shall they preach except they be sent?" Is not this process a plain one? Is not this God's own arrangement? Does he not "send" the preacher, or the dispenser of his word, with a proof and power which is convincing? They thus "hear" of God, and believing is the result of such hearing; and then call on him, and so are saved. Thus "faith cometh by hearing, and hearing by the word of God." Is not this the exact way that God gives a man faith? Now we see, also, how life—the blessing promised—is given, not only proffered, but given. Perfect evidence compels belief; and this perfect demonstration shall yet be given, for this we know is "God's purpose and plan;" given to as many as the promised blessing extend.

Shall we dare limit this blessing, promised to all the nations of the earth? and shall we dare say that to proffer life to a man is a blessing, unless he is won, by the force of truth, to believe and accept of life? "God was willing to show to the heirs of promise the immutability of his counsels," and so he confirmed it by an oath, that all the heirs of promise might have strong consolation who flee for refuge to lay hold of the hope set before them. Question: Why were they disconsolate? What was the "consolation" they needed? They were under the doom of death. The hope of life, then, would give consolation. Very well. How many were in this condition? As many as were under said doom. How many are the heirs of promise? As many as the promise extends to. How many does the promise extend to? Answer: "And I will bless thee, and thou shalt be a blessing to all nations of the earth." Is not every individual of the entire race included in said promise? Is the blessing given to all the nations, through Abraham, less than the blessing given to Abraham? Now, if said promise is the Gospel, and if the promise blesses one of the race, must it not bless all? This "strong consolation" comes to one when he flees for refuge and lays hold of said promise. Till he does this he is not blessed. When he does this, he is blessed. Well, if all shall ultimately be blessed will not all ultimately lay hold of this promise? How else can all be blessed? and will not the promise fail if all are not blessed?

Again. "Behold we bring you glad tidings of great joy which shall be unto all people." Is a man made joyful and glad at a message he rejects? at a Gospel which he will not receive, because he cannot believe it for want of evidence? To make one joyful and glad at a message you bring him, must you not so fully demonstrate the facts to him as to win his confidence? to remove his every doubt? In short, must not the perfect evidence you bring to him compel him to believe? Certainly all this must be done; and when this is done, in the case of every man, the promised blessing will be given.

"Correct not my writings out of your own opinion, or out of contention; but from reading of the Divine word, or by unshaken argument."
—Augustine.

I am writing for the BIBLE EXAMINER, and have examined the Bible somewhat for the last forty years of my life; and what I now write are some of the conclusions I have come to from the study of said book. I fear they will be acceptable to but few readers now. Indeed, I do not wish any one to "commit" himself to my views, or to any man's views. We should be careful never to do this; but still we may help each other in coming at a correct understanding of that word by giving the results of our investigations.

I was not much pleased with the sentiments of "Henry Smith Warleigh," contained in "Why Evil was Permitted,"—i. e., as to the whole; though some things said in it were quite interesting: so, of course, was sorry to learn that it would be made more prominent hereafter. We ought to be careful that we do not stereotype that which will call for immediate correction. Great men are not always wise. "God has made foolish the wisdom of this world." "He leads counsellors away spoiled." He could not do this if men were wise by His wisdom; if their counsel was such as His own.

O how blessed are the truths daily unfolding before our eyes as we study the volume of inspiration, as well as the volume of nature. How thankful we should be for the assurance given us of glorious times to come; that God has declared the decree that he has set, i. e., in decree His King on his holy hill of Zion; that this King shall reign in righteousness, and princes rule in judgment; and that this reign and rule is to be universal and endless; that

"Arabia's desert ranger to Him shall bow the knee,
And Ethiopian stranger His glory come to see;
With anthems of devotion, ships of the flux shall meet,
And pour the wealth of ocean in tribute at His feet;
For He shall have dominion from river, sea and shore,
Far as the eagle's pinion or dove's light wing can soar."

Shall we murmur at the means? Shall we complain of the salutary discipline of sorrow, suffering, and death, which shall bring us to such happy results? Nay! "Thy will is welcome; let it wear its most tremendous form: roar waves, rage winds; I know that Thou canst save me by a storm."

Pittsfield, N. H.

FROM R. WILLARD, M. D.

BRO. STORRS: I am impressed that I ought to write you something by way of encouragement, and at the same time, conscious of my inability to instruct those wiser than myself; nevertheless we are admonished to endeavor to comfort one another, as we see the day approaching.

Our experience has fallen in an eventful age; I sometimes contemplate the status of society in my youthful days, and then follow the stream of eventful changes to the present time, noting the apparent advantages, as they seem to rise. The advance of human skill is incalculable. Rational enterprise and power have made giant strides among us; while iniquity does not linger far behind.

As to religion in the days of our boyhood, it was understood pretty uniformly in the Antimomian phrase, while denominations split mainly on ritual and government.

The immortality of the human soul was conceded by all; nevertheless, sectarian walls had doors through which Christian fellowship found access; notwithstanding all expected to meet in Christian fellowship, beyond the starry heavens, so soon as life's short journey should end. None dared question the death-bed exit of the soul, and the vital query was, its destination: not recognizing the hiatus between present and future life; and, hence, resurrection was a doctrine seldom preached about, and perhaps few saw its necessity from their standpoint. But since natural immortality has been questioned in later years, and found to be but a dogma, and that future life is hid with Christ in God, and not until He appears, will we appear with him at the resurrection from the dead; which greatly disturbs and calls in question other doctrines entertained by our forefathers. But such was their light, although to us it seems darkness; but a man is judged for what he has, and not for what he has not.

This seeking for eternal life through Christ, and him only, greatly remodels our faith, and sets us on holy ground; divests us of self-righteousness, and points us, at once, to the LIFE-GIVER for that boon, which he alone can confer; and I am glad that there is none other name given, under heaven, whereby we must be saved. But we find a large majority of professors still cling to the popular dogma, "Thou shalt not surely die" (Gen. iii. 4). "Let God be true and every man a liar." God said to Adam, "The day when thou eatest thereof, thou shalt surely die." And has it not proved true for the last six thousand years? and need we further time to prove which of the two told the truth?

The serpent's lie has laid broad the foundation upon which mythological fables have been devised and proved a hot-bed of error. But my preaching neighbors and their professing charges still vote for the arch usurper, despite of all Bible proof to the contrary. Abraham's inheritance is a nullity if he has gone to heaven and finds it there! But, no: God pointed it out to him, and made its title secure by confirming it with an oath; and all Christians expect to enjoy the future state with Abraham; but the matter of dispute is where is it to be; in the air, or on the earth? And then again, there is likewise a difficulty as to whether we and our home will be a tangible reality, or a mirage of fancy.

I am surprised that "old wives' fables" are so current in this nineteenth century! At the time of Luther, when beginning to emerge from the bottomless pit of the papacy, it might not be wondered at. But Papal dogmas are still rife in the land, and Protestant christiandom teems with them. But, dear brother, I trust we have got a long way beyond this moral slough, and can look back and thank God that we have, through grace, made our escape toward the mountains, and we hope soon to climb Pisgah's top, and by faith "view the landscape o'er."

God's plan of human salvation never looked half so glorious as now. When we realize that "Of the increase of His government and peace there will be no end," our powers of computation are at an end; and can but contemplate the glory which shall "cover the earth as the waters do the sea. The zeal of the Lord of hosts will perform this!" Bless his holy name!

I am thankful that the time draws near when the time of restoration will commence. It will not be long, I hope, before the Bride is in readiness; when He will come to gather His elect jewels and take them to Himself. Amen.

Accept congratulations for self and family. Our health and comforts demand gratitude. The friends at Philadelphia would appreciate a visit from you at your earliest convenience.

FROM WILLIAM ERWIN.

BRO. STORRS I hereby acknowledge the receipt of the first and second numbers of the eighteenth volume of the BIBLE EXAMINER. I have read them with the greatest care and pleasure. I thank you for this further manifestation of kindness. I have great reason to be thankful that any of your productions ever fell into my hands. Through yourself I was first led to contemplate the true destiny of man. It requires almost a martyr's fortitude and firmness to confront and strenuously oppose a popular and almost universal error. In my circumscribed sphere I find it requires a willing sacrifice of every consideration except rectitude. I am truly thankful for the thoughtful kindness of our blessed Saviour for the kind assurance that they who lose their lives for his sake shall find them!

I am anxious to keep an eye on your further advancement into the principles and science of the government of God over his creatures. To this end I enclose $2.20 for the EXAMINER; so please continue to forward them.

I praise my heavenly Father that there is, at least, one individual on earth who is willing to assiduously search the Scriptures and publish a periodical independent of all pre-conceived opinions and superstitions. I most heartily bid you "God speed," and wish you abundant success in your endeavors and labors of love; and I will make no small effort to send you some subscribers.

Yours, in the bonds of truth.

Painted Post, N. Y.

FROM EMILY F. LOCKWOOD.

BRO STORRS: I have been long intending to drop you a few lines, but have been prevented by ill health and work of various kinds.

Feeling sure that you will not be unwilling to hear from one who deems it a privilege to be of the denomination your paper so ably represents; an honest seeker for truth. I venture, therefore, to trouble you with half an hour's jottings.

Experience and observation have taught me that candor and plain speaking, though not always the most expedient and politic, so far as the speaker is concerned, is yet always the best, so far as the cause of truth is concerned; therefore, when I see a person manifest an ardent desire to know the right, regardless of tradition, my sympathies go out after such an one; and for this cause I am decidedly interested in the contributors of your Magazine. And if, in searching for the true meaning of God's word, yourself and others make no mistakes, or blunders, you will be the first that ever wrote on the mysterious Book without; and will doubtless be as pardonable as those who have gone before you.

I would like just here to give a little of my experience, (and in respect to obstinacy and wilful ignorance it is not unlike many others, I fear), and how it was I came to be interested in what I now call one of the greatest truths of the Bible; and if by so doing I could encourage any, or stimulate one to look at the subject, I shall not labor in vain or expose my lack of charity for naught.

About two years ago, your paper was thrust (as I thought) upon my husband by our friend and neighbor J. L. Knapp; and to tell the truth, I was much offended, (secretly of course); and when compelled, from respect to husband, to listen to the reading of it (for I would not touch the paper myself) I would at once pronounce it Universalism.

Thus matters stood, when Rev. S. P. WILLIAMS* chanced to visit us. Conversation, of course, turned to religious interests. He inquired how the Baptist cause was prospering in Sratoga. In answer, I said, we have left the Baptist church and joined the Adventists. He remarked, "That is natural for Baptists," as though the Baptists were the only turncoats. Then I said, "Mr. Lockwood has gone farther than this; he was investigating and I thought embracing a theory called Ages to Come, and that through the influence of a paper edited by Geo. Storrs, and I did not want it so." He looked at me with a benign expression and replied, "I want it just as God wants it." He then gave this statement that he "was acquainted with Geo. Storrs from his youth, a more honest man never lived."

The commendation of this particular virtue, in such a time as this, when the clergy as well as laity stand at discount in regard to it, I considered irresistible, and it turned the scales at once, I assure you: and never after did I refuse to listen to or read your paper.

A reprimand like his was received with great favor, and I trust the lesson it taught will not be forgotten, that

"That mercy I to others show,
That mercy show to me."

* By the way, he married a cousin of ours.

[NOTE BY THE EDITOR.—The above named minister was born and brought up in the same town with myself. His father was my intimate friend and counsellor in my first efforts to preach; a plain, honest open-hearted Local Methodist Minister. The son, some years after myself, became a member of the same Methodist conference of Travelling Preachers, possessing the good traits of his father. It is many years since I have heard his name mentioned till now. I am glad to learn that he still possesses the spirit of our Divine Master, and "wants it just as God wants it." Amen to that sentiment, with all my heart.]

I am surprised to find we are so little in advance of Romanism to day; that our Advent brethren, to whom this truth belongs, are so ready to shut their eyes and stop their ears. That they do this is shown by a recent action of the Hoosick Valley Conference, as reported in the "World's Crisis" of Nov. 26, 1873; and, as in all probability, in the multitude of your cares, it has not been noticed I will give an extract:

WHEREAS, certain conflicting elements of doctrine are being advocated and preached by brethren, who if going out under the auspices of this Conference, make us not only responsible for the advocacy of doctrines erroneous, but necessitating the rejection of a large share of both the Old and New Testament Scriptures, therefore:
Resolved, That this Conference shall not issue certificates of recommendation to any persons advocating any doctrine dividing our Christian efforts and bringing in discord calculated to destroy our influence both with the church and world.

Resolved, That the foregoing shall not be so construed as to abridge or hinder the free and perfect right of every one to read and search the Scriptures for themselves, and act according to the best light they have; unless their views shall be made so prominent in preaching, or otherwise, as to disturb and divide the peaceful relations of churches, and also to neutralize the efforts of brethren co-operating with the Conference.

"And we forbade him, because he followed not us." Does it not look like mockery to grant the right of private judgment in the examination of the Bible, and then (perhaps) reproach and crush or injure a man because he cannot see every passage in the same light as his neighbor?

Is it not a fact, that reformers in every age, have been looked upon as bringing dissension into the churches? and the nearer the truth the greater the discord.

I can imagine you, dear brother, and those holding the same views, as standing on an eminence, and can look farther in all directions than those who stand at the base. Hence, they look with suspicion and distrust when the way is pointed out, and suppose you are misdirecting them. But let them gain the summit; let them with minds untrammelled search the Scriptures, and they may be led to correct their misjudgment, or, at least, expend that charity which is due to a brother.

And now that I have written at such length, bear with me still farther, while I make a few inquiries. My mind has been much exercised, of late, respecting the method of receiving or rejecting Christ in the coming ages. It may seem a question premature, yet we cannot, as thinking, rational beings, leave those things for others, or pass them by with indifference, nor, indeed.

would we be wise above what is written. But to the question. May not the apostles stand as a pattern for that as well as this dispensation? Is there not a difference between the conversion of Paul, Peter, and Thomas? In the case of Peter, flesh and blood did not reveal it: and again after Christ's resurrection he appeared to Thomas, and said, "Reach hither thy finger," etc. Thomas answered and said to him: "My Lord and my God." Jesus says to him, "Because thou hast seen me and believed; happy they who saw not, and have believed." Here is surely a blessing pronounced upon those that "saw not and believed."

Still again: How diverse from the others is the case of Paul. Stricken down when he thought he was doing God's will! What could he do but to obey? Was he not a chosen vessel indeed? Paul says to Timothy, "I thank him who gave me strength, Christ Jesus our Lord, that he accounted me faithful, putting me into the ministry." Again: "But for this cause I obtained mercy, that in me first Christ Jesus might show forth all his long suffering, for a pattern to those who should hereafter believe on him to life everlasting." I repeat the question: Is there not in these cases, and others that could be mentioned, at least a type of that which is to come? Did the Lord show greater mercy to Paul than he manifested to those who crucified him, when he said, "Father, forgive them?"

Saratoga, N. Y.

FROM ELD. JACOB BLAIN.

BRO. STORRS: I wish to make a request through the EXAMINER to brethren and sisters who are interested in the spread of our new truths. I have 750 of "HOPE FOR OUR RACE," and want them put into the hands of readers as soon as possible, and at least half before the hurry of summer business begins. I know of no way to have it done to advantage only for brethren in all parts to write for a few, say, half to a dozen, and find readers in their places or send to their friends. I see no hope of selling them for years, and may die before it is done, unless opposition lessens. I therefore wish brethren to have them to lend and give to those they think will read them. If they can sell any, do so, and pay when convenient.

Our tracts and paper are doing much, but a class of readers want larger works before they become settled in their views; and all should prepare to defend and contend for the views they adopt. The advantage of "HOPE FOR OUR RACE" is the fact that it quotes more largely from Scripture than any of our works; even more than Bro. H. Dunn thought it needful to quote in his large work of 700 pages. When any write they should send postage, if possible, which is only two and a half cents per copy when three or more are sent in one package. Let none decline sending because the pamphlets cost me money. They are printed and will be paid for, and the loss, if any, must come in their laying idle.

Buffalo, N. Y., Feb. 17, 1874.

A SISTER writes, "privately:" I like the EXAMINER just as well as ever. I would like to keep it after I have read them; but I cannot; I see so many who are in darkness and need the light, which they contain, so much, that it seems wrong for me to keep them. I know that they will do good where they go, and I send them to those who read and give them to others who can appreciate them. I could not see one destroyed, for I consider them precious. I like the new form very much better than the old, for they last longer to lend, and are so nice to bind. It is a blessed book; I hope it will travel over the earth till the Lord comes. I thank the Lord for raising up a few who dare proclaim these truths. I wish there were many more. But the Lord knows what we need, and He will arrange every thing all right in His own good time. Bless His holy name. May we have the blessed privilege of meeting in His kingdom.

Your Sister in Christ.

NOTE BY THE EDITOR.—This sister manifests the self-sacrificing spirit which we all do well to emulate. "But how can we loan and give away our EXAMINERS when we wish so very much to keep them?" Well, I will help you all I can. I will, so long as I have them, replace without charge those you lose in the work, if you are not able to pay for them at six cents per copy Nos 1, 2, 3 and 4. I have a large supply on hand, and wish them sent out on their mission. Give them a chance to speak.

ISAAC S. SMALL, Wales, Me., writes: After delaying beyond the time that I desired to make a remittance to you for the highly esteemed BIBLE EXAMINER, I now send $2 for vol. xviii. I have read it for many years with great interest, and I think with profit; but have not been able, at all times, to adopt all the views advanced in it. I think there is much in the Scriptures of truth to sustain your present position, and hope you may be spared to shed all the light you have upon it.

My age, nearly 81 years, impaired health and eyesight, render me incapable of investigating for myself as I once could, and admonish me that my earthly life must soon come to a close.

Yours in Christian fellowship.

NATHAN PUTNAM, Salem, Mass., writes: I am more attached to the Bible and BIBLE EXAMINER than to any other books. Not being connected with any earthly organization they contain nearly all the preaching that I have. Being in my 78th year do not feel like strolling around to listen to much that is not contained in aforesaid books; but quite content myself with what I learn therein. I pray for a knowledge of "the way, the Truth and the Life;" that thereby I may attain a hope of immortal life. I pray God to bless you in your present position, and make you a lasting blessing. Yours, in the Gospel hope.

Editor's Notices.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.—It is my desire that all letters for me be sent to my residence, as I visit New York but once a day, and sometimes only once in two or three days; while the “Letter Carriers” deliver letters four times each day, Sundays excepted. I shall still retain my Post Office Box in New York, because I fear loss by giving it up, at present, as that address has been placed on all my works scattered for twenty years past. I prefer that all persons communicating with me hereafter address me as follows,

GEO. STORRS,
72 Hicks Street,
BROOKLYN, N. Y.

EXCHANGES.—Hereafter I shall receive no paper or periodical as an Exchange that does not come to me postage paid, and directed to me, “72 Hicks Street, BROOKLYN, N. Y.” In return for such, I will send the BIBLE EXAMINER postage paid.

GEO. STORRS.

POOR BRETHREN.—I desire in every way consistent to aid brethren in distressed circumstances: but I have been too often imposed on, by calls from those with whom I had no personal acquaintance, to give notice in the EXAMINER, except such as relate to those I am certain are worthy of aid. This knowledge must be personal, or from reputable persons who are acquainted with the applicant's circumstances and character. As a general rule, these persons should apply to brethren near them; who should do their best to relieve the needy ones, or apply to others of their acquaintance.

Daniel W. Fike, Garrison, Iowa, writes me, his circumstances are trying, and asks help. I know nothing, personally, of him. Will those who do make inquiry and aid him, if need be? ED.

FROM DANIEL W. FIKE.

BRO. STORRS: Will you give the following an insertion in the EXAMINER?

Dear Brethren of the Abrahamic Faith: Necessity compels me to ask your aid in time of affliction. Causes of affliction,—Rheumatism of myself and white swellings, and sickness in my family; so I could not leave home to earn the necessaries of life.

Yours in the hope of immortality and restoration of Christ's kingdom.

Garrison, (Benton Co.,) Iowa.

THE BIBLE EXAMINER.—I will supply volume 17 in sheets (perfect sets) on the receipt of sixty cents. Also, odd numbers of that volume (or broken sets) for one cent for each two copies, which is simply to pay the postage. Who will scatter them?

I will still supply Nos. 1, 2, 3, or 4, of the present volume, for ten cents per copy to any one who wishes to send a sample to a friend; or three of either for 25 cents.

☞ The continuation of the Essay, “THE CURSE LIFTED,” is necessarily deferred until the next number of the EXAMINER.

MANY CALLED: FEW CHOSEN.

THE expression, "For many are called, but few chosen," is found in Matt. xx. 16, and xxii. 14. In the first text, it is at the conclusion of the parable of the householder who hired laborers into his vineyard at various hours of the day, at a fixed sum, and in paying those engaged at the eleventh hour (viz., five o'clock in the forenoon,) he settled with them first; and though no specified sum had been promised them, he gave them the same wages as those who had labored all day. In the other text, the language occurs at the close of the parable of the marriage feast for the king's son, when one man was found without a wedding garment on, and was cast out into darkness where was weeping and great sorrow. Both parables commence by saying, "The kingdom of heaven is like," etc.

The subject, then, is the establishment of the kingdom of heaven. All kingdoms have kings, subordinate rulers, and subjects. Without these three classes of men it would be no kingdom. It is manifest all cannot be rulers, nor all subjects. The kingdom of heaven has its King, selected and armed with authority to govern by God the maker of all. That King is "the Son of God." The subordinate rulers, or Helpers, in the government are to be selected from among the children of men; but they must possess certain qualifications to be "chosen" to that "high calling" (Phil. iii. 14); that is, they must become Christ-like, and be in perfect subjection to him and in full harmony with him and his rule. This "high calling" is to a "prize"—"a crown"—"an incorruptible crown" (1 Cor. ix. 25); to be "kings and priests unto God" (Rev. i. 6). To this high honor, "many are called," yet but a "few" "so run that they may obtain" the prize: "few," comparatively, seek only "the things that are Jesus Christ's;" too many, alas, "seek their own" instead of having the honor of Christ and God their object of concern; that which they most earnestly seek to promote by their life and conversation. They do not become Christ-like and in full harmony with him;

hence, are not "chosen" to be rulers with Christ on his throne.

It does not follow, that because they are not chosen to this glorious position, they are utterly lost. The "many called," though failing to obtain, or to be "chosen" to this high honor, may, nevertheless, attain to the bliss of being subjects in the kingdom, though they pass through a state of deep sorrow and regret that they had "not on the wedding garment;" and it is worthy of remark, that the "King" addresses such an one as a "friend."—"Friend, how camest thou in here not having on a wedding garment?" Sorrow, affliction, and deep disappointment is the result; but who can say that such an one shall utterly perish?

DR. ADAM CLARKE has some interesting remarks on the text. He thinks it refers to the Roman custom of selecting persons for active service in the army, in time of war. He says, "No one was forced to serve his country in a military capacity; and it was the highest honor to be deemed worthy of thus serving it. In consequence of this, all the youth were ambitious to be perfected in military exercises, and exerted all their powers to attain the highest perfection in this art by "leaping, running, wrestling, bearing burdens, fencing, throwing the javelin, etc." When soldiers were wanted for immediate war purposes, all citizens capable of bearing arms were "called" together, and the "Consuls" caused to be "chosen" from among them such as were judged the best fitted to make up the number needed. Though "many were called, few were chosen;" those not chosen to go to war, returned to serve their country by cultivating their lands, or in mechanical or other employments. None were useless because not chosen for active service in the war; though that was considered a high honor.

DR. CLARKE closes his remarks as follows: "Thus many are called by the preaching of the gospel, but few are found who use their advantages in such a way as to become extensively useful in the church,—and many in the church militant behave so ill, as never to be admitted into the church triumphant. But what a mercy that those who appear now to be rejected may be called in another muster, enrolled, serve in the field, or work in the vineyard. How many millions does the long-suffering of God lead to repentance."

Thus, Dr. CLARKE admits there "may be another muster" in which "those, who appear now rejected, may be enrolled" and do service in God's field; and he thinks there may be millions of such. That is granting much to the view I contend for. There are millions on millions who have never yet had an opportunity to enroll themselves in the Lord's service, who are yet to have it in "the ages to come." Dr. CLARKE might, and doubtless did, confine this opportunity to the present life; but where is a "Thus saith the Lord" for such restriction. In this life "many are called," but all are not; nor is it necessary that they should be; for the object now is not to make all men fit for the rulership in the kingdom of heaven; but "to take out of the" mass "a people for His (God's) name" (Acts xv. 14); "for known unto God are all his works from the beginning of the world" (verse 18). And as only a "few" have ever been "chosen," in this life, and they, manifestly, as "a kind of first-fruits of His creatres" (Jas. i. 18), it follows, that it was no part of God's work to have all, or even a very large part of the race, "made partakers of the Divine nature" in this life; but, of the many, choose a few, and so perfect them by trial, suffering, and labor, as to make them in perfect harmony and likeness with their King, that when the kingdom of God is "set up" on earth, and that perfect government is established, the many, the mass of the race, shall have a perfect exhibition of what the grace of God has wrought and can do, and willingly take a place as subjects under such a glorious administration, and "all people, nations, and languages" will be called upon "to serve and obey him"—"the Son of man" and his saints, or "chosen" ones (Dan. vii.)

In "the ages to come" will be manifested what John saw in vision, viz., "A great multitude, which no man can number, of all nations, and kindreds, and people, and tongues" will stand "before the throne, and before the Lamb, clothed with white robes, and palms in their hands; and cry with a loud voice, saying, Salvation to our God which sitteth upon the throne, and unto the Lamb" (Rev. vii. 9, 10). These are not the "few chosen;" but the multitudes saved through and by Christ and His "few" who "were redeemed from the earth," and "from among men" during the present life (Rev. xiv. 4). Those few redeemed ones, it seems clear to me, fulfil the message thus set forth in the vision: "I saw another angel fly in the midst of heaven, having the everlasting gospel to preach unto them that dwell on the earth, and to every nation, and kindred, and tongue, and people, saying with a loud voice, Fear God, and give glory to him; for the hour of his judgment is come; and worship him that made heaven, and earth, and the sea, and the fountains of waters" (Rev. xiv. 6, 7). The result of this preaching is the salvation of that "multitude which no man can number."

We may well adore God that a "few are chosen" and prepared to perform the great and glorious work of bringing—led by the Lamb—such an innumerable company to such joy and glory as is described in chapter vii. Praise God and the Lamb. The proclamation made by the angel flying through the midst of heaven, clearly has never yet been made, nor ever will be till the symbolic number of 144,000 is completed and glorified with their risen and glorified Head; and the great mistake of christendom is in supposing such a work is to be accomplished by mortal men, and be confined to this life. Such an idea is like the mistake of the Jews who supposed their Messiah was to accomplish all his work at one advent, or without dying and being raised from the dead. Without this, how could his reign be eternal? And without the death and resurrection of the "chosen few," the blessing promised to Abraham and his seed could never be accomplished according to the plan of God of blessing "all the families of the earth." To this work, few are the chosen; but, "in due time" the "many called" will realize the great mercy of God in his choice of the "few," from the race, fitted and prepared to bless the many.

"Many are called," and "many" will ultimately be saved; but "few are chosen" to accomplish the great work of the salvation of the many; and a "succession of ages" are appointed in which to perfect the work (Eph. ii 7, 11, 21); but God's word will "not return void, but it shall accomplish that whereto" He "sent it" (Isa. lv. 11). Amen. So shall it be. Ed.

THE SIN AGAINST THE HOLY GHOST.

Some of the writers for this Magazine have labored to overcome the difficulty in the restoration of all men to the Divine will and service;

but none of them, as I think, have succeeded in that work. The best and only thing I have seen that gives countenance to the idea that the "sin of blasphemy against the Holy Ghost" may not absolutely prevent the ultimate redemption of the sinner, is that presented by ANDREW JUKES, in his work on the "RESTITUTION OF ALL THINGS," published in London in 1869. Mr. JUKES is a believer in inherent immortality; and rejecting the doctrine of eternal torments, he could not do otherwise than to advocate the ultimate salvation of all men; and hence made a strong effort to overcome the difficulty arising from the texts which speak of the sin against the Holy Ghost. I have no unwillingness to accept the ultimate restoration of every human soul, and if I believed that immortality is inherent in man I should be obliged to adopt JUKES's view of the case under consideration; but my views are unchanged on the fact that immortality is a super-added gift of the God of grace, and only bestowed on any man after reconciliation to God in Christ. Mr. JUKES, in answering objections to his view of "The Restitution of all things," speaks as follows:

"Let us look at the texts which are chiefly relied on as teaching the doctrine of everlasting punishment. First, the passage respecting the sin against the Holy Ghost, which our Lord declares 'shall not be forgiven, neither in this world, nor in that which is to come.' From this it is concluded that the punishment for this sin must be never-ending. But does the text say so? The whole passage is as follows: 'Wherefore I say unto you, all manner of sin and blasphemy shall be forgiven unto men; but the blasphemy against the Spirit shall not be forgiven unto men. And whoso speaketh a word against the Son of man, it shall be forgiven him; but whosoever speaketh against the Holy Ghost, it shall not be forgiven him, neither in this age, nor in the coming age.'

"These words so far from proving the orthodox doctrine, that sin not forgiven here can never be forgiven, distinctly assert,—first, that all manner of sin and blasphemy shall be forgiven unto men; secondly, that some sins, those namely against the Son of man, can be forgiven, apparently, in this age; and, thirdly, that other sins, against the Holy Ghost, cannot be forgiven either here or in the coming age; which last words imply that some sins not here forgiven may be forgiven in the coming age, the sin or blasphemy against the Holy Ghost not being of this number. This is what the text asserts: and it explains why God has long withheld the general outpouring of His promised Spirit; for man can not reject or speak against the Spirit, until the Spirit comes to act upon him. God has two ways of teaching men; first by his Word, the letter or human form of truth, that is, the Son of man, in which case a man may reject God's call without knowing that he is really doing so; the other, in and by the Spirit, which convinces the heart, which therefore cannot be opposed without leaving men consciously guilty of rejecting God. To reject this last cuts man off from the light and life of the coming world. This sin, therefore, is not forgiven, 'neither in this age, nor in the coming one.' But the text says nothing of those 'ages to come' (Eph. ii. 7), elsewhere revealed to us; much less does it assert that the punishment of sin not here forgiven is never-ending.

"When, therefore, we remember how our Lord has taught us to forgive, 'not until seven times, but until seventy times seven' (Matt. xviii. 22); and when we see the length and breadth of this commandment, that it is bidding us forgive as God forgives, not only till seven times seven, that is the 'seven times seven years,' which make the Jubilee, (Lev. xxv. 8), but 'unto seventy times seven,' that is a decade of Jubilees, the mystic 'seventy weeks,' which 'are determined to finish the transgression, and to make an end of sins, and to make reconciliation for iniquity, and to bring in everlasting righteousness, and to seal up the vision and prophecy, and to anoint the Most Holy' (Dan. ix. 24); words which surely have had an inceptive fulfilment in the first coming of our Lord, but which, like so many other prophecies of His coming and kingdom, wait until another coming and another age for a yet more glorious accomplishment; when we remember that this is the forgiveness which God approves, we may be pardoned for believing that the threatening, 'It shall not be forgiven, neither in this age, nor in the coming one,' does not measure or exhaust the possibilities of God's forgiveness. 'I believe' indeed 'in the Holy Catholic Church, the resurrection of the body, and the life everlasting;' but I also 'believe the forgiveness of sins,' even to the end, as long as God is a Saviour and there is any sin to need forgiveness."

REMARKS BY EDITOR OF THE EXAMINER.

As I said, in my introductory remarks, this argument of JUKES's is the best I have ever seen in favor of the idea that the sin against the Holy Ghost, though never to be forgiven in this age nor in the one to come, may nevertheless be forgiven in some of "the endless succession of ages"

(Eph. iii. 7, and iii. 21): yet, he has not established the fact that it will be. Observe, the Saviour does not command to forgive except repentance is manifested. He said: "If thy brother trespass against thee, rebuke him; and if he repent, forgive him; and if he trespass against thee seven times in a day, and seven times in a day turn again to thee saying, I repent; thou shalt forgive him" (Luke xvii. 3, 4). This fact connected with forgiveness Mr. JUKES has not noticed.

The apostle informs us that men may commit such a sin that it is "impossible to renew them again to repentance;" and that sin is committed by persons who "were made partakers of the Holy Ghost" (Heb. vi. 4-8). How, then, are such persons ever to be forgiven, seeing their repentance is impossible?

Mr. JUKES says, "The text says nothing of those 'ages to come,' . . . much less does it assert that the punishment of sin not here forgiven is never-ending." But it does "assert" that the person thus sinning "is in danger of eternal condemnation" (Mark iii. 29); which is certainly equivalent to saying, though their ultimate salvation may not be absolutely impossible, there is danger of its becoming so, and hence it cannot be said, in truth, that universal restoration, or the final salvation of every soul of Adam's race is a revealed fact; for, there is at least one sin the forgiveness of which we have no warrant to say will ever be forgiven; and the person who commits it is "in danger of eternal condemnation;" and if so, "the punishment" will be "never-ending," whatever the punishment may be, whether degradation, torment, or a ceasing to exist.

Well did the apostle exhort, "Grieve not the Holy Spirit of God."—"Quench not the Spirit." It is only by the Spirit of God we can rise out of our animal nature into a spiritual nature; hence, if grieved, quenched, blasphemed against in its work, the person is in danger of being eternally condemned, or hopelessly lost. Let all, therefore, take heed to the apostolic injunction and the Saviour's warning. Be watchful, lest at any time we commit the sin spoken of. Those who are sincerely desirous to honor and please God, and cleave to the Saviour, will be preserved from such a sin and from its awful consequences.

THE SAINTS' INHERITANCE.

THE apostle says, "Eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, neither hath it entered into the heart of man, the things God hath prepared for them that love Him: but God hath revealed them unto us by His Spirit" (1 Cor. ii. 9, 10). The things so mysteriously hidden from the natural mind, are, nevertheless, "revealed" by the "Spirit" in the prophecies of the Scriptures; still, our minds, as believers, are not always in that advanced state that enables us to receive the indwelling Spirit, so as through its teachings to receive and accept the teachings of Divine revelation on questions of much interest. Jesus said to his disciples, just before he went away, "I have yet many things to say unto you, but ye cannot bear them now" (John xvi. 12). Moses wished to see God's glory; but he was answered, "Thou canst not see my face: for there shall no man see me and live: . . . thou shalt see my back parts; but my face shall not be seen" (Exo. xxxiii. 18-23).

In our present state, faith is the test of our love to God, and is that by which we are and shall be justified, and for unbelief be condemned. The promises and oath of God are the basis on which faith is built. Faith trusts God to do all He has said, and embraces the idea that "He is able to do exceeding abundantly above all that we ask or think" (Eph. iii. 21). True, "we now see through a glass darkly" (1 Cor. xiii. 12); but in due time, after we have walked by faith, we shall see all things clearly. If we could now see all that we wish to know, it is doubtful if we could "live" any more than Moses could had his prayer to see God's glory been answered.

The beloved disciple—John—had such a sight of his glorified Redeemer, on the Isle of Patmos, that he "fell at His feet as one dead" (Rev. i. 17).

While the Scriptures give us sufficient light to show us there are inexhaustible treasures of joy in reserve for those who love God, and embrace His Son as their LIFE-GIVEN, the "far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory" (2 Cor. iv. 17) is kept under a veil till we are matured and ripe to enter into it.

That the earth is the inheritance of the saints is clearly revealed to faith. "Blessed are the meek, for they shall inherit the earth" (Matt. v. 5, and Psa. xxxvii. 11). It is to be their eternal possession: "The righteous shall never be removed: but the wicked shall not inhabit the earth" (Prov. x. 30). The kingdom of God is to succeed the "wild beast" governments of men, and supersede them all, and "shall never be destroyed" (Dan. vii. 14-18); "it shall stand forever" (Dan. ii. 44). The saints—Christ's tried and faithful servants—are “to possess” it “for ever and ever” (Dan. vii. 18). Christ’s “dominion shall be from sea to sea, and from the river to the ends of the earth” (Psa. lxxii. 8). “The Lord God shall give unto Him the throne of his father David; and he shall reign over the house of Jacob forever; and of His kingdom there shall be no end” (Luke i. 32, 33).

I might extend these remarks to any length, but these must suffice for this time, and I trust some will find food for thought in them. Ed.

THE IMPORTANCE OF TRUE FAITH

“Without faith it is impossible to please God: for he that cometh to God must believe that He is, and that He is the rewarder of them that diligently seek Him.”—Heb. xi. 6.

The chapter from which this text is selected gives us the character of faith and its power. It is impossible to exercise faith without evidence. Persons may have what they call faith, without evidence, but it lacks the character of true belief: it is only fancy or imagination. The evidence of the existence of a God is such that the most ignorant of our race, except the idiotic, accept it as a fact undeniable that there is such an existence or power above themselves. It is only “the fool that saith in his heart, There is no God” (Psa. xiv. 1). Such denial shows the person destitute of a common understanding; or, in other words, is a “fool;” not capable of perceiving truth when presented to him. The faculty that perceives there is a God is essential to the knowledge of the true God; and all men who possess this faculty are destined to have that knowledge imparted to them “in due time:” i. e., in God’s own time; and until that is given them, their actual trial for an endless life does not commence. The actual sin of man is, that, “when they know God, they glorify Him not as God” (Rom. i. 21): they do not accept Him as the object of their highest love and confidence, and yield implicit obedience to Him.

Until the true God is made known to man, God “overlooks” that which is sin, in itself, so that it does not fix the final state of the individual, though it may involve him in great and sore afflictions and cut short his present life. “The only true God” has his own time for making Himself known to the children of men. He does not do it, to all, at once nor at one time. The development has always been gradual, both as to time and to people. Some are chosen or selected to receive this knowledge sooner than others, but this selection is designed for the benefit of others; and “in due time” they are to bless “all the families of the earth;” those who had not the opportunity previously to know God. Thus God makes “the few” the instruments to bless the many in His own time; and this is all ordered in infinite wisdom and love to ultimately bind the whole race together as one band of brothers, each having the same interest in the welfare of the others that he has in his own; thus filling the earth with peace and love, exhibiting God as he is, viz, “Love,” for “God is Love” (1 John iv. 8, 19). Then truly, will “the whole earth be full of His glory” (Num. xiv. 21, Isa. xi. 9, Hab. ii. 15).

FAITH “in the only true God, and in Jesus Christ,” is ESSENTIAL to a final salvation, or redemption from sin and death; and, consequently, the knowledge of God and his Son must and will be made manifest to every soul of the race of Adam, as Jesus has “given himself a ransom for all, to be testified in due time” (1 Tim. ii. 6). “Without faith it is impossible to please God;” and without knowledge it is impossible to have faith; and this is the order God himself has established. This order is as old as the creation of man, and runs through every dispensation in the Divine government of the world; and upon the exercise of faith depends the final state of all the human family. Without knowledge faith cannot exist, and neither can unbelief; and the only sin that the Gospel knows, as bringing a final condemnation, is unbelief: “He that believeth not shall be condemned.” Every son and daughter of Adam, therefore, must and will have made known to them the only true God and Jesus Christ; before their state is unalterably fixed in endless life, or in an irrevocable death. They must come to God, in Jesus Christ, believing that He is (that He exists as the only true God), and that He is the rewarder of them that seek Him. This all implies an opportunity in this age or some of “the ages to come” to possess the requisite knowledge needful to the exercise of the faith that brings the approbation of God, or that pleases Him.

The testimony of God concerning himself and his Son, Jesus Christ, is what is to be believed; and such faith unwaveringly holds on to the testimony of God and his promise, that He will fulfill all His words; no matter how impossible the fulfilment may seem to human minds; for, it accepts the fact, that “What God has promised he is able to perform”—and that “Nothing is too hard for God;” so that if He commands to offer up a son for a burnt offering, whom He had promised should be the medium of blessing the world, dark and mysterious as the command may appear, faith counts that "God is able to raise that Son from the dead," and He will do it sooner than His promise shall fail. This faith we see exemplified in Abraham when called to offer up Isaac.

Such is the faith that honors God and trusts His word, nothing doubting that He will fulfil every word He has uttered. This is the "faith of assurance;" and, where it exists, is pleasing to God. It is that faith which we must exercise to have the "testimony that God is pleased with us" as He was with "Enoch, before his translation" (Heb. xi. 5). It will be well for us all, who are looking for Jesus's return from heaven, and a possible translation, then to have the testimony that Enoch had, "that he pleased God." To be destitute of it may prove a great disaster to us, however much we may speak of our desire for "the appearing" of Christ. Is our desire born of love to God, and an earnest wish that His name should be "hallowed," honored, revered, adored, loved, and obeyed; and that Christ should be manifested as the "Saviour of the world" for whom He died, and that the evidence of that love of God and his Christ should be made known to every man—to all men for whom "He gave himself a ransom:" or, is our desire a selfish one; based on the idea of self-aggrandisement, and a mere wish to be delivered from the trials incident to the present state, regardless of what becomes of our fellow-creatures who have never had our privileges and advantages to know the only "true God and Jesus Christ, whom God sent to be the Saviour of the world?"

It is important that we have the testimony that we "please God" in these matters; and until we have that witness in ourselves that our desire for the second advent of Christ is not mainly from selfish motives, it will promote our acceptability with God to improve our waiting time by seeking a Christ-like spirit, in loving our whole race, for which Christ gave himself for their redemption; and earnest efforts to bring the true knowledge of God and his dear Son to our fellowmen, and heed the Apostle's language thus expressed: "I exhort therefore that, first of all applications, prayers, intercession, and giving of thanks, be made for all men; . . . for, this is good and acceptable in the sight of God our Saviour; who will have all men to be saved, and come to the knowledge of the truth. For there is one God, and one mediator between God and men, the man Christ Jesus; who gave himself a ransom for all, to be testified in due time."

I conclude these remarks by enforcing the Apostolic exhortation, that we, "first of all," should bring all men, everywhere—our whole race—before God for his blessing; and thus be pleasing to God, believing that "He is" the "God of the spirits of all flesh" (Num. xxvii. 16); and that, as such, He will give to all, the means of knowing Him and his Son, and an opportunity for improving those means to obtain an endless life, and "that He, is the rewarder of them that diligently seek Him" when those means and that opportunity is bestowed on them. Let us in prayer bring all men, as well as ourselves, to the throne of God's grace, and plead for them all as Christ gave himself a ransom for them all. Thus shall we have the witness in ourselves that our heart is in sympathy and union with Christ, and we are prepared to dwell with Him when He shall return from heaven. Ed.

JUDGMENT.—The term "judgment," as applied to God's government of the world, does not always, if ever, apply to what is usually termed a "day of judgment" in which man's final destiny is unalterably fixed. It often relates to rule, discipline, establishing equity, justice, etc.; by which order, righteousness, and peace are promoted. The principles on which this judgment is conducted are beautifully set forth in the following language: "A bruised reed shall he not break, and the smoking flax shall he not quench: he shall bring forth judgment unto truth. He shall not fail nor be discouraged, till he have set judgment in the earth; and the isles shall wait for his law" (Isa. xlii. 3, 4).

Here is no appearance of the common notion of "the day of judgment." It is the establishment of a righteous government in which truth shall become universal; and where the element of truth exists in the heart, however feeble it may be, it shall, under the perfect government of Christ, be brought forth unto perfection, though it had been, at the establishment of His reign, like a bruised reed, or as the smoking flax, both giving only a feeble sign of life, and apparently ready to be destroyed. Yet under the work of Christ, in setting "judgment in the earth," such weak and feeble tokens of the existence of the love of truth, "He shall bring forth judgment unto truth;" the bruised reed shall become strong, and the smoking flax shall burst forth into an illuminating flame.

"He shall bring forth judgment unto the Gentiles." That judgment, or rule, will bring such to the knowledge of the truth as never have had it previously; and "He shall not fail nor be discouraged till" it is done, and "judgment" (righteousness and truth) is "set in the earth."

THE STUDY OF THE BIBLE.

CHAPTER XVIII.

On Typical and Allegorical Interpretations.

"O how unlike the complex works of man
Heaven's easy, artless, unencumbered plan!
No meretricious graces to beguile;
No clustering ornaments to clog the pile;
From ostentation as from weakness free
It stands, like the cerulean arch we see,
Majestic in its own simplicity."

COWPER.

Few thoughtful readers of Scripture will dispute that events in the earlier dispensation sometimes foreshadow other events in the later. As readily will it be allowed, that illustrations are not unfrequently drawn from the Old Testament by the writers of the New in which persons there are regarded as prefiguring other and later personages. Our Lord himself in this way illustrates his burial and resurrection by the history of Jonah (Matt. xii. 40), and His lifting up on the cross by that of the brazen serpent (John iii. 14). Again, He is said to be "a High Priest after the order of Melchisedek" (Heb. vii.); while the preservation of Noah and his family in the ark seems, by the Apostle Peter, to be regarded as symbolical of the preservation of the elect (1 Pet. iii. 20). Nothing, however, is built on these resemblances. They illustrate later truth, but cannot, on that account strictly speaking, be termed types; since there is nothing to show that either the events or persons referred to were designed to be such, and that therefore they should be regarded as "actual prophecies" of things to come.

In answering the question, "What rule should be adopted in deciding whether a passage or a person is or is not typical?" we believe that none safer or better can be laid down than that which is advocated by Bp. Marsh. It is this: "There is no other rule by which we can distinguish a real from a pretended type than that of Scripture itself. There are no other possible means by which we can know that a previous design and a pre-ordained connection existed. Whatever persons or things, therefore, recorded in the Old Testament were expressly declared by Christ and His Apostles to have been designed as prefigurations of persons or things relating to the New Testament, such persons or things, so recorded in the former, are types of the persons or things with which they are compared in the latter.

"But if we assert that a person or thing was designed to prefigure another person or thing, where no such prefiguration has been declared by Divine authority, we make an assertion for which we neither have nor can have the slightest foundation." In short, to borrow the words of Professor Moses Stuart, "just so much of the Old Testament is to be accounted typical as the New Testament affirms to be so, and no more." This takes the whole question out of the hands of fanciful expositors, and enables the most unlettered reader to decide what is typical and what is not.

Dr. Davidson, in his "Introduction," a little modifies this view; but the result is not, after all, very different. He says, "Various places in the New Testament intimate or expressly assert that most of the institutions peculiar to the old pre-figured spiritual things under the new economy. The Epistle to the Hebrews plainly shows that the entire Levitical law with its sacrifices, rites, and priests, foreshadowed better things (Comp. x. 1; vii. 11—22; viii. 1—13; ix. 1; x. 18). The same view is given by Paul in the Epistle to the Colossians (ii. 17). The Epistle to the Galatians has it also (iii. 24). But inasmuch as the various parts of these institutions are nowhere placed side by side with spiritual correlatives, it is obviously unsafe for us to do more than to receive generally that which it has not pleased God to explain in detail. So far as these types have a prophetic character, they are clear enough for practical purposes; but, like other prophecies, they are not to be interpreted minutely, according to the fancy of the expositor." If these principles had always been adhered to, from what a load of overshadowing error would Scripture have been delivered. For what is a man to make of his Bible who is told by one, that Moses, in "forty particulars," typifies Christ; by another, that every passage in the Old Testament looks backward, and forward, and every way, like light from the sun, not only to the state before and under the Law, but under the Gospel too; by a third, that there are forty-nine typical resemblances between Joseph and Christ, and seventeen between Jacob and Christ,—his worst actions being regarded equally symbolical with the best.

Nor should it be forgotten (for it is a solemn warning), that on this use of the supposed types and figures of the Old Testament the Roman Catholic Church builds most of her tenets.

All this folly, for it cannot properly be designated, by any other name, rests on the notion that Truth instead of being simply revealed in the Bible, is to be developed out of it by human ingenuity; that underneath its direct teachings lie intimations which may justly be made the basis of new discoveries; and that depths of meaning are to be found in the plainest statements, if only the investigator be spiritual enough to discern them.

Let this doctrine once be allowed, and nothing can be clearer than that, under its operation, the Word of God is turned into an enigma, and Truth lies prostrate at the mercy of the fanciful, the ingenious, and the weak. "Under such methods," it has been well said, "we may shut our lexicons, and draw lots for the sense."

Intimately connected with this abuse of Scripture, and equally foolish and dangerous, is the attempt to attach more than one meaning to any passage of Holy Writ, whatever variety of applications it may admit of.

The Fathers, as we have already said, are untrustworthy as expositors, mainly on account of the vicious habit into which they fell, of multiplying meanings in Scripture. Some held to a fourfold, some to a threefold, and others to a twofold sense in the Sacred Text. Origen is supposed to have maintained a twofold sense, and a fourfold application, of all Scripture. Others denied a literal sense altogether; and most of them imagined that such a sense was far too meagre to be worthy of God, and that the literal meaning was merely intended to be the vehicle of higher and more ethereal teaching. The Bible by this means was made, in their hands, "to reflect every hue of fancy, and every shade of belief, in those who assumed the office of interpretation;" and the result was, that instead of being rendered serviceable for practical instruction, it soon became "one vast sea of uncertainty and confusion."

The school in question is not yet extinct. Many still regard this fanciful mode of dealing with Scripture as eminently spiritual; some by its help developing out of the prophecies the most extraordinary conclusions concerning passing events; and others, holding a different view, explaining away, by a like process, the plainest declarations of the Word of God relative to the Second Advent of Christ, and the character of the dispensation under which we live. The death of Abel, we are still told, prefigures the sacrifice of Christ; "Enoch is a figure of the Church (of the latter day), which shall be taken away before human evil reaches its climax, and before the Divine judgment falls thereon;" while "Noah, on the other hand, is a figure of the remnant of Israel, who shall be brought through the deep waters of affliction, and through the fire of judgment, and led into the full enjoyment of millennial bliss, in virtue of God's everlasting covenant."

The building of Babel indicates "the spirit in which associations are now formed for purposes of philanthropy, religion, or politics." Sodom and Gomorrah represent the world as distinguished from the little flock; and Rebekah leaving her Father's house to marry Isaac, is called "a most touching and beautiful illustration of the Church, under the conduct of the Holy Ghost, going onward to meet her heavenly Bridegroom."

We pause here; and in doing so are anxious to avoid misconception. We are far from denying that the Scripture narratives of the Old Testament are intended to teach us very important spiritual lessons; and we will yield to no one in reverence for these Divine oracles. It is because we reverence them so highly, that we remonstrate against this mischievous habit of "adding to" them that which is purely human and largely erroneous.

We feel most deeply that in all ages the Church has been far too apt to forget that this is not her home; that her children are but pilgrims and strangers here, as all their fathers were; and that with most of the ambitions of earth the Christian should have nothing to do. But when we are told in effect, that progress in science is sin; that "a Christian asserting his rights" with his fellow-man is not "perfect as his Father, for his Father is dealing in grace, whereas he is dealing in righteousness," that all the concerns of the world, even its government and magistracy, are to be abandoned to the ungodly, we cannot but protest most earnestly against what we consider to be unscriptural perversions of God's Holy Word.

We conclude by laying down the following rule:—He who would understand his Bible must be content to regard as typical or allegorical such portions of Scripture only as are declared to be such on Inspired authority; he must be satisfied with the one plain and paramount meaning which manifests itself to the simple-minded in connection with the context; and disregarding all human fancies, however spiritual the teacher of such imaginations may be supposed to be, he must determine, at all hazards, to take the Book just as it stands; to accept it in the spirit of a little child; to confess that he has before him but fragments of a truth that is, in its entirety, infinite; and be content to wait for the day when that which now often seems to us to be "torn into a thousand pieces, and scattered to the four winds of heaven," shall be gathered limb to limb, and "moulded with every joint and member into an immortal feature of loveliness and perfection."

CHAPTER XIX.

On Technical Terms in Scripture.

EVERY science, and Theology among the rest, has its technical terms.

With these, so far as they are merely Theological, and not Scriptural, we do not intermeddle. We propose to notice such only as occur in our Authorized Version, and which derive a coloring in the eyes of ordinary readers, from their technical use in theological discussions.

We fully admit that many of these terms cannot be dispensed with; that such words as Regeneration, Conversion, Atonement Election, Covenant, Law, Grace, Salvation, Justification, and Sanctification, are not to be set aside because they have often been used without discrimination, or been sometimes regarded as offensive to men of taste. Yet is it of great importance that these phrases should be Scripturally understood; that they should not be expounded in accordance with merely theological associations; but always in accordance with the sense they were intended to bear in the particular passage wherein they may occur. Most of them are used in different places, in different senses; and if this fact be not recognized, nothing but confusion of thought can ensue. e. g.—

REGENERATION in its ordinary acceptation amongst us, is intended, and rightly, to express that moral change that is elsewhere denominated being "born again"—born, "not of blood, nor of the will of the flesh, nor of the will of man, but of God" (John i. 13). Yet it is indisputable that in the only two places in which this particular word occurs in the English Version of the New Testament, it does not mean anything of the kind. In one instance (Tit. iii. 5), it is used in the sense of a change of profession by baptism; in the other (Matt. xix. 28), it is employed in the sense of Resurrection,—“when the Son of man shall sit in the throne of His glory.”

CONVERSION is sometimes used to express an entire and radical change of conduct, following renewal of heart; and sometimes to indicate return from a temporary course of wrong doing. It is used in the former sense in the Acts (xv. 3) where Paul speaks of the conversion of the Gentiles: it is used in the latter sense by our Lord, when He says to Peter, “When thou art converted, strengthen thy brethren” (Luke xxii. 32).

ATONEMENT is a word which occurs but once in our version of the New Testament (Rom. v. 11), and there it is mistranslated, since it ought to have been rendered “Reconciliation.” As it stands, it conveys the idea of substitution by sac- rifice, a truth which, whether taught or not in Scripture, is not expressed in the passage in question.

ELECTION is a term ordinarily understood as implying the selection by God from eternity of certain persons to be saved from hell, and made holy in Christ; the rest of mankind being left to that natural weakness and perversity which is their sin, and which will inevitably involve them in eternal misery. Into this view, regarded as a doctrine we cannot here enter; but it is right to observe, that in the New Testament the word is frequently, if not ordinarily, used in relation to service.

In this sense it is applied to Christ (Matt. xii. 18; 1 Pet. ii. 6); to angels (1 Tim. v. 21); to the Apostles (John xv. 16—19); and to Christians generally (1 Pet. ii. 9). In the Old Testament it is so used with regard to Christ (Isa. xlii. 1); and to David (2 Sam. vi. 21; Psa. lxxviii. 70).

GRACE sometimes stands for “the free and eternal love and favor of God, which is the spring and source of all the benefits we receive from Him” (Rom. xi. 6; 2 Tim. i. 9; John iii. 16). Sometimes for the work of the Spirit renewing the soul (Rom. vi. 14; 2 Cor. xii. 9). Sometimes for the Divine favor, as manifested in reconciliation (Rom. v. 2), in the love of Christ (2 Cor. viii. 9), and in the Gospel generally (1 Peter v. 12). Sometimes it is put for the virtues wrought, by the Spirit of God in the heart of a renewed man (2 Cor. viii. 7; 2 Pet. iii. 18). And sometimes it merely means the favor or friendship of a fellow-mortal (Gen. xxxix. 4). In each of these cases the context, and that alone, decides the meaning.

COVENANT, though always implying “an agreement,” is a word that is applied in the Bible in various ways. There is the Covenant of Works (Gen. ii. 17), and there is the Covenant of Grace (Ephes. i. 3—4; 2 Tim. i. 8). There is the Covenant of which Circumcision was the seal, and with which the rites and ceremonies of the Jewish economy were inseparably connected; and there is the New Covenant (Heb. viii. 6—8), which brings freedom from the burdensome ritual resting on the Jew. The importance of keeping these distinctions clearly in mind becomes obvious when we read what St. Paul says in relation to Law.

LAW, in Scripture, certainly does not always mean the same thing. Sometimes it stands for conscience, or the Law of Nature (Rom. ii. 14); sometimes for the Moral Law, as embodied in the Ten Commandments (Rom. ii. 25; vii. 7); and sometimes for the Ceremonial Law of the Jews (Gal. iii. 11; Phil. iii. 5; Heb. vii. 19). It is in this latter sense alone that St. Paul uses it whenever he speaks of the impossibility of Justification by the Law. He does not, of course, mean to imply that man can stand before God, justified by works, in any sense; but his argument always relates to the Ceremonial Law. He would have been the last man to maintain that at any period of his life he was morally blameless; although he insists that ceremonially he was without fault (Phil. iii. 6). It is this Law of Ordinances alone that Christ has abolished (Ephes. ii. 15).

Luther, with great power and wisdom, used the doctrine of Justification by Faith alone, as his most trusty weapon in contending against indulgences, pardons, masses for the dead, and such like superstitions. Wesley and Whitefield urged it in England as against formal observances, whether in the shape of prayers, church going, sacraments, or almsgiving. In the present day it is too often presented as if it were the antagonist of good works; whereas, in Scripture, faith and works are always regarded as inseparable. It was probably to meet some such tendency, that the Apostle James wrote his Epistle (Jas. ii. 14—26).

HEAVEN. This word occurs about two hundred and eighty times in the New Testament only. In ten it is translated "air"—the fowls of the air—(Luke viii. 5); in five it is rendered "sky" (Luke xii. 56); in eighty-six it is put for the visible firmament (Mark xiii. 25); in eighty-three it indicates the peculiar residence of God and of the Holy Angels (Acts vii. 49); in thirty-three it is associated with the kingdom of the Redeemer (Matt. iii. 2); and in the Apocalypse it is commonly put for the world of separate spirits, or Hades. It is impossible to understand Scripture if these distinctions are not borne in mind.

HELL (Sheol) invariably stands in the Old Testament, either for the grave, or for the invisible world of spirits.

In the New Testament, several distinct words, widely different in meaning, are alike translated HELL; a practice which necessarily leads to a good deal of confusion in the mind of the English reader. Hades is thus always translated HELL, although it never means the place of final punishment. Gehenna, which probably has that meaning, occurs twelve times. It is not possible here to note the distinct meaning in each case. The attention of an intelligent reader should, however, be directed to this misleading diversity.

MERCY is a word which, in most cases, ought to be rendered favor, since it by no means implies the clemency of a judge sparing a criminal, but rather the bestowal of kindness.

WRATH, in like manner, when attributed to

God, is by most persons connected with Eternal Punishment, although without warrant. It simply signifies displeasure, and is in the Prophets applied to different degrees of punishment, whether inflicted or threatened. Isaiah speaks of "a little wrath" (liv. 8). Jeremiah of "great wrath" (xxxii. 37). In the New Testament it is applied to the destruction of Jerusalem (Luke xxi. 22, 23).

SALVATION, although now commonly used by us to signify deliverance from Hell, by no means generally, or as a rule, bears that interpretation in Scripture. For although it be quite true that Christ saves us "from wrath" (Rom. v. 9), it is in a still higher sense true that He delivers us from the slavery of sin. A careful examination of passages, such as Matt. i. 21; Acts iii. 26; Rom. i. 16; Phil. ii. 12; Ephes. i. 13; v. 23; vi. 17, and many others, will satisfy a thoughtful person that, as a rule, the word "Salvation" is, in the New Testament, associated, not so much with any future blessing, as with a present deliverance from the bondage of moral evil.

SANCTIFICATION is the last term of this class to which we shall refer. It some times signifies separation for holy or religious uses (Gen. ii. 3; Exod. xiii. 2); and sometimes the actual cleansing of the soul (1 Cor. vi. 11). It is sometimes applied to God when His judgments are made known (Numb. xx. 13; Ezek. xxxvi. 23); and sometimes to Messiah as the King and Head of the Church (John x. 36). But its ordinary meaning is actual purification; whether ceremonial, as in the case of the Jews, or moral and spiritual, as in the case of the Christian (Exod. xix. 10—22; Josh. iii. 5; Lev. x. 3; 1 Cor. vi. 11).

CHAPTER XX.

On the Use of Ecclesiastical Terms in Scripture.

In the chapter immediately preceding this we have only referred to technical terms which are so in the original, and not made such by any particular translation of them. We must now notice a class of words which sometimes mislead in consequence of their mistranslation.

The translators of the Bible into the present Authorized Version—laborious men, and worthy of all honor,—were not altogether free agents in the work they undertook. King James expressly commanded them not to change "the old ecclesiastical words;" and in their Preface to the large Bible they tell us they have regarded the admonition. It will be necessary, therefore, to refer to certain instances in which it will be seen that adherence to the Royal Mandate has darkened the sense of the original.

EASTER (Acts xii. 4) : "Intending after Easter to bring him forth to the people." The word "Easter" should unquestionably have been translated "Feast" or "Passover." It occurs twenty-nine times, and is so translated everywhere else. The text plainly means that Herod would not bring forth Peter until after the Passover,—including the days of unleavened bread (John xviii. 28).

BISHOP (1 Tim. iii. 2; Titus i. 7). The word here translated "bishop" (Επισκοπος) should have been rendered "inspector" or "overseer;" since it has no special reference to what we understand by a diocesan prelate. The phrase indicates "an office;" probably in some respects corresponding to a modern bishopric, but in other respects very different. Επισκοπος is in one instance (Acts xx. 28) translated "overseer," and it would have been much better had it always been so rendered.

CHURCH (εκκλησια) is a word which three times stands for a mere assembly of persons (e. g., Acts xix. 32—40, where the word ecclesia is so rendered); once for the body of the Israelites in the wilderness (Acts vii. 38), where Moses is spoken of as he "that was in the Church in the wilderness;" Αίτην times it indicates a particular society of Christians, meeting either in one place or in different parts of a town or city (e. g., Acts xi. 22; 1 Cor. xvi. 19). Ordinarily (about eighty-five times) it denotes the entire body of professing Christians dwelling in any given city or district,—in Judea, or among the Gentiles (e. g., Acts ix. 31; Rom. xvi. 4; 1 Cor. vii. 17). In all these cases the Church is regarded as an outward or visible thing. Ten times it is used to indicate true and spiritual members, as distinguished from the hypocritical or self-deceived (e. g., Ephes i. 1—3; Col. i. 18—24); and in all these cases it is regarded as an invisible society.

MINISTER (διακονος). This word occurs thirty times in the New Testament, and is sometimes translated "minister" (Matt. xx. 26); sometimes "deacon" (1 Tim. iii. 8); and sometimes "servant" (Mark ix. 35). It is the word used to indicate the "servants" that waited at the marriage feast (John ii. 5 and 9); it is applied to magistrates (Rom. xiii. 4); and to womanly service in the case of Phoebe of Cenchrea (Rom. xvi. 1). As it is so plain that the word simply expresses "service" and that it is so used by Paul when applied either to apostles or elders (1 Cor. iii. 5; 2; 2 Cor. iii. 6), it certainly is a great pity that it should have come to be associated exclusively with preachers of the gospel.

DEACON, (διακονος), falls under the same head. There is in the New Testament no office so called, which corresponds either to the "deacon" of the Episcopal church, or to that of the Congregationalists. The word simply means "service." So far as the authority of Scripture is concerned, a minister may be called a deacon, or a deacon a minister, or a Christian visitor one or both, without any violation of its teaching. Martha was a deacon to Christ when cumbered with much serving; and Paul when he went to Jerusalem to minister to the saints (Rom. xv. 25), although the money was actually distributed by their own elders (Acts xi. 30).

Among Congregationalists, the office of the deacon is generally traced to the transaction recorded in the sixth chapter of the Acts, where the Church at Jerusalem, by the advice of the twelve apostles is said to have selected seven men, "full of the Holy Ghost and wisdom," to superintend the service of tables, and to silence the murmurings of those who thought that certain widows "were neglected in the daily ministrations."

It should, however, be recollected that these persons were not chosen to a permanent office, but to meet a present necessity; for the word rendered "business" ought to have been translated "need," or "necessity." It occurs forty times in the New Testament, and is so rendered everywhere else.

Further, the persons thus selected are nowhere called deacons. That no such permanent office existed is rendered at least probable by the fact that the money raised by the disciples at Antioch for the poor was sent to the "elders" at Jerusalem (Acts xi. 30).

But it will be said, "Why, then, are deacons, as such, required to possess certain moral qualities (1 Tim. iii. 8)? and what is meant by the phrase, 'They that have used the office of a deacon well'?" (1 Tim. iii. 13)?

We reply,—The demand of the apostle for certain moral qualifications applies, and is intended to apply, not to any office in particular, but to service for the Church, of whatever kind. "They that have used the office of a deacon well," should be read, "They that have diaconized, or performed service (of any kind) well (margin, ministered), purchase to themselves a good degree."

The office of "deacon," as now recognized either in Episcopal or Congregational churches, may be very useful and honorable, as it undoubtedly is, but it can derive no authority in either case from Scripture, since the word so translated ought simply to have been rendered "service."

ΠΡΑΧΗ. Some may perhaps be startled when told that the word "preach" has no reference whatever to any particular mode of telling the glad tidings of salvation; but it is nevertheless true.

The word evangelizo literally means to announce glad tidings, and simply relates to the first information that is given to a person or people on that subject; that is, when the subject may properly be called news. As to the manner of giving such information, the same word may not improperly be used, in whatever way the thing be notified; publicly or privately, aloud or in a whisper, to one or to many.

The English word "preach" fails to communicate the idea given us in the New Testament; because with us it implies "a public and continued discourse," which is by no means the sense conveyed to us in Scripture.

In like manner the word kerusso, used in the Epistle to the Romans (x. 14), "How shall they hear without a preacher?" does not mean "one who pronounces a public discourse on sacred subjects," but simply "a herald publishing tidings; his message may be only a single sentence, and a very short sentence too; and though it certainly implies public notice, accompanied by warning to do or to forbear something, it never denotes either a comment on, or explanation of any doctrine, critical observations on, or illustrations of any subject, or a chain of reasoning in proof of a particular sentiment." In short, it never means what we understand by preaching.

The supposition that the gospel is to be promoted only or mainly by clergymen or ministers, and by didactic teaching, whether in sermons, tracts, or exhortations, public or private, is an error which has led, in many cases, to forgetfulness of individual responsibility altogether.

We have probably now said enough to put the reader of Scripture on his guard in relation to the use and authority of ecclesiastical terms.

AN OLD BOOK AND THE NEW JERUSALEM.

WHILE in Philadelphia, in December last, a friend loaned me an old book, containing twenty-two sermons on the prophecies. The title page is gone; so there is no clue to the author, nor the time when published, except in one sermon, speaking of a certain event, he says it occurred "in the last year (1806)." Thus it seems the sermon was written in 1807, or near seventy years ago. It seems, also, from some expressions, the author was a New England man. He was evidently a man of much study and thought—large knowledge of the Bible and history. He held to the literal understanding of the Bible,—to the literal and personal reign of Christ upon this earth during the thousand years of Rev. xx., and the rebuilding of the Temple at Jerusalem, as described in the last chapters of Ezekiel; and that after that thousand years, and the judgment that follows, the earth will be melted by fire and all the wicked then be literally burned up; then the earth renewed,—"all things made new,"—and the New Jerusalem, which he maintains is now in existence, will come down on the renewed earth and remain eternally. A large extract from the Sermon on this last topic I give the readers of this Magazine, which, no doubt, will interest many. He speaks as follows:

THIS NEW JERUSALEM, called the tabernacle of God, is to come down from heaven after the earth is new. It is plain that this city will be moved, by the name given it; the tabernacle, which means a moveable building,

That this city, which is now built, will come down from heaven, to the new earth, all prepared to dwell in, is as certain as it is that a bride is adorned for her husband, and no other. "Him that overcometh will I make a pillar in the temple of my God, and he shall go no more out; and I will write upon him the name of my God, and the name of the city of my God, which is New Jerusalem, which cometh down from God" (Rev. iii. 12).

In this verse Jesus mentions the New Jerusalem as the city of his God, and says it cometh down from heaven from his God. When we read that an angel came down from heaven, we suppose it was true. When we read that Christ shall come down from heaven, it means that he will stand at the latter day on the earth. When we are told that the new Jerusalem cometh down from heaven, we have the same reason to believe it will ere long come down, as we have to believe Christ will come down from heaven hereafter. Christ spake of its coming down from heaven; but John had a vision of it descending to the new earth. "And I John saw the holy city, New Jerusalem, coming down from God out of heaven, prepared as a bride adorned for her husband" (Rev. xxi. 2, 10).

What can be more evident than this, that this city will descend from heaven to earth where men will enjoy God in the city? This is further explained in verse 10, "And he carried me away in the spirit to a great and high mountain, and shewed me that great city, the holy Jerusalem, descending out of heaven from God." Three times this city is mentioned as coming down from heaven "which cometh down out of heaven from my God." Chapter ii. 12, "coming down from God out of heaven." Chapter xxi. 3, "The holy Jerusalem, descending out of heaven from God."

If these things do not convince men that this city, this paradise of God will come down from heaven, then I must conclude that they do not receive testimony God has given of what Christ says are the true sayings of God. The Lord Jesus knew that many would think these things concerning the city to be similitudes, or things different from what is said of them; and that we might believe that what is said of the New Jerusalem, means as it says, he has in the last of this book mentioned several important things, which appear to me duty to mention before I proceed to describe the city.

"And he said unto me, These sayings are faithful and true, and the Lord God of the holy prophets sent his angel to shew unto his servants the things that must shortly be done. Behold I come quickly; blessed is he that keepeth the sayings of the prophecy of this book." These two verses follow the description of the holy city; and it is declared that what is said of the city is faithful and true, and that an angel was sent by the Lord God to shew his servants those things which must be shortly done. After this it is said, "I Jesus have sent mine angel to testify these things in the churches." (Rev. xxii. 3, 7, 16.) By this we are taught that it is meant that the churches, as well as the servants of God, should know these to be true, and no parable.

To conclude the whole of what Christ has said concerning the New Jerusalem, he has warned every man not to add or diminish from what he has said of the holy city, and those who shall dwell there. "For I testify unto every man that heareth the words of the prophecy of this book, if any man shall add unto those things, God shall add unto him the plagues that are written in this book; and if any man shall take away from the words of the book of this prophecy, God shall take away his part out of the holy city, and from the things that are written in this book. He which testifieth these things saith, surely I come quickly. Amen. Even so come, Lord Jesus" (ver. 18, 19.)

These things concerning the city are here considered a prophecy of things to come, and the person who shall dare to make the prophecy any thing besides what it is said to be, is threatened with a loss of that glory which all who believe shall at last enjoy.

According to this declaration we are safe in believing that what is called a city in these chapters means just such an one as is here described.

I shall now proceed to the New Jerusalem, as it is laid down in the two last chapters of Revelation. In the description of this city, there are several particulars mentioned in these two chapters.

1. The New Jerusalem — Holy City — and Tabernacle of God.

The word Jerusalem signifies "the vision or possession of peace, or, they shall see peace." It is made of two words, JERU, they shall see, and SALEM, which means peace. This city which is to come down from heaven is the New Jerusalem, in distinction from the Jerusalem at this time, or the thousand years of Christ's reign upon earth. It will be new and suitable for the new heaven and earth, and for these new creatures who shall dwell there forever. It is called the holy city, because every part of it will be holy, and all who shall dwell there will be holy, and all their employment will be of the same nature of the city. No unholy person will ever have admittance there:

"Those holy gates forever bar,
Pollution, sin, and shame,
None shall obtain admittance there,
But followers of the Lamb."

It is called the Tabernacle of God, because of its being moved from heaven to earth, and because God will dwell there, with his people forever.

2. The extent of the city is mentioned: "And the city lieth four square, and the length is as large as the breadth. And he measured the city with the reed, twelve thousand furlongs; the length, and the breadth, and the height of it are equal."

How exceedingly great must this city be! Twelve thousand furlongs square, that is fifteen hundred miles in length and breadth. This makes it six thousand miles in circumference; but when the new earth appears, without any sea there will be room enough to receive it. It must be remembered that when this city comes down, it will be prepared as a bride adorned; its builder and maker is God; and it will come down with the foundation, wall, street, and all done. Some have thought the height of the wall will be equal to the length and breadth of the city; but this is a mistake. The wall is said to be one hundred and forty-four cubits high. This I shall notice hereafter.

The meaning of the height being equal is, that there is one entire level to the street and top of the wall. It is not like Jerusalem, or Rome, built on mountains. Though this city is to be so large; yet we are not to suppose that this city is to contain all that will be saved; for it is mentioned that the kings of the earth, (which means the new earth,) do bring their glory and honor to it. There are principalities and powers, now in heavenly places, among angels; and in the world to come there will be principalities and powers, this Paul has mentioned, Eph. i. 21; iii. 10. This city thus large will be the chief place of resort from all parts of the earth where saints immortal will dwell; for when the new heaven and earth are created, the righteous will dwell all over the earth. Peter says, "We according to his promise look for new heavens and earth, wherein dwelleth righteousness." O how the glory of God will shine in such a holy city, of such magnitude!

This heavenly city is the masterpiece of architecture ever reared by the great builder. Its very form, a cube, is perfection itself: no other form could equal it, and its stupendous greatness astonishes us beyond measure! Fifteen hundred miles in length, and breadth! What a city is this! Whose superficies contain two millions and a quarter of square miles, and its solid contents, three thousand, three hundred and seventy-five millions of cubit miles! And there might stand at once on the ground of this city, without touching each other; fifteen billions, six hundred and eighty-one thousand, and six hundred millions of men! (allowing two feet square, or four square feet,) which would be more than could be born in four hundred ninety six thousand, nine hundred and thirty years, at the rate of sixty persons in each minute.

The use of these calculations is to show the amazing greatness of the city, and to make it evident, that the number of the saved, (though so many will die the second death,) is inconceivable, since God has prepared such a vast city for them.

8. The measure of the wall of Jasper around the city.

"And he measured the wall thereof, an hundred and forty and forty-four cubits, according to the measure of a man, that is the angel, and the building of the wall of it was Jasper." The height of the wall of this city is said to be an hundred and forty-four cubits. Allowing a cubit to be one foot and a half, it would make the wall two hundred and fifteen feet high. The wall itself is said to be Jasper, a most precious stone. Think a moment of a city six thousand miles in circumference, with a wall two hundred and sixteen feet high, and that wall of white

Jasper; what glory is this! It far exceeds all that mortals have seen. Remember he whose power created the heavens, the earth, and sea, and man upon the earth, can easily shew his creatures such a city as this. It is added that the city thus walled, was pure gold, like unto transparent glass. How rich! How glorious! How beautiful! Blessed are they that do his commandments, that they may have right to the tree of life, and enter in through the gates into the city.

4. The foundation of the wall of the city is mentioned.

"And the wall of the city had twelve foundations and in them the names of the twelve apostles of the Lamb. And the foundations of the wall of the city were garnished with all manner of precious stones. The first foundation was Jasper; the second, sapphire; the third, chalcedony; the fourth, an emerald, the fifth, sardonyx; the sixth, sardius; the seventh, chrysolite; the eighth, beryl; the ninth, a topaz; the tenth, a chrysolite; the eleventh, a jacinth; the twelfth, an amethyst."

In the temple built by Solomon there were twelve stones or foundations on which it stood; three on each side, and in the days of Christ, the adorning of the temple was such, that the disciples were charmed with the glory of it; but what was all that compared to the glorious foundations of the New Jerusalem which John saw when he had a vision of things to come! These foundations are described as very glorious on two accounts:

I. On account of the precious stones with which the foundations were garnished; these are said to be twelve, one precious stone to each foundation.

As it is likely many of my readers are unacquainted with these precious stones mentioned as the garnishing of the foundations of this city; and as many wish to have an account of them, I shall here give a short description of them, that each one may have an increasing idea of the glory of that city prepared, which shall ere long come down from God out of heaven.

1. The foundation was garnished with Jasper. This is a precious stone. There are fourteen varieties of Jasper. (1) The first color is green. (2) Red; (3) Yellow; (4) Brown; (5) Violet color; (6) Black; (6) Bluish gray; (8) Milky white; (9) Variegated with green, red and yellow clouds; (10) Green with red specks; (11) Veined with various colored clouds; (12) Jasper with various cloud colored zones; (13) That which has various colors mixed promiscuously without any order; (14) That which contains some par ticles of agate, called agatized Jasper. A foundation garnished with Jasper of either of those colors must be glorious indeed. The Jasper which is most valued is the green, spotted with red or purple.

2. The second foundation was garnished with Sapphire. The sapphire is a genus of precious stones, and of a blue color, and is the hardest of all except the ruby and diamond. *

3. The third foundation was garnished with Chalcedony. This is a gem. There are four known species of the chalcedony. (1) A bluish white one; (2) The dull, milky veined chalcedony; (3) The third is a brownish black, dull, and cloudy one; (4) The fourth is the yellow and red chalcedony, superior to all the rest in beauty.

4. The fourth foundation was garnished with an emerald. The emerald is a precious stone, and the softest of all precious stones. It is considered the most beautiful of all the gems, being in general of a green color. There are two kinds, the pale green, and dark green.

5. The fifth foundation had a Sardonyx. This is another of the precious stones, consisting of a mixture of the chalcedony and carnelian. It is found, (1) striped with white and red strata; (2) white with red dextrical figures.

6. In the sixth foundation was the Sardius. This precious stone is of the color of blood.

7. In the foundation was the stone called Chrysolite. The color of this stone is yellow like gold.

8. In the eighth foundation was the stone called Beryl. This stone is of a bluish green color. It never receives any admixture of color into it, nor loses the blue and green, but has its genuine tinge in the degrees from a very deep and dusky to the palest imaginable of the hue of sea water.

9. In the ninth foundation was the Topaz. This stone is of the same color as the chrysolite, having the color of gold.

10. In the tenth foundation was the Chryso-prasus. The color of this stone is green, having a yellowish tinge inclining to blue, like the green leek.

11. In the eleventh foundation was the Jacinth. This stone is of a purple or violet color, from whence it has its name.

12. In the twelfth foundation was the Amethyst. Amethyst is a transparent gem, of a purple color, which seems composed of a strong blue and deep red, and, according as either of these prevails, affording different tinges of purple, sometimes approaching to violet, and sometimes, even fading to a pale rose color.

These precious stones are all small in the earth, and appear to me as samples, to let all know the glory of the New Jerusalem by, like a translated Enoch as a sample of all the saints. How a few of these things draw our attention; but what are all these compared to a city great and glorious, garnished all around with such precious stones.

II. These foundations are described as being very glorious, on account of the names in these precious stones. There are three foundations on the east; three on the north; three on the west; and in each foundation one of the names of the apostles of the Lamb. While the names of the wicked shall rot, the apostles who have had their names in everlasting remembrance, engraved on the foundations of the city, while they within enjoy glory forever.

As there are three foundations on a side, there will be three names upon each side, in a length of fifteen hundred miles.

It is impossible for mortals to describe what Christ promised his apostles and all who follow him, in the world to come.

Having mentioned the foundations, we proceed to mention the gates which are twelve.

"And the twelve gates were twelve pearls; every several gate was of one pearl; and the street of the city was pure gold, as it were transparent glass." The gates of the New Jerusalem, are said to be twelve in number, three upon each side; and each one is said to be one pearl. How glorious! and how rich! The pearl which we are acquainted with, is a hard, white, shining body, usually roundish, found in testaceous fish, resembling an oyster. The finest pearl is pure white, and not dead and lifeless, but clear and brilliant, and is perfectly free from any spot or stain, and their surface is smooth and glassy, and they bring their natural polish with them, which art is not able to improve.

Pliny says that pearls are the most valuable and excellent of all precious stones; and from our Saviour's comparing the kingdom of heaven to a Pearl, it would seem that they really were held in such high estimation at that time. We are told that Servilla, the mother of Brutus, presented one to Caesar of the value of 50,000 pounds sterling. Cleopatra had one valued at 250,000 pounds sterling.

The foundations are to be garnished with all manner of precious stones; but the gates are composed of the most precious of all. These gates are designed as an ornament to the city, for they are never to be shut against any, so that the kings of this new earth will ever be at liberty to bring their glory and honor into it, and to acknowledge the King of kings. "And the gates shall not be shut at all by day, for there shall be no night there."

The city which shall be built in the thousand years will have gates that the riches of the Gentiles may be brought into it. At that time there will be day and night, but in the new earth there will be no night, but one eternal day.

As the twelve foundations of the wall had in them the names of the twelve apostles of the Lamb, so the gates had in them the names of the twelve tribes of Israel. It is likely the names of the twelve tribes were placed in the gate directly over the names of the apostles, in the foundations.

This mentioned in verse 12, "And had a wall great and high, and had twelve gates, and at the gates twelve angels, and names written thereon, which are the names of the twelve tribes of the children of Israel." In addition to all this glory of the gates of pearl, it is said that there were twelve angels placed at the gates of the city, that each one who enters the gates, may by them be welcomed into the city, wherever they come from different parts of the new earth to bring the glory and honor of the saved nations into it, and for the kings of the new earth to bring their glory and honor there.

We have now given a short sketch of the outward glory of the New Jerusalem, as seen by the beloved John on the Isle of Patmos; which consists in the name, the extent of the city—the measure of the Jasper wall—the garnishing of the twelve foundations—the names of twelve apostles—and the gates of pearl, with the names of the twelve tribes of Israel, and the twelve angels at the gates. This is the outward glory of the city: we will now "enter in through the gates," and view the city within, and see the greater glory there.

When we count over the glorious things within the city, we find twelve mentioned in the two last chapters of Revelation.

1. The pavement of the city and the street. This is said to be pure gold like transparent glass. "And the city was pure gold, like unto clear glass. . . . And the street of the city was pure gold, as it were transparent glass." There is but one street mentioned in the whole city, for there are no public or private buildings, but the whole city is one public walk. What a glorious city is this, that even the street or ground of the whole is of gold, which is in appearance like clear glass! Pure gold indeed! as though it was designed for the pure in heart.

2. Another part of the glory of this city is the river of water of life running from the throne of God and the Lamb. "And he shewed me a pure river of water of life, clear as crystal, proceeding from the throne of God and the Lamb." There is no doubt in my mind that this will be a real river as well as a real city; if we explain away one we may the other. In the thousand years of Christ's reign on the earth, waters are to issue out from the sanctuary, from the house, and town down into the dead sea, and there is to be trees on each side of the river, for food and medicine. In this city, as there is no temple, the river is to proceed from the throne. It is certain that creatures will always need support from the Creator, and this living water will be one part of it. It will benefit all the inhabitants of the new earth, as well as those of the New Jerusalem forever.

3. Besides the glory of the city on account of the river, we are told of a tree of life in the midst of the street and on either side of the river. "In the midst of the street of it, and on either side of the river was there the tree of life, which bare twelve manner of fruits, and yielded her fruit every month; and the leaves of the tree were for the healing of nations. Blessed are they that do his commandments, that they may have right to the tree of life, and enter in through the gates into the city" (Rev. xxii. 2, 14). "He that hath an ear let him hear what the Spirit says unto the churches; to him that overcometh will I give to eat of the tree of life, which is the midst of the paradise of God."

This tree of life is described as very large, extending its branches across the river and into the street on either side of the river, the whole ground of the city is street. This tree is said to bear twelve manner of fruits, and yield her fruit every month, and it is designed for food and constant health to the nations that are saved, who walk there.

Many are surprised at the hearing that those who are immortal will eat and drink in the new earth. Did not Christ, who was raised immortal, eat and drink with his disciples after his resurrection? Did he not promise his disciples that he would not drink of the fruit of the vine till he drank it new in his Father's kingdom? Did he not promise the apostles that they should eat and drink with him in his kingdom? He certainly did. This will be done when in the thousand years the apostles shall set on twelve thrones judging the twelve tribes of Israel; in the New Jerusalem how much more will they enjoy! We are told here why he promised them that they should eat and drink with him, because the tree of life and river of life, is prepared for that very purpose, "For the Lamb is in the midst of the throne, shall feed them, and shall lead them unto living fountains of waters, and God shall wipe away all tears from their eyes."

4. In addition to all this glory we are told that the throne of God and the Lamb are in the city. "Proceeding out of the throne of God and the Lamb. But the throne of God and the Lamb shall be in it."

In the temple Solomon built, the glory of God was seen when Solomon prayed. There was the presence of God, and Solomon whom he had appointed to reign over Israel; but in this city behold a greater than Solomon! John saw the city, "having the glory of God." His presence was seen by John in a more wonderful manner than it was in the days of Solomon. On this throne where the glory of God is seen, Christ the Lamb is to reign world without end. This throne he is on now in heaven, and when the New Jerusalem comes down from God out of heaven, this throne will be on the new earth in the New Jerusalem, then will the shout be heard, out of heaven, which John mentions, Rev. xxi. 3, "And I heard a great voice out of heaven saying, behold, the tabernacle of God is with men, and he shall dwell with them, and they shall be his people, and God himself shall be with them, and be their God." O the glory of that city!

5. The light of the city is next mentioned. "And her light was like unto a stone most precious, even like Jasper stone, clear as crystal. And the city had no need of the sun, neither of the moon to shine in it; for the glory of God did lighten it, and the Lamb is the light of it."

In the thousand years of Christ's reign I think from what Isaiah says, the light will be greater than it is now. "Moreover, the light of the moon shall be as the light of the sun, and the light of the sun shall be seven-fold, as the light of seven days, in the day that the Lord bindeth up the breach of his people, and healeth the stroke of their wound" (Isaiah xxx. 26). This evidently refers to the time when the Jews are restored, but the city in the new earth will have a light superior to the sun, moon, stars or candles; the glory of God and the Lamb will be the light. When the angel came to the shepherds, his light turned night into day. When Paul was on his way to Damascus he saw a light above the brightness of the sun. When Christ was on the mount the apostles saw something of that light which he will make in the New Jerusalem. John saw Christ on the Isle of Patmos. He says, "His eyes were as a flame of fire, and his countenance was as the sun shining in his strength" (Rev. i. 14, 16). This light will not be like the sun, seen only part of the time, but the glory of God and the Lamb will be a constant light, causing the inhabitants to be strangers to night and darkness.

6. Another part of the glory in the city is the temple. In the old Jerusalem, the temple built by Solomon was a great ornament to the city; and David said, "Because of thy temple at Jerusalem shall kings bring presents unto thee" (Psa. lxxvii. 29). The temple or house to be built in Jerusalem, in the thousand years of Christ's reign will be so glorious that it will attract the attention of the most distant nations. (Isa. ii. 1.) But what are all these to the temple which shall adorn the New Jerusalem? Not a temple built of wood, stone, iron, brass, silver, gold, or precious stones. John saw none of these; but He who is the light is the temple. "And I saw no temple therein, for the Lord God Almighty and the Lamb are the TEMPLE of it" (Rev. xxi. 22). What more can be wanted? To have the glory of God in the face of Jesus continually encircling us, is all the temple the saved nations will need forever.

7. With all this outward and inward glory, without citizenship to dwell there we should see a great lack indeed. These are mentioned, verse 24, "And the nations of them which are saved shall walk in the light of it." These are the ones who confessed Christ here, and endured to the end, such as were washed in his blood, who had experienced the washing of regeneration, and renewing of the Holy Ghost, who had forsaken all for Christ, out of every nation, tongue and people. It is said, verse 27, "And there shall in no wise enter into it anything that defileth, neither whatsoever worketh abomination, or maketh a lie, but they which are written in the Lamb's book of life."

It is all in vain for us to think we shall enter into that city at last if we work iniquity. Christ has told us who will have their part in the lake of fire, and will be shut out of the city. "But the fearful and unbelieving, and abominable, and murderers, and whoremongers, and sorcerers, and idolaters, and all liars, shall have their part in the lake which burneth with fire and brimstone, which is the second death" (Rev. xx. 8). He has also told us who will enter into this city. "Blessed are they that do his commandments, that they may have right to the tree of life, and they may enter in through the gates into the city."

8. In addition to all this there will be no curse on the city, or its inhabitants for ever. "And there shall be no more curse." The pres-sence of God and the Lamb will prevent all this forever.

9. As all the new earth will be inhabited by the saved nations forever, they will bring their glory there, when they shall come to acknowledge the king of glory as the author all their glory and joy. "And they shall bring the glory and honor of the nations to it." This city will be the metropolis of the whole new earth.

10. It is plain to me that there will be kings under Christ and over those who are saved. He could not be King of kings if there were no other kings under him. These are the kings which are to reign with him on the earth forever. These are the kings of the earth, (the new earth) who will bring their glory and honor to the New Jerusalem, and who will consider Christ as the giver of all they enjoy. "And the kings of the earth do bring their glory and honor into it" (verse 24).

Many people think there will be no order or government, after this world, in the world to come; but whoever reads the New Testament will find that there will be principalities and powers in the world to come far exceeding what is known here.

"For unto the angels hath he not put in subjection the world to come whereof we speak." Paul mentions the names that are to be named in the world to come, as well as in this world, including principalities and powers, and considers Christ above them all, in this and the world to come. "Far above all principality, and might, and dominion, and every name that is named, not only in this world, but also in that which is to come" (Eph. i. 21). This world to come means the new heaven and earth. There are now principalities and powers in heaven as well as in the earth. "To the intent that now unto the principalities and powers in heavenly places, might be known by the church the manifold wisdom of God" (Eph. iii. 10).

11. Another part of the glory of this city is, that all who have been faithful servants here, shall see his face there, and have his name in their foreheads, and behold his glory. "And they shall see his face; and his name shall be in their foreheads." What more can there be to make this bliss complete?

12. To close the whole description of the glory of the New Jerusalem, it is said, "And there shall be no night there; and they need no candle, neither the light of the sun; for the Lord God giveth them light; and they shall reign for ever and ever." Changes, troubles, tears, and death, are at an end, and glory eternal is their's. One eternal noon is their's, and the golden harps ever tuned, will assist their deathless tongues in ascribing glory, and honor, to him who sits on the throne, and to the Lamb, for ever more, Amen.

WE SURELY SHALL REMEMBER.

When we reach a quiet dwelling
On the strong eternal hills,
And our praise to Him is swelling
Who the vast creation fills;
When the paths of prayer and duty
And affliction all are trod,
And we wake to see the beauty
Of our Saviour and our God;

With the light of resurrection,
When our changed bodies glow,
And we gain the full perfection
Of the bliss we then shall know,
When the life that "flesh" obscureth,
In each radiant form shall shine,
And the joy that aye endureth
Flashes forth in beams divine;

While we wave the palms of glory
Through the long, eternal years,
Shall we e'er forget the story
Of our mortal griefs and fears?
Shall we e'er forget the sadness,
And the clouds that hung so dim,
When our hearts are filled with gladness,
And our tears are dried by Him?

Shall the memory be banished
Of His kindness and His care,
When the wants and woes are vanished
Which He loved to soothe and share?
All the way by which He led us,
All the grievings which He bore;
All the patient love He taught us,
Shall we think of them no more?

Yes! we surely shall remember
How He quickened us from death,
How He fanned the dying ember
With His Spirit's loving breath.
We shall read the tender meaning
Of the sorrows and alarms,
As we trod the desert, leaning
On His everlasting arms.

And His rest will be the dearer
When we think of weary ways,
And His light will seem the clearer
As we muse on cloudy days.
Oh! 't will be a glorious morrow
To a dark and stormy day!
We shall recollect our sorrow
As the streams that pass away.

THE LOVE OF GOD.

"Whom have I in heaven but Thee? and there is none upon earth that I desire beside Thee."—Psalm lxxiii. 24.

THESE words are the outpourings of a heart yearning with intense and passionate longing for greater knowledge of God. They express the deep-seated and earnest feelings of the child of God. They are, in fact, the utterances of a son towards a father, and that father one who is himself perfect in holiness and goodness. The Psalmist's love had utterly cast out fear, and all he knew or cared to know was that God was his Father, and that He was more to him than the whole world beside.

We forget that heaven itself can give us nothing better than the sight the Holy One; that it is not so much freedom from suffering, nor deliverance from the bondage of corruption, that will form the real happiness of the believer there, as the presence of God with him perpetually. To behold the face of our Father in heaven, to be near Him, to, as it were, hold converse with Him? Is such a thing possible? Can it be that for sinful men such a blessing is reserved? We are so familiar with the expression "sons of God," that it does not make the impression on the mind that it otherwise would. The angels may indeed veil their faces before that glorious Being, but it almost seems as if it were reserved for man to behold the full effulgence of His glory. Oh, if we only realized, as we profess to do, the fact that we who are approved shall be permitted to approach thus closely to that Almighty One, should we then care as we do for the fleeting pleasures of this world? Should we not rather strive with anxious longing and carefulness to follow as closely as possible in the footsteps of Him who was the express image of the Father? Should we not endeavor, and would there not be a holy rivalry among us as to who should most closely approximate in love and obedience to our Redeemer? We are not left in any doubt as to the more perfect way by which that end is to be attained. Whosoever wishes to be high in the Kingdom of God, let him be servant to his brethren, even as the Lord came, "not to be ministered unto but to minister."

If, then, we really have a desire to behold the face of our Father in heaven, we must ever bear in mind that as He is love, we cannot see Him nor know Him without love—that love of which so glorious a description is given by St. Paul. Let us then "suffer long and be kind," both to one another and to all men; let us "envy not;" let us not "vaunt ourselves nor be puffed up;" let us "not behave ourselves unseemly, nor seek our own;" let us not be "easily provoked," nor bear malice; let us "rejoice not in iniquity, but rejoice in the truth." Finally, let us bear all things, believe all things, hope all things, endure all things. So, and so only, may we hope to have full communion with both the Father and the Son.

Love to God through Christ, and to men as being the offspring of God, brings with it its own exceeding great reward; for when once it takes possession of the soul its tendency is to grow more and more till it becomes the mainspring of all the actions of the soul, which finds therein greater and greater delight and happiness. For after all what can we conceive of, so far as happiness is concerned, greater than that the soul should be so filled with the love of God that it throws off all care for the future, all anxiety and distrust, and is able to rest in perfect peace and security, ever learning more and more of the wonderful ways and works of the Almighty.

There is this also in perfect love to God, that it not only casts out fear, but of itself compels the soul that is under its influence to do the will of God in everything. It can no more exist without producing fruits, than fire can burn without producing heat. No other motive can at all compare in real efficiency with this. It comes from God, and it must of necessity do what is pleasing to God. Even earthly love can scarcely exist without showing itself in some way; how much less then when the object is perfection of holiness and goodness.

There is also this glorious fact about love to God, that it casts out every kind of envy, and makes its possessor desire that all men, even one's enemies, may come to adore and love God in the same manner as ourselves. If a man says he loves God and hates his brother, he must be deceiving himself, for not only does the love of God cause love to one's brethren, but even to one's enemies.

Now it is one of the means by which not only our love to God is perfected, but by which alone it can be fully known, that we should be ready, when called upon, to forsake all and follow Him alone: to give up, when He demands it, even our most cherished possessions. Not that our Father ever requires us to give up anything unless it is really necessary, but that He wishes us to be worthy of that love. It is not without reason that He is called a jealous God, for His love is so great that He wishes His children to be like Himself in holiness and goodness, that they may be perfect also in happiness and joy hereafter.

It will be one great object of "Our Hope" to endeavor to develop more fully, if only in the hearts of a few, greater love to God; to encourage one another to look upon God, not as a taskmaster, nor as one who willingly takes pleasure in causing us to suffer, but as being, what He unquestionably is, a Being to be loved and not to be feared—in fine, a Father. We should learn to look upon God as One who desires to bring our wills into accordance with His own, only in order that He may bless us the more thereby, and who wishes us to consider ourselves His children. Observe with what freedom, so to speak, the saints of old address God; how they pour out their whole hearts before Him, and tell Him all their troubles! They do not, as too many do in the present day, come to Him in what may be called a servile spirit, or as if they were in dread of Him; on the contrary, they seem, as in the case of Job, almost to remonstrate with Him: "Wherefore do the wicked prosper?" "Hast thou forgotten to be gracious?" and Moses even goes so far as to say, "Thou hast not delivered Thy people at all." It is quite refreshing to read such heartfelt expressions, even though they may seem sometimes stronger than they ought to be, after the unreal, I had almost said false professions of humility that are so common among us where we pray to God.

St. John says with great truth: "Behold what manner of love the Father hath bestowed upon us, that we should be called sons of God."

If, then, we are sons of God, should we not look upon all those who serve God in sincerity, as being in deed and in truth brothers—children of the same Father; and ought we not therefore to do at least as much for one another as if we were all brethren in this world—children of one father on earth. The law of Christ, according to St. Paul, is to bear one another's burdens; an expression that almost seems to me to imply that one great reason why these burdens are sent at all is that they may afford each of us an opportunity of assisting one another.

If, where two or three are gathered together in love to Christ, He Himself is in the midst of them, may we not expect and hope that He will sometimes draw so near to us that we, as it were can all but see Him. It is indeed quite possible that even now, if our eyes were only opened, as were those of the two disciples at Emmaus, we should actually behold Him among us. But apart from this, are there not times in the lives of all who seek God when, though they cannot see, they can feel Him to be very near them, more especially when their hearts are filled with love to Him.

It would almost seem as if something approaching to an absolute certainty and conviction of His presence among us were sometimes attained, and when we become satisfied that we are indeed His offspring. At such moments "Our Hope" becomes Our Certainty, and we feel that God does but try us for our good, and that He, like Joseph, only waits for the right moment to make Himself manifest to us. We may almost say, indeed, that, like Joseph, He even anticipates the right moment for so doing, through the excess of His pity and love. If Joseph could not refrain himself when he saw the distress of his brethren, we may be sure that the loving Saviour will reveal Himself also as soon as ever He sees us to be sufficiently prepared for it.

Who indeed "can utter the mighty acts of the Lord, or show forth all His praise?" Who may understand His goodness—His everlasting pity and tenderness? Even on earth, in this imperfect and sinful state, there are sometimes vouchsafed to us such glimpses of His goodness as completely carry away our souls, and lift us almost into His presence; when earth and all things in it seem to fade from our view, and we feel caught up, so to speak, to the third heaven. The highest idea we form of God falls infinitely below the reality; like the Queen of Sheba, we shall undoubtedly hereafter be able to say: "Lo, the half was not told me."

Let us then, as His children, "glory in His holy name;"—"let the heart of them rejoice that seek the Lord." Let it be the object of our lives to purify ourselves even as he is pure; that so we may even on earth feel Him to be very near us. Then shall we, free from every law but the perfect law of liberty, be indeed a law unto ourselves; find ourselves more and more emancipated from the bondage of the world and of sin, and "beholding as in a glass the glory of the Lord, be changed into the same image, from glory to glory, even as by the Spirit of the Lord."—Our Hope.

MAL. IV. 1-3 EXPLAINED.

SOME of our Advent papers and advocates of the world burning system are quoting Mal. iv. 1-3 to sustain their theory of no mercy for our race after Christ returns. I wish to remind such brethren that far greater Bible critics than they have seen that these verses have no reference to the final doom of the wicked.

Dr. Adam Clarke, the great Methodist commentator, thus explains these verses:

["Behold the day cometh that shall burn as an oven."] The destruction of Jerusalem by the Romans.

["And all the proud."] This is reference to verse 15 of the preceding chapter.

["The day that cometh shall burn them up."] Either by famine, by sword, or captivity. All these rebels shall be destroyed.

["It shall leave them neither root nor branch."] A proverbial expression for total destruction. Neither man nor child shall escape.

["And ye shall go forth."] Ye who believe on his name shall go forth out of Jerusalem when the Romans shall come up against it. No Christian life fell in the siege and destruction of Jerusalem.

["Grow up as calves of the stall,"] refers to the peace and usefulness of the Christians after their escape from the destruction of Jerusalem.

["Ye shall tread down."] This may be the commission given to the Romans: Tread down the wicked people, tread down the wicked place; set it on fire, and let the ashes be trodden down under your feet. See Clarke's Commentary, Vol. iv., page 807.

Harris' Introduction to the Scriptures, a critical standard work, gives the same explanation as Adam Clarke. Townsend's Notes does the same. See page 1174. Bishop Lowth, and Dr. Campbell, of Scotland, agree with Clarke in explaining Mal. iv. 1-4.

Some are explaining 2 Pet. iii. as wrongfully as they do Mal. iv. They make it contradict what most of the old prophets plainly teach, viz., that the great work of Christ in redeeming our race isto be done after his second coming, and after a general resurrection.

Mal. i. 1 reads: "The burden of the word of the Lord to Israel by Malachi." This shows the threatenings in chapter iv. were to that nation, and not to the world at large. Some of us are learning that an ultra literalism is hurting truth as much, if not more, than what they call the spiritualizing system. The symbolic and figurative language of the old prophets, and of the New Testament, is yet far from being well understood and applied; and so errors are being kept up by sad mistakes. The God-dishonoring doctrine of endless torment is continued by not seeing the meaning of Bible language; and we should take heed lest we make a similar mistake in trying to prove by symbolic terms that the great mass of our race were brought into being by a God of love and mercy, only to be finally burned up.

Twenty-two years ago, in my work "Death not Life," I quoted Mal. iv. to prove final destruction. I was then just emerging from the old traditions; but now, after many years of hard study in trying to see that the Bible, as well as men's say so, vindicated God's moral character, I discover that most of the 200 passages I then quoted to prove final death, were wrongly applied; and, like Mal. iv., only tell untimely, cruel, temporal death, or severe earthly judgments. The result of my studies has led me to melt up my old stereotype plates, to have them changed into better ones; as God's power and goodness will raise up the heathen and the mass of men who have died in ignorance of His love, and give them light and repentance, and so change as to make them fit subjects to praise the "riches of his grace" eternally.

Thanks be to God that hundreds, by re-examination, are learning their mistake in this great matter, and have boldness enough to own and forsake error when they find it.

FROM JOHNSON WHALEY.

BRO STORRS: It is not saying too much to assert that no other publication has given the same or equal pleasure in reading, as the EXAMINER since you were enlightened in the direction of its main theme. It has often occurred to me, when reading, why this unusual happy thrill, which seemed to pervade my whole being? and a consciousness of true light flashing over my spirit. I say "spirit," because I am accounted a heretic, by many of my former co-religionists, on the subject of spiritual influences: not on what the Scriptures teach do we differ so much, but in the application of those teachings to us of the present day, or period of the "Dispensation of the Spirit."

I have long held that all the promises made by Jesus and his apostles are applicable to all Christians, in all ages or periods of the present Dispensation, except those made to apostles as such; i.e., as witness of his resurrection. If not, why not? When was the law repealed? Is human nature any better than it was then? Does the history of the past prove the reverse? Do men exhibit more oneness than then in their lives, even with all the experience of the centuries gone by? Does the intellectual perception and acknowledgement of certain precepts and facts enable any man to live in the fear and love of the Father, when Jesus said, "Of mine own self I can do nothing." Can any man attain to the perfection taught in the New Testament without the Spirit of God dwelling in him, as taught in Rom. viii., and many other Scriptures? I have been met, scores of times, with this—"Show us some of your miracles!" as though miracles were all that was necessary to constitute a pure Christian character! How much better were the apostles for having power to work miracles, till the Holy Spirit was conferred to enable them to understand what now seems very simple to minds from our standpoint? Yet they (the apostles) needed the aid of the Spirit to overcome trials and temptations, all through their pilgrimage, as well as to proclaim the word of life! allow me to propound a question, (not that I want to provoke discussion.)

Is not the lack of God's Spirit, assisting our spirit, the main cause of the disputations and dividing of "bodies," as they are termed, more than any other cause? As my sheet is nearly full I will only say, that I have stood aloof from all organization, for over five years, and every day confirms me in the feeling that I never shall be connected with them again.

Yours, in love,

Geneva, Ill, January, 1874.

J. F. LEE, M. D., Monroe, N. C., writes: Will any writer point out the harmony actually existing between Protestants and Catholics? and plainly state all the articles of Protestant Creeds, which are founded on the sole authority of the Catholic Church? What authority have Protestants for most of their belief but the decisions of the Church of Rome? None. I received the EXAMINER for December, and read every word in it. The word all, so frequently used by some correspondents, would seem to lead the reader to infer that the writers are almost, if not entirely, Universalists. I do fondly hope the BIBLE EXAMINER—the present Editor, together with all who examine its pages, may improve, and manifest clearly a growth in grace, and an increase in knowledge. The sum in addition, constituting the sum and substance of religion is, "Add to your faith, virtue; and to virtue, knowledge; and to knowledge, temperance; and to temperance, patience; and to patience, godliness; and to godliness, brotherly kindness; and to brotherly kindness, charity," or love (2 Pet. i. 5-7).

REMARKS BY THE EDITOR.—That the tendency of the writings of some correspondents is to leave the impression that they believe in a universal restoration of the entire race, is unquestionably true. The standing testimony of the Editor is, "In no case will the Editor be responsible for the sentiments of Correspondents." He expresses his own sentiments, in his own language, and over his own signature, and he has endeavored to guard against the idea of an absolute recovery of every individual of the human race. For, while it is evident, to his mind, that every person born into the world will have an opportunity to improve the grace of God, at some period of their existence, and be blessed with all the means necessary to secure a final salvation; it is equally evident that their opportunity is that of responsible and accountable beings; their wills cannot be forced to submission; as that would not be the conversion of men, but a change of them into irresponsible machines, and a destruction of their manhood and responsibility; which, in fact, is no salvation at all.

It seems to the Editor that the vindication of the character of the CREATOR, and His government, does not require us to conclude that every individual will ultimately be saved into an endless life; and that it is an ample defence, of both, to prove that every soul of man shall have an opportunity and ample means to secure such a result. What more can be desired? Forced submission never did and never can bring happiness. It is the cheerful and voluntary compliance with the Divine will, arising from a discovery that "God is LOVE," and that He is "a just God and Saviour," that brings peace and joy to the soul. This is the submission that results in a final salvation.

FROM ELD. E. OWEN.

BRO. STORRS: The eminent practicability of the working of God's plan, respecting the race of man, I feel more divinely in harmony with than ever before, since having become conversant with the contents of the "EXAMINER," and learning your views, as they have been set forth from time to time. Though I do not fully endorse all there is written in the EXAMINER, yet I feel disposed to prove all things, and hold fast that which is good. I deprecate that condition of mind which assumes the possession of all there is worth possessing, by way of light; and despise that ignorant arrogance which pedantically assumes the prerogative of molding the faith of others by means of wholesale denunciations of the positions others honestly assume, and by frantic appeals to the prejudices which are known to exist against any innovations.

If men have real or imaginary arguments to present in opposition, I feel to respect them for presenting the same. But when so called "men of God" advise congregations to exclude from their houses, and churches, all who believe in the "age to come," (as was reverently done in this place), I feel to say, God have mercy upon such leaders of the people: for, if the blind lead the blind, both shall fall into the ditch.

I am fully satisfied the Advent people are growing more and more contracted in sentiment; more and more averse to investigation; and I am fully aware that spiritual death and declension is inevitable.

May God preserve me and as many as can be preserved from imbibing so unfruitful a frame of mind.

The cause is slowly yet gradually gaining; thank the good Lord! Be of good cheer, Bro. Storr, the Lord is yet alive.

It requires but little courage and endurance to sit in a finely upholstered rail car and ride over the line of road. But some one had the route to survey, to clear forests, and ford streams, establish grades, etc.; and if God has called you to the latter work, (which He seems to have done), do it in his fear, through his strength, for you can do all things through Christ strengthening you.

I wish I could afford you material aid toward supporting the EXAMINER, (which I receive free,) but it is a time of sore trial with me; for which I thank my own dear "Father."

Your brother in Christ.

Times of Restitution.

FROM POLLY G. FITTS.

"But those things, which God before had shewed by the mouth of all his prophets, that Christ should suffer, he hath so fulfilled. Repent ye therefore, and be converted," (Why converted?) "that your sins may be blotted out, when the times of refreshing shall come from the presence of the Lord: and he shall send Jesus Christ, which before was preached unto you: whom the heavens must receive until the times of restitution of all things, which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his holy prophets since the world began" (Acts iii. 18-21).

Now let us see what the prophets have said about the restitution. Now the Lord had said unto Abraham, "Get thee out of thy country, and from thy kindred, and from thy father's house, unto a land that I will shew thee: and I will make of thee a great nation, and I will bless thee, and make thy name great, and thou shalt be a blessing: and I will bless them that bless thee, and curse him that curseth thee: and in thee shall all the families of the earth be blessed (Gen. xii. 1-3). And the Lord said unto Abram, after Lot was separated from him, "Lift up thine eyes, and look from where thou art, northward, and southward, and eastward, and westward, for all the land which thou seest, to thee will I give it, and to thy seed forever. And I will make thy seed as the dust of the earth; so that if any man can number the dust of the earth, then shall thy seed also be numbered," etc. (Gen. xiii. 14-16.) Gen. xvii. begins thus, "And when Abram was ninety years old and nine, the Lord appeared to Abram and said unto him, I am the Almighty God; walk before me, and be thou perfect. And I will make my covenant between me and thee, and will multiply thee exceedingly. And I will establish my covenant between me and thee and thy seed after thee in their generations, for an everlasting covenant, to be a God unto thee and thy seed after thee, and I will give unto thee, and thy seed after thee, the land wherein thou art a stranger, all the land of Canaan, for an everlasting possession; and I will be their God." Again Gen. xxii. it is said, And the angel of the Lord called unto Abraham out of heaven the second time, and said, By myself have I sworn, saith the Lord, for because thou hast done this thing and hast not withheld thy son, thine only son, that in blessing I will bless thee, and in multiplying I will multiply thy seed as the stars of heaven, and as the sand upon the sea shore; and thy seed shall possess the gate of his enemies: and in thy seed shall all the nations of the earth be blessed, because thou hast obeyed my voice.

Let us see what the prophet David says about this covenant, and their generations. He says, O ye seed of Abraham his servant, ye children of Jacob my chosen. He is the Lord our God: his judgments are in all the earth. He hath remembered his covenant forever, the word which he commanded to a thousand generations. Which covenant he made with Abraham, and his oath unto Isaac; and confirmed the same unto Jacob for a law, and to Israel for an everlasting covenant: saying, Unto thee will I give the land of Canaan, the lot of your inheritance: when they were but few men in number; yea, very few, and strangers in it, etc.

To this agrees the testimony of Stephen in the Acts of the Apostles. And he said, Men, brethren and fathers, hearken: the God of glory appeared unto our father Abraham, when he was in Mesopotamia, before he dwelt in Charron, and said unto him, Get thee out of thy country, and from thy kindred, and come into the land I shall shew thee. Then came he out of the land of the Chaldeans, and dwelt in Charron: and from thence, when his father was dead, he removed him into this land wherein ye now dwell. And he gave him none inheritance in it, no, not so much as to set his foot on: yet he promised that he would give it to him for a possession, and his seed after him, when he had no child.

Now we ask, Have these promises been fulfilled? The Bible and all profane history say, No. Then it must be in the times of restitution, when he shall send Jesus, whom the heavens must receive until those times begin. Yes, God hath remembered his covenant, the word that he commanded to a thousand generations. But we have had but about two hundred generations as yet; then, according to the truth of the living God, the greatest number of generations must come in the glorious times of restitution that God has spoken of by all his holy prophets since the world began. Now if there are generations, there must be births; and if births, there must be probation or trial. Let us look at what God says by the prophet Isaiah, (ch. lxx. beginning at the 17th verse), "For behold, I create new heavens and a new earth: the former shall not be remembered nor come into mind. But be ye glad and rejoice forever in that which I create: for, behold, I create Jerusalem a rejoicing, and her people a joy And I will rejoice in Jerusalem, and joy in my people: and the voice of weeping shall be no more heard in her, nor the voice of crying. (Then the voice of weeping, etc., has been heard in Jerusalem here spoken of). There shall be no more thence an infant of days nor an old man that hath not filled his days: for the child shall die an hundred years old; but the sinner an hundred years old shall be accursed. And they shall build houses, and inhabit them; and they shall plant vineyards, and eat the fruit of them; they shall not build and another inhabit; they shall not plant and another eat; for as the days of a tree are the days of my people, and mine elect shall long enjoy the work of their hands. They shall not labor in vain, nor bring forth for trouble; for they are the seed of the blessed of the Lord, and their offspring with them. (Bless the Lord for these precious promises, and that they are fulfilled in the new earth). And it shall come to pass, that before they call, I will answer; and while they are yet speaking, I will hear. The wolf and the lamb shall feed together, and the lion shall eat straw like the bullock: dust shall be the serpent's meat. They shall not hurt nor destroy in all my holy mountain, (or, kingdom). saith the Lord." O what a glorious passage "Thus saith the Lord" is. God hath sworn He will multiply them as the stars of heaven, and as the sand upon the sea shore, as the dust of the earth; and in thy seed shall all the nations of the earth be blessed.

To this agrees the word of God by Isaiah xi.

Speaking of the ROD and BRANCH that should grow out of the stem and roots of Jesse; it says, And righteousness shall be the girdle of his loins and faithfulness the girdle of his reins. The wolf also shall dwell with the lamb, and the leopard shall lie down with the kid; and the calf and the young lion and the fating together; and a little child shall lead them. And the cow and the bear shall feed; their young ones shall lie down together; and the lion shall eat straw like the ox. The sucking child shall play on the hole of the asp, and the weaned child shall put his hand on the cockatrice's den. They shall not hurt nor destroy in all my holy mountain; for the earth shall be full of the knowledge of the Lord as the waters cover the sea. In that day there shall be a root of Jesse, which shall stand for an ensign of the people; to it shall the Gentiles seek: and his rest shall be glorious. Bless the Lord, O my soul; and let all holy beings say, Amen.

Here is another everlasting truth spoken by the same prophet. "For unto us a child is born, unto us a Son is given: and the government shall be upon his shoulder; and his name shall be called Wonderful, Counsellor, The Mighty God, The Everlasting Father, The Prince of peace. Of the increase of his government and peace there shall be no end, upon the throne of David, and upon his kingdom, to order it, and to establish it with judgment and with justice from henceforth even for ever. The zeal of the Lord of hosts will perform this" (Isa. ix. 6. 7). Amen, and Amen again.

Again God saith by his prophet, Isa. lix. 20, 21 "And the Redeemers shall come to Zion and unto them that turn from transgression in Jacob, saith the Lord. As for me, this is my covenant with them, saith the Lord; my Spirit that is upon thee, and my words which I have put in thy mouth, shall not depart out of thy mouth, nor out of the mouth of thy seed, nor out of the mouth of thy seed's seed, saith the Lord, from henceforth and forever (Isa. lix. 20. 21). I cannot but exclaim, in the words of our Saviour, "O unwise, and slow of heart to believe all that the prophets have written." Yes, O unwise. Could God have declared it in stronger language and is it not evident from this covenant with Abraham, and which was renewed with Isaac and Jacob and their seed after them, that this earth is to be the place of their everlasting residence?

The same doctrine is taught in Daniel, when speaking of the ten toes or kingdoms of Nebuchadnezzar's vision. God by the prophet says, "In the days of these kings shall the God of heaven set up a kingdom, (not after their days) which shall not be destroyed; and the kingdom shall not be left to other people, but it shall break in pieces and consume all these kingdoms, and it shall stand forever." How can any Bible reader believe that when Christ comes the second time and raises the righteous dead, changes the righteous living that he will destroy every other living thing from off the whole earth, take all the righteous up to heaven to reign with him a thousand years, and leave the earth desolate, with not a living being, upon it but the devil? Who will the saints reign over in heaven? What kingdoms will there be to break in pieces, and consume after the thousand years are finished?

This doctrine of the restitution is taught in the Prophets, the Psalms, the Gospels, the Epistles, and the Revelations of John. May God enable us to search the Scriptures, that we may believe and receive them by faith, and worship God in Spirit and in truth. O precious words of Jesus, "The hour cometh, and now is, when the true worshippers shall worship the Father in Spirit and truth: for the Father seeketh such to worship him." May God help us to contend earnestly for the faith once delivered to the saints; and to pray fervently, "Thy kingdom come. Thy will be done in earth, as it is in heaven."

Haste thee along, thou glorious noonday!

O for the eyes of ancient seers!

O, for the faith of Him who reckons

Each of his days a thousand years!

A thousand years! then on for ever!

'Tis the glad time so long foretold;

'Tis the glad morn whose early twilight,

Prophets saw in times of old.

May the loins of all of God's dear children, be girt about with truth, and their lights burning; and they like unto men that wait for their Lord.

Is Faith the Gift of God.

BRO. STORRS: I see it stated in last EXAMINER (No. 6, p. 187) that "Faith is the gift of God;" and then the query is put, "is it not?" To that question, will you permit me to answer, No! and say that it is not his gift. One passage only, that I can call to mind, (Eph. ii. 8) seems so to teach. "By grace are ye saved through faith: . . . it is the gift of God." Which is the gift, grace or faith? I answer, grace; not faith, for "faith comes by hearing, and hearing by the word of God" (Rom. x. 17).

In the Greek, as in other languages, nouns of unlike genders cannot agree with nor refer to each other; but nouns of like genders do agree, and refer to each other. Now it so happens that in Eph. ii. 8, faith, and it, are of unlike genders, and so cannot agree or refer the one to the other; while grace and it are of like gender, both being neuter; and these do agree, and refer to each other, so that grace is the gift, and not faith. In Rom. vi. 23, Paul tells us expressly, that "eternal life" is the gift of God through Jesus Christ; and, in chapter ii. 6, 7 and 16, he says, God will confer this gift, "In the day when he shall judge the secrets of men by Jesus Christ," . . . which, perhaps, explains more clearly to us all, the words in 1 Peter i. 13 in which he says, "Wherefore gird up the loins of your mind, be sober, and hope to the end for the grace that is to be brought unto you at the revelation of Jesus Christ."

Henry Smith Warleigh's work, "Why Evil was Permitted," is doing good here. We have distributed 100, and intend to another, for it sets men to thinking, and leads them to inquire into "the eternity of evil," which strikes at the root of the matter.

Yours in the love of our Saviour.

G. W. STETSON.

Edinboro, Pa.

FROM WM. B. PUTNAM.

BRO. STORRS: It is with pleasure I address you, to inform you of the result of a meeting held by myself and Eld. I. F. Wilcox, at Angelo, Monroe Co., Wis. We have organized a Church there of thirty members, and others are almost persuaded, and we think, from appearances, that quite a number will embrace the faith once delivered to the saints. To God be all the glory. Amen.

There is nothing that has ever given such an impetus to the Gospel of the kingdom as the fact that Christ will redeem all men from the bondage of death; the saints to inherit eternal life: the creature who was made subject to vanity (or death) not willingly, but by reason of him who hath subjected the same in hope; for the creature itself shall be delivered from the bondage of corruption into the glorious liberty of the children of God: and the impenitent or wicked dead shall awake to shame and everlasting contempt.

It seems strange that some men are loud and long in their denunciations against the resurrection of infants of unbelievers, and of the heathen that have died without the knowledge of God or his Christ. They say, "They will remain in the congregation of the dead; they have had a law of conscience that will save them if obeyed, and if rejected they will never see life."

They quote Rom. ii. 12-15 to prove it. Now it is evident that if there could have been a law given that could have given life, then verily righteousness should have been by the law. "The just must live by faith," if any man is "justified by law, he is fallen from grace."

I asked one of the above if he did not believe that all children living at the coming of Christ, and all the ignorant heathen would have the privilege of believing on him and have a right to the tree of life if obedient? He said, he did. I told him they had been a law to themselves as much as those dead, and if God gives them a chance to believe, after Jesus comes, he certainly will give the like characters from the dead the same chance, or be liable to the charge of partiality. He said, he did not know, but he did not believe they would be raised, etc.

May God help us to be more conformed to his will in all things; for, His will must be done in all things. I mean to spread this glorious gospel far and wide as I have opportunity and strength. The brethren like the EXAMINER much.

As ever, your brother, in faith and hope.
Tunnel City, Wis.

REMARK BY THE EDITOR.—Bro. Putnam takes fifteen copies of the EXAMINER, and has subscribers for them all. He seems to be at work in earnest. May the Lord raise up many such, and they will find their labor is not in vain. Saints and sinners, all over the land, are starving for lack of a life giving element which they have not.

FROM H. HEYKS TO ELD. BLAIN.

BRO. BLAIN: I thought, rather than write you privately, it were better to say through the EXAMINER something concerning Rev. xxii. 11. You may remember we had some talk about this Scripture in Springfield, last summer.

An Advent preacher, H. K. Flagg, had said to me, he would convict me of infidelity in fifteen minutes. He took his Bible and read me a few verses here and there, and asked me if I believed them? I told him I did. He then read, "He that is unjust," etc. He asked me if I believed that? Instead of saying directly, Yes, I spoke in a way requiring some discussion. H. K. F. got right up, and said he would talk no more with me!

On speaking to you, Bro. Blain, about this verse I found you not satisfied about it. We were both agreed that any inference drawn from it could not justly be allowed to overthrow a mass of prophetic truth.

Thinking of late about Rev. xxii. 11, it occurred to me to say, what others may improve on: The book of Revelation is given to the churches. See Rev. xxii. 16, also several places in second and third chapters. In chapters one and two we read, "To show unto his servants," etc.

Now, Bro. B., may not the unjust, the filthy, the righteous, the holy, be faithful and unfaithful servants; and have no bearing on mankind otherwise? I would not take away from the words of the book: let the verse have its full import. I do not think I do the Scripture injustice.

Hartford, Conn.

FROM ABRAHAM PENNELL.

BRO. STORRS: If it would be any comfort or encouragement for me to say, I am highly pleased with the EXAMINER in its matter and form, I would cheerfully do it. I think the present form has several advantages over the former one. Though it seems to be a long time between its appearance, yet, when it does come, it brings a double load of the precious treasure from both sides of the Atlantic Ocean. The light does shine on both sides; and if it were not for the "blindness in part, that has happened unto" the Gentiles, they might see it, and correct some of their dreadful errors and blindness, by which they misrepresented man, and cast a dark shade upon the character and government of God; and, to a certain extent, make the revelation He has given of "no effect by their traditions."

God says, "My ways are equal." If this be so, we must get on a wider gauge than the popular teachings to understand how that declaration is true.

If with the present dispensation all hope for the race ends, and Jesus, the only name given whereby we can be saved, ceases to save any more, it is very evident that a vast majority of the human family must be forever lost. And all the result of ignorance, never having heard of Jesus and his salvation. Does this prove that God's ways are equal? If so, I fail to see it.

There must be a mistake somewhere; either the inspired writers or their readers have made it; and my faith is so strong in inspiration, I think it is not there. The fault, then, must be in their readers: and the mistake seems to be with the Gentiles, in this dispensation, similar to that of the Jews in their dispensation. They were the chosen people of God; and of course must monopolize all God's favors at the expense of all the rest of mankind. "The elect, chosen of this dispensation, constitute the people of God, and that sets the bounds to God's mercy." Well, the Jew ought to have learned his mistake by this time; and I think the Gentile will have to travel full as far in the next dispensation before he learns his mistake. To be sure, he can wonder at the stupidity and blindness of the Jew; and in a very friendly manner begin to pick out the mote that is in his eye, with a full grown beam in his own. Where is boasting then? It is excluded: by what law? The common sense law of interpreting the Scriptures. Apply that, and all comes out right, giving glory to God in the highest, peace on earth and good will to men.

Why, we ought to have outgrown these narrow limits of theological teaching and sectarian boundaries long ago, and had beacon lights of the everlasting kingdom shining with such lustre as to attract the attention and admiration of all christendom.

Honeoye, N. Y.

FROM JAMES M. YOUNG.

BRO. STORRS: I wish you to know that I am much pleased with the BIBLE EXAMINER. It is not the form of the sheet I look at, but those endearing thoughts and ideas found in its welcome pages. Withal, it certainly is more convenient in its present form; and I now shall carefully keep each number, that my children may bless God that He permitted their father to welcome this rising light.

At the start, I was taxed to see your views of election. From a child I have thought that Abraham's God ruled all of His universe. I wondered how any man could think otherwise. I could not see how God could be disappointed. This idea of God has been the anchor of all my hopes. The idea caused my friends to stand aloof from me as from spots of leprosy. I could see but few things on earth finished; and if things went on in this way my Redeemer was going to suffer a terrible defeat. Your "SIX SERMONS" came to hand, and I saw light, cheering, but dim. It was light from God. I hailed it with much joy; and as you have held up your lamp I could see each step distinctly. As one holding his breath, wondering and delighted, I have walked with you; and as you unlocked each door, I stepped in and witnessed all the finishing of the room. Go on, brother, as you are only in the court of the Gentiles yet.

Thanks be unto God who giveth us the victory through our Lord Jesus Christ. Faith lends its realizing light; the clouds disperse, the shadows fly, the Invisible appears in sight, and God is seen by mortal eye. The storm about me still rages. But I can see above it. Our Father in heaven smiles. Yes, my aged brother, I shall meet you by and by; and you will then know me,—one of the loving family. In our Father's house are many mansions. It is not likely that you shall be able or have time to unlock but few of them, as it takes much time and labor to explain the grandeur and beauty of each room to your inquisitive, cautious, increasing company. It puts me in mind of a class of little school girls looking through a fence at a flower garden, asking questions of the kind-hearted gardener; they long to kiss those lovely, blooming flowers.

As you lay down your pen, no doubt, God will raise up finishing helpers to herald the heavenly King and his redeeming power. Oh what joy awaits the Bride of the coming King!

"With confidence I now draw nigh,
And Father, abba, Father cry."

Caleb and Joshua only brought back a true report; yet they led Israel through the desert to the promised land. As Moses, God has enabled you, by the rod, to give (light) "water" to the clear famished Israel. A good shepherd delights to see pure water for his thirsty, bleeding flock. I have no doubt but young Caleb and Joshua are, even now, in your camp! How beautiful are thy tents, O Jacob; and thy tabernacles, O Israel! With what pleasure Moses beheld those two young men! How his heart blessed them! What a pleasure to give his departing charge to Joshua, and then ascends the mount to take a full survey of each hill, valley, stream, and grove: yea, all of the beautiful landscape; the humble fig-tree, the aged cedar, and the waving palm; his last look, the most trying point, attracts his gaze; his fatherly gaze comes back to the herds and flocks, and last to lone white tents. His eye is not dim. God's shepherd now shakes with parental emotion. One by one his eye rests on twelve companies: he remembers the burning bush; he remembers Egypt and her plagues; he remembers the Red Sea; he thinks of the precious Rock that flowed; oft-times his inmost heart blessed them; they were dearer to him than life; he sees them after him; they dare not follow. In advance of all are Joshua and Caleb. As he looked on them, he remembers how confidently he heard them say, "We are able to go up and possess the land." A noise behind now may have attracted his attention. The One which spake to him on the flaming mount! Moses' eyes have turned from the white tents of Israel to Him who said, "No man can see my face and live." Amen.

So may thine eyes turn from the tents of Israel to the City of God when thy work is done. Glory, immortality, eternal life.

Earth's cares with me will soon be o'er,
Yet rugged steps still lie before,
While God, my Father, cries, "My son
Be of good cheer, your crown is won."

Time, long or short, the same to me,
With joy I shall his Israel see;
From sorrow we shall all be free;
With God there is a crown for thee.

Dancer, Mich.

FROM OLIVE A. PERCY.

BRO. STORRS: Another year is nearly gone. A year less to live. How few, comparatively, of the great family of mankind there are, who, as they journey on through this world, seem to realize that life is very, very short. They toil on from year to year; some to obtain wealth; some to become learned and influential; some for political power; and others there are who seem merely to live, because life is given them; apparently without ambition or desire of any kind.

Few ever even stop a moment at the close of a year, month, week, or day, to think that they are so much nearer eternity; and yet how true; precious hours never to return; like a book, leaf after leaf is turned until all is read, and the past closed up. Its clouds and sunshine; seed-time and harvest; joys and sorrow: and we stand between the past and future, and can but look up to the Father and ask, child-like, What may the book of another year read to us? Let us press closer to a Saviour's feet than ever before, and ask for strength, wisdom, and patience, to perform every task, do every duty, work faithfully, not choosing the way ourselves, until He says "It is enough;" rest from all care and labor.

Thy way, not mine, O Lord,
However dark it be;
Lead me by thy own hand;
Choose thou for me, my God,
So shall I walk aright.
Take thou my cup, and it
With joy or sorrow fill,
As best to thee may seem;
Choose thou my good and ill.

Rouayton, Conn., Dec., 1878.

FROM J. L. KNAPP.

BRO. STORRS: I have received the EXAMINER since I came to this coast. I am much pleased with the improvement; I prize it higher than any reading besides my Bible. I think I shall be able to do something in its circulation on this coast before long. In conversation with two Advent Ministers recently, they both said, they did not believe it absolutely necessary for a man to believe on Christ in order to be saved in the Kingdom of God: if they acted up to the law in their consciences they would be saved. If this is true, the preaching of the Gospel has been a curse. As it has been preached and lived, many have become infidels who, perhaps, might have been saved if they had been left to the law of their conscience. One man said, "God knew who would believe." I told him, if God saved on that principle, He might have saved the death of his Son; and saved all who would have believed, without this greater outlay of suffering. But what says the word of God on this subject? Rom. iii. 20, "Therefore by the deeds of the law there shall be no flesh justified in his sight; for by the law is the knowledge of sin" (Rom. iii. 20). "Knowing that a man is not justified by the works of the law, but by the faith of Jesus Christ, even we have believed in Jesus Christ, that we might be justified by the faith of Christ, and not by works of the law; for by the works of the law shall no flesh be justified" (Gal. ii. 1-10). But that no man is justified by the law "in the sight of God, it is evident: for, the just shall live by faith" (Gal. iii. 2). "Christ is become of no effect unto you, whosoever of you are justified by the law; ye are fallen from grace" (Gal. v. 4). We read, "Jesus said unto him, I am the way, the truth, and the life; no man cometh unto the Father, but by me" (John xiv. 6). In John x. 9 Jesus says, "I am the door;" and in the first verse He says, "He that entereth not by the door into the sheep-fold, but climbeth up some other way, the same is a thief and a robber."

How men, who contend so much for the honor of Jesus, as our Advent brethren do, and yet try to get men into the Kingdom by law, is a mystery, only that blindness in part has happened to Israel in these days.

Santa Clara, Cal., Jan., 1874.

E. E. LOWELL, writes from Winnegance, Me.: I am much interested and profited by the teaching of the BIBLE EXAMINER. I am seeking for light and truth. I have never read any work which throws so much light on the Bible as it sets forth; although I do not understand all I read, yet it looks like a God of justice to give all an opportunity to know what Christ has done for them that they may accept or reject Him. May the Lord bless you with health and means, and continue to enlighten you by his Holy Spirit that you may spread light and truth before a perishing world. A few here have embraced your views of probation after Christ comes. I am indebted to one of these for the EXAMINER, being too poor to pay myself, he paid for me. I lend them to those who will read; and may God bless them to their eternal good. Your brother in Christ.

FROM AMOS SANFORD, Esq.

BRO. STORRS: I am glad to notice that you propose, as you have time, to speak to the people in such places as will furnish a Hall not connected with any sect or party. A hall can be had at this place and hearers to listen to you; but I suppose the great distance precludes the idea of your coming to this far west. I would indeed, be glad to hear you, and if I never meet you in this age, I hope (desire and expect) to meet you in the "age to come." May God bless you in your labor of love.

Permit me here to say to the brethren of like precious faith, that more of us ought to go and do likewise. I include myself, because I am ready to respond to invitations in South Eastern Kansas, South Western Missouri, North Western Arkansas, and the Indian Territory. My address is COLUMBUS, Cherokee Co., Kansas.

FROM ELDER T. T. JENKS.

BRO. STORRS: It is with increasing interest that I read the EXAMINER from month to month. I am becoming more and more convinced by the study of the Word, especially the prophets, that the work of redemption does not stop with the Second Advent. Our Advent brethren seem to think they have the whole plan worked out from beginning to the end; but I am satisfied that we have but just entered the boundless field of God's truth and love to man. "Oh the depth of the riches, both of the wisdom and knowledge of God! How unsearchable are his judgments, and his ways are past finding out."

Westfield, Mass., Feb., 1874.

ALPHEUS McCORD, Olona, Ohio, writes: I can say, with Bro. P. Alling, in regard to the doctrine advocated by the EXAMINER, I am becoming more and more confirmed in their correctness; therefore I am willing to the extent of my ability to help disseminate the views therein advocated. I have distributed forty copies of the EXAMINER within the last month; and I trust good will result; of this I feel well assured, because no "labor is in vain in the Lord."

NOTE BY THE EDITOR.—I have several hundred odd numbers of Vol. 17 still on hand, which I will send, in parcels, to any one who will pay the postage (one cent for each two copies) and scatter them among such as will read.

WALTER PATTERSON, Delhi, N. Y., writes: I have been in the habit of sending the EXAMINER to Scotland after I had perused it. But since it has been published a monthly Magazine, I have found it so exceedingly interesting that I could not spare it; and besides, I have enough to do with it here. I find some of my neighbors deeply interested in its perusal, and I hope soon to prevail on them to become subscribers. However, my dear friend in Scotland must not be forgotten; I therefore send $3 to pay for him. Please send the back numbers of this volume.

WM. SUTTER, Everton, Ont., Canada, writes: The BIBLE EXAMINER is a very welcome visitor to our Canadian home; and especially in its new form. It will now be much more easily preserved for future perusal, and much it contains will stand reading many times. It is very refreshing to find people endeavoring to teach others, who are themselves earnest seekers after truth; dogmatism and bigotry being the order of the day. Wishing you and yours every blessing, I remain yours, in love.

TO THE READERS OF THE EXAMINER.

Brethren, Sisters, and Friends: We are publishing two pamphlets to aid our Mission Tent enterprise, viz., "A Concise History of the Truth of the Primitive Christian Fathers," and "The Tree of Life," by C. F. Sweet; also his "Colloquy" with Dr. A. Campbell on everlasting punishment. As we go into new fields with our tent, we need just such works to answer certain inquirers and silence objectors; and while we expect to keep a supply of other books on hand, we can get none to fill the place of these. They will be printed about the first of next May; but times are hard, money is scarce, and we are poor. We ask, therefore, all who can and will, to send us $1— or more, if they will,—to aid us in this enterprise, and we will send, as soon as printed, six of our pamphlets, three of each, (the Colloquy and Tree of Life being bound as one,) for each dollar received.

If by this means we can receive $100, or thereabouts, by the 1st of May, we can pay for printing, and go into the regions beyond with our tent, unencumbered by debt. Who will invest $1 to send the gospel to the poor and blind.

The two pamphlets contain about 150 pages and will retail for not less than 20 cents each. They are free to the Lord's honest poor. Send for some. Address either of the following:

Geo. ATKINSON, North Attleboro, Mass., writes: I am well pleased with the EXAMINER. It makes an excellent Institute; one that will be worth preserving and binding for a Text Book. Yes, and one that will do to read and re-read, time and again.

ILLUSTRATED JOURNAL.—The most brilliant and attractive Monthly in the world, embellished with beautiful Engravings, and elegantly printed on fine tinted paper. 50 full page Engravings during the year. Editor's Notices.

THE EDITOR of this Magazine expects to be in Pittsburg, Pa., the first and second Sundays of this month, and speak on the Divine Character and Government. The place, or Hall, will be given in the papers of that city.

LYNN, MASS.—Since April 1st the Editor of this Magazine has spent two Sundays in the above named place: had good attention and large audiences. He trusts the cause of truth was promoted, and the Divine Character and Government will be better understood and loved than ever. He had pleasing interviews with friends, and was helped on his way in a liberal manner. May the Lord bless and reward them.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.—It is my desire that all letters for me be sent to my residence, as I visit New York but once a day, and sometimes only once in two or three days; while the "Letter Carriers" deliver letters four times each day, Sundays excepted. I shall still retain my Post Office Box in New York, because I fear loss by giving it up, at present, as that address has been placed on all my works scattered for twenty years past. I prefer that all persons communicating with me hereafter address me as follows,

GEO. STORRS,
72 Hicks Street,
BROOKLYN, N. Y.

THE BIBLE EXAMINER.—I will supply volume 17 in sheets (perfect sets) on the receipt of sixty cents. Also, odd numbers of that volume (or broken sets) for one cent for each two copies, which is simply to pay the postage. Who will scatter them?

EXCHANGES.—Hereafter I shall receive no paper or periodical as an Exchange that does not come to me postage paid, and directed to me, "72 Hicks Street, BROOKLYN, N. Y." In return for such, I will send the BIBLE EXAMINER postage paid.

BRO. G. H. DANFORTH, of Norwichtown, Ct., fell asleep in Jesus, Feb. 23, in the expectation of a resurrection in the morning of our Lord's return from heaven. May the grace of our blessed Redeemer sustain his bereaved widow in this hour of trial.

FROM ADELIA P. DANFORTH.

BRO. STORRS: My husband, G. H. DANFORTH, fell asleep in Jesus, February 23d, aged sixty-seven. He was sick five months with Sciatica Rheumatism, and was a great sufferer, but bore all with patience. The first of January he took a severe cold and died with pneumonia. He fell asleep in full hope of a resurrection. His last words were, "Jesus, come."

G. H. BUZZELL, Concord, N. H., writes; I am much pleased and interested in the EXAMINER. It is the best of anything I have the knowledge of. I can say with a full soul, God speed the right, and bring us safely to Mount Zion, where Christ shall sit on David's throne. I long to see Him there, and myself with the multitude made immortal. How cheering it is to be in that path of the just whose light and knowledge are increasing to get out that beaten track that knows no advance.

No. 8.

THE DESTINY OF THE UNREGENERATE.

Twenty-four years since, an eminent minister of the gospel in England, (H. H. Dohney), wrote me, saying: "There are but three things possible, only three theories which can be held," viz.:

"1. Those who die in a state of impenitence will be sooner or later converted to God in the next state, and be saved:—or,

"2. They will continue to exist forever in a state of alienation, and therefore of misery:—or,

"3. They will cease to be, perish forever.

"I can conceive of no fourth alternative. . . . Of these predicaments, the first is the happiest; that which commends itself to the heart, and which seems the most worthy of God, and the most honorable to him. But if we are to confine ourselves to the Scripture argument, our own independent opinions are hushed, the moral argument is declined," etc.

I am happy to know that since the above was written Mr. DONNEY'S views have been modified both on the "Scriptural" and "moral argument." I have not introduced the subject to state what his present views are, but to express my own on the moral argument. If I believed God had created us with a moral nature which a professed revelation contradicted, especially when that moral faculty has become Christianized, I must be compelled to reject such a professed revelation as not of God my Creator; because such a system or theory makes God to contradict himself, which is impossible. Creation and revelation harmonize, or God is not "the same yesterday, to-day and forever." But he says, "I am the Lord, I change not; therefore ye sons of Jacob are not consumed" (Mal. iii. 6).

Hence, God having created us with a moral faculty by which we may, "even of ourselves, judge what is right" (Luke xxi. 57), it cannot be contradicted by any revelation made by Him when that revelation is rightly understood. Who will dare affirm that God thus contradicts Himself? True, men do affirm it, and call on us to accept their blasphemous theories; and multitudes bow to such usurpations over the God-given power to "judge what is right."

Those who allow their moral faculties to be over-ridden by the "traditions of men" are constantly in danger of being corrupted by any superstition or wild fanaticism, and to be pushed onward into infidelity. It is a dangerous position men fall into who suffer their moral nature to be outraged by pretended revelations; they are liable to be the sport of a deceiver, till they lose all knowledge of "the only true God." Such, alas, to an alarming extent, is the state of christendom this day.

"God is Love," and "a just God and Saviour" (1 John iv. 8, 16; and Isa. xlv. 21). He has said, "Look unto me, and be ye saved, all the ends of the earth: for I am God, and there is none else: I have sworn by Myself, the word is gone out of my mouth in righteousness, and shall not return, That unto me every knee shall bow, every tongue shall swear" (Isa. xlv. 22, 23). Who shall disannul God's oath or make void his purpose? All christendom knows, to-day, that oath has not yet had a fulfilment in any important sense; and millions on millions have died who never did bow the knee, nor hear God's voice calling them to Look unto Him and be saved. Is our moral sense to be shocked with the assumption that all these millions are to be punished with eternal torments or annihilation without any opportunity to comply with God's invitation and command, made and confirmed with an oath? and simply because "tradition" affirms that the only chance for submission and obedience, for any of the race, is in this present life?

JEHOVAH himself gives the lie to that assumption; not only in His word, but in the moral sense, or moral consciousness, He has implanted in every human being He has made: to deny that, is to deny that God is unchangeable, and to affirm He is divided in His administration and His revelations: His works saying one thing, and His word another and a very different thing.

Nothing less than a vast majority of the human race can be embraced in the oath of God, that to Him "every knee shall bow," and that through Christ; for, says Paul, "God hath highly exalted Him, and given Him a name which is above every name: that at the name of Jesus every knee should bow of things in heaven, and things in earth, and things under the earth; and that every tongue shall glory confess that Jesus Christ is Lord, to the glory of God the Father" (Phil. ii. 9-11).

"All things" not only in heaven and earth, but "under the earth," embrace the dead as well as the living, and the terms all and every cannot be made to mean a few; there may be exceptions, but they must be the few. While it may be admitted that the terms are not always used in the absolute sense, it must also be admitted they embrace the mass.

After more than fifty years study of the Scriptures, I am satisfied, the "few" saved in the dispensations past and present, are "the kings and priests" that God has "taken out of the nations;" and the mass yet to be saved are the subjects of the kingdom of God, to be taught, governed and blessed in "the ages to come," but who never attain to "the crowned" honor. Let those who would attain to this high honor know, it is those who now "suffer with Christ" that "shall be glorified together with Him." Those who expect to attain to such honor by a time-serving and man-pleasing policy, or who make self-gratification a ruling principle, and refuse the reproach attendant on a self-denying course for Christ and his words, will meet with disappointment. "Strive to enter in at the strait gate"—too strait for those last mentioned—and "walk in the narrow way"—too narrow for those who wish for "flowery beds of ease," and refuse to bear reproach for the truth and Christ; and who, when truth is unpopular, refrain from proclaiming it lest they lose reputation, support, or some other consideration equally unworthy of a follower of Christ.

The spirit that will be found worthy to receive a crown in the kingdom of God, is the spirit of man "seeking goodly pearls: who, when he had found one pearl of great price, went and sold all that he had and bought it" (Matt. xiii, 45, 46). Nothing, no matter how dear, must be withheld when God calls for the sacrifice. He that loveth father, mother, wife or children, houses or lands, or his own life better than Christ and His words, has no just ground to expect a "crown" as king and priest in the kingdom of God. Such is the law of this dispensation; but "the ages to come" are for the subduing of the masses of the human family—ages of judgment—i. e., rule to decide the final state of every soul of the race, in which state all will be taught and governed, and submission or final destruction will be the result. In this view our moral sense and revelation are in harmony; God's ways are shown to be equal, and His long suffering proved to be what the Bible everywhere represents it to be. Then will come to pass the saying that is written, "Every creature which is in heaven, and on the earth, and under the earth, and such as are in the sea, and all that are in them heard I saying, 'Blessing, and honor, and glory, and power, be unto Him that sitteth upon the throne, and unto the Lamb forever and ever'" (Rev. v. 12, 13). Glorious consummation; just such as our moral sense approves, and with which it harmonizes perfectly.

If Mr. Dobney does not now occupy the same ground I have taken, there can be no essential difference, if I understand him. It gives me much pleasure and encouragement to find one who started in opposition to the doctrine of inherent immortality about the same time with myself has arrived at nearly the same conclusions at length, neither of us having any knowledge of the operations of the other's mind on the great question on which we now seem nearly agreed, though our intercourse had been discontinued for near twenty years.

Mr. Dobney no longer sees it necessary to suppose the Scripture leads us to "decline the moral argument." God's character, government, and word, all make it imperative on us to give prominence to the moral argument; and the man who does not use it, so far, dishonors his CREATOR, who has endowed him with a moral nature.

A REQUEST.

BRO. STORNS: Will you please expound and chronologically locate Rev. xxii. 11? E. C.

The text reads, "He that is unjust, let him be unjust still; and he which is filthy, let him be filthy still; and he that is righteous, let him be righteous still; and he that is holy, let him be holy still."

Dr. BLOOMFIELD, in his "Critical Notes of the Greek New Testament," says, on the language of this text, "g. d. 'If he persists in his unrighteousness, he will reap the consequences of it.' The mode of expression is authoritative. (Newc.) Agreeably to this, Mr. Holden well paraphrases: 'They who after this revelation and the awful warnings given them, continue to be unjust and filthy, let them remain so, and reap the punishment worthy of their deeds.'"

Such, I think, is the true exposition of the text. As to its "chronology," it can only be placed, as to individuals, "AFTER this revelation and the awful warnings" are "given them." Hence is applicable to no one till after the truth of the matters revealed has been made known to them. To apply the language to all men, without regard to their unavoidable ignorance, and fix its application at death, or at the second advent, as if the final state of all men was then a fixed fact, is an unwarrantable use of the language, and a palpable contradiction of the Divine testimony in a multitude of other Scriptures, which affirm that a "due time" will come to "all men," when the fact of Christ having given "himself a ransom for" them shall be testified "to them." After that is done, whether in this age or in "the ages to come," in this life or a future one, then the deliberate choice or determination of the individual will fix his condition unalterably.

There is nothing in the text nor context that warrants any one in giving any other construction to the words. The verse that follows shows that I have the true idea of the text: "And, behold, I come quickly; and my reward is with me, to give every man according as his work shall be." This reward is meted out according to the knowledge or ignorance of individuals: "That servant, which knew his Lord's will, and prepared not himself, neither did according to His will, shall be beaten with many stripes. But he that knew not, and did commit things worthy of stripes, shall be beaten with few" (Luke xii. 47, 48). Here ignorance is shown as an excuse for not inflicting an extreme punishment. But to suppose the final state is unalterably fixed without the knowledge of "the true God and of Jesus Christ," is to suppose the stripes are equal on both classes, and thus contradicts the testimony of Jesus.

The purpose of God and his will is, that, "all men shall come to the knowledge of the truth" before a final decision, that makes their case and state unalterable, as expressed in Rev. xxii. 11. Till after that knowledge is obtained, though men may and do commit things which will bring "stripes," yet their final state is not fixed; but their conduct may and will have some bearing on their final trial for an endless life. Those who improve now, according to the best light they have, will be better prepared to accept the great salvation when clearly set before them, and will be more likely to accept it then.

That the text Rev. xxii. 11 may be applied at any time to all who have the knowledge of "the only true God and Jesus Christ," and deliberately and wilfully refuse subjection to the Divine claims and government, may be true; for a time will come to all such when God will say, "My Spirit shall not always strive with man" (Gen. vi. 3); and their persistence in rejecting His truth and resisting the Spirit of God will result in their being given over to that state of sin and wickedness set forth in the text under consideration, while those who have yielded to the truth and Spirit of God, will be confirmed in their state of holiness.

Whenever the truth is presented to an individual, and set home to his heart by the Holy Spirit, so that he is called to a choice of the service of God, if he then wilfully persists in a sinful course, he is in danger of the awful state set forth in Rev. xxii. 11; and may well tremble lest the sentence is confirmed, and he be fixed in a state unalterable, and receive the punishment that awaits all such characters.

Warnings like those in this text are not mere pretences, as some seem to suppose; but are exhibitions of terrible realities to which a course of wilful sinning will ultimately lead. Let all take the warning, and make sure work for "the ages to come," while they have opportunity; for "the night cometh, when no man can work" (John ix. 4). Let none to whom the truth is now manifested flatter themselves they will ever have a better or another opportunity to avail themselves of its benefit. To all such, the language of Scripture is, "Behold, now is the accepted time; behold, now is the day of salvation" (2 Cor. vi. 3). Ed.

THE REMOVAL OF EVIL.

God said, The Seed of the woman should bruise the serpent's head; which can have no meaning short of saying. The Seed of the woman shall fully remove the evil introduced by the serpent's subtlety.

This position is objected to on the ground that it involves universal salvation; but I inquire, Cannot all the evils introduced by Adam's sin be removed without the final salvation of all his posterity? For what do any of Adam's race ultimately perish? Is it for his sin, or for their own personal sins? God has said, "The son shall not bear the iniquity of the father"—"the soul that sinneth it shall die" (Ezek. xviii. 20).

A final death is no part of the evil introduced by Adam's sin. Paul's argument (Rom. v.) proves my position that all the evil resulting from Adam's one sin will be ultimately removed. He speaks as follows: "Therefore, as by the offence of one, judgment came upon all men to condemnation; even so by the righteousness of one the free gift came upon all men unto justification of life: for as by one man's disobedience the many" (all men) "are made sinners, so by the disobedience of one shall the many" (the same all men) "be made righteous" (verses 18, 19).

No language could more strongly sustain my position, that all the evil which was introduced into the world by the subtlety of the serpent shall be removed by the Seed of the woman. There is a universal salvation from that evil. But what has that to do with salvation from one's own personal sins? No man will be held in death by Adam's sin, nor go into a final death state except for his own sins, committed against the knowledge of God's remedy, and a wilful rejection of it.

Christ — "The seed of the woman" — has "abolished death," that which came by Adam, "and brought life and immortality to light through the Gospel" (2 Tim. i. 10). The Gospel shows that the death brought into the world by the first transgression, or sin of Adam, is "annulled, abrogated:" it has no power to hold one of Adam's race: Christ has, by His death and resurrection, "destroyed the power of death" to hold any of the race in its dominion. It was for this purpose He "took flesh and blood," that "through death He might destroy him that had the power of death," that is, the devil—de-evil, the evil introduced by the "one transgression." That evil will be totally annulled, eradicated, and nothing of it remain: "the times of restitution of all things, which God hath spoken by the mouth of all His holy prophets since the world began"—or, since the days of Adam—will put an end to all the evil introduced by the serpent's subtlety.

That this is universal salvation in one sense, I admit. It saves all the race from the consequences of Adam's one sin; but our own sins are entirely another matter. Deliverance from them and their consequences depends ultimately upon the reception of the remedy God has provided; if that is rejected when made known, then our sins remain on our own heads, and death is the ultimate and unavoidable result from our natural mortality; for no man is immortal from nature, and only a change to immortality can make us such, and such change is the peculiar gift of God to those who have "part in the first resurrection" (Rev. xx. 6), which is the subject also of Paul in 1 Cor. xv.; and likewise of Jesus, Luke xx. 36. In all these texts it is the first class in the resurrection that is spoken of; for "the rest of the dead live not again till the thousand years are finished;" a later period is allotted to their revival, nor is a word said of such being raised immortal, or of their putting on immortality subsequently; yet it is said, after the holy city is established on the earth, and the Bride (the immortal ones) is there, that "The nations of them which are saved, shall walk in the light of" the city, and it expressly says "the LAMB is the light thereof"; and it is added, "A pure river of water of life, clear as crystal, proceeded out of the throne of God and the Lamb . . . and on either side of the river, was there the tree of life, which bare twelve fruits, and yielded her fruit every month: and the leaves of the tree were for the healing (or health) of the nations." (Rev. xxi. and xxii.)

No immortal ones need such a provision. Such a provision Adam did need, and had he remained obedient, he would have been permitted to "eat thereof and live forever." (Gen. iii. 22). So those who are the subjects of the resurrection, subsequent to the thousand years, as well as "the left of the nations" (Zech. xiv. 16) will, if obedient, have access to the tree of life, eat thereof, be kept in health, and live forever; but if disobedient, they will be excluded from it and die, as Adam did, for their own sin; and no remedy is revealed for such sinners, that I know of.

My view consists in the firm belief of a full and final deliverance of the entire race, from all the evil introduced into the world by Adam's sin; so that by "the restitution of all things," etc., no one of the race will find he has lost anything by that evil. But on the contrary, has gained, or may gain, by the experience of the past, and the knowledge of the future, an inexhaustible treasure of knowledge and wisdom, concerning the perfections of God, especially of His love, that may prove a source of eternal joy, to which he never could have attained by any other course of discipline. Yet all this may be lost by your own personal sins, or wilful refusal to accept the offered benefits on God's terms.

Ed.

HOW OFT SHALL I FORGIVE HIM ?

WHEN Peter asked Jesus, "Lord, how oft shall my brother sin against me and I forgive him? till seven times?" Jesus answered him, "I say not unto thee, Until seven times; but until seventy times seven" (Matt. xix. 21, 22).

If God requires us thus to forgive one another, establishing the principle that no length of sinning against us releases us from the obligation of forgiveness, shall any one conclude that it is impossible or improbable that He may extend his forgiving love beyond this short life? especially to such as have never heard of that love?

The number seven seems to be a peculiar, if not a mystical, number: it marks perfection. "Seven days, seven months, seven years, seven times seven years, seven churches, seven golden candlesticks, seven seals, seven angels, seven trumpets, seven thunders, seven vials," and a multitude of other things are set forth by the number seven.

The seven years, in the Mosaic law, is a marked epoch when Israelitish servants went out free (Ex. xxi. 2-5). And when seven times seven years had transpired, bringing the Jubilee, the trumpet sounded which "proclaimed liberty throughout all the land unto all the inhabitants thereof: it shall be a jubilee unto you; and ye shall return every man unto his possession," etc.

Here were only seven times seven years, and liberty came to all the inhabitants of the land, however they had previously lost their liberty and their possessions. We may conclude that there was designed to be, and probably will yet be, the jubilee of jubilees. At any rate, these times and seasons were typical of something in the future—a liberty among men and for men not yet developed, though dimly (it may be) shadowed forth in the law.

Saith the Saviour, You shall "forgive until seventy times seven;" a definite number put for an indefinite one; as much as to say, "You must never lose or put from you a spirit of forgiveness; but be always ready to forgive trespasses against you without limitation."

Why? Because, by such a course, you manifest the spirit of your "Father which is in heaven:" "He maketh His sun to rise on the evil and the good, and sendeth rain on the just and the unjust" (Matt. v. 45). If our heavenly Father, through His Son, commandeth us thus to forgive those who sin against us, are we to suppose a time will come when He will cease to exercise a spirit of forgiveness towards any soul of man who implores that mercy? The idea that such a time will come borders on blasphemy. It supposes that He commands us to be more perfect and more forgiving than himself.

Bishop Newton, who was a believer in inherent immortality, and a believer in the letter of everlasting punishment," is shocked at the idea of its being necessarily unending, and says, "the spirit of Scripture indicates the contrary." He says:

"Repentance in hell is not impossible. . . . If the wicked should turn away from his wickedness, he should be plucked as a fire-brand out of the fire."—See Bishop Newton's Works, London Edition, 1787, Dissertation 60.

Thus, in the mind of "orthodoxy" itself there is an effort to show that in a future state, even for sinners in hell, God's forgiving love has still a place, if they repent. The struggle in Bishop Newton's mind is that which rises up in every man's mind, if he gives himself to anything like an independent thought. Do God's mercies cease with the present life, to every unconverted son and daughter of Adam, without regard to their knowledge of His mercy and the means He has provided whereby they may have final salvation from sin and death's dominion? That is the question relating to God's forgiving love. God so loved the world that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in him should not perish, but have everlasting life" (John iii. 16). Will He not see to it that, if this life or a future one, every soul of man shall have the knowledge of His love and the means to improve it to life everlasting? "He that spared not his own Son, but delivered him up for us all, how shall he not with him also freely give us all things?" (Rom. viii. 32). Is it not true that, "The whole creation groaneth and travaileth in pain together until now?" and, also, that "The earnest expectation of the creature waiteth for the manifestation of the sons of God?" (Rom. viii. 19, 22.) Sorrow, pain, disquietude, ignorance, and uncertainty as to the way to escape from sin and its consequences, yet hoping that some "Golden Age" will yet come, wherein deliverance will reach them. The character of that Age they are in ignorance of, and of the means to be employed in blessing them; but it really is the "manifestation of the sons of God," or the true Church of God, glorified, and exalted to be "kings and priests unto God and the Lamb," to bless and save their poor and ignorant fellow creatures who never had the light and privilege of these "sons of God;" but shall now be blessed through their ministration; and if not wilfully rejecting the Really God has provided "for sin and uncleanness," (Zech. xiii. 1), they will come to Him, who proclaimed himself, "The Lord, the Lord God, merciful and gracious, long-suffering, and abundant in goodness and truth, keeping mercy for thousands, forgiving iniquity, transgression and sin" (Ex. xxxiv. 6, 7). Yes, God's forgiving mercy is as everlasting as his nature; and not till he ceases to be God, will he cease to forgive the penitent, believing sinner, here or hereafter, nor suffer any soul of man to perish for the lack of the knowledge of His Remedy for their estate of sin. Ed.

THE PRAYER OF JESUS, JOHN XVII

In a previous EXAMINER a portion of that prayer was noticed. I propose now to look at the first part of it. He says to his Father, "As Thou hast given unto him (the Son) power over all flesh, that He should give eternal life to as many as Thou hast given him: and this is life eternal, that they might know Thee the only true God, and Jesus Christ, whom Thou hast sent" (verses 2 and 3).

This part of the prayer has a fulness of meaning that is not to be hastily passed over, and which few, it is to be feared, comprehend. That Christ has "power given him over all flesh," surely, none will dare deny who respect the New Testament, however they may regard the Old. There is no evading the fact, that "all," here, does not mean a "few;" and the quibble on "all nations," as if that expression did not include all families and all individuals, is completely overthrown by the words of Jesus—"all flesh." That most assuredly includes every individual of the race of Adam.

The object for which the Father gave the Son this power over all flesh is clearly expressed, viz., That He should give eternal life;" and then the statement is made as to how it is to be given, viz., by the knowledge of "Thee, the only true God, and Jesus Christ, whom Thou hast sent."

Now, if the only way to give eternal life is to communicate the knowledge of the true God and Jesus Christ, then it follows, inevitably, that "all flesh"—all men—must have that knowledge communicated to them in this life or somewhere and somehow hereafter, whether they improve it or not. Christ having power given him over all flesh with the special object to give eternal life, He must have equal power to make known to all flesh the knowledge of the only true God and Himself; and not to do it is to make Him the cause of the failure of men to secure that life; because, as men cannot have eternal life without the knowledge spoken of; and as no man can have that, unless he has it revealed to him by the proclamation of the only true God and Jesus Christ, no one can be to blame for their want of that knowledge except those who neglect to give it to them.

As moral and accountable beings, men may refuse or neglect to improve by the knowledge given them, but the knowledge of the true God and of Jesus Christ must be communicated to them, some time and some where, or they cannot have eternal life, nor be condemned for not receiving the benefit of which they never received any knowledge. Jesus has stated the ground of condemnation, thus: "This is the condemnation, that light is come into the world, and men love darkness rather than light, because their deeds are evil" (John iii. 19). Till knowledge is communicated of God and Jesus Christ no man is, or can have a final condemnation. Christ is pledged, by the power given him over all flesh and the acceptance of that power, to see that all flesh have knowledge of the only true God and of Himself, in this life or another, before He can justly condemn any one to a final death. Be it remembered, "The Father judgeth no man, but hath committed all judgment unto the Son."

The Son has stated the ground, and the only ground of condemnation: it is unbelief of the proclamation of the "Glad tidings of the kingdom of God"—the reign of God and of his Christ on the earth; a kingdom to be established immediately at the close of the four governments of Dan. ii. and vii. Those who have not previously heard those glad tidings, shall hear of the actual establishment of that kingdom when it is set up, for God says, "It shall come, that I will gather all nations and tongues; and they shall come and see my glory," etc. (Isa. lxxi. 18).

Then, when they have knowledge of the only true God and of Jesus Christ, their reception or rejection, by obedience or disobedience, decides their final state. Knowing God and knowing Christ, if they accept that government and reign Jesus Christ gives them the blessing God gave Him power to bestow. If then they refuse subjection and persist in disobedience the second death is their doom; and they perish, not from the want of the knowledge spoken of, but from a refusal to accept Christ as the LIFE-GIVER of God's own appointment.

To talk of a man's being subjected to an irrevocable death for not knowing God and Jesus Christ, when he has never had the means to obtain that knowledge, is to reproach the government of God, and to impeach the administration of his Son, who has been invested with power over all flesh to give the needed knowledge.—Ed.

THE STUDY OF THE BIBLE.

BY HENRY DUNN.

CHAPTER XXI.

On the Influence of Hymns and Other Sacred Poetry on Popular Interpretation.

To say that the Bible is as often interpreted by the hymn-book of the dissenter, as it is by the Prayer-book of the churchman, is but to state a simple truth. The impressions which are received from the one, not unfrequently bias the interpretation given to the other. Embodying, as popular hymns do, almost every shade of theological sentiment; forming, in their use, no unimportant part of public worship; committed to memory in early youth; meditated upon in the closet; recited in seasons of joy or sorrow; and whispered in the ears of the dying, it is almost impossible to exaggerate the influence they exercise in the formation and support of particular religious views.

Far be it from us to depreciate sacred song, or even to speak lightly of an agency which has been so greatly blessed of God both to the conversion and edification of multitudes. But it may surely be permitted us to suggest, that both hymns and psalms (so called) are purely human compositions; that they sometimes pervert, and that they commonly exaggerate, Scripture truth; that a guard should always be kept against their becoming authoritative; and that, however touching or beautiful they may be, care should be taken lest as they steal into the soul, they should carry with them some seed of error which, mingling with the purest and best affections, may become in time a master-thought, which it is next to impossible to eradicate.

Wesley's hymns come to hundreds of thousands of simple minds with a weight fully equal to that of any inspired composition; and Watts's are regarded by multitudes more as second only to Holy Writ.

From a recent article in the Methodist Magazine, it would seem that Wesley's hymns are all but officially recognized as summaries of the faith of his followers. The writer says:—"Apart from the utility of the hymn book as a manual of devotion, it has answered another purpose of primary importance. It may be regarded as an authenticated standard of doctrine, by which all the essential points of belief are clearly defined. It is common to refer to Mr. Wesley's Sermons, and Notes on the New Testament, as embodying our distinctive theology. But if I were asked by a stranger to refer him to the most popular compendium of Wesleyan doctrine, I should refer him to the hymn-book. That book contains the belief of the mass of our people. Their commentaries and institutes are there. The strains which are familiar to every household, these are in reality the creeds and articles of a community. And so, while Charles Wesley was composing the strains which were to animate our devotion, he was at the same time fixing our doctrinal standards. As long as the hymn-book keeps its place in our public worship, our households, and closets, so long will the purity of our faith be guarded by the double defence of the understanding and the affections." And yet it would not be difficult to find, in the productions both of Watts and Wesley—great and good men as they were,—many statements which will not bear examination by the light of truth; much that is exaggerated or one-sided; many things, in short that distinctly bear the mark of the particular views, prejudices, and errors of the writers.

Even versions of Scripture are by no means exempt from this charge. The psalm, as it stands in the Bible, is often very different in character from the psalm as it reads in the metrical version. Dr. Watts frankly avows that, in accommodating the Book of Psalms to Christian worship, he found it necessary to divest David and Asaph of every other character than that of a psalmist and a saint, and "to make them always speak the common sense and language of a Christian."

That the excellent Doctor, to whom the Church is so much indebted, intended to accomplish this without irreverence, we are quite sure; but that he always succeeded in the attempt we are not so certain. He adds, "I have not been so curious and exact in striving everywhere to express the sense and meaning of David, but have rather expressed myself as I may suppose David would have done had he lived in the days of Christianity; and by this means, perhaps, I have sometimes hit upon the true intent of the Spirit of God in these verses farther and clearer than David himself could ever discover. In several other places I hope my reader will find a natural exposition of many a dark and doubtful text, and some new beauties and connections of thought discovered in the Jewish poet, though not in the language of a Jew."

We do not quote these passages in order to find fault with Dr. Watts. He frankly avows what he thought it right to do, and he plainly tells us that in his Psalms he is sometimes interpreting dark and doubtful texts. Our object is to show that by this open admission of one of the greatest hymn writers the world has ever seen, these compositions ought never to be confounded with the inspired truth they either condense or paraphrase; that they ought never to be used as authoritative exposition of any text or portion of Scripture; and, above all, that they should never be regarded as partaking, in any degree, of the peculiar sanctity which belongs to the Bible. Their use in public worship as the most appropriate expression of our praise, like the use of liturgies as the channels and embodiments of our supplications, all but inevitably leads to their being so associated in the mind with the Scriptures that are read, and the God that is worshipped, that they imperceptibly get exalted into a position which by no means belong to them.

We are not among those who imagine that verse is an unfit vehicle for religious thought; or that because poetry appeals to the imagination while religion must be exhibited just as it is—suppression and addition equally corrupting it,—that therefore it can supply nothing to the mind; for surely it is a noble task “to celebrate in glorious and lofty hymns the throne and equipage of God’s almightiness, and what He works, and what He suffers to be wrought with high Providence in His Church.” But when we remember how greatly this faculty has been abused—how “Milton’s Paradise Lost” is commonly read and quoted as if it were an inspired production,—a true picture of God’s dealings with the children of men; how Dante’s great poem has long been both the source and support of all those coarse and material conceptions relative to future punishment which at once harden and darken men’s minds, and dishonor God; how even a modern production, such as Pollock’s “Course of Time,” is in hundreds, perhaps in thousands, of Scottish households venerated a true exposition of the Divine Word,—we cannot but feel that there is some force in Dr. Johnson’s saying, that “religious truth is too sacred for fiction, too simple for eloquence, and too majestic for ornament.”

Never should it be forgotten that “all the subjects of Divine Revelation demand of us the most sober and reverent investigation; that whenever we meddle with them, we should eagerly and singly desire to seek for all Truth; and scrupulously reject and cast to the greatest possible distance all error; and that to make the Truth of God the subject of fanciful embellishment, however devoutly it may be done, must often tend to favor the formation of wrong ideas, impressions, and feelings.”

Let it not, then, be thought needless to lift up on this subject, the voice of warning. For so long as thousands are much better acquainted with David’s Psalms in metrical versions, than they are with the Inspired Text; and thousands more build on hymns, hopes and consolations which only ought to be built on the Bible; it can never be improper to draw attention to the danger that is involved in such a course: or to show how that which, if rightly used, is one of the highest sources of delight and spiritual profit, may, by abuse, easily become one of the most serious impediments to the understanding of Holy Scripture.

CHAPTER XXII.

On Church Authority and the Creeds.

As the decisions of the Church, relative to doctrine, are mainly embodied in “Creeds,” the subject of this chapter necessarily embraces a consideration of the value of these compositions regarded as Expositions of Divine Truth.

The Bishop of Oxford says, in his recent Sermons, that God has been pleased to give us His Revelation “in the Volume of Inspiration, AND in the Creeds of the Church.” He draws no distinction between these two channels, as he seems to regard them, of Divine communication.

Now it is plain that, if the Holy Spirit still illumines the Church,—if the Creeds were framed under the influence of this semi-inspiration,—if the writings of the Fathers are to be put on a level with those of the Apostles,—the first duty of the interpreter is to consult these ancient authorities, and his highest obligation must be obedience to their decisions.

On this subject Dr. Christopher Wordsworth has very recently delivered five Lectures in Westminster Abbey, which have since been published under the title of “The Interpretation of the Bible.”

Many very excellent remarks occur in these Lectures, especially in relation to the temper and spirit in which the Bible should be read.

Expounding the passage, “Open thou mine eyes, that I may behold wondrous things out of thy law” (Psa. cxix. 18), he clearly shows that “Reason, as well as the Bible, is a precious gift of God; and that Reason is to be employed in the interpretation of Holy Writ,” if only it be used “reasonably,”—that is under, the influence of a humble and teachable spirit. “Vain is it,” he says, “and worse than vain to apply learning to the study of Scripture, unless we have those moral dispositions and spiritual graces, without which our eyes are veiled. All is vain unless the soul and spirit are sanctified by the fear of God. He who would understand the Bible must love the Bible. “The secret of the Lord is with them that fear Him” (Psa. xxv. 14). “He that willett to do God's will, shall know of the doctrine" (John vii. 17). God revealeth His secrets unto babes,—those who are like children in simplicity,—but He hideth them from the wise and prudent" (Matt. xi. 25). "Mysteries are revealed unto the meek." Them that are meek shall He guide in judgment, and such as are gentle, them shall He learn His way" (Psa. xxv. 9).

Nothing can be better than these opening words. But unhappily, as it seems to us, they are practically set aside by the subsequent announcement that, in cases of doubt or difficulty, the authority of the Church alone must decide as to what is Truth.

"Jesus Christ himself," he adds, "is the great interpreter of the Bible. He does it by the presence and power of the Holy Ghost, whom He sent from heaven to abide for ever in His mystical body the Church universal, protecting Holy Scripture against false interpretations, and declaring the true sense in her Creeds and Confessions of Faith."

Now, on the amount of truth or error in this statement everything turns.

It behooves us most carefully to examine it. Dr. Wordsworth fully admits that "the living waters of Christ's grace flow freely to all;" but then, he says, "it is only in certain rivers and channels, viz., in Holy Scripture, in the Holy Sacraments, in Prayer, and in Confirmation; we should therefore not presume that his promises will be made good to us, unless we comply with the conditions which He has annexed to them."

Again we say,—If this teaching be true, it behooves us to submit at once; to bow to the authority of the Church, and to seek for the Holy Spirit from the Church, through Sacraments and Confirmation, but 'in connection, of course, with the study of Scripture and Prayer. If this claim, however, cannot be sustained from the Bible, it equally behooves us, at whatever risk of paining dear friends, to say in plain terms, that such a doctrine is ROMANISM.

"Christ," says Dr. Wordsworth, "has given the keys to His Church, to whom He has promised His presence, and His Spirit, and whom He has appointed to be the keeper and interpreter of Holy writ." "Christ now declares to us the true meaning of Holy Scripture in all necessary points of Christian doctrine, in Creeds and Confessions of Faith"

Admitting that the Apostles had special gifts from Christ, which the Clergy now do not possess, he still insists that "the power of interpreting Holy Scripture was continued to after ages." In support of this assertion he brings forward one, and but one fact, on which his entire argument hangs; it is this,—Christ said to His Apostles, "Lo, I am with you alway, even to the end of the world" (Matt. xxviii. 20); therefore,—for this is the amount of the reasoning,—in spite of all appearances to the contrary; in spite of the absence of any proof which is capable of being weighed; in spite of clerical discords and confusions innumerable; in spite of past history and of present experience; in spite of eyes, and ears, and senses, this doctrine, like that of Transubstantiation, is to be believed as transcendental; directly supported, indeed, by the authority only of a particular interpretation of a single text, but supposed to be implied in all God's dealings with His Church.

Dr. Wordsworth tests, so to speak, the truth of his views by the history of the production of the Creed published at Nicea, A. D. 325, and known amongst us as "the Nicene Creed." He says, "We revere that Creed because we know it to have been framed by holy men, who had many advantages which we do not possess for the right, interpretation of New Testament."

This is supposed to have been the case—

"(1) Because the language in which the New Testament was written was the native tongue of the authors of the Creed.

"(2) Because they possessed (so it is said) many ancient writings penned by Apostolic men, which are not now extant, and which served for the elucidation of the New Testament.

"(3) Because abundant spiritual graces were shed upon the Church in the age when that Creed was framed.

"(4) Because those holy men had contended valiantly for the faith in times of persecution; had been in daily peril of death; and had the most urgent motives to examine and ascertain the truth.

"(5) Because they employed the helps of mutual conference and deliberation; because they came together from various parts of Christendom, and were more than three hundred in number.

"(6) Because they brought with them from their several Churches a true report of the doctrines which had been received by those Churches from the holy Apostles; because they prayed devoutly for the Divine illumination of the Holy Ghost upon their deliberations; because they placed the Bible before them as the chart and compass of their counsels; and because they agreed in their judgment, and delivered that Creed to future generations, and joined with one heart and voice in professing it and declared it to be the sense of Holy Scripture, which the primitive Churches of Christendom had received from Jesus Christ."

"Yet further," he adds, "we receive the Nicene Creed because we know that when it had been framed and promulgated at such a time, by such persons, and in such a manner, it was forthwith accepted by the Church Universal, which is the mystical body of Christ."

Such is the argument in favor of Church authority in the interpretation of Scripture.

CHAPTER XXIII.

The Council of Nice.

IN reply to "the case" on behalf of Nicene teaching, which we have endeavored in the preceding chapter to state fairly and fully, we propose, first, to consider the elements of which the Council of Nice was composed; and next, to endeavor to estimate the result of its labors, so far as its conclusions have come down to us.

For this purpose, we shall avail ourselves of that living picture of the assembly which has been furnished by Dr. Stanley in his admirable Lectures on the Eastern Church.

We find there, that while the Council included many who had suffered in pagan persecutions, it consisted of Arians as well as Orthodox; "the learned and the illiterate; courtiers and peasants; old and young; aged bishops, on the verge of the grave, and beardless deacons, just entering on their office."

Among the assembled multitude we observe Arius, "a strange, captivating, moon-struck giant," who in Alexandria had "a following of seven hundred religious ladies;" Athanasius, the small and insignificant deacon, hardly twenty-five years of age, who "rivets the attention of the assembly by the vehemence of his arguments;" Eusebius, "the father of ecclesiastical history," whom Athanasius is convinced is at heart an Arian: "Egyptian hermits from their cells,—half savage, wild, and mangled by the torments they had endured; scholars from the more civilized cities of Syria, and wild ascetics from the remoter East."

Over this motley assembly presided the Emperor Constantine, who, on his arrival, found himself literally overwhelmed with parchment rolls or letters containing complaints and petitions against each other, from the larger part of the assembled bishops; which, when accusations, and recriminations were bandied to and fro in the Imperial presence, he wisely burnt before them all, declaring that he had not even read them.

The charges, says Dr. Stanley, were, among others, that of gross licentiousness. Constantine's observation on them was—"Never let the faults of men in their consecrated offices be publicly known to the scandal and temptation of the multitude. Even though I were, with my own eyes, to see a bishop in the act of gross sin, I would throw my purple robe over him, that no one might suffer from the sight of such a crime."

The Emperor, "always careful of his appearance, was so on this occasion in an eminent degree. His long hair, false or real, was crowned with the Imperial diadem of pearls. His purple or scarlet robe blazed with precious stones and gold embroidery. He was shod, no doubt, in the scarlet shoes then confined to the Emperors, now perpetuated in the Pope and Cardinals. We may well believe that the simple and the worldly both looked upon him, as we are told they did, as though he were an angel of God descended straight from Heaven."

And yet this man—often a preacher to thousands, "who cheered him lustily"—was a semi-pagan and subsequently the murderer of his son his nephew, and his wife.

"Incredible as it may seem to our notions," says Dr. Stanley, speaking of him at a later period, "he who had five-and-twenty years ago been convinced of the Christian faith: he who had opened the first General Council of the Church; he who had called himself a Bishop of Bishops; he who had joined in the deepest discussions of theology, he who had preached to rapt audiences; he who had established Christianity as the religion of the empire; he who had been considered by Christian bishops an inspired oracle, and an apostle of Christian wisdom, was, although now on his deathbed, himself not yet received into the Christian Church. He was not yet baptized: he had not even been received as a catechumen."

Such was Constantine, the president of the Council of Nice. What must the Bishops have been who regarded this man as 'an inspired oracle, and an apostle of Christian wisdom?' And yet this is the Council which Dr. Wordsworth tells us especially enjoyed the presence of Christ; through which "He declares to us the true sense of the Bible with regard to the fundamental articles of the Christian faith," and by whose decisions "the most unlettered peasant is able to discriminate truth from falsehood!"

Let us next see what the decisions of the Council, as embodied in the Creed, really amount to.

For this purpose we cannot do better than compare "the Nicene Creed," as it stands in the Communion Service, with that which is known under the title of "the Apostles Creed," as found in the service of the Morning Prayer, and see precisely what we have gained.

The result is embodied in these words relating to the Lord Jesus,—“Begotten of His Father before all worlds, God of God, Light of Light, Very God of very God, Begotten, not made, Being of one substance with the Father, By whom all things were made.”

And now we would seriously ask any thoughtful and pious person to estimate the value of these words, and then to say honestly and truthfully whether he can find anything in them that helps him to understand—as Dr. Wordworth says they do—“the true sense of the Bible with regard to the fundamental articles of Christian Faith?” whether he can discover anything in them which will “enable every man, yes, even the simplest child and most unlettered peasant, to discriminate truth from falsehood, and to understand the Bible aright in those heavenly doctrines which are necessary to everlasting salvation?”

We profess an utter inability to do this. To us, the words in question appear to be little better than an attempt to be wise above what is written, to explain truths which are above reason, and, therefore, inexplicable by mortal faculties; and to attach an importance to modes of thought and expression, which, in Scripture, belongs only to a heartfelt reception of the Divine Testimony.

Nothing can be plainer than that the men who thought and wrote in these scholastic terms, had lost the simplicity of the Gospel; that there was presumption in their decisions; and that nothing could justify them in pronouncing the Son to be “of one substance with the Father,” or pretending to distinguish between the Son as “begotten” and the Holy Ghost as “proceeding.” We should not like to say how near so irreverent a procedure approached to blasphemy.

It may not be amiss to inquire further, “What was the effect of these transactions, at the time, on the Christian community at large?”

Dr. Stanley shall tell us.

“When we perceive,” he says, “the abstract questions on which the controversy in the Council turned; when we reflect that they related not to any dealings of the Deity with man; not even, properly speaking, to the Divinity or Humanity of Christ, nor to the doctrine of the Trinity (for all these points were acknowledged by both parties), but to the ineffable relations of the Godhead before the remotest beginnings of time, it is difficult to conceive that, by inquiries such as these, the passions of mankind should be roused to fury.”

“Yet so it was. So violent were the discussions that they were parodied in the pagan theatres. Sailors, millers, and travellers sang the disputed doctrines at their occupations, or on their journeys. Every corner, every alley of the cities of Alexandria and Constantinople was full of these discussions—the streets, the market places, the drapers’ “the money changers,” the victuallers. Ask a man “How many oboli?” he answers by dogmatizing on generated and ungenerated being. Inquire the price of bread, and you are “The Son is subordinate to the Father.” Ask if the bath is ready, and you are told, “The Son arose out of nothing.”

Is it possible to conceive of a state of things, —corrupt and immoral as society then was,—more lamentable! Yet this is the age to which we are told to look back with affection as pre-eminently Christian; the age on which Dr. Wordworth tells us “abundant spiritual graces were shed.”

The supposition lying at the root of all these notions about the light and piety of the Nicene age is, that the Holy Spirit enlightens men apart from purifying them; that there is a grace of the Spirit not mentioned by St. Paul, which, as St. Basil says, “plays through the intellectual faculties;” that by this grace, which is supposed to be official in character, Truth is discerned; that although still ours, it was pre-eminently enjoyed by the Fathers; and that, consequently, an assembly of clergy was then, and is still, the best channel for arriving at Christian Truth.

That is the theory. This particular Council becomes the illustration, not merely because the eminent divine to whom we have referred stakes, so to speak, the value of Church authority upon its decisions; but because the Professor of Ecclesiastical History in the University of Oxford has so recently furnished us with a true picture of its composition and character.

On a review of the whole, we affirm that the Nicene Fathers, instead of having more, had not half the advantages we possess for interpreting Scripture aright; that the mere fact of their having spoken Greek is, by every scholar, regarded as a matter of very little moment indeed; that there is not the slightest evidence that they had access to any ancient writings by Apostolic men which we do not possess; that instead of “abundant spiritual grace” being shed upon the Church in the Nicene age, it was a period distinguished by darkness, ignorance, and superstition; that the mere fact of many of the bishops there present having suffered persecution, is no reason for supposing that they had more urgent motives to examine and ascertain the truth than we have; that the circumstance of three hundred men assembling, bearing with them the vague traditions of their respective neighborhoods, is no proof whatever that they knew more than we do about what was believed in the Apostolic Churches; that prayer for Divine illumination, offered as it was under the delusion that Christ was with the clergy officially, must be regarded in precisely the same light as the prayer which is now offered in Rome day by day, by the Pope and Cardinals, for the preservation of the Papacy; and finally, that the acceptance of the Creed by future ages, enforced as such acceptance has always been by secular power, and the offer of worldly advantage has nothing whatever to do either with its truth or falsehood, its wisdom or its folly.

The lesson we have to learn is, that no man can honestly and candidly read his Bible who allows himself to be influenced, in his judgment of its teaching, by the decisions of priests and monks who happen to have lived twelve or fifteen hundred years ago; and who, whatever piety they might possess, were unquestionably, and as a rule, under the influence of dark and bewildering superstitions. [The very Nicene Fathers proposed (with a view, as it is said, to the reformation of manners) that a rule should be established requiring all bishops, priests, deacons, and sub-deacons, who had married before their ordination, to withdraw from their wives; a law which was very near being carried.—Taylor's "Ancient Christianity."]

THE SCEPTRE OF JUDAH:

OR, THE PROPHECY OF JACOB AND JEREMIAH.

"The sceptre shall not depart from Judah, nor a law-giver from between his feet until Shiloh come" (Gen. xlix. 10): "David shall never want a man to sit upon the throne of the house of Israel" (Jer. xxxiii. 17).

[It is generally supposed that the prophecy first named had its fulfilment in the continuance of the tribe of Judah till the first advent of Messiah; but I find that view called in question, in an able article in "The Rainbow," by a writer by the name of J. MILL. His argument seems convincing and conclusive. Though the article is somewhat long it will well pay for a careful reading. To save space I have omitted the introduction which states the common theory.—ED. OF EXAMINER.]

Perhaps there is no more convincing proof of Divine revelation, than to find predictions receiving their accomplishment long after they have been uttered. But the too common practice of attempting to prove the fulfilment of prophecy, in events and occurrences, when reason unbiased can recognize little or nothing corresponding with the prediction, only perplexes the mind of the believer, and gives the unbeliever occasion to scoff. We think it right to give all diligence to learn what God has revealed by the prophets and apostles; but we think it much better to keep the mind in suspense, than to be satisfied with an application, or to affirm a position against which serious objections can be urged. Now, this view of the fulfilment of Jacob's prophecy is beset with difficulties which seem to be wholly insurmountable. Indeed, if this be the true interpretation of the prophecy, instead of finding a "literal fulfilment," there seems to be a complete failure in every particular. We note a few difficulties which stand in the way of agreeing to this fulfilment.

1. The prediction was uttered long before there was any appearance of a sceptre in Judah, and before Judah attained any peculiar pre-eminence over the other tribes except what is intimated in this prophecy by Jacob; and it would seem strange to intimate the departure of the sceptre without giving any indication of its appearance.

2. Other portions of Scripture seem to warrant the conclusion that it is to Christ the sceptre belongs; then why should Jacob's prophecy indicate its departure at the coming of HIRI "whose right it is," and who alone is entitled to bear it?

3. It appears entirely contrary to historical facts.

4. It seems to be in direct opposition to other Scripture predictions. Of course we use the word "sceptre" in its true scriptural meaning, — a staff or rod, borne in the hand, indicating kingly or ruling power in actual possession; not a right to rule prospectively, nor ruling power which has been possessed, but has passed away. "She had strong rods for the sceptres of them that bare rule" (Ezek. xix. 11). But "fire is gone out of a rod of her branches which hath devoured her fruit, so that she hath no strong rod to be a sceptre to rule." (ver. 14.) And when the Lord promised to restore Israel and destroy the power of Babylon, Israel was to take up the proverb, and say, "How hath the oppressor ceased! the golden city ceased! The Lord hath broken the staff of the wicked, and the sceptre of the rulers" (Isa. xiv. 45).

Let us now take a glance at some of the more prominent periods of Israel's history, from the days of Jacob's prophecy to the time of the Messiah, and see how the case answers to a "literal fulfilment" of the predicted continuance of the sceptre power in Judah. Without being particular as to length of time, we may allow one hundred years in Egypt under Pharaoh; forty years in the wilderness under the leadership of Moses (not of the tribe of Judah, but of Levi); four hundred and fifty years under the judges (Acts, xiii. 20); forty years under Saul, of the tribe of Benjamin, the first king in Israel. Here then, are six hundred and thirty years of their history after Jacob's prophecy, and no sceptre in Judah! David was then anointed, the first time that even the semblance of a sceptre can be recognized in the tribe of Judah. He reigned over Israel forty years, and subjected other nations to his sway. Solomon, his son, succeeded to his father's throne, and reigned also forty years. At his death, ten tribes revolted from Judah's rule, thus breaking up the sceptre power, or, at least, leaving it to bear rule only over its own tribe. "How is the strong staff broken—the beautiful rod (sceptre)!"

Assuredly the sceptre of Judah was broken with a terrible stroke, and many were the inroads upon Judah by the revolted ten tribes, on one occasion killing a hundred and twenty thousand, and carrying two hundred thousand into captivity. (2 Chron. xxviii.) After this revolt the kingdom of Judah continued with varying fortune for nearly four hundred years, until, according to Ezekiel xxi. 25-7, the sceptre-power was completely broken, the diadem removed, and the kingly power taken away, between four and five hundred years before the birth of the Messiah, never more to be restored until "He come whose right it is," and to whom it is to be given. Now here is a prophecy which, instead of agreeing with the sceptre continuing in Judah "till Shiloh come," and then departing from Judah, threatens the utter removal of kingly power from the house of David and tribe of Judah, until he come whose right it is, and promises the giving of it to him. Where, then, is the literal fulfilment of Jacob's prophecy to be traced? And where is the "sceptre lingering in the tribe of Judah" to be found at the Messiah's birth? The humiliating confession made by the Jews before Pilate, "We have a law, and by our law this man ought to die;" but, "It is not lawful for us to put any man to death," shows that Judah's sceptre was departed. The Jews had a law, that law which they had received from Moses, but they had no power to carry it into effect—they had no power but what was granted them by a Gentile! and Herod had governed them thirty-three years before Christ was born.

But however unsatisfactory the retaining of the sceptre by Judah until Christ came may be, the furnishing of a "lawgiver" seems even worse. We would submit that the tribe of Judah never furnished a lawgiver to Israel from Jacob's death, till Christ's birth, even for a single day. Among the last words of Israel's last prophet we read, "Remember ye the law of Moses, my servant, which I commanded for all Israel" (Mal. iv. 4). No king of Judah seems to be entitled to such designation, or ever in Scripture received the title of "Lawgiver." Their very highest honor was to "Do all things as it is written in the law of Moses." Moses was their only "lawgiver," and he was of the tribe of Levi—not of Judah. Where, then, is Judah to be found furnishing a law-giver, or retaining the sceptre till the coming of the Messiah? Certainly not while in Egypt; not in the wilderness; not while under judges; not during the reign of Saul; not while captive in Babylon; nor from that time till Christ; and surely the mere existence of the tribe of Judah, or some sceptreless descendants of David—not LAWGIVERS, but in subjection to the law of foreign conquerors—cannot meet the requirements of Jacob's prophecy, nor be accepted as a fulfilment of it, either literal or figurative. But why labor at such a hopeless task? Is not a single glance at the first verse of the chapter where the prophecy is found sufficient to remove all anxiety, and relieve us from the profitless labor of seeking for fulfilment where fulfilment is not to be found? Jacob, before giving utterance to this prophecy, "Called unto his sons, and said, Gather yourselves together, that I may tell you that which shall befall you in the last days" (Gen. xlix. 1). We need not, therefore, look for fulfilment in the history of the tribe of Judah in the past. It has its time fixed by Jacob himself, in that period so well known to all students of Scripture prophecy: "The last days." And certainly "the last days" did not run their course during any of the sixteen hundred years between Jacob and the birth of Christ.

It is further to be noticed that this is but a part of Jacob's prophecy concerning Judah, and seemingly not the most important part. The pre-eminent honor and power assigned to Judah in "the last days," are first declared, and the portion under consideration seems simply to affirm that Shiloh must first come and the people be gathered to him, before that power prevails, or those honors can be realized. But much depends upon the rendering of the single word "depart" in this prophecy, to bring it into perfect harmony with Judah's past history, and also into perfect harmony with all the other predictions concerning "the last days" to be found in other portions of Scripture. Thus, for instance, in other prophecies of "the last days," we read, "the law shall go forth from Zion;" "The Lord shall send the rod (sceptre) of thy strength out of Zion;" "A sceptre shall rise out of Israel to smite Israel's enemies;" but no one supposes that when "the law goes forth," and "the sceptre is sent out of Zion," that the law and the sceptre are to be no more there. Now read Jacob's connected prophecy in the light of these and other prophecies, and all seems plain. "Judah, thou art he whom thy brethren shall praise; thy hand shall be in the neck of thine enemies; thy father's children shall bow down before thee. Judah is a lion's whelp; from the prey, my son, thou art gone up: he stooped down, he couched as a lion, and as an old lion; who shall rouse him up?" But "The sceptre shall not depart (go forth) from Judah (to bring his enemies into subjection), nor a lawgiver from between his feet, until Shiloh come: and unto him the gathering of the people." (Gen. xlix. 8-10.)

It will be observed that the two words "shall" and "be" in the end of the tenth verse, printed in italics, indicating that they are words supplied by the translators, are here left out, and thus the passage teaches, not only that the people are to be "gathered unto" Shiloh, but that their gathering to him, as well as his coming, takes place before the sceptre and law go forth from Judah, to subdue his enemies, as indicated by his "hand" being "in their neck. With this view of Jacob's prophecy, to any one at all familiar with the Scripture prophecies of the "last days," the numerous similar predictions which they contain, will rush into the mind, and their "kindred drops" will not only "mingle into one," but swell into such a flood, that nothing will seem able to resist its force. The common interpretation of this prophecy, however much it may have been relied on, and however many great men may have adopted it, seems evidently a failure, a complete failure in every part.

During that period in which fulfilment has been sought, and thought to be found, Judah did not enjoy his brethren's praise, but very often felt the power of their wrath, not only in killing and carrying into captivity, single-handed, but by entering into a confederation with a foreign power to go up against Judah and utterly put an end to the house of David, and set the son of Tabeal on his throne. (Isa. vii.) His "father's children," instead of "bowing down before him," rose up against him, revolted from his rule, and so fierce was their wrath against him, that "The heart of the house of David and the heart of his people were moved as the trees of the wood are moved with the wind," through fear of their hatred and enmity. "His hand" was not "in the neck of his enemies," but his neck was frequently under their heel. Almost all the neighboring nations oppressed and distressed him. Beside the kingdom of the ten revolted tribes of his "father's children," the Assyrians, the Philistines, and the Arabians entered into Judah, and after killing many, carried away their substance, their wives, their sons, and their daughters; and at last the Babylonians carried them completely away. As an "old lion" that has gone up to lie down in his lair after devouring the prey, and having caused terror all around by his valor and might, so that none would venture to rouse him up, where is he feared? The answer must be, Nowhere. As "a lion among flocks of sheep," Judah, as yet, is known only in prophecy, not in history. Among "the nations his enemies" he is no more feared than the harmless kid among the beasts of the forest. If Jacob's prophecy must be accepted as having been literally fulfilled, who need fear to set up for a prophet? If the prophets of Baal could only have made sure of as accommodating interpreters, need they have feared to enter into competition with the prophets of Israel? or to have replied to the challenge of the God of Israel when he called to them thus: "Let all the nations be gathered together, and let the people be assembled: who among them can declare this, and show us former things? Let them bring forth their witnesses, that they may be justified; or let them hear and say, It is truth. Ye (Israel) are my witnesses, saith the Lord; I have declared the former things from the beginning, and they went forth out of my mouth, and I showed them. I did them suddenly, and they came to pass." "I have not spoken in secret, in a dark place of the earth; I said not to the seed of Jacob, Seek ye me in vain." "Produce your cause, saith the Lord; bring forth your strong reasons, saith the King of Jacob. Let them bring them forth, and show us what shall happen: let them show the former things what they be (who predicted them, and when or how they came to pass), that we may consider them and know the latter end of them; or declare us things to come that we may know that ye are gods, and be dismayed and behold it together." (Isa. xlii., xlviii.) Give only the same latitude to interpretation as is frequently done to the prophets of Israel, and we see nothing to hinder any heathen prophet to take the field in defence of his god. But no! Jacob's prophecy stands unfulfilled, and, "though it tarry, wait for it: at the end it shall speak, and not lie." (Hab. ii. 3.)

But perhaps it is time to refer to the "golden thread of unity" by which the events of this prophecy are bound together with the events of the "last days," as predicted in other portions of Scripture. And perhaps the first worthy of notice is that remarkable outburst of sublime eloquence from the lips of that old prophet of Baal who was summoned from his eastern mountains to curse Israel, but who was restrained from his purpose by the God of Israel, and compelled to utter in the ears of this enemy-king some of the most sublime sentences regarding Israel's "latter-day" glory that are to be found upon record. It was not necessary that Balaam should tell a heathen king out of what tribe of Israel the King of this "latter-day" glory should arise; but describing himself as "the man whose eyes are open," he exclaimed, "Surely there is no enchantment against Jacob, neither is there any divination against Israel. Lo! the people shall dwell alone, and shall not be reckoned among the nations. Behold, the people shall rise up as a great lion, and lift up himself as a young lion; he shall not lie down until he eat the prey and drink the blood of the slain. He couched, he lay down as a lion, and as a great lion, who shall stir him up! His King shall be higher than Agag, and his kingdom shall be exalted. He shall eat up the nations, his enemies, and shall break their bones." And when the angry king commanded Balaam to flee to his place, lest he should feel the wrath of him who had sent for him to curse Israel, and who had "thought to promote him to great, honor," Balaam said, "Behold, I go to my people;" but before going, he said to the king, "Come, and I will tell thee what this people (Israel) shall do to thy people in the 'latter days.' And he took up his parable and said, I shall see him, but not now; I shall behold him, but not nigh; there shall come a Star out of Jacob, and a Sceptre shall rise out of Israel, and shall smite the corners of Moab and destroy all the children of Sheth. And Edom shall be a possession; Seir also shall be a possession; and Israel shall do valiantly. Out of Jacob shall come he who shall have the dominion, and shall destroy him that remaineth of the city." And he said, "Alas! who shall live when God doeth this?" and betook himself again to his own mountains. (Num. xxiii. xxiv.) These utterances by the man who, "falling into a trance, but with his eyes open, saw the vision of the Almighty," are so strikingly similar to those of Jacob, that no one could fail to see that both prophecies relate to the same period of time, and announce the same things, even although the "last days" and "latter days" had not been mentioned.

But while it might be enough for a heathen king to know that "out of Jacob shall come he that shall have the dominion," it was not enough for Israel. Twelve tribes came of Jacob, and numerous families from each tribe. Hence we have first the tribe of Judah, next the family of David, of Judah's tribe, pointed out, to which all eyes are turned, as the tribe and family in which the Lawgiver and Ruler is to appear. For, says David, "The Lord God of Israel chose me before all the house of my father, to be king over Israel for ever; for he hath chosen Judah to be ruler, and of the house of Judah, the house of my father, and among all the sons of my father he liked me to make me king." (1 Chron. xxviii. 4.) David being made king over Israel, God made promise to him that of his seed he would raise up one to sit upon his throne whose throne and kingdom would be permanently established (2 Sam. vii. 13-18). But while the permanent establishment of OME of the seed of David upon his throne is thus made sure by solemn promise, we know of no promise that requires an unconditional, unbroken chain of succession of David's seed to sit upon his throne, as is frequently contended for, and especially from the passage which stands at the beginning of these remarks, viz., "David shall not want a man to sit upon the throne of the house of Israel." (Jer. xxxiii. 17.)

Moses has given a rule thus: "When a prophet speaketh in the name of the Lord, if the things follow not, nor come to pass, that is the word which the Lord hath not spoken; thou shalt not be afraid of him." And if any prophet affirms that David would never at any time want a man to sit upon his throne, the thing has not "followed nor come to pass," and therefore this rule would compel us to reject both the prophet and his prophecy. The dynasty of David ceased with the accomplishment of Ezek. xxi. 25-27, and was to be "NO MORE," according to that prophecy, till he "should come whose right it is." "The throne was cast down," and "his crown profaned by casting it to the ground." (Psa. lxxxix. 39.) But his crown shall not for ever be "profaned!" His throne shall not for ever remain cast down! For thus saith the Lord, "Once have I sworn by my holiness, that I will not lie unto David. His seed shall endure for ever, and his throne as the sun before me." (Psa. lxxxix. 35, 36.) "In that day will I raise up the tabernacle of David that is fallen, and close up the breaches thereof, and I will raise up his ruins, and I will build it as in the days of old. And I will plant them (my people Israel, when all the sinners shall have died by the sword) upon their land, and they shall no more be pulled up out of their land which I have given them, saith the Lord thy God." (Amos ix. 9 to end.) But it would be strange indeed if we were compelled to accept Jer. xxxiii. 17 as teaching that David would never at any time want a man to sit upon his throne, when it is the "overthrow of the house of David," and the "desolations of the cities of Judah, and the streets of Jerusalem, as being without man and without beast," depicted in the same chapter, that gives rise to the prophecy. We would suggest the marginal reading of the seventeenth verse, which preserves the "golden thread" of harmony, running through the whole prophecies. "There shall not be cut off from David for ever a man to sit upon the throne of the house of Israel." This rendering admits the want of a man, but affirms that the want shall not be for ever, and corresponds with the desolations spoken of in the same chapter, and also with the promise, "Behold the days come, saith the Lord, that I will perform that good thing which I have promised to the house of Israel and to the house of Judah. In those days and at that time will I cause the branch of righteousness to grow up unto David, and he shall execute judgment and righteousness in the land." (ver. 14.) Thus the Law, the Psalms, and the Prophets — Jacob, Balaam, David, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, and all the prophets — bear one united testimony to the "latter-day glory," when the sceptre shall go forth from Judah, and a Law-giver from between his feet, when Shiloh comes, and a "willing people" are gathered unto him,—when "his throne shall be established for ever as the sun," and he "shall execute judgment and righteousness in the land;" and "from the uttermost ends of the earth shall be heard songs ascribing glory to the righteous ONE."

HUMAN REDEMPTION.—No. 7.

ON CONVERSION, AS DISTINGUISHED FROM REGENERATION.

CONVERSION (epistrophē), which literally means turning round, is a term used in Scripture sometimes to express an entire and radical change of conduct, following renewal of heart; and sometimes to indicate return from a temporary course of wrong-doing. It is used in the former sense in the Acts (xv. 3), where Paul speaks of the "conversion of the Gentiles;" it is used in the latter sense by our Lord when He says to Peter, "When thou art converted (epistrepsas), strengthen thy brethren" (Luke xxii. 32). In Peter's case the conversion was sudden, and effected by a look: "The Lord turned, and looked upon Peter. And Peter remembered the word of the Lord. And Peter went out, and wept bitterly" (Luke xxii. 61, 62.) Under ordinary circumstances, conversion (although not without exceptions) is an outward and visible thing, and, generally speaking, is, by the Divine blessing, identified with human effort and influence.

Regeneration, on the other hand, as implying a "new birth," and regarded as the first and transition step from death unto life, is the work of God alone; it is probably in all cases an instantaneous, and it is certainly a secret one.

Conversion is a process which may be repeated again and again; each successive spiritual impulse forming a new era in the history of the soul. It is action rather than life; it is commonly the result of a definite form of human agency; and it is generally brought about by influences which act upon the nature of man under all the ordinary conditions which affect responsible beings. When our Lord says to His disciples, "Except ye be converted, and become as little children, ye shall not enter into the kingdom of heaven" (Matt. xviii. 3), He is not enforcing the doctrine of the new birth, but simply teaching the necessity of turning away from those false notions which had led them to ask who should be greatest.

Regeneration, on the contrary, is, from its very nature, complete, and commonly involves a present consciousness of forgiven sin; it is a change transcending all ordinary laws; it is generally independent of outward circumstances, and it is always anticipative of future bliss. It is, in short, the peculiar donation which God bestows on the elect, who thus receive "power (or privilege) to become the sons of God; which are born, not of blood, nor of the will of the flesh, nor of the will of man, but of God" (John i. 12, 13). It is the accomplishment on earth of a change of nature, which, in other cases, may or may not be effected in the world (or age) that is to come.

Conversion, although equally the work of Him from whom cometh "every good and perfect gift," is not in the same sense supernatural, inasmuch as it may be, and often is, but temporary. If a man exchange a life of sin for a life of obedience; if earnestness and seriousness in religion take the place of habitual indifference; if pure and blessed tastes and affections are obviously superseding those which are low and depraved, we may safely speak of such a one as converted, and hope that the outward and visible change indicates the inward condition of the soul—that it implies the regeneration of the whole nature by the power of the Spirit of God. But months, nay, years may elapse, during which it would be neither safe nor right for us to form any practical decision on the question; for, on the one hand, differences in degree are very apt to be confounded by us with differences of kind; and, on the other, changes the most important in a man's character may be accomplished so gradually that no human wisdom is competent to decide when they took place, or so suddenly that their reality and value cannot be tested. Even in cases where the change is the unquestionable result of religious impressions, it is often impossible to decide upon its precise character until proved by its fruits.

These distinctions, which derive all their value from being scriptural, are of great practical importance when viewed in connection with the various agencies God has appointed for the conversion of the world.

The question must often occur, both to the minister of the Gospel and to the private Christian,—What is the actual value of the influence that can be exercised by one man over another in relation to his spiritual interests?

Sometimes it seems as if it must be rated very low indeed: "I have no encouragement to preach," says Mr. Cecil, in his "Remains," "but the belief of a continued Divine operation. To bring a man to love God, to hunger and thirst after the mind that was in Christ—with man this is impossible! But God has said it shall be done, and bids me go forth and preach; that by me, as His instrument, He may effect these grand ends; and therefore I go."

An eminent American divine (Dr. Edward Griffin) puts the same sentiment still more distinctly and forcibly. After arguing that as it was necessary for Moses to stretch out his arm, or the Red Sea would not have divided—for the trumpets to have been blown, or the walls of Jericho would not have fallen—for the voice of Ezekiel to have been heard, or the valley of bones would have been undisturbed—he thus proceeds:—God sent Ezekiel to say, "Dry bones, hear the word of the Lord," when He knew that the bones would never hear without His supernatural interposition. And the command was a sufficient warrant and encouragement to the prophet. If God should bid me go and preach to the dead in yonder graveyard, I would go. With no other encouragement, I now stand over this valley of the slain (the congregation he was addressing), and say to the dead of my people and kindred, "Come out of your graves, ye bones that are very dry. Awake thou that sleepest, and arise from the dead, and Christ shall give thee light."

I do not think that evangelical preachers generally would like to express their views in precisely these terms, but I am quite sure that the words embody the sentiments of thousands and tens of thousands of the most excellent Christians the world has ever seen. Only let it be granted that regeneration and conversion mean in Scripture the same thing, and that none but the regenerate are saved from eternal ruin, and it follows, of course—regeneration being supernatural—that what are usually called means of grace, while appointed antecedents of conversion, are not second causes; that if an earnest exhortation makes a deeper impression than a frigid one, it is but a coincidence between the supernatural and natural order of Divine operations; that the only end of preaching is to produce attention to truth; and its only use to prepare the way for a Divine work on such souls as God has foreordained to save. An Arminian would of course put the case somewhat differently, but on the supposition of his being a believer in the supernatural character of regeneration, the result cannot be different. Such are the inexorable demands of logic in theology.

This view of the Gospel, and of its work in the world, proceeds, of course, on the supposition that Divine sovereignty decides the eternal condition of all men—decides it, not in the sense in which God decides all human affairs, viz., as that great final cause without whom no creature can live or move, and by whose permission alone it is that either sin or suffering can exist. but as the ordainer of a destiny over which, however appearances may indicate the contrary, human volitions have no power.

I am quite aware that the faithful minister of the Gospel, however "high" his theology, always labors to show that this fixed Divine purpose in no way interferes with the freedom of the human will, or with the efficiency of human effort; that God hears the prayers of the living for the spiritually dead; that every man might, if he would, arise and receive light and life; that human powerlessness is but another name for human sin; that no man finally perishes, save by his own suicidal act.

Such reasoning, inconsistent as it may seem, generally commends itself to the devout mind; for its defects are all lost sight of in the relief which is felt at finding that even the sternest theology cannot venture to ignore those irrepressible instincts of the heart which assure us that God is just, or those plain statements of Scripture which declare that He is Love. Yet, after all, we cannot but feel that preaching of this character, if not a riddle, is a torment; and that its perplexity must be occasioned, either, on the one hand, by some strange perversion of the teaching of Scripture, or, on the other, by vain attempts to reconcile those partial and fragmentary revelations of the Infinite which we alone possess, with the demands of a logic which is, at best, but finite and human, and may, therefore, be an altogether inappropriate medium for the exposition of truths which are superhuman and illimitable.

I believe that much of the difficulty in question arises from a complete misapprehension of those portions of Scripture which reveal the existence of an elect Church; from extending to all mankind statements which are intended to apply only to the subjects of the Divine predestination; from the consequent assertion—implied, if not expressed—of a doctrine of reprobation; and the final evolution of a system which no ingenuity can ever make consistent with human responsibility, with a judgment according to works, with “few stripes,” or with “many stripes.”

At the foundation of this error lies the notion I am endeavoring to controvert; viz., that in Scripture regeneration and conversion mean the same thing; that both alike are sovereign and superhuman; that election from the foundation of the world is the distinctive characteristic of every soul of man who escapes the damnation of hell; that when St. Paul speaks of the power of the “potter” over the clay, “to make one vessel to honor and another to dishonor,” he teaches not, as one would naturally suppose, that the same God who here, without injustice, makes one a peasant and another a prince, may also, in the world to come, give or withhold dignities at His pleasure—that would be intelligible enough—but, incredible as it may seem, that they intimate His right as sovereign, to ordain to eternal misery all who are not the subjects of His electing grace. To support this theory, the choice of Jacob, even before his birth—an illustration used by the same apostle—is held to have had relation, not to the birthright only, but to all spiritual blessings.

I “have not so learned Christ.” I believe as firmly as any in electing love, and in the regeneration of those who are made partakers of it. Evidence of the fact is found in what such men do and dare in vindication of their high calling; justifying it sometimes, at the price of all that the world calls good or great—comfort, reputation, human love, nay even life itself; always at the cost of much self-denial, in the crucifixion of sin, the mortification of every evil desire, the abandonment of many of the objects of this world's ambition, and the constant sacrifice of self-will and self-gratification to the obedience of Christ and the love of the brethren.

These I hold to be the invariable characteristics of the man who is born, not of the flesh, but of the Spirit; and if such persons form, as they certainly do, a very small proportion indeed, even of those who are surrounded by the purest light, and who enjoy the highest advantages, I cannot but conclude that beyond these there will be found a multitude whom no man can number, to swell the song of redeeming love, and to celebrate the victory of the God-man, when He shall have “the heathen for His inheritance, and the uttermost parts of the earth for His possession.”

I believe, therefore, in CONVERSION, even though it may not be accompanied by the regeneration of the entire nature. I believe in it as the result of human influences co-working with God; co-operating with that blessed Spirit who not only gathers his elect but is ever convincing “the world of sin, of righteousness, and of judgment.” I believe that the work of the Church is now, as it will be in the world to come, the conversion of sinners to the Redeemer; that its real, as distinguished from its apparent success, will always be proportioned to its zeal, and love, and truthfulness, both in word and deed; that its only sword is “the sword of the Spirit which is the word of God;” that just in proportion as the Church illustrates the faith it preaches by a holy and consistent life, must be its power to elevate and to bless; that while nothing is too large for its expectations nothing should be too small for its thankfulness; that as its one message is, “Be ye reconciled unto God,” and its one encouragement the assurance of the deliverance of the world, through Christ, both from the power and punishment of sin, so its one object should be the moral and spiritual advancement of all with whom it comes in contact.

Every step in this direction, taken how or by whom it may, is to be regarded as of inestimable value; every putting forth of desire after the good and the true, and especially after Him who is embodied truth and goodness, is to be welcomed as a work of the Spirit; and since every good thing which is begun here will be carried on hereafter, every shade of improvement, either in society at large or in the individual transgressor, is to be rejoiced in as evidence that in no case whatever does God's word return unto Him void; that it always accomplishes that which He pleases; that it invariably prospera in the thing whereto He sends it (Isa. lv. 11).

THE LIMITS OF THE AGES.—No. 1.

The Bible is not a book to be solved once for all like a series of mathematical problems. It is the gift of Divine wisdom and love to man—man who is in some respects always the same, and in other respects always changing. No one but God could write a book for man. Men may write for their fellow-men of a class, a nation, a time; but the God of the spirits of all flesh has brought out gradually a book which speaks to all their own heart's language "words whereby they may be saved" from guilt, and sin, and ignorance, and finally from all evil. The Church of Christ is far on in its school time, so the wonderful Book, which contains all its lessons, will surely be declaring to those who have ears to hear truths which were not presented to it in earlier days. Without dwelling upon the obvious difference between the lessons of Old Testament and New Testament times, we may observe the gradual progress of revelation in the latter. Our Lord told His disciples (John xvi. 4) that He had not said to them from the beginning what He was then saying because of His bodily presence among them. He further added, verse 12, "I have yet many things to say unto you but ye cannot bear them now." The Holy Spirit was to come and lead them into all truth, but by no means suddenly, or there would have been no room for the conferences, and differences, and mistakes, which the caudor of Scripture has put on record in the Acts of the Apostles. St. Paul appears to claim (Eph. iii.) a special understanding of the mystery of the Church, given to him for public benefit—"to make all men see what is the dispensation of the mystery which from the ages hath been hid in God," while he seems to intimate an acquaintance with another truth for which even the Church (not to speak of men in general, who are, however, the subject of it) was yet unready when he writes to Timothy, "Christ gave Himself a ransom for all to be testified in due time" (literally, "the testimony in its own times").

Scientific facts have contradicted the old established interpretation of some parts of Scripture, but instead of Scripture itself suffering from this, it has been cleared by means of such natural but God-given truth, and now stands out in these parts brighter and more glorious than ever. May it not be that certain moral facts, which the timidity of a faulty faith has ignored, or the prominence of other considerations has kept in the back ground, but which have always remained in irreconcilable antagonism to some articles of the original creed of Protestantism, are, after all, Divinely-appointed witnesses against a false interpretation of Scripture, the end of whose work, even in this life, will be a perfect agreement between God's work and the moral sense of regenerate man?

Few thoughtful Christians can have given attention to the question of Divine judgment without being conscious of a contradiction to the apparent meaning of isolated texts and passages given by their feelings and sense of right, and this contradiction, which is only worthy of much notice in the breast of Christians, and those who handle reverently the Word of God, is especially interesting when it occurs in those who confess their inability to see any meaning in Scripture but that against which their moral sense revolts.

But few thoughtful minds, knowing how plainly Scripture asserts the foreknowledge and election of God, and observing how little opportunity (if any) is afforded to the most, of becoming acquainted with saving truth, or assistance given them of obtaining an interest in it in this life, will feel that the difficulty is much lessened by a rejection of the doctrine of sovereign and final reprobation. Two facts stand before us apparently in antagonism to one another: one is that God withholds from some (not to say most men) the opportunities and influences which make others Christians; and the other, that His word pronounces the sentence of eternal punishment on at least many who are thus left to the corruption of a fallen world, and the workings of their own natural wills. Another apparent contradiction puzzles the mind—"God is love;" "He is good unto all, and His tender mercies are over His works." He wishes (thelei) that all men should be saved, and the expression of this wish is that "Christ Jesus gave Himself a ransom for all." He has purposed to "gather together again all things in Christ, whether they be things in heaven, or things on earth," and yet on the other hand, there is everlasting destruction denounced and to be executed by Christ Himself against all those who know not God and obey not the Gospel.

From these apparently contradictory statements, we, who believe in the whole Bible as the Word of God, and are resolved to sacrifice neither class of Scripture, see that Divine universal love and the severity of what we have called eternal punishment, are in agreement with one another, while our common sense and our moral sense, which God himself recognizes in all that He says about love or justice, and to which He sometimes appeals in defense of His own ways, repudiate the idea of agreement between governing love and the institution of endless misery, as we do that of Holy Omnipotence decreeing the eternalization of sin, in appointing the conditions which secure its everlasting increase.

How, then, are we to reconcile these opposites? It can only be by understanding eternal punishment in some different sense than that which has usually been assigned to it, and by obtaining the support of Scripture itself for our interpretation.

We will suggest what we believe to be the key to the difficulty in the words of one who could never be suspected of sympathy with any who denied the everlasting torment of the lost, Dr. John Owen, the greatest of the Puritan commentators. In vol. i. p. 237 (Clark's Edition) he says, "Scripture revelation extend unto the state of things unto the end of the world and no longer."

We believe the learned and keen-sighted puritan shows here that he had a glimpse of what might have unravelled to him the darkest mystery of religion and divine government, but he did not follow it up, but elsewhere strangely forgets or ignores what he has here said, and condemns those who arrived somehow at the conclusions to which his own light would have led him. I do not suppose that Dr. Owen would have allowed that he meant the word eternal reached no further than "to the end of the world," but he expressly allows this elsewhere, as I will show, and in these words which we have quoted he lays down a principle (unconsciously no doubt) which makes it reasonable to understand the words signifying duration in a limited sense, for surely there is no more reason for adjectival ideas being suggested to us beyond the limits of our comprehension, than there is for ideas of substance; in other words, if there is good reason for silence respecting the occupations of heaven and hell beyond the boundary of the time ages, there will be the same reason for silence respecting the further prolongation of time itself; the mind that could not comprehend the former would fail to comprehend the latter. But so far we have only got our moral of John Owen, but what saith the Scripture? In 2 sense and reason, and the unintentional assistance Tim. i. 9, we read of God's purpose and grace as "given us in Christ Jesus before eternal times" (pro chronon aionion), and the same expression is used in Titus i. 2, "eternal life which God promised before eternal times." We have never known the natural force of these words allowed to them by any interpreter of Scripture reputed orthodox. We pointed them out on one occasion to a popular and able minister, and he sought to fasten upon them the sense of "from eternal times," till his own lexicon confuted him and left him confessedly unable to understand them. Is there not here clearly indicated a point anterior to those ages which it is usual to think and speak of as endless? for if eternal times in Scripture really mean endless duration, either past or future, the undoubted language of the Apostle Paul "before eternal times," is incorrect and meaningless. Moreover, let it be observed that in the very same verse and sentence (Titus i. 2), the expression "eternal life" occurs, so that either it is possible and proper to use the same word with two different values in the same verse, or else we must allow the evident sense of "eternal" in regard to past times (which is such as to allow of a point antecedent to it (to determine the force of the same word when applied to the believer's life. We venture to say it is absolutely impossible for any reasonable man to avoid this alternative. We may just now remark that this has an important bearing on the interpretation of Matt. xxv. 46; but we shall have occasion to return to that again.

We have thus a point marked before eternal times; if we could find in Scripture another point after eternal times, we should have proved the finite character of those ages which are popularly supposed to represent eternity, and in doing so have obtained the key to the moral difficulty we have stated above. Such a point will, we submit, appear from the comparison of two or three passages. In Daniel vii. we have the prophet's vision of Christ's kingdom superseding all the kingdoms of the earth, and we read, "His dominion is an everlasting dominion which shall not pass away, and His kingdom that which shall not be destroyed." Also, four verses later, it is laid, "The saints of the Most High shall take the kingdom and possess the kingdom forever, even forever and ever." Similarly, Rev. xxii. 2, assures us the saints "shall reign for the ages of the ages," the strongest expression of duration used in Scripture. Yet the Apostle Paul declares in Cor. xv. 24, that when the "end" comes—all enemies, including death itself having been subdued by Christ, as King during these ages of conflict,—"the Son will deliver up the kingdom to God, even the Father;" in other words, He will be no longer King as Son of man, but it is expressly as Son of man that He obtained the kingdom (Dan. vii.) which was to be everlasting, while it must surely be subordinate to him, and not as continuing in any sense after Him as Son of man, that his saints possess the kingdom for ever, even for ever and ever. Thus there seems to be a terminating point to the for ever and ever of the Old Testament, at least in Daniel's use of it, and therefore to the corresponding expression in the Book of Revelation, while the great time ages roll between this and the point marked by the apostle Paul in his Epistles to Timothy and Titus.

J. F. B. TYNLING, Our Hope.

GOD'S PROMISE TO ABRAHAM, ISAAC AND JACOB.

"For when God made promise to Abraham, because he could swear by no greater, he swear by himself" (Heb. vi. 13). "By myself have I sworn, saith the Lord, for because thou hast done this thing, and hast not withheld thy son, thine only son: That in blessing I will bless thee, and in multiplying I will multiply thy seed as the stars of heaven, and as the sand which is upon the sea shore; . . . and in thy seed shall all the nations of the earth be blessed; because thou hast obeyed my voice" (Gen. xxii. 16-18).

"And the Lord said unto Abram . . . lift up now thine eyes, and look from the place where thou art, northward, and southward, and eastward, and westward; for all the land which thou seest, to thee will I give it, and to thy seed for ever. And I will make thy seed as the dust of the earth: so that if a man can number the dust of the earth, then shall thy seed also be numbered. Arise, walk through the land in the length of it and in the breadth of it; for I will give it unto thee" (Gen. xiii. 14-17). "Unto thy seed have I given this land, from the river of Egypt unto the great river, the river Euphrates" (Gen. xv. 18). "And I will give unto thee, and to thy seed after thee . . . all the land of Canaan, for an everlasting possession" (xvii. 8).

God renewed his promise to Isaac: "Sojourn in this land, and I will be with thee, and I will bless thee; for unto thee, and unto thy seed, I will give all these countries, and I will perform the oath which I swore unto Abraham, thy father; and I will make thy seed to multiply as the stars of heaven, and will give unto thy seed all these countries; and in thy seed shall all the nations of the earth be blessed; because that Abraham obeyed my voice, and kept my charge, my commandments, my statutes, and my laws" (Gen. xxvi. 3-5).

And God confirmed the same to Jacob: "The Lord said, I am the Lord God of Abraham thy father, and the God of Isaac; the land whereon thou liest, to thee will I give it, and to thy seed; and thy seed shall be as the dust of the earth, and thou shalt spread abroad to the west, and to the east, and to the north, and to the south: and in thee and in thy seed shall all the families of the earth be blessed" (Gen. xxviii. 13, 14).

David sums up the covenant thus: "Which covenant he made with Abraham, and his oath unto Isaac; and confirmed the same unto Jacob for a law, and to Israel for an everlasting covenant, saying, Unto thee will I give the land of Canaan, the lot of your inheritance" (Psa. cv. 8-11).

We have quoted promises that God made to Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, etc., that never were, nor could be fulfilled in this life. Yet God has promised with an oath.

"THESE ALL DIED IN FAITH."

Stephen says, "When Abraham's father was dead, he removed him unto this land, wherein ye now dwell. And he gave him none inheritance in it, no, not so much as to set his foot on: yet he promised that he would give it to him for a possession, and to his seed after him, when as yet he had no child" (Acts vii. 4, 5).

Paul says, "By faith Abraham, when he was called to go out into a place which he should after receive for an inheritance, obeyed; and he went out, not knowing whither he went. By faith he sojourned in the land of promise, as in a strange country, dwelling in tabernacles with Isaac and Jacob, the heirs with him of the same promise" (Heb. xi. 8, 9, 13). These all died in faith, not having received the promises. They did not forfeit the promises; for, they died in faith.

NOW, WHERE IS THE HOPE OF THE PROMISES?

ANS.—It is to be fulfilled in Christ. "Now to Abraham and his seed were the promises made. He saith not, And to seeds, as of many; but as of one, and to thy seed, which is Christ. And if ye be Christ's, then are ye Abraham's seed, and heirs according to promise" (Gal. iii. 16, 29). "So then they that be of faith are (at the present time) blessed (by faith) with faithful Abraham. Children of God by faith in Christ Jesus" (verses 9, 26). So in this world we may be the children of God by faith. But they which obtain that world, and the resurrection of the dead, are the children of God, being the children of the resurrection in Christ (Luke xx. 35, 36).

We will now examine the hope of Israel, in Christ. Jesus said, "I am the resurrection, and the life. God hath begotten us again unto a lively hope by the resurrection of Jesus Christ from the dead" (1 Pet. i. 3). Paul says, "For the hope of Israel I am bound with this chain" (Acts xxviii. 20). "And now I stand and am judged for the hope of the promise made of God unto our fathers: unto which promise our twelve tribes, instantly serving God, day and night, hope to come. For which hope's sake, King Agrippa, I am accused of the Jews. Why should it be thought a thing incredible with you, that God should raise the dead (Acts xxvi. 8-9)?" Then the hope of the promise is through the resurrection of the dead.

Paul says, "Men and brethren, I am a Pharisee, the son of a Pharisee: of the hope and resurrection of the dead I am called in question." Again, "And have hope toward God, which they themselves also allow, that there shall be a resurrection of the dead, both of the just and unjust."

"O, Israel, thou hast destroyed thyself; but in me is thine help. I will ransom them from the power of the grave; I will redeem them from death" (Hosea xiii. 9; 14).

"These bones are the whole house of Israel: behold, they say, our bones are dried, and our hope is lost . . . Thus saith the Lord God; Behold, O, my people, I will open your graves, and cause you to come up out of your graves, and bring you into the land of Israel. And shall put my Spirit in you, and ye shall live. And I will make them one nation in the land upon the mountains of Israel; and one King shall be king to them all: and they shall be no more two nations, neither shall they be divided into two kingdoms any more at all (This has not yet been since Ezekiel wrote). And they shall dwell in the land that I have given unto Jacob my servant, wherein your fathers have dwelt, and they shall dwell therein, even they, and their children, and their children's children for ever. Moreover, I will make a covenant of peace with them; it shall be an everlasting covenant with them; and I will place them, and multiply them, and will set my sanctuary in the midst of them for ever more" (Ezek. xxxvi).

"For if the casting away of them be the reconciling of the world, what shall the receiving of them be, but life from the dead? (Resurrection.) For I would not, brethren, ye should be ignorant of this mystery, lest ye should be wise in your own conceits; that blindness in part is happened to Israel, until the fulness of the Gentiles be come in: and so all Israel shall be saved; as it is written, There shall come out of Sion the Deliverer, and shall turn away ungodliness from Jacob: for this is my covenant unto them, when I shall take away their sins" (Rom. xi.). This taking away the sins of blind Israel, appears to be after Christ comes to Sion.

"When I shall bring again their captivity, the captivity of Sodom and her daughters, and the captivity of Samaria and her daughters, then will I bring again the captivity of Jerusalem's captives in the midst of them. When thy sisters, Sodom and her daughters, shall return to their former estate, and Samaria and her daughters return to their former estate, then thou and thy daughters shall return to your former estate. Nevertheless, I will remember my covenant with thee in the days of thy youth, and I will establish unto thee an everlasting covenant. Then shalt thou remember thy ways, and be ashamed when thou shalt receive thy sisters, thine elder and thine younger; and I will give them unto thee for daughters, but not by thy covenant. And I will establish my covenant with thee; and thou shalt know that I am the Lord: that thou mayest remember, and be confounded, and never open thy mouth any more because of thy shame, when I am pacified toward thee for all that thou hast done, saith the Lord God (Ezek. xvi.).

We must all know that Sodom was entirely destroyed by fire. So there must be a resurrection to be restored. This everlasting covenant that God establishes with Israel when the Redeemer comes to Zion and the dead are raised to life, and they be brought into the land of promise, is not the new covenant that was made with Israel in the apostle's day. But it is the old covenant made with Abraham, Isaac and Jacob for land through Christ.

But the covenant made at Mount Sinai, in Horeb, was a covenant of laws, and so was not the new. The inheritance is not of the law, but of promise.

The first condition of that promise was fulfilled by Abraham through faith in offering Isaac. The second condition was fulfilled by Christ (Rom. v. 18, 19; 2 Cor. v. 19).

We could write many comments; but to avoid lengthy ones, we study to so arrange and compare Scripture, that one passage will explain and throw light on another, as far as possible. I have been much interested in the BIBLE EXAMINER, because I love free discussion; and an increase of knowledge of the Bible. Bible truth increases faith, that works by love and purifies the heart.

THE LAW of Moses is most instructive; for it is true that the letter of that law cannot be explained but by the gospel, it is no less true that the gospel in its breadth and depth cannot be set forth save by the figures of the law, each jot of which covers some blessed mystery.

KNOWLEDGE, in its highest stages, always borders on the obscure. But it is folly to argue from such a fact, that what is incapable of being made perfectly clear, in either nature or revelation, is not a proper subject for investigation, or that inquiry into it is of no use. Such a position must be a petrified one, and its author a dwarf.

THE CURSE LIFTED.

A BIBLE VIEW OF THE PROMISED RESTITUTION.

BY WILLIAM H. SPENCER.

CHAPTER V.

WE have learned, from our investigation of this subject in the preceding chapters, what the Divine purpose was in the permission of the curse, and also the certainty of its removal. I would now briefly invite your consideration of the fact that Christ is the Divinely chosen instrument for the lifting of the curse.

"It pleased the Father that in him (Christ) should all fulness dwell; and having made peace through the blood of his cross, by him to RECONCILE all things unto himself: by him, whether things in earth, or things in heaven" (Col. i. 19, 20). The apostle plainly informs us in this language, that God purposes to consummate an eternal unity of all things, by and through Christ, the second Adam. John says, "We have seen and do testify that the Father sent the Son to be the Saviour of the world" (1 John iv. 14). "He is the propitiation for our sins; and not for ours only, but for the sins of the whole world" (1 John i. 2). And he is proclaimed to us as "The Lamb of God, which taketh away the sin of the world" (John i. 29).

Salvation means deliverance, whatever that deliverance may be from. Christ, as the second Adam, is "the Saviour of the world" in a twofold sense: (1) He saves, or delivers, the world (i. e., the human race) from the consequences of the first Adam's transgression. "Wherefore, as by one man sin entered into the world, and death by sin; and so death passed upon all men, for that all have sinned." . . . "Therefore, as by the offence of one judgment came upon all men to condemnation; even so by the righteousness of one the free gift came upon all men unto justification of life. For as by one man's disobedience (the) many [all men] were made sinners, so by the obedience of one shall (the) many [all men] be made righteous" (Rom. v. 12, 18, 19). The apostle argues that as all men were involved in the condemnation that came upon Adam for disobedience, even so, through the obedience of Christ, the second Adam, shall all men be "made righteous" in the same sense they were made sinners by the first Adam's disobedience. As through the first Adam "death passed upon all men, so through the second Adam "the free gift"—justification from Adamic death,—should come "upon all men." Or, as Paul states it in another place, "As in Adam all die, even so in Christ shall all be made alive" (1 Cor. xv. 22).

(2.) Christ is "the Saviour of the world," also in the sense that he saves the world from the necessity of dying a second time—from the necessity of suffering "the second death." Thus is secured to all men a probation for endless existence. That some will suffer the second death—(how many it is not for mortals to determine), is sufficiently established to warrant the belief that all men will not finally attain to eternal life, though it is unquestionably revealed in Scripture that the mass of the human family will do so.

As the antitype of the brazen serpent uplifted in the wilderness, that the Israelites, by looking upon it, might be delivered from destruction by the fiery serpents sent among them (Num. xxi. 9), Christ has been lifted up "that whosoever believeth in him should not perish, but have everlasting life" (John iii. 14-16). It is contrary to the character of God to affirm, directly or indirectly, that he caused the brazen serpent to be uplifted for the salvation of the Israelites from the fatal bites of the fiery serpents sent among them, and then withheld from the great majority of them all opportunity to look upon the brazen serpent, by which act such salvation depended. To withhold such opportunity from any to their destruction would be the grossest form of injustice. In justice to the afflicted Israelites, if God gave to one of them an opportunity to look upon the brazen serpent, He must give a like opportunity to all; and if any refused to look thereon, then they alone were responsible for the fearful doom that should overtake them.

Likewise must we recognize the wisdom, justice and love of God in the gift of his Son. According to God's purpose in the permission of the curse through the Adamic transgression, and prompted by immeasurable and immutable love for a groaning creation, God "gave his only begotten Son" to suffer, die, and "be lifted up" to His right hand, "that whosoever believeth in him should not perish, but have everlasting life." The great apostle to the Gentiles tells us that "whosoever shall call upon the name of the Lord shall be saved" [Syriac: "have life"—i. e., life everlasting]. "How then shall they call on him in whom they have not believed? and how shall they believe in him of whom they have not heard? and how shall they hear without a preacher?" (Rom. x. 13, 14.) The conclusion is abundantly established by these inspired words, without the necessity of further quotation of Scripture, that, as the serpent was lifted up in the wilderness to save all the Israelites who were bitten by the fiery serpents, so Christ has been "lifted up" for the salvation of all who have come under the consequences of the serpent's influence in Eden; and that, as all the serpent-bitten children of Israel had an opportunity to look upon the brazen serpent in the wilderness to their salvation, so God's love for "the world," all men, (John iii. 16) will grant to all men, in "due time" (1 Tim. ii. 4), an opportunity to believe on Christ to "everlasting life,"—"that whosoever believeth in him should not perish." If the word "whosoever," as Christ uses it in John iii. 16, does not mean that all men shall have an opportunity to "believe" on him, then the same passage would teach that God's love did not embrace "the world," and consequently, the most hopeful of believers in Christ could not be certain that God's love embraced them. Just as sure as God's love, manifested in the gift of his only begotten Son, embraces all men, just so surely will all men have the opportunity, in due time, to believe on him. But, as it is impossible for any to "believe in him of whom they have not heard" (Rom. x. 14), hence it is rendered certain that Christ, the "one Mediator between God and men,"—"who gave himself a ransom for all," shall "be testified" to all men "in due time," and thus they will "come unto the knowledge of the truth" (1 Tim. ii. 3-4).

MY BLESSED HOPE.

THE following article, "MY BLESSED HOPE," is the deliberate conclusion of an aged minister of the gospel, who has with great care and caution studied the word of God more than a half century. In his earnest search after the truth, as it is in Jesus," he has adopted the three following safe and simple rules of Bible exposition. Thus error has finally yielded to truth:—

1. Search the holy Scriptures with child-like simplicity, with the mind untrammelled by the pre-conceived religious opinions of education, tradition, and human standards of orthodoxy, prayerfully looking for the guidance of the holy Spirit.

2. The sacred Scriptures are to be understood according to the common law of language, and never as allegorical or figurative unless necessary to make good common sense.

3. The few passages which seem to conflict with the general tenor of the word of God may not be used to promote error, but, of course, always in a subordinate sense, for this good reason: The word of God, rightly understood, is a perfect harmony, never conflicting with itself nor its Author.

"For we are saved by hope: but hope that is seen is not hope; for what a man seeth, why doth he yet hope for? But if we hope for that we see not, then do we with patience wait for it?"—Rom. viii. 24, 25.

Hope is the sunshine of the believing soul while in this vale of tears. Hope, like faith and love, must have its object. That object will have the power of attraction just in proportion to the clearness of its presentation to the mind's eye. When Christ is revealed to the eye of faith, He is seen "the chiefest among ten thousand, and the one altogether lovely." Thus seen as He is, love to Him is a natural result, and is evidence of the new birth. Even so when the Holy Spirit opens the inner eye to the glorious object of hope, the great things of God which he has promised, hope, in exercise, becomes the motive power of its possessor, regulating the feelings, motives and actions. It at once quickens, strengthens, purifies and comforts, serving as "an anchor to the soul, both sure and steadfast," during all the conflicts of life, even unto death. Thus the believer "glories in tribulation," is "joyful in hope," and will finally be "saved by hope."

The gospel hope rests solely upon the Divine promises. Theological speculations have well nigh obscured the Christian hope. A flood of light and pleasing church literature, dictated by worldly policy, has insiduously turned away the multitude of professing Christians from the simplicity of that "faith once delivered to the saints." Hence, the lamentable lack of religious power so manifest, and the seeming necessity of wooing the patronage and support of this sin-loving and God-hating world. The fruit of this unholy and unnatural alliance is a matter, of course, the substitution of worldly prosperity and vain show for vital godliness.

The great essential in the believer's hope is immortality. "O blessed hope of immortality!" According to the sacred record, this was lost by the first Adam. It has not and cannot be restored by any less than Christ the Second Adam. The popular dogma of man's natural or inherent immortality is of heathen origin, as both history and revelation clearly prove. This long cherished heresy conflicts with the word of God, and bears directly on the character and mission of Christ, the great LIFE-GIVER, "Who only hath immortality, dwelling in the light which no man can approach unto" (1 Tim. vi. 16). Christ testifies of himself, "I am the resurrection and the life." The apostle's testimony is, "The gift of God is eternal life through Jesus Christ our Lord." This eternal life is immortality. This is found in Christ only; is not independent of him elsewhere, or otherwise. That teaching in the name of the Lord, called "Gospel," which withholdeth this essential glory from Christ, is not "the Gospel," but "another gospel." The general failure of our times to fully preach Christ as the only hope of immortality, is among the principal causes of the feeble and sickly character of our present Christianity. In the nature of things, this cause and its effect are wedded together. What God has clearly revealed is essential to man's best interest; we may not add to or take from it.

The future or final reward of the righteous is not at death, nor in an intermediate state, but "at the resurrection of the just" (Luke xiv. 14). Death is neither a rewarder or a life-giver, but an enemy,—the offspring of Satan and sin, to be "abolished" by gospel decree. All honor, power, and glory, belongs to Christ our Saviour.

"Flesh and blood cannot inherit the kingdom of God" (1 Cor. xv. 50). Therefore, there can be no proper kingdom or reign of Christ until after the resurrection of the righteous dead, when "mortality shall be swallowed up of life" Then those who sleep in Jesus will "put on incorruption." Not a conscious moment can be lost to them by the sleep of the grave, however long its duration. Next in the Divine order is "to be present with the Lord,"—to "be like him, and see him as he is." Hence, primitive saints were ever looking, watching, and "waiting for the Lord from heaven," as all saints now should according to promise. Most precious promise, immutable pledge, still on record,—"I will raise him up at the last day" (John vi. 40). Short of this coming and raising from the dead there can be no hope, even for "the saints of the Most High." For, "Then they also which have fallen asleep in Christ have perished" (1 Cor. xv. 15, 18). Of the saints then living it is promised, "We shall all be changed, in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye at the last trump." That change will be "This mortal must put on immortality." That is the putting on a new and immortal nature which they had not previous to this change. When the Bible speaks of man either living, dead, or resurrected, according to the law of language the entire man is referred to,—"soul, body, and spirit." The assumption that in death and resurrection his body only is meant, is an excusable perversion of the word of God, as all honest Bible students must see at a glance.

"So when this corruptible shall have put on incorruption, and this mortal shall have put on immortality, then shall be brought to pass the saying that is written, Death is swallowed up in victory" (1 Cor. xv. 54). Just at this point, and not before, is the object of hope reached, as proved by the following Scripture: "Looking for the blessed hope and the glorious appearing of the great God and our Saviour Jesus Christ, who gave himself for us" (Titus ii. 13, 14). Also, "For our conversation is in heaven, from whence also we look for the Lord Jesus Christ, who shall change our vile body that it may be fashioned like unto his glorious body" (Phil. iii. 20, 21). From these and parallel passages of Scripture it clearly appears that the blessed object of gospel hope is not so vague and indefinite as to have no power to move or attract, but that it is a real something that thought can, in some measure, grasp, as an infinite good most desirable. The early Christians feasted upon this hope; were "strong in the Lord, and in the power of his might;" separate from the world while in it, and fearing no harm.

The Christian hope necessarily embraces the future abode and inheritance of the redeemed. This is described so definite and clear in the sacred records that he that runneth may read.

"Then shall the righteous shine forth as the sun in the kingdom of their Father" (Matt. xiii. 43). As an object of hope mark its locality and duration: "And the kingdom, and dominion, and the greatness of the kingdom under the whole heavens, shall be given to the people of the saints of the Most High, whose kingdom is an everlasting kingdom" (Dan. vii. 27.) Mark again the nature and adaptation of this home and inheritance of the blest: "Begotten again to a lively hope by the resurrection of Jesus Christ from the dead, to an inheritance incorruptible and undefiled, and that fadeth not away, reserved in heaven" now, but "to be revealed in the last times." (1 Pet. i. 3-5). Our blessed Lord has said for the comfort of all his suffering and waiting disciples, "In my Father's house are many mansions. I go to prepare a place for you, and if I go and prepare a place for you I will come again and receive you to myself, that where I am ye may be also" (John xiv. 2, 3). This place thus prepared cannot be in this world of sin and death as now under the curse, but in the "world to come." In the language of Scripture, it will be "Our house which is from heaven" (2 Cor. v. 2). The language of believers is, "For have we no continuing city, but we seek one to come" (Heb. xiii. 14). This is the heavenly "Zion" to which "the ransomed of the Lord shall come with songs and everlasting joy upon their heads. They shall obtain joy and gladness, and sorrow and sighing shall flee away" (Isa. xxxv. 10). This is the "city of the living God," and none other than "that great city the holy Jerusalem descending out of heaven from God" (Rev. xxi. 10).

Into this city "the King of glory" shall triumphantly enter with his ransomed host according to promise. "Blessed are they that do his commandments, that they may have right to the tree of life, and shall enter in through the gates into the city" (Rev. xxii. 14). Here is not even a hint of poetical "sky mansions"—a mere delusive myth.

Verily, redemption's plan will be completed in Messiah's great mission to our world. This purpose of mercy is briefly expressed in a single Scripture, thus: "For this purpose was the Son of God manifested that he might destroy the works of the Devil" (1 John iii. 8). David's Son on David's throne will surely accomplish this in its due time according to the Divine oath given to David. Why not? Hope looks for what faith claims, and faith claims all that God hath promised; nothing more and nothing less. To illustrate: "Nevertheless, we according to his promise, look for new heavens and a new earth, wherein dwelleth righteousness" (2 Pet. iii. 13). In this new economy our Lord's long misunderstood prayer will be answered to the very letter, and Heaven's high standard of purity will then be a practical verity over all the "new earth wherein dwelleth righteousness." Sin, with its cause and all its dire consequences, shall be no more forever. Every foot-print of the arch-deceiver shall be wiped out. Less than this would be short of the fulfilment of the promise, and less than completeness in the kingdom, reign, and final triumph of "the Lord of lords, and King of kings." Divine goodness forbids the thought of such failure.

The mighty Conqueror "will not fail or become weary." He will effectually "bruise the serpent's head;" "thoroughly purge his floor," and gather out the tares from this world, the domain of his future kingdom. God is not slack concerning his promise. "The Son of man shall send forth his angels, and they shall gather out of his kingdom all things that offend, and them that do iniquity and shall cast them into a furnace of fire" (Matt. xiii. 41, 42). What judgments! What overturning! What coming glory! "And God shall wipe away all tears from their eyes; and there shall be no more death, neither sorrow, nor crying; neither shall there be any more pain, for the former things have passed away"

Such, in brief, is a Bible glance at the blessed hope of the children of God.

Dear reader, secure this hope now by unconditional submission and trust in God through Christ our Saviour only. WATCHMAN.

NOTE BY THE EDITOR.—The foregoing was written and sent to this Magazine by an aged Minister of the Methodist E. Church. It shows a doctrinal revolution is in progress in that Church, and it is too late to arrest it.

THE GREAT SALVATION.

THE "great salvation," as far as it relates to individuals, is summed up in the Christian disciple sharing with Christ in his inheritance. "If children, then heirs, heirs of God, and joint heirs with Christ; if so be that we suffer with him, that we may be also glorified together." (Rom. viii. 17.) The disciples are "joint heirs with Christ," who is himself as yet only heir of the Messianic inheritance. In the letter to the Hebrews the apostle describes him, even though now exalted to the throne of Jehovah, as the "heir of all things," and as "from henceforth expecting till his enemies be made his footstool." Hence his peculiar glory is yet to be given him, as seen by Daniel, when "one like the Son of man came with the clouds of heaven, and there was given him dominion, and glory, and a kingdom, that all people, nations, and languages should serve him." And just as Daniel was told by the interpreter that "the kingdom and dominion under the whole heaven should be given to the people of the saints," so Paul informs us that if we suffer with him "we shall be also glorified together." But at present they are simply heirs, "heir of the kingdom which God hath promised to them that love him," and "partakers of the glory that shall be revealed." (See also Rev. ii. 26, 27; iii. 21.)

Nothing is more evident than that mortal, perishing creatures, must undergo some remarkable change in order to qualify them for the everlasting possession of an inheritance, as "joint heirs with the Christ, the Son of the living God." "Flesh and blood cannot inherit the kingdom of God, neither doth corruption inherit incorruption;" and no separate or disembodied existence—nothing short of an immortalized bodily nature can by any possibility be qualified to share with Christ his everlasting kingdom. Hence the importance of the resurrection of the dead and that change to be effected on the faithful living when the Lord shall descend from heaven.

Christ is represented as the model, in a physical sense, of that quality of bodily existence to be conferred on his disciples—"Our citizenship is in heaven; from whence also we look for the Saviour, the Lord Jesus Christ, who shall change our vile body, that it may be fashioned like unto his glorious body." "Now are we the sons of God, and it doth not yet appear what we shall be; but we know that when he shall appear, we shall be like him; for we shall see him as he is." "For whom he did foreknow, he also did predestinate to be conformed to the image of his Son, that he might be the first-born among many brethren."

This joint-heirship with the Christ of his kingdom on the part of the disciple has its root in a relationship which is instituted in the act of becoming a disciple. He is then said to be "in Christ," and that from the earliest stage, for the apostle speaks of "babes in Christ." And not only during life, but even in death, for they are described "them also who sleep in Jesus." The idea of one person being in another is evidently a figure of speech, and is probably derived from the Hebrew mode of expressing the idea of in which is by the letter Beth, corresponding to the English B, and signifying a house. As a house is for the purpose of being in, so it was mutual to express the idea of in by the word or letter signifying a house. And as the occupant of a house derives all the advantages the house is fitted to yield, so the person who is in Christ derives all the advantages connected with such a position.—Selected.

BE TRUE.

SPEAK thou the truth. Let others fence
And trim their words for pay;
In pleasant sunshine of pretence
Let others bask their day.

Guard thou the fact; though clouds of night
Down on thy watch-tower stoop;
Though thou should'st see thine heart's delight
Borne from thee, by their swoop.

Face thou the wind; though safer seem
In shelter to abide,
We were not made to sit and dream;
The soul must first be tried.

Show thou the light. If conscience gleam,
Set not the bushel down;
The smallest spark may send his beam
O'er hamlet, tower and town.

Be true to every inmost thought,
And as thy thought, thy speech;
What thou hast not by suffering bought,
Presume thou not to teach.

HOLY joy is the root and spring of thankful praise.

FROM J. F. LEE, M. D.

Bro. STORRS: I will in this last epistle of mine, touching the organization of human creeds and sects, finish all allusions to them, so that hereafter I shall be silent about such pseudo-evangelical alliances! It seems to me that all the sects, Protestant and Catholic, are in (to use a Londonism) a shaky condition: In extremis. How conflicting, disputatious and fallacious their notions! In their general pretensions or assertions, how various the fallacies, wiles, tricks or lies, are hid or concealed; and so they wrap them up, with here and there some show of truth. "In the church (each sectarian) many deceptions are practised and various tricks are played off." At no time, perhaps, could it with greater truth be observed than at the present time. To search out and thoroughly investigate truth, is or ought to be the first, the primary study of man. "Search the Scriptures"—the Bible. Don't seek to know all that reformers or founders of sects have said if you wish to know the truth. Learn of Christ; follow him, examine and thoroughly investigate his sayings, what the prophets say; what Moses, and the apostles have left on record. How great in number, how numerous are the little minded men; the would be leaders! heads of sects, of Churches, evangelists! Beware of them, "Homoninj lupus," said Erasmus—"Man is a wolf to man."

There is some ground to fear that "The adventists," will, ere long, be divided into a variety of sects as much estranged from one another as are Arminians and Calvinist, Episcopalians and Catholics, Methodists and Baptists, Lutherans and Quakers, Moravians and Shakers; in fact they are now divided in "a shaky condition." "The Herald of Life," "The Bible Banner," "The World's Crisis," "The Advent Times," etc., though agreeing in some things, are yet not exactly in harmony; and some of them are not friendly to "the BIBLE EXAMINER." In fact, some of them hardly ever mention the latter, unless to find fault or excite prejudice against "George Storrs." These things ought not so to be. One thing to my mind is self-evident, i. e., that some who fancy themselves, in possession of all truth relative to this age (nian) and the age to come, or "the ages of ages," the kingdom of heaven; its rulers, judges, subjects, etc., have much to learn. But just as soon as an editor, or corresponding editor, fancies he is in possession of all the gospel—of all it contains relating to the present or the future—just so soon is he wise in his own conceit, and with him any advance in knowledge and wisdom is at an end. Seeing then all these things, how cautiously should we act and beware, lest we should be led astray by the errors of others, or fall into the presumptuous sin, of rejecting the plain words of inspiration and following crude conjectures either of our own or the constructions of others. I will bring these rambling remarks to an abrupt conclusion, and indulge in something more congenial to the heart of an humble, meek, contrite Christian.

Let us trust in God alone. Obey his injunctions, live by faith—be led by his Spirit in harmony with his word. Behold what an impressive truth the poet Virgil uttered—"The Spirit of God, the Divine Spirit, supports the vital principle, and diffusing itself through every limb, sets in motion the entire bodily machine, and blends itself with the whole frame." And pow for the life, and peace, and strength, and happiness of us all, what else is requisite to make us what we profess to be, Christians? The Spirit of Christ—the mind that was in Christ. May God, our heavenly Father, grant us (for his Son's sake, whom he did not spare but delivered him up for us all,) all things to insure us in safety to perfect us in love, and preserve us by his power—that we may love Him with the whole heart and love one another. Amen.

Monroe, N. C., 1874.

FROM S. S. CALL.

BRO. STORRS: Bro. Blain has sent me two packages of tracts with a copy of the EXAMINER in each package, all of which I have carefully read. This week I also received tracts, "God's Oath and promise to Abraham," a "Second Chance to be Saved," and "The Doctrine of Election." These I have carefully read, and I must say, my heart burned within me, while the Scriptures were being expounded unto me; and I could not help exclaiming with the poet.—

"Blind unbelief is sure to err,
And scan God's work in vain;
God is his own interpreter,
And he will make it plain."

Yes, Bro. Storrs, God bless you for the position you now hold. Persevere; "Be steadfast unmovable, always abounding in the work of the Lord, forasmuch, as your work is not in vain in the Lord."

I can say, Amen, to the principles or the doctrine of "the ages to come;" for the great foundation and principle of the doctrine is, "Overcome evil with good," and was uttered by our Master. O how blind I have been! and how blind many of the dear brethren are on this glorious truth! I read your articles on the "Oath and promise to Abraham," in the "Herald of Life," as they were first printed; you, also, very kindly, sent me three copies of the EXAMINER when you first revived it; yet I could (or would) not see; yet, thanks be to God, who giveth us the victory through our Lord Jesus Christ; for, truly, the victory was not of my own getting. But, thank God, one more fetter is broken. Once more I am free in Christ, and I feel free indeed, because the Son hath made me free. Bless his holy name.

I cannot close my letter without telling you that my sympathies have all along been with you, even from the first; and I have hoped you would succeed and prosper, in spite of all opposition; yet it seemed too good to be true. My heart is full to overflowing; the tears of joy dim my eyes as I write. Tongue cannot express the sweet comfort and peace, of a soul that is filled with God's love. No, it must be experienced to be known.

I shall try to render material aid for you, and your publications, from this time on. I am fully committed to the cause, and shall stand with and by you to the end, trusting in Christ for wisdom and strength to sustain and direct me as he sees fit. I must say, when you left the "Herald of Life," your light went with you, and you was sensibly and really missed; but you have gained another talent, and added it to the first talents.

FROM LUCRETIA B. LAMB.

BRO. STORRS: A few of us in this city came together on the eve of March 31st, to celebrate as best we could the anniversary of the Christian passover. Precious were the incidents connected with that event, that were read and commented upon; especially Jesus's earnest desire to eat that supper with them before He suffered; also, His declaration that He would drink no more of the fruit of the vine until He should drink it new with them in the kingdom of God; which was virtually a promise to drink it with them in that kingdom which He had taught them to pray might come, and which we may now realize to be near, even at the door. A cluster of precious memories filled our minds with peace and joy that language cannot express. The brethren dispersed abroad were remembered, especially Bro. Storrs and those convened with him at the same hour.

How richly this reminds of the great work of our blessed Lord until He shall come again; also the perfect union with Him that it is ours to enjoy even now. Jesus prayed that his disciples might be one with him, as He and the Father are one. He also prayed that all who believed on Him through their word might enjoy the same union. "I in them, and Thou in me, that they may be made perfect in one." O, what a thought! May we take it home to our hearts, and daily live by its sanctifying power; then will all with whom we mingle realize the transforming power of Jesus's prayer.

St. Paul, Minn., April 11, 1874.

FROM D. J. ELLSWORTH.

BRO. STORRS: The April EXAMINER came last night, and this morning I read the sermon on "The New Jerusalem." My mother read it last night, and called my attention to it. Notwithstanding the different views that are taken of it, what transcendent glory does it reveal for Christ and saved humanity! The thought came to mind, "What a tract it would make, to put into the hands of everybody." Would it not help to arrest the attention of many poor sinners, who hear and know so little about the glorious future, from what is taught them now-a-days?

I will pledge $2.50, or $3, as may be needed; and suggest that you insert a clause in the preface, as an appeal to all those who read to consider to what glorious state and future they may attain.

I still like the EXAMINER; although sometimes I take it up for a few moments' reading, and find such long articles, I lay it down again. You know how it is.

I remain your brother in Christ.

Windsor, Conn., April, 1874.

FROM LUCY E. WATSON.

BRO. STORRS: We prize the EXAMINER very much, and would be unwilling to part with it, although I do not know as I could say that we firmly believe the doctrines it advocates; yet there is no feeling of objection in our hearts, but rather the contrary. I love to think it may be so, and it looks to me there is much light in that direction. It makes God look like a God of love and mercy compared with many pre-conceived opinions. I do not wonder John said, "God is Love; and he that dwelleth in love, dwelleth in God, and God in him." I do desire this principle of love in my heart, and rooted so firmly that with the Apostle I can say, "Nothing . . . shall be able to separate me from the love of God." Without this we are nothing; for "love is the fulfilling of the law;" it is the mainspring of the plan of redemption. It moved the heart of God to give his Son to die for us, and open the way into a world that is glorious; and the inhabitants will never say, "I am sick," for "In that bright eternal, death can never, never come." My heart says, "Come, Lord Jesus, and put an end to all strife, and bring immortality to the waiting church." He has promised, and He will fulfill it in His own good time. Till then, we toil on; and soon we shall receive the crown.

Northwood Narrows, N. H., 1874.

SAMUEL BROWN, Milwaukee, Wis., writes: I should not know how to do without the EXAMINER. I sometimes think we have but just begun to "see men as trees, walking" as regards God's great plan of redemption. May God give us light as we are able to bear it.

CRITICISM.—1. John ii. 10: "They went out from us, but they were not of us; for if they had been of us, they would no doubt have continued with us." Most readers take the stress of this passage to rest on the words "from us," as distinguished from "of us;" whereas, they are the same in the original. For this our authorized translators are chargeable; who by confounding the propositions, altering the tenses, and inserting without the slightest warrant the expression "no doubt," have given to the entire passage a complexion, causing it to be often hailed as an apostolic argument in favor of "final perseverance;" whereas its primary design is a caveat against antichristian and ruinous error. John wrote:—"They went out of us, but they were not of us; for if they were of us, they would have remained with us." Should it be replied that the intrinsic meaning remains much the same, our rejoinder is simply this: "Stick to your text, like honest men."—W. Robinson.

"BIBLE INVESTIGATOR."—A Monthly Magazine for the investigation and exposition of all Bible truth, without regard to sects, creeds, parties or traditions, entitled as above, will be published by the undersigned at the low rate of seventy-five cents per annum, commencing May 1st, 1874.

The poor will be supplied free, so far as I am enabled to do so. Friends of truth, sending $5 to aid in the work, will receive the "BIBLE INVESTIGATOR" free, so long as it shall "remain alive," which I hope will be until "the coming of the Lord."

Subscriptions and correspondence respectfully solicited. Address, AMOS SANFORD,

OUR HOPE: A Magazine Bearing on Prophetic Enquiry. Edited by WM. MAUDE, and Published by ELLIOT STOCK, 62 Paternoster Row, E. C., London, England.

Just as this number of the EXAMINER goes to press, I have received the above named Magazine, from No. 1 to 7; for which I thank the friends in England; and hope, ere long, to get time to examine them.

OBITUARY.

BRO. STORRS: By the request of Bro. DAVID ROLLINS, before his death, I now write to inform you that he departed this life March 17, 1874, after a number of weeks of severe pain and suffering, which he bore patiently, considering that it was his heavenly Father's will. He was greatly comforted, in his sore affliction, by a glorious hope of a future resurrection and an admittance into the kingdom of our Lord Jesus Christ. His age was 84 years. Like a shock of corn fully ripe and fitted for the harvest, our brother has closed this life. L. H. MERWIN.

The Bible Examiner.

The friends of the EXAMINER have my thanks for the aid hitherto given since the revival of this Magazine. It was revived under peculiarly trying circumstances; and nothing but a clear sense of duty could have induced me to undertake the work at my time of life, and deserted, as I was, by those who had, financially, sustained me for eight years previously. I have no reproach to cast upon them; they acted, it is to be presumed, as they were pledged to act. To leave them, under a deep conviction that truth and honesty demanded it of me, was a most painful trial. Experience, however, has thus far satisfied me that I followed the call of God in the matter; and the EXAMINER has been sustained without incurring debt up to the present time, though many have been sent out without charge, or gratuitously.

Three numbers more will close the present volume. Those, therefore, who intend to pay for this volume and have not yet done so,—and such as intend to help on the work by donations, will much oblige by remitting the amount at the earliest day possible, that the remaining numbers may be issued without interruption, and the next volume be entered on free from all incumbrances, and with an increased number of subscribers.

To encourage old subscribers to pay up,—who have not yet remitted anything on the present volume,—if they will send $3, soon, I will credit them in full to the end of the next volume.

New subscribers shall receive the whole of the present volume (back numbers and the remaining three) for $1.10, if applied for soon: or, for $3

I will send them the present volume and the following one.

At the close of the present volume it is intended to put up, in plain binding, all the numbers, with an INDEX to the subjects. This volume will be sold at $2.25; the 25 cents being for postage when sent by mail: if taken at my office, $2 only. Those who wish this volume, thus bound, will please give me notice early, that I may know how many to bind, as I can supply but a limited number; and those who send first will be first supplied.

EDITORIAL NOTE.—In my hurry to get off the May EXAMINER, so as to meet my engagement in Pittsburg, May 3d., I was prevented from reading any of the proof of that number before it went to press. I regret to see several errors in it. Most readers will easily correct them; yet I owe them an apology. On page 230, fifth line from top, for "disobedience," read, obedience. Page 233, line 14 from top, for "affectations," read, affections. Page 246, the 15th and 16th lines from the bottom should be transposed. Page 253, 21st line from top, for "mutual," read, natural. Minor error occur, but these are the principal ones.

ELD. J. A. SPAFFORD, Coborne, Canada, writes: I am very much pleased with the present form of the EXAMINER, and hope to do something in procuring subscribers. I am fully satisfied that you have the truth in the main: hope the Lord's stewards, who have the means, will not see you lack funds to spread these glorious truths which so clearly vindicate our Father's dealings with the children of men and show Him in very deed a God of love. Yours, in hope of eternal life.

VISIT TO PITTSBURG, PA.

THE EDITOR of this Magazine spent the first and second Sundays in May in the above named city. He found there a small but noble band of friends who uphold with full hearts the truths advocated by himself. Among them is a preacher, who was formerly of the Methodists, but is now firmly settled in the character of the Divine government as set forth in this periodical. The EDITOR, while in Pittsburg, set forth his views to many attentive hearers, and trusts that the labor was not in vain.

The following extract is taken from the Pittsburg "Leader" the Monday after the first Sunday's service. The term "Rev." is omitted from the extract, and, also, a few words are changed, as the Reporter did not catch the precise expression.

GEORGE STORRS AT LIBRARY HALL—AN INTERESTING DISCOURSE ON THE FINAL OVERTHROW OF SIN.

A large audience assembled at Library Hall, last night, to hear George Storrs, of Brooklyn. The subject, as had been previously announced, was "A Vindication of the Government of God over the Children of Men."

The position the speaker took at the outset was that justice was one of the most glorious attributes of the Divine Being. As he has provided for an endless life, he will also give all his creatures an opportunity to attain that life through redemption by His Son. It is not to be supposed for one moment that the Creator could so provide for the human race, without thoroughly comprehending the principles and motives which are inborn in all the human family. His plan is perfect, and I have not the least conviction that He will ever alter one iota of it. He understood perfectly the system upon which He created the world and man. It is impossible to create an accountable being who can not sin. God did not alter his plan when man first sinned in the garden of Eden. Just as if he knew what course man would pursue when first created, He provided redemption for him. Redemption was just as surely in his plan as any part of the work. Every son of Adam will have an opportunity to be saved; if not now, in the ages to come. Just so sure as the evil of man affected the whole race, that evil will be removed in time to come.

There is to be an endless succession of ages, during which time all the provisions for the redemption of the human race are tending toward the great consummation. The time will come, when all who have already died, and who will hereafter die without a knowledge of God, will have an opportunity to be saved. I cannot think that the infinite Being will condemn those who have not had an opportunity to be saved. All men will have an opportunity; if not in this life, in a future one. Do not misunderstand me. I do not mean that all men will have another opportunity, for there are some who have already had the opportunity, and rejected it.

Many think the Almighty is a harsh and revengeful Being, who shuts up those who have sinned in some dark place of torture. Until they see God as he is, and not as he has too often been represented, their opportunity will not have arrived. If they die without a true knowledge of God in the present life, as many have died, they will have a chance to know Him as He is in His true light, in some future age, and then will their opportunity have arrived. Some may call me "Universalist." I am, in one sense; I believe that a universal opportunity will be accorded every son and daughter of Adam.

During the delivery of the discourse the utmost attention and interest was evinced by those present. Shortly after the commencement, some half dozen persons rose and went out, whether on account of the non-accordance of their sentiments and doctrines with those of the speaker, or for some other reasons, is best known to themselves.

THE EDITOR of the EXAMINER desires to acknowledge his gratitude to the friends in Pittsburg for the generous manner in which they sustained him and helped him on his way. May our covenant God abundantly reward and prosper them.

DIFFICULTIES: OR, LUKE XX. 35, 36.

A good sister writes: "I fail to be yet convinced of the resurrection to life of any, in the future, but those who are found in Christ; for He says plainly to the Sadducees concerning the resurrection, 'They that are accounted worthy to obtain that (age), and the resurrection from the dead, neither marry nor are given in marriage; neither can they die any more; for they are equal unto the angels, and are the children of God' (why?) 'being the children of the resurrection.' Now permit me to ask, if all men are to be raised up in the future, are they not the children of the resurrection? How then am I to understand what Jesus meant with such an explanation? I confess I cannot." "A. P."

If we expect to find any system perfectly free from difficulties, we shall find our mistake by and by. Suppose I lay one text along side of that quoted by our sister, thus:

Christ plainly says, "The hour is coming in the which all that are in their graves shall hear His voice, and come forth; they that have done good unto the resurrection of life; and they that have done evil, unto the resurrection of condemnation;" or, judgment: for the original word (krisis) is so translated in verses 22, 27, and 30 of the same chapter.

Now, if the construction of our sister, of the text Luke xx. 35, 36, is the true one, how is she to construe this of John v. 28, 29? Would it not compel her to accept an ultimate universal salvation? for, this text more plainly asserts a universal resurrection, than that in Luke does that all the resurrected are the children of God. Shall we believe that these texts contradict each other, or that our Lord contradicts himself? No believer in Jesus dare take that position! Both texts are truth, uttered by Him who is "The way, the truth, and the life." Any theory, therefore, which does not harmonize them must be untrue.

The only question, then, is, how can they be harmonized? Certainly they cannot be by a denial of a universal resurrection; and they cannot be by maintaining that all the resurrected ones are the children of God, because, "plainly," two classes are embraced in the resurrection John v. 28, 29. Most professed Christians who find texts that seem to clash with each other, and one of them seems to contradict their theory, set themselves to explain away the opposing one. Such a course is not "rightly dividing the words of truth." That caused the "fall of the Jews." Their Messiah was to be a King and reign on David's throne. But He was just as certainly to "pour out His soul unto death," to "be cut off." They looked for Him to reign gloriously; but they overlooked his sufferings and death; and thus coming short of the whole truth they stumbled and fell. Both His death and reign are facts; and though spoken of in the same connection have proved to be near two thousand years apart, already; and it may be that even the apostles had no idea of such a delay as to the reign of Christ on David's throne.

Now as to the resurrection question. That there is to be more than one resurrection there is ample proof in the Bible. Our Lord speaks of a reward to be bestowed at the resurrection of the just (Luke xiv. 14). Paul speaks of "every man in his own order," in the resurrection (1 Cor. xv. 14). The Revelator speaks of "the first resurrection" (Rev. xx. 6); and of "the rest of the dead" not living again till after a thousand years (verse 5). These, with other testimonies, go to show the dead do not all rise at the same time. There has already been raised, "Christ, the First-fruits; there is to be, "They that are Christ's at His coming" to reign: "then the end." Says, Dr. A. Clarke, "The end, when the whole mass shall be raised." The apostle gives three separate seasons of resurrection, 1. Christ: 2. They who are His at his coming: 3. Afterwards "the end" of the resurrection; when the mass, or "rest of the dead," will be raised. A vast and mighty difference has there been and will there be in these resurrections. Christ has been raised and glorified for near two thousand years: at the commencement of the next age, His saints will be raised; made immortal; "cannot die any more," not "be hurt of the second death;" reign with Christ on his throne (Rev. iii. 21). have the life of the age next to follow this, from which all "the rest of the dead" will be excluded. Thus will those who are Christ's at his coming have eternal life; i. e., a life commencing with Christ's reign and never to end; while those who are not among these honored ones, will remain in death through all "the age to come;" but in some of "the ages," following that, will have a resurrection of an inferior character, because they will not be immortal by their resurrection, and are liable to "the second death," as appears from what Jesus says, Rev. ii. 11, "He that overcometh" (now, in his conflicts) "shall not be hurt of the second death." There is, hence, an amazing difference between those raised at Christ's coming, and the mass to be raised in the ages afterwards.

Enough has probably been said to prepare the way for explaining Luke xx. 35, 36, so as to make a perfect harmony with John v. 28, 29. It is evident Jesus speaks in Luke of the resurrection of the righteous dead; or, the resurrection that takes place at His coming. The Sadducees said, "There is no resurrection." i. e., none of the human family will rise from the dead. They presented the case of seven brethren, whom they assumed to be all righteous because they strictly kept the law, and married their brother's wife to raise up seed to a brother who died without children, as the law required. Jesus meets them on this ground: as though He had said "You say these brothers and this woman were all righteous, or just; very well: They which shall be accounted worthy to obtain that age, in which those who are mine at my coming shall have a resurrection, neither marry, nor are given in marriage: neither can they die any more: for they are equal (or, like) unto the angels; and are the children of God, being the children of the resurrection of the just; and, that just ones are raised from the dead, even Moses showed at the bush, when he called the Lord the God of Abraham, and the God of Isaac, and of Jacob: for He is not the God of those who are hopelessly dead, and never to live again; for all live to Him who calleth things that be not as though they were."

This argument was sufficient to silence the Sadducees, who denied, that there "is any resurrection" (verse 27). The question, as they presented it, required only the proof of the resurrection of the just. That settled, their denial was overthrown. It is the resurrection of a certain class of the dead by which they were "put to silence;" and it was wholly unnecessary, to the argument, in this place, to say anything of the resurrection of "the rest of the dead:" that is decided in John v. 28, 29, and Rev. xx. as well as abundance of other testimony.

The texts that were supposed to contradict each other are thus made to harmonize perfectly. It is only for want of careful attention to all parts of the Scriptures that men talk about contradictions in the Bible, or make attempts to set aside some portions to establish the traditions of men, or to uphold a theory they have stereotyped, and a dread of being thought changeable. Accept all Bible testimony as truth; and study it till you can give every portion its place in harmony with all other; so shall we increase in the knowledge of God and of our Lord Jesus Christ. Ed.

THE ANGELIC MESSAGE.

"BEHOLD, I bring you good tidings of great joy, which shall be to all people." . . . "Glory to God in the highest, and on earth peace, good will toward men" (Luke ii. 10, 14).

The "good tidings" are the birth of a Saviour, which name signifies a "LIFE-GIVER, to make safe, to deliver, to preserve, to cause to escape;" such a Saviour as perfectly frees from all evil and danger, and is the author of eternal salvation; one "that taketh away the sin of the world" (John i. 29). This "child born" is "the Christ"—the Anointed of God; the One God has set apart as "The Prophet," to teach the truth; a Priest, to offer himself a sacrifice to reconcile the world to God, bear away its sin, and to "make intercession for the transgressors" (Isa. liii. 12); and; especially, for all that "come unto God by Him" (Heb. vii. 25). And He is God's anointed KING to rule in the hearts of His people, and to reign over the world on the "throne of His father David" (Luke i. 32, 33, Dan. vii. 14, and Psal. lxxii. 8).

All these things are included in the "good tidings" by the angels. These tidings are for "all people"—all have heard or will hear them; else the angelic message is a deceitful and false proclamation. But that cannot be, for a part of it has already been fulfilled, and that is a pledge, an earnest, of the accomplishment of the whole; and men may as well deny that the Christ was ever born as to call in question the fact that every child of Adam will hear the "good tidings" of His having given Himself a ransom for all.

But, says an objector, "Multitudes have died without hearing this message, and surely they will not be raised from the dead to hear it." Answer: Abraham died without possessing the land God promised him: Will he not be raised from the dead to have the promise fulfilled? So will God cause the truth of the angelic message to be manifested in spite of death, which stands no more in His way than Jordan stood in His way against Israel's being brought into Canaan. "All people" must and will hear the good tidings announced by the angels at the birth of the Christ; even the "tidings of great joy:" none are ultimately to perish without a probation in the full knowledge of that heavenly message; nor then, only by a known and wilful rejection of the Anointed One who is commissioned to carry out and execute God's design of love to every soul of the race.

The idea that the present life is the only time that God will employ in "reconciling the world to Himself" (2 Cor. v. 18) is without one declaration of Scripture to support it; and makes the Divine testimony concerning the work of the Christ a deception and a falsehood; for that testimony expressly declares that God's "good pleasure, which He hath purposed in himself," is, "that in the dispensation of the fulness of times He might gather together in one all things in Christ, both which are in heaven, and which are in earth; even in Him" (Eph. i. 9, 10).

In view of such a result, no wonder that "a multitude of the heavenly hosts," at the birth of the Christ, burst forth with a shout of "Glory to God in the highest, and on earth peace, good will to men." No marvel that we are told, "Which things the angels desire to look into" (1 Pet. i. 12); for, when the work of human redemption is so completed that sin, evil, death, and hades, are all removed, and "God is all and in all," such a manifestation will have been made of God's wisdom, power, love, mercy, and long suffering, as will cause all intelligent beings to wonder, love, adore, and obey "Him that sitteth upon the throne, and the Lamb," and prepare them for still more of the displays of the Divine wisdom, knowledge, power, and love, continually unfolding, but never to be exhausted. O, wondrous love! wondrous fountain of "unsearchable riches;" a store durable and as exhaustless as eternity itself! What a contrast, to be in such a state, after having passed through the "howling wilderness" of our pilgrimage in this age of sorrow, pain, and death! How will "Glory to God in the highest" eternally employ our tongues; while "on earth" there will be "peace"—universal harmony and love every where experienced; men learn war no more; none to disturb or make afraid. All this under the reign of the "Child born" in Bethlehem of Judea—the world's Redeemer and Lord.

The "good tidings," as yet, have had only a small beginning,—only as a "mustard seed" sown in the earth; but it is to become "a great tree" and "fill the whole earth." All the living and the dead of our race are to share in the knowledge and sight; and if not won to join in the joy—"great joy"—it will be because they "will not" accept the Christ; but, Herod like, "seek to destroy" Him (Matt. ii. 13, 16). -But such an effort will be unavailing; for Jesus will reign on, without end; because His "Father has appointed Him to a kingdom" that has no end; which shall not be destroyed, nor pass away; but shall "fill the whole earth, . . . and it shall stand for ever" (Dan. ii. 35, 41).

The present and past ages have been filled up with preparatory work, or building scaffolding and preparing the workmen to carry on the great work, in "the ages to come," that "shall fill the whole earth with the knowledge and glory of the Lord as the waters cover the seas" (Hab. ii. 14, Isa. xi. 9, and Psalms lxxii. 8, 17, 19). God's work will then be found to have been carried on with wisdom that infinitely surpassed all human conception, and with a result so perfect and complete as to be a matter for eternal praise and adoration, and inspire a faith and confidence in His wisdom, knowledge, love, and power, that no circumstances can ever again, for a moment, shake; and a perfect peace of mind in relation to future events will be the eternal experience of all intelligent creatures. Glorious result and consummation! Let us strive to make our calling sure to be of the workmen to be employed in this glorious enterprise of God and His beloved Son, Jesus Christ our Redeemer and Lord. ED.

THE CONTROVERSY.

"Disallowed indeed of men, but chosen of God, and precious" (1 Pet. ii. 4). Who is God's choice? Jesus Christ. For what did he choose him? To be the foundation and head of a spiritual creation. The animal, or Adamic foundation was only designed to produce an animal race; a sort of temporary arrangement, to be of short continuance, but to serve as a starting point to produce a more noble structure that should endure endlessly. To this end, God chose his Son as the permanent foundation and the builder of a spiritual structure, that the purpose of God to make man in His own image should in due time be accomplished. For this purpose the Son of God took on himself the nature of the animal man, or "flesh and blood," thus forming a union with the perishable race, which entitled Him, through a perfect obedience, to lift that race into a higher, or spiritual life, through a work of grace, and changing the believing and obedient, into the image of His own divine nature.

Thus prepared, He triumphed, and the animal nature being crucified, He rose from the dead, by the power of the eternal Spirit, wholly a spiritual being; and God hath chosen him as the foundation and head of a new and spiritual creation or building among the children of men. A spiritual nature, immortality, incorruptibility, eternal life, are all derived from him, and from no other source can they be obtained by any of the first Adam's race.

Here is the Controversy: God has made his choice, as he has the right to do, and he calls upon all men, everywhere, to harmonize in the choice, assuring them there is hope from no other quarter; no spiritual nature; no immortality; no incorruptibility; no endless life, except through this foundation or living head of the new creation. "There is none other name under heaven given among men whereby we can live" (Acts iv. 12.). Here is the whole controversy between God and men. Men disallow, disapprove, reject God's choice. They pretend they have an immortal soul, a spiritual nature, a deathless element that inheres in themselves; and thus virtually set aside God's chosen method for the bestowment of immortality, and incorruptibility. They refuse to yield their fancies and wills to God's will; and thus the controversy goes on. God is well pleased with his choice of a living Stone—Jesus, the LIFE-GIVER. In His sight that Stone is "precious," honorable, highly esteemed, costly: but men are dissatisfied with it, and cast it aside: it is too humiliating to them to admit that they are of the dust, and have no higher principle in their nature; their proud hearts would "be as Gods"—spiritual, immortal, without being dependent on God's chosen medium—Jesus—for such qualities.

One or the other of the parties in this controversy must yield, or eternal dissolution must be the fate of man. Does any man think God will yield to their impious claims, and approve of their contempt of his "chosen and precious" LIFE-GIVER? Are any desperate enough to suppose they can successfully contest this matter with the Almighty? Alas, for such, they will find they must bow to the Divine will or perish forever "like the beasts that perish." All the efforts of men to arrive at immortality, incorruptibility, endless life, except in Jesus Christ alone, are as fruitless and vain as if they should attempt to blow out the sun by the puff of their breath. They must submit to God's terms, or go back to the dust from whence they came. all the efforts of men to arrive at life eternal by any other means or method than that God has chosen, will be as fruitless as the attempt at Babylon to build a tower up to heaven: and the confusion of language at that time was no greater than the vexations that men now inflict on themselves and each other in efforts to make it appear that they are what God has never given them power to be, aside from regeneration in Christ Jesus. They would now, "be as Gods;" or, be immortal and live forever without Christ.

Those who acquiesce in God's "chosen and precious" Stone, or foundation, become as "lively stones"—stones having life by their connection with it—and "are built up a spiritual house," a dwelling, a mansion, a house of God, "a temple of the Holy Spirit," and thus will be brought into an endless life: die no more, and be forever with the Lord. Let the Controversy end, now and forever.

TOO MUCH FOR THEIR FAITH.

BELIEVERS "in the age to come" seem to be quite as alarmed at the doctrine of "the ages to come" as are the opponents of a future age. What is the matter? They are quite willing the promise and oath of God should have its fulfilment in those "left of the nations," after the second advent, and their posterity; but seem quite unwilling that it should cover the millions who have in the past lived and died in utter ignorance of God's mercy and love in providing a remedy, for the perishing, in the SEED of the woman, who is to bruise the serpent's head and destroy the works of the devil, i. e., all works of evil introduced by the one transgression of Adam; the main one of which is death. Death, which has come on unnumbered millions, who have died in ignorance of God's remedy, they seem to suppose shuts them out from the benefit of the Edenic promise, confirmed by an oath to Abraham.

Saith Paul, "He must reign till He hath put all enemies under His feet" (1 Cor. xv. 25). This must, of course, refer to His mediatorial reign, for "He shall sit and rule upon His throne; and He shall be a Priest upon his throne" (Zech. vi. 13). To put "all enemies under His feet," certainly does not imply that all enemies will be destroyed in the sense of being killed or annihilated. There is one enemy that will be so destroyed, that is death; which Paul calls "the last enemy;" this destruction annuls the power of that death which came into the world by "one man's sin;" so that as I have said elsewhere, no descendant of Adam can now be held in that death except by a personal and wilful rejection of the Deliverer.

To put under a conqueror's feet, was not to kill them. The expression is taken from the ancient custom of conquerors putting their feet on their vanquished and prostrate enemies, to signify their total defeat, and subordination to the power of the victor, and is used by the Apostle to represent a like subjection of all enemies to Christ, and under His reign of conquest, which commences at His second advent. It is not an act of triumph over dead enemies, nor by killing living ones, but of subjection to His government.

Are we to suppose that this subjection relates only to such as may be left alive after the second advent? Why then add, "The last enemy shall be destroyed—death?" All enemies are put under His feet—are subjected to him—but "the last enemy (introduced by Adam's sin) shall be destroyed," viz.: "death." That destruction shows that the "Adamic death," as some call it, holds none of the race, of necessity; no death can hold any man in its dominion unless it is the result of his own wilful rejection of the LIFE-GIVER; and such rejection cannot take place till that LIFE-GIVER has first been proclaimed to him.

How does the idea of the subjection of the "left of the nations," after the advent, make good the Edenic and Abrahamic promise, and the testimony of Paul that all enemies shall be put under His feet? Can it in truth be said, that Christ has thus subjected them, if all the myriads who have lived and died in ignorance of the Deliverer between the creation and "the age to come" are never to hear of Him, and death is never to be destroyed? Christ came "to destroy the works of the devil" (1 John iii. 8); and death is the main work of the evil which afflicts the race; and that Adamic "death shall be destroyed;" and it shall never be said that any man remains in death or is dead because Adam sinned. "The son shall not bear the iniquity of the father" (Ezek. xviii. 20). "The soul that sinneth it shall die" (verse 4).

The perfect work of Christ, the second Adam, will be accomplished when he has bruised the serpent's head,—eradicated all the evil from the race which the first Adam brought upon it, and every man, woman and child, of that race, has been placed in as good and favorable a condition as Adam was at creation; yea, they shall be placed in a more favorable condition, for "Where sin abounded, grace did much more abound"

(Rom. v. 20). The great DELIVERER will perform no such stinted work as Adventists and Life believers generally teach and preach; their views in these matters are only a modified form of the old heresy of eternal torment for all who do not now believe in the Christ, whether they have ever heard of Him or not. Such views savor a want of faith in the power of God to accomplish His great and precious promises, or a disbelief in of such promises having been made. Ed.

PREJUDICE AND BIGOTRY.

THESE are two fashionable old thieves, who go about in sanctimonious garbs to deceive the unsuspecting. They are really two of the most unscrupulous d'evils that ever cursed the human family. They are destitute of both sight and hearing, and yet pretend to see and hear all things. They have tongues, but "under their lips is the poison of asps" (Rom. iii. 18); their "tongue is set on fire of hell" (Jas. iii. 6). Their main business is to put out the eyes of others, and close up their ears, so that they shall remain stationary in knowledge, and receive no further light, especially on the things of God or of the coming kingdom. They, themselves, are petrified: they can see nothing, hear nothing, with patience or candor, that does not harmonize with their stupid condition. They are incapable of reasoning: that faculty in them is dead from the want of action; all they can do is to grumble and find fault with those who will not submit to their dictation. They think themselves wise, while Paul pronounces them "fools" (Rom. i. 22, and 1 Cor. viii. 2).

Strange as it may appear, these two monsters have managed so to conduct their nefarious work in matters of religion, that few men can be found who dare to hazard their lives in opposing them. because such as do oppose their vile pretensions are sure to be ridiculed, denounced, belied, misrepresented, and have often lost their lives by them. They are highwaymen, who watch for any and every one who passes by, to rob and plunder him, to pluck out his eyes, cut out his tongue, and mutilate him in every possible way. The man who earnestly goes out in search of truth may expect these conscienceless villains will meet him at every step; and he must make up his mind to bear patiently their insults, and strive only with the "Sword of the Spirit" to overcome them. In due time, He, who is "the way, the truth, and the life," will slay them by "the sword that proceedeth out of His mouth" (Rev. i. 16, and ii. 16). They must and will die ere long, so let us be patient, but do our own work regardless of these old sinners. Ed.

THE STUDY OF THE BIBLE.

BY HENRY DUNN.

CHAPTER XXIV.

General Principles.

LEAVING Dr. Wordsworth, the Council of Nice, and the particular text on which Church authority is ordinarily based, let us now inquire whether there are indications in any part of Scripture that it ever was the design of God that divine teaching should be subjected to professional interpretation; or that it ever was the duty of a simple-minded follower of truth,—Jew or Gentile,—to rely on the expositions of either Priest or Levite, Rabbi or Scribe?

That, under the Jewish economy, the Priests were commanded to "teach the children of Israel all the statutes which the Lord had spoken unto them by the hand of Moses," is clear (Lev. x. 11); that these ministers held a Divine Commission, and were descended in unbroken succession from the first High Priest, appointed by God himself, is certain; that they had, through Moses, a promise almost identical in terms with that given to the Apostles by the Saviour, cannot be disputed—"The Lord thy God, He it is that doth go with thee; He will not fail thee, nor forsake thee" (Deut. xxxi. 6);—a promise repeated by the Prophets as stretching onwards through all their history (Isa. xli. 10, 11), and appropriated in each succeeding generation by the men who sat in "Moses' seat."

The question is,—Did all these advantages combined, viz., a Divinely appointed priesthood, —a command to teach,—an unbroken succession,—an everliving promise—justify on the part of the Jewish hierarchy a claim to interpret Old Testament Scripture, or warrant a simple-minded Israelite in casting the responsibility of deciding betwixt truth and error upon his religious guides?

Let the history of that people answer. So far as they did follow these professional instructions, they were, as a rule, misled and deceived. So far as they abandoned their guidance, and listened to the voice of the irregular teachers raised up by God from amidst the laity, they prospered.

What precise lesson is intended to be taught by the fact, that "under the ancient Theocracy," and again throughout the whole period of the Hebrew Monarchy, the most noted of those, holy men of old, by whom God spake unto the fathers,—Isaiah, Jonah, Amos, Joel, Hosea, Nahum, Micah, Zephaniah, Habakkuk, Obadiah, Haggai, Zechariah, Daniel, and Nehemiah, were neither Priests nor of priestly families, we do not profess to know; but the fact that the men chosen of God to be the inspired teachers of the people were, for the most part, altogether independent of the Hierarchy, is surely proof positive that the interpretation of Scripture was not intrusted to the Priesthood.

It may be said, that the Levites were specially appointed to "teach Jacob the judgments, and Israel the Law" of God (Deut. xxxiii. 10); that for this purpose, lest their minds should be distracted with worldly cares, no portion of the Land of Canaan was allotted to them; and that they sometimes took up their residences in the houses of the rich, and acted both as Priests and instructors of the children (Judg. xvii. 9).

This is quite true. But then it must be borne in mind that this teaching referred chiefly, if not entirely, to ceremonial observances, in relation to which the Levite was an absolute authority. On this point the word of God is explicit: "Take heed in the plague of leprosy, that thou observe diligently, and do according to all that the Priests the Levites shall teach you: as I commanded them, so ye shall observe to do" (Deut. xxiv. 8).

The work of the Levite, as expounded in Scripture, was threefold; it consisted in explaining the Ceremonial Law in doubtful cases,—in solving difficulties which might occur in dealings between man and man,—and in deciding controversies (disputes) among the people (3 Chron. xix. 8). There is nothing whatever to show that either Priest or Levite had the slightest authority to interpret Prophecy, or to decide upon the teachings of Moses, so far as these related to things moral and spiritual.

The rise, at a later period, of Rabbis or Doctors, and the worship of the Synagogue, does not at all interfere with this conclusion. On the contrary, the "vain traditions" of the former, —so strongly denounced by our Lord,—and the freedom of exposition which prevailed in the latter (Matt. iv. 23; Luke iv. 16-20; Acts xiii. 14-16), indicate that it was the duty, as it was also the privilege, of the Israelite to judge for himself as to the meaning of the written Word.

That there was among the Jews a strong party who claved to Church Authority and Traditional teaching, is unquestionable. Paul, before his conversion, was one of this class. He was a devout man, and an earnest believer in the Old Testament Scriptures; but he read them only by the light of the Church of his fathers, and he acted only in harmony with the instructions of its ministers (Acts xxii. 3-5). The result was know. Under the delusion that he was doing right in being thus guided by the Priests, he was led to engage in a work, the thought of which filled him, to the day of his death, with remorse and shame.

Wherein was his error? It lay undoubtedly in transferring to others a responsibility which could in reality belong only to himself. His mind was prejudiced. He was, in relation to Christianity, uncandid, and unfair. There were some things about the religion of Jesus which he disliked, and so he would listen to no argument in its favor. He thought that, instead of maintaining the perpetuity of the Law, Christianity dishonored it. Had he examined more closely, he would have seen that his prejudices were unfounded, and that Christ, instead of degrading Judaism, was its perfection and its end, "witnessed to both by the Law and the Prophets" (Rom. iii. 21).

But why should he trust himself in any such investigation, when he had the anointed Priests of God,—the true interpreters of Scripture,—on his side?

So he argued; and so he erred.

Before his conversion he leaned implicitly on his spiritual advisers; after that great change, he recognized the higher duty of comparing their injunctions with the revealed will of God.

And what he did we are taught to do.

"These" (the Bereans) "were more noble than those in Thessalonica, in that they received the Word with all readiness of mind, and searched the Scriptures daily, whether those things were so" (Acts xvii. 11).

"Prove all things; hold fast that which is good" (1 Thess. v. 21).

CHAPTER XXV.

On Shadows of the Past, as Affecting the Interpretation of Scripture.

We have already drawn attention to the importance of regarding, in connection with our interpretations of Scripture, the circumstances under which the words contained in any given passage were uttered; the persons to whom they were addressed; and the impression they were intended to leave on those who first heard or read them. We have also referred to various perversions of Scripture which, at different periods, have found, and still find, an imaginary support, through the unauthorized projection into the present, of texts which exclusively belong to the past.

We propose now, briefly to refer,—and chiefly by way of example,—to some of the forms in which the shadows of departed ages still fall over us, and in doing so bias our interpretation of the Word of God.

The first we shall notice occurs in the Ordination Service of the Church of England, in which the Bishop, laying hands on the candidate for the ministry, thus addresses him,—“Receive the Holy Ghost for the office and work of a Priest in the Church of God, now committed unto thee by the imposition of our hands.”

The introductory words are those of our Lord when, meeting His Apostles after His resurrection, He breathed on them, and said, “Receive ye the Holy Ghost” (John xx. 22).

The interpretation—implied, though not expressed—is, that these words were, so to speak, the formula by which Christ constituted the Twelve to be the founders of His Church; and that therefore they are, to say the least, appropriate words in which to set apart its ministers.

Dr. Archer Butler, one of the ablest advocates of Church principles, regards the “breathing” of the Lord which accompanied the words when first uttered, as “imparting” to the Apostles “a new life;” and we presume, therefore, that Churchmen hold that the same declaration,—when made in what they regard as God’s appointed order, and by those to whom He has given authority to ordain,—warrants the expectation that, in connection with the prayers by which it is accompanied, and the faith supposed to be exercised, a “breathing” from on high of spiritual blessing may descend upon the Presbyter, and qualify him for the work he had to do.

We admit that this interpretation is sanctioned by the traditions of at least eight centuries; but we cannot therefore allow that it is worthy of acceptance. There is not a shadow of evidence for the assertion that the blessing communicated to the Apostles at the time referred to was a spiritual one. The unquestionable fact, that after this they continued in Jewish darkness, and that it was not until Pentecost that they became qualified for the service they had to undertake, alone disproves any such supposition. It is equally plain that the gift then bestowed was of another character, viz., the power of “remitting or retaining” those special infictions on account of sin, and so of the sin itself, which throughout their career they so largely exercised (Acts v. 1—11; xiii. 11; 1 Cor. iv. 21; v. 3—5).

The interpretation implied in the Ordination Service is but a shadow of the past.

We are quite aware that many Church writers affirm that the words in question, as uttered by the Bishop, are not a declaration, but a prayer. Mr. Gell, on the contrary, and those who with him advocate Liturgical Revision, insist, and, as we think, have demonstrated, that the words must be understood in the sense of actually imparting the Divine gift, and not as a prayer that it may be received. With this controversy, however, as belonging only to Churchmen we have here nothing to do.

The second instance we shall take from the "Communion Service," or rather from the "Exhortation" directed to be read by the minister at the time of celebration. In that address the people are warned against receiving the Supper of the Lord unworthily in these words,—“For then we kindle God’s wrath against us; we provoke him to plague us with divers diseases, and sundry kinds of death.”

The text here, by implication, interpreted as having a literal bearing upon ourselves, is obviously that which is found in the First Epistle to the Corinthians (xi. 30), where the Apostle says, “For this cause” (i. e., on account of the gross abuses then connected with the administration of the Lord’s Supper), “many are weak and sickly among you, and many sleep.”

But will any one deny that the passage (taken literally, and as implying the actual infliction of bodily disease) belongs exclusively to that Apostolic and miraculous Church discipline which, in all human probability, ceased when the last man died on whom the last of the Apostles (John) had laid hands? He can hardly do so, in the face of the revealed fact that persons who had received power from the Apostles to work miracles, could not transmit the gift to others. The experience of Philip at Samaria (Acts viii. 14-17) seems to demonstrate this.

Here, then, seems to be drawn the line where miracle ceases; and therefore the line which separates inspired, or semi-inspired teaching from that of ordinary men.

For ourselves, we should attach much weight to any teaching which could be authenticated as that of a man on whom St. John had laid hands, and we should be prepared to listen respectfully to any evidence that might be offered in favor of a supposed miracle, if wrought during the first half of the Second Century. But beyond that time we should turn a deaf ear to all such pretensions.

In relation to the text now under notice, we would simply ask any clergyman, High or Low, whether, in his heart of hearts, he really believes that an unworthy taking of the Lord’s Supper is likely to involve the sudden disease or premature death of the sinning communicant? Probably no one would be prepared to answer in the affirmative. Why, then, are the words retained?

Simply because they come to us as a tradition of centuries,—a sacred shadow of the past.

Our third example shall be taken from a volume entitled “Subordinate Standards and other Authoritative Documents of the Free Church of Scotland,” published by authority of the General Assembly in 1851.

Here, extraordinary as it may seem, we find a Nonconformist community, differing in no respect whatever in its origin from other Nonconformist bodies,—a community regarded by the Church of England as no Church at all,—its “orders irregular, its mission the offspring of division, and its Church system, if not schism, at least dichotomy” (seditious,—literally, standing apart,—Gal. v. 20), absolutely asserting that to it (i. e., to its Church officers) “the keys of the kingdom of heaven are committed; by virtue whereof they have power respectively to remit and retain sins, to shut that kingdom against the impenitent, both by the Word and censures, and to open it unto penitent sinners by the ministry of the Gospel, and by absolution from censures, as occasion shall require.”

We naturally ask, “On what text is this claim founded?” And again the reply is, “On the words uttered by the Lord to His Apostles after His resurrection,—“whose soever sins ye remit they are remitted unto them; and whose soever sins ye retain, they are retained” (John xx. 23).

The interpretation—implied, though not expressed—is, that the words in question communicated, not to the Apostles only, but to the ministers of the Gospel through all time, the power of including or excluding men from the visible Church.

But is this the fact?

We should seriously question whether any man—minister or layman—can be found who would deliberately answer, Yes! Yet there the claim stands, “to be enforced by the Church like her other laws,” simply because it embodies a tradition of centuries, and is an honored shadow of the past.

Further, and perhaps more striking examples still, of the influence of these shadows may be found in the “Form of Church Government” and “Directory” of the same body.

In these it is asserted that a blessing is especially promised “to the prayers of a minister for the sick;” that it is his privilege “to read the Scriptures in public,” because the Priests and Levites in the Jewish Church did so (Deut. xxxi. 9); that it is his “to bless the people from God; (Isa. lxvi. 21), because “by Priests and Levites” (under the law) “are meant” (under the Gospel) “Evangelical Pastors;” that the charge and office of interpreting the Holy Scriptures is a part of the ministerial calling which none, however otherwise qualified, should take upon him in any place, but he that is duly called thereunto by God and His Kirk; and finally, that at family worship, the reader of Scripture to the household should be approved by the minister and Session,—that no person (except the head of the household) should be suffered, without such approval, to perform worship in families,—and that special care should be taken that each family keep by themselves, not admitting strangers. The reason given (among others) is that such meetings tend to the prejudice of the public ministry.

The interpretations of Scripture involved in these assumptions are so extraordinary, that if the claims founded thereupon did not stand on record in "Authorized Documents," it would be impossible to believe that they could have been formally re-asserted by a seceding body, abandoning church and manse alike, in order to render what they regarded as a needful testimony in favor of the soul headship of Christ in His Church.

We could easily multiply our instances; for as an eminent Dissenter, who has candor enough to judge justly and courage to say what he thinks, has expressed it,—“With all their professions, and in spite of their repudiation of human authority, there are among the sects modes of legally uniting income and office to questionable opinions, which are not without results on the mental uprightness, the freedom, happiness, and self-respect of (other) Nonconformists—than the particular body to which we have referred.

But we refrain. Every step is an offence. Men hear with something like satisfaction of “a mote” in their brother’s eye; but they become forever alienated from the man who dares to hint at the possibility of “a beam” being in their own eye.

Yet is the duty of pointing out such hindrances in the study of Scripture not altogether to be neglected. For anger, in a Christian breast, is short-lived, and will soon pass away; but Truth is eternal. We speak, therefore, in the hope that in some thoughtful hour, better feelings will prevail; and then it may, perhaps, be both discovered and acknowledged, that more or less, the shadows of the past fling themselves across all of us. And although we may each fondly imagine that, in our own case, they fall but slightly or partially, it is well to remember that “a very small object, close to the eye, will darken the earth, and hide the sun.”

Almighty and everliving God, pitifully look upon our infirmities, we beseech Thee; and so deliver us from all darkness of mind, formality, and superstition, that, discerning clearly the true meaning of Thy Holy Word, we may, with all fidelity of heart, cleave thereto, through Jesus Christ our Lord.

CHAPTER XXVI.

On Private Judgment in the Interpretation of Scripture.

PRIVATE judgment, properly understood, simply means PERSONAL RESPONSIBILITY.

In the exercise of this responsibility, a man may, if he think fit, accept, with or without question, the decisions of Rome,—the conclusions of the fathers,—the dogmas of the Puritans,—the speculations of Rationalists, or the current opinions which belong to the religious circle in which he has been educated, or may, at any given time, happen to move. But, in each and every case, his conduct is an act of private judgment, for the wisdom or folly of which, with all its attendant consequences, he is alone and individually answerable.

Private judgment, thus viewed, implies a twofold obligation; viz., first, that of a patient and diligent use of all the means placed within our reach for ascertaining Truth; and secondly, the cultivation of those dispositions of heart which are favorable to spiritual discernment, and apart from which no man can rightly discriminate between Truth and Error.

The former will include in the case of those who have an opportunity to investigate, a thankful appreciation of the labors of scholars, in relation both to the text and to the translation of Holy Scripture; and an examination of the commentaries of pious and learned men, so far as they may seem to us to be truthful and unprejudiced expositions of Holy Writ: the latter, as graces of the Spirit, must be sought, where alone they can be obtained, at the footstool of him who is the giver of every good and perfect gift.

To these we would add, a reverent listening to that voice of the Church which expresses itself in the lives and labors of holy men in all ages; a voice, which is not the voice of the Priest, or the voice of a party, or the voice of the schoolmen, or the voice of the Fathers, whether Greek or Latin, or the voice of England or Scotland,—Evangelical or Arminian, high or low, broad or exclusive; but that great silent testimony which issues, through all time, from Apostles and Prophets, from Martyrs and Confessors, from poor and rich, from the palace and the peasant’s cot, from the ignorant and the learned, from the living and the dead;—witnessing evermore to the truth of Christ's holy Gospel,—to its influence over mankind,—to its triumphs over the world,—to its sole and exclusive power to enlighten, to solace, to sustain and to save. Wretched indeed is the sophistry which would confound this sublime echo of the human heart responding to the Divine, with the decisions of a Council, or the dicta of a sect.

Research, properly speaking, is an obligation which can rest only on the few; but the cultivation of candor; charity, humility, truthfulness, and dependence,—whatever, in short, brings us into that moral sympathy with God and goodness which is essential to the recognition of excellence whather in Scripture or in life, is the duty of every child of Adam. That moral qualities alone are fully adequate to the discernment of Truth in Religion is evident from the words of St. John, who, writing to persons who were unlearned, says,—“Little children, there are many antichrists,—many deceivers are entered into the world. Believe not every spirit, but try the spirits whether they be of God. Ye have an unction from the Holy One, and ye know all things. The anointing which ye have received abideth in you; and ye need not that any man teach you” (1 John ii. 18, 20, 27: iv. 1; 2 John ver. 7).

The force and truthfulness of these words of the aged Apostle have been verified in all ages. Up to the present hour, the noblest examples of simple faith and piety are to be found, not among the learned, but among the poor and the suffering; among Negro slaves; in peasant's huts; in spots where controversy never comes; and among persons to whom if it reached them, it would be but as the jargon of an unknown tongue.

The question, whether this believing “with the heart unto righteousness,” as St. Paul terms it (Rom. x. 9, 10), be “Faith,” or not, is the turning-point of dispute between those who attach a high importance to Creeds, and those who do not. The difference may not always be openly avowed; but it invariably affects the reasoning on either side.

Dr. Manning, in his recent lectures “On the Grounds of Faith,” puts the matter more distinctly perhaps, but scarcely more decidedly, than he would have done when an Archdeacon in the English Church. “Faith,” says he, “implies knowledge; and all knowledge, worthy of the name, must be definite. The faith we confess in our Creed must be understood, both in its substance and in its letter,—the explicit and the implicit meaning, article by article,—and it must be expressed in terms as definite, severe, and precise, as any problem in Science.”

Further, he adds, “Knowledge must also be certain. It must not only be true; it must be Truth with its evidence, illuminating the intelligence; or, in other words, the intelligence possessed by Truth with its evidence.”

“This kind of certainty,” he says, and truly enough, “cannot be attained by the ignorant, since they are unable to pursue the trains of thought needful to arrive at it; nor can it be attained by the learned, since, apart from the authority of the Church, it is absolutely unattainable.” Hence, he argues, “the Pope, as the representative of Christ, is the sole arbiter of Truth;” he that heareth the Pope heareth Christ, and he that despises the Pope despises Christ.

Our reply to all this is, that “the Faith” he describes, is not the Faith of the New Testament; that as such a belief can have little or nothing to do with the state of the heart, no man can be the better for it; and that since it is only to be exercised by subjection to another mind, it is but a shifting of all responsibility in relation to Truth, from the individual sinner to the supposed infallible Church. It therefore destroys alike, personality and probation.

Dr. Manning adds, as an unanswerable argument in favor of Romanism,—The Catholic Faith makes people happy.

We shall not dispute the assertion. Human nature craves for infallibility in religious matters, and it is a happiness, we doubt not, even to think that we have secured it.

This craving, Dr. Whately has truly observed, is the fruitful source both of superstition and Atheism; but it is incessant in some minds. God has, however, not chosen to gratify it. And because He has not,—because He has thought fit to make our apprehension of Divine Truth to depend mainly on a right state of heart,—men of all classes quarrel with His method.

The mode in which this dissatisfaction manifests itself is various. Sometimes it is in the way of restlessness, and sometimes of mistrust. Some times it finds expression in a reckless scepticism, followed by a predisposition to listen to any Church which professes to be infallible; and sometimes it carefully bars the door against all inquiry, and refuses, under any pretext, to be disturbed.

Hence the timidity and terror which is so often manifested when any new form of religious thought is first broached in Christian circles. That which is stated may indeed be true, but whether it is so or not, matters little. It seems to introduce an element of uncertainty in quarters where neither doubt nor question has ever been allowed to enter, and therefore it must be disallowed.

To all such, we can only say, that for intelligent men to shrink from the investigation of Truth of any kind, however specious may be the pretext, is, in fact, to evade the most important part of their moral discipline; that he who desires Truth as the supreme good cannot fail eventually to enjoy the blessedness it brings in its train; and that he who subordinates Truth to what he calls Peace, may haply, in the end, lose both Truth and Peace.

THE CURSE LIFTED.

A BIBLE VIEW OF THE PROMISED RESTITUTION.

BY WILLIAM H. SPENCER.

CHAPTER VI.

PETER, on the day of Pentecost, when he experienced the predicted outpouring of the Holy Spirit, speaking of Christ, says, that the heavens "must receive" Him "until the times of restitution of all things which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his holy prophets since the world began" (Acts iii. 21).

In these words, coming from lips touched with heavenly fire, we are assured that "since the world began" God has spoken of a work of restitution: "in times past" by "the prophets," and "in these last days" he hath "spoken unto us by his Son, whom he appointed heir of all things" (Heb. i. 1, 2).

In the apostle's argument, on this blessed occasion, when the promised Comforter was fully come, Christ the Messiah, whom the Jews had cruelly slain, was the central object,—the all-absorbing topic. No logic or oratory, before or since, ever excelled Peter's on this occasion, when there appeared cloven tongues, like as of fire, and sat upon each of the apostles. "And they were all filled with the Holy Ghost, and began to speak with other tongues as the Spirit gave them utterance." With Divine eloquence, and logic impressed with holy fire, Peter set before those "dwelling at Jerusalem, devout men, out of every nation under heaven," how they had "killed the Prince of Life, and that God had raised him from the dead, in whom alone is salvation; "for there is none other name under heaven given among men, whereby we must be saved" (Acts iv. 12).

In a brief examination of the apostle's discourse on this memorable occasion, we notice, in the first place, that his argument involves a return of Christ from heaven. Christ is represented in parable "as a man taking a far journey," who gave "to every man his work" until He returns. As a Nobleman gone into a far country He is yet away. The heavens have received Him, and will retain Him until the appointed time comes for the work of restitution to commence. The heavens yet receive Jesus, and hence we know that "the times of restitution" are yet future, and cannot begin until "the times of the Gentiles" are ended.

No supposed spiritual coming of Christ can meet the demands of the apostle's argument. Christ was SEEN to go into heaven. The apostles watched Him with loving eyes and thrilling emotions as He ascended upwards, until a cloud swept Him from their sight. And He will be SEEN to come again. "This same Jesus," angels assured the disheartened disciples, "which is taken up from you into heaven, shall so come in like manner as ye have seen Him go into heaven." "This same Jesus" will return to this earth in like manner (i. e., literally and personally) as he went away. Hence, we "hope for the grace that is to be brought unto" us "at the revelation (apokalypsis) of Jesus Christ" (1 Pet. i. 7, 13). And we are "looking for that blessed hope and the glorious appearing (epiphania) . . . of our Saviour Jesus Christ." Surely, nothing is more clearly revealed in the Holy Scriptures than the personal, visible return of Christ from heaven. We find the impress of this truth upon almost every page of Holy Writ. But we need not dwell on this point.

As we have before intimated, the work of restitution will not commence until the return of Christ from heaven. This work will embrace a period of time called "times of restitution," and will not begin until the work of "the times of the Gentiles" is accomplished. This dispensation,— "the times of the Gentiles,"—is only preparatory to the great work of redemption in the next, i. e., "the times of restitution." During this dispensation God is taking out a people for his name (Acts xv. 14),—a "Bride of the Lamb,"—an Elect Church, "chosen in Christ," and will be joint-heirs with Him in the possession of the world to come, and will be co-workers with Him in lifting the curse, and blessing "all the families of the earth," as God promised to Abraham (Gen. xii. 1-3). The number God is now selecting by the Gospel are to become a divinely-organized cabinet to sit with Christ on His throne and be associated with Him in the regeneration of the world (Rev. iii. 21; Matt. xix. 28). Being make partakers of His sufferings here, they will share His glory hereafter; for they have the promise that if they "suffer" with Him, they "shall also reign with Him" (2 Tim. ii. 12). They cannot live as men of this world, for as pilgrims and strangers they are looking for a "kingdom prepared for them from the foundation of the world" (Matt. xxv. 34). Hence they are called upon to make their "calling and election sure" (2 Pet. i. 10). Paul labored to keep his body under, lest, after he had preached to others, he himself should "become a castaway" from the high position of co-ruler and co-worker with Christ in "the times of restitution" (1 Cor. ix. 27). And he "suffered the loss of all things" to "win Christ," that he might "attain unto the resurrection" out from among the dead (Phil. iii. 11) to a priestly and kingly work.

The necessity of a work of restitution appears from the fact that without a restitution God will utterly fail of the accomplishment of his purpose in creation. Without a restitution God will fail of the destruction of the serpent, as predicted in Eden, and hence He will fail of a complete triumph over evil. Without a restitution all the promises made to Abraham will fail of accomplishment, and he will never come from the cave of Machpelah, as the "heir of the world," to take endless possession of the promised inheritance, and God's oath and promise to him that "all the families of the earth" shall be "blessed" in him and his seed" becomes a delusive myth. Without a restitution Divine theocracy will never be restored, and Christ, David's heir will never set upon David's throne, and Judah and Ephraim will never become one nation upon the mountains of Israel, as God hath promised. In brief, all that God purposed in the work of creation, has its counterpart in the work of restitution; and hence, however long the end He had in view may be postponed by the permission of evil, its removal is assured by the certainty of a restitution.

As to what will be accomplished by the work of restitution there can be no doubt in the mind of a candid Bible student, and needs but brief mention here. There will be a restitution of all things spoken of by the mouth of all the holy prophets.

1. The world will be restored to its Edenic fertility and loveliness. "The tree of the field shall yield her fruit, and the earth shall yield her increase" (Ez. xxxiv. 27). "The wilderness and the solitary places shall be glad" for the blessed inhabitants of the world, "and the desert shall blossom as the rose. It shall blossom abundantly, and rejoice even with joy and singing; the glory of Lebanon shall be given unto it, the excellency of Carmel and Sharon; they shall see the glory of the Lord, and the excellency of our

God. And the parched ground shall become a pool, and the thirsty land springs of water" (Isa. xxxv. 1, 2, 7). "Instead of the thorn shall come up the fir tree, and instead of the brier the myrtle" (Isa. lv. 18, 19). Thus will the curse be lifted from the earth.

2. The lifting of the curse from the animal world will restore them to their original docility and submission to man. Man was made for "dominion over the fish of the sea, and over the fowl of the air, and over the cattle, and over all the earth, and every creeping thing that creepeth upon the earth" (Gen. i. 26). This lifting of the curse from the animal world will secure man from all harm and annoyance from animals and every creeping thing. "The wolf shall dwell with the lamb, and the leopard shall lie down with the kid, and the calf and the young lion and the fatling together, and a little child shall lead them. And the cow and the bear shall feed; their young ones shall lie down together; and the lion shall eat straw like the ox. And the suckling child shall play upon the hole of the asp, and the weaned child shall put his hand on the cockatrice's den. They shall not hurt nor destroy in all My holy mountain, for the earth shall be full of the knowledge of the Lord as the waters cover the sea" (Isa. xi. 6-9). "And I will make a covenant of peace with them, and will cause the evil beasts to cease out of the land; and they (the people) shall dwell safely in the wilderness, and sleep in the woods" (Ez. xxxiv. 25). "And in that day will I make a covenant for them with the beasts of the field, and with the fowls of heaven, and with the creeping things of the ground" (Hosea ii. 18).

3. In the work of restitution Christ shall establish righteous rule in the earth to which all human governments shall be made submissive. God has promised to give unto Christ the throne of his father David (Luke i. 32, 33). And Peter says, that "David being a prophet, and knowing that God hath sworn with an oath to him, that of the fruit of his loins he would raise up Christ to sit on his throne, spake of the resurrection of Christ for this very purpose to sit on his throne" (Acts ii. 30, 31). He shall have dominion from sea to sea, and from the river to the ends of the earth (Psa. lxxii. 8. 11). "He shall have the heathen for his inheritance, and the uttermost parts of the earth for a possession" (Psa. ii. 8). "He shall be King over all the earth" (Zech. xiv. 9). The kingdoms of this world shall become his, and he shall reign over them forever and ever. (Rev. xi. 15.) He shall have dominion over all people and languages that they may serve Him. (Dan. vii. 14.) He shall be exalted that at the name of Jesus every knee shall bow, of things in heaven, and of things in the earth, and under the earth; and that every tongue shall confess that Jesus Christ is Lord to the glory of God the Father (Phil. ii. 10, 11). Thus will Christ, in the position of absolute Rulership, bless all nations with righteous government, and provide everything needful to their peace and prosperity. Wars shall cease unto the ends of the earth. Nation shall not lift up sword against nation, neither shall they learn war any more. (Isa. ii. 4.)

4. The restitution will establish universal worship of God and obedience to his will. This, of course, involves universal prevalence of the knowledge of the Lord. He says: "But as truly as I live, all the earth shall be filled with the glory of the Lord" (Num. xiv. 21), which assures us that He will be universally known. Those who are loth to believe in the conversion of the world should re-examine the words of the prophets in relation to the work of restitution.

Says the Psalmist: "All the ends of the earth shall remember and turn unto the Lord, and all the kindreds of the nations shall worship before thee." "All they that go down to the dust shall bow before him." This testimony embraces all the human family, both dead and living, and hence proves universal worship of and obedience to God. Again the Psalmist says: "All men shall fear and shall declare the work of God; for they shall wisely consider His doing." "God shall bless us: and all the ends of the earth shall fear thee" (Psa. 67). "All nations whom thou hast made shall come and worship before thee, O Lord; and shall glorify thy name" (Psa. 82.) "The heathen shall fear the name of the Lord, and all the kings of the earth thy glory" (Psa. 102.) "All the kings of the earth shall praise thee, O Lord, when they hear the words of thy mouth; yea, they shall sing in the way of the Lord." (Psa. 138) These are but a sample of those sublime prophetic utterances of the Psalmist pervading the entire book, which shall have their fulfilment in "the times of restitution."

In harmony with the foregoing the prophets have all spoken. Says Isaiah: "And it shall come to pass in the last day, that the mountain of the Lord's house shall be established in the top of the mountains, and shall be exalted above the hills, and all nations shall flow unto it. And many people shall go and say, Come ye, and let us go up to the mountain of the Lord, to the house of the God of Israel, and He will teach us of His ways, and we will walk in his paths; for out of Zion shall go forth the law, and the word of the Lord from Jerusalem." "And the lofti-ness of man shall be bowed down, and the Lord alone shall be exalted in that day." (Isa. ii.) "He will destroy in this mountain the face of the covering cast over all people, and the veil that is spread over all nations. He will swallow up death in victory; and the Lord God will wipe away all tears from off all faces; and the rebuke of his people shall he take away from off all the earth." "And it shall be said in that day, Lo, this is our God; we have waited for him, and he will save us; we will be glad and rejoice in his salvation" (Isa. xxv. 5-9).

Passages of this import might be quoted, to almost any extent from the prophets and writers of the New Testament, but our space compels us to forbear. But until this evidence is impeached, and the prophets, who spake as they were moved by the Holy Ghost, have been shown to have deceived us by false words, we must believe that the times of restitution are coming when God shall be universally obeyed and worshipped. Nor can we honestly avoid this conclusion, if we would, short of a rejection of the word of God itself.

THE LIMITS OF THE AGES.—No. 2.

IN our last paper, we suggested that Scripture has indicated limits to the ages which are generally supposed to represent eternity, by reference to a period "before eternal times," 2 Tim. i. 9, and Titus i. 2; (or "before the ages" 1 Cor. ii. 7, which expressions have their equivalent in "before the foundation of the world," Eph. i. 4, and 1 Peter i. 20); and by informing us that our Lord, although He must reign, and that as Son of man, for the ages of ages, shall in the end give up the kingdom to God the Father.

In the present paper we would endeavor to show by examples the way in which the time-spaces, so often hastily concluded to be eternal, are spoken of, and from this and other considerations to form some estimate of their Scriptural value. No thoughtful person who has given attention to this subject needs to be told that in the Old Testament there are many examples of the word "for ever" being used of things that have long since passed away. By far the commonest of these is (olam or ohlam), and the most frequent application of it is to the statutes of the Levitical law. Now our theological authorities who insist upon the everlastingness of sin and misery, treat this use of their word "for ever" as if it presented to them no serious difficulty. But, indeed, it ought to do so. It will not suffice to say that the word is limited by the subject it treats of, as if every Israelite knew, or ought to have known, that the ceremonial law was to be superseded by another, while every Christian ought to know that men are essentially immortal, and that therefore the greatest word for continuance in their case (being the same as that used of temporary institutions), must signify an actual eternity. The case is otherwise. Few, if any, in ancient Israelitish times could have seen the future abrogation of ceremonial in favour of spiritual religion. No doubt there was sufficient apprehension of God's grace to make those who sought communion with Him, grateful and spiritual worshippers; but not only the general dulness of believers in all times, and the tendency even of such to cling to forms, but the evidence of the New Testament makes it impossible for us to believe that the temporary character of the Levitical institutions was perceived, or was expected by God to be perceived by those who received them. Even after the personal ministry of Christ on earth, and the descent of the Holy Spirit, and the immense increase of the Church, the presiding apostle at Jerusalem felt it necessary to warn St. Paul, on his sudden arrival in the city, that the myriads of believing Jews were all zealous for the law, and had a strong suspicion against him as an enemy of the old form of religion.

This makes it evident that we have not in the Epistle to the Hebrews, with its glorious exhibition of Christ as the substance of the Mosaic revelation, the general intelligence of primitive Christianity respecting the law of Moses, but the extraordinary spiritual insight of one man, who might represent a class (not likely, however, to include the Apostles James or Peter, though anticipated at the cost of his life by the martyr Stephen, Acts vii. 48, 49), while the bulk of the Jewish believers still clung to their ancient ritual, and, doubtless, warmly pleaded that its ordinances were appointed under the seal of eternity. Thus it cannot truly be said that the evident character of the Mosaic law qualified the meaning of ohlam as applied to it. Nor, on the other hand, can it be said that when applied to man, apart from Christ, our knowledge of human nature determines the force of the word to be greater than in other cases. We know nothing from the Scriptures about original or natural human immortality: the argument about the breath of God is of no force whatever; even without such passages as Job xxxvii. 10, and Ps. civ. 30, the teaching of 1 Cor. xv. 45-47 ought to be sufficient to prevent the repetition of this plea, at any rate with those who know that the words, "living soul," quoted by St. Paul, are applied without any distinction in the Hebrew to men and beasts.

So that instead of its being evident (that is, to the ancient Israelites—for the words were spoken to them) that Mosaic institutions were temporary, while every one knows that man's being is everlasting because immortal, neither one nor other of these common statements is true, and therefore neither one nor other of them enables us to determine the value of the Old Testament "for ever," much as they have been used for this purpose.

It is evident that this "for ever" is a variable quantity, but it is at least questionable whether it is intended in any case to be understood as indicating eternity. Bishop Lowth says regarding it on Isa. lxiv. 5 (where we have continuance, as he remarks, without any meaning): "is a destined, but hidden and unknown portion of time." This latter idea is the single one suggested by the derivation of the word from the verb to hide, while no doubt the former—fixed by God who hides it from man—is also properly conveyed by it. Now it is this word whose derivation and use without the idea of eternity are so evident which God uses with regard to Himself, as, for example, in Deut. xxxii. 40: "I lift up my hand to heaven, and say, I live for ever," Deut. xxxiii. 27: "Underneath are the everlasting arms;" Psalm xc. 2: "Even from everlasting to everlasting Thou art God." Similarly the word (ad), the primary meaning of which is (time) beyond or besides, and which occurs, for example, in Psalm cxxxii. 12 of the conditional continuance of the royal power to David's children, is adopted by Jehovah to describe, as far as man may understand it, His own continuance. So it is in Isa. lvii. 15: "The high and lofty one that inhabiteth ad." It is this word which is used of Messiah in Isa. ix. 6, where it is much more happily translated, we think, by some versions of the LXX. than in our English Bibles, a pater ton mellontos aionios ("the father of the coming age").

Yet another word of kindred meaning is used of things temporal and of the eternal life of God. (Kudem) looks back rather than forward, and signifies priority or antiquity. It is applied to God in Deut. xxxiii. 27 ("The eternal God is thy refuge"), and to the mountains (Deut. xxxiii. 13), of whose creation the first verse of the Bible informs us, and whose non-eternity in respect to the past we must hold if our theology regarding matter is to be Christian and not heathen.

But the wonder, from the standpoint of popular theology, is not so much that God uses these words (elsewhere of finite import) of Himself, as that He so uses them in the very passages in which their meaning must necessarily be non-eternal. Thus, in Hab. iii. 6, we read, "The mountains of ad have scattered themselves, the hills of ohlam have bowed; the ways of ohlam are His." Now, whether we understand the prophet to refer to the literal mountains (contrasting with the sand-mountains of the desert), or to their mighty and established inhabitants, it is evident that things of ohlam and of ad are represented as passing away, while in some sense God is adored as He whose ways are ohlam. This passage seems properly to meet the objection made from Matthew xxv. 40, that aionios must be eternal when applied to punishment, because it is also used of the life of the righteous. Are the ways of God, then, of no longer continuance than the mountains which flee away at His presence? The prophet and no modern controversialist is responsible for the use of the words, but it would seem that one or other of the following suppositions is necessary to account for it: either the words are used in different senses in the same verse, or God does not mean eternity by ohlam or ad even when speaking of Himself. We may compare with this Old Testament passage that in Titus (i. 2) already referred to,— "in hope of eternal life which God . . . promised before eternal times." If the second aionios really means "eternal," how, seeing it refers to the past, can there be anything before it? and less than eternity is intended, how can eternity be insisted on in the first clause without allowing that the same word may, without explanation, have different values in the same verse?

The greater variety, and at the same time oneness of origin of the time expressions of the New Testament confirm the impression made by the indefinite and concealing terms of the Old. Here the time unknown in its greatness becomes the age (aion) and the mere "beyond" of David and Isaiah makes room within itself for successive periods (aionios), some of which may be distinguished; and although not actually numbered to us, rolling onwards towards a completion in "the dispensation of the fulness of the times," Eph. i. 10 ("time" being interchangeable with "age," see Mark x. 30; Luke xviii. 30); and the achievement by Christ of the conquest of evil and establishment of a reconstituted universe.

That God has a great purpose which requires the course of the ages now past and future for its development appears from Eph. iii. 11. kata prothesin ton aionion (the design of the ages); or Heb. xi. 3, "the ages arranged kateertisthai tous aionas by the Word of God;" or, 1 Tim. i. 17, where God is called "the King of the ages." The American editor of Lange on Genesis, happily compares this title, as it occurs also in Ps. cxlv. 13 (a "kingdom of all ohlams") with the Lord of hosts, remarking that the two together represent God as Lord of the worlds in space, and King of the worlds in time. Usually, the whole course of time, from the fall to the second coming of Christ, is regarded as an age; it is the age, "this age," and in character, "this present evil age" (Gal. i. 4), which designation seems to shut out the possibility of any other in the present course being as bad, although the common thought of sin established, self-propagating, increasing without limit, requires a future age so bad as to deprive the present of its right to the title. We have not space to examine passages in detail, but we would briefly call attention to Isa. xxxiv. 10, in connection with the oft-quoted passages in Revelation in which its imagery and language seem to be borrowed. There the time expression is a peculiar one, for "continuance of continuances." The Greek translation of this by the LXX. is "for a long time;" but the same period being spoken of in verse seventeen with the Hebrew ohlam ad, thus showing that they reckoned this expression, which by itself would be understood "for ever," as equivalent, "for a long time."

The limited nature of the aion of Scripture might be fairly inferred from the variety of its application, and the use of the plural, even its Old Testament equivalent, Isa. xxvi. 4, Ps. cxlv. 13, which is of more weight than Mr. Darby's argument after Aristotle, that it means "always being." Scripture must modify the original sense of many human words, and the various forms in which this word appears, with additions and multiplications, seem evidence that Aristotle's definition, though grammatically unquestionable, would not suit the revelation of spiritual things. In reply to the argument from Jude 6, which some may think stronger than anionios, from its use in Rom. i. 20, it seems sufficient to call attention to the whole sentence: the chains are "everlasting—unto the judgment of the great day."

A passage in the great Puritan, JOHN OWEN, cannot fail to be interesting to all who really desire to know the meaning of words in this controversy. Dr. Owen believed in the eternity of torment, and yet he wrote thus on Heb. vii. 17,—"This word (for ever) is applied to the law and legal priesthood, and signifies a duration commensurate unto the state and condition of the things whereunto it is applied. There was an ohlam of the law, an "age" whereunto its continuance was confined, . . . and as ascribed unto the Gospel, it doth not signify eternity absolutely, but a certain unchangeable duration unto the end of the time and works of the Gospel; for then shall the exercise of the priesthood of Christ cease, with his whole mediatory work and office, 1 Cor. xv. 28." Again he says, "And this 'for ever' answers unto the 'for ever' under the law, each of them being commensurate unto the dispensation of that covenant which they do respect; for absolute eternity belongs not to these things. The 'for ever' of the Old Testament was the duration of the dispensation of the old covenant. And this 'for ever' respects the new covenant, which is to continue unto the consummation of all things. . . . But at the end of the world, together with the dispensation of the new covenant, an end will be put to all the mediatory offices of Christ, and all their exercise."

Now I submit to the consideration of those who so earnestly contend for the doctrine of eternal evil, whether all that they say might not have been urged by an unbelieving Jew against the arguments of Paul in the Epistle to the Hebrews. Whatever evidence we give from Scripture regarding life, death, immortality, destruction, it is all met, and, in the judgment of our opponents, nullified by the words, "These shall go away into everlasting (æonial) punishment." Exactly thus would an earnest advocate of Judaism have answered all the evangelical arguments of the Apostle: "God said of the sons of Aaron (Ex. xl. 15), "Their anointing shall surely be an everlasting priesthood throughout their generations; and the word 'everlasting,' which He chose, was as strong as any in our language, and the very word which He elsewhere uses (Deut. xxxii. 40) to describe His own continuance of being."

It is easy to speak of eternity, but to grasp the idea of it is beyond the reach of any finite creature. Is it, then, very improbable that God, who certainly does use in a limited sense the words understood by men to be unlimited, has not spoken about that which His creatures could not possibly understand, but that even when describing His own indissoluble life He has been content with words which are finite though their boundaries could not be passed by the mind of man. When God would speak of His wealth He claims the cattle on a thousand hills: when He sets forth his power, it is sometimes as a mighty man, or as a giant refreshed with wine. And so it may be in regard to His eternal life: that cannot be realized by a created intelligence, but illustrations may be used to impress our minds which yet fall infinitely short of the unspeakable reality. And supposing this to be the case, there is no insecurity brought in to mar the title of the believer. He is a partaker of the Divine nature—one with Him who "dieth no more;" the limits of the ages are not the limits of his being, or of his happiness, though they bounded the revelation of earth and time.

HUMAN REDEMPTION.—No. 8.

ON THE DOCTRINE OF REGENERATION, OR THE NEW BIRTH.

THE precise phrase "Regeneration" (Paliggenia), occurs only twice in Scripture; once in the sense of a change of profession by baptism, "the washing [laver or pool] of Regeneration" (Tit. iii. 5); and once in the sense of resurrection, "the Regeneration, when the Son of man shall sit in the throne of His glory" (Matt. xix. 28). The term is used by Greek writers to express the re-birth of all nature in the spring; and by Josephus, when describing the edict of Darius, by which the Jews were permitted to return to Jerusalem. It is applied to the "regeneration" of his country. Kindred phrases, however (such as being "born again," "born of the Spirit," becoming "new creatures in Christ Jesus,") occur repeatedly in the inspired volume, and generally indicate that great inward and effectual change in the heart and character of a man which is wrought by the Holy Spirit in connection with faith in the Lord Jesus Christ, and under the influence of which self ceases to be a man's centre, and God becomes such.

The doctrine is not peculiar to the New Testament. The prophet Ezekiel (xi. 19) assures the Jews that a time will come when God "will give them one heart," put "a new spirit" within them, take "the stony heart" out of their flesh, and give them "an heart of flesh." Yet, very soon after (xviii. 31), regardless of what we should consider logical consistency, or the force of necessary inferences, he calls upon the same people to cast away their transgressions, and to make themselves a new heart and a new spirit. Further on (xxxvi. 26, 27), he repeats the promise that God will one day do it; but places the fulfilment far in the future, and soon after connects it with the resurrection (xxxvii. 13, 14). It was to these passages that our Lord probably referred when, speaking with Nicodemus on the new birth, He says, "Art thou a master of Israel, and knowest not these things?" (John iii. 10).

It is in this interview with Nicodemus that we have the first intimation of the applicability of these strong figures to Jews or heathen embracing Christianity. And our first inquiry is, What impression did the conversation there recorded finally make upon the Jewish ruler? I say finally.

because, in the first instance, it is clear the language of the Lord was either misunderstood, or regarded as a saying too hard to be received. Which of the two may be uncertain. If the former, Nicodemus exhibits the most astounding ignorance of figurative language; if the latter, he considers it impossible that any change so radical as that intimated could be necessary at his age, and in his position. Set right on both these points;—first, by the intimation that the term was used in the same sense in which it had been used for ages (John iii. 10)—the sense, in fact, in which the Jews applied it every day, when they baptized proselytes from heathenism; and secondly, by the reiterated assurance of its absolute necessity to the Israelite as well as to the Gentile (ver. 5, 6);—the question still remains, How did Nicodemus understand it? Did he suppose that the Lord meant to say that he, a ruler of the Jews, was yet an unconverted man, in the darkness of unbelief? or did he rather understand Him to teach that the fact of coming to Christ at all was, in itself, a proof of the new birth, since the Lord assures him that it was not the working of miracles that had convinced him, but (whether he knew it or not) that higher work of the Spirit, without which no man could “see [i. e., discern] the kingdom of God?”

I believe that neither the one nor the other supposition fully expresses the truth. I see no reason whatever to suppose that Nicodemus had any thoughts or feelings corresponding to those which we invariably associate with the term being “born again.” He was a Jew, a ruler of the Jews; and nothing in the record indicates that he was either hypocritical or self-deceived. He came timidly, indeed, and by night, but with a true aim; and he came, not simply as an individual, but as the representative of a class. “We [the rulers of the better sort] know [he says] that Thou art a Teacher come from God: for no man can do these miracles that Thou doest, except God be with him.”

The reply of Jesus is explicit:—“Except a man be born of water” (i. e., except he openly avow Me by a public profession, in baptism—the baptism of John), and except he be “born” also “of the Spirit,” he can neither truly discern the character nor enter into the fellowship of the kingdom of God. For this kingdom involves much more than at present appears—much that will be hard to receive; viz., the lifting up of the Son of man, and the salvation of the world, Gentile as well as Jew, through Him (John iii. 11—21).

Whether Nicodemus ever got beyond his timid half-heartedness—whether he ever was baptized, and confessed Christ openly—is very uncertain; the probability is that he did not, for he appears to be precisely the same man at a later period, when, in his place among the chief priests and Pharisees, he counsels justice and moderation (vii. 50—52); nor does the fact of his uniting with Joseph of Arimathea (another secret disciple) in the burial of Christ indicate more than is expressed in his first nightly visit. It is possible that both these men might be amongst those who were converted after Pentecost; but no assurance of the kind is conveyed to us in the Sacred Records, an omission not without its lesson, if it teaches us to abstain from judging one another, or attempting to decide on character without adequate information.

But here the question naturally arises—and it is a very important one,—Did our Lord, when He uttered the words, “Except a man be born again, he cannot see the kingdom of God,” mean to teach us that, without a change as great and radical as that which is experienced by the elect, no man living can escape the eternal damnation of hell? or did He simply intend us to understand that through this Divine transformation alone can any one become a member of the redeemed Church, enjoy a present salvation, and be a king and priest to God for ever and ever?

On the first supposition, every unrenewed man, without exception, ignorant or enlightened, Christian or heathen, hangs trembling by a thread over the verge of the bottomless pit; and distinctions between the virtuous and the vicious, the moral and the profane, are altogether lost sight of in the tremendous alternative involved. On the second, such persons, although excluded from “the Church of the firstborn,” as vessels for more or less dishonor—shut out from the high privileges and glorious dignity of those who are emphatically to be made “partakers of the Divine nature,” to “judge angels,” and, under the Redeemer, to teach and to rule in the world (or age) that is to come—are yet, on the supposition of their being other than absolute rejecters of grace, not excluded either from mercy now, or from the hope of advancing blessedness hereafter.

That there is much in Scripture calculated to support the more hopeful view, and to justify us in concluding that Regeneration should rather be regarded as the evidence of election than of grace—the peculiar privilege of those who enjoy here an anticipative reception of future blessing, and who are to form that Church which is emphatically “the Bride of the Lamb,” can scarcely be disputed. Whether the term “new-born” is ever applied in the New Testament to any but those who are regarded and generally spoken of as "chosen before the foundation of the world," may be doubtful. Alford thinks that in that well-known passage (Heb. vi. 4-8), where it is said to be "impossible for those who were once enlightened, and have tasted of the heavenly gift, and were made partakers of the Holy Ghost, if they shall fall away, to renew them again unto repentance," a distinction is drawn between the elect and the regenerate; and he regards the text as one among many, where in Scripture, as well as from the teaching of the Church, we learn that "elect" and "regenerate" are not convertible terms. All the elect, he says, are regenerate; but all the regenerate are not elect.

Let this be as it may, it is at least certain that, generally speaking, the two terms are regarded as one in signification. St. John, in the very first chapter of his Gospel, indicates this when he says that they among the Jews who received Christ were persons to whom God "gave power"—or, as it reads in the margin, "right or privilege—to become the sons of God;" which were "born, not of blood, nor of the will of the flesh, nor of the will of man, but of God" (i. 12, 13). It is such only who can say, "Of His own will begat He us with the word of truth, that we should be a kind of firstfruits of his creatures" (Jas. i. 18). It is of such alone that the apostle writes when he declares that "whosoever is born of God doth not commit sin; for his seed remaineth in him: and he cannot sin, because he is born of God" (1 John iii. 9). It is of such St. Paul speaks when he says, "Neither circumcision availeth anything, nor uncircumcision, but a new creature" (Gal. vi. 15); a term which he has just before explained to mean "faith, which worketh by love" (Gal. v. 6); or, as he expresses it in another place, "keeping of the commandments of God" (1 Cor. vii. 19). These, out of the "many called," are the "few chosen;" chosen for employment in the vineyard (Matt. xx. 16); "vessels unto honor, sanctified, meet for the Master's use" (2 Tim. ii. 21). They are the Lord's "gold," His "jewels" (Mal. iii. 2, 17), His "friends" (John xv. 15).

Texts like these obviously do not apply to all who confess and call themselves Christians; but must, from their very nature, be confined to those who have "crucified the world," "put on Christ," and count themselves but "pilgrims and strangers" here below.

Further, the great change in question is always described under terms which almost seem to forbid the idea of human co-operation. When a man is spoken of first as "dead" and then as "alive from the dead;" first as the "old" man, and then as the "new;" as quickened from above like the babe in the womb; as made alive, like the plant while it is yet underground, it is exceedingly difficult to associate with the cause of so thoroughly a change anything at all approaching to an efficient human volition. Such a transformation seems of necessity one which can only be spoken of as the special, direct, and sovereign act of Him in whom "we live, and move, and have our being."

Finally, as those who enter into the kingdom of God are always spoken of in Scripture as a "little flock," to whom it is the Father's good pleasure to give the kingdom (i. e., rule and authority in the age to come); since the crowning sin of man is always declared in the Bible to be unbelief, a sin which cannot be chargeable on the myriads who have never heard the name of the Great Object of our faith; since salvation is always spoken of as a present blessing, deliverance even now from the love and power of sin, I am compelled to conclude that Regeneration, in its highest sense is a sovereign and therefore limited gift; that the regenerate will form the court rather than the company of heaven; that this dispensation is not one of universality, but of selection; that it is preparatory, and not final; that while its primary object is to call out and educate those who are to be "kings and priests," its secondary, but by no means less important end is, by the agency of the elect, and through the preaching of the Gospel now, to convert sinners from the error of their ways; to develop, through sin and sorrow, the ever-varying phases of human character; to evolve, by slow but certain processes, those great moral and spiritual principles which are embodied in the revelation of a Divine Redeemer; and to prepare mankind at large for that coming judgment and final probation which will in due time follow the second and personal advent of the Son of God.

What, on this supposition, will, in that mysterious world to which all are tending, be the precise condition of the converted, but not regenerate; of the unconverted, because ignorant or thoughtless multitude; of the evil and profane; of the heathen who have never heard of Christ; of the Jew, from whom He is still veiled; of the followers of Mahomet, yet, as it would almost seem, the sword and scourge of God wielded for the punishment of a corrupt and idolatrous Christianity; and of the tens of thousands in the most enlightened lands, whom nobody knows how to rank or where to place, I do not profess to know. It is only permitted us to say, that all will be judged righteously, and "according to the deeds done in the body, whether they be good or bad;" that the feeblest faith in Christ will then be found to have had a life in it; that the least service rendered to a disciple will, because rendered to a disciple, not lose its reward; and that they only have cause utterly to despair who, having deliberately and knowingly rejected the counsel of God against themselves, despised and persecuted His children, and denied the Lord that bought them, can, on no Scriptural ground whatever, expect anything better than "a fearful looking for of judgment and of fiery indignation, that shall destroy the adversary."

Surely it is not unreasonable to hope that these may be much fewer in number than good men are sometimes led, in their short-sightedness, to imagine.

THAT CITY AND THAT NAME—NEW JERUSALEM.

ARE there to be two Jerusalems,—cities proper,—on the earth, at one and the same time, at any period in the future? is a question apparently absurd; and yet such contingency is involved if we accept and believe the testimony of the prophets, and then accept, also, as truth, the theories and interpretations of men as applied to the symbolic city of Rev. iii. 12, and xxi. 2, 10. If this be a city proper, then why not also "the holy city," of xi. 2?

That Jerusalem (which now is, and is to be trodden down of the Gentiles until their times are ended,) is to be rebuilt, enlarged, beautified, adorned, and made glorious, made an eternal excellency, and a joy of many (all) generations, and when thus re-established, not to be plucked up, nor thrown down any more forever, is, by the prophets, so clearly taught, so expressly stated, so unconditionally promised, that no man can gainsay it, except he do violence to the word of our God,—which shall stand forever,—and most shamefully pervert its testimony.

Where space is so precious as in a Monthly, we cannot quote, in full, a tithe of this evidence; but there are some prominent points that must be produced. Of the passage, "He hath prepared for them a city," we say, Yes! That is in his plan, and according to his purpose; but "God, . . . calleth those things that be not (as yet,) as though they were" (now existing). By turning to Isa. lxxv., and carefully examining verses 17, 18, 19, we do find, that this city was not prepared in the prophet's day; it was still future to his time, and we also find that the time set for the creation of that city, is cotemporaneous with the creation of the "new heavens and new earth," which is claimed to be still future to our day of 1874 A. D.; consequently, it legitimately follows that the material construction of the city is not yet an accomplished fact. In this prophetic declaration, two things demand particular attention, as specified and comprehended in the promise of verse 18, which is explanatory of ver. 17. 1. "I create Jerusalem a rejoicing." 2. "Her people a joy." We have, in the two things, a mode of expression common to all languages, viz., a city spoken of in a double sense: the first referring to and involving the material structures only; and the second comprehending the inhabitants, separately, as the city. Ezekiel, in his vision, is shown the reconstructed material city proper, and has its entirety, its parts, courts, avenues, plans, purposes, and uses, explained to him. While John, under the symbol of a city, has shown to him "the Bride," the "Lamb's wife," the "daughter of Jerusalem," unto whom shall come "the first dominion,"—the kingdom,—she, who is to dwell in the city of the great King; even that city which God has promised (unconditionally) "to establish and make a praise in the earth," i. e., JERUSALEM.

Note: In Isa. lxxv., from verse 19 to 25, a prophetic "declaration of facts" is made, or "a bill of particulars" is placed before us, exhibiting and setting forth the condition of both city and people in the land, under the renewed state,—"in the regeneration" (paringenesis), "the new birth-day," Diaglott and Wordworth's Greek Testament, Matt. xix. 28;—not the state of the resurrected, immortalized saints, but they of verses 19, 20, and the three parties of Micah iv. 6, 17. Now some pretend to say "there will be no children there then:" but surely they are wise above what is written, for Isa. xi. 4-9, speaking of the very same time and events, says, "a little child," and "the sucking child," and "the wanned child," will be there, and the prophet tells what they will do there. So much on and for such "rush-light commentators," and their expositions of "There shall be no more thence an infant of days," and we leave them there, with their comments and commentaries.

The key to the true position is to be found in Rev. iii. 12. "I will write upon him (that overcometh) the name of my God, and the name of the city of my God, which is NEW JERUSALEM, . . . and my new name." The members of his Body, constituting the Bride, do overcome, and when the marriage of the Lamb takes place, he confers on her three titular, distinctive epithets, indicative of the rights, favor and position attained to. 1. That of his God. 2. That of the city. 3. His own name.—Incorruption, heirship and sovereignty; or, eternal life, sonship, and the kingdom. But the bestowment and reception of the first does not make her "his God;" and naming his own name on her does not constitute her the HUSBAND; nor does the second name "written on," or given to his Bride, transform her into a CITY. "Come hither, John, and I will show thee the Bride, the Lamb's wife, . . . and he shewed me—that great city—the holy, . . . the NEW JERUSALEM, . . . prepared as a bride adorned for her husband (ver. 2). "Upper Salem," "Jerusalem which is above," said Paul, is the mother of us all." And a literal city! The phrases, from above, from God, out of heaven, from heaven, etc., cannot be claimed, strictly, to be descriptive of, or as designating more than the origin and nature, as "I am from above, ye arc from beneath," which Paul explains as indicative of heavenly and earthly, or spiritual and natural (animal) origin or nature. But spiritual does not mean mythical, ethereal, and immaterial, but it does mean sinless, pure, holy, and righteous; THAT, is spiritual; and such will be the city of our God, and the great King; and such, also, will the origin and nature be of her,—the Bride, the Lamb's wife, who shall take the name of the city, and be called "the holy city, NEW JERUSALEM." (Isa. lx. 14.)

By the law of symbols, and by easy transition, all the properties and concomitant conditions of a constructed city, (by which the Bride is represented,) are transferred to her in the symbol, as in Isa. i. and lx.

Psalms cii. 16, prophetically declares that "When the Lord shall build up Zion, he shall appear in his glory, . . . to hear the groaning of the prisoner; to loose those that are appointed to death, to declare the name of the Lord in Zion and his praise in Jerusalem; when the people are gathered together, and the kingdoms, to serve the Lord."

I would be glad, if space allowed, to fully consider four things here, which we can now only specify and give some references as explanatory and corroborative. 1. His appearing in glory. Col. iii. 4; 1 Pet. i. 10, 13; 2 Pet. i. 16-31; Acts iii. 10-24.

2. The gathering of the people. Gen. xlviii. 10; Isa. ii. 2; xi. 10; xlii. 1-4; xlix. 6, 7, 23, 23; lv. 4, 5; lx. 1, 3, 4, 5; Hag. ii. 7; Luke ii. 30-32; 2 Thess. ii. 1; 1 Tim. ii. 4-6.

3. The transformation of the kingdoms. Dan. vii. 13, 14; Psa. ii. 6-8; viii. 6; cx. 1, 2; Rev. xi. 15.

4. The work then to be done. (Peter gives the "Rule." Prophecies pertaining to the sufferings of Christ belong to the first advent; those under the glory to the second coming.)

(1) Opening of judgment seals, Rev. vi. 1-17, producing the "time of trouble," Dan. xi. 30; xii. 1; Matt. xxiv. 21, 22; Isa. xxvi. 20, 21; Rev. vii. 18; Jer. xxx. 7. (2) Gathering out of his kingdom offending things, and the destruction of Antichrist. Matt. xiii. 41; Isa. xi. 4; 2 Thess. ii. 8; Zech. xii. 4; xiv. 12, 13; Ezek. xxxix. 8; xxxviii. 10-22; Isa. lxvi. 15, 16; Rev. xvi. 24; xix. 20; Heb. x. 31. (3) Gathering of Jacob, Ishmael, and Judah, ("all Israel"). Micah iv. 6, 7; Hosea vi. 1-3; Isa. liv. 1-10; xliii. 1-7; Jer. xxxi. 6-12; xxxii. 36-42; Ezek. xx. 33-44; xxxiv. 18-30; Rom. xi. 25, 31; Rev. vii. 4-8; xiv. 1-5; xix. 1-7; Isa. xxvi. 1-9. (4) Subjugating the nations, and filling the earth with blessing and glory. Psa. ii. 8, 9; xxvii. 28, 29; all of lxvii. and lxxii.; lxxxix. 23-34; all the Psalms from xcvi. to c., with cx.; cxlvi. 5-7, and cxlvii. to cl. are Messianic. Isa. ii. 4; Psa. xlvii. 9; Micah iv. 3, 4, 11-13; Hosea ii. 18; Zech. ix. 9-10; xiv. 4-9; Jer. xxiii. 5-8; Psa. cii. 13; Isa. lii. 8-10; xxxii. 1-4, 13, 20; lxvi. 10-14, 19-23; Numb. xiv. 21; Isa. xi. 9; xxiv. 23; all of Isa. xii.; xlv. 22-25; Phil. ii. 9-11; Rev. xxii. 17.

There, my allotted space is filled, and I have only begun, and I can only add now, (then come again) that Jeremiah says (iii. 17), "At that time they shall call Jerusalem the THURONE OF THE LORD, and all the nations shall be gathered unto it, to the name of the Lord, to JERUSALEM, . . . (see verses 13-18); and Ezekiel declares, (xlviii. 35), that from that day (sometime), the name of the city shall be, JEROVAH SHAMMAH; i. e., the Lord is there."

For ten years past, my constantly increasing convictions have been, that Christendom hardly sees the aurora of God's "glad tidings" to the children of men dwelling on this sin-cursed earth, but prisoners of hope, groaning for deliverance; and it will come! blessed be his holy name; earth shall be emancipated! and the contemplation of it fills me so full, I cry out! O my God, let it come! Come, O my Lord, and bring salvation! come, and bring in everlasting righteousness! "O the depth of the riches both of the wisdom and knowledge of God! how unsearchable are his judgments, and his ways past finding out!"

VIOLATION OF CONTRACT.

Numerous sects have arisen that proclaim they have no creed but the Bible; that all who unite with them will have Christian freedom and liberty of opinion, and find a home among loving brethren with the mind unfettered. But in a few years they require all their preachers to preach in accordance with the sentiments of their early authors. If they speak not according to that rule they are reviled and stigmatized as "hobby lovers," or "hobby riders,"—"inovators—disturbers of the church," etc. They are treated as vile and hateful persons; and they find to their sorrow that they are not in that loving brotherhood that was promised them: they discover they have been ensnared, entrapped, and deceived by false pretences and false pretenders. To persuade any one to join their church under false pretences is a most odious practice, and is unworthy an honest or honorable man, and beneath all that can be called Christian character or manliness.

In law a contract implied is just as binding as one that is expressed. When a church proclaims, publicly, that it has no creed but the Bible, and invite membership on the ground that they shall never be fettered by human opinion; it is clearly implied that every member can read for himself and be his own interpreter; that no other person's interpretation shall be forced upon them; that his rights shall in nowise be curtailed on account of the exercise of freedom of opinion—the freedom of self-interpretation. If this contract is not implied, then there is no such thing as an implied contract. Yet every sensible man must admit there are such contracts. It is conceded in law.

Now who are these false pretenders?—these covenant breakers? who are these crafty entrappers? Let all who feel a harshness towards their brethren, who have made advances in their views, pause and examine themselves and see whether they are covenant breakers. Especially, let those who are members of assemblies called "Christian Churches," or "Advent Churches," engage heartily in this self-examination, and realize it is no small sin to be a covenant breaker. Take care what thou doest! Dissappoint not those who had a right to expect better things of you. Do not manifest yourself a deceiver. Why have aged brethren, who have labored and suffered for years in the cause of God, been reviled, treated with scorn, and virtually excluded from all Christian sympathy because they have taken a step in advance of the generality of you, in the vindication of the character and government of God? Why are they told, they are "Hobby lovers," etc.? Are they more so than their accusers? Are they to be pushed and crowded out of your Christian sympathy because they think the love of God is more extensive than you happen to think, or can at present see? Are "Christian" organizations justified in pursuing such a course, and thus making divisions, while pretending to avoid them? Were not your own organizations brought into being by just such unchristian conduct towards you when you had advanced beyond your old associates? and do you now practice the same spirit towards others that you condemned when new light first broke, as you believed, on your minds? Are not "Adventists" enough divided already to bring a heavy reproach on themselves? Is the bleeding cause of Christianity not yet sufficiently wounded in the house of its friends? Is it not the scandal of christendom that the professed disciples of the "meek and lowly" Jesus and so divided as to present just the opposite of the answer of the Saviour's prayer that they might "be all one," as He and his "Father are one?"

For the honor of humanity, but especially for the honor of Christianity, let professed believers in our Lord Jesus' speedy return from heaven keep covenant with each other. Let them show they have been sincere in their promises that every member shall have the right to his own free belief, of what the Bible teaches, and the right to express his own honest opinions; to "add to his virtue, knowledge," and proclaim his discoveries of truth as fast as he obtains them by a careful study of the Scriptures. Let us remember it is a crime to live without adding to our "virtue, knowledge;" and, also, a crime to put the truth we have discovered "under a bushel," or keep it locked up in our own minds, and thus hide the "light" from others. Let us be honest proclaimers of what we believe God has given us to see of His character and government, even though it may be new to you. Remember, it is the truth that sanctifies us and makes us free; and it is the truth that honors God, and is the instrument of good to men. Let us be loving, kind, generous, and liberal brethren; and let "each esteem others better than themselves," and all cease striving for "masteries;" realizing it is the "meek and lowly," Christ will honor when He appeareth.

LITTLE CHILDREN love one another and so fulfill the law of Christ.

TABLE TALK AT HILLSTEAD HOUSE.

HILLSTEAD. It is very kind of you, my friends, to leave your homes in this melancholy fog, and I am glad you have found, or felt, your way to Hillstead House in safety. Be assured my wife and I tender you a loving welcome.

Mrs. H. All the more so, that it seemed cruel to expect you on such an evening as this.

ARNOLD. Locomotives are blind, and consequently run as comfortably in fog as in sunshine. Besides, it is ample compensation for three or four miles of London mist to reach such a haven as this, where the comforts of a warm room are crowded by the welcoming smiles of our kind friends who reside—O dear! I almost covet their house, and thus break the commandment!

HOLTON. You need not do that. There are more to be had on the sides of this gentle hill, from every part of which the view is extensive and beautiful.

ARNOLD. Bating the fog.

LENNY. Of course; yet it strikes me that fog does not obliterate, it only obscures for the time, the fields on which it rests. And there is fog on more things than our friend's park—fog on politics, fog on science, fog on theology, fog on—

HILLSTEAD. Hold! dear Lenny. You will get us all in a gloomy mood and spoil the evening. Let us take one thing at a time, and try to clear it from the murky clouds you speak of. What shall it be? Theology?

Mrs. H. In that we are more interested than in any thing else, and I cherished the hope that it would form the subject of conversation this evening.

LENNY. Mrs. Hillstead's hope, thus revealed, must be considered by us all as equal to a command; and though I do not profess myself a theologian, I have a deep impression, that there are certain points popularly accepted as integral parts of Christianity, of which the writers of our sacred books knew nothing. It may be dangerous to take one's intuitions as oracles to be depended on; but when certain things are proclaimed by the pulpit as revealed declarations against which moral consciousness protests, as utterly at variance with the essential character of an infinitely perfect Being, I do not think that the feeling is either sinful or rebellious. Certainly, if I thought so, I should even try to silence the protest, for I wish to be loyal to Him in whom I live; but in that case, I should be plunged in mystery, which would make reason itself a gift of very doubtful value.

HARRIS. I suppose none of us are strangers to the impression referred to by our friend. It will come at times, and occasionally with great force, causing much perplexity; and I have observed that the devout and loyal, the men who are above all things anxious to honor God, are most liable to be cast down by it. As by a kind of loving jealousy for his glory, they feel depressed when things are said about him,—and that too, seemingly, on his own authority,—the most distant approach to which in the case of any human ruler would cause the whole world to cry out against him. But I am satisfied by a careful personal examination of the Scriptures, that they contain no doctrine whatever but such as commends itself to the understanding of the wise and the heart of the loving. The man, whoever he was, who first invented the non-natural sense as the canon of interpretation for the Scriptures, launched a doctrine upon Christendom which has wrought amazing and incalculable mischief. I am sometimes lost in painful astonishment when I think on this subject, and I am positively glad to shake it off. Words by this monstrous non-natural sense which is ridiculously called "spiritualizing"—have been forced to change their meaning; and as words carry doctrines these too have necessarily been changed, and upon the perverted doctrines schoolmen and theologians have built up elaborate "systems of divinity," which have hidden the sublime simplicity of Heaven's truth from the eyes of men, as completely as a dense fog hides an exquisite landscape. If death had been allowed to mean death, and life life, we should have understood the Bible on these subjects, and, consequently, have had revelation instead of a perplexing riddle of non-natural definitions which define nothing, and make obscurity more hopelessly obscure.

HILLSTEAD. We are really obliged to the weather, after all! Why, it has helped us wonderfully!

OWEN. Our brother might have added, whilst exposing the mischievous absurdity of the non-natural scheme, that if our theological leaders would only allow us to understand Jew, Israel, Judea, Zion, Jerusalem, the Church, the coming of the Lord, and other words and phrases, as meaning just what the words and phrases literally and obviously mean, we should be able to read the Scriptures intelligently, and know a great deal more about the future. Places, persons, things, the Church and the kingdom, prophecy and doctrine, parable and literal fact, have been so perplexingly mingled and muddled, that, regarding the plainest utterances of Scripture, the Christian man is troubled with the question—"What does this mean?" An illustrative case occurs to memory. A humble brother, in the world's sense, but for all that, one of God's nobility, said to me, not long since, "I wish you would help me to understand a passage I have been reading: 'And his feet shall stand in that day upon the Mount of Olives, which is before Jerusalem on the east; and the Mount of Olives shall cleave in the midst thereof toward the east and toward the west, and there shall be a very great valley; and half of the mountain shall remove toward the north and half of it toward the south.' Now I should like to know what these figures or metaphors mean."

"My good brother," I said, "they are not figures or metaphors, whoever may have taught so. The words very plainly and distinctly, in the most literal sense, describe the actual facts, as they will occur when the Lord comes. By no language, could I tell you what the words mean better than by simply repeating them. Feet mean feet; the Mount of Olives means the Mount of Olives; Jerusalem means Jerusalem, and so forth to the end." You should have seen the beam of joy that danced across my friend's face! "Now," he exclaimed, "I shall understand prophecy for myself. What a blessed thought this is!"

But I have spoken too long. I merely meant to give, as my small contribution to the evening's conversation, a thought that has taken up its abode with me. It is this, that whenever we think there is anything about God's government concerning which we had better be silent, we may be sure there is something wrong in our reading. If we hold a dogma which we do not like to see the light, the sooner we drag it to light to be consumed, the better!

HOLTON. A fruitful thought. The fair logic of it is that, as the Great Ruler cannot, from the perfection of his nature, do wrong to any creature, when any supposed revelation of his shocks our moral sensibilities, we may conclude that there is no such revelation, or that we have misunderstood the oracle in question.

HILLSTEAD. I understand the thought; but it must be guarded. Is there no danger of setting up our moral consciousness as a standard for the Divine government? or of judging beforehand what revelation ought to be? Criminals hate the law that punishes them, and the magistrate who puts it in force.

OWEN. True enough. But the feeling of criminals is not in question here. I refer, and so no doubt does our brother Holton, exclusively to loyal, God-fearing, Christian men, whose consciences are enlightened, and whose moral nature has been purified by grace—men, in a word, who know so much personally of the Father's marvellous love in Christ that they are anxious to know all that he has said respecting the future, both of the loyal and the impenitent. Now, knowing what God is to them, and remembering that they were by nature children of wrath, even as others, they cannot conceive it possible that he will exact more of the unsaved than the strictly defined penalty of his own law, which is death. The introduction of the idea of torture or torment is an additional element not contained in the penalty: and men who know and love God feel that that is at variance with his character. That is my meaning, and that gives the guarding limit for which Mr. Hillstead justly pleads. Besides, we are overlooking in the argument that which belongs to its essence, namely, that out of Christ men are merely mortal.

HILLSTEAD. This is perfectly satisfactory to my mind. Wisdom is justified of her children: and if men will to do the Father's will, they shall know of the doctrine.

ARNOLD. Eternal life only in Christ is certainly a glorious doctrine, the very soul of the Christian revelation; and the whole Church, though as yet she knows not the fact, is under heavy obligation to those good and fearless men who have lately risked all to bring the priceless doctrine to the light of day. Their hearts should be cheered and their hands strengthened, for, amidst numberless difficulties, they are doing a work of incalculable value, the result of which it is impossible to predict.

HARRIS. For myself, I am deeply thankful that the chief weapon of infidelity has at last been taken out of its hands by loyal Christian men. Nothing so remarkable has occurred for many generations. No wonder that those who understand it are so grateful to the Lord!

ELFORD. Those who have patiently examined this great subject, with the necessary qualifications of learning and piety, and have shown as the result that the Church has for many ages been under a terrible delusion, deserve something better of their countrymen than to have their names cast out as evil. To be forsaken and ostracised is a poor reward for services which have rolled a dark cloud from the Christian system, robbed infidelity of its formidable argument, and added fresh glory to the Divine character. But though profoundly sorry that men who love truth better than life should suffer for their loyalty, I am not surprised. I shared the prejudice against these devoted brethren, and, I regret to say, united with others in calling them by hard names. But after awhile conscience took me to task, and suggested that to condemn unheard was neither Christian nor manly. So I ordered several books and pamphlets on the subject, together with the Magazine that has fought so brave a battle, that I might see and judge for myself. At the first mention of the thing you would think that Christian people would hail with joy the faintest suggestion that the Bible teaches that sin and suffering are not to be eternal. But this is a mistake. The chief opponents of this great doctrinal reformation are sincere Christians. The fact is easily understood. They have—we all have—been educated from infancy in the common belief, To hint that any part, or point, of that belief is contrary to the Scriptures is simply to shock them, even though the thing they believe—or fancy they believe—is infinitely more shocking than your hint. We must not, therefore, be impatient, but bear with our brethren. They will, by and by, and perhaps very soon, come round to us. One thing is very certain—we can never go back to them. Our discovery is too precious for that!

HILLSTEAD. The certainty that that discovery is no speculation of sentimental, but ill-informed people, but the actual teaching of God's word, harmonizing both with its letter and spirit, with his character and the nature of man, gives it such a hold upon the heart and understanding, that we cannot let it go. Besides, what a remarkable and suggestive fact it is that this precious light has been given to men who were faithfully laboring to awaken the Churches to the blessed hope of the Lord's glorious return! Loyal to one great truth, they were honored with another; and I cannot but think that in the light of the Second Advent many of the difficulties which now perplex Christian men will shortly disappear. And now, dear friends, accept our thanks for your company and profitable conversation. We hope to see you again ere long, all being well, when some other topic of interest may engage our thoughts, and, under the Lord's blessing, make us wiser and stronger for his service, as long as he honors us with permission to serve him.—The Rainbow.

IS THERE HOPE?

It is said by some, "We may reason the word of God all away!" That indeed would be a very great loss. But which of the two would be most lamentable, to have (if we may so speak) too much reason for the Bible, or too selfishly trammel our reason, so that we cannot understand half that is given us? Certainly, either of these conditions would be bad enough; but I see no great preference for the latter.

When I read accounts of the wanton destruction of human life, in heathen lands, I have reasoned like this. These people are without understanding; no knowledge of Christ as a Saviour; never heard of a life by faith in Him; they die, seemingly, as the beasts die; how can it be that God should ever care to notice them? Why should they not forever rest in mother dust? Certainly, as we by nature see them, there is nothing to desire! Why then trouble ourselves about them? On the other hand, I reason, "The seed of the woman shall bruise the serpent's head." Why? "Sin entered the world and death through (or, because of) sin." Death, then, came on account of the sin caused by the serpent. Now, if the serpent's head is to be bruised, is it to be wholly or partially bruised? If partially, can we not ask, What is equality? and where is the evidence of limitation? If wholly, then how can we avoid the conclusion that those poor heathen, barbarous though they were, must be benefited thereby? For none can deny but they die on account of the sin caused by the serpent. God's ways being equal no flesh and blood can receive partiality. Paul, though a chosen vessel to do God's work, was still a man; and, as far as the flesh was concerned, no more to be preferred than they, and was not made a chosen vessel simply for his own good, but for God's glory, particularly, and for the benefit of others generally. Christ saw fit to make a personal manifestation of Himself to Paul in order to convince him of his error.

Setting aside Paul's call to preach the Gospel, if it was necessary for Christ to make a personal manifestation of Himself to Paul, in order to turn him from his errors, why may not other men consistently claim the same manifestation before they can be wholly without excuse, provided there was no other evidence by which it was possible for them to be convinced? When the "sons of God are manifested" to the groaning creation with power to convince the world that Christ is the only source of life, it would seem that men who have once lived, and died in sin, would soon be convinced of a power that was able to destroy and to make alive.

But why reason in this way? Because the Lord says, "Come now, and let us reason together; though your sins be as scarlet," or "like crimson, I will make them white as snow." Are the sins of those who have not known the law, or heard of Christ, more than scarlet? Are they darker than crimson? Can those who have not come to a knowledge of the truth, be classed with those who have knowingly rejected Christ and life through Him? If we do not reason properly, how can we come to just conclusions?

If we do not reason, how can we fulfil the Lord's command? We are given the faculty of reason above other animals, and therein are made responsible accountable beings; but not accountable for what we cannot learn. Let us not shun to use our God-given faculty for fear of losing the esteem of men, nor to sustain any of our selfish theories. God's power being unlimited, and His love boundless, I believe there must be hope for all who have not knowingly rejected the offer of life through Christ.

One says, "The heathen are a law unto themselves, and will be saved or lost according as they live up to that law." Now, I desire (if such exists) to see one passage to prove that any person can become Christ's without a knowledge of and faith in him. Until such a text can be found it is absurd to teach such things. "Children," also, it is said, "will be saved because they have not sinned." Why have they not sinned? They have the same nature of those of many years. They have not sinned simply because they have not come to know what sin is. The same can be said of the heathen; if they have not known God's law, they have never transgressed that law; and should be saved the same as children, if they are saved without first coming to a knowledge of the truth, of Christ, and of God.

I can see no possibility for an endless life for any of Adam's race, unless it is a free gift from God through his Son; which, according to his word, can only be given as a reward for believing and obeying Christ, whom He has sent.

Christ is the great LIFE-GIVER, appointed by God to offer life to all men, and to every individual. Christ is the Tree of Life who shall be for the healing of the nations. O, soon may the day of healing come! Soon may the balm for all wounds be found. Soon may He who has healing in his wings come and restore this now distracted world. O soon—may the throne be established whose occupant shall be the Lord of lords, and King of kings. Let us earnestly, but humbly, desire the best gifts.

M. C. HARRIMAN.

Warner, N. H.

THE Lord Jesus came "to destroy the works of the devil." Will that enemy—be he what he may—have the vast majority of those for whom Christ "gave himself a ransom," to be eternally under his dominion? or, are the masses of all who have descended from Adam to have their heads bruised by "the old serpent," instead of the of "seed the woman" bruising his head?

A LOOK AT THE FUTURE.

Liable as we all are to the greatest mistakes in attempting to read current events in the light of prophecy, it is still all but impossible for a firm believer in this peculiar characteristic of Divine Revelation to refrain from something like speculation as to the possible bearing of political action, on what he is satisfied will sooner or later come to pass. Perhaps it is not desirable that it should be otherwise. It was intended that men of faith and insight should, to some extent at least, read the signs of the times.

Assuming then that, within limits, it is lawful and right to look into the future, and that our only guide in so doing is the outline given us in the prophetic page, we feel justified in suggesting for consideration certain possibilities which every now and then present themselves to our own minds.

We believe in the downfall of Popery, not only as a great tyrannic power, but also as a vile system of priestly delusion, and a standing mockery of the kingdom of Christ. We believe it will before long be torn up root and branch; not tenderly and by degrees, not by the mere overthrow of the temporal power of the Popes, but by the utter extirpation of all that constitutes the strength of its spiritual sway. If the predictions of the Apocalypse be not greatly misread, the time is at hand when the alienated children of that apostate community will themselves "make her desolate and naked, eat her flesh, and burn her with fire."

That such a result can only be brought about by revolutionary violence seems clear and the spirit of that extreme democracy which in spite of opposition grows steadily in Europe, indicates plainly enough that when the ability to execute such vengeance is possessed, the disposition will not be wanting. Is it not possible, then, that the overthrow of Catholic France by German arms may be a necessary precursor of the ruin of Romanism, by developing forces which before long may run wild in quarters where they are least expected or wished for.

The action of Russia, whatever its result, may at least teach us how soon and how suddenly the Eastern question may be both stirred and solved; while the attitude of the Jewish people—one of expectation but inaction—shows how strong is their faith that when the hour strikes, the land of their fathers will be given to them almost as by miracle.

But what then? What if out of the ruins of Popery and Mohammedanism, out of the wrecks of idolatry, amid the downfall of thrones and the exaltation of peoples, should spring up some new form of delusion, which shall unite the pomp and plausibility of Romanism with the Theism of Mahomet, and combine the sensuality of idolatry with the speculations of a heartless infidelity! Let such a system, under the pretext of unity in religion (the favorite idea of formalists in all ages), once claim the right of ecclesiastical domination, and there will be little difficulty in attaching any extent of intolerance to it.

Have we then nothing to learn, if—however apparently distant—the extirpation of priestcraft should, even by possibility, one day carry with it an intense hatred to Christianity itself, and a determination to put down its missionary spirit; if in this instance, as in so many others, it should prove that the tares cannot be plucked up without destroying the wheat also; if there is the slightest probability that through the startling suddenness of modern changes that time of ruin may be much nearer than we think; if, as many suppose, darker days than any the Church has yet seen are coming on; if submission to a ruling apostate may one day be demanded by an all-powerful public opinion more debased than any that in the middle ages defended the Inquisition!

That something of this kind is shadowed out in the Apocalypse can scarcely be doubted, and we shall all before long have to choose between the acceptance of that prophecy as it stands, or its total rejection as inconsistent with the times in which we live and the institutions we are too apt to believe imperishable.

One more supposition may be flung out for consideration. May it not be because these dark days are approaching, when to the eye of man, the victories of Christianity will be all turned into hopeless defeats, and progress be impossible, that God is leading man, unconsciously, to the recognition of truths eminently calculated to prevent despair; that He is opening up to them brighter views of the future of humanity than have yet been cherished by the devout; that He is breaking up old systems and churches in order that a wider faith and a more individual piety may flourish amongst us; that He is revealing to us the great mission-field after the resurrection, when "the veil shall be withdrawn from all nations," and "death be swallowed up in victory," that so the thought of final triumph may comfort those who would otherwise imagine that in the failure of their schemes, Christ himself was defeated? May He not thus be hastening the time when the long-neglected and despised Apocalypse will be felt as a necessary armor; "its prophecy bringing to thousands strength in the fires, and songs in the night; its declarations enabling them, even when the triumph of Antichrist is at the highest, to look serenely on to his near doom and their own perfect victory!"—Selected.

Correspondence.

FROM WM. MURRELS.

BRO. STORRS: You will begin to think that I am growing neglectful. I have to plead other causes than neglect. We have had quite a severe winter on this coast, which affected business of most kinds very much. Mine suffered among the rest. I realize that our Father in heaven has been very kind to me. How consoling it is to be assured that He cares for us.

The EXAMINER comes regularly, and is a very welcome visitor. Its contents seem much in advance of almost all other publications on the great theme of the coming ages. There is great light and beauty exhibited in the Scriptures when viewed from the stand-point pointed out by much of the writings in the EXAMINER.

I have at no time during my Christian experience passed through so much mental conflict as I have had to undergo for some time past. Temptations are fierce, attended with coldness of heart and doubt. All the wrong that I have ever done seems to come crowding upon the mind in dread array, clamoring loudly that my hopes are vain! But I, as often, meet them with a louder acclaim, "The blood of Christ cleanseth from all sin," to my great relief.

April 1st, at 3 o'clock, A. M., was full moon here, and hence the return of the Passover. To me it is most interesting on more than one account, which I will not stop here to state. After having got all the emblems prepared (the bread was made from wheat of my own raising, having bruised and baked it myself; and the wine I made from the grapes of my own growing) I rose at the proper hour and partook of them alone. Oh, it was a solemn and blissful time; no one present but the Eternal One, and He whose sufferings and death was being commemorated!

I do not attach any value to my having prepared the emblems myself other than that they did not pass through wicked hands.

I have received some tracts from Bro. Blain; thanks to him.

Yours in the glorious hope of immortality in Jesus in the near future.

Forest Hill, Cal., April, 1874.

CHARLES AXOLE, Prairie Ville, Mich., writes:

Through the mercy of God's loving children, I have been blessed beyond expression. I am a poor and consumptive man. By some means I have before me the BIBLE EXAMINER of March and April, 1874. It offers new things; great light; good news; better than I ever had hopes to hear. If Bro. Storrs could believe that God would reward him for sending the EXAMINER to me, I would read and cause it to be read by many. Silver, gold, nor greenbacks, I have none. If I had, I would send for some of those broken sets of the EXAMINER; for there are people that could see and believe, and perchance would wish to know more. If you would send some, I promise they shall be carefully delivered to those who have minds to understand. I fear that some people have not minds to comprehend the Promise of God.

REMARKS BY THE EDITOR.—To meet such calls, funds are needed. With the closest economy the EXAMINER has hitherto been published without incurring debt, and many tracts have been circulated, besides thousands of odd numbers of the EXAMINER, and the way is opening for a still wider spread of the glorious truths thus being promulgated: but the Editor of this Magazine does not feel called to incur debts to carry on the work. If any of the friends have means to spare, all shall be done that the Editor's time and strength will enable him to do. His stock of Tracts is exhausted; and until funds are received he does not think he is justified in publishing more. A hundred dollars could be used in the tract department to advantage at the present time. But the EXAMINER is first in importance. Friend Angle's desire will be complied with: the EXAMINER and odd numbers will be sent him gratuitously.

FROM MRS. LIZZIE H. BUXTON.

BRO. STORRS: I should be very sorry to lose the reading of a single number of the EXAMINER; though I do not fully indorse every thing it contains, yet of most I have been a firm believer these many years.

"The Sceptre of Judah," in the May number, brought to my mind an article, published several years since, on "Curious and Original Discoveries, Concerning the re-settlement of the Seed of Abraham in Syria," etc., which has afforded me much comfort in the past. May be, some of your numerous readers will find something in it to strengthen their faith, and so encourage their hearts to patiently wait, while they earnestly, yea, ardently look for the advent of our blessed Lord, "whose feet shall stand in that day upon the Mount of Olives, and the Mount shall cleave asunder, and there shall be a very great valley."

Nothing can be done about this great "restoration" until "The Times of the Gentiles are" ended; hence, I am looking and searching for the ending of the days, and think the evidence clusters around the Spring of 1875. Although we are living in a dark and cloudy day, yet some light shines; some Gospel is preached. We who know our Master's will and do it not, will be beaten with many stripes; while they who do not know, and commit things worthy of stripes will be beaten with few; therefore let us whose minds are enlightened into some of the great and precious truths of the coming ages be diligent that we may be found of Him in peace, without spot and blameless.

I have been much interested in many letters you have published; especially those of sister "Polly G. Pitts." Enclosed you will find the article spoken of above. Do with it as you see fit. Worcester, Mass., April, 1874.

NOTE BY THE EDITOR.—I have read the article with much interest, and think I shall publish it soon as I can find space; though it is rather too long to be inserted immediately. I must complete "The Study of the Bible" in this volume; and, as far as possible, the extracts from Mr. Dunn's work on "The Destiny of the Human Race." These two works, if there were nothing else in the "EXAMINER," would make the present volume invaluable; and all our friends who do not secure this volume will regret it hereafter.

FROM ELDER J. BLAIN.

BRO. STORRS: I want the privilege of giving notice in the EXAMINER of the amount sent me on my call for aid to pay up my debt, incurred by publishing works to advance our good cause, and for means to live while devoting all my time in the work of spreading the truths we love. This public notice is needed by the fact that without it no brother can know what amount others have given, and so cannot see what need I have of further aid.

I made my appeal for help in the EXAMINER last December, and then stated the reasons why I owed my printers $400, viz., the opposition of Advent preachers and all their papers to our present views; and, worst of all, by being forbidden to sell our works at Camp-meetings for three years past. The consequence has been, that I have had to give away the mass of my works, as I felt it a duty to have them out on their mission. I am happy to learn, by letters, that truth is being spread and much comfort given by thus giving them out.

Since my appeal for help I have received in all $42.* All can see this amount would come short of supporting myself and wife through a long winter; yet, I have paid $25 on my debt, and lived by the aid of kind children and selling a very few books, not more than $15 worth.

One, and likely the main cause of this result, has been the uncommon scarcity of money. I shall yet hope for relief if times change during the summer. God is faithful to his promises, and will direct in the matter.

My health yet gives me hope of traveling this season as usual. I again invite brethren to send for "Hope for our Race," if they can lend, give, or sell them to willing readers, where they live.

Buffalo, N. Y.

* I omit the individuals' names and the sums each paid, believing it would not be their wish to have them published.—EDITOR.

S. S. CALL TO ELD. BLAIN.

BRO. BLAIN: I have carefully studied your pamphlet, "Hope for our Race." I believe it to be true; and if I had the money I would send for a dozen at once. I can't keep it at home so as to study and compare Scripture, as I would like to. I must lend it to those who are searching for truth; it is just as much theirs as mine. I keep changing with them; one man lives five miles from me, and he is very much interested in the work; another four miles; another two and a half miles.

If I had the works I could sell them. I am determined to do all I can to spread this glorious gospel light as far as I can. I have got one subscriber for the BIBLE EXAMINER, and subscribed myself. Accept my thanks for your favor of the pamphlet and tracts. The light they have afforded is a great comfort to me. I expect opposition to these views, but I mean to meet them all with charity, and so fulfil the law of Christ.

Hesper, Iowa, April 2, 1874.

English Correspondence.

FROM H. BRITAIN.

Dear Sir and Brother: I thank you for your kind recognition of my pamphlet, and for the encouragement given me by your acknowledgment of any good it may possibly produce.

I have seen and do see so much bitterness in existence amongst the sects with which I come in contact that I have, at times, well nigh despaired of any good being effected at all by truth. But I ever had recur to my mind the command, "Occupy till I come." In the face of it I fight onward.

MR. DUNK happened to be in Birmingham and had called upon me the day your number came to hand. I hope to see more of them.

I purpose, God willing, to send you extracts from a work or two I have bearing on the kingdom of Christ and the future of the human race; and trust they may be available.

I should have written to you before this had I not been in hopes of being able to have sent you an extract from a work entitled "The Future Human Kingdom of Christ," which you may not have seen.

I think it is a great misfortune that those who accept the common foundation of Christ the Lord, do not bear and forbear with each other more. There is as great a difference between the neophyte, the young man, and the aged in Christ as there is in the natural human family. Why should all be expected to range under one thought until all are capable of understanding with the same perceptive power? Wisdom has to be spoken amongst those who are perfect; not amongst the imperfect ones.

I shall be much pleased at any time to hear from you at your leisure, and to know what progress the truth is making in your country. But above all, that those who hold the foundation truth ally themselves together. For what each may build upon the foundation, lies much to themselves—and for the materials with which they build they are annexable to God.

With all Christian regard and esteem, I am
Yours, truly,

Birmingham, 57 Bradford St., April, 1874.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.—It is my desire that all letters for me be sent to my residence, as I visit New York but once a day, and sometimes only once in two or three days; while the "Letter Carriers" deliver letters four times each day, Sundays excepted. I shall still retain my Post Office Box in New York, because I fear loss by giving it up, at present, as that address has been placed on all my works scattered for twenty years past. The Bible Examiner.

Two numbers more will close the present volume. Those, therefore, who intend to pay for this volume and have not yet done so,—and such as intend to help on the work by donations, will much oblige by remitting the amount at the earliest day possible, that the remaining numbers may be issued without interruption, and the next volume be entered on free from all incumbrances, and with an increased number of subscribers.

To encourage old subscribers to pay up,—who have not yet remitted anything of the present volume,—if they will send $3, soon, I will credit them in full to the end of the next volume.

New subscribers shall receive the whole of the present volume (back numbers and the remaining two) for $1.10, if applied for soon: or, for $3 I will send them the present volume and the following one.

At the close of the present volume it is intended to put up, in plain binding, all the numbers, with an INDEX to the subjects. This volume will be sold at $2.25; the 25 cents being for postage when sent by mail: if taken at my office, $2 only. Those who wish this volume, thus bound, will please give me notice early, that I may know how many to bind, as I can supply but a limited number; and those who send first will be first supplied.

FROM MRS. ELIZA A. B. BENTON.

BRO. STORRS: I like the EXAMINER better than the best of all the papers we take. To me your views are generally deeply interesting, and precious Bible truths: and though husband and I get but little encouragement, we have, and still intend to circulate your and Eld. Blain's works, as we have opportunity. We have sent and carried them to persons far and near; some have read; but seem not to be free thinkers;" Others say, (after keeping them several weeks), "I have not read all yet but I will right away." Some say they are "afraid to read, lest they be led into error;" and many show they will not read them at all. I feel disappointed, surprised, and grieved, at the cool indifference of so many good Advent brothers and sisters to such manifest Bible truths as have been presented.

My poor health hinders me from seeing a great many whom I believed would look into and love these truths as I do: but my faith is somewhat shaken since being one day at "The Addison Advent Christian Conference," where some remarks strongly reminded me of your "Prejudice and Bigotry," in No 9 of BIBLE EXAMINER; but such things only strengthens my faith in the truthfulness of your views.

That truth will ultimately prevail I have no doubt, and those opposing wise ones may be "taken in their own craftiness," and yet find their own weapons to turn against themselves, proving their labor to be not all for righteousness, peace, and joy in the Holy Ghost." O, may God and our Saviour grant that no true believer in Jesus Christ be left in the dark because of blind teachers, or led astray by any who lie in wait to deceive, and by using the word of God deceitfully, as it is said, by some of us that, "that is what we do."

I am glad you are still going from place to place declaring the good news "preached before unto Abraham," giving "meat in due season," and making ready a people prepared for the Lord." May you so continue to do till He comes, then receive the faithful servant's reward. Yours, in Christ.

WRATH AND MERCY.

MANY suppose that because the LORD threatens wrath and destruction, and executes the threatenings, that no mercy can follow; and that the state of such is final or unalterable. Nothing can be more unscriptural than such a view. Wrath and destruction are often set forth as a correction, and accompanied with promises of restitution at a future period. Israel as a people were threatened with great wrath or punishment; and terrible calamities befel them by plagues and captivity which destroyed them from off the land the LORD had given them, and they have been dispersed among all nations, enduring sufferings indescribable. Yet all this has been accompanied with assurances that these calamities are to be followed by a great deliverance, and prosperity far greater than they had ever before enjoyed, and with the assurance that their latter end should be not only more glorious than their beginning, but that their calamities should no more return upon them. A few samples, from many like testimonies, only need now to be given: "Therefore thus saith the LORD God; Now will I bring again the captivity of Jacob, and have mercy upon the whole house of Israel, and will be jealous for my holy name; after that they have borne their shame, and all their trespasses whereby they have trespassed against me, when they dwelt safely in their own land, and none made them afraid. When I have brought them again from the people, and gathered them out of their enemies' lands, and am sanctified in them in the sight of many nations; then shall they know that I am the LORD their God, which caused them to be led into captivity among the heathen: but I have gathered them unto their own land, and have left none of them any more there: neither will I hide my face any more from them; for, I have poured out my Spirit upon the house of Israel, saith the LORD God" (Ezek. xxxix. 25-29).

Here the case of wrath followed by mercy is clearly set forth, as also the preceding part of the chapter shows. To quote all similar passages would be to transcribe a large portion of the Scriptures of truth, and of the utterances of the God of Israel concerning His purposes of wrath and mercy to the "whole house of Israel." And as wrath and mercy are set forth as the lot of Israel, so, also, are Gentile nations placed in a similar light. Let us look at a few examples on this point. Thus says the word:

"I have heard the reproach of Moab, and the revilings of the children of Ammon, whereby they have reproached my people, and magnified themselves against their border: Therefore, as I live, saith the LORD of hosts, the God of Israel, Surely Moab shall be as Sodom, and the children of Ammon as Gomorrah" (Zep. ii. 8, 9). Here is wrath, as one might say, "to the uttermost;" yet, hear now what the LORD says of Moab and Ammon: "Yet will I bring again the captivity of Moab in the latter days, saith the LORD" (Jer. xlviii. 47). "And afterwards will I bring again the captivity of the children of Ammon, saith the LORD" (Jer. xlix. 6). Here are two cases in which the people are to experience wrath like as Sodom and Gomorrah; and yet mercy is ultimately to be extended to them: yea, even Sodom itself is to have mercy extended to her; see Ezek. xvi. 46-61, where her future restoration is explicitly spoken of. So "eternal fire" (Jude 7) does not necessarily signify an endless one. "It shall be more tolerable for the land of Sodom in the day of judgment than for Capernaum" (Matt. xi. 24). Here mercy is more than hinted at for Sodom; and the prophecy by the mouth of Ezekiel makes it certain that Sodom is to be joined with Jerusalem in the reception of the LORD's mercies, and will be restored; having drunk the cup of wrath, she is to have the cup of mercy given her.

The cases noticed may be sufficient to satisfy candid minds that mercy does follow wrath; and salvation may, therefore, follow destruction. That the LORD can create and destroy, none will pretend to deny. That it is equally easy for Him to destroy and afterwards build up again, none can reasonably doubt. That the recreation will be more perfect, a knowledge of the infinite wisdom and power of God would lead us to conclude; and when He "makes all things new" (Rev. xxi. 5) there will be a perfection beyond all our present thoughts.

That a nation or people may be destroyed, in one sense, does not prove that it is a total and final destruction; for, if they are destroyed so as to be useless for a particular purpose, they may yet be converted to usefulness in another.

This fact is illustrated by the Lord's own words, thus: "Arise and go down to the potter's house, and I will cause thee to hear My words. Then I went down to the potter's house, and behold, he wrought a work on the wheels: and the vessel that he made of clay was marred in the hand of the potter: so he made it again another vessel as seemed good to the potter to make it. Then the word of the LORD came to me, saying, O house of Israel, cannot I do with you as this potter? saith the LORD. Behold as the clay is in the potter's hand, so are ye in my hand, O house of Israel" (Jer. xviii. 2-6). As of a nation, so of individuals: they are in God's hand; and if they are spoiled or destroyed for one use, He is able to put them to another use; and so, "In a great house there are not only vessels of gold and of silver, but also of wood and earth; and some to honor, and some to less honor" (2 Tim. ii. 20).

The LORD is not like the man who undertakes to build without counting the cost, and so is not able to finish. His plan was perfect and complete before earth's foundation was laid or a man created. Redemption was as much in His plan as creation: "Known unto God are all his works from the beginning of the world" (Acts xv. 18); and Christ was "the Lamb slain from the foundation of the world" (Rev. xiii. 8). God met with no disappointment; never changed His plan: it was "His good pleasure which he purposed in himself, that in the dispensation of the fulness of times He might gather together in one all things in Christ, both which are in heaven, and which are in earth; even in him" (Eph. i. 9, 10). Nor will His purpose fail by the follies or sins of men; for He has said, "My counsel shall stand, and I will do all my pleasure" (Isa. xlvi. 10). He has said, "I am the LORD, I change not" (Malachi iii. 6); and the apostle James says, "The Father of lights, with whom is no variableness, neither shadow of turning" (Jas. i. 17). There will be no defeat nor failure in His purpose concerning this world and its inhabitants. The "curse" has come; evil has been made manifest: the blessing is sure to follow "in due time:" the "serpent's head" is to be crushed; the evil will be purged out and be overruled to bring men blessings full, complete, unending; blessings such as they never could have known had sin and evil been made impossible at the outset. Men shall reap the fruit of their evil-doings; bear the curse; but God will ultimately convert the curse into a blessing; yea, He will cause the wrath of man to be the means of praising Him, by bringing out the glorious perfections of His nature, and manifesting His love, wisdom and power, as they never could otherwise have been manifested; "and the remainder of [man's] wrath shall God restrain" (Psa. lxxvi. 10). O, the wisdom, power, and love of God, as manifested both in His wrath and mercy! "All nations shall come and worship before Thee; for Thy judgments are made manifest" (Rev. xv. 4). Such will be the consummation: for "Behold, I make all things new" (Rev. xxi. 5). Ed.

IS THE NEW JERUSALEM A LITERAL CITY?

There are two opinions on this question. It may not be important to determine which is the correct one. Some strong things may be said on either position. It is asked, "Are there to be two Jerusalems—cities proper,—on the earth, at one and the same time, at any period in the future?" Such an idea appears to the inquirer "absurd." To me, however, it does not appear in that light. That the Old Jerusalem is to be rebuilt in greater splendor than ever before, prophecy every where proclaims; and especially in the last chapters of Ezekiel; and that it will be a permanent establishment is equally true. It must not be overlooked, however, that that restored and rebuilt city, with all its appurtenances and services, belongs exclusively to literal Israel and established in their own land; and cannot, therefore, be the same as the New Jerusalem of Revelation, which is especially for the BRIDE of the LAMB. To transfer the Bride to the City of Ezekiel would be to displace literal Israel and its various rites, ordinances, and government, as there set forth.

The idea that the New Jerusalem is a symbol of the glorified church, or Bride of the Lamb, seems most incongruous. If it had been spoken of simply as a city there might have been a propriety in its being called a church, as a corrupt church is symbolized by the city of Babylon.

The symbol in this last case was taken from a corrupt city, well known in the past. How unlike is the description of the New Jerusalem. To suppose such a detailed description as is given of the New Jerusalem is a mere symbol of the Bride of the Lamb, and not of her residence, has no analogy in history or Bible utterances, as I see. I am led, therefore, to favor the idea that the description is that of a literal city; the residence of Christ and his Bride. The City and the Bride are spoken of as one, because the contained and the container are indissolubly united,—the Home and its inheritors. The city of Ezekiel belongs. As I have said, to the literal Israel restored and permanently established. The New Jerusalem belongs exclusively to Christ and his Bride. It is the Seat of Government, so to speak, for and of the world: the City into which "The kings of the earth do bring their glory and honor" (Rev. xxi. 24); a city into which "they which are written in the Lamb's Book of Life" will enter (verse 27); and from which will go out "healing for the nations" (Rev. xxii. 2).

As to the position of this city on the earth, if a literal city, it cannot occupy the same place as the city of Ezekiel. By measurement it is fifteen hundred miles square, and does not appear to be on the earth till after the thousand years and the judgment that follows, and what is called "a new heaven and new earth" appear, and "there is no more sea" (Rev. xxi. 1); and God has said, "Behold, I make all things new" (ver. 5). If, then, "there is no more sea," there will be vast plains to be occupied; and some of these may be devoted to the location of the "World's METROPOLIS, while the Metropolis of literal Israel and its divisions of land, as described by Ezekiel, will remain undisturbed.

DID THE SUN STAND STILL?

It seems a discussion has arisen in "The Rainbow" on the above subject. It commenced by a Correspondent inquiring in relation as to how the effect was produced, and how "to meet and answer the views of those skeptics who make this passage" (Joshua x. 12-15) "their great weapon of attack upon the Word of God."

It has created no little surprise, in my mind, that men of large intellect should take the ground that the earth, instead of being a globe, is a vast plain at rest, while the sun travels around it, and is placed, in fact, only three or four thousand miles above it. I have no intention of entering into the discussion further than to inquire, If the earth is a plain and not a globe, why do our English friends get a sight of sun-rise four hours earlier than we in America? It would seem, if their theory is true, all the inhabitants of earth should see the sun rise at the same time.

As to the text in Joshua x. 12-15, I have been satisfied for a long time that it is an interpolation, and so marked it in my Bible years ago. I am pleased to find myself not alone in this view. I was not aware of this fact till "Our Hope" for June was received in which its Editor takes precisely the view I have long entertained on the subject. His reasons for rejecting it are:

"(1.) It is clear from verse 18 that the passage contains a quotation from the legendary 'book of Jasher,' which we have no reason to suppose was inspired.

"(2.) These verses violently interrupt the narrative; verse 16 carries it on smoothly and chronologically from verse 11.

"(3.) The unsuitableness of verse 5 in its present connection is so manifest that many MSS. and editions of the LXX. omit it altogether. It is the same, word for word, as verse 13, which is plainly its only true position, and that from which it has been misplaced by some copist.

"(4.) The alleged miracle is irreconcilable with the established facts of astronomy—a science quite beyond the reach of paradox.

"(5.) It is very remarkable that this stupendous miracle—if miracle it was—is never once subsequently referred to in the Scriptures either of the Old or New Testaments. One would certainly have expected to find mention of it in Hebrews xi."

These reasons are all good: and the last one was that which first arrested my attention to the fact that probably the text was an interpolation and not the voice of inspiration; though I have never before felt called to give public utterance to my settled conviction on the subject. Ed.

R. F. LADD'S PROPOSAL.

IN another part of this Magazine will be found a plan proposed by Bro. Ladd to help the Tract cause, and the work generally of spreading abroad the views now being promulgated in relation to the character of the blessed God and His government over the human race. That these views are sure to supersede the horrible views of the Divine character and government, which have for centuries overborne truly pious hearts, and filled them with gloom in regard to the final doom of the mass of the human race,—there need be no doubt; for "the earth shall" yet "be full of the knowledge and glory of the Lord" (Isa. xi. 9; Hab. ii. 14, and Num. xiv. 21). But who among us are willing to take the reproach and bear the burden of pushing on the battle against the Moloch worship of the past and present centuries, which has been varnished over with the name of Christianity, publishing the God of the Bible as the author of our being, and proclaiming His government as a most selfish and merciless administration as it respects the mass of the human race? Who will "come up to the help of the Lord" against these monstrous representations of the Divine character and government? Shall any of us, from the fear of reproach, or loss of place, or worldly gain, keep back our hand from a work so glorious as that to which we are now called? Are any waiting for the work to become "popular," thinking "It wont pay" to engage in it yet? Let such mercenary spirits stand aloof from this holy work—"Verily, they" will "have their reward,"—but let all who seek not the reward that cometh from man take a nobler course, and put themselves on the Lord's side in no equivocal manner; but openly and boldly; knowing, "if we suffer with Him" we shall "be also glorified together" with Him, who "gave Himself a ransom for all." Ed.

"THE GRAND CARDINAL TRUTH."

The following extract is from the Edinburgh Review:

"Every page of the gospel, and of the writings of St. Paul, demonstrates that the doctrine of the immortality of the soul, is the grand cardinal truth which the apostles had to proclaim to man kind." In the above sentence is a parenthesis, which is as follows: "It is confirmed by the fact of the resurrection of Christ."

Dr. J. F. LEE, of North Carolina, writes: "I copied the above extract from the 'Monroe Enquirer.' I feel no inclination to make any remark; in sadness, sorrow and suffering, I must patiently wait, trusting alone in God."

REMARKS BY THE EDITOR OF THE EXAMINER.

Was there ever a more preposterous assumption put forth by men than this of the "Edinburgh Review?" That is the "Grand Cardinal Truth" of the Bible, which is not once named in all that Book! neither Moses, the prophets, Jesus Christ, nor His apostles ever once spoke of an immortal soul, or uttered such a sentiment as that which the "Review" puts forth as the "grand cardinal truth which the apostles had to proclaim to mankind." If it was, they must all

"be damned" for unfaithfulness; for they never once spoke of it. That they did make prominent the "resurrection of the dead" is true: but that "the resurrection of Christ confirmed the immortality of the soul" is as preposterous as to say, Paul taught that the resurrection of the dead is proof that Christ did not die and that no man can possibly die! Will these logical reasoners tell us how that can have a resurrection from the dead which never died? But they may say, "It is only the body that dies." Then it is only the body that has a resurrection; and how does that prove the soul immortal? Is the body or the soul the man? If you say, "It is the soul:" then, as you say, the soul is immortal, and hence, cannot die, the man never can have a resurrection, because he was never dead; and you contradict both Christ and Paul, as well as Jehovah himself, who testifies that Christ's "soul" was to be "made an offering for sin" (Isa. liii. 10, 12); and Christ himself said, "My soul is exceeding sorrowful, even unto death" (Matt. xxvi. 38; and Paul says, "CHRIST died" (1 Cor. xv. 3); and he also testifieth, "Now is Christ risen from the dead."

Now, "the man Christ Jesus" did die, or He did not. If He did not die, he had no resurrection; and the apostle's talk about it is a fable. If He did die, His "soul" was "sorrowful, even unto death," and died; and His resurrection, so far from confirming the immortality of the soul, proves that for the dead there is no future life nor immortality except through the resurrection from the dead.

AN EXPOSITION ASKED

BRO. STORRS: Will you please give me an exposition of our Lord's words, "Except a man be born of water and of the Spirit he cannot enter into the kingdom of God" (John iii. 5). W.

This request is made because some persons are teaching that in order for any one to be saved they must be immersed three times in water, or what is called "Trine Immersion," i. e., thrice repeated. Very few Baptists have taken this extreme view.

So far as water baptism is concerned, as an essential of salvation, it finds no support in John iii. 5 by any intelligent consideration of the text and context. Any thing essential to salvation must be common to the race. But if trine baptism in any form in water is essential to an entrance into the kingdom of God, then all the "holy men of old," including Abraham, Isaac and Jacob will be excluded. But Jesus testifies they will be in the kingdom. The inference, therefore, that without trine baptism, or any other water baptism, a man cannot be saved, is untrue.

When the text John iii. 5 was uttered, what is called "Christian baptism" was not instituted. Hence, the text does not relate to baptism with nor in water. Jesus explains the being "born of water" in the next verse by saying, "That which is born of the flesh is flesh." The water, therefore, has reference to natural birth, which is always in water, and produces only a perishable creature: hence, "Ye must be born again,"—"born of the Spirit," or "he cannot enter the kingdom of God." Not born again with or in water: for such birth, if it could take place, would still produce no fitness for the kingdom of God; the individual would yet be a corruptible being.

This subject might be much enlarged on, but it seems enough has been said to satisfy an unprejudiced mind that whatever else the being "born of water" may mean, it does not mean water baptism, whether that ordinance be a Divine institution or not. Ed.

ANOTHER EXPOSITION ASKED.

BRO. STORRS: Please give me an exposition of the expression of the text, "As many as were ordained to eternal life, believed" (Acts xiii. 48).

H.

The ordination here spoken of has been assumed to be a Divine predestination of the individuals to eternal life. Nothing, however, in the text or context warrants such a construction of the language. The original (tetagmenoî), as used in this text, signifies, "disposed for;" or, "purposed for;" or, "bent on;" and relates to the disposition of mind those possessed who believed; and is used as a contrast in relation to those Jews who contradicted and blasphemed, spoken of in verse 45; to whom Paul said, "It was necessary that the word of God should first have been spoken to you: but seeing ye put it from you, and judge yourselves unworthy of everlasting" (aiouion, the age lasting) "life, lo, we turn to the Gentiles" (verse 46). The Gentiles, some of them, when they heard the word of God relating to that life, and learning that they were embraced in God's love and mercy, were disposed for a part in everlasting life, and believed the good news: but they must "endure unto the end" to be in ultimate possession of that life (Matt. xxiv. 13); or, they must "hold fast the confidence and the rejoicing of the hope firm unto the end," if they would be "Christ's house," or family (Heb. iii. 6). Ed.

A NEW PLAN OF SALVATION.

FAITH in Christ is God's plan; and faith cannot exist without testimony; God is pledged, that, as "Christ gave himself a ransom for all" men, the fact shall "be testified in due time" to all men: but that due time has never yet come only to a few for whom Christ gave himself a ransom, viz., "every man," and was "the propitiation for the sins of the whole world" (Heb. ii. 9, and 1 John ii. 2). Is God's pledge to be set aside for human substitutes and to gratify human prejudices?

Here is one of the new plans of the opposers of "the ages to come" as probationary. He says:

"God is love, and knows all things; and, as I believe, will inflict no unnecessary pain; so those that are dead He will raise, and save all that would have turned to Him if they had had a trial, and the rest will sleep a perpetual sleep and be as though they had not been. Amen."

This writer's heart is full of compassion, and he cannot quite go the theory that there is no salvation or revival from the dead of any but such as have formed a spiritual union with Christ in this life. Let us see how his new plan of salvation works.

1. It dispenses with faith altogether; faith is wholly unnecessary to salvation. 2. It substitutes God's knowledge of what a man would do if he had a chance to believe. 3. It makes trial wholly useless: If God knows what they would do, that is enough. 4. It makes God's ways very unequal; for He subjects some of us who do believe to very great and severe trials to prove what is in our hearts, while he accepts others without any trial or faith, simply on the ground of His own knowledge. If one class is thus accepted, why should the other not be? Is God cruel to believers and lenient to the others? 5. It makes the trial of Adam a useless if not a cruel affair; for God's knowledge was sufficient to determine Adam's final state without trial, and so of all the race.

Alas, for this new plan of salvation; it represents God's whole administration as a most cruel and offensive one; for He could have given each man his final destiny without a trial as well as with; for He knew who would serve Him if they had a trial and who would not. Why not then have spared the race the sorrows and tribulations that have followed in the train of trial?

There is no authority for this new plan of salvation. The Gospel is "in due time" to be preached "to every creature;" then "he that believeth shall be saved, and he that believeth not shall be condemned." The Gospel does not say, "Those that God knows would believe if they had a chance shall be saved." Such teaching is no where found in the Bible.

Salvation does not turn on God's knowledge (whatever He may know), but on a trial of man under a system which shall bring out a moral character and manifest how men stand in heart to God's will or government. Under God's plan, salvation—which is to be in harmony with the Divine will—is impossible without trial; there must be some test of the human will before it can be shown to be in harmony with the Divine. God's test is faith, i. e., a willing reception of Christ as God's one Mediator between Himself and us, and through whom alone we can come to the Father and obtain an endless life.

As to the time or period when that trial shall take place—begin or end—God has kept it wholly in His own power, and no man knoweth it except in his own case and experience; no man can determine it for another. Yet we do know that to multitudes it never has come in this life; certainly not to those who have died in infancy or in total ignorance of God's claims on them. Yet God has said, the "One Mediator between God and men, Christ Jesus, who gave himself a ransom for all," shall "be testified in due time." That time will come so sure as "God cannot lie;" and "every creature" has heard, or shall hear, the message of God's love for "the world," and for him or her in particular, either in this life or a future one, whatever men may say or think to the contrary. THE THEOLOGICAL HELL.

The following I cut from a Pittsburg paper on my late visit there:

"The strangest description of hell is that of Heinrich Heine. "Hell," he says, "appeared to me like a great town kitchen with an endless long stove, on which were placed three rows of iron pots, and in these sat the damned and were cooked. In the third row sat the heathen who, like the Jews, could take no part in salvation, and must burn forever. I heard one of the latter, as a square-built, burly devil put fresh coals under his kettle, cry out from his pot: 'Spare me! I was once Socrates, the wisest of mortals. I taught truth and justice, and sacrificed my life for virtue. But the clumsy, stupid devil went on with his work and grumbled, 'O, shut up there! All heathen must burn, and we can't make an exception for the sake of a single man.'"

This description is a tolerably fair one of the popular theory of Christendom. In spirit and principle what worse is it than those theories which maintain that innumerable multitudes of the human family created with an irrepensible desire for endless life and joy, are to be left hopelessly in death, or awaked only to be tormented awhile and then put out of a living existence without ever having had one opportunity to secure an endless life, having died without the means of knowing the only true God and Jesus Christ in consequence of the unavoidable circumstances under which they were born and educated? Men talk of the "justice of God." There is neither justice nor mercy in such theories; to say nothing of the fact, "God is Love." Ed.

"GO FORWARD."

"THE LORD said unto Moses, . . . Speak unto the children of Israel, that they go forward" (Exo. xiv. 15). The Apostle to the Gentiles said, "This one thing I do, forgetting those things which are behind, and reaching forth unto those things which are before, I press toward the mark for the prize of the high calling of God in Christ Jesus" (Phil. iii. 13, 14). Peter says, "Grow in grace, and in the knowledge of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ" (2 Pet. iii. 18).

It is a great pity that some professed Christians seem to be entirely of another mind from the three witnesses above presented. They appear to suppose it is an unpardonable sin to "be wiser today than they were yesterday." They are now infallible and cannot move, even though the Lord and the Apostles call on them to do it; and they denounce those who "go forward" of their fancied perfection in knowledge.

It is somewhat humiliating to confess we have been in error, and some would rather die in it than to humble themselves enough to confess they are not infallible, forgetting that "before honor is humility."

These thoughts have been suggested by the conduct and outcry of some, who, professing to be reformers, seem to suppose that no one must advance beyond the point they have reached, or modify their fancied perfect theory. Happily all are not of their mind, otherwise theology would become a stagnant and putrid pool. The wisest have much yet to learn, which never can be reached without unlearning many things they have supposed to be truth; and he who is ashamed to unlearn, or who refuses to do it, is never likely to rise above a dwarf, and will probably live and die one. Advance is the law of our being, and let all heed the inspired sentiments of the above Scriptures. Ed.

THE STUDY OF THE BIBLE.

BY HENRY DUNN.

CHAPTER XXVII.

On the Study of Unfulfilled Prophecy, as Connected with the Interpretation of Scripture Generally.

IN an admirable essay "On the Nature and Object of Revelation," the late learned Dr. S. R. Maitland thus expresses himself:

"I was going to say," he remarks,—"Let us thankfully take the Word of God, and ransack its stores, let us search it as for hid treasure, and bend every power to find and seize on all that God has condescended to reveal."

"But what a question meets us at the very outset! I see that I must come to it, and, therefore, I may as well state it at first; 'Have I any business to meddle with those parts of the Word of God which relates to the future? or, in other words, which consist of unfulfilled prophecy?' Strange as it may seem, this question has been agitated in the Christian Church, and a great majority seem to have decided it in the negative."

"But here it seems necessary to state distinctly, what is included under the term 'unfulfilled prophecy.'"

Under that designation, then, may be placed:

FIRST. Those portions of the writings of the older Prophets which, although forming part of the inspired messages which were at different periods delivered to the people of Israel by Isaiah, Ezekiel, and others, clearly stretch far beyond the time when they were uttered; which obviously refer to events much further in the future than the return from the Babylonish Captivity; and which are ordinarily supposed to relate to the times of Messiah.

SECONDLY. Such incidental predictions relative to the Second Advent of Christ, or to the appearance of a "Man of Sin," or "Mystery of Iniquity," as are found in the Gospels and Epistles.

THIRDLY. The Apocalypse of St. John.

The first of these,—for the most part relating to Israel,—are ordinarily spiritualized, perhaps we should say vocalized,—by being applied, although in the most vague and general terms, to the Christian Dispensation; which, it is supposed by such interpreters, will terminate with the conversion of the world to the Redeemer, and, in so doing, fulfill the class of prophecies which speak of the lion lying down with the lamb, and of the knowledge of the Lord covering the earth "as the waters cover the sea."

The second, so far as they relate to the coming of Christ, are mostly supposed to find their fulfilment in the death of the Christian, which is regarded as the coming of the Lord to him; while those which refer to the Man of Sin are generally applied to the Church of Rome.

The third—the Apocalypse—is commonly abandoned as unintelligible; admitted, indeed, to be Divinely inspired; admired for its wondrous beauty; loved and honored as a repository of texts capable of varied application; but utterly disregarded as a prophetic record of events destined to take place during the eighteen hundred or two thousand years which are to elapse between the first and second advent of the Lord.

The common excuse for this general neglect of later prophecy, and especially of the Apocalypse, is threefold: first, the supposed impossibility of attaining to anything like a satisfactory assurance as to its meaning; secondly, the confusion incident to schemes of interpretation which, proceeding on no recognized principle, only contradict and neutralize each other; and thirdly, a prevailing opinion that prophecy was never to be understood before its fulfilment; that consequently such investigations, if not forbidden, are at least idle; and that the tendency of prophetic study is to divert the mind from that which is more practical, and, perhaps, more spiritual.

We are far from denying that some reason has been given for these unhappy conclusions; for too many ill-disciplined and imaginative persons have violated all propriety in their treatment of the Apocalypse; clever, but vain men, have sought and found notoriety in ministering, through its pages, to that morbid desire to read the future which so frequently afflicts mankind; and commentators, learned and ignorant alike, have in this, as in too many other instances, increased rather than lessened difficulties, by their ingenious inventions and conflicting conclusions.

To objectors, of all classes, we are content that Dr. Maitland should furnish a reply.

"Knowing" he says, "that all Scripture is given by Inspiration, and that all is profitable for instruction in righteousness, I think we must admit that all ought to be read and studied by him who professes to receive the Scriptures as the Word of God. This, indeed, I find admitted in general terms by most Christians; and I never met with any man, professing to be a disciple of Christ, who would have taken upon himself the responsibility of marking out those parts of the Bible which a Christian should omit to read. But I have met with many, who have so stated the matter, as virtually to negative all the particulars of their general admission.

"The reader has probably met with many persons professing religion, and at the same time openly avowing that they never attempted to understand those prophecies which they consider as unfulfilled—who told him with complacency that they never studied them, and took some credit for their forbearance.

"It is natural that such should desire to dissuade others from that which they avoid themselves; and to this end several maxims have been framed and repeated, till they have become current, and are frequently used by those who would act more honestly if they simply said that they had never attempted to understand a great part of Revealed Truth,—that they considered it a very difficult business,—that they had been so much engaged in other matters, that, far from knowing how much might be learned on such points, they had never once seriously reflected how far it was a matter, either of duty or wisdom, to see whether anything was to be learned or not.

"On some of these maxims I would offer a few remarks, because, when they are uttered with gravity, they are apt to impose on simple readers of the Bible.

I. "We are sometimes told that we ought not to attempt to pry into things which are not revealed. Why, no, to be sure; we ought not to attempt to do anything which common sense pronounces at once to be impossible. If anything is not revealed, I do not understand how we can pry into it, and it is a foolish waste of time to attempt it.

"But will the persons who deliver this maxim undertake to say what is and what is not revealed? Unless they can do this, however magisterially they may affirm the proposition, it is altogether inconsequential; at all events, it does not apply to him who is searching the Scriptures to discover what is revealed; and who is not likely to find—or, if he has common understanding, to seek—what is not revealed in Revelation.

II. "It is urged by those who desire to dissuade from the study of prophecy, that it is not the most important study,—not the most essential,—not the most profitable!

"Suppose we should grant this. Surely, if to ascertain the meaning of prophecies, which the Spirit of God has vouchsafed to give, be not the first and most important duty of man, it is at least as important, and as profitable as many of the pursuits which engage those who use the argument.

"To come to the point, however. Is it true that unfulfilled prophecies are among what may be termed the less profitable subjects for Christian discussion? Do not some of the subjects which are most frequently brought forward, and are considered as of the utmost importance, rest entirely on unfulfilled prophecy? On what ground but what he considers a right interpretation of unfulfilled prophecy, does any preacher venture to tell his hearers that they shall rise from the dead, and that the Son of God shall come to judgment? Yet these truths, resting wholly and entirely on unfulfilled prophecy, are, and ought to be published; and if any man discourages the reader of Scripture from searching what God may have revealed on these points, by telling him that he is not to pry into futurity, not to indulge his curiosity about the fulfilment of unaccomplished prophecy, I venture to say that he does all he can to intercept the light of God's Truth, and to make His Word of none effect,—and he does it at his peril.

"The truth then seems to be, that there are some unfulfilled prophecies which Christians in general find to be profitable: and I would suggest whether, instead of saying that they do not study other prophecies because they are unprofitable, they ought not rather to say, that those prophecies are unprofitable because they do not study them?"

III. "It is often said, 'The prophecies were not intended to make us prophets.' If these words are to be taken quite strictly, they are certainly true; and I do not know that any man ever pretended, that by studying the prophecies, he had obtained the gift of prophecy. If there has been any such person, I believe him to have been sadly mistaken.

"If, however, it is meant that prophecy was not given in order that we might foreknow and predict future events, it is not true. Yet, from a sort of confused mixture of these two ideas, this saying has been supposed to contain much wisdom and some wit, instead of being seen to be either a mere truism, or a barefaced falsehood.

"Let us try the truth of this statement by one or two prophecies, fulfilled and unfulfilled.

"Was the prophecy of the Deluge given only that, after it had been fulfilled, it might be interpreted? or was it given that men might foreknow the Divine purpose? When a Divine Revelation had been given to Noah, in order that he might be, in the true sense of the word, a Prophet, were those who heard him to forbear repeating his words, under pain of being sneered at as 'Prophets?'

"Again, were the prophecies of Messiah's first Advent given only that they might be interpreted by the event? Did not God vouchsafe those prophecies to gratify the curiosity (if it must be so called) of those who waited for the consolation of Israel, and to enable them to foreknow the things belonging to their peace? Were the prophecies which our Lord uttered, only to be interpreted by the event, in order that His own providence might be manifested? or did He mean His disciples to foreknow that they should be beaten in synagogues, and brought before kings and rulers for His sake? Was our Lord's prophecy of false prophets only intended to show His own foreknowledge? Was not the Apocalypse given to Him, 'that He might show unto His servants things that must shortly come to pass?'

'If it be said that many who repeat this false assertion do not mean to refer to such common topics as the Resurrection and the Judgment, but to certain peculiar views, or to certain peculiar notions, I must reply that people should say what they mean; and that, if the prophecies of God were given for our learning, he must be a bold man who undertakes to decide which are worth studying, and which are not. For my own part, I am slow to believe that God has revealed anything to man which it is not worth his utmost pains to learn.'

We add nothing to these admirable words, beyond expressing our firm belief, uttered under a deep sense of responsibility, that "to those who have made their calling and election sure," a right understanding of the purposes of God in regard to the coming kingdom of Christ, is the most important object to which they can direct their attention.

CHAPTER XXVIII.

On a right Understanding of the Dispensation Under which we Live.

We have more than once expressed our conviction that large portions of Scripture can never be rightly understood so long as we neglect to regard them in connection with the particular dispensation, persons, and circumstances to which they are intended to apply.

No other admitted truth is perhaps so generally forgotten.

The prevailing notion seems to be that, "because all Scripture is profitable for instruction," therefore all Scripture, uttered no matter when, or to whom, is immediately applicable to our circumstances. The folly of this notion would be obvious enough if the principle it involves were fairly carried out on all occasions. But this is never done. It is only adopted in relation to exhortations which are repeated in other forms in the New Testament; to Types; and to Prophecies which involve blessings.

The point always taken for granted is, that the present is the last and final dispensation of God's Providence in His Church; that therefore all promises, made when or to whom they may, culminate in our experience; that,—contrary to St. Paul's express teaching (1 Cor. vii. 18),—the converted Jew is to be regarded as a Gentile; that he who is called, "being circumcised," to become as if "uncircumcised;" and that all promises of glory in the latter day are to be enjoyed by the Jew, only by and through his connection with the Gentile Church.

But what if it should appear, on a more accurate examination of Scripture, that, as the Mosaic dispensation was one of special mercy to the Jew, so the present is simply what St. Paul calls it, "the dispensation of grace to the Gentiles" (Eph. iii. 2); and that, beyond this, there yet remains a dispensation, that of "the fulness of times" (Eph. i. 10), to be entered upon by all of us after the resurrection, under which the Jew shall fully inherit the promises made to his fathers, and the heathen become the inheritance of the Redeemer?

It would be out of place here to support such a theory. Nor shall we attempt it. The only lesson we would draw from the possibility of its truth is, that we had better take Scripture just as we find it; and not force it from its original meaning, by applications which can be justified only on a supposition—incapable of being proved—that this dispensation is final and complete.

We are now dealing with the question simply with reference to Interpretation; and in relation thereto we feel bound to maintain, in opposition to the fancies of otherwise admirable expositors, that God's Word should be always understood as it stands; as it must have been understood, if understood at all, by those who listened to it when it was first uttered; as it would be understood now, if it could be read only in the light thrown upon it by the context, and apart from any theories of our own.

To render our meaning as clear as possible, we cannot do better than illustrate what we have said, by reference to a text which is, as we think, frequently perverted in this way. It will at once be seen that the passage in question represents a class.

"O house of Jacob, come ye, and let us walk in the light of the Lord" (Isa. ii. 5).

To interpret, as is commonly done, "house of Jacob" as meaning "the spiritual Israel,"—all that are brought to the God of Jacob, (so Matt. Henry and others);—to apply the text to the Church of Christ,—as if the Prophet, when speaking to the Jews, looked onward to us, and intended that a double application should be given to his words, is,—however excellent the intentions of the expositor, to darken the Word of God; to deprive it of all point and force; and under the delusive idea of thereby giving it a wider and more practical bearing, to strip it of all definite application whatever.

No one, of course, disputes that Christians are called upon, now and evermore, to "walk in the light of the Lord;" but why should they not be urged to do so on the basis of the apostolic exhortation to Gentile converts,—“Ye were sometimes darkness, but now are ye light in the Lord: walk as children of light” (Eph. v. 8)? To impress the lesson, valuable as it is, from the words of the Prophet, is to destroy the meaning of Scripture: to do so from the words of the Apostle is to illustrate it; for the exhortation of Isaiah is addressed exclusively to the Jewish nation, while that of Paul is directed to Gentiles, and so to believers in all ages.

It may be said, that the supposed impropriety of interpreting “house of Jacob” to mean “spiritual Israel,” is a matter of opinion.

If it were so, the objection would have little force. But it is quite otherwise. It is plain, from the verse which immediately follows, that the Prophet is not addressing the spiritual members of the Jewish Commonwealth, but the nation at large, in their national capacity; for he goes on, under the very same title—“house of Jacob” (verse 6), to speak of them as idolatrous and disobedient, and therefore nationally not to be forgiven (verses 8-9).

It also may be urged, that since the verses which precede the one on which we are commenting, and which speak of the nations beating their “swords into ploughshares,” refer to the last days (ver. 2-4), they must belong to the Gentiles; and therefore the fifth verse may, with perfect propriety, be similarly applied.

But such authority have we for saying that what Isaiah tells us he saw “concerning Judah and Jerusalem,” really relates to the Gentiles? that when he says the nations shall flow “to the house of the God of Jacob,” he does not mean any such thing “concerning Judah and Jerusalem?” or that when he declares “that the Law shall go forth out of Zion, and the Word of the Lord from Jerusalem,” he intends the Gentile Church under this dispensation?

We take this one instance, only as a specimen of hundreds of others; for it is no exaggeration to affirm, that hundreds of texts are commonly interpreted in precisely the same way;—that is, without sufficiently regarding the dispensation to which they belong, and, as a rule, with grievous inattention to the circumstances under which they were uttered, and the class to whom they were addressed.

We close by commending a few Scriptural facts to the careful consideration of all diligent readers of the Bible.

(1) Explain it as we may, St. Paul clearly terms this dispensation one of Grace to the Gentiles (Eph. iii. 2); and as plainly speaks of one to come, “the dispensation of the fulness of times” (Eph. i. 10).

(2) The Old Testament Prophets never hint at a dispensation like ours; viz., one under which, for nearly two thousand years, delay should take place as to the visible exaltation of Messiah. With them, the humiliation, and the subsequent glorification of the Redeemer, by the subjection of all men to Himself, always seem to touch each other.

(3) The first Christians, notwithstanding the teachings of their Lord to the contrary, inherited from the Prophets the expectation of the immediate triumph of Christ, and, for some years, lived in almost daily expectation of His Second Advent.

(4) St. Paul tells us that he received, “by special revelation,” the knowledge of a “mystery, which in other ages was not made known unto the sons of men” (Eph. iii. 5); “which was kept secret since the world began” (Rom. xvi. 25, 26); which mystery, there seems every reason to believe, included, in connection with the freedom of Gentile converts from Jewish rites, a communication to the effect that a long delay would take place before the Saviour’s return;—a period during which a “mystery of iniquity” was to prevail, and a Gentile election to be gathered in.

(5) The same Apostle clearly associates the triumph of Christ with the Resurrection. When he quotes Isaiah’s prophecy, “Unto Him every knee shall bow, and every tongue confess” (xlv. 23), he connects it with the day when “every one of us shall give account of himself to God” (Rom. xiv. 11). And again, when he quotes the same Prophet as predicting a period when “the veil that is spread over the face of all nations” shall be removed (Isa. xxv. 8-9), he, like the Prophet, looks for its fulfilment only at the Resurrection,—the period when “Death is swallowed up in victory” (1 Cor. xv. 54).

(6) Peter, contemplating what was, even to him, the strange fact that, after the redemption of the world by Christ, it should still be allowed to go on as it does, explains the mystery only on the principle of its meaning salvation, not condemnation; "seen as Paul had taught," according to the wisdom given unto him, revealing, in his Epistles, some things hard to be understood (even by the Apostles themselves), which the unlearned (or rather, the unteachable) and unstable wrest, as they do the other Scriptures, unto their own destruction" (2 Pet. iii. 15, 16).

From the whole, we draw no conclusion beyond this,—that, for aught we can tell, there may be, nay, that there probably is, a dispensation to come which will explain naturally, and as they stand, those passages of Scripture which we are now so apt to twist and turn in every direction, in the vain hope of making them accord with our preconceived notions: a dispensation which will also explain why many things in the Bible, which to us appear useless—such as the genealogies of tribes and families—have been left on record as portions of that Word, the characteristic of which is, that it "abideth forever."

CHAPTER XXIX.

On the Use and Misuse of Parallel Passages.

THAT great advantage frequently arises from the careful study of what are considered to be parallel texts, will certainly not be disputed by any intelligent reader of Scripture. Sincere and deep is the gratitude every student of Scripture ought to feel to the many excellent men who, at great cost, both of time and labor, have bequeathed to us a mass of references so various, and so valuable as those are, which now enrich the marginal columns of our Bibles.

Yet it cannot be denied that some of these references are misleading; that others seem to be intended rather to guide the reader to a particular view of truth, than to help him to discover the meaning of the Word of God; that others relate to the words rather than to the spirit of the passage to which they are affixed; and that all, even when judiciously selected, do great harm if they lead the reader away from the context, and cause him to rely for light rather on a variety of fragmentary passages, scattered up and down over the passages of Holy Writ, than on the connected reasoning of the Apostle or Evangelist who may be writing. Where caution, in this respect, is neglected or despised, the result must be disastrous; for parallel passages then merely take the form of a very imperfect and disjointed commentary; are, if simply verbal, quite as likely to delude as to enlighten; and, if otherwise, can furnish but a very partial insight into the meaning of any particular text.

The great point to be aimed at, in our endeavors to understand Scripture aright, is to ascertain, first of all, the meaning of the words; then, by very careful observation, the connection in which they stand, and the relation they bear to what has gone before, or comes after; then to consider the circumstances under which they were uttered or written,—the persons to whom they were addressed, and the impressions they obviously left, or were intended to leave, on those who first read them, or actually listened to the living voice of the speaker. If this be done carefully and accurately, the reader will soon become familiar with the spirit as well as the words of Scripture, and will be in little danger of falling into any important error, as to the lessons intended to be imparted by the sacred writer.

The value of a parallel passage is, as a rule, to be measured by the degree in which it possesses a suggestive character. It then serves to stimulate research, and to indicate the direction in which additional light may probably be obtained. For this end, merely verbal references are of little use; but, of course, only on the supposition that, in each case, care is taken to ascertain the sense in which a particular word may, in any given passage, be used; for in Scripture, as in other books, the same word is often used in various senses, and in all such cases the true sense can only be discovered by observing the connection in which it stands.

No reasonable person can doubt for a moment that, in order to ascertain the meaning of particular portions of Scripture,—to see it, so to speak, on all sides,—it is absolutely necessary to keep in mind the tenor of the whole book. We always take this course in interpreting a merely human composition, even though it be but a letter from a friend; and it is equally necessary to follow it in reading an inspired epistle. The character of the writer,—his known sentiments,—what he has said elsewhere,—all go to explain a doubtful passage, when it occurs even in the most familiar correspondence. How much more is it necessary to keep the character and object of God's entire Revelation in mind, when interpreting any part of Scripture!

Had the Jews done this, they would not have fallen into the grievous mistakes they did relative to the Messiahship of the Lord.

"We have heard out of the Law," said they to Jesus, "that Christ abideth forever; and how sayest thou, The Son of Man must be lifted up" (crucified) (John xii. 34)? They were so far right. Isaiah had said so (ix. 7). So had Daniel (vii. 14).

But was that all that either of these Prophets had said about the Redeemer? Certainly not. Isaiah had clearly foretold his sufferings and death (chap. liii.); and Daniel had said distinctly that "after threescore and two weeks, Messiah should be cut off," but "not for Himself."

Here, then, is an instance in which the neglect to notice the entire teaching led into error. In the case both of Isaiah and of Daniel, the two apparently contradictory passages should have been each and equally regarded; both should have been humbly received and carefully pondered; and patience should have found her perfect work in watching and waiting for their full and harmonious accomplishment in God's own time.

So with ourselves. Some persons are greatly stumbled when they read that David, with all his sinfulness, is called, both in the Old Testament and in the New, "a man after God's own heart" (1 Sam. xiii. 14; Acts xiii. 32). A reference to another portion of the same Prophet (1 Sam. ii. 35) relieves the difficulty; for there, referring to David, God is represented as saying, "I will raise me up a faithful priest, who shall do according to that which is in mine heart,"—a passage which at once suggests the primary meaning of the text first quoted—viz., that David, in his public and official conduct, should fulfill the Divine will, and maintain inviolate the laws which God had enjoined.

This, as a rule, he did. In two striking instances, however, he failed to obey—viz., in the cases of Shimei and of Joab. He confesses, on his death-bed, to Solomon, that in these instances he had not acted as he ought to have done as the ruler of the nation; and he leaves these men to be dealt with, so far as it could be done without injustice, by Solomon. Each of them, by a subsequent violation of the law, brought judgment on his own head, and died justly.

Again, in the case of Balaam. Reading merely the account given of him in the Book of Numbers (chap. xxiii. and xxiv.), one might be led to doubt whether he should be regarded as a bad man, or merely as a very imperfect and erring Prophet. But the Apostles deliver us from this difficulty. Peter tells us that covetousness was Balaam's ruin (2 Pet. ii. 15); Jude classes him with Cain and Korah (ver. 11); and John, in the Apocalypse (ver. ii. 14) distinctly marks him out as a type of evil.

These illustrations will suffice to show what is, properly speaking, to be understood by the injunction to compare Scripture with Scripture; and it is in making such comparisons that a well-prepared collection of parallel passages may prove of very great service.

The phrase, "ANALOGY OF FAITH," or, interpreted according to the analogy or rule of faith, implies something more. It means, when rightly understood, that Scripture must be interpreted in harmony with itself—that is, with its entire teaching. Paul implies this when he says that the death of Christ is a fact or doctrine, "according to the Scriptures" (1 Cor. xv. 3, 4); and so again Peter in the Acts, where he speaks of Christ's sufferings as being in harmony with "those things which God before had showed by the mouth of all his Prophets" (Acts iii. 18).

So, among ourselves, if any man expound the doctrine of a free justification without the works of the law, as if it absolved from obligation to holiness, he does so in direct contradiction of the analogy of faith, or, in other words, in defiance of the general spirit and teaching of Scripture.

What we have to guard against is, allowing parallel references to mislead us by false associations,—by merely verbal resemblances,—by guiding us, however unwittingly, into a given line of thought,—by forming a sort of commentary for us; and, under pretence of enabling us to interpret according to the analogy of faith, by keeping us in harmony, not so much with Truth itself, as with what Christians generally suppose to be the spirit of Revelation, as it may happen to be embodied in the particular system of theology which is at any given time popular in religious circles.

THE CURSE LIFTED.

A BIBLE VIEW OF THE PROMISED RESTITUTION.

BY WILLIAM H. SPENCER.

CHAPTER VII.

ONE of the principle features of the work of restitution, as we have already intimated, will be the Restoration of Divine Theocracy. This great truth is revealed in the following prophecy addressed to the Virgin Mary:

"Thou shalt call his name Jesus. He shall be great, and shall be called the Son of the Highest; and the Lord God shall give unto him the throne of his father David; and he shall reign over the house of Jacob forever, and of his kingdom there shall be no end."—Luke i. 31-33.

From these inspired words we are assured that Christ shall be given the throne of his father David; and whereas, David's reign was temporary, Christ, his legitimate heir, shall reign over the house of Jacob forever. I will not now consume space to prove that "the house of Jacob" comprises the gathered and reunited Hebrew people—a fact that must appear self-evident to the unprejudiced Bible student.

One of the most wonderful and striking of all phenomena in human history is the fact of the distinct national identity of the Hebrew people. They have preserved their distinctive peculiarities during all ages of their history, in every climate and under every form of government, notwithstanding the efforts made to merge them with other people. Milman, in his history of the Jews, says: "Refusing still to mingle their blood with any other race of mankind, they dwell in their distinct families and communities, and still maintain the principles of national unity. Jews in the indelible features of the countenance, in mental character, in customs, usages and laws, in language and literature, above all in religion, in the recollections of the past and in the hopes of the future, with ready pliancy they accommodate themselves to every soil, every climate, every gradation of manners and civilization, and every form of government. With inflexible pertinacity they practice their ancient usages, very rarely form matrimonial connections out of their own communion, and observe the fasts and festivals. Denizens everywhere, rarely citizens. Even in the countries in which they have been the longest and most firmly established, they appear, to a certain degree, strangers or sojourners. They dwell apart, although mingling with their neighbors in many of the affairs of life. For common purposes they adopt the language of the country they inhabit; but the Hebrew remains the national tongue in which their holy books are read and their religious services conducted."

It has been variously estimated that they number as many to-day in their scattered state as during any period of their national prosperity. And when we seriously consider the prophetic picture of their future, their remarkable continuance becomes a phenomenon of absorbing interest. In their preservation must be recognized the hand of God for some wise purpose. The absolute unity of this people, and their separate existence for so large a portion of human history, provokes inquiry which mere worldly wisdom is powerless to answer.

But in their present dispersed condition we cannot fail to discover the fulfillment of Balaam's prophecy, uttered about fourteen hundred years before Christ, when he was bidden by Balak to curse Israel. Looking down upon the camp of Israel he said: "How shall I curse whom God hath not cursed, or how shall I defy whom God hath not defied? For from the top of the rock I see him, and from the hills I behold him. Lo!

the people shall dwell alone, and shall not be reckoned among the nations." Wherever the traveler may turn his steps, whatever land he may explore, or under whatever government he may sojourn, he finds more or less of the Hebrew people, presenting, in their humiliation, such a literal fulfilment of the Scriptures that infidelity stands aghast and dumbfounded. The lovely Jewish city, once the central glory of the earth, is a heap of ruins. Its glory has departed, and for long ages has been trodden under foot by Gentile nations.

Most keenly does the Hebrew nation feel their punishment for rebellion against God; and though trampled under the iron heel of persecution for their rigid adherence to their faith and the hopes of their fathers, yet they are not disheartened. Even though the finger of Gentile scorn points them out as the vilest of the vile, they, undismayed, look forward to a coming day of national glory, when the kingdom shall again be restored to Israel. Is this expectation—this hope which has given them such distinctive characteristics—well founded? It has been nursed into their very being, and from a child up they have known their Scriptures, upon whose pages is boldly emblazoned the coming of a triumphant Messiah—the King of Israel. The Apostle Paul earnestly enquired: "Hath God cast away his people? God forbid. God hath not cast away his people whom he foreknew." To self-righteous Gentile eyes they appear to be cast away, but Paul declares that this is untrue. Their city shall not always remain trodden down, nor their land a barren waste. Their bitter humiliation shall not always continue, for Paul declares that "a Deliverer shall come out of Zion;" and this Deliverer is that predicted One to whom shall be given the throne of his father David, and he shall reign over the house of Jacob (gathered and restored to their own land) forever.

Many are those hope-inspiring prophecies which reveal their future restoration, their conversion, exaltation and glory. When "the times of the Gentiles" shall be terminated by the Deliverer's advent, the blindness which hath happened unto them shall disappear like the morning mist, their city cease to be trodden down, but it shall be rebuilt and restored to regal glory as the joy of the whole earth. When Jerusalem shall arise, Phœnix-like, from her debasement, David's throne, long cast down, shall reappear in the restoration of theocracy. Says the prophesying angel to Mary: "The Lord God shall give unto him (Christ) the throne of his father David." This prediction is as certain of accomplishment as God's oath is immutable. Jehovah hath said: "I have made a covenant with my chosen; I have sworn unto David, my servant, Thy seed will I establish forever, and build up thy throne to all generations. . . . My covenant will I not break. . . . His seed shall endure forever. And his throne . . . shall be established forever." Peter on the day of Pentecost, thus discourses on the subject: "God hath sworn with an oath to him (David), that of the fruit of his loins, according to the flesh, he would raise up Christ to sit on his (David's) throne." To confirm Peter's testimony it is only necessary to show that Christ is the only legal heir to David's throne, and consequently the only personage through whom it can be restored and perpetuated as God hath sworn it shall be.

Zedekiah was the last occupant of David's throne. He owed his elevation to the rulership of Israel to Nebuchadnezzar, king of Babylon, who deposed Jehoiakim, a young and wicked king in Jerusalem. Though Zedekiah had taken a solemn oath to rule the kingdom of Israel subject to the king of Babylon, yet as pertaining to God he was his representative in power on earth. While he was God's viceroy, he was also Nebuchadnezzar's king; hence, as God had permitted the king of Babylon to become a supreme earthly ruler, for the chastisement of the wicked kings who had ruled in Jerusalem, to rebel against Nebuchadnezzar was also rebellion against God. When Zedekiah resolved upon violating his solemn oath by rebelling, Jeremiah and Ezekiel, sent of God, admonished him of his position, and one said if he did rebel he should "go to Babylon and die there," while the other declared that he "should never see Babylon." This appeared so contradictory that he concluded they were false prophets, and only emboldened him in his wicked design. He rebelled, and was soon deposed, and then he realized the truth, when, after his sons were slain before him, his own eyes were put out, and he, being "hound in fetters of brass," was "carried to Babylon," and "died there," and as the prophet had said, he literally never saw Babylon. His selfish thirst for power proved his ruin. Occupying God's throne upon earth, He could not seemingly sanction such iniquity in Zedekiah, hence he sends the prophet with the message: "Thou profane and wicked prince of Israel, whose day is come, when iniquity shall have an end, thus saith the Lord God, Remove the diadem, and take off the crown. . . I will overturn, overturn, overturn it, and it shall be no more UNTIL He (Christ) COME, whose right it is, and I will give it him."

Thank God that the long period of Gentile supremacy, between the deposition of Zedekiah and the restoration of the kingdom to Israel, is nearly ended, and He will come whose "right" it is to reign on David's throne while we are assured that Christ was a legitimate heir to David's throne, it could not really become His "right" at His first advent, or at least not till all of the older heirs were dead. But Christ was raised from the dead to an endless life, hence is now the only living heir to the throne, and at the appointed time He will come and claim His "right," and restore again the Kingdom, and with His bride as a royal priesthood—associate rulers—He will reign over the house of Jacob forever. "Of the increase of His government and peace there shall be no end; upon the throne of David and upon His Kingdom, to order and establish it with judgment and with justice, from henceforth (His second advent) even forever." "Behold I will take the children of Israel from among the heathen [the Gentile nations whither they are now scattered] * * * and I will make them one nation upon the mountains of Israel, and one king shall be king unto them all."

The glory of Christ's reign, in the restoration of theocracy, is beyond my feeble powers of description; but in our next chapter we will briefly consider the coming glory. Let us search the Scriptures, for "all Scripture is profitable."

HUMAN REDEMPTION.--No. 9

ON THE WORK OF THE HOLY SPIRIT.

THE first thing that strikes one in examining the testimony of Scripture relative to the work of the Spirit is, the revelation of its twofold manifestation; viz., as POWER, and as LIFE.

We cannot search the Bible with any care without observing that in some cases the heavenly gift is seen simply in the bestowal of Divine power, while in others it is as plainly the gift of a Divine life. In the one case, the action of the Spirit seems to be exclusively on the intellect; in the other, it is as exclusively on the heart, regarded as the seat of the affections. As power, the gift imparted enables the man to do that which otherwise he could not accomplish; as life, it enables him to be what God would have him to be.

Illustrations drawn from the sacred writings will best explain what is meant.

The recipients of the Holy Spirit as POWER may be supposed to include—

(1) Among others, Bezaleel and Aholiab who, were endowed with "wisdom, understanding, and knowledge, in all manner of workmanship, to devise cunning works, to work in gold, and in silver, and in brass," that they might fulfil the will of God in relation to the construction of the tabernacle Exod. xxxi. 2-6; Eldad and Medad and the seventy elders, who were invested with what is termed a "spirit of prophecy," that they might aid Moses in teaching and ruling (Numb. xi. 16, 17, 26); Joshua, filled with "the spirit of wisdom," that he might govern the people (Deut. xxxiv. 9); Cyrus, "anointed" to be a "shepherd" to Israel (Isa. xlv. 1; xlv. 28); and the hundred and twenty in the upper room, endowed with the power of speaking with tongues, that they might be evangelists to the nations.

(2) Moses, and the prophets of the Old Testament; the apostles of the New; and those of their disciples who were invested by them with ability to heal diseases, to work miracles generally, or in any other way to accomplish acts beyond the range of human capacity. The rapture of Ezekiel and of Philip (Ezek. iii. 12-15; Acts viii. 39, 40); the miraculous discipline of the apostolic age; its "rod," as exercised on Elymas and on the Corinthian offenders,—all come under this head.

(3) All persons endowed with the power of predicting future events, whether under the Old or the New Dispensation. And—

All who were inspired to teach men truths which could only be known by immediate revelation; to record conversations or actions, discourses or events, intended for the instruction of future ages; to write history, poems, proverbs, or epistles which should authoritatively guide men through all time; and to expound things which were for some years but partially revealed to the Church generally. Among these may be ranged apostles, evangelists, psalmists, and probably, in degree, the primitive elders or the rulers of the infant Church. For what else were those special gifts which are sometimes called "words of wisdom," "words of knowledge," "prophecy," "discerning of spirits," "divers kinds of tongues," "the interpretation of tongues" (1 Cor. xii. 8-12), but special endowments granted to particular individuals to enable them to perform the precise work they had to do?

Now let it be distinctly noted—for it is of great importance to mark such peculiarities—that in all these cases the Divine gift is simply power—power bestowed for a certain time, and with a definite object; that it is never given or used for the individual benefit of the recipient; and that it contains in itself no moral or spiritual element whatever. In apostolic estimation, all these gifts are counted as nothing compared with love (1 Cor. xiii 1).

That their possessors were generally partakers also of the higher and more spiritual donation is certain. But this is by no means universally the case. Of the moral and religious character of such men as Bezaleel we know nothing; Cyrus was a heathen; Samson, though a judge in Israel, was a semi-barbarian, and can scarcely be regarded as a spiritual man; Balaam was a type of evil; Judas probably worked miracles; and a human, if not a sinful, element seems sometimes to have blended with inspired songs, such as that of Deborah and some of the Psalms. Everywhere we are taught that the possession of a Divine power, whether it be to build, to govern, to fight, predict, to teach, to heal, to work miracles, or to speak with tongues, is not, in itself, proof of a renewed heart, or of necessity moral and spiritual in its nature.

The second form in which the work of the Holy Spirit is revealed to us is that of LIFE—Divine life, implanted in the soul of the individual man, and productive, in various degrees, of moral and spiritual blessing.

Yet here also a twofold operation is plainly revealed.

Our Lord himself has drawn the distinction to which we advert. The "Comforter," without whose blessed presence believers would be as "orphans," and the world at large friendless, comes, we are told, to convict some, and to renew others; perhaps we might say, without blame, to renew the few, and to convict the many; to make the one class, even now, "partakers of the Divine nature," and to prepare the rest for that future, whatever may be its character, in which their eternal destiny will be adjudged.

That in many cases conviction is but the prelude of conversion, and that in others it is the first step in the regeneration of the entire nature, cannot be doubted. But it is not always so. The world at large—in accordance with the promise of the Saviour—is now by the Comforter or Monitor convinced "of sin, of righteousness, and of judgment to come;" but large portions of it are, in no sense whatever, submitted to the Redeemer. Christendom, in centuries long past, was as a whole convinced from heathenism to the worship of God, the living and the true; but comparatively few were renewed in the spirit of their minds.

The higher gift belongs only to the believer. It is seen when the early Jewish churches, walking "in the fear of the Lord and in the comfort of the Holy Ghost, were multiplied" (Acts ix. 31); when they consisted of men upon whom was "great grace;" men whose religious history was distinguished by joy, and the character of whose life was everywhere manifested in praise and thanksgiving.

It is seen, too, in those Gentile fellowships of whom it could be said, "Ye have received the Spirit of adoption;" "The Spirit beareth witness with our spirit that we are the children of God; and if children, then heirs, of God, and joint-heirs with Christ" (Rom. viii. 15—17). It is seen in all of whom it can be affirmed, "The anointing which ye have received of him abided in you, and ye need not that any man teach you" (1 John ii. 27); "Ye have an unction from the Holy One, and ye know all things,"—i. e., all things which "pertain unto life and godliness" (comp. 1 John iii. 20 with 2 Pet. i. 3). It is seen in all who, in every age, bring forth "the fruits of the Spirit, which are love, joy, and peace in the Holy Ghost" (Gal. v. 22); for such we are told, have, as the result, not as the cause of their faith, been "sealed" for God. "In whom also, after that ye believed, ye were sealed with that Holy Spirit of promise, which is the earnest of our inheritance until the redemption of the purchased possession" (Eph. i. 13, 14).

It is itself the life-giving water that Christ promised, when in Jerusalem, "on the last great day of the feast, He stood and cried, if any man thirst, let him come unto Me, and drink." "The water that I shall give him shall be in him a well of water springing up unto everlasting life" (John vii. 37, 38; iv. 14).

The "Holy Spirit," in Scripture, is always either divine power given to man for a special end, and therefore temporary in duration,—without any necessary connection with moral or spiritual excellence,—and not intended for the individual benefit of the recipient; or it is divine LIFE, which is purely moral and spiritual, and intended for the benefit of the individual to whom it is given; in its lower forms convincing of sin, righteousness, and Judgment, and in its higher forms renewing the entire nature, and ending in everlasting life.

The one form (that of conviction) is for the world; the other is for the Church. The first is, as we believe, the commencement of a work, intended to be carried on in other worlds, and to find a completion either in the gradual approximation of the man to whom it is given towards the Divine likeness, or in his utter and irreparable ruin; the second is privilege, granted to those who, "chosen from the foundation of the world," are, in an emphatic sense, the "sons of God."

Beyond these forms, Scripture reveals no work of the Spirit of which we have a right to speak, or on which we ought to rely. And, with few exceptions, all Christians are agreed that it is only as Divine life that the gift of the Holy Ghost is permanent, or in any intelligible sense promised to ourselves.

But while this is admitted in words, it is commonly denied in fact. It has been thus denied ever since the dark shadow of the coming apostasy first fell upon the early Church. From that hour the Divine "counsel" on this, as on almost every other matter, has been "darkened," and the word of God too often dealt with "deceitfully."

The forms of error relating to the work of the Holy Spirit thus generated, have been many and dangerous.

(1.) Losing sight of the distinction, always preserved in Scripture, between the gift of the Holy Ghost as power and as life—regarding the action of the Spirit as being alike on the intellect and on the heart, men soon came to believe that while purifying, it was "a light playing on the irrational faculties, and clearing mental perplexities,—a secret energy, through which every organ discharges its functions aright." It was under the influence of this delusion that the creeds were developed, that doctrine was drawn from doctrine, that liturgies were collected, and that Gentile customs were adopted. It is under this same delusion that the Pope and Cardinals to this day invoke the Holy Spirit on all their transactions.

(2.) The Protestant Reformation, while it changed the direction, and somewhat modified the character of the error in question, was far from eradicating it. That great event simply transferred the supposed Divine light, first from the Church Catholic, regarded as a unity, to the various branches which, by their separation, bore testimony against the errors of Rome; then to the diverse fellowship which soon after separated from the original seceders; and finally to every individual Christian who, to this day, each for himself, devoutly believes that in answer to his supplications, he amid all the diversities of theological opinion, certainly attains to those views which are best for him, and, as he thinks, which are most in accordance with the will of God.

(3.) The most common form of delusion, however, is that which supposes that the Holy Spirit, in some special manner, accompanies and gives effect to sacred oratory; that He co-operates with animal excitements, exaggerated appeals, and inflated eloquence; that He gives power to all the various devices—borrowed, although unconsciously, from Rome—by which men, with the best intentions, and under influence of the purest motives, are ever seeking to awaken and alarm the thoughtless through the influence of the imagination, and by action on the nervous system.

Into the "Natural History" of these extravagances, or the sources of the delusion which connects them with a Divine blessing, and regards them as more or less endorsed by the Holy Spirit, I cannot here enter; but I may be permitted to observe that they will never vanish until texts are interpreted more soberly than they are at present, and their bearing controlled by the context; until this dispensation is viewed in its true character, as one marked rather by selection than by universality; until the age to come is connected with the age that is; and the distinction drawn in Scripture between the glorified Church and the "nations of the saved" (Rev. xxi. 24) is fully and fairly recognized.

Then will it be seen that Christ is indeed the Redeemer of the world; that mankind form a community, common participants in the miseries of the fall, and therefore common sharers in the blessings of the recovery; that Satan's apparent triumph is unreal and but temporary; that Divine love is wider and deeper than we are apt to imagine; that "all things" are working together for good to them that love God; that Christ, raised from the dead, is not only in this age, but also in the age which is to come, head over all things for the exaltation of the Church (Ephes. i. 22); that they who love Him are not "strangers and foreigners," as were the men of other nations in Jerusalem, and as in the age to come will those be who are not of the Church, but "fellow citizens with the saints, and of the household of God" (Eph. ii. 18, 19); that what we know not now we shall know hereafter.

Then, and not till then, shall we learn to separate the superhuman process by which God calls and trains His elect, from the great principles on which He governs the world; to be thankful for a light which, however dim, clears up many dark and painful mysteries; and to rejoice in a hope which relieves the sadness of the renewed heart when crushed by the thought of abounding sin and sorrow, holding out the blessed prospect in a future age of a ransomed world, dwelling under the righteous rule of its lawful and loving Saviour.

But this can never be so long as we persist in maintaining that the conviction of the world by "the Comforter" is but aggravated condemnation,—that God has no blessing for an Esau, and can show no favor to any man short of absolute union with Himself.

A proud heart and a lofty mountain are never fruitful.—George Eliot.

REMARKS ON ACTS III. 19,—21.

"Repent ye, therefore, and be converted, that your sins may be blotted out, when the times of refreshing shall come from the presence of the Lord; and he shall send Jesus Christ, which before was preached unto you; whom the heaven must receive until the times of restitution of all things, which God hath spoken by the mouth of all the holy prophets since the world began."

We will give the passage as rendered by two men of critical discernment, American and English. The American translation, by H. T. Anderson, reads thus: "Repent, therefore, and turn, in order that your sins may be blotted out, so that seasons of refreshing may come from the presence of the Lord, and that he may send Jesus Christ, who was destined for you; whom heaven must retain, till the time for restoring all things that God hath spoken by the mouth of his holy prophets of ancient times." A more recent translation, by a scholar of our own country, J. B. Rotherham, is as follows: "Repent ye, therefore, and turn about! for the erasing of your sins; to the end that, in that case, there may come seasons of refreshing from the Lord's face, and he may send forth the One who had been previously appointed for you—Christ Jesus; whom, indeed, it behooves heaven to welcome until times of promised establishment of all things of which God spake through the mouth of his holy prophets from antiquity." So far as translations can help us; we now have the mind of the Spirit fairly before us.

A brief statement may simplify the matter. The ancient prophets have not painted that eternal state which, in the city of God, follows the judgment of the great white throne. We have the conviction that a single glimpse into the supreme reality is not to be discovered in their writings. But they have portrayed in fadeless coloring the times of restitution, a period of accomplishment and restitution, an age of latter-day glory, a dispensation in which there will be refreshing from the presence of the Lord. That which gives the passage force and significance is the fact that the refreshing and restitution cannot begin until the Lord is sent back to us from heaven. The heavens retain him until the predestined period. He cometh in his kingdom; he inaugurates the age of glory, and leads in by his own shining hand the times of recovery and freedom for nature and society.

The ordinary world-dream (we might add, the ordinary Church-dream) is of some natural development,—religion, philosophy, science and commerce, all hand in hand leading us onward to the threshold of a golden age. Knowing what we do of the history of the world and of the Church, of the impulses and movements of modern society, and especially of the invariable strain of divine teaching, we are filled with amazement over the distempered dream.

There is not a single passage to be found in prophet or apostle which promises advancement either for the assembly of God or general humanity separate from the advent of Jesus the Lord. All things languish and darken, waiting for the supernatural impulses of that creative epoch. The natural development is tending, beyond controversy, to ghastly fear or presumptuous defiance, in superstition or atheism; to violence, confusion, and anarchy; to darkness, wretchedness, and despair.

The reconstructive power, the rescue of creation, can only descend from heaven and from God, and it cometh in the glorious appearing of the great God our Saviour.

It may be interesting to quote a few of the promises, that we may have before us the things which distinguish the period:

"And it shall come to pass in the last days that the mountain of the Lord's house shall be established in the top of the mountains, and shall be exalted above the hills, and all nations shall flow unto it. And many people shall go and say, Come ye, and let us go up to the mountain of the Lord, to the house of the God of Jacob; and he will teach us of his ways, and we will walk in his paths; for out of Zion shall go forth the law, and the word of the Lord from Jerusalem. And he shall judge among the nations, and shall rebuke many people, and they shall beat their swords into ploughshares, and their spears into pruning hooks, nation shall not lift up sword against nation, neither shall they learn war any more." (Isa. ii. 2-4.) "Behold the days come, saith the Lord, that I will raise unto David a righteous Branch, and a King shall reign and prosper, and shall execute judgment and justice in the earth. In his days Judah shall be saved, and Israel shall dwell safely; and this is his name whereby he shall be called, THE LORD OUR RIGHTEOUSNESS." (Jer. xxiii. 5, 6.) "O thou afflicted, tossed with tempest, and not comforted, behold I will lay thy stones with fair colors, and lay thy foundations with sapphires. And I will make thy windows of agates, and thy gates of carbuncles, and all thy borders of pleasant stones. And all thy children shall be taught of the Lord, and great shall be the peace of thy children. In righteousness shalt thou be established; thou shalt be far from oppression: for thou shalt not fear: and from terror, for it shall not come near thee." (Isa. liv. 11-14.)

We have no space for further quotation, but one thing behooves to be stated: There is a loose habit prevailing of quoting passages from ancient prophets, regardless of context, as if the glories of promise might come in some human age, as the growth of humanity under culture and moral influences. But all the passages, when examined, either distinctly declare, or manifestly involve, the presence of the King. He is to reign in Mount Zion gloriously before his ancestors; the sun confounded, and moon ashamed: all the lights eclipsed in his exceeding splendor. It is the glorious Lord who is to us a place of broad rivers and streams, where the placid waters are never disturbed by din of war. To see his face is the sovereign reality. The waving forest may be grand, and the rivers may run like molten silver over golden gravel, but the consecration from earth to sky, and all the prevalent glories get their charm from the open face of him who is altogether lovely. He breathes the divine tranquility, and seals the perpetual assurance. The comparison and collation of all the passages in ancient prophets would give us particulars of the following order:

I. The resurrection of the righteous dead—that uprising from the dust which has its roots in moral elevation and holiness before God. The body of the Lord shines forth in immortal beauty and is invested with sovereign power.

II. The ancient people of mystery and miracle, delivered from the glooms and sins of ages, are settled in their own land, never more to be driven out from the presence of the Lord.

III. The existence of a great kingdom of justice, filling all spaces under the heavens, from sea to sea, from the river to the ends of the earth.

IV. The spiritual education of nations, under the wings of Israel, the people flocking to the place of central manifestation for the teaching which purges away superstition, and for the worship which gives life, fulness and scope by divine manifestation.

V. The utter abolition of war, the forces and passions which minister to the horrors of the battle-field being either charmed into rest by love or held in restraint under the iron compression of power.

But we cannot specify all the particulars: those we have named, and all cognate realities, wait for the revelation of the Lord, and depend upon his manifested presence.

The careful consideration of ancient Hebrew documents, always in connection with the Christian revelation, will help, among thoughtful people, to dispel the almost inveterate delusion of some kingdom above the skies, or transportation of the holy into a remote foreign locality.

There is a place where the mystery of moral evil has come into dire manifestation; where incarnate love has been sublimely revealed; where prophets, saints, and martyrs have lived, and loved, and labored, and died: where God's own Son has hallowed the soil by his tears and redeeming blood. Now the place which has been the battle-field of Good and Evil shall witness the final triumph of truth and righteousness, that all the ends of the earth may see the salvation of God. When we see apostles judging the twelve tribes of Israel in the regeneration: when we find men, according to advancement in life divine, bearing rule over ten cities or five; when we hear great voices, like meeting waters, saying, "The kingdoms of this world have become the kingdom of our Lord and of his Christ, and he shall reign for ever," we shall understand more clearly the folly of that transportation theory, which has been reigning or floating so long, and always with pernicious results.

We are sure even now that it has no cords of life association, no roots in reality, and no power in it to nourish the higher forms of godliness.

CRITICISM.

Isaiah lxvi. 24: "Their worm shall not die" (quoted also in the Gospels). How hopeless seems the task of upsetting a popular delusion, especially when that delusion has the sanction of the pulpit! "But surely," says one, "a delusion which for long centuries is sustained for good and pious ends, must have a value in it; independently of the fact that it is not as a delusion that its aid is invoked, but as a momentous truth." Very well, then let us by all means get at the truth, once and for ever, and ascertain where we stand in the matter of this "undying worm" which has found its way into ten thousand monitory appeals and descriptive odes. It is a very terrible statement, this prophetic warning. Let us not lose the benefit of it by misconception.

Now, there cannot be the smallest doubt that "Skolees," the earth-worm, whenever used in a poetic sense, either in sacred or profane writings, stands as the invariable emblem of corruption and death. On the very front and forehead of the thing therefore it looks suspicious when just one instance of its use is selected and made to stand for the antagonistic condition of an ever vitalized consciousness; nay, more, for the central nerve of mental activity, for the very fountain of exquisite sensation: when pictorial imagery which to any unsophisticated mind can exhibit the victims only as lying under an irrevocable sentence of extinction, is tortured into a metaphor of unending life. And this perversity acquires a more and more damaging, it might almost be said, criminal, aspect, when it is seen to be engaged in the support of an unscriptural premise. But, alas! how long we are in making the discovery! All-conquering custom still leads us captive; we bow without thought to the cumulative wisdom which has hitherto suffocated us, until at last the oracles of the grove are devoutly supposed to be ratified by the very voice which gives them the lie.

Were it possible to doubt the real character of the metaphor now under discussion, some excuse might be allowed for an accidental variation. "A serpent's tooth" fastened to the living flesh might indeed well represent the pangs of remorse, but what carcass on which the earth-worm feeds can ever be supposed cognizant of its touch? Let any reader just turn to the various passages recited in a Concordance under the word worm, and he will be satisfied. The Old and New Testaments and the Apocrypha all tell the same tale. These may suffice, though many other illustrations occur besides those discoverable under the English heading "worm." Here, of course, it would be possible to enlarge on many other kindred misconceptions fostered by those who advocate the eternity of evil men and things; all of them being capable of lucid adjustment in the light of that glorious revelation of life and immortality, of which the RAINBOW, among serials, is the most powerful, consistent, and fearless advocate. But the long-standing despotism which the above metaphor has exercised among preachers and hearers seemed to single it out as a fraud of so mischievous a character that it could not be too severely condemned. John iii. 8: "The wind bloweth where it listeth," etc. . . . "So is every one that is born of the Spirit." As the method adopted in this pregnant discourse is to show that like produces like, that whatever are the attributes of the parent such also are the attributes of the offspring, that nature can never rise above her own level, and that spirit alone can generate spirit, the question must often have arisen, Why should not the two key-words "flesh" and "spirit" retain their respective powers throughout the argument? Why should we take upon ourselves to alter one of them, viz., "spirit," into "wind" just in one instance, and immediately afterwards allow it to resume its prior form? As we ordinarily read the eighth verse, the attributes of the wind are understood to resemble, not the attributes of the Spirit, nor the attributes of the Spirit's offspring, but they are supposed to resemble the offspring itself, whatsoever this may mean. Is there not some confusion here? The passage is confessedly difficult. Let us beware of enhancing its difficulty by conjectural treatment. A modern divine of advanced maturity has given us his opinion that this is one of the most difficult of all. In such cases it becomes exceedingly hazardous for us to attempt elucidation by chopping and changing the translation. By all means let the uniformity of the original tongue tell its own tale; and if we cannot even then resolve the doubt, how should an ignorant South Sea Islander, for example, understand an ambiguous passage in the Bible which we may have translated for him, when he finds in that passage two different senses in the compass of a single verse, and has no resource but to take them on our authority? If, therefore, we are resolved to begin verse 8 with "the wind," is there any reason why we should not conclude the verse with "the wind," and say, "The wind bloweth where it listeth," etc., . . . "so is every one that is born of the wind?" What acceptance would such a rendering receive from the majority of Bible readers? Mr. Govett, of Norwich, seems to entertain some such view, and in his treatment of the verse speaks of being "born of water and of the wind." But the difficulty always recurs: Are we right in departing at all from the term Spirit? It is true that in the Old Testament the original word, both in Hebrew and Greek, frequently stands for wind as well as Spirit, though this can hardly be said of the New Testament, where the writers both of the Gospels, of the Acts, and of the Epistles, in their narrative allusions to the wind, always adopt other words, not excepting the illustrious case of the Pentecostal wind. But not to lay a more than legitimate stress on this latter fact, do we not seem to stand in need of a most patent and intelligible reason for varying the translation of a word which rings as a key-note in the very heart of a closely compacted argument like that before us? Well, a reason has been adduced from the Syriac text. In that language, as in Hebrew and Greek, the word for Spirit [Rucho] is also capable of being used for wind; and it has been urged that the verbs in the passage before us, as also the pronominal affix to the noun "being in the feminine, the application of "Rucho" to the Holy Spirit seems to have been contemplated. That version, therefore, reads as follows: "The wind bloweth where she willeth, and thou hearest her voice, but canst not tell whence she cometh and whither she goeth. So is every one born of the Spirit." (See "The Syriac Churches, and translation of the four Gospels from the Peschito," by J. W. Etheridge). Let those who understand the Peschito make the best of this argument founded on the feminine form. Possibly it may serve to show that this view of the matter is traceable from a very early date; but as the Greek original makes no such sign, and must ever remain our rock of refuge in all controversial cases, we need never live in much fear of error when we abstain from breaking up uniformity.

Lastly, it is worthy of remark that the word required to express the mere inarticulate noise of the wind would (so we might expect at least) have been "Echos," whence our English word echo; whereas "phone," the word actually used would in any other position be understood as an intelligent voice. The two words occur side by side in Heb. vii. 10: "The sound of a trumpet and the voice of words." These facts being premised, will any of our readers "show cause" why the Greek original should not be taken simply as we find it, and read as follows: "The Spirit breatheth where he willeth, and thou hearest his voice, but thou doest not perceive whence he cometh and whither he goeth?"

Get at the root of things. The gold mines of Scripture are not in the top soil, you must open a shaft; the precious diamonds of experience are not picked up in the roadway, their secret places are far down. Get down into the vitality, the solidity, and veracity, the divinity, of the Word of God, and seek to possess with it the inward work of the Spirit,

MISREPRESENTATION OR MISAPPREHENSION.

OPPOSITIONS are very apt to do one or other of these things. That so able and intelligent a Christian as the Prebendary of Cork—HENRY CONSTABLE—should have done so in noticing the writings of HENRY DUNN is, certainly, most unaccountable. That some of our opposers in this country should do so is not strange. Prejudice and stereotyped theories have blinded their minds and perverted their judgments.

That the readers of the BIBLE EXAMINER may see how Mr. DUNN has been misrepresented by even the excellent and learned HENRY CONSTABLE, I give the following article, which appeared in the "Rainbow" four years ago; and it need not be wondered at that we who are promulgating substantially the same views as Mr. DUNN are in like manner assailed and misunderstood or misrepresented.

ED.

DESTRUCTION OR EXTENDED RESTORATION.

To the Rev. Henry Constable, A. M., Prebendary of Cork:

DEAR SIR: As you have thought it worth while to review at some length, in the pages of the Rainbow, "the view of man's destiny in the future world as it is represented in the publications of Mr. Henry Dunn," I may, perhaps, be permitted through the same medium to offer a few remarks on some very grave, although doubtless, unintentional misrepresentations which are to be found in the article referred to.

Not once or twice only, but thirty-one times, and in every variety of form, is the statement reiterated that "according to Mr. Dunn," there is to be a "restoration in hell of vast numbers to the image of God;" that "hell will be, in his view, the great field on which the harvest of the human race will be reaped;" that the soul in Hades "is being prepared to benefit by the more efficacious process to be undergone in hell;" that "hell is the true theatre of hope;" that "hell is clothed in bright colors for its inhabitants;" that "these men will not be put to any trial that will distress them;" that "the way from hell will be a broad and easy way;" and such like.

Yet, strange to say, this language is never used by me, nor can a single line from anything that I have written, be produced in its support. Listen to my own words, "Hell is the final lot of the irreclaimably wicked—a judgment directly inflicted by the hand of God. It has no grade-tions, for how can anything like degree be associated with an everlasting punishment, first represented as being cast into a 'lake of fire,' and then explained to be 'the second death.'"

A further injustice is committed in the following paragraph—"He" (Mr. Dunn), "relies upon the Jewish popular notion, taught and cherished by the Talmud, that a Jew could not be lost." Allow me to say that Mr. Dunn does nothing of the kind. His words are, "It is clear enough that the Jews, whether right or wrong in so doing, regarded themselves as a saved people, and as such heirs to all the promises embodied in the discourses of the prophets. The popular notion was that a Jew could not be lost, and recent investigations into the Talmud have shown that the modern doctrine of eternal punishment was unknown to them." You admit this yourself, saying, "Mr. Dunn has most faithfully represented the popular view."

Under what an extraordinary misapprehension then must the following paragraphs have been written:

"We see that there were two different interpretations given to the promises made to Israel. One of these interpretations was that they were made to every natural descendant of Abraham; the other that they were made only to such as inherited Abraham's faith and obedience. The Jews in general, the Talmud, and Mr. Dunn, have adopted the first of these; the old prophets, Christ, and his apostles took the second. . . The proud boast that they were as mere natural born Jews, 'the temple of the Lord,' that unpopular prophet Jeremiah pronounced to be 'lying words,' and for his unpopular kind of language he got himself thrust into a dungeon. When the Pharisee and the Sadducee came to John for baptism, probably expecting some compliment for their condescension, the rough preacher struck a rough blow at their favorite idea—'Think not to say within yourselves, we have Abraham to our father;' and for those and the like rough words he lost his head. . . Called upon to choose between these opposing authorities, we have no hesitation in following the latter, and we would, in all earnestness, recommend Mr. Dunn to do the same."

Singular council this to give to a man whose own words are "The apprehension that 'the kingdom' was not to be theirs simply as Israelites broke upon the Jewish people slowly—John had indicated what was coming when he received the Scribes and Pharisees with the unwelcome command, 'Bring forth fruits meet for repentance: and think not to say within yourselves, we have Abraham to our father; for I say unto you that God is able of these stones to raise up children unto Abraham.* And again, "Nationally, the rejection of Christ was a deliberate refusal to accept Messiah whom God had sent to reign over them; and it involved national ruin, utter and irremediable. Individually—that is to those who had heard the words, and witnessed the miracles of Jesus, who had 'seen and hated' the Son of God—it was equivalent to hating goodness. By such it was a 'counting of themselves unworthy of eternal life.' Of such the Lord Himself says, 'He that believeth not is condemned already, because he hath not believed in the name of the only begotten Son of God.'"

What then becomes of the assertion, "He (Mr. Dunn) says in effect, to all who listen to his words: 'You may be as wicked as the men of Sodom; as stiff-necked as the Israelites of Jeremiah's day; as iniquitous as the generation which filled up the measure of their fathers by crucifying Christ; as ungodly as the men of the last day on whom the Son of man shall come as a thief in the night. If you are, you shall certainly suffer retribution, your iniquities shall be visited on your head, yet only in the very same way that believers shall suffer retribution after they too have appeared at the judgment seat. (p. 65). But you are not to suppose that you have lost the opportunity of repentance. Far from it. This future time of pain shall be to you the blessed period during which you shall, with scarce the possibility of failure, and and with little or no effort on your part, make sure of that kingdom of glory and joy which is yours by the oath of the covenant of God.' Is this, or is it not, an encouragement to sin?"

I reply, it is without doubt, and much more. The statement is itself a sin. It is the sin of attributing to a man sentiments which he utterly abominates—statements which are the very reverse of what he has made. It is the sin of substituting for an author's own words the wayward inferences of an opponent. It is the sin which is committed by the many who insist that since the Prebendary of Cork denies the immortality of the soul, and holds that it will be destroyed, he is no better than a French materialist; for they too believe that men die like the beasts and are annihilated.

A still greater wrong, however, if it be possible, is inflicted a little further on. The following are your exact words:

"From this future of hell, as regards a very considerable number of mankind, we gather Mr. Dunn's exact views of the effect of redemption.

We are at a loss, indeed, to know in what way redemption, according to him, was effected; for he is of opinion not only that the glorious prospects of the world could have been brought about without the death of Christ, but that it ought to have been effected without the Redeemer's humiliation, rejection, and crucifixion (p. 19): but he does believe in redemption through Christ; and as Christ was really put to death by the Jews, he thinks that his death had something to say to it." (p. 142-3).

Let us then turn to these very pages, and see what is actually said. It is this:

"In Scripture it is the death of Christ, not the manner of it, that is always associated with human salvation. It is the shed blood (for 'the blood is the life') that purifies; not, however, like the prophet's 'nitre and much soap' (Jer. ii. 22), but by making us one with Christ in his death. In this sense it is the blood that redeems (Eph. i. 7; 1 Pet. i. 19; Rev. v. 9); that nourishes the soul (John vi. 54); that secures pardon (Heb. ix. 22); that gives access to God (Heb. x. 19; ix. 12); that cleanses (1 John i. 7; Rev. i. 5); that purges from sin (Heb. ix. 14); and that fits for service (1 Pet. i. 2). In it we have communion with the Lord (1 Cor. x. 16). By it we are brought nigh (Eph. ii. 13); and through it we are justified (Rom. v. 9; iii. 25). And again: 'Christ fulfills his work by dying that we might live; by becoming in death a propitiation for our sins; and by opening through his blood a way into the holiest for all who believe. Christ was emphatically a sin-bearer; he bare our sins in his own body on the tree.' *"

By what strange alchemy these words can be transformed into "As Christ was really put to death by the Jews," he (Mr. Dunn) thinks, "that his (the Lord's) death had something to say to it," may well pass the comprehension of all but persons who are familiar with theological controversy.

On minor matters, it is undesirable to say any thing beyond observing that the silence complained of regarding the fallen angels, in the statement "Of devils, he (Mr. Dunn) has not said a word," arises only from the absence of any reference in Scripture to their redemption. Nowhere are we taught that the future of impenitent men "is inextricably mixed up with that of the fallen angels." These apostate spirits are not, to me, what my brothers and sisters of mankind are. John wept much when no man was found worthy to open and to read the mystic book of the apocalyptic vision. This was human. The tenderness that thus expressed itself was neither weak nor blameworthy; it was the piety of the child of God. He could not be content till he knew more of the destinies of his race, because the Father of that race would not allow him to be content.

* "K gdom of God." (p. 21).

* Kingdom of God. (pp. 62, 63, 65, 142, 143, etc.)

If the same interest in his fellow creatures has led Mr. Dunn for many years to search diligently and with microscopic eye the Scriptures of truth, in order to discover what is there written (however dimly), regarding the future of humanity, let him be forgiven for not having abandoned the sure word of God, in order to indulge in speculations about the fallen angels.

The following passage will, perhaps, best explain the principle on which he has proceeded:

"In relation to the method of investigation pursued, let it be observed, we have strictly confined ourselves to Scripture testimony. We have not discussed the supposed reasonableness of any particular view. We have not attempted to weaken the force of the words 'eternal,' or 'everlasting.' We have not asked what is most in accordance with our senses of right. We have not imagined it possible for man to be more merciful than his Maker; for well do we know that, if we have either piety or benevolence, he gives it us, and the fountain is surely higher than the stream. We have simply enquired as to what is scriptural. We acknowledge no other authority. Only let us be satisfied that any given doctrine is revealed there, and we bow; for we believe in the Bible as a divine revelation, and have no sympathy whatever with those who would judge such a message from God by human consciousness, or measure it by any supposed spiritual intuitions of their own."^{*}

In pursuing his enquiries as to what is revealed regarding the final lot of man, the author of the "Destiny of the Human Race" has never desired to be regarded in any other character than that of a student of Scripture. He shrinks from dogmatism on a subject which is obviously, and for wise ends, left in holy obscurity. Not, therefore, to be neglected, but to be examined with peculiar reverence and tenderness; all conclusions relating thereto being tested by the general spirit of Scripture and by the instincts of the renewed heart—that "unction of the Holy One" which is at once light and love.

The anger that is excited in the minds of so many good people by the re-investigation of any doctrine that has been long and generally accepted, must be borne with. It is the inevitable consequence of unaccustomed light being presented to unprepared eyes. In this primary stage, if people perceive at all what is set before them, it is almost always in exaggerated and distorted forms. They behold "men as trees walking." Time alone will enable them to see truly; and not till they see truly will they feel charitably towards those who differ from them. Patience, meekness, quietness, and humility, are therefore essential to progress. The formation of a party in furtherance of a particular view may seem at first sight to be very desirable. But it is never so in what we term the long run. Party stereotypes thought, and hinders, instead of helping on any truth, that to be received aright, must be held in the spirit rather than in the letter.

For friendly words that forbid the supposition of intentional wrong, due acknowledgement is cheerfully rendered. You, Sir, express the kind wish that Mr. Dunn "may be led to re-consider his position;" that he "may one day see the whole truth" (the italics are not mine); that "the mists which now surround his mental vision may disperse." "Such a man," you say "we would gladly hail with us in our great controversy," Utinam noster esset!^{1*}

The very book condemned is said to be "a remarkable volume," and its author is credited with "undoubted talent," and much "depth of thought."

Mr. Dunn sincerely regrets that he cannot hold out in return any prospect that the invitation given is likely to be accepted. Thirty years ago he held as tenaciously as yourself to what is now known as the doctrine of annihilation, the literal destruction, soul and body in hell, of all who are not here renewed in the spirit of their minds. Prolonged study of Scripture and frequent meditation led him to the conclusion that this dreary and desolate belief found only a partial support in the Bible; that the final ruin of the race was inconsistent with the language of the New Testament; that while Christ has always had in the world an elect church consisting of few rather than of many, the gospel is everywhere said to be not only a provision of mercy intended for "the many," but that it will actually be a great advantage to such: that one day Christ will "destroy the works of the devil," and God will be all in all.

You say, "Mr. Dunn has for us no distinct positive doctrine. He unsettles faith, but does not build where he throws down." This is a serious charge, but I venture to think it is altogether an unfounded one. It would be easy to show that the hope of a large restoration is anything but a negative doctrine, did space permit. That, however, cannot be done here.

* That is, "would that he were on our side.—ED. of EXR.

I beg to remain, dear Sir,

Yours faithfully,

HENRY DUNN.

THE PROGRESSIVE AGE.

By ELDER J. PARRY.

THE world moves; few things remain as they were fifty years ago. Knowledge increases in almost every department. Vice makes rapid strides; so does science.

The long hidden secrets of nature are being developed day by day. Truth and falsehood, fiction and faith, are all striving for the ascendancy. Superstition and infidelity are on the war path: all the world is on tiptoe, looking, longing, expecting, hoping, fearing, for what may next transpire to astonish the universe.

To stand still, and have no new ideas in this age is to be fossilated! Amidst all this progress in good and evil, is religion alone to stagnate? Are old ideas and superstitions, that have stood the shock of ages, still to remain stationary? Our churches mean to have it so, if they can. They would establish the laws of the Medes and Persians. Priestcraft sets down its iron foot, and cries with authority, "Hitherto shalt thou come and no farther." Can they trust the rising tide? Vain and futile is the effort.

A chosen few, here and there, are breaking through the trammels of tradition, education, and bigotry, and dare to throw away their sectarian glasses and study the Word of God with their own eyes. What have they discovered that fills the heart with love to God, and joy and hope in the future? 1. That man is mortal, and can only gain immortality by faith in Christ, who is the resurrection and the life. 2. That death, and not endless torture, is the penalty of sin. 3. That "God is love," and "retaineth not his anger forever, because he delighteth in mercy." 4. That the earth renewed, restored, is to be the eternal home and paradise of the saints, who will reign with Christ in his kingdom, yet to come under the whole heavens; not above them, as tradition teaches. 5. That Israel restored to Palestine, and the left of the nations, after the Advent of Christ, will be the subjects of the kingdom, and enjoy the reign of Christ and his saints during the thousand years, in a state of probation. 6. That the next age will be the general resurrection of the dead; small and great, from sea and land; the heathen, children, idiots, and the whole human family, are all to stand before the great white throne: the judgment of the great day of God Almighty and the Lamb.

The next great question to come up, before this generation, is,—what is to become of this great multitude which no man can number? Are they all to be tormented forever in hell-fire, as orthodoxy teaches? Are they all to be destroyed and perish forever, as some of our Advent brethren teach? Or will there be a probation for those who have never heard the good news of the gospel during the present life? This subject must come up, if God's Word can throw any light upon it. Don't let us be afraid of it. "Buy the truth—sell it not."

If Christ is to have the pre-eminence in all things, why not in numbers of the saved? "He shall see of the travail of his soul, and be satisfied." What will satisfy him? This is the question. Let it come, and God speed the truth. Amen.

NOTE BY THE EDITOR.—The foregoing was sent to the Publishers of "The Restitution," and returned with a note saying, "We cannot publish this article now; have not yet concluded when to open the columns of the Restitution to the Fair Chance theory again. When we do we shall be pleased to publish it." Elder Parry therefore, sent it to the BIBLE EXAMINER, whose "columns," I trust, will never be other than "open" for the defense of the character and government of God.

ON CREEDS.

WHAT do you believe? This is one of the first questions put to any one desirous of uniting to any of the various sects of the present day—a question necessary and wise in its place, but one capable of being answered in many ways; variety of circumstances producing variety of replies. The position taken by non-Roman Catholic bodies being generally a simple one, in order to obtain a satisfactory answer—namely, all answers should be based upon the position, that nothing should be required to be believed of any man for which no certain warranty of Holy Scripture can be given. Yet, despite this, how numerous the divergences, how manifold the discrepancies, between the conflicting creeds of the present day: all profess to be His disciples, to obey His word, yet are in discord one with the other. How much this discord does influence, and has influenced, the world in its career of disbelief and folly is well worthy the thoughtful contemplation of the student of the Word. The more so, when we remember the Lord's Prayer, wherein he says, "That they may be one as thou Father, art in me, and I in thee, that they also may be one in us." Mark the result desired, "that the world may believe that thou hast sent me."

It is, however, my desire to direct attention, not to carry out its fulness, to the proper scriptural method of examination of all creed and professions of faith, made by person, persons, or sects. One of the most prevalent portions of all creeds is, "I believe in God." But simple as the utterance of the words are, easy as its declaration may be, is this expression of a belief in a God understood by the many who make it? As a form of words, it may be the rest on which the believer in Him may lean, after he has found Him through much struggling and weariness of heart, much despondency and chastisement of spirit. But, on the other hand, it may only be the dry bones of the theorist, divested of any life-bearing or fruit-producing results in himself. This is well exemplified in the Scriptures, "Thou believest that there is one God; thou doest well: the devils also believe and tremble." But of the believer something more is required than a trembling belief of the kind spoken of by the Apostle. The one springs from fear, the other should spring from love. How is the difference to be known? "If a man say, I love God,"—and love of God must proceed from, or, if you prefer it precede, belief in Him,—"and hateth his brother, he is a liar, for he that loveth not his brother whom he hath seen, how can he love God whom he hath not seen?" "He that dwelleth in love, dwelleth in God, and God in him." Very much to the point is the reasoning of the apostle,—love of God is shown by love to or of man,—love resting in the belief that God is love,—that His tender mercies are over all his works. Believing in Him, we are to be imitators of Him, who exerciseth loving kindness, judgment, and righteousness in the earth. One can understand the value of a belief which carries with it the life as shown in the words and examples seen in the Scriptures. How, after seeking for the Lord, struggling after Him—finding that he is not far from any one of us—the seeker cries out—"I believe in Him"—verifying the words of the Psalmist, "He satisfieth the longing soul, and filleth the hungry soul with goodness. Such as sit in darkness and in the shadow of death, bound in affliction and iron." Whether the words express belief in God or in Christ,—in the kingdom or immortality—it is well and wise to see that the delight in the law of God is after the inward man; that the circumcision is that of the heart, in the spirit, not in the letter,—for the letter killeth, and the spirit giveth life, and so be able to rise into the liberty (not license) of the Lord, the Spirit.

And, let it be well noted, that the churches we read about in the Acts and the Epistles were creedless churches. There was no creed, but great life. Organization is well in its place; but organization now there is much of creed and little life. With life is far superior.

If the Lord hath made us free, then are we free indeed. H. BRITAIN.

REAPING IN JOY.

There is an hour of hallowed peace
For those with care oppressed;
When sighs and sorrowing tears shall cease
And all be hushed to rest.
'Tis then the soul is freed from fears
And doubts that here annoy;
Then, they that oft had sown in tears
Shall reap again in joy.

There is an hour of sweet repose
When storms assail no more;
The stream of endless pleasure flows
On that celestial shore.
There purity with love appears
And bliss without alloy;
There they that oft had sown in tears
Shall reap eternal joy.

Correspondence.

An Interesting Communication.

FROM N. H. PALMER TO ELD. BLAIN

TO J. BLAIN, Dear Sir: Will you pardon a stranger for asking your attention to the following? I trust you will, for I received a package directed to me at Spring Place, Ga., containing the January issue of the "BIBLE EXAMINER," with some small tracts, post marked, Buffalo, N. Y., having your name in the margin. Accepting them as from an unknown friend, I will write you freely in relation to some of my own notions in regard to the matters discussed in these documents.

But first, a word explanatory of my religious relations and personal condition. I have been over thirty years connected with the M. E. Church South; over twenty years engaged preaching; much of the time as Itinerant. Now I am broken in health and constitution—incapable of labor, without means, and a family of six, very dependent—out of a situation; the primary cause, prejudice of opinion.

My opinions are usually formed upon independent reflection; hence, largely free from bigotry and intense sectarianism. I have tried earnestly to understand the Bible in its general bearings, and always seek such aids as I find available.

I am often led to ignore Orthodoxy and enter the field of free thought. But I have been greatly trammelled; the masses down here are ignorant, bigoted, and sectarian; and any material difference of opinion works great prejudice to one among themselves; hence, silence has been prudence, and my thoughts take shape without help or sympathizers.

The leading subjects discussed in these papers sent me and other related subjects, have long engaged my mind; and my conclusions have at times alarmed me, and been held long in abeyance. Again, I have had no medium of making my views public; and know, too, that want of education and mental training prevents breadth of view.

With slight modifications my views on Election are in harmony with those of the Tract on Election.

I believe that Jesus will return and receive his kingdom, and his saints with Him, at the end of the present age, now near its end. I believe the saints will be His teachers and rulers in His kingdom in the ages to come; and that the nations of the earth, natural men, in the natural body, will form one class of His subjects to be ruled and trained in civil, moral, and religious culture, to virtue and salvation; or, if impracticable, to be destroyed. The idea of repentance and pardon available to human salvation after the resurrection of the body is a new one to me: a surprise!

But I can give it a candid consideration. I have long believed the religious sense in multitudes is only in abeyance—is not wanting; and that their rejection of religion is qualified, and is no rejection at all; they have little light, or their religious sense is obscured, modified, not active.

I am partial to the following views on the resurrection: Believers are quickened by the Spirit: after the event of natural death, they "sleep:" a condition of life, unconscious it may be. As quickened, they progress to birth—a resurrection. Birth is the entrance to life; otherwise conditioned and conscious. Thus quickened and born of the Spirit they enter the kingdom of God.

These are the saints. Unspiritual men, not having the Spirit, are not quickened—not born of the Spirit; do not enter the kingdom of God—explain kingdom as you may. Such subjects will be raised as natural, physical beings, and by physical power. (not by the spirit of holiness), and under the laws and conditions of natural men, subject to the natural economy; as, for example, the ruler's daughter and the widow's son at Nain.

If God will to give such the offer of life, when raised again, it does not strike me as inconsistent with revealed truths. I have rejected the theory of endless torment (torture) in hell, and adopted that of final destruction for rejectors of Christ, extinction. I have no sympathy with the assumption that men have immortal souls that enter a sky kingdom at death.

I believe that evil, the curse, introduced by sin, will have an end; there will be restitution of all things: when, how? belongs to God.

I lean to the opinion that, ultimately, after the physical and aërial changes foretold of earth shall transpire, that the physical race of man will be perpetuated on earth, continue to develop, rise from the natural (not depraved—depravity cured) to the spiritual; in which condition they will not be controlled by natural laws and physical conditions, but be supernatural. It is the spiritual or supernatural, that now explains miracles.

These scattering hints about myself must suffice. I love knowledge and seek for truth for truths' sake, but am almost cut off from the land of the living. Had I means I would read your publications with great pleasure; but must be content without it. "What shall we eat, or wherewithal be clothed" is with us a material question; and I must go out and seek a situation and business.

Permit me to say, that, as I view it, the state of religion in this country is deplorable, if not hopeless; but not so viewed by the people.

Tilton, Ga., May, 1874.

On the reception of the foregoing letter, by me, I immediately wrote friend Palmer and sent him the EXAMINER with various other works, to which he has responded as follows.—EDITOR OF EXAMINER.

TILTON, GA., June 1, 1874.

BRO. STORRS: Your kind favor to me of May 28rd. is received; also the documents named; all of which are accepted by me as an affecting evidence of your Christian sympathy and love, and a most valuable and cherished acquisition.

I indulge the hope that my heart will ever appreciate such favor and cherish an affection for the donor.

While making active preparations to move (tomorrow), I have had time only to glance at the contents of these documents; but I feel already that a flood of light has broken in upon my darkness and that I have obtained great furtherance in my search after truth.

I know not what Providence directed Elder J. Blain to send me a small package of your publications; but they were as bread to a hungry soul; and little did I anticipate so rich a repast when my heart prompted a free expression of some of my views in response.

May God bless you and multiply a thousand-fold the fruit of your work of faith and labor of love, according to his riches in grace through Jesus the LIFE-GIVER.

Some six years ago I had a distinct conviction that the Scriptures of truth had never yet had a just and full interpretation nor exemplification by the Church. This imparted a new impulse to my mind; but I have little time and poor means for investigation. The heart too, you know, experiences a "home-sickness" in the abandonment of cherished opinions, even when truth is the prize.

The way was long—arduous; I have taken lately more than a year to examine "the Advent" views, but find that while they have unearthed several important truths, long obscured by traditions, they failed to give the desired satisfaction. Have I at last attained it? We must pause for the reply. As one who has been long wandering in the pathless mountains, weary, discouraged as to his liberation, suddenly emerging, views the plain stretching to the distant horizon, is perplexed and is afraid to venture into such a vast contiguity of space, so I deem it prudent to pause; take the bearings; acquaint myself with the landmarks, and so hope to proceed safely from a new departure.

Pardon me for so far trespassing on your valuable time. You have compelled me; and if God will, you may hear from me again.

I am in my 58th year, with infirm constitution and broken health.

Yours, in the hope of the Gospel. My address for a time, is

N. H. PALMER,
Cedar Ridge, Whitfield Co., Ga.

FROM POLLY G. PITTS.

BRO. STORRS: I take my pen to let you and God's children know that my heart is fixed, trusting in God. I have experienced much in the four weeks past, and the choicest of heaven's blessings have been mine. How much I have felt of that peace that passeth all understanding. O how much I have felt of the love of God, the love that draws me to the blessed Redeemer; and it has enabled me to say, "Here, Lord, I am, do with me as seemeth to Thee good. My life and its usefulness is Thine; and may my right hand forget her cunning, and my tongue cleave to the roof of my mouth, if I prefer anything before the Word of God for a rule of faith and practice. I know that light is sown for the righteous, and gladness for the upright in heart; but in the midst of all these blessings, our heart is made sad: sad to think that even in the professing world there is such a conflict come, and coming, between truth and error; and may God keep us watchful and prayerful in the great conflict, and help us to feel how much more blessed to stand for the truth, even if we stand alone, than to stand with a professing multitude in an awful error.

When contemplating the spirit of supreme selfishness that I find in the world, among those making high profession; I ask myself this question, What made the papal Church persecute the meek and lowly followers of Jesus? The answer is right before me. She made to herself an infallible head; one that could not err! Therefore, every one that did not believe the interpretation that she gave of the Word of God, was a heretic. O may God preserve us from such a spirit, and from such an error, and enable us to keep all of his commandments; receive the whole testimony of Jesus into good and honest hearts, and bring forth fruit an hundred fold, to His honor and glory. Let us remember that, "though we speak with the tongue of men and of angels, and have not charity, (or love, for that is it), we are become as sounding brass, or a tinkling cymbal. And though I have the gift of prophecy, and understand all mysteries, and all knowledge, and though I have all faith, so that I could remove mountains, and have not love, I am nothing. And though I give all my goods to feed the poor, and though I give my body to be burned and have not love, it profiteth me nothing." etc.

O, may God forgive us for our narrow views, and give us the love of Jesus, that we may love every creature as He loved them. May God open our understanding, to understand the last prayer of our Divine Master, that we may see and feel that that prayer will be answered, and the world will believe, and will know that the great love of God sent Jesus into the world, that they might have life, and believe. Let us ask ourselves this question, How can they believe on him of whom they have not heard? May God give us wisdom to get the answer from his word, knowing that faith comes by hearing; and hearing by the word of God: and he that cometh to God must believe that He is, and that He is a rewarder of them that diligently seek Him. The Word of God declares that in Christ was life, and the life was the light of men; and that He was the true light that lighteth every man that cometh into the world. Bless the Lord, Thy Word is truth; then every one that coming into the world now, every hour, shall have the light of life; yes, and all those that have died without the knowledge of that light; for every man that cometh into the world is a broad saying; yes, as broad as we could ask our God to give; yes, bless His Holy name. Justice and judgment are the habitation of His throne. O, who would not worship such a God in Spirit and in truth! when I look at the provision God has made for the life of the world, and then look at our narrow contracted views of it, I am sad. O, how many great and glorious promises, and prophecies, that were confirmed with an oath of God, are rejected, or are laid aside as useless lumber!

I prize the BIBLE EXAMINER highly; it is an unspeakable profit to me, and I prize it next to my Bible; and I bless God for raising up so many good, honest, and unselfish men to bring out the plain truths of that blessed Book. I like the table talk at the "Hillstead House," in the last number. I feel with Lenny, that there is much fog on many things, and especially on theology. Again, like Lenny, I can say, it may be dangerous to take one's intuitions as oracles to be depended on; but when certain things are proclaimed by the pulpit as revealed declarations against which moral consciousness protests, as utterly at variance with the essential character of an infinitely perfect Being, I do not think that the feeling is either sinful or rebellious. And, like her, I am satisfied, by a careful personal examination of the Scriptures, that they contain no doctrine, whatever, but such as commends itself to the understanding of the wise and the loving heart. Like Arnold I can say, "Eternal life only in Christ is certainly a glorious doctrine, the very soul of the Christian revelation; and I feel under great obligation to the good and fearless men who have risked all to bring the priceless doctrine to the light of day. I would cheer their hearts, and strengthen their hands amidst their numberless difficulties, if I had power to do it. They shall have my prayers.

I could mention much more of the good saying, in the EXAMINER that have cheered my heart, but will forbear this time. May God bless the BIBLE EXAMINER; and send it as a blast against every wall that is daubed with untempered mortar; a light on God's Word to those that are in the dark; a comfort and a helper, under God, to many; may its cheering letters be like a social meeting where all God's loving children can speak their minds untrammelled. May God give heavenly wisdom, strength, and health to its conductors, and its readers; and may they be enabled to indite good matter. May God help us to take unto us the whole armor of His providing; may our loins be girt about with truth, our lights burning, and we like unto men that look for their Lord.

Your sister, in the Lord.

Fredricksburg, Iowa, June, 1874.

FROM ELD. H. ROCKWELL.

BRO. STORRS: Through the never failing love of God I still live; and although the darkness of sin and death are deeply enstamped on all things earthly, I am yet looking forward in peaceful anticipation for the further and more glorious developments of truths that have not yet been set forth by very much preaching so as to be clearly and distinctly understood by the mass of men now living; much less to the millions who have lived and died without having ever heard of "The only true God and Jesus Christ."

Yes, my brother, while the lamp of this present life burns dimly, I wait to see its last flickering rays to become extinct, like the wick of the candle when it ceases to burn; by which, my precious mother taught me, a long time ago, to understand the fickleness of life. In consequence of the weight of years, and decaying faculties, together with continued ill health, I cannot communicate my thoughts as clearly as I desire.

By the study of my Bible and looking at the way in which the Lord has led me, in the path of my brief stay in this life, I become more fully confirmed that the fulness of God's love for our world is not all exhausted. Unless I am greatly mistaken, His work of blessing the race will not stop at the close of this age or dispensation. I believe that God lives, and will live to unfold His grand designs of goodness to mankind.

I would inquire, not for disputation, but that I may know the truth. Many of our friends affirm, when Christ comes again the work of God is finished, so that all things will be left stationary. If so, would it not appear superfluous to have kings and priests when there are none to rule over nor to instruct? In order that there should be a government of righteousness and peace, there must be subjects and dominion.

Again, let me inquire, If there is nothing to be done for the benefit of men in the ages to come, what becomes of those who never heard the message of mercy? O, you say, "They lived and died in ignorance; let them go, they are not worth saving." Do not be too fast! "Not worth saving," do you say? But why? You reply, "They were a poor, degraded set of creatures, that lived like brutes, fit only to perish." But they were men made by the same God and of the materials; and perhaps some of them were nearly allied to you; but if not, what are you? are you "worth saving?" What have you to commend you to the favorable notice of the Lord? Have you anything more than was given you? Perhaps you will reply, "I was born in a Christian country among a civilized people." Were you indeed! more is the pity, then, that a more Christ-like spirit did not flow from your heart. If none of whom we speak are worth saving, then what avails this great outlay of men and means for missions in heathen lands? Why not let them go out of life, as millions before them have gone? Ah, friends, let us lay our hand upon our mouth and our mouth in the dust, and cry, "Unclean; God be merciful to me a sinner."

"Where no law is, there is no transgression;" and if no transgression there is no condemnation. But you say, "They were a law to themselves." If so, could that law save them? for, "By the works of the law shall no flesh be justified." If God's ancient people could not be saved by law; and if Christ is the end of that law for righteousness, by giving us the law of faith; then if we are saved by grace through faith, let us fear lest any of us, not only seem to come short of it, but actually fail of it; for without faith it is impossible to please God. If righteousness can come by the law then Christ died in vain.

O, how immensely higher are God's ways than our ways! Well might the Psalmist exclaim, "How wonderful are Thy ways, and Thy thoughts past finding out!" Praise the Lord, O my soul; and all that is within me bless His holy name. Amen. Love to all that love life.

Woodstock Valley, Conn., May, 1874.

FROM RANDOLPH E. LADD.

BRO. STORRS: I have just arisen from "sitting at your feet," having completed the reading of the June EXAMINER, and I can no longer hesitate about what is my duty to do, for my own sake, for your comfort and satisfaction, and for the honor and glory of the blessed God, and our Saviour and LIFE-GIVER.

I must, and most cheerfully do, range myself in defence of the most glorious, God-honoring, soul-comforting doctrine that it has pleased God to reveal to man. I will not say that I am fully settled in mind upon many points, but am certain that the truth, in all its completeness, "lays in this direction." The few and feeble attempts which are made to invalidate and destroy your positions are so manifestly, to my mind, false and wrong that it appears like a pigmy's attempt to overthrow a pyramid. "I do not wonder that you pass them in silence; it is the best refutation they can have.

And now my good "teacher," as I have committed myself to the belief of this "New Heavenly glory," I feel it necessary that I should give practical evidence of it, and so I begin by inclosing herewith $5: to pay for my next year's Vol. 82; and for the benefit of some worthy inquiring brothers one copy each, if you can afford to furnish it a year for $1.50; and if not, to go as far as it will. I will leave it for you to select the recipients, as you know them.

But this is not all. Your call for money to replenish the tract fund affects me. I feel that we must do more for the spread of the Glad Tidings than we have been doing. I am burning with desire to inaugurate a more systematic and efficient effort for scattering the light, just as I did in 1844, when you was just emerging from the false system of natural immortality and the dreadful dogma of eternal torment, which had well nigh proved fatal to me. I do not think there was another one in New England that did so much to scatter every where your "SIX SERMONS." So now, my soul longs to push these blessed truths in every direction.

My plan is simple, and I pray that it may be adopted, or a better one devised.

I am not rich, but have a competence, with God's blessing, to last me until the Master comes.

I know of several brethren who hold these views that can easily place $100 against every $10 that I can spare. My proposal is this: I will head a fund for $100 with $10; to be paid as soon as all is pledged, to be reported monthly in the EXAMINER, if not objected to by you. I will start a fund of $100, with $10, every month for 12 months, if responded to by brethren and if by any means the amount can be advantageously employed in scattering the light, and you, dear brother, are not overtasked in the work. Shall this come before the readers of the EXAMINER and find only a feeble and sickly response?

Dear brethren, associates and joyous partakers of a common faith,—what do you say? Let the August EXAMINER record the pledges of from $100 to $500. Let us be in earnest; our time is short; the duty is pressing; it is the King's business and requires haste.

Springfield, Mass., June 5th, 1874.

JAMES M. YOUNG writes: I have removed from Mich. to Kenesaw, Neb., and hope this may prove a better field for labor. I have a love for truth and an unbounded confidence in the undertakings of my heavenly King. The earth is the Lord's and the fulness thereof. I am located on what was once called the "Great American Desert." The country is beautiful, and the land is rich; so, in the things of my Lord, what once looked as desert will yet blossom as the very Paradise of God. Hallelujah to God and the Lamb. The once desert, as it was thought, covered with blossoms, and the rough Rocky Mountains filled with silver and gold. The balmy winds waving the grass and flowers: the telegraph poles and wires, and loaded cars, causes the antelope to stand on an eminence and wonder; while the savage Indian exclaims, "white man's God move a heap fast every way, heap."

THE BIBLE EXAMINER.—I will supply volume 17 in sheets (perfect sets) on the receipt of sixty cents. Also, odd numbers of that volume (or broken sets) for one cent for each two copies, which is simply to pay the postage. Who will scatter them?

☞ In no case will the Editor be responsible for the sentiments of Correspondents.

The Bible Examiner.

One number more closes the present volume. There are a few subscribers who have not yet paid anything on it; others have paid only $1. Both of these classes will cease to receive this Magazine, at the close of the volume, unless I have a communication from them, immediately, requesting its continuance. Such has long been my practice in conducting periodicals under my charge. I never send Bills or "duns" for arrearages: the paper or magazine is discontinued when the subscriber has become indebted for one half or the whole of a volume and says nothing of intention to remit more. I desire the continuance of all names on our list; but without pay I cannot in justice to myself and paying subscribers and donors continue the non-paying ones. These remarks have no reference to those known to me as unable to pay. It is sent cheerfully to such without expecting any pecuniary compensation.

Those who intend to continue their subscriptions will do us a great favor to remit immediately, or inform me when and how much they intend to aid this Magazine. This is important to success in the work before us.

Those who intend to help by donations are also requested to inform me how much can be relied on from them during the next volume. The amount will not be made public, and will be known only to the donor and myself, unless by request of the giver. Our friends have done nobly heretofore in sustaining the EXAMINER and its EDITOR: but those who know the expense of living in this city would doubtless think strange how a small family, even, could live on what has been received by us. One word explains the mystery, viz., "Economy." We have lived, however, and have incurred no debts. For this our hearts are filled with unfeigned gratitude to God, the Giver of every good and perfect gift; also to those kind friends who have not forgotten us in our old age and isolated circumstances.

Shall the BIBLE EXAMINER still alive and go on in its work?

To encourage old subscribers to pay up,—who have not yet remitted anything on the present volume,—if they will send $3, immediately, I will credit them in full to the end of the next volume.

New subscribers shall receive the whole of the present volume for $1.10, if applied for soon: or, for $2 I will send them the present volume and the following one.

At the close of the present volume it is intended to put up, in plain binding, all the numbers, with an INDEX to the subjects. This volume will be sold at $2.25; the 25 cents being for postage when sent by mail: if taken at my office, $2 only. Those who wish this volume, thus bound, will please give me notice early, that I may know how many to bind, as I can supply but a limited number; and those who send first will be supplied.

The Editor's Post Office Address.

"One Mediator between God and men, the man Christ Jesus, who gave himself a ransom for all, to be testified in due time."—1 TIM. II. 5, 6.

VOL. XVIII.

NEW YORK, AUGUST, 1874.

No. 11.

WHO WILL LIVE AGAIN FROM THE DEAD?

SOME affirm that, "No one of Adam's race will ever be revived from the dead except those who have formed a spiritual union with Christ, by faith, in this present life, or prior to death." Of necessity this view excludes from a future life all adults who never heard of Christ, however unavoidable their ignorance, and all those who die in infancy, or prior to a capacity to exercise faith.

Is such a theory true? I once thought it was, and know on what basis it stands. It is the result of a misunderstanding of the character and government of God, brought into life by the absurd idea, almost universal in Christendom, that the entire race will have a resurrection from the dead; but the unregenerate only to suffer a hopeless punishment, with no possibility of mercy ever being extended to any of them. Such an idea was so revolting to the sense of an enlightened and kind heart, that many were led to another theory less so, and far more honorable to the CREATOR and his government. It gave relief from the horrible idea of a useless and hopeless torture of helpless creatures in the world to come.

The theory was sustained by many plausible explanations of Scripture; but it never did and never can make harmony of the Bible as a whole, nor vindicate the government of a CREATOR, infinite in wisdom, knowledge, power, justice and love. To suppose such a BEING should of his own will bring into existence such a race as the human family, and profess love to them all so great as to give His only begotten Son for "the world," and that Son gave "himself a ransom for all"—"tasted death for every man"—and yet only a very few ever to have any knowledge of these facts, or any benefit from them, because of unavoidable circumstances, over which most of the race never had any control, and were no more accountable for them than for their birth into this world:—I say, to suppose such a system of administration could exist by the will of a CREATOR, possessed of the perfections above named, is a tax on credulity too great long to be submitted to; nor can it be accounted for that any should continue involved in such a theory, except the fact that men having moved from a previous revolting theory, and feeling a rest in the new idea, and having, as they think, defended their present theory against the attacks of opposers, they settle down in the thought that no improvement can go beyond their standpoint.

Such a thought is an unfortunate one, because it assumes an infallibility that precludes a growth in knowledge, and must result in a sectarian spirit, which destroys true Christian fellowship, and prevents a maturity in knowledge, grace, and love, so important to meekness for the kingdom of God, or to constitute them "joint-heirs with Christ" to that kingly inheritance.

The advocates of the resurrection of only a few, or, as they call it, "No Life out of Christ," make John vi. one of their strongholds; perhaps it ought to be said, their strongest in defence of their position. On this chapter they insist on a very literal understanding of the language in certain verses, and insist that because Jesus says, of the believer, "I will raise him up at the last day," all others are excluded from any revival into life, for any purpose whatever. Their argument on that chapter has passed with themselves as unanswered and unanswerable; but a critical examination of the chapter, as a whole, will most likely shake the confidence of those who earnestly desire truth for the truth's sake, and who do not wish to sustain a theory at all hazards.

This chapter opens with a description of Jesus' compassion on a "great multitude" who came to hear his teaching, and because of His healing the "diseased." He fed this multitude by a miracle that astonished his own disciples. The multitude, when they had seen the miracle that Jesus had done, said, "This is of a truth that prophet that should come into the world;" and it seems they were disposed to "take him by force, to make him a king," but Jesus seeing this, "departed again into a mountain himself alone." This fact disproves an oft repeated assertion, that Jesus would have had the throne of David at his first advent if the Jews had received him. No, He refuses to accept it at that advent, for the plain reason, the prophetic time had not arrived for that event, and it was not his Father's will to give it to him till He had first made "his soul an offering for sin" (Isa. liii. 10).

During the dark night which followed Jesus' retreat to the mountain alone, He came to his disciples walking on a boisterous sea. The people who had seen the miracle of the multitudes fed, sought for him in vain on this side the sea, took shipping and went over to Capernaum seeking him; and when they had found him the conversation took place, so much relied on to prove that only believers who have a spiritual union with Christ will ever be raised from the dead. Almost at the first of that interview Jesus said, "The bread of God is he which cometh down from heaven, and giveth life to the world". . . "I am the bread of life" (verses 33, 35).

Here is a broad assertion of life to all men; not to a few only: which few are to have life in a "special" sense; for "The living God is the Saviour of all men, specialy of those that believe" (1 Tim. iv. 10). Here is the same distinction that Jesus makes in John vi. He says, "I came down from Heaven, not to do mine own will, but the will of him that sent me" (ver. 38).

The next two verses express a truth which has been only in part understood. It is not to be supposed they are mere tautology. The first great truth is thus expressed, "This is the Father's will which hath sent me, that of all which he hath given me I should lose nothing, but should raise it up again (en) in the last day." Who has the Father given to Christ? Answer: "Thou hast given Him power over all flesh" (John xvii. 2). "Jesus Christ gave himself a ransom for all"—"tasted death for every man," and "hath abolished death;" hence death cannot hold a soul of man by any binding power in itself; and so far as death came by Adam it is annulled by Christ; and this is the Father's will, that Christ should "destroy" that "death," so that no man is lost by or in consequence of it. In this sense, Christ had given him by his Father the entire race; and by that death He will not lose a single one of them; but will "raise it (the race) up again in the last day." "This He tells us, "is the Father's will." Thus briefly is stated the Father's will concerning the race, or "all men," for whom "Christ gave himself a ransom."

"To suppose that our Lord, in John vi., taught the doctrine that none would ever have a revival from death except such as had formed a spiritual union with him previous to dying, is to say He contradicts his own statement in the preceding chapter, where he says, "All that are in the graves shall hear his voice and come forth," etc. To teach, in the very next discourse, that only a few shall "come forth" sets his consistency in a light not very favorable; for, He not only would contradict himself, but contradict the testimony of God by the prophet Hosea, which reads, "I will ransom them from the power of the grave (sheol): I will redeem them from death: O death, I will be thy plagues; O grave, I will be thy destruction: repentance shall be hid from mine eyes" (xiii. 14). Nor will Christ's work ever have anything like a completion till He has "destroyed" this "last enemy—death" (1 Cor. xv. 26), which came into the world by the sin of "one man," Adam; and it will be destroyed by "one man," Christ. Thus will the serpent's head be bruised, or "the works of the devil be destroyed." This salvation from the death by Adam is universal; and is that embraced in the apostle's declaration that the "living God is the Saviour of all men." But there is a special salvation. This is something more or far greater than a mere living again from the dead. Of this greater salvation our Lord speaks in the next verse (John vi. 40)

After making the statement, just considered, in verse 39, He says: "And this is the will of Him that sent Me, that every one that seeth the Son, and believeth on Him, may have everlasting life; and I will raise him up at the last day." That this verse refers to a "special" class and a special salvation none need to doubt. 1. They are believers on "the Son;" consequently are those to whom he was preached; and has nothing to do with those of the race who were deprived of that knowledge. 2. They are raised up to "everlasting life"—made immortal, and "cannot die any more." This is a "special" salvation.

The previous verse presents Christ, by "the Father's will," as "the Saviour of all men:" this verse presents Him, by the same will, as a "special Saviour" of those who "see the Son, and believe on Him." The difference in the two verses is marked and palpable. Verse 39 teaches the deliverance of all men from the death to which they were subjected by the act of another, and not by their own sins. The 40th verse teaches, such as have seen or do see the Son and believe on Him will have a permanent or everlasting life by their resurrection; while verse 39 gives no such assurance to the mass of the raised ones; but their final destiny is to be decided after they "see the Son." If then they believe on Him, they live on and have access to the tree of life (Rev. xxii. 2) and live forever, as Adam would have done if he had had continued access to that tree (Gen. iii. 23).

"Are they to be converted, or be led to believe by sight?" some will inquire. I answer—Yes: why not? Were none ever converted by sight? Did any of the apostles believe in Jesus without seeing him? Nay, did they not all refuse to believe in his resurrection till they had seen him? And poor Thomas was determined he would not believe unless he could not only see Him but thrust his hand into his side, and put his finger into the wounds in his hands. This unbelieving disciple had the privilege of doing all that he demanded: then he believed. Now mark Jesus' language to Thomas after he believed: "Because thou hast seen Me thou hast believed: blessed are they that have not seen, and have believed" (John xx. 20).

From this language it seems that it is more blessed to believe without seeing Jesus than with it; yet it is indicated in the text John vi. 40 that no man will have a final condemnation for unbelief till he has seen Jesus. The Saviour saith "every one that seeth the Son, and believeth on him," etc. Seeing him is one of the methods God, in his love, uses to produce faith; though, as a general rule, those will have a greater blessing who believe without sight. Peter speaking of such, says, "Whom having not seen ye love; in whom, though now ye see Him not, yet believing, ye rejoice with joy unspeakable and full of glory; receiving the end of your faith, the salvation of your souls" (1 Pet. i. 8, 9). Such persons receive a present salvation—they find Christ a "special" Saviour, and are assured their resurrection, at the last day, will be to a deathless state—to immortality, eternal life.

Others, or the mass of the race, will be raised up at the last day, but not immortal: they shall see Jesus; for "every eye shall see him" (Rev. i. 7). Then, also, "he that seeth the Son, and believeth on him" will live on "forever," like as Adam would have done if he had been obedient; not by being made so that they "cannot die any more," but by access to the tree of life. They are not "sons of God by the resurrection," but are blessed under the government of "the sons of God," whose "manifestation" they had "waited for" (Rom. viii. 19), though unconscious of the precise method of their deliverance till it is accomplished. Then "the groaning creation" will see the manifold wisdom and love of God in having "subjected it to vanity," though, on their part, "not willingly, but by reason of Him who subjected the same in hope."

In the matter of being converted by seeing, I might also, have spoken of the case of Saul of Tarsus. He calls himself "the chief of sinners;" but he "saw the Lord Jesus," and was thereby convinced of his wickedness, and immediately abandoned it. He tells us, "I obtained mercy, because I did it ignorantly" (that is, blasphemed and persecuted) "in unbelief". . . "Howbeit for this cause I obtained mercy, that in me, first, Jesus Christ might show forth all long suffering for a pattern to them which should hereafter believe on Him to life everlasting" (1 Tim. i. 13-16). Do any doubt Paul's veracity? Then he anticipated a salvation by the sight of Jesus of other sinners after the "pattern" of his own conversion, manifesting the "all long-suffering" of the glorified Jesus. Such "a pattern is useless if this short life with all the unavoidable ignorance attending it is to fix the mass of the race in eternal death, for none have ever yet been converted after the "pattern" of Paul's conversion; but there will be. See Zech. xii. 6-10.

"LIGHTETH EVERY MAN."

The text John i. 9 is quoted by some to prove that although all men do not have the Gospel message, and that multitudes live and die without any knowledge of God's love to "the world," or of the mission of Christ, yet somehow all men are, or have been, so enlightened as to be saved by Christ notwithstanding their utter ignorance of Him; so they tell us, they find "Scripture that warrants the belief that some may finally be saved who never had opportunity to hear the Gospel;" and John i. 9 is brought forward to support that idea. It reads: "That was the true light, which lighteth every man that cometh into the world."

This text, when critically examined, so far from supporting the theory that any man can be saved without the Gospel, goes to prove that "every man that cometh into the world" shall be enlightened by the news of Christ and his mission. A literal translation of the text warrants this conclusion. It reads, literally, "He was the true Light, who is to enlighten every man that cometh into the world." This translation is supported by "Dr. BLOOMFIELD'S Critical Notes, edited by" the late "Prof. STUART." Dr. B. adds, "By panta anthropon is meant, men of all nations, and not the Jews only."

The evidence from this text goes to confirm the position, that at some time, in God's "due time" (1 Tim. ii. 6,) in some way, Christ will "enlighten every man" of the human race in relation to God's love of "the world," and His appointed means for their final salvation or eternal redemption from sin and all its consequences; so that every man—"every creature"—shall hear the Gospel message and have placed in his reach the means to secure the end God's love designed. When that is done, begins the real probation of the children of Adam's race. Till then no man is put on trial for his final destiny. Then, if he accepts the Lord Jesus as his Redeemer and King, he will have an endless, or eternal life. But, then, if he refuses this offered mercy, he dies for his own wilful rejection of it, having done a "despite unto the Spirit of grace" (Heb. x. 26-29,) and seals his own doom.

Thus will the truth be made manifest, that "The Lord is not slack concerning His promise [and oath to Abraham], as some men count slackness; but is longsuffering to us-ward, not willing that any should perish, but that all should come to repentance;" and "one day is with the Lord as a thousand years, and a thousand years as one day" (2 Pet. iii. 8, 9). Men are ready to think, because God has suffered so many years to pass and so many millions to go down in death without the knowledge of His love, and His remedy for sin and death, that, therefore, all those millions must hopelessly perish, and that infinite wisdom has no means by which to cause such to be visited with the Divine method of salvation, and the final triumph of the Son of God over all evil, bruising the serpent's head and destroying the works of the devil. (Gen. iii. 15., and 1 John iii. 8.)

Let God be true to His promise and oath, even if it should prove "every man a liar" (Rom. iii. 4). "Behold I bring you good tidings of great joy, which shall be to all people" (Luke ii. 10). "Glory to God in the highest, and on earth peace and good will to men" (verse 14). Such was the message and the song of God's angelic messengers, sent from heaven to proclaim the Redeemer's birth to the wondering shepherds, on the plains of Judea; and its consummation will have been accomplished when the message of God's love shall have been made known to "every creature." Ed.

THE PROMISE TO ABRAHAM.

THERE are those who seem to suppose that the Promise to Abraham, confirmed by the Oath of God, was a new dispensation, relating only to some distant, future, uncertain period, and to an equally uncertain or unknown people. I regard such a view as an entire overlooking of the record, and an abridgement of God's declared work for the race, of which Adam and Eve were the head. The woman was "deceived:" "Adam was not deceived" (1 Tim. ii. 14); he sinned wilfully; she through deception. Her sin had a mitigating circumstance: Adam's had none. He, though the father of the race, lost the headship, and could not conquer the evil he had introduced. The conquering headship was passed into the hands of the woman's seed, and that Seed becomes "the head of every man" (1 Cor. xi. 3). Of that Seed it was said, "It shall bruise thy head:" that is, It shall destroy the evil introduced by the "one transgression" of Adam, "For if through the offence of one, the many" (all Adam's race) "be dead, much more the grace of God, and the gift by grace, which is by one man, Jesus Christ, hath abounded unto the many" (Rom. v. 15); so that this "grace"—which was given us in Jesus Christ, before the (atonion) ages began;" or, before the beginning of the ages; i. e., the ages that followed the one transgression by which death was introduced into the arrangement concerning the race—embraces all the race, the entire posterity of the woman.

The race immediately passed into the hands of the Second Adam—the Seed of the woman—who in due time was "made manifest by the appearing of our LIFE-GIVER, (Syriac), Jesus Christ, who hath abolished (katargeesantes—to annul, to abrogate, to cause to cease, to come to an end, to destroy) death, (the death that came by Adam), and hath brought life and immortality to light" (2 Tim. i. 9, 10).

Thus we find the meaning of the expression "shall bruise thy head;"—it is to destroy that death which came by the "one transgression" of the first Adam: and to destroy that which was the procuring cause of death, viz., "the evil," or as it is rendered in Heb. ii. 14, "the devil."

The Second Adam was pledged by the word of God, as addressed to the serpent, to destroy, abrogate, annul, and cause to cease both the death and the evil brought on the race by the sin of the first Adam. That word of God embraces all that I claim for the promise and Oath of God to Abraham; so that my view of its covering the whole race is not going back for its application to those behind Abraham, for the promise to Abraham was only a renewal, now confirmed by an oath, of the word of God in Eden after man's "one transgression;" and it covers all who descended from the woman, or from Eve: to every one of them, death, so far as it is the result of Adam's sin, is annulled, abrogated, so as to have lost its power to hold one of the race: nothing but a personal rejection of the LIFE-GIVER, the Seed of the woman, God's remedy, can hold any man, woman, or child of Eve, in death's dominion. The blessing promised in Eden, and confirmed to Abraham by an oath, secures to the race, to each individual, an ultimate deliverance from all the consequence of Adam's transgression, and places their eternal destiny on the ground of their personal acceptance or rejection of God's remedy, made and provided, of His mere grace, "before the face of all people; a light to lighten the Gentiles, and the glory of thy people Israel" (Luke ii. 32). That remedy, therefore, will be made known to "to all people" either in this present life or in one to come, when the LIFE-GIVER shall actually abolish Adamic death, which is secured by the promise of God in Eden, and to Abraham, and therefore is spoken of as if it had actually occurred because of its certainty, as when God said to Abraham, "A father of many nations have I made thee" (Gen. xvii. 5), when as yet Isaac was not born; or as when it is said, "He was wounded for our transgressions," etc, centuries before its actual occurrence (Isa. liii. 5); God "calling those things which be not as though they were" (Rom. iv. 17), because of the certainty of the accomplishment of His promises and purposes.

Thus all is harmony in the Divine government, and JEHOVAH is justified both in his justice and love to the race, and all cause of complaint is forever removed, and God's ways are manifested to be "equal," and will cause heaven and earth, and all things therein, to unite in the song of praise, "Saying, Blessing, and honor, and glory, and power, be unto Him that sitteth upon the throne, and unto the Lamb forever and ever" (Rev. v. 13).

I make no pretensions of determining who have, in the past or present, had the knowledge of God's remedy, or who have or have not improved it; that is one of the "secret things which belong to God" (Deut. xxxix. 20); "but those revealed belong unto us and our children forever." God has revealed to us, by promise and oath, that "all families of the earth shall be blessed," in the Messiah, the Christ, the Redeemer, the Kinsman of our race, "who gave Himself a ransom for all, to be testified in due time" (1 Tim. ii. 6); God's time, which will ultimately be seen to be the best time; the best for the race as well as most honorable to God, and most promotive of the glory of our Redeemer, manifesting "the unsearchable riches of Christ" (Eph. iii. 8); a view of which made the apostle to the Gentiles to say, "Now unto him that is able to do exceeding abundantly above all that we ask or think, according to the power that worketh in us, unto him be glory in the church, by Christ Jesus throughout all the endless succession of ages" (Eph. iii. 20, 21).

GOD'S PLEASURE IN CREATING.

"Thou art worthy, O Lord, to receive glory and honor and power; for Thou hast created all things, and for The pleasure they are and were created."— Rev. iv. 11.

A glorious truth is proclaimed in these words, and is especially worthy of our attention because of the position and character of those who proclaim it. In this chapter John saw heaven opened, and heard a voice saying, "Come up hither, and I will show thee things which must be hereafter." In the Spirit he was taken up, and saw a throne and one that sat on it, and there was a rainbow round about the throne, which was an indication of a covenant of mercy, and care of the creatures He had made. About the throne sat four and twenty elders in white raiment and crowns of gold on their heads. These elders, as we learn from chapter V., were those who had been redeemed to God by the blood of the Lamb out of the nations and people of the earth, and are exalted to be "kings and priests to God, and shall reign on the earth." It was a vision of "things which must be hereafter." The "four vital beings" (zon, not "beasts") were also redeemed ones, whose peculiar work is unknown to us except as they were swift messengers (each having six wings) and constantly celebrating the holiness of the Lord, day and night, saying, "Holy, holy, holy, Lord God Almighty, which was, and is, and is to come." At the voice of their praise, "The four and twenty elders fall down before Him that sat on the throne, and worship Him that liveth for ever and ever, and cast their crowns before the throne, saying, "Thou art worthy, O Lord, to receive glory, and honor, and power: for Thou hast created all things and for Thy pleasure they are and were created."

The testimony, therefore, is beyond controversy with those who accept the Bible; and it shows that the Lord is the CREATOR of all things, and that the work of creation was a holy work, and done according to and for God's pleasure. It follows that no being was created without ample means and opportunity being provided for their highest good and redemption from sin, that might possibly occur, so that what evil might result to man from his state of training should be overruled for his advancement in the knowledge of God and a final greater exaltation than could have been attained without such a discipline as his Creator subjected him to.

Let it be kept in mind, the text (Rev. iv. 11) was the utterance of those who were glorified from among men, and are to be the future rulers on the earth, and therefore understood the work to be accomplished, and that God's pleasure is not to be defeated.

Let us now inquire what God's pleasure is concerning men. It is not His pleasure that any should finally perish. PROOF: "Have I any pleasure at all that the wicked should die? saith the Lord God: and not that he should return from his ways and live?" (Ezk. xviii. 23). "Say unto them, As I live, saith the Lord God, I have no pleasure in the death of the wicked; but that the wicked turn from his way and live" (Ezk. xxxviii. 11). "The Lord is not slack concerning his promises, as some men count slackness; but is longsuffering to us-ward, not willing that any should perish, but that all should come to repentance" (2 Pet. iii. 9). "Who hath . . . called us with a holy calling, not according to our works, but according to His own purpose and grace, which was given us in Christ Jesus before the world began" (2 Tim. i. 9).

Thus it is clear that the CREATOR, not only created our race for His pleasure, but foreseeing that our own works would be evil, and not entitle us to a continued existence, provided a way of life, in Christ Jesus, for us, in His own purpose and grace, before He commenced the work of creation. Now let us see what that purpose and grace was:

"In whom (Christ) we have redemption through his blood, the forgiveness of sins, according to the riches of His grace; wherein He hath abounded toward us in all wisdom and prudence; having made known unto us the mystery of His will, according to His good pleasure which He hath purposed in himself; that in the dispensation of the fulness of times, He might gather together in one all things in Christ, both which are in heaven, and which are on earth; even in him" (Eph. i. 10). The Apostle adds: "In whom (Christ) also we have obtained an inheritance, being predestinated according to the purpose of Him who worketh all things after the counsel of His own will, that we should be to the praise of his glory, who first trusted in Christ; in whom ye also trusted, after that ye heard the word of truth, the Gospel of your salvation" (ver. 11-13). Once more, the Apostle says, "God hath raised us up together. . . in Christ Jesus; that in the ages to come He might show the exceeding riches of His grace in his kindness towards us through Christ Jesus" (ii. 5-7).

All this shows the truth of the proclamation of the glorified ones, that the Lord is worthy to receive glory, honor, and power, for He is not only the Creator of all things, but that He created them with the most noble and glorious design, which will not be defeated by the folly or wickedness of the creatures He has made: nothing can prevent or thwart the counsel of His will and pleasure in creating all things. "The Ages to Come" must have their place to complete His counsel and pleasure. Ed.

"THRESHING" MEN INTO FAITH.

"Dr. Livingstone says that Schele, a famous African chief, observed to him on the occasion of his preaching to the tribe, "Do you imagine that these people will ever believe by your talking to them? I can make them do nothing except by threshing them; and, if you like, I will call my head man with our whips of rhinoceros hide, and will soon make them all believe."

The foregoing is a revelation of the origin of the preaching of the largest portion of Christendom. It was learned of heathendom. Love, God's great instrument to induce faith, is nearly lost sight of; and their "head men, with whips of rhinoceros hide," march through Christendom proclaiming wrath and vengeance to frighten men into faith! thus "converting" men, filling them with the spirit their supposed God possesses. But these "rhinoceros hide whips" make but poor converts; and induce more real infidelity than true faith. Let men see the true character of God in the light of His love to the world in the gift of His Son to deliver them from sin and death, and to bestow on them an endless life of joy and pleasure, and more would be effected in "the conversion of the world" in one year than has been effected in the last thirteen hundred years, or since christendom has gone back into heathendom with its system of whips and wrathful methods of making men have faith. Love casts out these devils. Ed.

FALSE TEACHERS: HOW KNOWN.—"He that speaketh of himself seeketh his own glory."—John vii. 18. Teachers who manifest a disposition to exalt SELF, and make it appear that they are something remarkable, are unmistakably false teachers. Whether this is done by words or deeds it is the same thing: they "seek their own, not the things that are Jesus Christ's" (Phil. ii. 21). This is the case with all who set themselves up for prophets; claiming to be somebody with special authority to command obedience to their teaching, and denouncing such as do not comply with their claims, though they can give no demonstration of a Divine commission by miracles or otherwise. Such persons, not unfrequently give something like prophetic utterances to amaze and astonish those duped by them, and when their prophecies fail, they, with amazing impudence, attribute the failure to something else than their folly, and invent another prophecy, equally absurd, to continue their power over those who have unhappily fallen under their influence. Ed.

THE STUDY OF THE BIBLE.

BY HENRY DUNN.

CHAPTER XXX.

On Doubts and Difficulties.

WHY God, in giving us a revelation of His Will in and through a Book, should have left so much room for doubt in relation to certain portions, or allowed so many difficulties to gather about its communications, is a question sometimes asked, amid pain and perplexity, in the deepest recesses of Christian hearts.

The true answer, whenever we find it, will certainly be this,—“Because it was wiser and better that it should be so.”

Let us see whether reflection will not enable us, in some degree, to parcise this, even now.

We need not scarcely say that DOUBT is not a plant of modern growth, nor is it to be associated only with a Written Revelation. It was felt by Old Testament Seers, and it was experienced by New Testament Prophets, Asaph frequently expresses one form of it,—“Verily,” he says, “I have cleansed my heart in vain;” in vain have “I washed my hands in innocency.” “When I thought to understand this,” he adds, “it was too painful for me” (Psa. lxxiii). Again, under the same influence, he exclaims, “Doth His promise fail for evermore?” (Psa. lxxvii. 8). And although it appears that he soon found rest and peace in a reposing faith, it is not the less true that he was, for a time, under the influence of the most painful of all doubts,—that of God’s faithfulness.

Jeremiah, in distress, is equally perplexed when he cries,—“Wherefore doth the way of the wicked prosper?” and he is desirous, as it were, to reason with God on the incomprehensibility of His judgments (xii. 1). And again: “We looked for peace, and there is no good; and for the time of healing, and behold trouble!” “Break not thy covenant with us:”—as if such a thing were possible with God (xiv. 19–21). Nay, stronger still,—“O Lord, thou hast deceived me, and I was deceived” (xx. 7). In all these cases doubt was temporary, and followed by renewed confidence; but it was there.

John the Baptist furnishes us with an example of another kind of doubt. Depressed in his spirit,—disappointed in his hopes,—and distrusting even the evidence of the voice from Heaven, he sends his disciples to Jesus with the touching inquiry,—“Art thou He that should come, or do we look for another?”

Thomas furnishes us with an example different from any of the preceding,—the other disciples say unto him, “We have seen the Lord!” He replies, disbelieving the testimony in spite of its unanimity, and notwithstanding the confidence he justly reposed in the veracity of his brethren,—“Except I shall see in his hands the print of the nails, and put my finger into the print of the nails, and thrust my hand into His side, I will not believe” (John xx. 25).

The Apostles frequently manifest a sceptical spirit, and it is strikingly displayed in the walk to Emmaus,—“We trusted that it had been He which should have redeemed Israel” (Luke xxiv. 21). The implication is unavoidable,—we have given up that belief now.

Let us not, then, imagine that doubt would have found no place in our hearts had Revelation been, in any respect, different from what it is.

A more important inquiry rises before us. What is the moral character of doubt? Is it, in itself, sinful? Is it always injurious to him who suffers from it?

The character of the reply to this question must depend on the character of the doubt. Is it honest doubt? Is it a doubt which desires to be removed by evidence? or is it a cherished habit of mind, traceable to conceit, or levity, or dislike to that which is asserted? Everything depends on this:—If it is honest, it is painful; if it is dishonest, it will be a source of satisfaction, like self-complacency. If it is sincere, it will be temporary, and the soul will have no rest until the truth or falsehood of the matter to be inquired into is ascertained. If it is affected, it will be chronic, and, to a great extent, indifferent as to any definite conclusion whatever. It must be the one or the other. It is either the most sacred agony of a noble nature, or the veriest trifling of a fool.

Of course we speak now of doubt in relation to moral truth,—for in this book reference to any other kind would be out of place; and of this, if honest and sincere, we fearlessly affirm that it is not sin, but the trial by fire of God’s own children. They may look upon it as foolishness or ignorance when once freed from it, but they only free themselves from it by facing it and going into the sanctuary of God to wrestle it off.

It is of doubt like this that the Laureate sings,—

“There lives more faith in honest doubt, Believe me, than in half the Creeds.”

and it was in relation to such scepticism that old John Newton was accustomed to say,—“Some men’s doubts are better than other men’s certainties.”

In no instance is this class of doubt dealt with as a sin in Scripture.

The Lord only answers the Baptist with additional evidence,—"Go and show John again those things which ye do hear and see: The blind receive their sight, and the lame walk, the lepers are cleansed, and the deaf hear, the dead are raised up, and the poor have the Gospel preached to them. And blessed is he, who shall not be offended in me" (Matt. xi. 4-6).

To Thomas he is condescending beyond measure. Not a word of rebuke. It is simply,— "Thomas, reach hither thy finger, and behold my hands; and reach hither thy hand, and thrust it into my side: and be not faithless, but believing." And yet there is commendation for men of a different stamp. "Blessed are they that have not seen, and yet have believed" (John xx. 27-29).

To the two disciples, "fools, and slow of heart," as they were, "to believe all that the Prophets had spoken," He kindly expounds, "in all the Scriptures, the things concerning Himself," and then, without one word of reproach, sits down with them to meat, and makes Himself known in breaking of bread. Is it possible he could have thus acted had doubt, in itself, been sinful? had not a living faith, so to speak, lain deeper than the doubt?

As has been well said by the lay writer to whom we have already been indebted, "the absence of positive faith and of righteous doubt are exactly correlative. They are twin symptoms of the same decadence." "I hardly know," he adds, "one young man who has strength and courage enough for righteous doubt. There is plenty of indifference, plenty of denial, plenty of cool passing by of whatever cannot be understood, plenty of complacent setting up or adoption of new philosophical theories; but of the resolute struggle for Truth, very little. Perhaps it has been undergone once on some subordinate point, and the result having been that the truth has been found to dwell outside of some preconceived opinion, the conclusion has been come to that it dwells, probably, outside of all received opinions, and that, from the moment one has left these, anything that looks like truth may very likely be true, so that it is no longer worth struggling with."

From the remarks we have already made, it will be seen that, far from considering doubt to be in itself sinful, we regard it, when righteous, honest, and sincere, as eminently helpful to Truth; and therefore we see no ground whatever for surprise that God should have left so much room for its exercise in reference to Divine Revelation.

Greatly is it to be regretted that the Bishop of Oxford, in his recent Sermons on "the Revelation of God the Probation of Man," should have spoken regarding it so unadvisedly as he has. Admitting, as he does, that "God's Word is spoken to us, and recorded for us, through the intervention of human agents,—that it is recorded in human manuscripts, read by us out of a printed book, and that at every turn there is opportunity for doubt and question," the Bishop has nothing better to offer to the doubter than the advice,—appropriate enough in the mouth of a Romish Priest, but altogether out of character in a Protestant Prelate,— "Fling doubt from you as if it were a loaded shell shot into the fortress of the soul; do not intermit prayer, be more frequent at communion, frequently repeat the Gloria Patri,"—in short, for this is what it amounts to,— "Do not venture to examine into Truth,—believe, on the authority of the Church, and be at rest."

As if this violent and unnatural suppression of doubt were equivalent to Faith; as if God's revelation of Himself in the Bible were given for the purpose of paralyzing the intellect, and prostrating humanity at the feet of a Priest; as if all history did not teach us that "conscientious doubt, when suppressed, eats into the soul like a cancer, and that the inevitable result is latent infidelity, and the total corruption of the moral and spiritual nature."

The difficulties of Scripture, then, have their use. They tend to promote a constant and ever fresh investigation into its claims and its contents; they call for the exercise of humility, patience, candor, and charity, in such investigations; and they teach us that great lesson which is written, as it were, in letters of light alike on God's works and on His Word, that advance in knowledge depends, far more than we are usually prepared to admit, on the state of the heart; that if we are often left, in our search after evidence, to balance probabilities, and to be misled, if we allow pride or prejudice to come between us and Truth; it is only to teach us that our moral probation, as creatures of God, extends far beyond mere outward acts; that the search after Truth is an important part of it; and that the office of the intellectual faculty is not to sit in judgment upon God, but humbly to receive, on the authority of heaven, teachings which are necessarily hidden from all who close their eyes to the demand a Divine Revelation makes on their obedience, and who shuts its light out of their souls, only lest it should make their shortcomings too manifest even to themselves.

CHAPTER XXXI.

On Reading the Scriptures with Prayer.

Miss BREMER, in one of her later works, tells us that an interview with the Pope,—during which the claims of the Catholic Church had been earnestly pressed by the Venerable Father—closed with these words, addressed to her by his Holiness:

“Pray, pray for light from the Lord, for grace to acknowledge the Truth; because this is the only means of attaining to it. Controversy will do no good. In controversy is pride and self-love. People, in controversy, make a parade of their knowledge,—of their acuteness,—and after all, every one continues to hold his own views. Prayer alone gives light and strength for the acquirement of truth and grace. Pray every day; every night, before you go to rest; and I hope that grace and light may be given to you. For God wishes that we should humble ourselves, and He gives His grace to the humble. And now God bless and keep you for time and eternity.”

The accomplished Swedish lady,—good Protestant as she is,—adds, “This pure, priestly, and fatherly admonition was so beautifully and fervently expressed, that it went to my heart. The Pope was to me really, at this moment, the representative of the Teacher who in life and doctrine preached humility, not before men, but before God, and taught mankind to pray to Him. The Pope’s words were entirely true and evangelical.”

Such is the process by which parasets to Rome are multiplied. Is there not something wrong about it? Is Miss Bremer’s view sound and Scriptural? Are the words of Pius, after all, either true or evangelical?

We think not. In similar tones and language, many an old Rabbi would, in our Lord’s time, have addressed a young disciple of Christ, in order to win him back to the old faith; and, in similar terms, many a self-satisfied religionist still warns and rebukes the inquiring spirit.

But wherein is it wrong? Is it not true that our first duty is to pray for light and grace? Unquestionably it is. Further,—Is it not true that, for the most part, in controversy there is much pride and self-love? and that men engaged in it often seek rather to display their acuteness than anything else? It cannot be disputed that such is too frequently the case.

Wherein, then, lies the error? For, if it be an error, it is one that is shared by thousands of Protestants in the present day, who are constantly teaching that all controversy is evil; that doubt is sinful; that free inquiry inevitably leads to scepticism; and that he who would arrive at Truth must do so by abasing his rational faculties, and by reading his Bible “on his knees,” rather than in his library; in the light of devotion, rather than in that of research; with the intellect at rest, rather than alert and quickened; with prayer, rather than with pains.

The error, as we imagine, lies in the supposition, implied, perhaps, rather than expressed, that devout submission and intellectual activity are somewhat opposed to each other; that the two cannot, if each be quickened, co-exist,—the one being, in fact, destructive of the other; and that, consequently, free inquirers must, as a rule, be a prayerless race.

But is it true that the intellect and the devout affections are thus opposed?—that independent research and prayer cannot really go on together?

The answer to the question must depend on the character of the prayer supposed to be offered. If a man, in praying over his Bible, asks for, and really expects to obtain, direct spiritual illumination; if he imagine that, in reply to his petitions, his judgment will, in some way or other, be so acted upon, that Truth will present itself to his intellect, and carry its own evidence with it; if, with the Fathers, he considers that the influence of the Holy Spirit, for which he prays, will be vouchsafed in the form of intellectual light; if, with some eminent modern divines, he regards the “Faith” for which he entreats, to be “a new faculty,” “a Divine capacity,” imparted only as a sovereign gift,—it then follows, of course, that the more passive he is, the better; that self-annihilation, were it possible, would be, of all things, the most desirable; that “creaturely activity,” as it is sometimes called, is a hindrance to the reception of the Divine blessing; and that prayer stands in direct opposition to the exercise of reason.

This has always been the doctrine of the Church of Rome. It manifests itself most, in the most devout of her children. It is the distinguishing characteristic of the “quietists” and “mystics” in her communion, of all ages; and it has always had a charm for devout Protestants of meditative temperament, who do not perceive the poison that it embodies. We may, and we ought to sympathize with Madame Guyon, when (as translated by Cowper) she sings,— “Sweet to lie passive in Thy hand,

And know no will but Thine.”

But we must not forget that the gifted Jansenist meant much more than we do by the words she uses; that her passiveness related not merely to the dispensations of God's Providence, but to the knowledge of His Word; and that it pointed to, and terminated in, an abject submission to Priestly rule and guidance.

It could not be otherwise. Believing, as she did, that God required her to pray, but not to think for herself,—to be devout, but not to question,—it followed, as of necessity, that she became the slave of men whom she supposed to be the appointed depositories of Divine Truth.

With Protestants, however mystic they may be, the case is somewhat different. Believing, as they do,—and truly,—that the Holy Spirit is given individually to every earnest seeker; and expecting this great boon—as they have no warrant for doing,—in the form of direct intellectual light; they bow,—not before a visible Church represented by a Priest,—but before what is neither more nor less human, the reflex action of their own piety, whether it be intelligent or untelligent, on their intellects.

The heart, in all such cases, guides the head,—and the result corresponds. If the heart be lowly, loving, and pure, the intellectual conviction, whatever it may be, will not be inconsistent with anything that is loving and pure. But, if the heart be but partially renewed,—if the man be still, more or less, under the influence of pride, vanity, conceit, uncharitableness, love of power, or self-seeking in any form,—the result will be in accordance. The more he prays, the deeper will be his satisfaction with his own views; the stronger his confidence in himself, as one "taught of God;" the more malignant will be his fanaticism, his sectarianism, or his superstition, as the case may be.

Again we say,—It cannot be otherwise. Believing, like the Romanist, that God requires him simply to pray, and wait for a light above and beyond any that he can get by the use of his rational faculties, however much these may be disciplined by labor, or purified by a right state of heart, he tries to lay aside his reason, and, if it were possible, not to think his own thoughts, in order that he may passively receive from above "the Truth as it is in Jesus." He never considers that, from the course he is taking, he will necessarily be acted upon by forces, which, however Divine he may deem them, are really as human as any by which he is in other ways affected.

But let us suppose another case. Let us suppose that the praying man expects his answer from God in another form; that he has not the slightest expectation of obtaining light, apart from a vigorous and independent use of his faculties; that as, when he asks God for daily bread, he only expects to receive it in the form of a blessing on his industry, his skill, his perseverance, and his trust in God: so, in spiritual things if, when he prays that the "eyes of his understanding" may be "opened," he expects his answer only in the form of that "eye-salve" (humility) with which the eye must be "anointed," if it would see (Rev. iii. 19),—in the form of purification from the various phases of evil that darken and becloud the faculties of a sinful man; if he bear in mind the words of his Lord,—"If thine eye be single, thy whole body shall be full of light;" if he look, therefore, for his answer, in growing freedom from prejudice, in a greater breadth of charity, in a more loving appreciation of Truth and goodness, wherever they are found; and consequently (a necessary consequence), through the reception of these "fruits of the Spirit," to have a clearer intellect, a sounder judgment, a better balanced mind; the reverse of all we have stated then becomes true. Prayer and intellectual activity go on together, and as, on the first supposition, they could not co-exist, so, on this, they cannot be separated:

But which is the true view?

For a reply we simply turn to "the Book." and to "the Master."

The Jews come to Christ with their doubts. What is His reply? Pray? No! It is "Search! (or rather, Ye search) the Scriptures: they are they which testify of me" (John v. 39). Again, He says to them, "I am come in my Father's Name, and ye receive me not." Why? Because ye do not pray? No! The cause of unbelief is thus stated,—"How can ye believe, which receive honor one of another, and seek not the honor that cometh from God" (ver. 44). "To this end was I born, and for this cause came I into the world, that I should bear witness unto the Truth. Every one that is of the Truth heareth my voice" (John xviii. 37).

Paul, at Thessalonica, when dealing with UNBELIEVERS, does not call upon them to pray; but, "as his manner was, went in unto them, and three sabbath days reasoned with them out of the Scriptures" (Acts xvii. 2). So, again, at Corinth, "he reasoned in the synagogue every sabbath day, and persuaded the Jews and the Greeks" (xviii. 4). Again, at Ephesus, we are told "he entered into the synagogue, and reasoned with the Jews." And so, before Felix, he "reasoned of righteousness, temperance, and judgment to come," till "Felix trembled" (xxiv. 25).

Nor is his method different with BELIEVERS. Complaining of some, that, when they "ought to have been teachers," it was needful to teach them "which be the first principles of the oracles of God," he adds, "Strong meat (the full comprehension of the supercession of the Mosaic law by Christ) belongeth to them that are of full age, even those who, by reason of use, have their senses exercised to discern both good and evil" (Heb. v. 14); i. e., their faculties exercised by practice in the distinguishing of Truth from error (so Stuart and Alford).

How different, in this particular, is the conduct of the Apostle before his conversion. He then prayed and persecuted; while Stephen and the Christians, though ever living in the atmosphere of prayer, reasoned out of the Scriptures. Saul and the Priests, like the Popes, supplicated God, and threatened man. Stephen the martyr studied, and quoted, and followed the written Word. The Persecutor would have nothing to do with controversy.

After his conversion, Paul, as we all know, became a great controversialist. Some of his Epistles—that to the Galatians, for example—are almost wholly controversial. Before his great change, we look in vain for a single argument against heresy; for then, like the Papal chief, he only "breathed out threatenings and slaughter." It was not till he became a Christian that he felt the necessity of giving a "reason for the hope that was in him" (Acts xvii. 2, 17).

Nowhere in Scripture, either from the lips of Christ or His Apostles, is prayer set before us as the medium by and through which Divine light is to be obtained. * Everywhere we are taught to pray for a right state of heart,—for pardon, for purity, for temporal and eternal good, for friends, for enemies, for all men, for a blessing from above on faithful teachers of the Gospel; but nowhere for light in the intellect; nowhere either for "a new faculty," or—which amounts to the same thing—for light above and beyond that which is open to all men. No such petition occurs in the prayer Jesus taught His disciples. Would we know God's will, we are to be "babes," as distinguished from the "wise and prudent" of this world; we are to be "obedient children;"

* We are most anxious not to be misunderstood here. We are only speaking of "Divine light" in the sense of mental perception. Far be it from us to deny that, in one sense—the true and Scriptural sense—light from Heaven is essential to all of us. Our ignorance is often felt to be so oppressive, our perplexities so harassing, that it would be crushing indeed to one's spirit, to feel that we were forbidden to pray for light. But not in the Pope's sense can we rightly do so. The light we need, and the only light God warrants us to expect, is that of love and purity, freedom from pride, prejudice, self-interest, and sin,—the indwelling, in short, of the Holy Ghost.

to seek for a renewed nature; for a "wise and understanding heart;" for "a single eye;" for "the fear of God;" and for strength and assistance in the fulfilment of every duty. But nowhere are we taught to pray for light except as it springs necessarily out of love.

It may be said, indeed, that in the Old Testament we are taught "by Solomon to "cry after knowledge, and to lift up our voice for understanding;" but then it is in connection with seeking for it, as the miner seeks for silver, by long and unwearyed toil. David, too, prays, "Open thou mine eyes" (Psa. cxix. 18); but the petition is in close alliance with others for humility (ver. 21), freedom from all mental insincerity (ver. 20), and a general quickening of the spiritual nature (ver. 25).

It may be urged, also, that Paul prays for his converts that "the word of Christ may dwell in them richly" (Col. iii. 16); that they may "hold fast that which is good" (1 Thess. v. 21); that they may be filled with the knowledge of God's will" (1 Col. i. 9, 10); but all these petitions are but so many forms of desire for the sanctification of their natures; for increase of grace; and for the planting within them of all holy principles and dispositions. In not a single instance does he direct them to pray for such blessings as direct gifts from Heaven; but always to watch, to search, to be faithful to duty, to love Truth, and to follow it at all risks, not doubting but that in this path they would find it.

We have said nothing as to the danger of unconsciously praying over the Bible, with the desire to find ourselves right. Yet nothing is more common; and it is certain that he who does so will generally succeed in obtaining the object of his wishes. "It is the same with Philosophy. If you have a strong wish to find phenomena such as to confirm the conjectures you have formed, and allow that wish to bias your examination, you are ill-fitted for interrogating Nature." So it is with the Bible. "Revelation is to be interrogated, not as a witness, but as an instructor."

What, then, do we learn from the whole? That Prayer is less important or influential on the mind of God than Christians generally have imagined! SURELY NOT.

"Prayer is the Christian's vital breath.

The Christian's native air,

His watchword at the gates of death.

He enters Heaven by prayer."

What we really learn is that, in the acquisition of Truth, Prayer occupies precisely the same position that it does in relation to the acquisition of bread; that as God now showers not bread from heaven, as He did in the wilderness, so He showers not truth upon our minds, as He did upon the Apostles: And in each case for the same reason; because it is not called for. The laborer has now, what the Israelite in the desert had not,—the opportunity of gaining his bread "by the sweat of his brow;" and the Christian has now, what the Christian in Apostolic days had not,—a complete revelation of the will of God in his hand, and nothing to hinder his understanding it, save his worldliness, selfishness, and sin.

For the removal of these hindrances let us all pray earnestly; assured that, only so far as they are removed by the Holy Spirit of God, shall we be able to discern "wondrous things" in the Divine Law

THE HIGHER CALLING.

TO THE EDITOR OF "OUR HOPE:" SIR,—As you have added another to the many religious periodicals which are already in existence, and have said what you thought fitting in justification of the step, allow me to express a hope that the new periodical will meet a want, not much felt perhaps, but nevertheless real and pressing: viz., an organ of communication between those, be they few or many, who, however differing in opinion on many points, count themselves "pilgrims and strangers" upon earth; and who therefore desire, without judging others, and with a keen consciousness of their own shortcomings, to recognize a loftier standard of duty than is the wont of persons who are content to abide in the conventionalisms of the religious world.

Magazines of a denominational character are numerous; periodicals devoted either to the furtherance of particular modes of doing good, or to the conversion of sinners by means of special agencies, such as revival movements, abound; and others still, designed to improve the popular taste, or to interest the young, are not wanting; but not one is, as yet, known to exist specially devoted to a survey of the higher departments of the Christian life, or intended, as you have expressed it, to enforce "the peculiar obligations resting upon those who believe themselves to be "heirs of the Kingdom," and who therefore anticipate reigning with Christ "on the new earth wherein dwelleth righteousness."

What those obligations are it is needless to say. They are expounded by Christ in the Sermon on the Mount, and are involved in what He has uttered regarding the "strait gate," the "narrow way," and the necessity of abandoning all for Him. They are inseparable from what is written respecting the "crown of life," the "prize of the high calling," and the "abundant entrance" when contrasted with being "saved so as by fire."

It is surely unnecessary to observe that obedience to these indispensable requirements is incompatible with the opinion now so largely prevailing among Christians, and recently avowed with singular frankness, that the high standard laid down by our Lord on the Mount may be lawfully modified; and that in modifying it "the common sense and instinct of Christians has, on the whole, caught its true meaning."

The root of these evils—not, be it observed, of evils that must always exist while human nature is weak and depraved, but of those that are traceable to the one master error—the pernicious "change" that has taken place among believers "in the general sense of what is right and lawful," will, in my opinion, mainly be found in the fact that, for all practical purposes, Christians have ceased to perceive that an important distinction is drawn in the Word of God between the "Elect" Church, the "Bride" of Christ, and other saved persons.

I hold it to be all important that this distinction should be pressed upon attention, since the whole spirit of the New Testament—to say nothing of particular passages—implies that the Church of God, "the pillar and ground of the Truth," is not to be confounded with adherents to Christianity, however sincere they may be: that it is to be for ever a thing apart; a thing of beauty and sanctity; a thing not of this world; a constant witness to goodness, often in sack-cloth and sorrow, but never in purple and fine linen; that it is to share alike the humiliation and the triumph of the Redeemer; that it is to suffer with Him and to reign with Him; that it is to "fill up" here the measure of its Saviour's sufferings, and hereafter to "enter into" and complete its Saviour's joy; that it is figuratively to endure the cross, and actually to wear the crown; that its members are one day to be kings, tributary, indeed, to the "King of kings," but to sit at the Royal table, to rule the world "with a rod of iron," and, as "Priests to God and to Christ," to carry out and finish the Redeemer's final conquest over the Devil and all his works.

The ennobling ambition to obtain that kingdom is continually set forth by Christ as best fitted to meet the necessities of higher natures that long for the distinctions of God. The expectation of it stains human pride, and pours contempt on all greed after the dignities of earth, while it affords a needed stimulus to those who wish to follow faithfully that career of unworld-liness and self-denial to which they are called. It supplies, too, the strongest of all possible motives to run a race which necessitates the laying aside of every impediment, however dear it may be to us, or however apparently needful for the flesh.

This view of "things to come," although Scriptural, is doubtless opposed to those portions of the Evangelical theology which are distinctively Augustinian, and which have come down to us on the authority of a man who, however great and good in many respects, lived in a dark age, advocated persecution, and supported almost every ecclesiastical abomination of his day. The old struggle, therefore, between Christ and "them of old time," between the teachings of the Spirit and traditions of the Church has to be re-commenced, and must be fought out to the end.

Intimately connected with this work, and, indeed, with all that concerns the higher departments of the spiritual life, is whatever pertains to the intelligent study of Holy Scripture. Nothing but mischief can flow from a superstitious way of looking at the Bible; from the habit many indulge of clinging to the letter rather than abiding in the spirit of the Book; from craving after a certainty which, independently of a work of the Holy Spirit on the heart of a believer, cannot be enjoyed, and which can, therefore, never be brought home to the sceptical and the ungodly. Such habits of thought create half our difficulties, greatly weaken our faith in Divine things, and, instead of being favorable to piety, only tend to hinder that repose in truth which, when felt as it should be, is at once our joy and our strength.

Greatly is it to be lamented that among ourselves everything connected with the Divine Life so commonly runs in fixed and appointed channels, that division of labor is supposed to be wise in spiritual things as in those that are temporal, and that, as a consequence, too much is left to the priest or to the pulpit; so much, in fact, that with multitudes of intelligent Christians, disuse in the study of Scripture has generated inability to profit by it.

These, indeed, like others, with one accord deny the right of either Pope or Prelate, Church or Council to override their private judgment in relation to religious truth, but the consciousness of weakness leads them to submit as implicitly to professional teaching as if they recognized its paramount authority; hence, when disturbed, they become either fearful or rash: the bolder too often seeking to prove their independence by a scornful rejection of truth and error alike, while the more devout and timid, equally unable to investigate calmly, cleave in terror to that which is traditional, and willingly accept the frightful doctrine that freedom of inquiry is inconsistent with the higher life; that an enlarged charity in relation to those who are supposed to be in error is but latitudinarianism; that no amount of faith or piety is adequate to justify a departure from old landmarks; that acquiescence is humility, and that the only alternative for a religious man is submission or scepticism.

This mistaken idea of duty, in an age like our own, when doubt prevails and everything is thrown into the crucible, necessarily leads, as it has led, to a shrinking, both in public and private, from the promulgation of clear and definite views on points so vital as are those of Election and Future Retribution,—doctrines essentially connected with what is recorded regarding the rewards and punishments of the world to come; so that the danger is imminent that differences of opinion regarding the personal character of the one, and the nature and duration of the other, will ere long be followed by the exclusion of both from the range of topics considered essential to definite religious teaching.

Further,—out of an enlarged study of Scripture can alone come right views regarding its eschatology,—the antichrist that is probably yet in the future,—the second advent of the Lord, and the end of the present dispensation; subjects second to none in importance on account of their practical bearing, but now greatly neglected, partly, no doubt, in consequence of the extravagances of the many who have set themselves up as interpreters of unfulfilled prophecy.

The result has been that while Scripture calls upon the believer to speak and act as if Christ were already at the door, and tells him that since the Saviour's reappearance in the clouds of heaven is, like our own death, uncertain as to time, but certain as to the event—His coming ought to be the daily theme of a believer's prayer and hope, modern Christians, to a fearful extent, cling to the idea that no such personal advent is to be expected; that Christ's coming is only figurative and spiritual; that He is, in fact, now on earth in the only form in which He ever will be.

The world being thus adjudged to be already Christ's, inasmuch as the Church has so largely absorbed society, it is inferred that no future antichrist is to be expected, and that disciples may lawfully plunge into the same ambitions as other men, and struggle for like rewards, so long as they do not disgrace the Christian name, or implicate themselves in any thing which is obviously unjust or unclean.

To all this, as fatal to the purity of "the Bride," the "Lamb's wife," I trust "OUR HOPE" will be distinctly opposed, while every care will, I am sure, be taken to avoid the extravagance, the narrowness, and the spirit of judgment which has, unhappily, been too often manifested by otherwise excellent individuals who have made some of these convictions the basis of an exclusive sect. D.

—Our Hope.

HUMAN REDEMPTION,--No. 10.

OF HEAVEN.

THE point to be noticed is—and, as contrasted with popular impressions, it is a very singular one—that THE WORD "HEAVEN" IS NEVER USED IN THE SCRIPTURE TO DENOTE THE FINAL DWELLING-PLACE OF BELIEVERS IN THE WORLD THAT IS TO COME. We all speak of going to heaven when we die, and are apparently quite unconscious that we are using a term which is nowhere sanctioned in the Holy Writ.

Heaven, as the abode of Christ, is always and justly regarded as the spot where our "hopes" rest (Col. i. 5), and where that reward is "reserved" which is to be revealed in the last time (1 Pet. i. 4). There our "inheritance among all them that are sanctified" is deposited (Acts xx. 32); our treasure is there (Matt. vi. 20; Heb. x. 34); our "names" are "written" there (Luke x. 20); our "reward" is there (Matt. v. 12); the "the crown of righteousness" is laid up there (2 Tim. iv. 8); our "conversation" (moral life) is there, "from whence we look for the Saviour" (Phil. iii. 20); but our final home is not there: for the "house" with which we are to be "clothed upon," although as yet, by a figure, spoken of as "in the heavens," and declared to be "eternal" in character, is to be a house "from heaven" (2 Cor. v. 2); and the holy city, the New Jerusalem, "is to come down from God out of heaven" (Rev. xiii. 10); and the dwelling-place of risen men is to be "a new earth," in which dwelleth righteousness (Rev. xxi. 1); and Christ is to return,—“For the Lord himself shall descend from heaven with a shout, with the voice of the archangel, and with the trump of God” (1 Thess. iv. 10); and “the tabernacle of God” is to be “with men,” and “He will dwell with them, and they shall be His people, and God himself shall be with them, and be their God” (Rev. xxi. 3).

That the elect Church, "the Bride," will occupy a position higher than the rest, nearer to Christ, and more glorious than that of many who will be saved, we have already seen to be probable from the statement that such shall be with Christ within "the holy city," while others, saved nations, "only dwell "in the light" of it (Rev. xxi. 24); but there is nothing whatever to support the ordinary expectation that at the resurrection, this material world of ours will be destroyed, and the righteous conveyed to heaven, to be for ever happy among the angels of God, sharing with them in the services of the upper world. There is far more reason to suppose that the angels will continue for ever to be "ministering spirits" to those who are "the heirs of salvation" (Heb. i. 14).

In all the speculations which excellent persons so freely indulge in about "being happy in heaven"—for, unsupported by Scripture, they are nothing but speculations—the point forgotten is, the perpetual humanity of man, so clearly indicated in the incarnation of the Redeemer, and in the fact that He ascended, in His human body, to "His Father and to our Father, to His God and to our God."

To a similar forgetfulness may probably be traced a tendency, now very common, to contemplate future happiness apart altogether from its connection with locality.

That there is a sense in which heaven may be within us is certain; for where God is, heaven is; and unfettered communion with Him, through Christ and by the Holy Spirit, is perfect happiness. But this is no argument whatever against a locality as the future residence of the redeemed. God is everywhere; but we cannot be everywhere; and since, at present—even were it true that space is merely subjective to the mind of man—we can comprehend the idea only as a relation, all the probabilities are that we shall continue to do so: for however glorious may be the spiritual bodies of the saints, however free from imperfection or corruption, however much they may transcend the limitations of our earthly conditions, the notion of place seems inseparable from the possession of a body.

The mischief involved in the tendency to think of the future in connection with the spirit alone, and of heaven as merely subjective, commences whenever such interpretations are supposed to include all that Scripture is intended to teach us relative to the world to come. Such is certainly not the case. Heaven is there always spoken of as a locality, the special residence of the Court of the Most High; hell is distinctly revealed to us as a place "prepared for the devil and his angels;" and the "new earth, in which dwelleth righteousness," as clearly declared to be the final abode of the "children of the resurrection."

And why should it not be so? Has not God made the world to be inhabited? Hath He not made all nations of men for to dwell on the face of the earth? "Thus saith the Lord that created the heavens; God himself that formed the earth and made it; He hath established it, He created it not in vain, He formed it to be inhabited: I am the Lord; and there is none else" (Isa. xiv. 18). The assurance given to man of sovereignty in it—a dominion far too absolute to be regarded as fulfilled either in the present or in the past—alone proves that it is not destined to destruction (Heb. ii. 8, and Psa. viii.). It is "till the day of Christ" that St. Paul prays the Philip- pians may be preserved; and it is "in that day"—the day of His return—that He is so desirous to "rejoice" (Phil. i. 10; ii. 10).

Further, the world is a redeemed world. Christ died to restore all things; to deliver all things from the grasp of evil; and who will venture to say that this design can ever be thwarted? that Satan is able to hinder the world from becoming the dwelling-place of the creature formed in God's image? or that "Wisdom" can be compelled to cease "rejoicing in the habitable parts of the earth," and no longer to find "delights with the sons of men?" (Prov. viii. 31).

These views, so far as they relate to the probability of this world becoming, when purified by fire, the future abode of man, are not new. Dr. Chalmers, in his "Astronomical Discourses," supports them with all the argument and eloquence of which he was so distinguished a master; and Mr. Isaac Taylor, in his "Physical Theory of Another Life," expresses his conviction that "all the practical skill we acquire in managing affairs; all the versatility, the sagacity, the calculation of chances, the patience and assiduity, the promptitude and facility; as well as the higher virtues which we are learning every day, will find scope in a world such as is rationally anticipated when we think of heaven as the stage of life that is next to follow the discipline of earth."

"With no other indication of the destinies of the universe than what may be furnished by the swelling emotions of pity that are now working, pent up in tender and noble hearts, we should hardly fear to err in assuming that a sphere will at length open upon such spirits, wherein they shall find millions needing to be governed, taught, rescued, and led forward from a worse to a better, or from a lower to a higher stage of life. It is quite as easy to suppose that the Creator should have imparted to human nature the notion and the desire of immortality, without intending to realize it, as that He should have instilled a boundless benevolence, which is to have no more opportunity to express itself than it may chance to meet with in the present state."

It may be added—and who so likely to be the objects of this benevolence as those who, on earth, have never been under any government deserving of the name; who from birth upwards have been abandoned to ignorance, superstition, and vice; and who wait only for a wise and kindly hand to lead them from evil to good, and from self to Christ?

It is a favorite idea with many, and doubtless regarded as a very spiritual one, that the employment of the redeemed will be perpetual worship. This notion proceeds on an utter forgetfulness of the fact that our Lord carried up into heaven human nature complete—all the powers of a perfect man. Does any one believe that these powers, being carried into heaven, are to lie dormant there for ever? Is it not manifest that there must be some exercise for them all? Will any one maintain that a person glorified will be more spiritually-minded, more full of love to God, than "God manifest in the flesh" was? Yet He had room in His human nature for personal friendship, as well as for the perfect love of God. Or will any one deny that the Perfect Man delighted Himself in the contemplation of the flowers of the field, the fowls of the air, the great order of God's works? Surely there must be room in the glorified state for the infinite pleasure of studying God's works—for "dressing and keeping" the marvellous "garden" of a perfected universe, in all its infinite expanse, in all its unnumbered provinces!

The main difficulty in the way of impressing these truths upon mankind arises from the false associations that are commonly thrown around matter. We forget that when God first framed the body of a man. He pronounced it "very good;" and that it was in his material dwelling-place that Adam originally enjoyed unclouded fellowship with his Maker. We forget that there is no essential connection between materialism and sin; that it was over the material world that "the morning stars sang together, and all the sons of God shouted for joy;" that it is the material and visible "heaven" that "declare the glory of God;" that if the body were indeed nothing better than the prison-house of the soul, Divine love itself would hinder the possibility of its resurrection; that it is the substitution of righteousness for sin, of the pure for the vile, of love for selfishness, and not of spirit for matter, that will distinguish the new economy; for its special and distinctive mark is simply this,—“A NEW EARTH, WHEREIN DWELLETH RIGHTEOUSNESS.”

Such a view—the only revealed, and therefore the only reasonable idea of the future life—puts to shame not merely the “dreamy Elysium of classical antiquity, and the sensualisms of Oriental beliefs; it rises above all the wearisome and vapid inanities of modern poetical or philosophical surmises,” and transcends every speculation which would attempt to draw evidence of the nature of man's futurity from the analogies of nature. “It is,” as has been well said, “the belief to which a genuine philosophy would instantly give the preference, if, among the many hypotheses of a future stage of human existence which have been imagined as probable, it must make a choice.”

A VINDICATION OF THE ANCIENT HOPE

OUR Lord comforted his mourning disciples by these words, “I go to prepare a place for you. And if I go and prepare a place for you, I will come again, and receive you unto myself; that where I am, there ye may be also.” The two men in white apparel said to the disciples, “Ye men of Galilee, why stand ye here gazing up into heaven? this same Jesus, which is taken up from you into heaven, shall so come in like manner as ye have seen him go into heaven.” The apostles were not content with the preaching of forgiveness and the peace of God; they added, “And he shall send Jesus Christ, which before was preached unto you: whom the heavens must receive until the times of restitution of all his holy prophets since the world began.” The passage is a very remarkable one, for it clearly teaches that the times of refreshing—the times of restitution, which formed the burden of prophecy, can have no accomplishment while the heavens contain the Lord Jesus. His revelation from heaven is the inaugural music of the happier time; and life and joy come from his presence. The Gentiles “turned to God from idols to serve the living and true God; and to wait for his Son from heaven.” Paul taught that “we should live soberly, righteously, and godly in this present world; looking for that blessed hope, and the glorious appearing of the great God and our Saviour Jesus Christ.” He taught also that “our citizenship is in heaven; from whence the Lord will descend to change the body of humiliation, and fashion it into glory by the energy of his working.” John exclaimed, “Beloved, now are we the Sons of God, and it doth not yet appear what we shall be: but we know that when he shall appear we shall be like him, for we shall see him as he is.” The Theosalonians were taught that the Lord would descend from heaven with a shout, that the dead in Christ would arise, and the living would be changed; and they were (in the midst of prevailing death) to comfort each other with such a hope.

But what has become of this central and distinguishing hope—the glorious appearing of our great God and Saviour? There are not many Christian men who would deny in so many words that such is the veritable hope of the gospel; but two fables have taken such root, that the true hope is substantially ignored.

First Fable: Glorified spirits basking in heaven; their prison-homes being in the grave.

Second Fable: A grand triumph for truth, in the spiritual reign of our Lord over a converted world.

These two fables have done enormous evil. In consequence of the first, the resurrection of the dead, which was the reality in apostolic preaching, though not vanished from the creeds, has vanished away into a mythical region as a powerless, unreal thing. No wonder; for if there be such triumphs for liberated spirits at God's right hand, why imprison them again in the battered and forgotten tabernacles?

The second of these fables has done serious injury in many directions. In one road, holy men entangled with such a theory, have their souls oppressed by a tremendous load, which God never intended them to carry—the burden of converting the world—and as they look at the increasing ungodliness, and think of their responsibilities, a desolation of spirit gatlens round them, for which we have no name. But a larger and more self-sufficient class in the same army, are rapidly losing all the distinctiveness of Christian standing. They join men of literature, science, and philosophy, believing that all are preparing the good time coming, and that what is not accomplished by Christianity may be done by the arms of flesh, and the forces of the intellect.

But let any man who holds the popular doctrine as to the conversion of the world by human agency, and then a thousand years' spiritual reign, try if he can take the old ground of watching, waiting, looking, and praying for the coming of our Lord. Such a one will speedily discover that the modern fables are not compatible with the ancient position of churches and Christian men. The "Christian Witness" says: "The following propositions seem to us capable of clear and strong proof. 1. There is in the future of this world's history a period of great spiritual light and purity,—a period when the earth shall be full of the knowledge of the Lord. 2. That this spiritual revolution is to be brought about by spiritual means alone, and from its nature cannot be brought about by any other means. 3. That this glorious period of light and purity may be identified with the millennium, or thousand years, of the Book of Revelation." It does not attempt to prove any of the three propositions; but it will save time if we grant the truth of the first and the third, and utterly deny that of the second—"spiritual means alone." We presume that the writer would include in his spiritual means great openings by the providence of God for the wider diffusion of that gospel which is the power of God to salvation; but the great doors are not opened by spiritual means alone. The means were not very spiritual by which that imperialism was smitten, which held up by force the shrunken despotism of Rome; nor was it by spiritual means alone that Italy and Spain have been unbarred for the circulation of evangelical truth. The conception is not in accordance with the history of the past. In the days of Noah, God purposed a great change in the spiritual condition of the world, for all flesh was corrupt; but it was not accomplished by spiritual means alone. The preacher of righteousness was there as one element; but in ripe time he was reinforced by the deluge and the ark, and the new order of things in the purged world was only inaugurated by immediate divine action.

Again, when idolatry became almost universal, it was not by spiritual means alone that the living God entered his protest.

There was the calling of Abraham, and the training of himself and the patriarchs by supernatural and moral means, as well as by physical conflicts and discipline. There was terrible power revealed in Egypt from the river of blood to the angel of death; there were great signs and deep experiences in the wilderness; there was sublime exhibition of God in the glooms and glories of the shaking mountain when Israel received her constitution at Sinai, and dread force, even pitiless, in the extermination of the Amorites.

Again, when God proposed a still greater glory, it was not accomplished by spiritual means alone—the glory of the Highest overshadowed the virgin; a star from the higher astronomy guided the magii; the songs of visible angels were heard by shepherds; the dove descended on the head of the Teacher; the voice of the Father sealed him; his royalty and divinity were confessed by deputies from all provinces; for there was opulent manifestation of miraculous power over nature, death, and hell. The second stage of development was not by spiritual means alone. There was the rushing wind, the lambent tongues; and shortly, in consolidated churches, the ninefold power of supernaturalism which gave the early church such wondrous and fearful beauty when adorned with all her jewels. Now, as the promise of a time when the earth shall be full of the knowledge of the Lord undeniably belongs to a NEW DISPENSATION; it would be rupture and dislocation most uncomely, it would put that dispensation out of harmony and analogical proportion with all the dispensations which have gone before, were there not seen in it the splendid power and fulness of a creative epoch—the glorious supernaturalism of God in immediate manifestation.

We have often wished that the science of exegesis which our Teutonic brethren cultivate so successfully, would travel in a western direction. It is hard to say on what principle of selection our English preachers quote passages; but so far as relevancy is concerned, they might be shaken in a bag, and taken out as they come to hand. If, for instance, we look into Isaiah xi., where the words occur concerning the knowledge of the Lord, we find ourselves at once transported into the midst of an economy which belongs to an unborn age. The Branch-King is actually present in the midst of Israel, occupying the throne of David. He has set his hand the second time to gather the outcasts of Israel and the dispersed of Judah from all corners of the earth and islands of the sea, and there is perfect reconciliation and unity in the ancient family. He has destroyed the tongue of the Egyptian sea, and made a highway for his people—no process of a moral or spiritual order—but a physical miracle; for it is like the work which he did when the people came out of the land of Egypt. There is nothing to hurt or destroy in all the holy mountain of the Lord; for not only is the brazen trumpet of war silent, but even the ferocious beasts have lost their devouring wrath, and share the rich tranquility. The Lord is evidently King over all the earth, one Lord, and His name One; in his sevenfold power he maintains the inviolate kingdom of justice and of love; for the iron rod of power, which belongs not to this dispensation, is as visible as the countenance of benignity and grace.

The prophets of Israel do not speak of church life, or church destinies; such things were hidden from ages and generations; but they do speak of the glory of Israel and Judah in the latter day; and in all their paintings of such glory, they either declare or assume the presence of the King. We have wrenched away a few passages from their living roots—and have assumed that we, by our moral agencies, are to fulfil the things which are predicted.

The "Christian Witness" says, concerning Revelation xx.: "As to the literal interpretation let it be remembered that the passage makes no reference, direct or indirect, to the second coming of Christ, as connected with the events which the vision reveals." This is somewhat astounding, when we consider that the nineteenth chapter gives us so distinctly the Revelation of the Lord from heaven. He whose eyes are like a flame of fire, and who has on his head many crowns—the word of God, who is clothed with a vesture dipped in blood. He appears on the earth with his armies. "Out of his mouth goeth a sharp sword, that with it he should smite the nations; and he shall rule them with a rod of iron: and he treadeth the winepress of the fierceness and wrath of Almighty God. And he hath on his vesture; and on his thigh a name written—King of kings and Lord of lords." We see the destruction of the wild beast—or the man of sin and son of perdition, who has been deceiving the nations by wonders of falsehood and claims of godhead; and then it is actually in the presence of the revealed Lord that the action of the twentieth chapter proceeds. The binding of the devil is no figure, nor are the thrones and resurrection powers. "I saw thrones, and they sat on them." As we cannot look forward for an antecedent, the first throned powers must refer to the kingly warriors who descended from heaven with the Lord. In addition, the souls formerly seen "under the altar," crying for judgment and enlargement, are now seen coming into life and power. Principles never shed their blood, or were beheaded, or cried under the altar; nor can phantoms be clothed with power to reign. A self-evident canon is, that resurrection corresponds with death; from a moral prostration that there may be a moral resuscitation; but from an actual death, there must be a true and literal resurrection. In fact, while the true life of a spirit is in communion with God, the true life of a soul is when clothed with its body of organization. The whole work is explained as the first resurrection; and, in fact, language could not be clearer or more decisive. Souls are made alive when the resurrection restores the tabernacle, and they reign when the Lord receives the kingdom.

The twentieth of Luke is in strict harmony with the twentieth of revelation. "They that are worthy to obtain that world, or age, neither marry nor are given in marriage; but are equal to the angels of God, and are the children of God; being the children of the resurrection." We have often wished for power to declare the reality in all its living force; but we fail. The matter must, however, be indicated.

The apostles preached "JESUS AND THE RESURRECTION." Now, from the passages in Revelation and Luke, the resurrection is a peculiarity and a glorious thing. It is no general resurrection of the dead: but a special resurrection out from the dead. It depends upon worthiness, moral character, spiritual elevation. There is a resurrection so peculiar and sublime that all who share in it are thereby declared and marked out as the children of God, because they are the children of the resurrection. The chieftains of life, the lords and princes of the great age of liberty and glory rise alone, rise into blessedness and sovereign power, and receive the kingdom under the whole heavens. Our Lord, the First-fruits, had a resurrection out from the dead: it was not possible that he could be holden. Nor is it possible for death to hold his people. They are members of "his body, of his flesh, and of his bones." The Spirit of him who raised up Christ from the dead dwelt in them during their mortal history, and prepared the tabernacles for spiritual and eternal service, and he will quicken them in ripe time." They will arise in glory and power, leaving the dead behind them. "Blessed and holy is he that hath part in the first resurrection: on such the second death hath no power; but they shall be priests of God and of Christ, and shall reign with him a thousand years." Compare with Luke: "Neither can they die any more,—are equal with the angels,—are the children of God, being the children of the resurrection." This is the resurrection of the just—they that are Christ's at his coming. This is the resurrection of life, and the better resurrection for which old worthies were willing to die, and sought no present deliverance. It was to reach this that Paul girded himself for battle with foes of flesh and spirit, forgetting things behind and pressing onward; if by any means he might attain to the resurrection out from the dead. No wonder that it has priority in time, as it has pre-eminence in moral grandeur; for resurrection of the wicked to judgment is the strange work to which God never hastens, being a judicial work, never once intimated in the Old Testament, seldom in the New, and which we may safely leave covered over with considerable darkness.

Our critic maintains his character for loose exegesis throughout. We read: "When the Pharisees demanded of him when the kingdom of God should come (Luke xvii. 20),—what was his answer? It will come when the times of the Gentiles are fulfilled. It will come in due time, God's own time; wait for it—your hopes will not be disappointed? No, not that. But the kingdom of God cometh not with observation; neither shall ye say, Lo, here; or, Lo, there; for behold the kingdom of God is within you. The kingdom of God to come after long ages? No; it is here now. It is within you, a spiritual reign over the hearts and consciences of men. Repent ye, and believe the good news." It requires some patience to transcribe and answer such perversion; but the necessity lies upon us. In the first place, though we, in common with all believers, reverently acknowledge a dominion of God in the inner man—a kingdom whose deep foundations are laid in contrite human hearts; yet we are thoroughly assured that there is no such kingdom involved in this passage or its context. The Pharisees had no kingdom of God within them. By their practices they were of their father the devil, and his kingdom of darkness and impiety was growing within them.

In the second place, when the language, "cometh not with observation," is fairly expounded, it cuts up by the roots the common theory of advancing the kingdom of God by the gradual conversion of families and nations. In such a case we could see the process, the stages of growth and development would be open to "observation." But the great kingdom of promise "cometh not with observation;" in other words, it will be sublime and sudden revelation which men are not looking for; a glory which will leap like lightning from the darkness.

In the third place, our Lord truly informed the Pharisees that the kingdom of God was "among them." The kingdom had drawn near, had descended upon them in the personal presence of the King with the powers of the age to come in triumphal manifestation. In such manner the true Monarch was seeking the conviction and allegiance of the people.

But when our Lord turned from the Pharisees to speak to his own disciples, he made it perfectly clear how the great final kingdom would be revealed. "And they shall say to you, See here! or See there! go not after them, nor follow them; for as the lightning that lighteth out of the one part under heaven shineth unto the other part under heaven, so shall also the Son of Man be in his day." Hence, as we read in a corresponding passage, the disciples were to pay no regard to those who said that he was to be seen either in the desert or in secret chambers; for when he did appear, the lightning revelation from east to west would leave no ground for dubiety, not only sudden and unlooked for—but convincing in splendor and illumination.

Our critic, after quoting a portion of Peter's discourse on Pentecost, says, "According to Peter's interpretation, then, Jesus sits now on the throne which David foresaw as promised to his Son." He also says, "There is much Scripture besides to sustain the conclusion that the throne which Christ occupies now is that to which prophecy referred as the throne of David." We have never seen the "much Scripture besides;" but if it has no more bearing on the point than the passage quoted from Peter, it is as well that the writer could not find time or space for quotation. When we read of David's throne getting translated into the heaven of heavens, we feel as if we were reading the "Arabian Nights," or some other oriental romance. The whole thing is a monstrous outrage against truth and sobriety; and though our friends have no conscious intention of blasphemy, it even borders on blasphemy. It is true that the throne of David was likewise the throne of the Lord; for all the thrones are his, and the throne of David was emphatically his, he being the author of all the laws and morals which his anointed viceroy had to administer. But though the throne of David on earth was the throne of the Lord, the concern is not true, the throne of God in heaven never was and never can be the throne of David. Our Lord simplifies the matter in a discriminating statement. "He that overcometh shall sit down with me in my throne; even as I overcame, and am set down with my Father in his throne." Our Lord is not sitting on his own throne, not on the Davidic throne of promise, from whence his iron rod will proceed, and his essential royalty come into manifestation. He is sitting on the throne of the Father, pursuing the work of the Priest, the Advocate, the Mediator. It is true we have heard of a "mediatorial kingdom;" but the language is worse than nonsense, and has no roots in reason or in revelation.

A little meditation will show how fine the passage is which we have quoted from the Master. The Central Throne of the Invisible God, where angels veil their faces, is indeed a sublime reality. There is only one Being in human form who can sit there—because he has a Divine side. The one in whom there dwelieth all the fulness of the Godhead bodily, whom all the angels are to worship when he cometh again to the habitable earth: he, and he alone, can sit with the Father in the seat of divine sovereignty. But though we can never sit down with the Father in the central throne of the universe, we can sit with the Son in his throne, because he has a human side. When the Lord God giveth him the throne of his Father David to rule the house of Jacob forever, we have the promise of sitting with him in his throne, and sharing in the dominion.

But among all the absurd dreams which have found currency, commend us to that one which gives us the throne of David in the heaven of heavens, and the house of Jacob among Gentile nations! There would be less of the burlesque, and certainly less profanity, if we were seeking the river Jordan in the vale of Clyde, or Mount Olivet among the Yorkshire hills. The ancient prophets were not deceiving the people of Israel when in the times of their darkness and oppression they promised them in the latter day the restoration of their theocracy and perpetual possession of the land: nor was the angel juggling with Mary concerning the throne of David and the house of Jacob.

Our Lord and his apostles have confirmed the statement of the angel. The Great One who took on him the vow of a Nazarite when he appointed the memorial supper, will never drink wine again till he drinks it new in the kingdom of the Father. As we have never yet seen his shining face at the head of any communion table, we still await fulfilment. "I appoint unto you a kingdom as my Father hath appointed unto me, that ye may eat and drink at my table in my kingdom, and sit on thrones judging the twelve tribes of Israel." This can never be fulfilled unless the twelve tribes are gathered; nor can it be fulfilled until the apostles are raised from the dead. In fact, a careful examination of Old Testament prophecies will show that the great kingdom of promise is mainly a resurrection kingdom. When Paul describes the resurrection of the saints, he says, "Then shall be brought to pass the saying that is written, Death is swallowed up in victory." Now when we turn to the place where that saying is written, we find it in company with the glory of Israel and the rending of the veil from the face of all nations (Isa. xxv. 6-9). Our Lord said to the Jews, "Your house is left unto you desolate," and it has indeed been a desolation which no speech can adequately set forth. But the Lord left a star of hope burning, "Ye shall not see me henceforth till ye say, Blessed is he that cometh in the name of the Lord." We do know that the desolate house shall arise from ruin, and be lighted and glorious as in days of old. We do know that the Lord loves his covenant people with an everlasting love, and that the gifts and calling of God are without repentance. We do know that blindness in part hath happened to Israel till the fulness of the Gentiles be come in; and that when the Redeemer returns to Zion he will remove the blindness, forgive the guilt, and save all Israel with a great salvation. But the mystery which the apostle opens to the Romans might as well have remained a mystery, so far as the Christian Witness is concerned.

There is the same lameness in the exposition it gives of a passage in the twelfth of Hebrews. "Wherefore we, receiving a kingdom which cannot be moved (a dispensation of worship which does not pass away as did that older one), let us have grace, whereby we may serve God acceptably with reverence and godly fear." The wonder grows upon us! Our present dispensation of worship is the kingdom which cannot be moved!! Let the reader open the chapter and pause a little on the verities to which we have come, not into actual possession, but by the faith which is the substance of the things hoped for, and the hope which is an anchor of the soul. There is Mount Zion, neither a legendary nor a symbolic place, where glory has been before, a good work. But our Father has not required any service as a condition of our acceptance. He only looks for the legitimate outworking of his manifested and accepted love. Thus, my dear brother, Faith is the active cause of all our service; and repentance and obedience are only results of faith, and not co-equal causes with faith. You will thus see that I am a firm believer in that faith which works by love and purifies the heart."

But I pause for the arrival of your final review, when I will conclude what remarks I may deem necessary to put you in possession of the means of comprehending the truth as it presents itself to me, and thus, conscious of the power of truth, I shall leave the matter that the leaven may work unobservedly till all that is capable of being leavened, may be.

"The Standard" of March 28th is received, containing your final review, the main-point of which is, that "Baptism is a command which I confound with promises." In the BIBLE EXAMINER, for October, 1800, I wrote as follows:

"There are three instances on record in which Baptism is placed before repentant sinners as a command. On the day of Pentecost, Peter said, 'Repent and be baptized every one of you, for the remission of sins; and you shall receive the gift of the Holy Spirit: again, it is recorded, that he commanded Cornelius and his associates, to be baptized into the name of the Lord;' and Ananias said unto Saul of Tarsus, 'And now, why tarriest thou? arise and be baptized, and wash away thy sins, calling on the name of the Lord.' These are the only three instances, we remember, where baptism is commanded. As a command, however, it does not require the performance of a positive act; but simply that the individual become the passive subject of an act performed by another; in other words, it commands submission, rather than performance."

This is perfectly in agreement with Professor W. K. Pendleton, in this same "Standard," who writes:

"The substance of the command always involves the agency of an administrator, a passive subject, and his immersion in water. One does not immerse himself, neither does he lie down upon the shores and let the waves flow over him; but he gives himself into the hands of another, and passively submits to be put under the water by him."

If therefore you can divest yourself of the bias of your theory and look at the question in its true and simple bearings, you must perceive that the baptism of the Scriptures is receptive, even the reception of "The promise of the Father; and in no sense the active performance of a duty: and that what you call, "the obedience of faith," is truly and legitimately the result, or outworking of faith—its natural outward expression. There never was and never can be the receptive submission of the Gospel till faith is wrought in the heart; and when faith is wrought there, it finds its expression in acts of devotion and love which constitute the obedience of faith;" and thus we are agreed that baptism is the reception of "The promise of the Father."

But, my dear brother, you think, speak, act, and write as though the question, that water is the element into which Christian baptism is performed is beyond question, and therefore beyond the pale of further controversy; that your publication of my articles was a personal courtesy, and of any thing further upon the same subject an unnecessary condescension. All this may be very gratifying to your own love of approbation, and is undoubtedly believed as the verity of truth by Reformers. Hence you utter with bold and fearless confidence your own and their sentiments, when you say, "The baptism which is commanded is Christian baptism, and it is water baptism which is commanded." Is this really so? Such marked, positive, and strong utterances should truly be beyond controversy. But is it so? To be beyond controversy no element but water should ever have been referred to into which Christians could, or should be baptized. When John said, "I indeed baptize you with water," he ought never to have uttered the possibility of any other baptism. But he said, also, "He shall baptize you with the Holy Ghost." Thus John speaks of baptism with or into water and baptism with or into the Holy Ghost.

Second: Jesus says, referring to his death, "I have a baptism to be baptized with, and how am I straitened until it be accomplished."

Third: Jesus repeats John's declaration—"You shall be baptized with the Holy Ghost not many days hence."

Fourth: Paul speaks of baptism into death" as the process of being "baptized into the Christ;" and therefore he says, "As many of you as have been baptized into the Christ have put on the Christ."

Lastly: "For by one Spirit we are all baptized into one body."

Now, before it can be claimed, that the element into which Christian baptism must invariably be performed is water it is incumbent upon the affirmants to demonstrate, either that death, the Holy Ghost, the person of Jesus, or the "one body" are not elements into which persons can be baptized, or they must demonstrate that water invariably meets every case. And this would involve the explanation of the contrast that John drew between water and Holy Spirit as two diverse elements into which persons must be baptized. In short, no reason can be found why the term baptism "into Jesus the Christ," does not mean as really what it says, as baptism into water means baptism into water. You impose upon yourselves the herculean task of proving that with, or into, means what it says when it refers to water, but when it refers "to the Holy Spirit," to "death," to Jesus the Christ" "to the one body" it does not mean what it says, but something else that you infer. And if you should succeed in the task you have imposed upon yourselves; why then, you will have annihilated "the Christ;" for the existence of "the one body," constituting "the Christ" is dependent upon the fact of each individual member being by "the one spirit baptized into the one body;" or, as Paul elsewhere expresses it, "For as many of you as were baptized into the Christ, have put on the Christ;" and are, therefore "members of his body, of his flesh, and of his bones." Thus the element of Christian Baptism is that which absorbs, assimilates and incorporates into its own nature the subject that is dipped, submerged and absolutely subjected to it, endowing it with its own attributes.

But I forbear; for the result or logical outcome of your argument is so absurd, that it will not bear the light of further exposure, and yet you blindly vaunt your position as beyond controversy! Whereas, the thick darkness that might be felt at the commencement of the Reformation is but slowly being dispelled, as evidenced by the fact that at this moment all the parties to the Baptismal controversy have taken for granted the ground taken by the Mother of Harlots, namely, that water is the element, and have only disputed about the mode of its application. So far, then, from this question being decided, or being beyond the pale of controversy, you have not even touched or attempted to touch it. True, you may stave it off; but sooner or later it will compel your attention and exact your consideration.

What, we ask, is clear and unquestioned testimony, free from inference? When such you produce to sustain your position, then we bow with reverence, shall say, Amen, and close our mouths, and stop our pen, for ever, as against the clear and unquestionable utterances of the Scriptures.

But to the point used by you,—"Baptism is a command." "How redest thou?" We read, Then Peter said unto them, repent and be baptized every one of you into the name of Jesus the Christ. for the remission of sins." Peter does not name water in these premises. You are compelled to infer all the water you find in this case. But Peter's command is not indefinite or unexpressed, for he distinctly names the element into which he would have these people baptized, namely, "into the name of Jesus the Christ." And so in like manner, he commanded Cornelius and his household to be baptized "into the name of the Lord." And so Ananias baptized Saul, "invoking the name of the Lord." These the only three instances in which baptism is urged as a command are in perfect accordance with the commission our blessed Lord gave to his apostles, saying, go teach all nations, baptizing them into the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Ghost. In every instance you are compelled to assume that water is the element. It is not expressed in the commission, nor affirmed as such in either of the cases where it is commanded.

You have been permitted to assume your position and beg this question long enough. We now claim that you meet it fairly with argument, not with ridicule; and sincerely trusting that the wedge of truth has gained an entrance into the strong bias of your position, we would fain hope that you will be compelled to think and reason independently and thus we commit the controversy to the keeping of our heavenly Father, who teacheth all according to their receptive ability with the earnest prayer that we may "see eye to eye" and be led as little children in the paths of the Father's favor.

Your earnest Brother in the Lord Jesus the Christ.

BAPTISM: THE REVIEWER REVIEWED.

This subject has been largely ventilated, recently, in "The Christian Standard" (a Campbelite paper), Cincinnati, in which GEO. B. STACY, Va., set forth his view of the true Christian baptism, and the Editor of the "Standard" reviewed it, but declined allowing Stacy to reply. Friend Stacy requests the reply to be placed in the EXAMINER, and says:

"You may think it unnecessary to re-open the baptism question: but I submit that the question of a "New Creation," a new birth, a change of nature, is not a secondary question to the sons of God, the heirs of the kingdom; and any argument that leads to the intelligent comprehension of these wonderful provisions of our Father's infinite love is all-important with them. . . . This question of water baptism is one of the Harlot's great enchantments, and needs to be utterly demolished, and therefore the question should be discussed occasionally."

As friend Stacy has in former years been an advocate of water baptism, as well as that of the Spirit, and has written in its defence in the EXAMINER, I have concluded to let his "Reply" to the "Standard's Review" appear in an EXAMINER EXTRA. It is well known that I have for years held the view that Christian baptism is that of the Spirit; and I have seen no argument against that view that has shaken my faith therein; but the reverse,—I have only been confirmed the more.—EDITOR.

AMELIA C. H., Va., March 29, 1874.

BRO. ERRETT: As truth alone is the object I seek, and would fain hope that you are governed by the same noble and God-honoring desire and pursuit, I present the following considerations, not, however, that I expect you to publish them, but simply that you may see that according to my understanding, you have not even touched my arguments; and that, evidently to me, resultant from the necessary bias of the theory you support and contend for. It seems impossible for poor humanity to rise above the bias of its preconceptions and think and act independently. As a consequence, you have represented me as affirming that which it is impossible logically to force into my statements.

But first, let me ask whether you wish it understood that baptism of the Holy Spirit is simply a metaphor, as well as baptism of fire?

Matthew says, "Then went out to him Jerusalem and all Judea, and all the region round about Jordan." Luke says, "Then said he to the multitudo that came forth to be baptized of him: O generation of vipers! who hath warned you to flee from the wrath to come?"

Again, "Think not to say within yourselves, we have Abraham to our father: for I say unto you, that God is able of these stones to raise up children unto Abraham." John also said unto these same parties, "I indeed baptize you with water," (namely, the multitude,—the inhabitants of Jerusalem, Judea and the region round about Jordan," who came to him and were baptized of him), "but one mightier than I cometh, the latchet of whose shoes I am not worthy to unloose: he shall baptize you with the Holy Ghost and with fire."

Now, what does the entire statement imply? And what does history record of the parties addressed?

If we are to accept these teachings as truth, then, every one whom John baptized with water, must have been baptized either with the Holy Ghost, or with fire; for John continues, "Whose fan is in his hand and he will thoroughly purge his floor, and will gather the wheat into his garner; but the chaff he will burn up with unquenchable fire." I accept therefore the statement of John as addressed to the parties who heard him, as having a literal fulfilment so far as they were concerned; and were it not that the baptism of the Holy Ghost, which occurred on Pentecost, is called "the promise of the Father," in relation to which the Saviour took great pains to instruct his disciples, I should be disposed to accept the Lord's ministry of grace and judgment upon the Jewish nation as the consummation of John's declaration, or rather the Lord's mission. But after his resurrection, "being assembled with them, he commanded them that they should not depart from Jerusalem, but wait for the promise of the Father, which, saith he, ye have heard of me. For John truly baptized with water; but you shall be baptized with the Holy Ghost, not many days hence." Here the Saviour identifies the promise of the Father "with the baptism of the Holy Ghost" by the preposition for, or because, as "John baptized with water you shall be baptized with the Holy Ghost not many days hence." Now John declared to that generation of vipers, that the Lord would baptize them with fire. But when Jesus addresses his disciples only, he simply promises to "baptize them with the Holy Ghost." And if language has any meaning, he calls this "baptism of the Holy Ghost," "THE PROMISE OF THE FATHER."

That is the great, pre-eminent, and most important of all promises; so that it is worthy to be called by way of distinction, "The promise of the Father," around which, and dependent upon which, all other promises hang. Hence Peter affirms on the day of Pentecost, that it had been necessary for him to ascend to the right hand of the Majesty in the heavens that he might be invested with the right and capacity, to administer this great pre-eminent "promise of the Father;" and having received of the Father the promise of the Holy Ghost, He baptized them with it. Can language be more specific? Having received of the Father the promise of the Holy Ghost, He "shed forth that which they saw and heard;" and he continued affirming, that this same "promise is unto you, and to your children, and to all that are afar off, even as many as the Lord our God shall call."

If our blessed Lord and his servant Peter have not identified "the baptism of the Holy Ghost" as "the great promise of the Father," which he has made to all, then, I am unable to know what either of them taught in the premises; and before you can sustain your position, you must show that "the promise of the Father, and "the baptism of the Holy Ghost" are not identical.

But the gist of your argument is based upon your erroneous statement of my position, contained in your No. 5, namely, "Sinners could not believe or have a single aspiration after God until the baptism of the Spirit was received." Permit me to say, that, there is no statement of mine you have printed, from which the above can be logically deduced. It is true I affirm, the baptism of the Spirit and the birth of the Spirit are one and the same. And so the great change to be wrought on man is called "regeneration," "New birth," and "new creation." But we must not forget that, these terms are used in the same sense that they are used in relation to natural, or physical things. Now when we say a thing was generated, we mean that it has passed through a slow and progressive process, having progressive stages of development till consummated. The forces that produce it, began to operate as soon as the process commences; but the thing is not generated till the process in all its stages is consummated. Thus in being "born again," the person is begotten of the word of truth; quickened by the Spirit, and finally born of the Spirit; when the process of spiritual gestation is consummated. And so the same process is illustrated in the parable of the sower. "The word of the kingdom" is sown broadcast into the hearts of all classes of men; and as it is the vital living principle; it vegetates and develops to the full extent of the capacity of sustenance found in each heart, as the soil; And thus it is that whatever of good is found in human aspirations and dispositions is, because "the word of the kingdom," in some of its phases, has found soil in which to vegetate, and the good is its fruit; for "every good gift and every perfect gift is from above, and cometh down from the Father of lights." Hence, "Of His own will begat He us by the word of truth." Now, as in nature many seeds vegetate that never mature, because of the poverty of the soil in which they germinate; and others because they are choked out by a ranker growth of briars and thorns; so in the spiritual world; the Lord soweth "the good seed" in all hearts; or; He begets or impregnates all men with the word of the truth, and the results correspond to nature; few of nature's impregnations develop to what is known as quickening or individual vitality; and even after this stage is accomplished there are many abortions; so that it does not follow that because there is a begetting there will be a matured birth. But we are justified in looking for the preliminary stages of development which precede, and when matured, necessitate the birth, without being compelled to affirm that these can only follow birth.

We only reiterate the Apostle's statement, that "The natural man receiveth not the things of the spirit of God: for they are foolishness to him: neither can he know them, because they are spiritually discerned." Not till after birth is there, or can there be, conscious comprehension of their own spiritual relations. The Spirit's power on the affections may lead to actions that may be called its results; and they will belong definitely to the different stages of gestation the person may have arrived at; these however are all preliminary and belong to the incipient stages of the new birth, and may never be consummated. You must, therefore, see that my language, legitimately construed, cannot be made to express what you have represented; but that my affirmations are consistent with the facts in the premises. Also, that what I call a physical act is one springing from the motive of acceptable servitude; or to do that which shall entitle us to the favor of God. Obedience is the performance of a duty—the performance of a legal obligation—and where glory and power must be again, according to the sure word of God; there is the city of the living God, the heavenly Jerusalem, still high above, not yet seen by mortal eye, either on the earth or in the air. It is common, in a bad school of interpretation, to evaporate its substantial glories into smoke; but it is a reality—the city which hath foundations, whose builder and maker is God. He who built even for natural man a splendid structure, roofed with stars, builds a nobler edifice for the glorified, which needs no candle, or lamp, or sun, or moon, the light all proceeding from the face of God. As we write, the grand river shines before us, and the tree of life is in full bloom, carrying back the mind to the Eden of the prime, and showing that the books of Holy Writ are bound together by something stronger than packthread. Then there are the innumerable company of angels. Has the editor of the "Witness" seen them? We shall see them, for when the Anointed cometh in his kingdom,—returns, again to the habitable earth,—they shall all worship him. He will be the true Jacob's ladder, as Son of God and King of Israel, uniting the heavens and the earth; and we, with Nathaniel the guileless, shall see the angels ascending and descending upon him.

Then there is the general assembly—the church of the first-born—the spirits of just men made perfect. The church of the first-born only comes into manifestation at the period for which every creature sighs and all creation is in birth-pangs. The general assembly is indeed a glorious gathering in the place where all the nobles of the earth meet in the communion which is eternal; and spirits of just men are never made perfect until they put on their resurrection bodies and stand in perfect manhood. Likewise with God the Father, with his Son the Mediator, we approach into closer, richer union— beholding the face of the Father, and receiving from the Mediator all the treasures which have been purchased by his blood, and secured by his life. The possession of these things is reserved for the kingdom-glory; for instead of having that kingdom in this dispensation, we cannot have it until the SECOND SHAKING COMES. He who once shook the earth at Sinai, will on another greater occasion shake, not the earth only, but heaven also, that all corrupt and imperfect things may perish in the blast and rebuke of God, and the everlasting kingdom shine forth. We are in one sense receiving that kingdom by growing in preparation for it, by advancing in the life of God and in the power of the Spirit, which is an earnest of kingdom-glory, bringing forth fruits of holiness and faith. Even here again the reader, who desires to see how the glories of Israel are interwoven with ours, can read in Hag. ii.

The author has difficulties, and sees incongruities in the theory of the Pre-millenarians. He could make him out a list much more formidable respecting the things which we believe in common, viz., the birth of the Son of God from the womb of the virgin; the death of a guiltless being for the sins of the world, and his resurrection from the dead. We have seen them all paraded in infidel books from Celsus to Holyoake, and could state the case very plausibly.

The difficulties and incongruities which he sees and feels are not weighty; and most of them are based on tradition and imagination. For instance, he has a difficulty in conceiving the intercourse of the glorified with the people still in the flesh during the personal reign. As to the extent or continuity of such intercourse we have no decisive information. As to the fact itself, the difficulty is uncalled for. We have abounding instances of communion between angels and men in the olden times. The host of God walked the earth, and mingled among men on errands of wrath or mercy. But more immediately to the point:—Our Lord, in his resurrection body of power and freedom, was with his disciples for forty days, giving them instruction. They did eat and drink with him after he was raised from the dead, though the residence with them was not so continuous as it had been before his crucifixion.

Another great difficulty of our author is as to how the risen saints can reign over nations during the millennium, considering that there has been a great conflagration destroying the framework of the earth. This difficulty is based upon several assumptions. First, it assumes that the great conflagration takes place at the beginning of the millennium which personal reign people hold. Now the most eminent interpreters of the premillennial school deny that position entirely, and place the fiery cataclysm at the close of the thousand years in connexion with the judgment of the great white throne. Second, it assumes that the conflagration will be universal—an assumption in regard to which he will meet with much wider sympathy, but one which the writer of this notice has no faith in, holding that it is neither proved nor capable of proof.

Third, it assumes that in case of a universal conflagration, God would not be able to keep alive the people whom he desired to preserve; but surely this is unreasonable. He can save from the fire, as he did from the water, all who are comprehended in the depths of his fathomless wisdom and love.

The most formidable difficulty presented is in connection with the modified revival of the Jewish polity. We have never felt this as a burden, but we are aware that it presses upon many: even among millenarians, many regard the last chapter in Ezekiel as the provision for some lapsed economy, a large scheme of glory never realized in consequence of unfaithfulness, and now quite gone away from possibility. But all this arises from the rationalism which surcharges our modern atmosphere, and it vanishes away from the simplicity of faith. Two or three considerations may be presented.

I. The apostles and the tens of thousands who had received the Lord in Judea and Jerusalem, long after Christ had ascended to the right hand of God, remained steadfast in adherence to the synagogue and the temple services. The great number of the priests who became obedient to the faith discovered no incompatibility between their new convictions and their old sacrificial service. Circumcision was never abolished so far as the Jew was concerned. So long as the temple service remained, the apostles participated in the worship reverentially by alms and offerings; and doubtless, there was supernatural grace flowing through the ancient ordinances. It was the Providence of God, permitted in Roman vengeance, rather than any doctrinal decree which clave asunder the connection between the Old Temple and the New Church.

II. We recognize the severance: since that time the Church, led by the Spirit of God, has gone another road, and is preparing for an elevation to which Judaism cannot attain. When the great door of the new age opens, the Church, which has gone through its own peculiar stages of development, reaches a goal which Levitic culture never could have given her. She, in her supreme glory, is done with ordinances of Church or Temple, being transformed into the immortal beauty, and invested with the terrible power of her great Head.

III. We must bear in mind that not only Jews from graves and Assyrian glooms, but myriads of heathen from the bondage of darkness and superstition, require spiritual education in the age which is approaching. In consideration of their mental and moral position, when the veil is lifted and the covering torn away, we can conceive of no better training school than that which is declared by the Prophets. A sacrificial culture for centuries and ages is exactly what they need. No man need be alarmed, as if the PERFECT SACRIFICE of love would lose any of its lustre; for that matchless wonder is in the CENTRE: the sacrifices of old looked forward to it, and the sacrifices of the future will look backward to it; hence it will always be the reality, the fountain head of all the rich life which streams through holy ordinances.

In that portion of Ezekiel which frightens some people, there is a passage of great spiritual beauty and force, with which we may conclude the present article. The prophet, who had seen the departing glory, is permitted to see the return. When the magnificent temple is finished, which has not yet been built, save in the Divine purpose, the prophet is brought to the gate which has an eastern prospect: "And, behold, the glory of the God of Israel came from the way of the east: and his voice was like a noise of many waters: and the earth shined with his glory." "So the Spirit took me up, and brought me into the inner court; and, behold, the glory of the Lord filled the house." "And he said unto me, Son of man, the place of my throne, and the place of the soles of my feet, where I will dwell in the midst of the children of Israel for ever, and my holy name shall the house of Israel no more defile." (xliiii.) But the remaining objections of the "Christian Witness," must be deferred for a concluding article. G. GREENWELL.

THE DYING HEBREW'S PRAYER.

A Hebrew knelt, in the dying light,
His eye was dim and cold,
The hairs on his brow were silver-white,
And his blood was thin and old!
He lifted his look to his latest sun,
For, he knew that his pilgrimage was done,
And as he saw God's shadow there,
His spirit mounted itself in prayer!
"I come unto death's second birth,
Beneath a stranger air,
A pilgrim on a dull, cold earth,
As all my fathers were!
And men have stamped me with a curse,

I feel it is not Thine,
 Thy mercy—like yon sun—was made
 On me—as them—to shine:
 And, therefore, dare I lift mine eye,
 Through that to Thee—before I die!
 In this great temple, built by Thee,
 Whose altars are divine,
 Beneath yon lamp that, ceaselessly,
 Lights up Thine own true shrine,
 Oh! take my latest sacrifice,
 Look down and make this sod
 Holy as that where, long ago,
 The Hebrew met his God!
 I have not caused the widow's tears,
 Nor dimmed the orphan's eye,
 I have not stained the virgin's years,
 Nor mocked the mourner's cry;
 The songs of Zion in mine ear,
 Had ever been most sweet,
 And always when I felt Thee near
 My 'shoes' were 'off my feet!'
 I have known Thee in the whirlwind,
 I have known Thee on the hill,
 I have loved Thee in the voice of birds,
 Or the music of the rill!
 I dreamt Thee in the shadow,
 I saw Thee in the light,
 I heard Thee in the thunder peal,
 And worshipped in the night!
 All beauty while it spoke of Thee,
 Still made my soul rejoice,
 And my spirit bowed within itself,
 To hear Thy "still-small voice!"—
 I have not felt myself a thing,
 Far from thy presence driven,
 By flaming sword or warring wing,
 Shut out from Thee and heaven!
 Must I the whirlwind reap, because
 My fathers sowed the storm,
 Or shrink—because another sinned—
 Beneath Thy red right arm?
 Oh! much of this we dimly scan.
 And much is all unknown;
 But I will not take my curse from man—
 I turn to Thee alone!
 Oh! bid my fainting spirit live,
 And what is dark reveal,
 And what is evil, oh! forgive,
 And what is broken heal.
 And cleanse my nature, from above,
 In the deep Jordan of Thy love!
 I know not if the Christian's heaven
 Shall be the same as mine:
 I only ask to be forgiven,
 And taken home to Thine!
 I weary on a far dim strand,
 Whose mansions are as tombs.

And long to find the fatherland,
 Where there are many homes!
 Oh! grant, of all yon starry thrones,
 Some dim and distant star,
 Where Judah's lost and scattered sons
 May love Thee from afar!
 When all earth's myriad harps shall meet
 In choral praise and prayer,
 Shall Zion's harp—of old, so sweet—
 Alone be wanting there?
 Yet place me in Thy lowest seat,
 Though I—as now—be there,
 The Christian's scorn, the Christian's jest.
 But let me see and hear,
 From some dim mansion in the sky.
 Thy bright ones and their melody."

The sun goes down with sudden gleam,
 And beautiful as a lovely dream,
 And silently as air:
 The vision of a dark-eyed girl,
 With long and raven hair,
 Glides in—as guardian spirits glide—
 And lo! is kneeling by his side;
 As if her sudden presence there
 Were sent in answer to his prayer!
 Oh! say they not that angels tread
 Around the good man's dying bed!
 His child!—his sweet and sinless child!—
 And as he gazed on her,
 He knew his God was reconciled,
 And this the messenger—
 As sure as God had hung on high
 The promise bow before his eye!—
 Earth's purest hope thus o'er him flung,
 To point his heavenward faith,
 And life's most holy feeling strung.
 To sing him into death!
 And on his daughter's stainless breast,
 The dying Hebrew sought his rest.

ILLOGICAL LOGIC.

"There is just this to be said, finally, as between Christianity and infidelity. The first teaches the immortality of the soul; therefore, that man is more than a beast. The second denies the immortality of the soul, thereby affirming that man is merely a beast. Let men once believe this, and there is nothing to prevent them from living like beasts, also. That is argument enough."—Chicago Times.

It seems by the Chicago papers that priests and laymen are strongly at war with each other; and judging from what appears from some copies of the "Times"—which some one sends me occasionally—one would think "the blind were leading the blind" on theological and infidel topics.

The above editorial, from the "Times," after having said some good things against infidelity shows how easy it is to reason illogically on the subject. It first assumes that Christianity "teaches the immortality of the soul;" which has no foundation in the Bible, and is "built on the sand." It then infers that thus "man is more than a beast." Though man is more than a beast, it is not because he has an "immortal soul. He has an intellect above a beast, and immortality is placed within his reach by the arrangement of his Maker and Redeemer; but he is liable to perish like a beast. Such is the teaching of the Bible.

To deny the immortality of the soul—says the "Times"—is "affirming that man is merely a beast." It is evident the "Times" has not studied the immortality question. Infidels may deny the immortality of the soul, and hold that men are merely animal; but it does not follow that because man is animal, and has not an immortal soul, that therefore he is merely a beast; for he has powers of mind far above a mere beast, and may attain to immortality or an endless life by the grace of his Maker and Redeemer.

Let the "Times" learn to meet Infidels with Scripture arguments; not with false ones and "traditions of men," as it has done in the above illogical logic. Such statements as it has made will convince no thinking mind of the truth of its position. Man is a dying creature; naturally possessed of no principles of immortality, but is a candidate for it and may attain unto it by a compliance with his Creator's will while passing through his proper state of trial for a final destiny. In other words, he may attain to an endless life by the acceptance of and submission to the Son of God as his redeemer, LIFE-GIVER, and "Lord, to the glory of God the Father.

The "argument" of the "Times" may be "enough" for the ignorant and uninformed; but it has no force with a thoroughly informed mind. With such, it is seen to be unsound and illogical. It is better calculated to make infidels than to prevent the spread of infidelity; because it draws in its train hopeless and endless torment or universal salvation. One or the other of these results is inevitable from the position that the soul is immortal. The doctrine of endless torments has made and is making infidels; and drives others into Universalism as a natural result of inherent immortality; for, a God of infinite wisdom, knowledge, justice and love, could never bring a creature into existence whose being, on the whole, would be worse than non-existence. Ed.

STRANGE CONTRADICTIONS.

I lately cut an important item of truth from the "Herald of Life," and the next week saw the same article in the "Worlds Crisis." It is the following:

WITHOUT the Holy Spirit to unfold, impress and quicken, the Bible remains a book not understood, and the Saviour as a root out of dry ground, without form or comeliness, and the preaching of Christ and him crucified but a "vain babbling of foolishness."

When the Bible is seen as a whole this is found to be a truth expressed in the briefest possible human language. In the Scriptures it is expressed still more briefly. These men are said to be "dead in trespasses and sin" (Eph. ii. 1-5). 1 Cor. ii. 14 states the same truth plainly—"The natural man receiveth not the things of the Spirit of God: for they are foolishness unto him: neither can he know them, because they are spiritually discerned." Jer. xiii: 23, shows the same doctrine in a still stronger way: "Can the Ethiopian change his skin, or the leopard his spots?" These are specimens of numerous passages which prove the sentiment correct which these papers have noticed in this short item.

But since some of us, by hard study, have learned from the Bible, as a whole, that God, in his sovereignty, is, in this dispensation, only "unfolding, impressing, and quickening, by the Spirit," a few—the "little flock," to be "heirs with Christ" in effecting this same work on the mass of the impenitent dead, after their resurrection, these papers and others, and the mass of Christians, are flatly contradicting the doctrine advanced in the same short item. They tell us that all in gospel bonds are "impressed by the Spirit and do understand the Bible and the preaching of Christ and him crucified;" and so, as the mass knowingly and wilfully reject Christ and the offers of mercy, they ought not, and will not have another chance to hear the "good news," and be made to understand it better by "the Elect Church" and the work of the Holy Spirit.

This is the trouble as to those in Christian lands; but when we ask opposers about the state and final doom of the heathen—two-thirds of our race—we get an evasive answer, and all is confusion. They dare not say the heathen are impressed by the Spirit, and understand God's plan of salvation; and the Bible compels them to admit that all who are saved must be saved by faith in Christ; yet they dare not say that all the heathen will be lost, for this makes God appear partial and cruel in not sending them the gospel, seeing he was able to do so. Thus, as their theory forbids repentance and mercy after death and a resurrection, all becomes confusion as to God's dealings with the mass of our race. Contrary to good reason and Bible statements, God is made to delight in misery by voluntarily bringing into existence, at least ninety-nine out of one-hundred of the race, foreknowing they would, by his own laws and by blindness, suffer untold misery while they live, and all to no good end.

The fact is, contradictions, confusion and gloom, must continue till men learn, by a closer study of the Bible, that God, in his great plan, has purposed to leave a vail over the mass of our race—both in heathen and Christian lands, “until the fulness of the Gentiles be come in.” When Christ returns, that vail, blindness, and stupidity, will be removed, both from the living and the risen impenitent dead: and so the declaration of the angels to the shepherds will be fulfilled: “Behold, I bring you good tidings of great joy, which shall be to all people;” also the oath and promise of God to Abraham that in “Christ all the nations of the earth shall be blessed.”

For a small part of the proof of my statement in this last paragraph, I kindly ask the reader to carefully examine Isa. xxv. 6-9; Psa. xxii. 27-31, and lxxxvi. 9; Ezk. xvi. 53-68; Rom. xi. and 2 Cor. iii. 13-16.

I have only time now to throw out these few thoughts on this subject, hoping that others will make it plainer, as it is very important in establishing our theory, that the mass of our race will be finally saved, either as “kings and priests,” or as happy subjects in the everlasting kingdom of God; and, so “the ways of God to man be justified.”

THE ABOMINATION OF MATT. XXIV: 15 AND MARK XIII: 14

Let any person of mind unbiased and ordinary understanding, read Matt. xxiv. 15, and the three verses following; also, Mark xiii. 14, and the two verses following; and then ask himself or herself this question: Can the abomination here presented, be Popery? The deliberate answer be, No. Reader, this “abomination” is not Popery. Those known among Adventists as “Time People” say that Papal Supremacy began in the Sixth Century; which, I shall not deny. And they say that the “standing” of the “abomination” of Matt. and Mark, was the Papacy in the first half of the Sixth Century. Friends, where was the Papacy in the Sixth Century? In Rome, in the Italian Peninsula, or the Continent of Europe, where it always has been, and is yet. (For seventy years, however, the Popes resided at Avignon, in France.) But what does Jesus say when speaking of this “abomination?” Hear Him: Matt. xxiv. 16, “Then let them which be in Judea, flee into the mountains: (read on,) Mark xiii. 14, etc. Now, friends, what could the fact of the Bishop of Rome being made by Imperial decree “Head of all the Churches,” have to do with people in Judea, or the Continent of Asia? Judens in Asia fleeing into mountains because a Bishop became a Pope in Europe, far away by sea or land from Palestine! The people of Judea were too far from Rome to “see” anything there.

Mentioning this matter in a meeting of “Timists” in this city, some months since, I was referred to the Crusaders. But the Crusaders were not in being until the Seventh Century; and as Judea is the land, and only land spoken of by Christ, any action of Crusaders in Judea fulfilling the “standing” of the abomination would be fatal to the chronology of the “Timists.” Confess and renounce error. P. S.—The foregoing was sent to the “Herald of Life,” but denied.

THE SIN UNTO DEATH.

1. What is the sin against the Holy Ghost? 2. What is the punishment for that sin? 3. Why never forgiven? These three questions cover the ground. 1. The sin. Mark iii. 22, 30. And the scribes which came down from Jerusalem said, Jesus hath Beelzebub, and by the prince of the devils casteth he out devils. . . . Because they said, He hath an unclean spirit.

After Jesus had cast out devils by the Spirit of God, they said it was by the devil. Heb. x. 26, 30. For if we sin wilfully after that we have received the knowledge of the truth, and hath done dispite unto the Spirit of grace. After they were made partakers of the Holy Ghost. Heb. vi. 4. To wilfully do despite to the Spirit of grace, after having light and knowledge in the head, and have had the Spirit of God in the heart. This is the sin against the Holy Ghost.

2. The penalty. Mark iii. 29. Is in danger of eternal damnation, or eternal judgment, Heb. vi, 2, which is the same thing in the original. That would be a final and unchangeable decision of the judge, whatever the penalty might be. Paul writes, to the Hebrews, what might take place when their nation is destroyed, Heb. x. 27, 28. But a certain fearful looking for of judgment and fiery indignation, which shall devour the adversaries, that is, to die "without mercy." 1 John v. 16. There is a sin unto death: I do not say that he shall pray for it. See this illustrated, Acts v. 1—10. But a certain man named Ananias, with Sapphira his wife, sold a possession, and kept back part of the price, and lied to the Holy Ghost, and both fell down and died.

Here the penalty of death was executed immediately upon the offenders as from God. Then the unchangeable, eternal judgment of God is that such sinners shall die without mercy, or forgiveness.

3. Shall not be forgiven. Matt xii. 31, 32: "All manner of sin and blasphemy shall be forgiven unto men: but the blasphemy against the Holy Ghost shall not be forgiven unto men neither in this world, neither in the world to come." The fair inference is, that all other sins shall be forgiven in the world to come.

To be forgiven is to have the penalty remitted. This cannot be. Because the full penalty must be inflicted upon the guilty one. Then what shall it be? endless misery, annihilation, or restoration?

Here we leave this awful subject for the present. J. B. FRISBIE.

PRESENCE OF GOD.—"Do I feel God? I am sure life is capable of feeling life; and of all beings in existence God is most palpably manifest to pure life. "Blessed are the pure in heart, for they shall see God." Does my heart distinctly perceive his beauty and glory? If not, I am bound to assume that my feelings are all wrong; for if this first feeling is not right, all the rest will partake of the grossness which prevents my seeing God. The reason why we cannot see him is simply our grossness.

"We have no right to account ourselves pure, or trust our feelings in any other direction, if we are not pure enough to see God. If we do not perceive the central glory, we are bound to conclude we are radically gross. "If thine eye be single, thy whole body is full of light."

Correspondence.

FROM ELD. H. ROCKWELL.

BRO. STORRS: I feel deeply impressed to present a few passages from the Bible, and earnestly solicit the candid and prayerful attention of all lovers of truth to examine and respond to them, so that the subject may be fairly presented to all sincere inquirers.

Paul said, "Let a man so account us, as of the ministers of Christ, and stewards of the mysteries of God" (1 Cor. iv. 1). Question: What are these mysteries? Were they something that had not been so fully developed that all men could fully understand them? "Therefore judge nothing before the time, until the Lord come, who both will bring to light the hidden things of darkness, and will make manifest the counsels of the hearts; and then shall every man have praise of God" (1 Cor. iv. 5).

Some men will, and do say, and with much apparent certainty, that, after the Lord comes, there will be nothing more to be done for the benefit of our race. But we ask, Why? Will the coming of the Lord so completely paralyze the strong arm of the eternal God that he can do nothing? If so, What will be the condition of the redeemed church of the first born from the dead? If God has nothing to do, I think that the situation would soon produce restlessness and discontent: for, unless He finds something for them to do, it would not be in harmony with His will for them to find anything for themselves.

But I praise the Lord that I have hope to join with that company of God's Evangelists in "the ages to come;" and with them to herald the glad song by angels sung on the plains of Judea, long time ago, when the Angel of the Lord said unto the shepherds, "Fear not: for, behold, I bring you good tidings of great joy, which shall be to all people" (Luke ii. 10). O, what a multitude had not at that time heard the blessed announcement; no, nor ever can without a resurrection from the dead? This will comprise one part of God's blessing in the promise to Abraham.

O, then, awake, ye that wait for the coming of our Lord; put on strength. O Zion, awake from thy sadness! put on thy beautiful garments. Behold thy King cometh! Yes, Lord; "And it shall come to pass, in that day, that the great trumpet shall be blown; and they shall come which were ready to perish in the land of Assyria, and the outcasts in the land of Egypt, and shall worship the Lord in the holy mount at Jerusalem." O, who, that hath an ear for music, will not shout for joy when the great trumpet of God shall sound out its sweet notes of triumph, when the veil of the covering, so long spread over all flesh, shall be removed? "Fear not: for I am with thee: I will bring thee seed from the east, and gather thee from the west: I will say to the north, Give up; and to the south, Keep not back: bring my sons from far, and my daughters from the ends of earth: even every one that is called by my name; for I have created him for my glory: I have formed him; yea, I have made him. Bring forth the blind people that have eyes, and the deaf that have ears. Let all nations be gathered together, and let the people be assembled. Who among them can declare this, and show us former things? Let them bring forth their witnesses, that they may be justified, or let them hear and say, It is truth" (Isa. xliii. 8-9).

Again, Paul says, "Unto me, who am less than the least of all saints, is this grace given, that I should preach among the Gentiles the unsearchable riches of Christ; and to make all men see what is the fellowship of the mystery, which from the beginning of the ages hath been hid in God, who created all things by Jesus Christ: to the intent that now unto principalities and powers in heavenly places might be known by the church the manifold wisdom of God" (Eph. iii. 8-10).

Now it appears to me, Paul would not come back, even if we desired it, to inform us of these mysteries: but I only wish that God would open our understanding so that we might understand the Scriptures. O, how my lonely heart crieth for the light and truth of the Bible. O Lord enlighten my way: guide me through the darkness of this gloomy world!

Again, Paul says, "And without controversy, great is the mystery of godliness: God was manifest in the flesh; justified in the Spirit; seen of angels; preached unto the Gentiles; believed on in the world; received up into glory" (1 Tim. iii. 16). Yes, and thank God, he is coming again; and all that love His appearing will enter with Him into the kingdom and receive a crown of immortal honor, such as never decked the brow of mortals. O Lord, help me to await the unfolding of thy truth.

I would like to have my many friends know, that, in answer to their prayers, I still live; and although weary and lonely, yet I wait our Lord's return. I presume this communication may be my last, for I am almost worn out: my sight, hearing, memory, and strength are fast going to decay. So, fare-you-well, dear ones, till the morn of deliverance dawns on our enraptured vision.

Woodstock Valley, Conn.

FROM ELDER JOSEPH CHAPMAN.

BRO. STORRS: I am now feeling that I owe a debt of gratitude to you, but more especially to the Lord for the BIBLE EXAMINER, which has by your kindness been sent to me since it took its present improved form.

I was led to examine the great truths embraced in the mission of Christ to our world more than thirty years since. I firmly embraced the only safe mode of Bible exposition; that is the literal, just as in the reading of any other truthful book. I was thus at once very much helped in Bible study. I saw that the glorious object of the believer's hope was most clearly and positively the second "appearing and kingdom of our Lord Jesus Christ" (2 Tim. iv. 1). This truth I dare not conceal in my thoughts, but have proclaimed wherever permitted as an under shepherd of the flock of Christ. I have also written them for periodicals that would admit them, and sent them out in tract form, not specially regarding the frowns or smiles of foes or friends.

I have been, and am still impressed with the abiding belief that this great event and glorious consummation is near at hand, even at the door. I am confirmed in this from the fact, that these great cardinal truths of the Gospel are rejected by the popular worldly-wise masses of professed Christians of the day, as was Christ, his disciples and doctrines, by the Jewish doctors and Church at Christ's first appearing. How evidently coming events now cast their shadows before them: and the question is now urged upon us, "Can ye not discern the signs of the times?" Alas, how few "have ears to hear." Thus shall it "come as a snare upon all" (mere dwellers) "upon the earth" at the end of this age, or "time of the Gentiles." It will when in another age be very different in the Divine administration. This next coming age is called "the day (period) of the Lord" in which will be the judgment of the nations, and beyond which will still be "the ages to come," in which God will show still more abundantly and gloriously "the exceeding riches of his grace, in his kindness toward us, through Christ Jesus" (Eph. ii. 7). In the popular theology of our day there is nothing, just nothing of this great and most precious truth so inseparably identified with the Divine character and administration! There is absolutely a famine in this word of God, all abroad in our pulpits and in our numerous religious periodicals.

Now in my seventy-third year, yet never have

I heard it even hinted at by any religious teacher: yet, there it is on the Book of God! Among the eight religious periodicals sent me, I see nothing of it, save in the "BIBLE EXAMINER." I am, therefore, most deeply interested in your labors, and conclude that for this purpose the Lord has raised you up; led you in a way you had not known, and sent you forth in this end of the age to promulgate this glorious truth in vindication of the Divine character and administration. Be assured that you have the sympathies and prayers of very many who estimate your labors "in the Lord," whom you serve.

Newark, N. Y., June 15, 1874.

ELD. SPANN TO ELD. BLAIN.

BRO. BLAIN: I am totally unknown to you, but I feel that I am well acquainted with you. I received (from you, I suppose,) a copy of "Hope for Our Race" while I was in Ft. Smith—over two years ago; have read it so much that its author seems an old acquaintance. I cannot tell you how much I thank you for the work. I had then just read Bro. Storrs' "Vindication," etc., and my mind seemed torn and troubled, and had just caught a ray of pure light, and I was struggling hard for the full light, and just at that time your work came to my relief. When I had read it, there seemed a mighty wave of light and truth to roll over me, and all was perfect peace, calmness, and a deep rejoicing that was inexpressible.

I came to this country where there is a small interest in Adventism, and I am meeting with much opposition in the way of backbiting from some of my brethren. In the meantime one of the ministers of Adventism, in company with another brother took me to themselves, a little as did Nicodemus with Christ, and insisted that I should tell them what this doctrine was. After much persuasion on their part, I yielded to their wishes and agreed to give them the outlines of the system, if we should not get into a dispute so as to get a bitter feeling. I did the best I could, not quoting much Scripture, for want of time, but referred them to your and Bro. Storrs' works for the argument. They became very much interested and gave me the money, and I sent to Bro. Storrs for a copy of each of the works. One of them is now thoroughly convinced, and four or five others very much interested; and now they want more of "Hope for Our Race" to give to others, and some of them are poor, and I see your kind offer through the EXAMINER and now ask that you send two copies, to ——. With many thanks for the light received from your labors I am, yours, in hope of a crown.

WM. W. SPANN.

Anna, Ill., May 25, 1874.

FROM ELD. JOHN FOORE.

BRO. STORRS: I have received the parcels you sent me, and have read them carefully; viz., "A Vindication of God's Government over the Children of men," etc, and also, the BIBLE EXAMINER: and I like them much; although there are some articles in the EXAMINER I do not understand as yet. But I hope it will not be long before we may all see eye to eye.

I once believed in a universal resurrection; some to die the second death: but what about the heathen who never heard of Christ? raise them up and judge them? By what? Something they never heard of! Such an idea was dark to me; yet I passed on in that view until about three years ago I began to study on the justice of God; then I came to the conclusion that God would either leave those in the grave who had never heard the Gospel, or raise them up and give them a chance for an endless life by the proclamation of the Gospel to them. But I was alone in this belief; none stood with me. I heard of "Geo. Storrs," and the hue and cry of "Universalism" by those who should have stood with him and helped him to examine the Bible; for if one man learns more than another, so let it be.

I feel truly thankful to God, and to Bro. Storrs for the glorious light I received through him and the EXAMINER. These views give me a greater love to the CREATOR of the universe.

Galesburg, Kansas, May, 1874.

C. SWIFT, Boston, Mass., writes: Mr. Parsons, the associate pastor of Nehemiah Adams, D. D., speaks out, very plainly, that things are now transpiring that were to take place immediately preceding Christ's second coming! He also teaches that Christ is to dwell here personally, and his saints are to dwell with Him. He says, This dry theology at Andover, etc., is no better than paganism! He says, He may lose his place [he occupies one of the first pulpits in the city] by preaching the truths of the Bible; but he is willing to go. Dr. Lorimer preaches in Tremont Temple (the largest congregation in the city), and I heard, a few days since, that he preaches plainly that Christ is coming, and that we shall dwell with Him on earth. There has been too much preaching of this "sky-kingdom." The Methodist ministers, in this region, have held several meetings here, in the city, to discuss the question whether the earth will be the future inheritance of the saints. The people will get their eyes open by and by.

ELDER WM. W. SPANN, Anns, Ill., writes: I have received the BIBLE EXAMINER; seven numbers of this volume, and the whole of volume 17, with several tracts. Please accept, in return (till I shall be able to do better), the warmest gratitude of my heart. I prize them higher than gold. I am glad to see the EXAMINER is free from sectarianism. Yours, in hope of the restitution.

CHARLES HOPE, West Berkshire, Vt., says: "If I could write I west much to say of my Father's love."

REMARKS BY THE EDITOR.—This speaks volumes, when I look at the evidence of a trembling hand that wrote it. The Lord bless this aged brother and keep him to His eternal kingdom.

WARREN SMITH, Cambria Mills, Mich., writes: I am very much pleased with the EXAMINER, and do most heartily endorse the views set forth therein, and pray God to bless you with strength of body and mind to go forward in the work you are now engaged in, and clearly set forth the blessings of so great salvation as is found on record in God's word, and thereby be a blessing to the present age. The back numbers of my EXAMINERS are all out on duty doing their work; and through the blessing of God they are doing a good work.

SELECTIONS.

CRITICISM.—1 John ii. 19: "They went out from us, but they were not of us; for if they had been of us, they would no doubt have continued with us." Most readers take the stress of this passage to rest on the words "from us," as distinguished from "of us;" whereas, they are the same in the original. For this our authorized translators are chargeable; who by confounding the prepositions, altering the tenses, and inserting without the slightest warrant the expression "no doubt," have given to the entire passage a complexion, causing it to be often hailed as an apostolic argument in favor of "final perseverance;" whereas its primary design is a caveat against antichristian and ruinous error. John wrote,—"They out went of us, but they were not of us; for if they were of us, they would have remained with us." Should it be replied that the intrinsic meaning remains much the same, our rejoinder is simply this: "Stick to your text, like honest men."—W. Robinson.

1 John v. 16: "I do not say that he shall pray for it." Here we are taught, at least by our authorized translators, that there is a mortal sin concerning which, when we have once recognized it in our brother, we are not to intercede for his forgiveness. Whether the apostle's words prescribe exactly this treatment, or are susceptible of some other interpretation, is well worthy our consideration. In verses 14, 15, and 16, occurs an instance of paranomasia, the same root doing duty for five words, all referring to the act of petitioning and the things petitioned for; and this is the constant sense of "aicto" throughout the New Testament. But when we reach the expression, "I do not say he shall pray for it," we encounter a different word, viz., "erotaō," the primitive meaning of which is simply to interrogate with a view to explanation, and generally so employed in the New Testament. Its secondary meaning undoubtedly is to make petition, in which sense also John not unfrequently uses it. But in deciding which of these two senses should be here adopted, our first duty is to cut off the final words "for it," which our translators have added without any warrant. What will now be the force of the verb, standing by itself? May not the passage be thus understood,—"I do not say that he (that is, the "any man" at the beginning of the verse) shall make inquisition?" "Seek not to investigate thy brother's liability;" or, as another apostle has put it, "Judge nothing before the time."—Muscatt.

WHAT IS TRUE RELIGION?—"It does not consist in forms nor in ceremonies, in thoughts or beliefs. It consists in the spiritual mind—in a life that is back of all thinkings and doings. We are made spiritually minded or religious by having the life of Christ pervade our hearts and minds, our nervous and spiritual systems—thus making us throughout "new creatures." . . .

The spiritual mind or true life will insinuate itself into all our thoughts and actions. We cannot explain it, any more than we can tell why a certain vegetable life will produce a countless number of forms exactly alike, as is seen in the leaves of a tree. But so it is."

THE grand want of our times is individual action. People are too much afraid of doing anything alone. We crystalize activity into cold formality by our cumbersome machinery.

AMBITION will always breed malice against those who oppose it.

The Bible Examiner.

This number closes the present volume. There are a few subscribers who have not yet paid any thing on it; others have paid only $1. Both of these classes will now cease to receive this magazine, unless I have a communication from them immediately. I desire the continuance of all; but without pay I cannot in justice to myself and paying subscribers and donors continue the non-paying ones. These remarks have no reference to those known to me as unable to pay. It is sent cheerfully to such without expecting any pecuniary compensation.

Those who intend to continue their subscriptions will do a great favor to remit immediately, or inform me when and how much they intend to aid this Magazine. This is important to success in the work before us.

Those who intend to help by donations are also requested to inform me how much can be relied on from them during the next volume. The amount will not be made public, and will be known only to the donor and myself, unless by request of the giver.

Shall the BIBLE EXAMINER still live and go on in its work?

To encourage old subscribers to pay up,—who have not yet remitted anything on the present volume,—if they will send $3, immediately, I will credit them in full to the end of the next volume.

I shall immediately put up the present volume in plain binding, with an INDEX of subjects. If applied for soon, it can be had at $2.25; the 25 cents being for postage when sent by mail; if taken at my office, $2 only. Those who wish this volume, thus bound, will give me notice, without delay.

A Word to Delinquent Subscribers.

There are a few who have received this entire volume of the EXAMINER without making any remittance, or signifying their wish not to continue to receive it; nor have they offered a reason for not paying for it. To such, of course, the magazine will no longer be sent: yet the appeal may properly be made. Is it not due to the EDITOR that persons who determine not to pay—when the magazine is sent to them beyond the time for which they have paid—should inform him of their wish for a discontinuance without delay? especially, as they can do so by a "Postal Card" at a cost of one cent?

It is now asked, as a favor, that any person receiving No. 1 of the next volume (in October), who does not intend to be a paying subscriber, or who does not know it is intended to be sent gratis, would inform the EDITOR of their wish in the matter at once.

If it should happen that any one is entitled to the continuance of the magazine, who finds it comes no more, let them inform the EDITOR, and the mistake shall be corrected. Let all subscribers who intend to pay, do so as early as possible.

TRACTS must be printed! Who will help immediately? Fifty dollars is wanted, and must be had, for this purpose right away. Let help come without delay.

The printer of the EXAMINER promises to materially improve the appearance of the coming volume.

DEATH'S DOINGS.

If it were not for the sure and certain hope that death is soon to be followed by resurrection, it would be painful beyond expression to lay away in the grave our dear, loved, and tried friends. It has been my lot, since the August EXAMINER was issued, to attend the funeral of two of my beloved brethren in Christ; viz., PETER KEMP, New York City, and RANDOLPH E. LADD, of Springfield, Mass.

BRO. KEMP fell asleep July 31, aged 61 years; having had several attacks of paralysis within a few years; the last of which left him to linger a few weeks in a state of helplessness, and at last to sink in death. He was a man greatly beloved; and his loss to his family and to a large circle of friends will be deeply felt. He has ever been one of my warmest friends and supporters: he "sleeps in Jesus," and will come from the land of the enemy at the voice of His REDEEMER. His wife, children, brothers, sister and friends are comforted with the knowledge of his Christian life and peaceful death.

BRO. LADD fell asleep August 5, aged 62 years. He had suffered more or less for six years with an unknown disease; which, by a post mortem examination, was found to be a cancer of the spleen, involving the liver, stomach, and intestines. He lived in hope of recovery till about three weeks before his death, when he wrote me as follows:

"DEAR BRO. STORNS: I am not expected to live many days, as my physician informs I can not get well, and may pass away at any time. I have long cherished the idea that if I did die before you, I should want you to attend my funeral and preach or talk my funeral discourse. I think you will gratify me. My choice of a text is 2 Tim. i. 12, as a favorite and oft-repeated one, in which I find much comfort. My disease is a hidden one, but supposed to be of a cancerous character. I have suffered long, and am glad it is so nearly through. I exit in hope of LIFE in Christ, and I am certain that I love Him with all my heart. I am washed in the blood of the LAMB, and am prepared to stand before him, as He has accepted and received me. I should have loved to live if it had been His will; but as He has otherwise ordered it, I cheerfully submit. I shall be glad of the short rest the grave will afford. Write me at once and let me know you will accept, and will do me this little last favor.

"Your waiting, suffering brother.

"R. E. LADD."

"Springfield, Mass., July 20, 1874."

I responded immediately. Bro. LADD had long been engaged in the Insurance business. The morning after his death, "The Hampden County Board of Underwriters held a special meeting," at which "Dr. Joseph C. Pynchon acted as Chairman," and addressed the meeting, says the report:

"By a gracefully worded address, delineating the virtues and character of the deceased in connection with his insurance life. His character was portrayed as a simply unostentatious one, unaggressive, full of kindness, and benevolence and sympathy, one who never wronged in word or deed a fellow member, even when suffering the most rasping competition. Ill will and malevolence never entered into the composition of this character, and the Board was challenged to name one whom Mr. Ladd had ever injured, or of whom he had ever spoken evil. In fine, he was spoken of as the true model of a Christian gentleman. It was voted to place this address upon the records of the Board."

A short funeral service was attended at his house on Friday; but the main service was in the Methodist M. Church ("Trinity") because of the many who were expected to attend; but a very rainy day reduced the assembly to four or five hundred, probably. An extract from Bro. LADD's letter, in the EXAMINER for July, was read, and his general religious views exhibited, showing that he died in the faith advocated by the EDITOR of the EXAMINER, which was briefly presented in discourse of an hour. The Pastor of "Trinity Church," Mr. Hulburd, assisted in the preliminaries of the service. Bro. LADD's wife, children, and brothers are comforted by the triumphant manner in which the deceased approached the time of his death: composedly settling his business matters; and, to all, expressing "perfect peace," and "washed in the blood of the LAMB."

Brothers LADD and KEMP were both men of God, and an honor to the religion of our common Lord and Redeemer. In their decease the Editor of this magazine has been deprived of two of his firmest friends; but God is able to fill their places with others, if need be; and he has no fears but that He will, in His own time and way, accomplish all his purposes, and fill the earth with His glory and the knowledge of Himself as the waters fill the seas. His ways are not as our ways, nor His thoughts as our thoughts. His counsel shall stand, and He will do all His pleasure: and "In the dispensation of the fulness of times" He will "gather together in one all things in Christ" (Eph. i. 10), and death be known no more. "THE THOUSAND YEARS PAST" THEORY.

In order to sustain the idea that the earth is literally to be burned at the second advent of Christ, and all its inhabitants, who are unprepared for immortality, are to be burned up with it, the theory is adopted that the thousand years of Rev. xx. is in the past; or, that they transpired during the triumph of Papacy. The idea is so contrary to the general tenor of the Scriptures and to facts that it seems almost folly to spend time to refute it. It has originated in a hostility to the idea of a probationary state for any of the human family after the return of Christ from heaven. It does not become me to judge of the honesty of the advocates of the theory; but of the theory itself, decided language will be employed. Think of the text relating to the thousand years. It reads, "I saw thrones, and they sat on them, and judgment was given unto them: and I saw the souls of them that were beheaded for the witness of Jesus, and for the word of God and which had not worshipped the beast, neither his image, neither had received his mark upon their foreheads, or in their hands, and they lived and reigned with Christ a thousand years. But the rest of the dead lived not again until the thousand years were finished. This is the first resurrection. Blessed and holy is he that hath part in the first resurrection: on such the second death hath no power, but they shall be priests of God and of Christ, and shall reign with Him a thousand years" (Rev. xx. 4-6).

A few questions may first be asked on the text: such as, 1. Where were the "thrones they" (the saints) "sat on" during the 1000 years past? 2. What rule or "judgment was given them?" 3. In what sense did they "live and reign with Christ a 1000 years" in the past? 4. In what did their resurrection consist? 5. Why is it called the first resurrection? Other questions might be added, and may arise as the subject is treated; but the above will first be noticed. On these it may be said, 1st, No "thrones" have ever yet been given; even the apostles were not promised any till "the regeneration when the Son of man shall sit in the throne of his glory" (Matt. xix. 28), which is not yet in the past; (see Matt. xxv. 31): then, and not till then, will the saints sit on thrones; and it is at, or in the thousand years. Paul tells us, "If we suffer we are reigning with Him;" as the 1000 years past theory should make it read. Those of Rev. xx., had suffered; but are seen afterwards reigning. These remarks may suffice on the first and second questions above: on the 3rd question, it may truly be said, in no true sense can it be affirmed of the past that saints have lived and reigned with Christ: they have suffered with Him and will reign with Him when He comes to sit on "the throne of His glory;" but that is not till He comes "from heaven, and all the holy angels with Him," and "these vile bodies are changed, and made like His glorious body" (see Matt. xxv. 31, and Phil. iii. 20, 21).

Question 4: "In what did their resurrection consist? will now have our attention. These persons "lived and reigned with Christ" the 1000 years; and it is affirmed, "this is the first resurrection;" clearly, their living is the first resurrection. Then it must be either a literal or a spiritual resurrection. If it is a spiritual one,—as the 1000 years past theory must make it—then universal salvation follows, inevitably; for, "the rest of the dead" will then "live again." If one is a spiritual resurrection so is the other; for to "live again" shows that they had once lived and had died. Those that reign with Christ had lived again; and others,—viz., "the rest of the dead,"—"lived not again till the 1000 years were finished:" at some period after that, they will live again. There is no way to avoid this conclusion but to deny the genuineness of the text; and that is a dangerous undertaking; for, "If any man shall take away from the words of the book of this prophecy, God shall take away his part out of the book of life, and out of the holy city" (Rev. xxii. 19). That the text is genuine, the proof is abundant; and it is a dangerous experiment to endeavor to remove it from the "book;" and there seems no reason for the attempt which can bear a close criticism.

Question 5: "Why is it called the first resurrection?" is in reality answered by the foregoing; but other remarks may be added. The Scriptures teach the resurrection of at least two classes of dead ones: one class to immortality, who cannot "die any more;" another class to judgment, who can die "the second death;" though they need not. The judgment, whatever may be said of it, does not determine the final state of this class by what they have done in this life; but it will be a rendering to them "according as their works shall be" (Rev. xx. 12; xxii. 12, and Matt. xvi. 27). The principles and method of judgment are thus set forth by the Lord himself: "Behold my servant, whom I uphold: mine elect, in whom my soul delighteth: I have put my spirit upon him: He shall bring forth judgment to the Gentiles. He shall not cry nor lift up, nor cause his voice to be heard in the street. A bruised reed shall he not break, and the smoking flax shall he not quench: He shall bring forth judgment unto truth. He shall not fail nor be discouraged till he have set judgment in the earth; and the isles shall wait for his law" (Isa. xlii. 1-4).

Here is much expressed in few words. It embraces the truth that "The Father judgeth no man, but hath committed all judgment unto the Son" (John v. 22). And it shows that judgment is carried on in mercy; for, a bruised reed will be not break, nor quench smoking flax; expressions denoting infinite concern for the least appearance of anything good in the subjects of judgment, and meeting out punishment only according as their deeds were evil. Sorrow, weeping, and wailing there will be for past sins; but the Judge "shall bring forth judgment unto truth:" all will see the truth both of the righteousness of the things they suffer, and also that "Jesus gave Himself a ransom for them all:" a truth which they had never clearly seen before,—for, "God will have all men come to the knowledge of the truth" (1 Tim. ii. 4);—and not till the truth is clearly set before a man can his final state be determined; for, "God worketh all things after the counsel of His own will;" and "the word of truth," which is to be "heard" by them, is "the Gospel of their salvation" (Eph. i. 11-13), which God is pledged shall be made known to them "in due time,"—the time which He has put in His own power; and that time is nowhere in the Bible restricted to this life; nor is any man authorized to affirm it is; to do so, is to be "wise above what is written," and to challenge the truth of Jesus' words that, "It is not for you to know the times, or the seasons, which the Father hath put in his own power" (Acta. i. 7). It is sufficient for us to know that God has promised, and confirmed it by an oath, that all the families of the earth shall be blessed in the Seed of Abraham, which is Christ; and that this "Christ gave him self a ransom for all men; tasted death for every man; and became a propitiation for the sins of the whole world;" and that God, who cannot lie, is pledged that "in due time" this "Gospel of their salvation" shall be published to "every creature" for their acceptance, that they may "trust in Christ" (Eph. i. 13) and have an endless life; or, if they knowingly and wilfully refuse to trust in Him, they shall be "hurt of the second death;" which cannot take place till they have been delivered from the first death that came by sin. This deliverance they shall have; for, "As by the offence of one, judgment came upon all men to condemnation" [to death]: "even so by the righteousness of one, the free gift came upon all men unto justification of life" (Rom. v. 18). The resurrection from the dead is a free gift to all men; and hence, it is impossible that any man can be made alive from the dead in a hopeless condition: no such resurrection ever did, or ever can occur; but the resurrection of a judgment will take place in order that all men shall "come to the knowledge of the truth," as God wills they shall before their final state is fixed. This proves Him to be "A just God and a Saviour" (Isa. xlv. 21): any other doctrine reproaches both His Justice and Love. But "If we sin wilfully after that we have received the knowledge of the truth, there remaineth no more sacrifice for sin" (Heb. x. 26): our doom is fixed.

Those who build their theory of burning the world at the second advent, on the second Epistle of Peter, should remember that said Epistle was long considered doubtful, and not admitted as genuine. The learned Dr. Lardner, in his list of "Canonical Books," placed 2nd Peter among the doubtful ones. It is, nevertheless, probably genuine. But if Rev. xx. 5, is of doubtful authority, so may 2nd Peter be, also; and then the world-burning theory has lost all its support from the Bible, as no other Scripture affirms any such catastrophe. However, both texts may safely be set down as genuine; and then, if a literal burning of the world is to take place, it will not be till "the perdition of ungodly men;" and that cannot be till after "the day of judgment," according to Peter's own statement; and that is not till after the 1000 years; of course, not till Christ returns from heaven and "sits upon the throne of his glory;" so that "the times of restitution" cannot be completed while Christ "remains in heaven," as some of the world-burning theorists maintain.

Finally: After the great cutting off of wicked men from the earth, in the winding up of the present age, and the Lord is "King over all the earth," . . . "It shall come pass that every one that is left of all the nations that came against Jerusalem shall even go up from year to year, to worship the King, the Lord of hosts, and to keep the feast of tabernacles: and it shall be, that whoso will not come up of all the families of the earth unto Jerusalem to worship the King, the Lord of hosts, even upon them shall be no rain: and if the family of Egypt go not up. . . there shall be the plague, wherewith the Lord will smite the heathen that come not up," etc., "This shall be the punishment . . . of all nations that come not up," etc. (Zech. xiv. 9-19). Here is, clearly, probation after the Lord is King over all the earth, and the statement agrees with John's, (Rev. xv.), where he saw the saints on the sea of glass, singing the song of Moses and of the Lamb, saying, "Great and marvellous are thy works, God Lord Almighty; just and true are thy ways, thou King of saints. Who shall not fear thee, O Lord, and glorify thy name? for thou only art holy: for all nations shall come and worship before thee; for thy judgments are made manifest" (Rev. xv. 1-4). Here is clearly made to be seen a probationary state to the nations, after the saints are glorified: so, the world is not then burned, and the saints are rejoicing in the glorious prospect of the subjection of all nations to their glorious Lord. Thus Zechariah and John agree; and the "world-burning" theory, at the second advent of Jesus, is crushed as between two mill-stones, and the work of restitution goes on gloriously for the "ages to come" (Eph. ii. 7). Amen. ALLELUIA. Ed.

BURNING THE WORLD:

SCRIPTURE IMAGES.

Bishop Lowth, on Isa. xlii. 10-13, says, "When the Hebrews intend to express happiness, prosperity, the renewal and advancement of States, kingdoms, and Potentates, they make use of images taken from the most striking parts of nature,—from the heavenly bodies,—the sun, moon and stars; which they describe as shining with increased splendor, and never setting; the moon becomes like the meridian sun, and the sun's light is augmented seven-fold (see Isa. xxx. 26); new heavens and new earth are created, and a brighter age commences. On the contrary, the overthrow and destruction of kingdoms is represented by opposite images: the stars are obscured, the moon withdraws her light, and the sun shines no more; the earth quakes, and the heavens tremble; and all things seem tending to their original chaos. (See Joel ii. 10; iii. 15, 16; Amos viii. 9.)"

If those who so strenuously contend for the burning of the world at the return of our Lord to reign on earth, would consider these facts, they would not be so positive that the language of Peter, in his 2d Epistle, proved a literal destruction of the earth's surface; especially as that text is the only one that conveys such an idea; and the general tenor of the Bible is positively against it, God having pledged Himself that He "will not again smite any more every living thing as I have done" (Gen. viii. 21). That a revolution is to take place in the earth, fitly represented as if the "elements shall melt with fervent heat, the earth, also, and the works that are therein burned up," is an undoubted truth. But that there is to be a destruction of the earth's surface and all its inhabitants, except those made immortal at the Advent of Christ, is an overlooking of the great and precious promises of God, uttered to patriarchs and prophets and confirmed by Christ and his apostles and the Revelation by Jesus to John, wherein it is declared, by those who had gotten the victory and stand on the sea of glass, (of course, glorified), "All nations shall come and worship before Thee: for thy judgments are made manifest" (Rev. xv. 2-4).

The judgments on corrupters of God's word, and the persecutors of His true Church, are to show to the world God's displeasure at such wickedness, and will lead men to "fear before Him," and they "shall come and worship before Him;" i. e., be subject to His rule and government; to His "King," who "shall reign and prosper, and shall execute judgment and justice in the earth. In His days Judah shall be saved, and Israel shall dwell safely" (Jer. xxiii. 5, 6); for, "There shall come out of Sion the Deliverer, and shall turn away ungodliness from Jacob. . . and so all Israel shall be saved" (Rom. xi. 26). "Yea, all kings shall fall down before Him; all nations shall serve Him. He shall have dominion also from sea to sea, and from the river [Euphrates] to the ends of the earth" . . . "All nations shall call Him blessed" (Psa. lxxii. 8, 11, 17).

The establishment of such a government, by the overthrow of the wild-beast governments, which have so long ruled the earth for their own aggrandisement, might well be set forth, in the symbolical language of Hebrew prophets, as the terrible commotion of the elements and the melting of the earth by fire; but can never be made to harmonize with the literal construction put on Peter's language relating to this great and glorious change, which he calls, "new heavens and a new earth, wherein dwelleth righteousness." A government is to be established on this earth with a King, who will rule for the good of all in His empire, with a body of sub-rulers trained and prepared by Himself, and of one mind with Him, whose one object will be to bless the nations and people of the earth by promoting the prosperity of all, and leading all into the paths of intelligence and virtue, that the LORD God may dwell among them, and they come to know their highest joy and honor is to be in perfect harmony with Him,

The world burning theory not only defeats this glorious result, but gives victory to "the serpent" power, who robs the "Seed of the woman" of His promised triumph in crushing the serpent's head, and makes Christ "satisfied" with a small portion of those who were included in "the travail of His soul," and He consents to part eternally with the mass of those for whom "He gave Himself a ransom;" and that, too, without ever letting them know that He had any love for them, or "tasted death" for them, or had ever made an effort to save them! Such a theory—or a theory involving such a result—never could come from that God who "gave His only begotten Son" because He "no loved the world;" and He loved it too in full view of its sinfulness and helpless state. Can any man soberly teach, that, having "no loved the world" He will burn up the mass of them without giving them the knowledge of that love and its action in their behalf, with no chance to exercise faith or unbelief, because they never had the opportunity to act at all in relation to the subject? God's love must and will be proclaimed to every soul of man before their final destiny is fixed.

MORE OBJECTIONS.

"Man that is in honor and understandeth not, is like the beasts that perish." Then, when the beasts have a resurrection, men will who die without understanding, and are not for God and His will." "A. P."

Thus writes one who is opposed to my present view of the destiny of our race. The objection, no doubt, is honestly made; but it seems to be uttered without a full "understanding" of the great facts of the Bible. It assumes that man is no better than a beast, because "like sheep they are laid in the grave," and because "all go to one place" (Psa. xlix. 14, and Eccl. iii. 20). What saith the Saviour, with emphasis? "How much then, is a man better than a sheep?" (Matt. xii. 20, and context.) Again saith Jesus, "Your heavenly Father feedeth the fowls. Are ye not much better than they?" (Matt. vi. 26.) Still more. Jesus tasted "death for every man" (Heb. ii. 9). Did He taste death for every beast? He "gave Himself a ransom for all" men (1 Tim. ii. 6). Did he do the same for beasts? "As by the offence of one, judgment came upon all men to condemnation" [to death]; "even so, by the righteousness of one, the free gift came upon all men unto justification of life" (Rom. v. 18).

My opposing friend assumes that because man does not now understand, and hence, in this respect, "is like the beasts that perish," that therefore he will not have a resurrection unless beasts have. If the proof was clear that Christ gave himself a ransom for beasts, we should know they, too, would have a resurrection; but we have no such evidence; while the proof is abundant and full, that He gave himself a ransom for all men; and that as all men were made subject to death for Adam's one sin, without regard to any act of their own; even so, by Christ's righteousness the same all men, shall be justified unto life, from that death, without regard to their own acts. Their continuance in life is another matter.

Man is better than a beast in the sight of his Creator; i. e., any man, all men; however ignorant and degraded; else why did God give his Son to suffering and death for their redemption, rather than for the beasts? Shall we "trust in ourselves," who have been enlightened by the grace and mercy of God, that we "are righteous and despise others" who have never yet been taught and blessed as we have been? "What have we that we have not received?" Who hath "made us to differ" from the man that "understandeth not?" If it has been by God's peculiar favor to us, "Why dost thou glory" over the ignorant who do not yet "understand" the things of God, even though they may die in their ignorance? Is God's hand shortened that it cannot save even such? Is His heart of love or his hand of power changed because death has set in? If so, is He not changeable? Has He not said to "the whole house of Israel" . . . "I will open your graves, and cause you to come up out of your graves, and bring you into the land of Israel" (Ezk. xxxvii. 11, 12)?

Shall we limit the Almighty, and say, "He may resurrect them all, when He resurrects the beasts?" Is anything too hard for God? "Hath He said it, and will he not do it?" The inference drawn from the expressions in Psa. xlix., that those ignorant of God, or who do not "understand," are as hopeless of a resurrection as the beasts, cannot stand for a moment in the light of the harmonious declarations of the Divine character and government found in the Bible. He, "who gave himself a ransom for all," has set his seal to the fact, that at his voice, "All that are in the graves shall come forth;" and God hath said, "I will ransom them from the power of the grave; I will redeem them from death: O death, I will be thy plagues; O grave, I will be thy destruction" (Hosea xiii. 14). Christ the Redeemer, "hath abolished" (annulled, abrogated) "death, and brought" both "life and immortality to light" (2 Tim. i. 10). Death cannot hold one of our race in its power. Christ is its Conqueror, and has declared "all shall come forth" from under its power. Just so certain as the first Adam brought all the race under death, just so certain the second Adam will deliver all the race from death.

The horrible and unscriptural doctrine that all men, not brought to the knowledge of God and Jesus Christ in this life, are to be raised from the dead and tormented eternally, or, tormented awhile, and then be put to death again; or, in other words, are to have a hopeless resurrection, is what has driven many true Christians into the doctrine that there will be no resurrection of any one, except such as have formed a spiritual union with Christ in this life. With their eyes still closed to the falsehood, and anti-scriptural doctrine of a hopeless resurrection, who can blame them for contending earnestly against the popular idea of such a revival from the dead? I cannot, and do not. I trust they will yet "see men as trees walking," and learn that they have been betrayed into error, on the resurrection, dishonorable to God and his anointed, by a denial of a universal resurrection of the dead; though far less dishonorable than either of those theories which give over the mass of the human race to a hopeless revival from the dead, or a revival for the purpose of torment eternal, or temporal, to be followed by death eternal; theories which have originated in ignorance of God's character and designs concerning the race, and of Christ's position as the Head of the new creation. ED.

THE FIRST-FRUIT AND ITS WORK.

Those born from the dead at Christ's coming from heaven are the "body of Christ" (1 Cor. xii. 27), hence are a part of the "first-fruits." They are blessed with Christ by a priority in the resurrection, or are the completion of "the first resurrection"—the Head and Body constituting the "perfect man" (Eph. iv. 13); for, not till this work is complete, of the resurrection of the Head and Body, will that text be fulfilled which says, "Till we all come in the unity of the faith, and of the knowledge of the Son of God, unto a perfect man, unto the measure of the stature of the fulness of Christ."

As the Head was the first-fruit raised up from the dead to bless and perfect his body, so is the Body of the first fruits to bless others in "the ages to come;" for, says Paul, God who is rich in mercy, for his great love wherewith he loved us, even when we were dead in sins, hath quickened us, together with Christ. . . that in the ages to come He might show the exceeding riches of his grace, in his kindness towards us through Christ Jesus." (Eph. ii. 4-7.)

Here is set forth, briefly, that the Body of Christ is to be, in connection with its Head, employed in blessing others in future ages. They who compose that body are not gathered out of this and the previous ages merely for their own sakes or for their own pleasure or enjoyment, but that they may be a blessing to the "families of the earth," yet to be blessed, as the "promise and oath of God to Abraham" declares they shall be. "The unsearchable riches of Christ" are, by their means, to be made known to all for whom Christ became "a ransom," i. e., to all men—to every man, woman and child of Adam's race, to whom Christ has not already been made known. Thus, and only thus, as I now believe, can or will be fulfilled the promise of Eden that the Seed of the woman shall bruise the serpent's head, and Christ destroy the works of the devil, (Gen. iii. 15. and I John iii. 8.) THERE is this difference between happiness and wisdom: he that thinks himself the happiest man is really so; but he that thinks himself the wisest is generally the greatest fool.—Lord Bacon.

THE STUDY OF THE BIBLE.

BY HENRY DUNN.

CHAPTER XXXII.

On the Division of Scripture into Chapters and Verses, with Headings and Subscriptions.

THESE divisions, it need scarcely be said, have nothing whatever to do with the inspiration of Scripture. They are purely human, and comparatively modern.

The history of this mechanical arrangement is soon told.

The Vulgate (the Latin version of Scripture) was the first divided into chapters; a work undertaken by Cardinal Hugo in the thirteenth century,—as some think, by Langton, Archbishop of Canterbury, in 1227.

The Hebrew Scriptures were similarly divided by Mordecai Nathan in 1445.

The division of the New Testament into verses (for it was, as we have seen, already broken up into chapters) was accomplished by Robert Stevens, who is said to have completed his work in the year 1551, during a journey on horseback from Paris to Lyons. Whether it was accomplished literally while riding on horseback, or when resting at inns, is uncertain.

The Hebrew Scriptures were similarly broken up into verses by Athias in 1661.

The “points or stops,” in Scripture are, also, for the most part, of modern date. “Full stops” are found in the earliest manuscripts; but our present system of punctuation dates from about the ninth century.

The “Subscriptions” annexed to the Epistles, such as “The Second Epistle to the Thessalonians was written from Athens,” are also un-Apostolic, and not to be depended upon. They are often quite inaccurate; and sometimes directly contradict internal evidence. Dr. Mill tells us that these “Subscriptions” were added by an Egyptian Bishop, about the middle of the fifth century. Mr. Hartwell Horne says,—“Whoever was the author of them was either grossly ignorant or grossly inattentive. They are altogether wanting in some of the best ancient manuscripts, and in others they are greatly varied.”

The “Headings to Chapters” in our English Bibles are equally without authority, and sometimes they are quite untrustworthy: e. g., the heading to the closing verses of the forty-second chapter of Isaiah is, in our Bibles, “God reproveth the people of incredulity;” while that for the verses immediately following,—the earlier verses of the forty-third chapter,—is, “The Lord com-forteth the Church with His promises.” Yet it is quite plain that the whole is addressed to one class of persons, and ought to have been closely connected in the text.

The very same error is committed at the close of the forty-third chapter, and in the beginning of the forty-fourth; where, according to the heading, God “reproveth the people as inexcusable,” and then “comforteth the Church with his promises.” No such separation, however, is found in the Prophet. He knows nothing of this distinction between Church and people. Well may Dr. Maitland say, “this is not rightly dividing the Word of Truth, but cruelly chopping it.” In hundreds of instances, these headings, standing as they do in Bibles professedly published without note or comment, are not unfrequently commentaries of the worst description, because arbitrary, dogmatic, and unsuspected.

The divisions into Chapters and Verses, as they now stand, are so obviously imperfect, that it is scarcely needful to draw attention to the fact; but even when not absolutely inaccurate, they often tend to break the sense and to obscure the meaning; e. g.,—

(a) The description of the humiliation and glory of Christ by Isaiah really begins, not as it appears in the English version to do, with the fifty-third chapter, but at the thirteenth verse of the fifty-second.

(b) In Jeremiah, the various prophecies are frequently confounded by this division. An entirely distinct prophecy evidently commences at the sixth verse of the third chapter, which is nowhere shown in our Bible.

(c) In the New Testament, the latter verses of the ninth chapter of Matthew evidently belong to the tenth; and the first verse of the fourth chapter of the Colossians as plainly belongs to the third chapter.

The Epistle to the Hebrews affords a striking example of the serious hindrance to the understanding of the argument, which is sometimes placed in the way of the reader by breaking an Epistle into chapters. Most of the passages in this Epistle begin with,—“Wherefore,” “For,” “or,” “Therefore;” so that the reader who confines himself to one or more chapters, often begins with a conclusion from an argument, or an argument for a proposition which he has not read; and reads a proposition or an argument stopping short of the conclusion. And yet, such is the power of habit and prejudice, that many would not be content with reading it in any other form; they would fancy that its sacredness had been taken away.

An intelligent reader of Scripture will find many more such examples; and it can scarcely be doubted that the tendency of them is to darken the sense. Yet these divisions have been so generally adopted, that both in public worship, and in the selection of portions for family or private reading of the Scriptures, we generally take one or more chapters, without any reference to the connection.

It may, indeed, be said, that a Christian who sets himself seriously to study the Word of God, will pay little or no attention to these divisions. This may be true; but a great part of those who read the Bible do not read studiously; and even those who do, may find it easier to break off a bad habit, than to get rid of all the ill effects of it. These divisions are so familiar to us, that it is difficult, if not impossible, to read the Bible as if we had never known them, even when we are aware of their mischievous effects, which readers in general most certainly are not.

The early Christians had indeed titles and heads to their Bibles, but the object was simply to point out the general contents, not to divide for reference. Many of these chapters contained only a few verses, and some of them not more than one.

But it will be said, Are not these divisions of great use? Unquestionably they are. To pretend that no advantage has been derived from such an arrangement would be simply absurd. It is certainly very convenient for reference, especially in connection with a Concordance, and it is therefore wisely retained, by side-notes, in Bibles which are printed on another plan, and are generally known as "Paragraph Bibles."

The greatest evil, probably, that has arisen from the breaking up of Scripture into portions, is the encouragement it has afforded to the common, but bad habit, of reading the Bible in fragments, oftentimes as unconnected as the pages of any other book would be, if separated from that which precedes and follows them.

If we add to this habitual mangling of the Word of Truth, the scarcely less evil of textual preaching, which has probably been greatly promoted by the same cause, it will be found difficult to overstate the amount of mischief which has been thus produced and perpetuated.

CHAPTER XXXIII.

How Helps may Become Hindrances.

UNDER the term "Helps" to the understanding of Scripture, we include, not merely books specially written for the purpose of facilitating its study, but all standard Commentaries and theological manuals,—the devotional writings both of Anglicans and Puritans, and approved works of practical piety generally; for books of this character, commonly sway mankind more powerfully in the views they take of Holy Scripture, than works expressly prepared with a view to its elucidation.

To books, must be added an agency more powerful still,—that of the living voice, sounding, Sunday after Sunday, from the pulpits of the Established Church, and among all shades of Nonconformists. It is scarcely possible to exaggerate the extent of influence exercised in this way over religious opinion.

We are not disposed to undervalue any of these "means of grace," as they are ordinarily termed. In many cases, the amount of blessing thus imparted is greater than human arithmetic can calculate; in others, it may be doubtful whether the apparent benefit is as real as it seems to be; and in some, the influence is unquestionably bad. But, as a whole, there can be little doubt that sermonizing, with all its weakness, is a public benefit, and a mainstay of the religion of our land, such as it is.

Our object is not to depreciate the value of either books or men, regarded as teachers of Divine Truth; it is simply to show how easily these "helps"—for such they certainly are when rightly used—may become "hindrances," if trusted in without discrimination,—substituted for personal responsibilities,—or merely leaned upon as pillows of indolence.

Even of books specially intended to facilitate Scriptural investigation, it may be asserted, with out paradox, that they are sometimes at once both helps and hindrances; helps in one direction, hindrances in another.

Such we believe to be the case, notwithstanding their acknowledged excellences, with many "critical introductions" to the Bible. They help us, by the information they impart; they hinder, by the impression they leave that Holy Scripture can scarcely be understood without a prolonged course of preparatory acquisition.

How, it may well be said, can it be expected that ordinary readers should ever be qualified to form any independent judgment respecting the teachings of a Book, for the interpretation of which upwards of three hundred rules, occupying in their statement and illustration nearly two hundred closely printed octavo pages, are found in a work so able and yet so popular as that of Mr. Hartwell Horne? How can it be supposed that laymen, occupied as they are every day in the active duties of life, will ever be able,—whatever their wishes may be,—to enter into discussions on the "literal sense," the "allegorical sense," and the "spiritual sense" of Scripture; into "laws for ascertaining" the meaning of words and phrases, and the "arrangement of emphasis;" into inquiries about "scholiasts and glossographers;" into "canons" for investigating "scope" or context, "analyses," "antiquities," "chronology," and "the analogy of faith;" into explanations of "tropes and figures,"—of "metonymy," whether "of cause, effect, subject, or adjunct,"—of "metaphors and their sources,"—of "synecdoche, irony, and hyperbole;" of "types, parables, and prophecy;" of "internal and external evidences;" and, finally, of "principles for practical application." Yet such, and nothing less, is the vastness of the apparatus deemed to be necessary in order to understand aright the Divine Message.

We are not to be supposed, for a single moment, to look with contempt on any of these branches of inquiry. They all have their place in the course of a student's preparation for life, and form part of that mental discipline by which the human mind is enlarged and strengthened. But, just as "critical analyses of the English language,"—which have little to do with a plain man's comprehension of his mother tongue,—often create an impression on the mind of the untaught, that some mysterious light is by such processes developed, so, ordinary readers of Scripture are apt to conclude that, apart from critical investigations of the kind referred to, the Bible can never be properly understood.

Least we should be suspected,—however unjustly,—of despising the labors of the learned in this particular, we will state what we have further to say on the matter, only in words of men justly held in the highest repute for their attainments.

That eminent scholar, Dr. Maitland, thus wrote thirty years ago:

"I must add my belief that the cumbersome apparatus of systematic interpretation ought to be placed among the impediments to the right understanding of the Word of God. The learning and labor which have been bestowed on it, seem to me to have been worse than wasted; and so far from helping towards the understanding of the Word of God, it appears more calculated to puzzle and perplex the student, and to supply, to those who may desire it, the means of confounding common sense, and perverting the plain text of Scripture."

"These systematic schemes" (referring especially, to Waterland's Preface to his "Scripture Vindicated"), he says, "are properly unknown to most readers of the Bible, and, therefore, do not directly form an impediment to them; but it is obvious, that complex machinery which they never saw, and could not understand, may have a great effect on the manufactured article of which they are the consumers."

"Some persons, I believe, have thought that they put honor on the Word of God, and the language in which it is written, by telling us that there is something 'in the original' which no translation can reach,—something not translatable, not expressible. No doubt this is true, as regards every language, and every book in every language, unless it is confined to the most common subjects, and written in the lowest style. In most cases, the curious felicity of one language cannot be transferred to another, without using such periphrasis, or making such nonsense, as is peculiarly unfelicitous; but so far as regards meaning, where meaning is of importance, and the mode of expression of secondary consideration, or none at all, anything written in one language may be made intelligible in another, provided the things spoken of are known to the translator, and the persons for whom he translates."

For recent testimony in the same direction we turn to the University of Oxford, and there we find one of no mean eminence thus expressing himself:

"Who would write a bulky treatise about the method to be pursued in interpreting Plato or Sophocles? No man, assuredly, who did not wish to create the impression that the meaning of these writers was beyond the comprehension of ordinary readers. And this is precisely what has been done in relation to Scripture. People have come to believe that without a formidable critical apparatus it is not possible to arrive at the meaning of God's Word: whereas the reverse is nearer the truth. The plain and unsophisticated reader is far more likely to get at the true interpretation than the learned student. For the use of interpretation is to get rid of interpretation, and to leave us alone in company with the Author.

"When the meaning of Greek words is once known, the young student has almost all the real materials which are possessed by the greatest Biblical scholars, in the Book itself. The great thing, after all, is to perceive the meaning of words in reference to their context. Less weight should be given to Lexicons,—that is, to the authority of other Greek writers,—and more to the context. It is no exaggeration to say that he who, in the present state of knowledge, will confine himself to the plain meaning of words, and the study of their context, may know more of the original spirit and intention of the Authors of the New Testament, than all the controversial writers of former ages put together."

The verbal critic magnifies his art. There is a scholasticism of Philology as well as a scholasticism of Philosophy. Words are often studied too minutely,—made to mean too much,—refinements of signification are drawn out of them. There seems, indeed, to be good reason for doubting whether any considerable light can be thrown on the New Testament from inquiring into the language. It has not been sufficiently considered that the difficulties of the New Testament are, for the most part, common to the Greek and the English. The noblest translation in the world has, indeed, a few great errors, and these, more than half of them, in the text; but we only do the Book violence to haggle over the words.*

Once more we return to Dr. Maitland.

"The Bible," he says, "has long been the subject of discussion by the learned and the unlearned; and some of each class have left no stone unturned to make it appear that certain parts mean what they certainly do not mean. These persons are assisted, in the New Testament, by having a vast number of Greek writers, of various countries and ages, by whose help to find or to make a required meaning. The critic shows that the word in question is used in a variety of senses by different writers: and it is hard if he cannot twist some of them into a resemblance of what he wishes. Thus an overwhelming mass of what is called 'BIBLICAL CRITICISM' is heaped upon the Word of God, and explanation after explanation too often only makes the matter darker than it was before.

"Truth is single; and therefore one is right, and the rest, how many soever they may be, are wrong. A good deal of the evil of this arises, I imagine, from vanity, coupled with the affectation of modesty. The commentator frequently knows not what to say; but is unwilling to confess this with out showing that he knows what others have said. His own mind is altogether dissatisfied with their explanations, yet he recounts them; and without saying of some (as he really ought, if he mentions them at all), that they are mere nonsense, not worth a moment's notice, he affects to leave it to the reader to choose what explanation he pleases. A simple mind is thus bewildered, and perhaps almost led to a vague idea, that what has so many interpretations, all thought worthy of record, has not, in fact, any very certain or definite meaning at all."

And all this folly and confusion arises from

* The Rev. B. Jowett, Regius Professor of Greek in the University of Oxford, attempts which have been too successfully made, to raise an opinion that the Bible is not to be judged of by the rules of common sense: forgetting the fact, that learning can obscure as well as illustrate, and heap up chaff when it can find no more wheat.

Thus far we have sustained our position by the authority of eminent men in the Church of England. We now add a few words of Nonconformist testimony.

"Startling," says an able writer in the Eclectic Review (Nov., 1860), "as the fact sounds when enunciated, the Christian Church in the nineteenth century cannot point the student of the Sacred Scriptures to a single recognized principle of Biblical Interpretation." Who can wonder at the avowal that follows!—"The readings and the findings of the private Christian are often in advance of the expositions and instructions of the public teacher."

When once this fact is fully recognized, the false notion—now all but universally held—that the one Divinely appointed means of Christian edification is SACRED ORATORY, delivered from the pulpit, will be shaken to its foundation. It will then be seen that while popular speaking, when effective, is admirably adapted to awaken the attention of the careless, to interest the young and uninformed, to kindle the affections, and to move to action, it is altogether unsuited to advanced Christians; is incapable of leading them on to deep personal acquaintance with Divine Truth; and, after a season, all but certain to become a hindrance to spiritual growth. This happens, because it is commonly abused by the indolent; because it occupies, in the esteem of multitudes, the place of personal investigation; and because—being associated with united worship—it almost inevitably becomes the only living channel of religious impression.

Nothing is more certain than this,—that whatever want seems to be supplied to a man while in a passive condition, he will never seek to satisfy by active effort. Yet it is quite as true in religious matters, as it is in everything else, that, with outlabor and discipline, all direct instruction must be unavailing and useless. The most elaborate and manifold apparatus can impart nothing of importance to the passive and inert mind. It is almost as unavailing as the warmth and light of the sun, and all the sweet influences of the heavens, when shed upon the desert sands. A mind, even if it be filled with the results of other men's labors, can, as Dr. Beattie remarks, "only be compared to a well-filled granary; it bears no resemblance to the fruitful field, which multiplies that which is cast into its lap a thousandfold."

Hitherto we have proceeded on the supposition that the teaching thus imparted,—although too oratorical,—is, on the whole, sound and sensible. But that it is not always so, is but too well known. Ministers themselves not unfrequently complain of the immeasurable mischief which is inflicted by much of our popular preaching on the cause of Bible interpretation. An ingenious twist is often valued more than a true explanation. The words of the text in such cases merely supply a theme, neither preacher nor hearers ever troubling themselves about its meaning. The reason for this course is, that the text is wanted merely for the purpose of communicating some moral or religious lesson, determined upon beforehand; or for the support of some cause which the preacher may be pleading, or to condemn some error which he has to combat. As has been well remarked,—“Any one who has ever written sermons is aware how hard it is to apply Scripture to the wants of the hearers, and, at the same time, to preserve its meaning.”

This sort of perversion is bad enough when united, as it often is, with deep earnestness, solid learning, and much oratorical power; but how intolerable it becomes, when combined with ignorance and folly, vanity and conceit, will be fully admitted by all who have been obliged to listen, as too many have, to expositions of Scripture which, from their astounding stupidity, are only calculated to excite men to laughter or to scorn.

Who has not heard sermons in which the entire teaching has been made to turn altogether upon mere emphasis, applied in the most arbitrary manner to a single verse of Scripture? sermons, which remind one only of the sentence, dear to every schoolboy,—“Do you ride to town to-day?” since it is one which, according as this or that word is made emphatic, admits of five different meanings, and is capable of being considered in five distinct relations, viz., to fact, to person, to mode, to place, and to time. Seriously, such is the treatment the Word of God too frequently receives at the hands of men who, themselves wanting common sense, are quite unconscious that others possess that Divine gift.

CHAPTER XXXIV.

Concluding Remarks.

It may have occurred to some readers that, in the observations we have made, relative to the right understanding of Scripture, we have dealt too much with the negative, and too little with the positive side of the question; that we have lingered long over supposed hindrances, but said little as to helps which may be obtained and confided in by humble inquirers.

The criticism is just. We have done so advisedly; partly, because we think that previous writers on this subject, have, for the most part, taken no notice of the impediments we have endeavored to lay bare; and partly, because we are satisfied that little real help can be given to an intelligent reader of the Bible, beyond that which is afforded by pointing out the most obvious hindrances to its comprehension; and by directing his attention generally to rocks and quicksands which, whether seen or unseen, form the main obstacle to the safe arrival of the heavenward traveller in the haven of Truth.

Yet not exclusively have we alluded to hindrances. Three or four great leading principles may certainly be gathered, from what we have, at different times, suggested as important to be borne in mind.

The first is, that in studying Scripture, and in connection with humble and prayerful dependence on “the Giver of every good and perfect gift,—it should be read connectedly and as a whole; with faculties alert and awakened; with minute observation of the often partially concealed links of thought which connect portion with portion; and with a constant reference to the object of the speaker or writer—the character and circumstances of the parties addressed,—and the age or dispensation to which the truth in question may be supposed specially to belong.

The second is, to acquire clear and distinct conceptions as to the precise meaning of what are sometimes termed the “technicalities” of Scripture. As words of this class are used in different senses, their true meaning in any given case, can only be ascertained by carefully observing the connection in which they stand, and the obvious intention of the writer in using them.

The third,—implied rather than expressed,—is, to seek after the true import of Scripture silences, often more expressive than speech; and to weigh well the indirect hints which are scattered over the Bible, relative to events predicted, but not yet fulfilled; such as the restoration of Israel,—the “times of the restitution of all things,”—the bringing again of Sodom, Moab, and Edom,—the second coming of the Lord, and the universal subjection of mankind to His government.

Above all would we urge the conscientious devotion of an adequate portion of time to the general study of the Book, both alone and with others. And this with a view, not only to personal edification, but to the improvement of all with whom we come in contact. No man will ever learn, who is determined beforehand not to teach. No man can know how little or how much he knows of any subject until he has attempted to teach it.

Diligence in this work will be sure of an abundant reward. The Bible can never get behind the age. It has treasures in it, many and great, yet undiscovered. Advance in acquaintance with it can only be made "in the way in which all improvements are made; by thoughtful men's tracing on obscure hints—as it were, dropped us by nature accidentally, or which seem to come into our minds by chance."^{*}

It may finally be objected, that many things we have suggested as means to understand Scripture, are, in fact, results of prolonged examination; and that a somewhat extensive knowledge of the Book is presupposed as a necessary qualification for commencing its study.

Again we say,—the criticism is just. We have never imagined ourselves to be writing for persons who approach the Bible for the first time, or who take it up for perusal without any preconceived impressions as to its spirit or contents.

We have, throughout the entire book, taken it for granted that our readers will be persons who are, more or less, familiar with their Bibles; who have already received definite impressions as to its teachings, from a variety of sources; but who are, nevertheless, desirous of enlarging their acquaintance with the Sacred Record, and of correcting their prepossessions by fresh, and, as far as may be, independent examination.

We urge this task upon all,—whatever may be their supposed inability to accomplish it,—on ground applicable to many things, and expressed by a Heathen poet in the phrase. "Virum acquirere eundo," strength is acquired in proceeding. Virgil, indeed, is speaking of rumor, which gathers force as it goes, but the sentiment is applicable to almost all human undertakings. If we would become acquainted with our ability to do a thing, we must patiently and perseveringly endeavor to accomplish it.

Neglect in the performance of any duty commonly entails, as its punishment, the very inability which is complained of. Our Lord says to the Jews, "Yet a little while is the light with you. Walk while ye have the light, lest darkness come upon you" (John xii. 35). "And that darkness does come. Not only is the light itself removed, but there is a peculiar darkening of the eye in those who have the light and do not use it. It is with the souls of such men, as it is with the bodies of certain lower animals, which have withdrawn themselves into rayless caverns, afar from the light of day: they were plainly formed by their Creator's hand to see; but their long absence from the light has obliterated the power of vision, so that, at times, even the very visual organs themselves become extinct. And so it is with these souls. The gradations are well nigh imperceptible, but the end is sure."^{*}

THE CURSE LIFTED.

A BIBLE VIEW OF THE PROMISED RESTITUTION.

BY WILLIAM H. SPENCER.

CHAPTER VIII.

THE earth as the work of God's hands is destined to exist forever; and though the curse like a dark and lowering cloud, hangs over the earth, yet it is but a shadow compared with the coming glory—a cloud with its silver lining—when the curse shall be lifted. A groaning creation shall not always struggle in the bonds of corruption. The shadows of the gloomy past shall not always be spread as a mantle over the face of nature, for the few pellucid rays of dawning glory, shining through that terrible cloud of coming judgment, betokens a new genesis, a renewal, a grand regeneration (Matt. xix. 28), which gladdened the Psalmist's vision when he exclaimed: "Thou sendest forth thy Spirit—they are created; thou renewest the face of the earth." "The glory of the Lord shall endure forever; the Lord shall rejoice in his works."

In days far back on the stream of time was the LORD'S GLORY EXHIBITED TO FAVORED MORTALS.

In the lamentable murmurings of the congregation of Israel in the wilderness, when in their rebellion they questioned the power of that divine hand which had led them forth from Egyptian bondage, and freed them from the cruel lash of the task-masters, God manifested to them the tokens of his might, and the evidence of his presence. Aaron said unto them: "In the morning, then ye shall see the glory of the Lord; for that he beareth your murmurings against the Lord: and what are we, that ye murmur against us? And it came to pass, as Aaron spake unto the whole congregation of the children of Israel, that they looked toward the wilderness, and, behold, the glory of the Lord appeared in the cloud."—Exod. xvi. 7, 10.

* Sermons by the Bishop of Oxford, "God's Revelation Man's Probation."

Again: When "Moses went up into the mount" to receive the law of God, "a cloud covered the mount. And the glory of the Lord abode upon mount Sinai. . . . And the sight of the glory of the Lord was like devouring fire on the top of the mount in the face of the children of Israel."—Exod. xxiv. 15-18. Though Moses was permitted to come into the presence of the Lord, and talk with him face to face, yet it appears he desired a fuller manifestation of His glory. "And he said, I beseech thee, show me thy glory. And He said, I will make all my goodness pass before thee, and I will proclaim the name of the Lord before thee; and I will be gracious, and I will show mercy on whom I will show mercy. And he said, Thou canst not see my face; for there shall no man see me, and live. And the Lord said, Behold there is a place by me, and thou shalt stand upon a rock; and it shall come to pass, while my glory passeth by, that I will put thee in a cleft of the rock, and will cover thee with my hand while I pass by: and I will take away mine hand, and thou shalt see my back parts: but my face shall not be seen."—Exod. xxxiii. 18-23. This faint manifestation of God's glory, compared with its fulness, left such a heavenly radiance on Moses' face that he must needs be veiled when he returned to the camp of the Israelites; for "Aaron and all the children of Israel" saw that "the skin of his face shone, and they were afraid to come nigh him."

By direction of God Moses erected a "tabernacle," and He said, "there will I meet with the children of Israel, and the tabernacle shall be sanctified by my glory." When Moses had completed the work, and all things were ready for the manifestation of the Lord's glory, "then a cloud covered the tent of the congregation, and the glory of the Lord filled the tabernacle. And Moses was not able to enter into the tent of the congregation, because the cloud abode thereon, and the glory of the Lord filled the tabernacle. And when the cloud was taken up from over the tabernacle, the children of Israel went onward in all their journeys: but if the cloud were not taken up, then they journeyed not till the day that it was taken up. For the cloud of the Lord was upon the tabernacle by day, and fire was on it by night, in the sight of all the house of Israel, throughout all their journeys."—Exod. xl. 34-38. Thus did the Lord manifest his presence with the children of Israel, guiding them in all their journeyings.

We need not trace the instances of the manifestations of the glory of the Lord to the people of his choice. The same pellucid light of celestial glory which crowned the lofty peaks of Mt. Siani we find consecrating the temple of Jerusalem, after Solomon had devoutly dedicated it to the Most High. There the glory of the Lord abode, illuminating the mercy seat with a heavenly glow, and hallowing the sanctuary with its presence.

Time rolled on, and the Israelites betook themselves to idolatry, and the habitation of righteousness became burdened with iniquity; then, alas, came the sad hour of the people of his choice, for the Lord would not sanction their iniquity by dwelling in their midst, and the time came for

THE DEPARTURE OF HIS GLORY.

The Lord manifests his glory by the river Chebar to the captive Ezekiel; and again when he went forth unto the plain, he says, "the glory of the Lord stood there, as the glory which I saw by the river Chebar." Jerusalem had forsaken God; and the coals of fire upon the altar which had heretofore consumed the sacrificial substitutes, were hurled into the midst of the city, betokening the desolation which awaited it. "Then the glory of the Lord departed from off the threshold of the house." Since that sad hour only occasional flashes of the glory of the Lord have been manifested in this sin-cursed world. It "shone round about" the wondering shepherds of Bethlehem, and "they were sore afraid." (Luke ii. 9.) It gleamed from the face of the meek and lowly One upon the mount of transfiguration, while his seamless vesture shone with celestial light, and a halo of glory encircled the eye-witnesses of that majesty of their transfigured King, and "beheld his glory as the glory of the only begotten of the Father." Moses in the cloud-capped peaks of Sinai, and Elijah borne heavenward on the fiery chariots did not appear in the dazzling glory as now, wherein was prefigured "the power and coming of our Lord Jesus Christ."

If a sin-burdened world has received such wonderful manifestations of "the glory of the Lord," what can be the greatness of its manifestation in the regenerated earth—in the new world? The exhibition of God's glory in the past is but a shadowy light of the incomprehensible fulness and greatness of

THE COMING GLORY.

As "the glory of the Lord filled the tabernacle" which Moses erected, so hath God sworn, "as truly as I live, ALL THE EARTH shall be filled with the glory of the Lord. (Numbers xiv. 20, 21.) In contemplation of this promise, which is as certain of fulfilment as that God lives, well may poor groveling worms of dust humble themselves in sack-cloth and ashes, in view of their unworthiness to partake of the coming glory—that blessed period soon to dawn upon this cursed and sorrowing world, when the wilderness shall be glad and the deserts and solitary places shall rejoice and blossom with the loveliness and fragrance of the rose, and the wilderness shall be clothed with Lebanon's glory and Carmel's and Sharon's excellency. Then "the ransomed of the Lord shall return, and come to Zion with songs and everlasting joy upon their heads; they shall obtain joy and gladness, and sorrow and sighing shall flee away." "And they shall see the glory of the Lord and the excellency of our God."

"The glory of the Lord shall be revealed, and all flesh shall see it together: for the mouth of the Lord hath spoken it." "The Lord God will come with a strong hand, and his arm shall rule for him; behold, his reward is with him, and his work before him."

Drifting rapidly down the stream of time, our lot has been cast amid the perils of "the last days." Oppressed with the iniquity of a Sodom-like world, tired and weary of the heartless taunts of the scoffing multitudes, and mingling our sighs with a groaning creation, we patiently wait and anxiously watch for the first gladdening ray of heavenly light—like the golden beams which precede the rise of the king of day—which shall announce the return of Him who has "entered into glory." A dazzling glow of glory shrouded the mount of transfiguration, but the "King of glory" shall come "in his own glory, and in his Father's, and of the holy angels," "to be glorified in his saints, and to be admired in all them that believe." O how we should rejoice that we are partakers of Christ's sufferings, for if we "endure all things" we shall "obtain the salvation which is in Christ Jesus, with eternal glory." If we "suffer with him" we shall also "reign with him;" "the sufferings of this present time are not worthy to be compared with the glory that shall be revealed in us," "for our light affliction, which is but for a moment, worketh for us a far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory."

O blessed prospect! "When Christ, who is our life, shall appear, then shall we also appear with him in glory." "When he shall appear, we shall be like him," for he "shall change our vile body, that it may be fashioned like unto his glorious body." When the son of Jesse with the prophetic spirit beheld this coming glory, well might he exclaim, "I shall be satisfied when I awake with thy likeness." "Blessed be the Lord God of Israel, who only doeth wonderful things. And blessed be his glorious name forever; and let the whole earth be filled with his glory. Amen, and Amen. The prayers of David the son of Jesse are ended."

GEOLOGY AND INFIDELITY.

The infidel thinks he sees, in the Science of Geology, a contradiction of our account of the creation; taking that event to have been about six thousand years ago. And here the church has been to blame in taking this position.

No geological truth can come in collision with a Bible truth. Our Mosaic account of the creation of the world begins thus: "In the beginning God created the heavens and the earth." To this beginning there is no date; for there was nothing to date from. All we know about it is, it was a long time ago. The next we read, is: "And the earth was without form and void; and darkness was upon the face of the deep."

So far the Mosaic account of the creation is in perfect harmony with the geological origin of the earth by the present popular "Nebular Hypothesis," which is, that elementary matter was first in a chaotic state, uncondensed, and in a turbid gaseous form, such as the nebula, little whitish spots seen in matter, out of which the planets are formed. So the generous geologist is bound to give Moses due credit of his scientific account of creation.

On a moment's reflection it is self-evident that Moses describes a period of darkness which has no date to beginning or end. If one has a right to say it was twenty-four hours; another has as good a right to say, it was twenty-four thousand years; for none of us know the duration of it; but we know it was a long period from the following circumstances: Geologists are generally agreed that the first form of life that existed on the earth, was of the very lowest order; but all do not agree in what period life began.

The Azoic Age was so called because it was supposed to be without life; but Prof. Dawson, of Montreal, in fossil coral, found what he called the shells of Rhizopoda (Root-footed). As this fossil was found in Canada, near the St. Lawrence, in what was called the Azoic Period, the name Rosozon Canadensis has been given to it; which means, Canadian early life. This earliest form, and lowest order of life, had no eyes; for they needed none to live in darkness. And as their shells are found as evidences of succeeding generations, long ages elapsed during their existence; therefore, the Mosaic age of "darkness" may safely be put down at thousands of years.

The next Mosaic period we come to is, "And God said, Let there be light: and there was light." Succeeding the age of the aforesaid eyeless creatures, we find another race having very large eyes in proportion to the size of their bodies: such as the Trilobites, and some others. "And God called the light, Day; and the darkness he called Night: and the evening and the morning were the first day."

Now it is very evident that this first day was not a day as measured by the sun; for it was three days before the sun was made. It is said, also, that "God divided the light from the darkness." So this division seems only to constitute the terms day and night, without regard to definite time. And as yet there was no firmament to divide the waters above from the waters below. So had there been a full blazing noon-day sun his rays struggling through a dense vapor, loaded with carbon, as thick as molasses, could not be perceived without extraordinary large eyes, such as we find the creatures of that period had. It is clearly stated that this gathering of the waters, and the introduction of a firmament, called heaven, was the second day. And in the third day the waters, under the heavens, were gathered into one place, called seas, and the dry land appeared, which was called earth; and later, in the same day, the earth brought forth grass, herbs and trees; each bearing seed and fruit after its kind.

This is the Mosaic account of what Geologists call the Azic Age, the first portion of which agrees perfectly with the Mosaic account, and the latter does not contradict it. As yet no graminivorous, or carnivorous animals existed, because such could not live without the product of the earth. It is, therefore, reasonable to suppose that God would not create animals before He made something for them to eat. Moses tells us "the sun and moon were created on the fourth day." Geology shows us that the distinct feature of the early Silurian Age was the partial clearing of the sky after the murky clouds of the Azic. The first glimpse of the sun would have seemed, to an observer, as a new creation, and in popular language it is thus described.

We also read that on the fifth day the waters brought forth abundantly the moving creatures that had life. And Geologists know that the swarming seas of the Silurian and Devonian Ages justify this description. And God said, Let the earth bring forth the living creature after his kind: cattle and creeping things, and beasts of the earth after his kind. And God said, Let us make man in our image, after our likeness; and let them have dominion over the fish of the sea, and over the fowl of the air, and over the cattle, and over all earth, and over every creeping thing that creepeth upon the earth." This being done, the six days of creation were ended in harmony with the Geological evidence that the existence of man was coeval with that of beasts, birds, fish and creeping things.

On a review of the six days' creation, no doubt but that the earth at first turned on its axis as it does now. This is evident from its spheroidal figure of the earth, its equatorial diameter being twenty six and forty seven hundredths of miles more than its polar diameter. The fact of its having this form is evidence that it took it by turning on its axis: and it is proof also that it turned on its axis while in a chaotic state, or before it became consolidated. But this motion could not produce day and night before the firmament was clear enough to admit the light of the sun.

Another fact should be borne in mind: or the third day the earth brought forth grass, herbs, trees, etc., and man and beasts were not made until the sixth day. Why not? Because the abundance of carbon, known to be in the world, so loaded the air that no such beings could live. So before man and beasts were made, a vegetable race must be made to use up the carbon and purify the air, so as to be fit for air-breathing animals. And Geology testifies to the enormous growth of vegetables which must have grown for ages in an atmosphere thick with carbon. So from the third day to the end of the sixth there must have been a very long period. The candid reader must, therefore, perceive that our Bible account of creation is of Divine revelation: or of Geological science: and in either case it is true, and as a truth, the Infidel has no fault to find with it, or by whom it was written.—*An extract from an unpublished MS. by Z. IS THE POPE THE LITTLE HORN OF DANIEL?

AFTER examining this subject for two or three years, I have come to the conclusion, the prophecy of Daniel vii., viii., xi., and xii., is not of the papacy, and that the papacy is not the Man of Sin spoken of in the New Testament. John says, "He is antichrist that denieth the Father and the Son" (1 John ii. 22). This the Pope does not do. Let any one read the prophecy, without a pre-conceived opinion, it seems to me.

they would never think of applying it to the Pope. When speaking of the ten horns, Dan. vii. 8, he sees "another little horn" come up after them, and pluck up three of the first horns by the roots. We should bear in mind, a horn denotes a kingdom; and the eyes and mouth are in this little horn, that becomes great, but not until it becomes great. After he sees this beast speak great words, Daniel says, "I beheld until the thrones were cast down, and the Ancient of days did sit, . . . and ten thousand times ten thousand stood before him: the judgment was set, and the books were opened."

It is evident that he looked down through a period of time without telling what he saw, until the general judgment, when the books were opened. There is, I think, but two places in the Bible where it speaks of more than one book being opened at the same time: one is in Rev. xx., after the thousand years. After he sees the books opened, he goes back to the beast, that speaks the great words, and tells what becomes of him, and says, "I beheld till the beast was slain, and his body destroyed and given to the burning flame. As concerning the rest of the beasts, they had their dominion taken away; yet their lives were prolonged for a season and time." We find this same beast, in Rev. xix. 19, 20, cast into a lake of fire burning with brimstone. Then the old dragon is bound a thousand years.

Daniel says, "I saw one like the Son of man come with the clouds of heaven, . . . and there was given him dominion, and glory, and a kingdom, that all people, and nations, and languages should serve him." Here we notice, when Christ comes, all people that are left, after the beast is destroyed, will be subjected to Christ. The vision troubled Daniel; so he asked one that "stood by, the truth of all this." The angel tells Daniel the interpretation of the things. He tells him, "These four beasts are four kingdoms which shall arise out of the earth. But the saints of the Most High shall take the kingdom, and possess the kingdom for ever, even for ever and ever." Then Daniel inquires for the truth of the fourth beast, and the ten horns that were in his head; and of the other which came up, and before whom three fell, even of that horn that had eyes, and a mouth that spake very great things, whose look was more stout than his fellows. I beheld, and the same horn made war with the saints, and prevailed against them, until the Ancient of days came, and the judgment was given to the saints of the Most High, and the time came that the saints possessed the kingdom. Here we notice that the saints, the same that the beast made war with, are to execute the judgment on the beast. See Psa. cxlix. 8, 9.

In the angel's interpretation to Daniel he says, The fourth beast shall be diverse from all kingdoms; "and the ten horns out of this kingdom are ten kings that shall arise, and another shall arise after them, and he shall be diverse from the first" (ten, not one of them), "and he shall subdue three kings. And he shall speak great words against the Most High, and he shall wear out the saints of the Most High, and think to change times and laws, and they shall be given into his hand until a time, and times, and the dividing of time." We notice that the horn, or kingdom, that rises after the ten, does this work, and not the woman of Rev. xvii. This beast is not destroyed by the ten horns of Revelation, as we shall see. That this is a prediction of the great anti-christ is admitted by all expositors. But protestant writers have supposed that it referred to the papacy, long before "the Man of Sin was revealed;" therefore, people were thrown off their guard in looking for anything else to fill the prophecy; hence, they apply the "time, times, and dividing of time," to the long succession of Popes, and not to one kingdom. We find the word time used in the fourth chapter of Daniel. It is used in the king of Babylon's dream; also, in the interpretation, and is the same times, which signifies seven years. What rule of interpretation have we to make the three and a half times to signify 1260 years?

"But the judgment shall sit, and they shall take away his dominion, to consume and destroy it unto the end." In Elder Grant's new tract, "The Mystery Explained," he says: "When speaking of the little horn, Daniel says, 'They shall take away his dominion, to consume and destroy it unto the end' (Dan. vii. 26), we find no antecedent in Daniel for the pronoun they; but when we turn to the work of the ten horns on the scarlet-colored beast, we believe we find who are to do the work of taking away the dominion. These ten horns are to hate the woman, make her desolate, eat her flesh and burn her with fire."—page 25. He makes the ten horns, on the beast, destroy the beast, himself! The ten kings of Italy are to hate the woman and make her desolate; but the beast is quite another thing. A horn, or beast, denotes a political power. France is the seventh head on the scarlet-colored beast of Rev. xvii., and continued a short space, and received a wound by the sword at Waterloo, and did live again under Napoleon III. I shall notice this hereafter.

If we follow the history of France back to its rise, we shall find when he plucked up the three horns, as Daniel says. In Robin's Modern History, period 3d, page 80, we find the following: "France, anciently called Gaul, immediately previous to the dissolution of the Roman Empire of the West, was divided between the Romans, Visigoths, Franks, and Burgundians. A few years after that event, viz., 581, Clovis, King of the Franks, obtained, by degrees, possession of the country. He is, therefore, considered the true founder of the French Monarchy, as before him the Franks held only a few provinces on the right bank of the Rhine. From this people ancient Gaul obtained the name of France."

Here we find a kingdom that comes up at the right time and place, and plucks up three kings; the Romans, Visigoths, and Burgundians. On page 81 he says, "Clovis made many conquests. First, over the Romans, in the battle of Soissons; then over the King of Turingia, who had invaded his dominions; afterwards over the Germans, in the battle of Tobbiac; and finally over the Visigoths under Alaric, when he subdued all the south of Gaul." Daniel says, "And out of one of them came forth a little horn, which waxed exceeding great, towards the south, and towards the east, and towards the pleasant land" (viii. 9). There is no history so applicable to the prophecy as this. This little horn first becomes powerful, or "more stout than his fellows; and the same horn made war with the saints." The eyes and mouth were in the horn; or somewhere in the history of this horn we shall find where he makes war on the saints for three years and a half, if our premises are correct.

"And it waxed great, even against the hosts of heaven; and it cast down some of the host and of the stars to the ground, and stamped upon them; yea, he magnified himself even to (against, margin,) the Prince (Christ) of the hosts; and by (from) him (the Prince) the daily was taken away, and the place of his sanctuary (house consecrated to the worship of God,—Webster) was cast down." This brings us to another period in the history of France; and the prophecy cannot apply to any other kingdom. Daniel says, "And an host was given him against the daily, by reason of transgression; and it cast down the truth to the ground." We have had no sacrifice since Christ was offered once for all, and the daily is connected with the truth, and cannot be pagan worship. In verse 10 the angel says, "Behold, I will make thee know what shall be in the last end of the indignation, for at the time appointed the end shall be." He tries to impress Daniel's mind that this will take place near the end, or in the last end of the indignation. Then he says, "The ram which thou sawest having two horns, are the kings of Media and Persia; and the rough goat is the king of Grecia; and the great horn, that is between his eyes, is the first king. Now that being broken, whereas four stood up for it, four kingdoms shall stand up out of the nation, but not in his power; and in the latter time of their kingdom, when the transgressors are come to the full, a king of fierce countenance, and understanding dark sentences, shall stand up." This king of fierce countenance is to stand up in the latter time of their kingdom when the transgressors are come to their full. Paul says, there shall come a falling away first, then shall that Man of Sin be revealed, the son of perdition.

The historian says, after speaking of some of the causes of the French Revolution, "There were other concurrent causes, such as the corruptions of religion and the abuses which existed in the church; the despotism and profligacy of the government; the inequality, and the enormous burden of taxation; the hauteur, and the odious privileges of the nobility and clergy; the notions respecting liberty and equal rights, generated by the revolution in America; and especially the progress of philosophy respecting free thinking, and otherwise, which the writings of Voltaire, Rousseau, and others, so effectually aided. These, and perhaps other causes combined, threw a great nation into madness, and created a revolution which rocked the world."

—Period 10, page 311.

There can be nothing more applicable to Paul's falling away time, and the time when "the transgressors are come to their full, when a king of fierce countenance stands up" (Dan. viii. 23), than this. It seems to me that people have been greatly deceived by thinking that the papacy is the Man of Sin. Paul says, "Let no man deceive you by any means; for that day" (the coming of Christ) "shall not come except there come a falling away first, and that Man of Sin be revealed, the son of perdition." "For the mystery of iniquity doth already work, only he who now letteth will let (or hinder) until he be taken out of the way" (2 Thess. ii. 3, 7). France passed an act stating that "there is no God, and death is an eternal sleep."

Says Faber, on the prophecies, vol. 3, page 363, "On the memorable 26th day of August, 1773, an open profession of Atheism, irreligion, and infidelity, was made, and forthwith acted upon by a whole nation, once devoted to the papal superstitions. Christianity was then formally abolished, as a notorious and malignant imposture, by the government of revolutionary France." When this was accomplished, there was nothing in the way to hinder the Man of Sin from being revealed; whom the Lord shall consume with the Spirit of his mouth and the brightness of his coming; even him, whose coming is after the working of Satan, with all signs and lying wonders, and with all deceivableness of unrighteousness in them that perish, because they received not the love of the truth that they might be saved; and for this cause, God shall send them strong delusion, that they should believe a lie, that they all might be damned who believe not the truth, but had pleasure in unrighteousness" (2 Thess. ii. 8-12.)

We find this same beast, or satan, "cast out of heaven into the earth (civil or political power of the beast), and his angels were cast out with him, rejected of God, left to believe a lie, for their Sodom-like wickedness. Therefore, it is said, "Woe unto the inhabitants of the earth, and of the sea," (occeasiastical power), "for the devil is come down unto you, having great wrath, because he knoweth that he hath but a short time" (Rev. xii. 9-12). If it was 1260 years, it would be a long time for such a state of things to exist.

We find in Rev. xi. 7, 8, after the two witnesses have finished their testimony in their sackcloth state, "The beast that ascendeth out of the bottomless pit," (it does not say, has or had, ascended out), "shall make war against them, and shall overcome them, and their dead bodies shall lie in the street of the great city, which spiritually is called Sodom and Egypt, where also our Lord was crucified." Here we see Paris, the city where the two witnesses (the Old and New Testaments), were destroyed, is compared, spiritually, to Sodom and Egypt, and also to the place where Christ was crucified.

Jude says, "Even as Sodom and Gomorrah and the cities about them in like manner, giving themselves over to fornication, and going after strange flesh, are set forth for example, suffering the vengeance of eternal fire." Peter says, "But there were false prophets also among the people, even as there shall be false teachers among you who privily shall bring in damnable heresies, even denying the Lord that bought them, and bring upon themselves swift destruction. And many shall follow their pernicious ways, by reason of whom the way of truth shall be evil spoken of." Then he says, "If God spared not the angels that sinned," nor the old world, and turned "the cities of Sodom and Gomorrah into ashes, condemning them with an overthrow, making them an example unto those that after should live ungodly." Here we find Sodom set forth as an example or type of that city where the two witnesses in the street, and where the ways of truth are evil spoken of; and it is said, this beast was slain, and his body destroyed, and given to the burning flame (Dan. vii. 11); and the rest of the beasts had their dominion taken away; yet their lives were prolonged for a season and time; and the same beast cast into a lake of fire, burning with brimstone, and the remnant slain with the sword of Him that sat upon the horse. Then the dragon is bound a thousand years, not annihilated, but his power taken from him.

By a careful examination of Rev. xi. we find the angel tells us where to apply the rod. He says, Rise and measure the temple of God, and the altar, and them that worship therein. But the court, without the temple, leave out, and measure it not, for it is given unto the Gentiles; and the holy city (church) shall they tread under foot forty and two months; or three and half years. He tells us not to measure the sackcloth state of the two witnesses; but the period that the truth and the church of Christ are set aside and rejected. I think this is what is to be understood, as the Mau of Sin and the Antichrist.

Daniel says, "Another shall arise after the ten, and he shall be diverse from the first." Then he is not one of the ten, and must occupy the place of three of the first ten, or pluck up three of the first. Now, if we can find a kingdom that does this work, we shall find the right one. The historian says, "Under Didier the kingdom of Italy came to an end. He was defeated by Charlemagne, his son-in-law, and Italy was afterwards incorporated into the New Western Empire."—Period 4, page 93.

"The New Western Empire, so called, included the dominions of Charlemagne, or the countries of which he was acknowledged as the sovereign, in A. D. 800. It was at this period the title of 'Emperor of the West' was conferred upon him. He was established in that august sovereignty, by being crowned at Rome, by Pope Leo III."—Page 91.

"It is thought by some, that had he chosen Rome as the seat of his government, and at death transmitted an undivided dominion to his successor, the fallen empire of the Romans might have been restored to its former prosperity and greatness."—Page 98. (We see if Rome had been restored to its former greatness, the prophecy would have been broken. But the beast was not to take his seat in Rome as many think.) "The countries included under the title of the New Western Empire, were principally France, Burgundy, Germany, Italy, and a part of Spain." . . . "Being present at the service of mass, on his knees before the altar, the Pope came suddenly behind him and placed on his head the crown of the Cæsars. This act was followed by loud acclamation by the populace. An august title, which had lain dormant for several centuries, was thus revived, but it did not restore Rome to its ancient splendor, for reasons which were given above."

This shows that Rome is not the subject, or center, of the prophecy; but France fills the place of the little horn, and waxes great towards the east and south. This must be the Dragon of Rev. xii., with the seven heads crowned, but no crown on his horns, as the ten divisions of Italy had not received their separate forms as kings at that time. The historian says, "Having been crowned the second time, by Pope Stephen II., in return for his service, Pepin marched against the Lombards, who had invaded the Principality of Ravenna, and threatened Rome itself. The Lombards were spared only by the surrender of Ravenna, which Pepin bestowed on the Holy See. Thus commenced the temporal authority of the Popes."—Page 94, (751).

After speaking of the New Western Empire, he says: "The empire, as such, continued but a short time. One country after another separated from it under the successors of Charlemagne, and Germany at last became the sole seat of the empire.

The Leopard beast, of Rev. xiii., is the same horn when he speaks great words against the Most High, and wears out the saints, and takes away the daily. "The dragon gave him his power, and his seat, and great authority. And I saw one of his heads, as it were, wounded to death; and his deadly wound was healed; and all the world wondered after the beast." We see the wounded head is on this beast, and it is the one the world wonders after. "And they worshipped the dragon which gave power unto the beast; and they worshipped the beast, saying, 'Who is able to make war with him!'" Here we notice that this beast that was so powerful that the others had to submit to him, or worship him, because there was none able to make war with him. This must have taken place in France under Bonaparte, and was wounded to death at Waterloo.

"And there was given unto him a mouth speaking great things, and blasphemies, and power was given him to continue (make war) forty and two months." Here we have the three years and a half, again; the same as in Dan. vii. 25. "And he opened his mouth (this is the horn's mouth) in blasphemy against God, and blasphemed his name and his tabernacle, and them that dwell in heaven." If this was not fulfilled at the French revolution, then I see no place for it to be. "If any man have an ear let him hear." "He that leaeth into captivity, shall go into captivity. He that killeth with the sword, must be killed with the sword."

"And I beheld another beast coming up out of the earth" (civil or political power of the dragon); "and he had two horns like a lamb, and he spake as a dragon." This beast has the appearance of having two horns, but they are not full grown, like the Ram's horns of Dan. viii. 20. "And he exerciseth all of the power of the first beast before him, (or in his presence) and causeth the earth, and them that dwell therein, to worship the first beast, whose deadly wound was healed." Then this beast before him must be France, after the wound is healed: this is very clear. In chapter xvii. 7, the angel says, "I will tell thee the mystery of the woman and of the beast that carrieth her, which hath the seven heads and ten horns. The beast that thou sawest was, and is not," (or has the wound by a sword) "and shall ascend out of the bottomless pit, and go into perdition." verse 8. "And the beast that was, and is not, even he is the eighth, and is of the seven, and goeth into perdition." These ten horns were to give their strength unto the beast,—this eighth head,—and they are to make war with the Lamb; but the ten horns are to hate the woman, and make her desolate, before they make war with the Lamb; and the beast that carrieth her, must go into perdition, before the ten kings can do the work of desolating her. Now was it not the Prussian and German power that exercised all the power of France in 1870, and have left the woman to the mercy of the ten kings? "And he," the two horned beast, "doeth great wonders so that he maketh fire come down from heaven on the earth in the sight of men." Did it not seem like a miracle at the time that the Prussian and German armies took the power of France into their own hands? Then Bismarck says to the French, "choose you a President by vote, and organize a government, or make an image to the beast that had a wound by a sword and did live." "And he had power to give life unto the image of the beast, that the image of the beast should both speak, and cause that as many as would not worship" (or comply with the government) "should be killed."

"And after these things, I saw another angel come down from heaven, having great power; and the earth was lighted with his glory. And he cried mightily, with a strong voice, saying, Babylon the great is fallen, is fallen, and is become the habitation of devils, and the hole of every foul spirit, and a cage of every unclean and hateful bird." Any one that saw, or heard of the horrible scenes in Paris at the time when the government of France, or the image, was caused to have life, they must say this prediction was fulfilled.

If the woman represents the church, who is the church, if not the people that support her? The beasts, or kings that carrieth the church were crowned, "The eldest son of the church." France has been one of the most blood-thirsty catholic kingdoms on the earth, and is so at the present time. This is why the Pope wants to have France become an imperial power; and this is the cause of the present trouble between Bismarck and France; and when another war comes between France and the Germans, we may see the mark of the beast and the number of his name on their foreheads, or in their hands. Then if we are wise we shall understand.

In order to make out that the Pope is the beast, and that he took his seat in Rome, A. D. 533, they quote the decree of Justinian as follows. "In 533 he decreed that the bishop of that church should be the head of all churches, and began at once to persecute those who would not submit." I ask, who had the most authority, the Pope or the beast that carried her? Then they quote what Bower says; "While the Arian king was striving by the most just and equitable laws to clear the church from all simony in the West, the Catholic Emperor, Justinian, was employing the most unjust means of clearing her from all heresies in the East; that of persecution, and the most cruel persecution any Christian Emperor had yet set on foot as countenanced." I need not quote any more to show the folly of applying this to the Pope.

It seems that Daniel ix., has reference to Daniel's people, and the destruction of Jerusalem; and has no connection with the other chapters, where time is connected with the daily. In ch. ix. 27, he says: "And he shall confirm the covenant with many for one week, and in the midst of the week he shall cause the sacrifice and oblation to cease; and for the overspreading of the abominations he shall make it desolate even until the consummation, and that determined shall be poured upon the desolator." We see war is the cause of the desolations in verse 26; and it is called abominations in verse 27. See also the words of Christ, in Matt. xxiv., where he says to his disciples, "When ye, therefore, shall see the abomination of desolation, spoken of by Daniel the prophet, stand in the Holy place, (whoso readeth, let him understand); then let them which be in Judea flee to the mountains: and except those days be shortened no flesh shall be saved." These words must apply to the church at the destruction of Jerusalem, and also in the 9th of Daniel, because he says, "Then if any man shall say unto you, lo, here is Christ, or there, believe it not; for, there shall arise false Christs and false prophets," etc. We see the days that are shortened, cannot apply to the antichrist, or the one that takes away the daily; but they place the abomination or make desolate by war, as at the destruction of Jerusalem. There is no daily spoken of at the destruction of Jerusalem; and no sacrifice when the daily is taken away. Sacrifice is a supplied word, and should not be there, for sacrifice and oblations ceased.

Dan xi. commencing at verse 6, to the end of the chapter, I think took place in the last part of the 18th century and first of 19th. The 21st verse must refer to France; and the king of the south to Russia; and verse 40, "The king of the south (Russia), shall push at him (France), and the king of the north shall come against him" (France). Any one has only to read the history of the war that France made on the nations from the commencement, or just previous to the French Revolution, to find all those places designated in the last part of this chapter, even the Ethiopians, on the Island of St. Domingo. He is yet to plant his palace between the seas, in the glorious holy mountain where he will come to his end, (by Christ and the saints) when he with the ten kings makes war with the Lamb.

HUMAN REDEMPTION.—No. 11.

SALVATION.—VARIOUS SIGNIFICATION OF THE TERM.

THE word "Salvation" occurs in the OLD TESTAMENT in three distinct senses.

First,—It is put for signal deliverances wrought by human agency; e. g., "Shall Sathan die, who hath wrought this great salvation in Israel?" (1 Sam. xiv. 45). Men are, in this sense, frequently called "saviours" (Judg. iii. 9—15; Obad. 21).

Secondly,—It is used to indicate Divine protection and blessing. God is spoken of as a "rock" of salvation, a "shield," and a "horn" (2 Sam. xxii. 3), and special manifestations of His providence are emphatically called "His salvation" (Exod. xiv. 13; 1 Chron. xvi. 23—35; Psa. xxvii. 1). In this sense, too, Jehovah is said to be the "Saviour" of Israel (Isa. xiv. 15; Hos. xiii. 4).

Thirdly,—It is employed to describe a state of mind,—consciousness of peace with God, and deliverance from the dominant power of evil; e. g., "Let Thy priests, O God, be clothed with salvation, and let Thy saints rejoice in goodness" (3 Chron. vi. 41); and again, "He hath clothed me with the garments of salvation. He hath covered me with the robe of righteousness" (Isa. lxi. 10). "Salvation," in this sense, was joy and peace to its possessor. So David prays, after his sad fall, "Restore unto me the joy of Thy salvation" (Psa. li. 12); by which he means, "Give me again the sweet consciousness of forgiven sin."

Prophetically, the everlasting blessedness of Israel (whatever that state might signify to the Jew) is called her "salvation" (Isa. xlv. 17; xlvii. 13; lii. 7). I say, whatever that state might signify to the Jew; but I have no doubt as to what it did signify to him. I believe that, to the ancient Israelite, it always and rightly meant, the exaltation of Abraham's seed under the Messiah, after the resurrection (Isa. xxv. 6—8; xxvi. 19; xlv. 17—23, comp. with Rom. xiv. 11; Ezek. xxxvii. 1—14; xvi. 53—63). It is in this sense that the coming King is emphatically termed by Isaiah "a Saviour, and a great one" (xix. 20), and is spoken of by the same prophet (xlix. 8) as given "in a day of salvation,"—to "establish [raise up—mary.] the earth,"—to cause "to inherit the desolate heritages,"—to "say to the prisoners (in the grave), Go forth; to them that are in darkness, Show yourselves" (xlix. 9),—to cause the chosen people to enter upon a period when "they shall not hunger nor thirst; neither shall the heat nor sun smite them; for He that hath mercy on them shall lead them, even by the springs of water shall He guide them" (xlix. 10, comp. with Rev. vii. 16).

"Salvation," as it is now generally understood, in the sense of deliverance from hell, is a term unknown to the Old Testament. Such passages as, "Thou hast delivered my soul from the lowest hell" (Psa. lxxxvi. 13), or, "Thou shalt beat him with the rod, and deliver his soul from hell" (Prov. xxiii. 14), refer only to the grave, and are usually so translated in the margin.

That the ancient Jews believed in future punishment is clear enough. The amount of light they had on this subject may be gathered from the various Scriptures which speak of sinners as "silent in darkness" (1 Sam. ii. 9); as "reserved to the day of destruction" (Job. xxi. 20); as persons whose "name" shall, by God, be "put out for ever and ever" (Psa. ix. 5); on whom He will "rain burning coals, fire, and brimstone, and an horrible tempest" (xi. 6); who "shall not inhabit the earth" (Prov. x. 30); who shall be slain by "the breath of the lips" of Messiah (Isa. xi. 4); who shall be made as "ashes under the soles of the feet" of the righteous (Mal. iv. 3); and whose "carcasses" (dead corpses) shall be for an enduring memorial of God's judgment on them, for "their worm shall not die, neither shall their fire be quenched, and they shall be an abhorring to all flesh" (Isa. lxvi. 24). From these passages,—and there are none of a contrary character,—it is difficult to see how the Jew could gather more than that the wicked would be subjected to the punishments thus threatened.

What classes of persons were by the Jews included under the term "wicked," it is not difficult to gather. Primarily, and as a rule, the idolatrous enemies of Israel,—their seducers and oppressors,—constituted the great body of transgressors; exceptionally, apostate Jews,—men of violence and blood, fraternal opposers of God and goodness,—were comprehended: but there is nothing whatever to indicate even a suspicion, on the part either of priest or prophet, that mankind as a race, in consequence of Adam's fall, were born under a liability to eternal misery after death,—that all alike were, by nature, involved in this one great and common condemnation. Explain the fact as we may, it cannot be denied that the doctrine of the liability of all mankind, in consequence of the fall, to eternal misery, if revealed at all in Scripture, can be found only in that later revelation, the advent of which was announced to the wondering shepherds as "good tidings of great joy which shall be to all people" (Luke ii. 10).

Nothing can be plainer than that the Jew looked at the condition of the race from a standpoint differing in many respects from our own. It never seems to have occurred to him that man, as man, was under condemnation; that the original threatening, "In the day that thou eatest thereof thou shalt surely die," meant more than God declared it to mean when He said to Adam, "Cursed is the ground for thy sake; in sorrow shalt thou eat of it all the days of thy life; in the sweat of thy face shalt thou eat bread, till thou return unto the ground; for out of it wast thou taken: for dust thou art, and unto dust shalt thou return" (Gen. iii. 17—19); or that a Jewish babe was born "under wrath," and, until regenerated, regarded as a child of the devil. Explain this state of things as we may, we are forced to conclude that, if man did really then enter upon existence in the condition supposed, the Antediluvian, the Patriarch, and the Israelite, were alike ignorant of the fact.

That the distinctions which exist now, between the spiritual and unspiritual, the merely moral and the truly devout, the men of form and ritual, and the men whose purged eye pierced through these outer coverings into the invisible and eternal, existed among the Jews, cannot be doubted. Such men knew, as well as we do, that they had natures prone to sin and averse to holiness, and that God therefore required "a new heart and a right spirit" (Ezek. xi. 19; xviii. 31); but, as I have said before, this necessity is, in the OLD TESTAMENT, never spoken of as attaching to man, as man, in consequence of Adam's sin; is never regarded as existing apart from personal transgression; or ever supposed to be essential to salvation.

Whether rightly or wrongly, the Jews assuredly believed that, whatever might become of other nations, "Israel" would be "saved." Individually, they were quite aware that the birthright might be cast away, that God might be rejected, and His favor lost by apostacy; but, as a nation, they always regarded themselves, and were regarded by the prophets, even in the midst of their backslidings, as a chosen people (Rom. xi. 26).

In the NEW TESTAMENT, the word "salvation" first meets us in the announcement of the angel that the holy child shall be called Jesus (i. e., Saviour), because He shall save His people from their sins (Matt. i. 21). Peter, addressing the Israelites, says, "Unto you first God, having raised up His Son Jesus, sent Him to bless you, in turning away every one of you from his iniquities" (Acts iii. 26), and Paul but teaches the same doctrine to the Gentiles when he tells them that "the Gospel is the power of God unto salvation" (Rom. i. 16); that they must "work out" their "salvation with fear and trembling" (Phil. ii. 12); that salvation is "a helmet" for daily use in the warfare of time; and that the "wise" are they who live it (Ephes. v. 15; vi. 17). Nothing can be clearer than that the primary and principal idea of salvation in the New Testament is deliverance from the bondage of evil, emancipation from the "captivity" thereof.

But this is not the only sense in which it is used,—for St. Paul, writing to the Romans regarding Christ, says, "Being now justified by His blood, we shall be saved from wrath through Him" (Rom. v. 9); and again to the Thessalonians—"Jesus, which delivered us from the wrath to come" (1 Thess. i. 10); and again, "God hath not appointed us to wrath, but to obtain salvation by our Lord Jesus Christ, who died for us, that, whether we wake or sleep, we should live together with Him" (1 Thess. v. 9, 10).

In all these cases, the wrath referred to is that which shall fall upon the enemies of Messiah when He comes in triumph,—makes "known His salvation,"—"openly shows His righteousness in the sight of the heathen" (Psa. xcvi. 2),—bares "His holy arm in the eyes of all nations," and causes "all the ends of the earth" to "see the salvation of our God" (Isa. li. 10; Luke iii. 6).

With these two ideas clearly before us,—that salvation is primarily deliverance from the bondage of sin and evil, and secondarily, as a consequence, deliverance from wrath,—we need not be perplexed if we find this same word "salvation" often put for something far higher, even for a present union with Christ; involving freedom from the love of sin,—the partaking of a "Divine nature,"—being "born again,"—"created anew in Christ Jesus unto good works, which God hath before ordained that we should walk in them" (Ephes. ii. 10).

Hence it is that Peter is sent to tell Cornelius "words whereby he and all his house should be saved" (xi. 14), although before he heard those words the Lord himself had said to him, "Thy prayers and thine alms are come up for a memorial before God" (x. 4). Hence, too, Zaccheus, a man evidently accepted beforehand on account of his works (Luke xix. 8), has salvation "brought to his house" by that blessed Redeemer who "came to seek and to save that which was lost" (ver. 9, 10). It is in this higher sense alone that salvation comes to the Gentile through the fall of the Jew (Rom. xi. 11); that some are "from the beginning chosen to salvation through sanctification of the Spirit and belief of the truth" (2 Thess. ii. 13); and that for others there is "a day" (or period) in which, as "in a time accepted," they may gain or lose the precious boon. And so it is recorded on one occasion, that "as many as were ordained (set in order) to eternal life believed" (Acts xiii. 48); and on another, that "the Lord added to the Church daily such as should be saved," or, as Alford translates it, "those who were being saved" (Acts ii. 47). In all these cases the salvation spoken of is much more than deliverance from wrath, much more than emancipation from the captivity of evil; it is admission to fellowship with the Redeemer, it is the earnest and pledge of a full and final victory over all evil.

Greatly, therefore, as some may be stumbled at being told that salvation is represented in Scripture as a thing of degree, involving more or less according to circumstances, we fearlessly affirm it to be true. Scripture does indeed teach that to be "in Christ" involves a title to every form of spiritual blessing, whether for time or eternity; but it does not teach that every man not thus united to the Saviour is abandoned to evil, or that he who fails to become in the highest sense a child of God, is by necessary consequence a child of the devil. Not so easily does the Father in heaven let his feeble and erring ones go. For men are His children in two senses,—by birth and by adoption; they can be the devil's only in one,—by giving themselves up to his power and service, and by a voluntary and wicked rejection of the offered love of the Redeemer.

If salvation be not a thing of degree, what does St. Paul mean when he speaks of it as especially sent to God-fearing men—"Whosoever among you feareth God, to you is the word of this salvation sent" (Acts xiii. 20)? when, writing to "saints"—saved men—he says, "Whether we be afflicted, it is for your consolation and salvation" (2 Cor. i. 6)? when he tells the Philippians that the contradictions he experienced should turn to his "salvation" through their prayer, and "the supply of the Spirit of Jesus Christ" (i. 19)? when he bids Timothy "take heed" unto himself, and to "the doctrine" he teaches, since "in so doing" he should "both save himself and them that heard him" (1 Tim. iv. 16)? when in one place he affirms it to be certain that "all Israel shall be saved" (Rom. xi. 26), and, in another, labors, "if by any means he might save some of them" (xi. 14)?

In what other sense than in that of a present and higher salvation, as distinguished from a future and lower one, is it possible to conceive of the loving Saviour saying, "Unto them that are without, all these things are done in parables: that seeing they may see, and not perceive; and hearing they may hear, and not understand; lest at any time they should be converted, and their sins should be forgiven them" (Mark iv. 12)? Does any reasonable being, with the fear of God before his eyes, dare to say that words like these, whether found in the Prophets or on the lips of the Lord himself, mean more than that the parties here referred to were not then capable of profiting by the instruction He imparted,—that they were not fit to be numbered among His chosen disciples,—that their reception of His teaching at that time would only lead to its misapprehension and abuse? Does any one imagine that the Redeemer meant it to be supposed that He abandoned the multitude forever?

The conclusion may be a startling one, but it cannot be escaped,—Grace, in one form or other, must extend beyond this dispensation; Mercy must be future as well as present; Forgiveness must be possible, not only in this world, but in the world to come; Pardon and Union to Christ cannot be identical; Salvation is a thing of degree.

And now we come to understand why it is that salvation is spoken of in Scripture as accomplished through so many agencies; that belief in Christ's power to heal saved when He was on earth (Luke vii. 50); that baptism once saved (1 Pet. iii. 21); that hope saves (Rom. viii. 24); that memory saves (1 Cor. xv. 2); that the Word saves (Jas. i. 21); that the love of the truth saves (2 Thess. ii. 10); that preaching saves (1 Cor. i. 21); that grace saves (Eph. ii. 5, 8); that endurance to the end saves (Matt. xxiv. 13); that calling on the name of the Lord saves (Acts ii. 21); that coming to Christ saves (John x. 9); that His life saves (Rom. v. 10); that His death saves (Col. i. 22); that faith saves (Acts xvi. 31); that belief in the resurrection of the Lord saves (Rom. x. 9); that the knowledge of Scripture saves (2 Tim. iii. 15); that Christ is himself "salvation" (Luke ii. 30; Acts iv. 12); and that real Christians, while saved already, come at length to say, "Now is our salvation nearer than when we believed" (Rom. xiii. 11).

Hence, too, it is that "salvation," while a present blessing, is yet an "inheritance" (Heb. i. 15); enjoyed now, yet to be received by them that "look for the Saviour when He shall appear the second time without sin (a sin offering) unto salvation" (Heb. ix. 28); in one sense entered upon when faith is first exercised; in another, the crown and completion of the Christian life.

It is in this latter sense, as an inheritance "reserved" for those "who are kept by the power of God," that "salvation" was so deep an object of interest to holy men of old. For this,—the highest privilege of the elect and the gift of Christ,—was the salvation "of which [or, regarding which] the prophets have [in all ages] inquired and searched diligently, who prophesied of the grace [the peculiar favor] that should come unto [the saints]: searching what, or what manner of time, the Spirit of Christ which was in them did signify, when it testified beforehand the sufferings of Christ, and the glory that should follow. Unto whom it was revealed, that not unto themselves, but unto us [of the Gentile dispensation] they did minister the things which are now reported by them [the inspired apostles] that preached the Gospel with the Holy Ghost sent down from heaven; which things the angels desire to look into" (1 Pet. i. 10-12).

Love is the fulfilling of the law.

Correspondence.

[THE following letter comes marked "Private;" but, while I withhold the writer's name, she must excuse its publication. It is too good to "put under a bushel."—ED.]

BRO. STORRS: As it is about time for me to receive No. 12 of the BIBLE EXAMINER, I thought I would write a few lines and enclose the money to pay for it another year, as I am not willing to give it up yet. It is just as good as ever, and a very welcome visitor here. I should miss it very much if it did not come to cheer me up while I am waiting for Jesus.

I have been receiving two copies, for a few months past, that I might have one to give away and keep my own. I appreciate your kindness in sending them, but I would rather part with mine, than have you send them to me free of charge.

O this glorious Gospel! How I long for all to have the privilege of hearing it. It is so sweet to know that God is a God of love: that He takes no pleasure in the death of the wicked, but wants all to be saved: and that He will give every one a chance to hear of that Blessed Saviour who died for all, not a few.

I have always believed in an age to come when Christ and his followers should reign over the nations, and that all would then have an opportunity to hear the truth,—obey it,—and come to Christ. The gates of the Holy City are to be left open day and night, that they may bring the glory and honor of the nations into it. If there is no chance for one to repent and enter that Holy City, why not shut the gates? It would be better to have them shut; then the righteous could not see that wicked class that John tells us will be outside. I, for one, think I could not be much happier if they were out of sight, if I had no power to make them better. But I understand that those who reign with Christ will have some one to reign over; and it will be the wicked nations that John saw outside of the Holy City. And they will have the blessed privilege of hearing the glorious truths which we have heard and of repenting of their sins, and obeying the gospel, and passing through the gates into that Holy City, where they can be in the presence of Him who died for them.

If this is not true, then John made a mistake when he said the gates would be open continually: for that would not be necessary if there is no one to pass in or out. But I think John knew just what he was talking about; and he told the truth; and I am glad that I am willing for all that wicked class to be saved, and live in the kingdom prepared for all who will come to Christ.

My Bible teaches me that "God has appointed a day in which He will judge the world by Jesus Christ according to Paul's "Gospel." Would it be right to judge a man by that of which he never heard? No, indeed! God is more just than that; all will have an opportunity.

If I believed that all were going to be burned up at the coming of Jesus, but those who are watching for Him, I could not long for Him to come, as I now do. I cannot bear to think of such a dreadful thing; and I am sure I could never have a heart to pray for it, as many do at the present time.

I expect that Christ is coming to make things better, instead of worse; and if there are a large number to be burned up (as many believe), it will not be before the end of the next age, if it is then. Bless God for allowing me to see Him in His true light, that I might be able to serve Him through love, instead of fear, as many do. I hope the time is near when all may be able to believe Him to be a "God of love."

May God bless you, and give you strength to write these glorious truths (which the world ought to know) for many years, if Jesus does not come.

Your Sister in Christ.

—, Me., Aug., 1874.

FROM CORA M. CLEMENCE.

BRO. STORRS: I greet every number of the EXAMINER with as much pleasure as I would a long absent friend. It seems like conversing face to face with those of like "precious faith:" it is indeed very cheering to me, for I am alone in this place. These glorious truths are a joy and comfort to me. For months I have not met with any of the brethren and sisters, till a Bro. and sister H., from Plainville, called. How rejoiced I was to meet them. But here the meetings with the dear children are of so short duration; but in the promised land we shall never be called to part with those we love. When looking forward to that glad day, with fond anticipations, I am cheered by the thought that in a little time from this, if faithful, we shall safely arrive at home: then to think, we are to dwell with Jesus our Saviour and King, the great LIFE-GIVER, throughout endless ages! O, how it lifts my soul away from the grovelling things of earth to the bright eternal future, and helps me to endure the afflictions and trials here with submission!

So, as I read our highly prized magazine, the EXAMINER, and see that light and truth are spreading in all directions, and in Europe, I feel that truth will prevail, and the Lord will have a chosen people. What a righteous Ruler will soon govern the world; not like the present rulers of earth, but ONE that will manifest love and equity. "Many a treasure" that has laid hidden for centuries beneath the dust of earth, or old ocean's waves, will come forth and share in the blessings promised. Yes, thank God, we have the assurance that all that hear the glad tidings and accept, will live again, to die no more. O, blessed thought! The redeemed will never say, "I am sick," or "weary of trials;" but all will be free from the ills of this mortal life and have eternal joy.

FROM MRS. EMILY F. LOCKWOOD.

DEAR EXAMINER: One may ask why I look so longingly for this particular magazine; why not be content with the weeklies? among which is the "Exr. and Chronicle," the first Baptist paper in America; the "Crisis," which claims to be one of the best of another class, etc. Much as I love these for the good they have done, in the past, I feel straitened in reading them; ("have out grown them," so to speak). Is this egotism? I think not. But why such attractions in the EXAMINER? Because its prevailing sentiment is love. Not man's love to God only, but God's love to all mankind. It teaches that another and better day is dawning; that the time is coming when the cord that binds humanity together, will vibrate in unison with the heart of the Great Master.

I thank you for the first Editorial in the August EXAMINER. The subject has for some time interested me. And while I would not "pin my faith upon the sleeve" of any individual, I must say, and that without flattery, I read the Editorials with great interest.

Saratoga Springs, N. Y., Aug. 1874.

FROM MRS. MARTHA A. HAUSE.

BRO. STORRS: Because I have not written you for so long a time, does not indicate any abatement of interest in the BIBLE EXAMINER, and the glorious truths which it exhibits. On the contrary, my interest steadily increases; but circumstances have been such, that I have had but little leisure for writing; besides, I have all along hoped a way might be opened for me to do something more for its support, before I should write again. I am sorely pained, from time to time, as I see the straitened circumstances of its Editor, to whom I feel so much indebted for the teachings of Bible truth, which has been more to me than gold, even any sum that might be named. "The earth is the Lord's and the fulness thereof; the cattle upon a thousand hills are His also." We are prone to say, "this is mine," or, "I own so much," etc., while we are only stewards, and using what does not belong to us. How much is spent in extravagance and folly of all sorts. The rightful owner will soon come, to whom we must render a strict and impartial account of our stewardship: Then shall all be judged according to the deeds done in the body, whether they be good or evil.

St. Paul, Minn., Aug., 1874.

English Correspondence.

57 Bradford St., Birmingham, England, }
August 8, 1874. }

BRO. STORRS: It appears to me that we have all to determine for ourselves, with God's help, the solution of the following problems:

1. How can I be saved? (Personal salvation.)
2. How can my country be saved? (National salvation.)
3. How can all men be saved? (Human salvation.)

All alike through the Lord Jesus Christ. But, varying in manner, degree and object, but not in kind.

The knowledge of these various degrees makes the difference between the babe in Christ and the aged in Christ, and the necessity follows of speaking wisdom among those that are perfect. Though we may not see eye to eye in every particular, yet, in the main points, we may agree. Knowing only in part, we wait for that which is perfect to come, so that we may know even as we are known.

The power of our fellowship at this present time depends upon the power with which we are working out our salvation in Christ, first. So far only as this power in us is vital and exists indeed and in truth, so far only shall we be able to enter into the question of the salvation of others.

Our union with each other depends on our living union with Christ. Not a union written on stones or paper, but in the table of the heart, and such union alone will stand the test of time and eternity. All other questions will find their place in the heart and mind by degrees and proper order of development, according to the gifts which God gives us through His Son.

Brethren, wherever you may be, bear and forbear, give aid and forgive, for the sake of our Lord Jesus Christ. Yours, faithfully,

HENRY BRITAIN.

"The Study of the Bible."

The matter of the entire volume of HENRY DUNN on the above subject is now transferred to this volume of the EXAMINER, with the exception of items of poetry at the commencement of some chapters and short prayers at the close of them. His volume is sold at $1.50. You have it here, with a vast amount of other important matter, for a trifle more, if bound; and the whole for a less sum if you take the volume unbound, i. e., in numbers. A few in numbers, of Vol. xviii., may be had for $1.35: bound, $3.25. In both cases sent free of postage. Please send your orders immediately, if wanted. BRO. STORRS.
