know the realities of the second death. Again we were taught to believe that the peaceful and happy kingdom of God was far away, 'beyond the bounds of time and space;' but breaking from traditions's chain, we find what and where the kingdom is—we find a promise made to the 'fathers,' (and they were the 'early fathers' too, Abraham, Isaac and Jacob) that they should inherit the land forever. They died not having received the promise, but they were persuaded of and embraced them, and made their confession, as I hope all of our brethren are willing to do, that they were strangers and pilgrims on the earth. The promise is yet sure to them and to those who are Christ's, for they are Abraham's seed and heirs according to the promise. The meek shall inherit the earth—when the wicked are cut off thou shalt see it—and the kingdom, and dominion, and the greatness of the kingdom under the whole heaven, shall be given to the people of the saints of the Most High, whose kingdom is an everlasting kingdom, and all dominions shall serve and obey him. The glorious light of revelation, presents to the Christian a happier clime, a paradise more to be desired than the vain philosophy of a traditionated mind can possibly describe—and I feel to praise our God to-day that the light has shone and reflected its rays upon our once darkened paths, and that before it Tradition has quailed beneath our feet; and on God's truths we now stand, and it is as immutable as His throne. Then fear not, little flock, for soon we shall take the kingdom.

Other points might be noticed to show the contrast between tradition and the word of God, but I forbear, except the one which has called forth the above remarks. The prayer of thousands is, SAVE me from the DEATH that never dies! with equal propriety we might pray, Give us the LIFE that never lives!! Life is LIFE and death is DEATH, and all the comments of Christendom will not change the meaning of the two words, and they will ever convey an opposite meaning one from the other. God says, 'The soul that sinneth it shall die'—tradition says, it shall live forever in misery. God says all the proud and they that do wickedly shall be stubble, and the day cometh that shall burn them up, and leave them neither root nor branch—tradition says that not only root and branch will be left, but the whole 'tree.' God says the Image of gold, silver, brass, iron, and clay, shall be broken to pieces, and become like the chaff of the summer threshing-floors, and no place be found for them—and I believe it with all my heart.

To my mind all is plain; but some of our good brethren dissent from this view of things, and think it all together absurd. Such we should treat with the utmost forbearance and long-suffering, and by kindness and love or charity, which thinketh no evil, and sound argument based upon the word of God, use our endeavors to enlighten their understanding, that they may know and rejoice in the truth.

Truth makes us free; by it we are sanctified, and upon it we shall stand unmoved amid the conflagration of the last great day. Soon the descending judge will settle the question, who are right and who are wrong. Then we no longer shall see through a glass darkly, but see as we are seen and know as we are known; that which is now rendered obscure through the infirmities of poor, fallen human nature, will soon in the sunshine of an eternal day, be unfolded to our mental vision never to be forgotten.

Then in view of this blessed truth, let us bear and forbear with each other—love as brethren—keep the unity of the spirit in the bond of peace—possess that charity which suffereth long and is kind, that envieth not, vaunteth not itself and is not puffed up, doth not behave itself unseemly, seeketh not her own, is not easily provoked, thinketh no evil, rejoiceth not in iniquity, but rejoiceth in the truth, beareth all things, believeth all things, hopeth all things, endureth all things, and that never faileth! And beside this, giving all diligence—add to your faith virtue, and to virtue knowledge, and to knowledge temperance, and to temperance patience, and to patience godliness, and to godliness brotherly-kindness, and to brotherly-kindness charity. For if these things be in you and abound, they make you, that ye shall neither be barren nor unfruitful in the knowledge of our Lord Jesus Christ, keeping ourselves unspotted from the world and in the love of God, that when the Chief Shepherd shall appear, we may also appear with him in glory.

Thy brother in tribulation, and expecting redemption this present year of our Lord, 1847.—Amen, even so, come Lord Jesus, and come quickly.

LETTER FROM BRO. W. PRATT.

Bro. Marsh:—The good Lord is at work among his people—he is bringing them up to that platform where they may be found by the Lord when he comes, without spot or wrinkle or any such thing. Although we have been disappointed in not going into the kingdom the last fall, yet our blessed Lord has not disappointed us of his presence or power. I think, notwithstanding it is a time of peril, that it is the best time to live we ever lived. Many think it strange we are not ashamed, when our time, as they say, has passed by again. Well, they have yet to learn, if they have not already, that we have a perfect deed to an inheritance, that is glorious and unfading—and the time recorded in our deed will surely bring us into the promised land. If we have not as yet ascertained the exact time there given, shall we say we have not a perfect deed? No. Shall we be ashamed? Not as long as we have a kingdom just before us, that swells our hearts with a hope big with immortality. Shall we stop looking and drop our heads? Not as long as the God of heaven says 'look up.' Well, you must admit you know nothing about when the Lord will come? says the objector. We cannot, as long as our Lord says, 'ye shall know he is nigh even at the door.'

Yours waiting a speedy redemption,

W. PRATT.

Sturbridge, Mass., Dec. 23d, 1846.

Bro. D. Davis, Spring Mills, N. Y., Dec. 21st, writes:—

The interest in the cause has been increasing up to the present since our recent meeting. There is much searching of the Bible and prayer—and there appears to be a rational, consistent state of mind among those who profess to have found the Savior precious to them. The brethren hold from two to three prayer meetings in each week, which are well attended by many believers and unbelievers. There appears to be much inquiry—'are these things so?' also much settled and determined opposition. My heart is pained, not because men differ from me in respect to these things, but because they appear to have no desire to know the truth. Brethren be faithful, be vigilant; for your adversary, the devil, is going about like a roaring lion, seeking whom he may devour. Let all your labors be mixed with love. O how much we need the spirit of Christ at the present. Brethren, is not the time short, and shall we not persevere until the end?

Bro. J. T. Morley, West Almond, N. Y., Dec. 22d, writes:—

My heart, my mind, my calm judgment is with the advent cause as much as ever. I have thought these things all over and over again, in calm retirement: my mind is settled. I have much yet to learn, but what I have learned I think correct in the main. I have a strong hope of meeting my Savior in peace—of meeting the children of God in the new earth. This hope cheers me in life's toils and trials—it is my meditation, my comfort. There are but few who wish to talk about the Scriptures, and much fewer who will talk with reason and candor. The world does not charm me—my heart is not on it; my treasure is in heaven. The time seems long: when will our Savior come? We have waited; been disappointed; our hearts are sad. God grant that we may wait like the husbandman, with long patience. The great meeting of all the good and holy who have ever lived, is a glorious theme! It fills my soul—it melts my heart. I feel anxious—I feel a longing for the time to come; but God has said be patient. He knows best. May we all be quiet, be meek, be humble, be holy, and in the great day stand without shame before our Savior.

Bro. N. C. Gates, Ellington, Jan. 27th, writes:—The Voice of Truth is of great importance to me—1st. Because it imparts meat in due season, which refreshes my drooping spirits; 2d. Because through its assistance I have been enabled to convince a brother of mine, who is a preacher in the Christian connection, now living in the State of Ohio, that the day of the Lord is at hand. I received a letter from him but a few days since. He states that since he was at my house this fall, he had pretty much given up preaching on the account of not knowing what to preach. He states that his mind had become so agitated on the immediate coming of our Lord, he had been at a loss what to do; but he has finally ventured to give one discourse on that subject, and he had a good time, and left an appointment for another on the same subject.

Bro. J. Salisbury, Troy, Pa., Dec. 26th, writes:—I have been a member of the Baptist church for 26 years, but have now withdrawn from them because they have rejected one of the greatest truths that ever shone from the pages of inspiration: the second, personal coming of Jesus Christ being at the door. They say it may be a thousand and perhaps a million of years yet, before Jesus will come again. I have handed to the leading ones of the church some numbers of the Voice—have talked with them by the fire-side upon the subject many times, but to no purpose. The Lord seemingly has withdrawn himself from them, and I fear they have become what the Scriptures of truth term 'fallen Babylon!' Awful thought! Brethren and sisters whom I loved; but I must forsake all if I would be a disciple of Jesus, and share the bliss at his right hand.

Exeter, N. H. Dec. 22, '46

BRO. MARSH:—Your remarks on the Church at the First and Second Advents, I like very much. The truth is what we want. It is true that the great mass of professors are awfully corrupt and wicked. It is also true, I believe, that God's people are called out from among them. They have forsaken the right way. They are altogether conformed to the world; and unless they repent, I fear their damnation is certain!

Yours, &c.,

WESLEY BURNHAM.

Bro. H. Orr, Darlington, C. W., Dec. 26th, writes:—

'If any man love the world, the love of the Father is not in him.' There is a great deal meant in this expression, viz: 'the things that are in the world.' Dear brother, when I see men and women who profess to be looking for the coming kingdom at hand, and yet hold fast the maxims and fashions of the proud opposing sects, my soul is pained. May God by his power cut me and them more loose from the world—for all that are not free from the spirit and practices of the world at that day, will be shut out of the kingdom.

The brethren at Darlington generally are steadfast in the faith. Peter Hough labors with us to good acceptance. We made some arrangements here to commune once in four weeks, but some of the brethren think, according to the Scriptures that the time of the passover is the only time it should be used. I wish you to examine the subject, and through your paper give us something on it.

We can only say a word now in answer to Bro. Orr's inquiry. At another time we may say more. The Savior says, 'as oft as ye do this'—clearly implying that he did not mean to limit the supper to merely once in the year. The disciples met on the 'first day of the week' to eat bread, but we are nowhere told that they met for this purpose on the anniversary of the passover. History tells us that the early Christians eat the supper every first day of the week. Let there be no strife on this matter. But as oft as duty will admit, we would recommend that all Christians show forth the Lord's death by eating the supper.—EDITOR.

Bro. L. Dudley, Perry's Mills, N. Y., Dec. 19th, writes:

Within a few weeks past, there have been a number of sound conversions on Caldwell's Manor and in Stanbridge, C. E. On the 10th of Dec. twelve followed the Lamb of God down into the water and were buried with him in baptism. Such a time I never witnessed before on such occasion. The Lord has some faithful laborers in this part of his vineyard, both male and female. He has set our beloved brother, D. T. Taylor on the walls, to give the last solemn message to the world, to prepare for the judgment. His labors are blessed of God.

I am still doing what little I can to prepare a bride for my Master, and to be also ready myself to go into the marriage of the Lamb.

Bro. D. Carlton, York, O., Dec. 21st, writes:—There is nothing of peculiar interest occurring here at present, except the brethren in this region are generally steadfast, looking for the Lord. Bro. George Needham and family stayed with us over the Sabbath a short time ago. They have shared largely in the general sickness that has visited this country the summer past, and not possessing much of this world they have drank deep of the cup of affliction and trial. Bro. Needham was still very feeble and unable to preach. He was trying to go to his friends in the State of New York. I hope the friends of Jesus will remember him for Jesus' sake.

Bro. W. Barlow, Hadley Falls, Mass., Dec. 26th, writes:

Dear Bro. Marsh:—There is a great mourning among the churches because the spirit of the Lord seems to be withdrawn; and I am reminded almost daily of the scene of the prophets of Baal, in the days of good old Elijah. Little did they think when they closed their door against the coming of Christ that they were shutting out the Holy Spirit from their midst, and thereby more blinding themselves that that day might overtake them as a thief!

Bro. W. Goldsmith, South Creek, Pa., Dec. 5th, writes:

I am alone, and am deprived of meeting with those of like precious faith. Will Bro. Marsh prevail on some good brother to come and preach in this place? I verily believe much good may be done in northern Pennsylvania.

Scenes of the Final Judgment.

The tremendous scenes of the final judgment await every human being, and yet how small an influence do these scenes exert on the living multitudes who are hastening to meet them in eternity. Jeremy Taylor in dwelling on this most solemn subject, says :

When the first day of judgment happened, that, I mean, of the universal deluge of waters upon the old world, the calamity swelled like the flood, and every man saw his friend perish, and the neighbors of his dwelling, and the relatives of his house, and the sharers of his joys, and yesterday's bride, and the new-born heir, the priest of the family, and the honor of the kindred, all dying or dead, drenched in water and the divine vengeance; and then they had no place to flee unto; no man cared for their souls; they had none to go to for counsel, no sanctuary high enough to keep them from the vengeance that rained down from heaven; and so it shall be at the day of judgment, when that world and this, and all that shall be born hereafter, shall pass through that same Red Sea, and be all baptized with the same fire, and be involved in the same cloud, in which shall be thunderings and terrors infinite. Every man's fear shall be increased by his neighbors shrieks, and the amazement that all the world shall be in, shall unite as the sparks of a raging furnace into a globe of fire, and roll upon its own principle, and increase by direct appearances and intolerable reflections. He that stands in a church-yard in the time of a great plague, and hears the passing bell perpetually telling the sad stories of death, and sees crowds of infected bodies pressing to their graves, and others sick and tremulous, and death dressed up in all the images of sorrow round about him, is not supported in his spirit by the variety of his sorrow; and at doomsday, when the terrors are universal, besides that it is in itself so much greater, because it can affright the whole world, it is also made greater by communication and a sorrowing influence; grief then strongly infectious, when there is no variety of state, but an entire kingdom of fear; and amazement is the king of all our passions, all the world its subjects. And that shriek must needs be terrible, when millions of men and women, at the same instant, shall fearfully cry out, and the noise shall mingle with the trump of the archangel, with the thunders of the dying and groaning heavens, and the crack of the dissolving world, when the whole fabric of nature shall shake into dissolution.

The Rich should be Liberal.

REASONS WHY.

1. Riches are the gift of God; they should be used, therefore, according to his will. 'Freely ye have received; freely give.'
2. Prosperity is very dangerous. Hence the caution addressed to Israel, 'Lest when thou hast eaten, and art full, and hast built goodly houses, and dwelt therein; and when thy herds and thy flocks multiply, and thy silver and thy gold is multiplied, and all that thou hast is multiplied; then thy heart be lifted up, and thou forget the Lord thy God.'
3. Judicious liberality is invaluable as a means of grace. 'The liberal soul shall be made fat; and he that watereth, shall be watered also himself.'
4. Many have fallen into great spiritual darkness in consequence of forgetting the declaration of Christ, 'It is more blessed to give than to receive.'
5. Few men of wealth are called to be heirs of eternal life; 'for a rich man shall hardly enter the kingdom of heaven.' It becomes those few, therefore, to acknowledge God's distinguishing grace in a peculiar manner.
6. The possession of riches is very dangerous to children. This is proved by our daily observation. In this way God is constantly showing that money is to be judiciously expended, not hoarded up.

7. The example of Christian liberality is very salutary. Those who see a man of wealth crucifying that 'love of money which is the root of all evil,' acknowledge the power of the gospel over his heart and life.

8. In the case of many rich men, their property is their principal talent. If this, therefore, is 'kept in a napkin,' wherein do they honor God?

9. Rich men, as they approach a dying hour, often regret having given so little. For one who is soon to appear in the eternal world, it is a sad reflection, 'how few will have been saved by my liberality!'

Caution to Ministers.

Do not forget that it is possible that you should lead others to a rest, into which you might fail to enter; that you should point others to a salvation, which you had only partially secured yourselves; that you should be diligent in cultivating others' vineyards, and yet mournfully neglect the proper culture of your own. The text plainly reminds us that there may be too much 'coming and going,' even in doing good. The soul must have its hours of privacy, or the lamp of our spiritual life will soon have wasted away, and leave us to go to those whose spirituality we had helped to kindle, saying, 'Give us of your oil, for our lamps are gone out.' No mistake can be more dangerous than that of supposing that spiritual employments will necessarily make spiritual minds; that because our occupations make us much conversant with eternal and invisible realities, the soul will have little to dread from worldly influences. The very opposite is experienced and bewailed by every faithful minister of the gospel. He knows, and it is his cross, and danger, and humiliation, while he knows it, how easy it is to slide into a mere professional piety; how great is his danger of falling into a fictitious devoutness and warmth—no more than the faded fire, it may be, of happier and more spiritual days.

Transcendentalism.

There is more pure reason in the following description of Transcendentalism, than in any we remember to have seen. The question, 'What is Transcendentalism,' has met so many humorous and absurd answers, that people generally have no correct idea of this system of philosophy. Mrs. Child says :

If you wish to know the origin of the word 'Transcendentalism,' I will explain it briefly and simply as I understand it.

All who know any thing of the different schools of metaphysics, are aware that the philosophy of John Locke was based on the proposition that all knowledge is received into the soul through the medium of the senses; and thence passes to be judged of and analyzed by the understanding.

The German school of metaphysics, with the celebrated Kant at its head, rejects this proposition as false; it denies that all knowledge is received through the senses, and maintains that the highest, and therefore most universal truths, are revealed within the soul, to a faculty transcending the understanding. This faculty they call pure reason: it being peculiar to them to use that word in contradistinction to the understanding.—To this pure reason which some of their writers call 'the God within,' they believe that all perceptions of the good, the true, and the beautiful, are revealed in its unconscious quietude; and that the province of the understanding, with its five handmaids, the senses, is confined merely to external things, such as facts, scientific laws, &c.

EMOTION AND FAITH.—There are two classes of Christians—those who live chiefly by emotion, and those who live chiefly by faith. The first class, those who live chiefly by emotion, remind one of ships that move by the outward impulses of wind operating upon sails. They are often at a dead calm, often out of their course, and sometimes driven back. And it is only when the winds are fair and powerful that they move onward with rapidity. The other class, those who live chiefly by faith, remind one of the magnificent steamers which cross the Atlantic, which are moved by an interior and permanent principle, and which, setting at defiance all obstacles, advance steadily and swiftly to their destination, through calm and storm, through cold and sunshine.—Upham.

AN EXAMPLE.—Cyrus had taken the wife of Tigranes, and asked him what he would give to save her from servitude? He replied, all that he had in the world, and his own life into the bargain. Cyrus, upon this, very generously restored her, and pardoned what had passed. All were full of his praises upon this occasion, some commending the accomplishments of his mind, others those of his person. Tigranes asked his wife whether she did not greatly admire him? 'I never looked at him,' said she. 'Not look at him!' returned he. 'Upon whom, then, did you look?' 'Upon him,' replied she, 'who offered his own life to redeem me from slavery.' This charming example should be copied into our behavior in the house of God, where we should behold and contemplate the beauties and perfections of that blessed person alone, who actually did give his life a ransom for all.—See Xenoph. Cyroped. iii. 147.—Bishop Horne.

MEETINGS IN ROCHESTER.

Our meetings in this city, are held three times on the Sabbath, all on Tuesday and Friday evenings, in Shaw's New Brick Block, east side of the River, corner of Main and Stone streets; entrance from Stone street. The Lord's Supper will be administered in the afternoon of the first Sabbath of every month.

BUSINESS NOTES.

- West India Mission—By a friend $10, which is sent to Bro. Wm. Ide, N. Y.
- T. F. Pomeroy—We have no recollection of receiving the article.
- A. Balcovek—Testaments we cannot send by mail. You are credited on paper to vol. xiii no. 13.
- Wm. Clark—J. Shepherd's debt is as stated in the bill; but as it was our mistake in not discontinuing when ordered, we now credit him in full, and discontinue his paper.
- J. E. Hazen—The Post Office department is in the fault; we send your paper regular.
- S. I. Roney—The bill to L. Haskall was a mistake. He is now paid to vol. xiv no. 2.
- J. Thorp—We think only $1 was received from Bro. Worden. According to our books your debt to close of vol. xiii will be $2.75, and Bro. J. Ganyard's debt at the same time will be $2. Is this as you understand it?
- G. W. Brown—The credit is right on our book.
- J. D. Johnson—Through your or our mistake his paper has been sent to Worcester, Mass. It is now entered for Manlius, N. Y.
- J. Weston—Thank you. Still your fears are groundless, as our articles on time, if permitted to close them will show.
- W. Harris—Your letter says $2, but there was but $1.
- H. Mudgett—His paper we find has been sent to Meredith, Upper Village; we have now entered it for Meredith village.
- L. P. Judson—We will remember your request; yet we think they will not visit Jamaica.
- Post Master at Richmond Corners, Me.—The dollar was received, and pays for his (R. Bates) paper to vol. 12 no. 10.

The Bible.

BY MRS. A. C. JUDSON.

'Tis a ray of purest light,
Beaming through the depths of night,
Brighter than ten thousand gems
In the costliest diadems.

'Tis an orb! more radiant far
Than the fairest evening star;
Yea, the sun outshining, even,
When it rides midway in heaven.

'Tis a fountain, pouring forth
Streams of life, to gladden earth;
Whence eternal blessings flow,
Antidote for human woe.

'Tis an ocean! vast and clear,
In which rays divine appear;
Bearing freight, the choicest store,
Ever borne this wide earth o'er.

'Tis a mine—ay, deeper, too,
Than can mortal ever go;
Search we may for many years,
Still some new, rich gem appears.

Blessed Bible! Precious word!
None most sacred from the Lord;
Glory to his name be given
For this antepast of Heaven.

Concluding Reflections on the Visions of Daniel.

BY T. R. BIRCH, M. A.

FELLOW OF TRINITY COLLEGE, CAMBRIDGE, ENGLAND.

DAN. II. 37.—"The king answered unto Daniel and said, Of a truth it is that your God is a God of gods, and a Lord of kings, and a revealer of secrets, seeing thou couldst reveal this secret."
VIII. 22.—"Hitherto is the end of the matter. As for me, Daniel, my cogitations much troubled me, and my countenance changed in me; but I kept the matter in my heart."

The course of these sacred visions has now been unfolded, from its beginning to its close. The general outline of their application has first of all been defined by clear and simple proofs, confirmed by the general assent of every age of the church. The history of the three first empires, and of the fourth in its earliest stage, has been briefly described, and found to be in full agreement with the prophetic symbols. The meaning of the ten kings and of the little horn has next been submitted to a close and full examination. The application of these to the kingdoms of Western Europe, and the papacy of Rome, has been established by various proofs,—the order of the prophecy, the strict meaning of the terms, and the clear fulfillment of each separate element of the prediction. The moral difficulties supposed to lie against this exposition have also been examined, and found to supply a farther argument in its favor, while some lessons of deep interest to a spiritual mind have been derived from a review of the whole history.

The vision has next conducted our thoughts from the past events of Providence to the future kingdom of God. The nature of this kingdom has been examined. Three main principles have been confirmed by a copious induction of Scripture evidence; that the millennium is still future; that it will be followed by a renewal of the earth, still peopled by righteous generations; and that the Second Advent will precede this restitution of all things, and the whole age of promised blessedness. By the light of these main principles the remainder of the visions has now been explained, both in the dissolution of the Great Image, and the features of that kingdom of the mountain which is then to ensue.

Before, however, we part from a subject so magnificent and boundless, it seems desirable, from a review of the whole, to derive some great spiritual lessons, and thus to leaven our souls more deeply with the influence of these holy truths. And here the visions themselves will supply us with examples, and teach us the spirit in which we ought to close our historical survey. When the king of Babylon had these truths revealed to him, they produced on his mind an impression of deep reverence towards the God of heaven. 'Of a truth it is, that your God is a God of gods, and a Lord of kings, and a revealer of secrets.' The power and the wisdom of the Most High were equally conspicuous in the revelation; His power, in controlling these mighty empires through their whole course for ages, and establishing his own kingdom on their ruins; and His wisdom, in revealing to his prophet, so long before, the outlines of all history for thousands of years. The effect upon Daniel himself, in the second vision, was not less deep and impressive. 'He kept the matter in his heart.' Deeply and earnestly did he ponder, from time to time, the truths which had been set before him, that he might enter more fully into their design, and learn the mysterious grandeur of God's eternal kingdom. Such ought to be the effect on ourselves also in the present day. The prophecy will have failed to accomplish in us its designed purpose, unless it shall lead to a deeper and humbler adoration of the Divine wisdom, and prayerful meditation on all the ways of His providence here below.

The truths which open before us, on a review of the whole prophecy, are indeed many and various. There are four which may be singled out as among the most conspicuous, and which will form, therefore, a fit and natural close to this whole inquiry. These are—the right and Christian use of all past history, the Protestant character of the true Church, the duty of a national allegiance and subjection to Christ, as the Supreme King, and the unspeakable joy and blessedness of the world to come.

I. These visions then, of Daniel, instruct us, in first place, what is THE RIGHT AND CHRISTIAN USE OF ALL HISTORY. This is a great lesson which Christians in general have been slow to learn, and which, could we learn it thoroughly, would prove to be rich with the highest blessings to our souls.

It is true that in the present day historical studies have been revived, and are pursued by thousands with unusual ardor and zeal. A higher standard has been proposed. Writers, as well as their readers, no longer content themselves with the meagre annals which were usual in former days. They seek, with laborious diligence, to enter deeply into the spirit of past ages. Not only the memory, but the imagination and the reason are now called into lively exercise; and all the efforts of learning are lavished in the effort to revive the forgotten and neglected scenes of earlier days. The romance of history, and its philosophy, go hand in hand. One school of historians has arisen, whose a s to clothe all the records of the past with the freshness of a poetical fancy; and another which seeks to analyze them with the research of a profound philosophy. Never were such ample materials provided, or the memorials of the past exhibited to view, insphered in such a brilliant light of genius and learning.

But, amidst this profusion of mental power, how small is the spiritual profit which has hitherto accrued to the church of God! The course of the world has appeared generally, even to pious Christians, a bewildering maze; where no purpose or plan can be traced, and where the hand of God is but dimly visible, in the shifting variety of perpetual changes. Hence they have scarcely thought of looking here for any large supply of spiritual instruction. A confusion like that of the great deep, when first the Spirit of God began to move on the waters, has seemed in their eyes to rest upon the whole. Hence the study has remained, for the most part, with writers of a more worldly school of thought. These have had objects of a different kind. They have sought to realize the living scene which occupied the busy thoughts of former generations. They have viewed the study as that of an interesting play; only more deep in its interest, because of its historical reality. They have traced the passions of the various actors, and all the shifting scenery of this wonderful drama. And thus, to their eyes, history has been clothed with all the beautiful colors of romance; and turned into a storehouse of inexhaustible treasures, to exercise and delight an active and refined imagination. A few there are who have had a still higher aim; who have sought to unfold the secret springs of action, and so to derive political wisdom from the perplexing chaos of historical change. They have traced the growth of liberty, and the various phases of civilization. They have watched the dawning of science through the clouds of superstition; and the deep fermentation of intellectual life, which, out of feudal barbarism, has evolved the triumphs of modern art, of laws, and of freedom. They have sought, from this review, to derive both instructions of wisdom and lessons of hope, with an assurance of the world's continual progress to a higher perfection.

But how poor and empty, after all, are the results which philosophy has ever attained, in its efforts to solve this strange enigma of Divine Providence! The school of Romance has quickened, indeed, and cultivated the fancy; it has procured fresh amusement for triflers, and has enlarged, for sensitive minds, the sphere of their sensibility; but it has done little or nothing to enrich the understanding, or to renew the heart. Often, it may be feared, there has been an opposite influence. A diseased and unnatural taste has been formed; which delights in ages of superstition, and loves to fling the colors of awe and mystery over the darkness of spiritual ignorance and delusion, or the foulest deeds of violence and blood.

And if now from poet-historians we turn to the philosophers, our disappointment will be the same. Few of them are sufficiently versed in Christian truth to understand even the first principles, which guide and control the course of Divine Providence. For the most part they are ignorant of the Fall, that master-key to the records of human life. They are ignorant of redemption, in the deep mystery of the Savior's love and of man's perverseness which it reveals. They are ignorant of the order and mutual connection of God's past dispensations. And further—a still more fatal defect—they have no clear discernment of that glorious kingdom of Messiah upon earth, its times, its continuance, its holiness, and its glory, which is the final issue of all the changes they are seeking to explore. Hence, with few exceptions, their philosophy is sordid, their first principles false and groundless, and their inferences are merely fuel to increase the flame of popular delusion; to strengthen the bands of superstitious tyranny, or embolden infidelity to a fresh and more vigorous attempt to establish its own triumph on the ruins of thrones and altars, and even of the supremacy of God himself. And hence almost the sole lesson which the philosophic historians of the continent profess to derive from their researches, is the sure triumph of democracy in every land; and the gradual progress of the world towards perfection, by the strength of the human will, not by the victorious triumph of supernatural grace.

Now, in contrast to all these abortive efforts, the present visions afford us a Divine key to unlock those secrets of Divine Providence which are impenetrable to all the attempts of mere human science. The great outlines, not only of the past, but of the future also, are here portrayed. Every event of time is thus turned into a sacramental pledge of God's presence, and of the ceaseless oversight which He exercises over all human affairs. Beside the general outline, the moral features of each successive empire are also revealed. By a few vivid strokes, the Divine Spirit sets before us those great truths, which philosophy, immersed in the mists of worldliness, can never attain. He reveals to us moral deformity, where a worldly eye sees only dazzling splendor; and where the superstitious behold a beautiful ceremonial, with all sweet sounds of music, and all the graces of art, adoring a religion of royal state and mystery. He discloses to us a hateful idolatry, offensive to God, and ruinous to the souls of men. But this humbling view of the past is not given to create a gloomy and hopeless despondency. It is revealed to us that it may illustrate, by a brighter contrast, the blessings which are in store for our fallen world. A mightier power, and a deeper wisdom, than that of human philosophy, are at work for its redemption. The Son of God, who, as the mystic stone, was supernaturally incarnate of the Virgin, will also, by a supernatural work of Divine power, complete His great purpose of love, and restore our lost planet to the family of heaven.

The King.—Dan. xi. 36—45.

I am not willing to differ from my brethren in opinion merely for the sake of argument—nor am I willing to subscribe the sentiment that any one of them has, as yet, obtained all the truth, and therefore we can learn nothing more. Hence, although I have from the first conscientiously believed with those brethren who have applied Dan. xi. 36—45 to Papacy and the French government, and the closing particularly to Napoleon Bonaparte—I now think this a mistaken application, and will give my reasons for so thinking as briefly as possible. There have always been some serious difficulties in my own mind in the above application, but the main application seemed so plausible, and as I had never seen so perfect application to this Scripture to any other events, I have all the while contended for it until within a little more than one year, during which time I think I have discovered a better application, more rational, tangible, literal, and hence much more glorious.

I believe, (as says Dr. A. Clark) that the book of Daniel is badly compiled, and that by consequence the 12th chapter is separated from its true connection, leaving the reader to suppose that the instructions of the 10th and 11th chapters were given to Daniel between the 9th and 12th; but this cannot be correct as all will discover, so soon as they critically read these chapters with this remark in the mind: hence, I will not stop here to argue this point. If we therefore, in the study of this prophecy, observe the following arrangement of the chapters: 2d, 7th, 8th, 9th, 12, 10th, 11th, I think we shall obtain a clearer harmony of the instructions given on time, and also learn the very important fact that the 11th chapter, like the measures, reveals to the end itself, even the coming of Christ and resurrection of the dead, instead of stopping with the commencement of the time of the end, as we have supposed.

I am satisfied in the main with the disposition which has been made of the foregoing portions of this prophecy, hence, I will come as directly as possible to a consideration of the verses in question, just remarking that the 35th verse evidently closes the prophetic picture of the days of Papacy, having brought us down to the point where Papal dominion shall cease and the time of the end begin. We are shown that the beast does not expire at this point, for, notwithstanding the faggot fires are utterly extinguished, it (the government, and not the dominion over the saints,) is yet for an appointed time, it shall continue all the time of the end, yea, to the coming of Christ, and the resurrection—see 2 Thes. ii. 3—8: Dan. vii. 26, 27 and xii. 13. The appointed time for Popery after her dominion is taken away is the excess of days (years) contained in 1335 over 1290 being 45 years, which appointed time is itself clearly the time of the end. Now, having followed Popery from her beginning quite down to the resurrection, and consequently to the coming kingdom, by introducing her existence during the time of the end, some other power must be presented in verse 36, and it is one that figures quite largely before the time of the end commences, and actually continues until the indignation is accomplished. The indignation here spoken of, I take to be the same brought to view in chapter viii. 19, which all adventists understand, refers to the last hours of this world—the time of trouble, chapter xii. 1, out of which or at which time the saints shall be delivered, every one who shall be found written in the book. This cannot be the old French government, nor yet Napoleon, the servant of that government, for they are both gone and the indignation is not yet accomplished. To me it seems solemnly important that we fix our eye upon the right government in the fulfillment of this prophecy, and I therefore hope the subject will be heartily reviewed by every lover of truth.

I understand, that in verses 36—39 inclusive, we are presented with Mahomedanism, from its rise until it becomes the terrible Ottoman Empire; and if I am incorrect, that monster of iniquity has entirely escaped the angel's notice—while other governments of much less importance it is allowed are presented, a supposition that I cannot for a moment admit. I judge that the angel directs attention to the Ottoman power in its full history, commencing at the same point in the history of that power, introduced by John the Revelator, after the sounding of the fifth angel, chap. ix. 11—'And they had a King over them, which is the angel of the bottomless pit, whose name in the Hebrew tongue is Abaddon, but in the Greek tongue hath his name Apollyon.' Here the Revelator more than intimates that this king is somewhere the subject of Hebrew prophecy, and if that notice is not in the verses under consideration, I know not where to look for it. All agree that the Revelator in this Scripture has his eye upon Mahomedanism, and that point too, where 'they had a King over them.' The angel said to Daniel, 'And the King shall do according to his will,' &c.; John says, 'They had a King over them.' If these are not parallel Scriptures, then I am seriously mistaken, for I cannot see how we can avoid the conclusion that the eye of Daniel and John are on the same government, and that here are the parallel lines of divine truth.

The characteristics ascribed to this king have been with an ill grace ascribed to the French government, but if we look for them in Mahomedanism we find every feature perfect. Is it said that he shall exalt himself above every god? read the Koran. The founder of Islamism claimed to stand next to the great Jehovah, having authority to repeal nearly the whole of the Bible. Did he speak marvelous things against the God of gods? The whole Koran is but little better than blasphemy and much of it blasphemy high handed. Mahomed did not worship the God of his fathers, for they were Christians; but he worshiped an imaginary god, and fought for an imaginary heaven. He did not regard the desire of women, for God has said that her desire shall be to her husband; and the Koran taught that a man might have four wives, and as many concubines as he could support. He, in his estate, or the people raised up by him, worshiped or honored the god of forces, for force was the religion of the Koran—that people have sacrificed to their arms. The Koran guarantees to all who die in defending its precepts, or in spreading them, an abundant entrance into a paradise of sensual indulgence,—and I say again, in the history of Mahomedanism, nothing is wanting to fill the picture of the prophet to perfection, and I judge that a very little research will satisfy any one that the Ottoman empire is the subject of this prophecy thus far.

In verse 40 Daniel is informed that at the time of the end (he does not say when the time of the end begins, but at, which must mean in this connection of words, during the time of the end) shall the king of the South push at him, (at the Ottoman power) and the king of the north shall come up against him like a whirlwind, with chariots and with horsemen and with many ships, and shall overflow and pass over. The king of the south here introduced can be no other than Egypt—and Egypt has been pushing at the Ottoman power, and that during the time of the end, and would in all probability have conquered the Turks but for the interference of the allied powers of Europe. This effort of Egypt ended in 1840, and now the same power is meeting the deluge promised in this verse, from the king of the north. I think this king of the north is the Russian monarchy, with Nicholas at the head, and is the government which will accomplish what remains of this prophecy. He it is that shall overflow and pass over, and he is all ready to do so. He is abundantly prepared for the task. His fleet is in perfect order and safely moored, being guarded by new and splendid fortifications, and every preparation that a clear head could devise, has been, and is being made for this grand enterprise. No monarch beside Nicholas at this time, is known to ever indulge the hope of universal conquest; but who can doubt but he has the ambition at least to desire to conquer the world. This desire is written on his every public act, and all that can prevent this issue is the coming of the Lord. Said Napoleon on his death bed, 'Whoever has Constantinople has the world,' and we think the conduct of Nicholas and the nations of Europe and Asia toward the Ottoman empire, evidently show that they are all agreed in this opinion. Nicholas knows that if he can but command the Dardanelles, he can successfully dictate the conditions of peace or war to all the nations of the earth. Let him but conquer Constantinople, and he would at once control the treasures of Egypt, and the Libyans and Ethiopians would be at his steps.

I have said that Nicholas was all ready to do this work, and fulfil this prophecy to the very letter—but if so why does he wait? if indeed he is now waiting. I answer, that the nations whose power he dreads, may become so far embroiled in wars at home as to have no effectual force with which to impede his progress in his great object, which is to take Constantinople. My judgment is, should France and England come into collision, or should either of those governments interfere with the Mexican war, either of which or even both are by no means very improbable, Nicholas would seize the opportunity, conquer Constantinople, overflow and pass over, and then would 'plant the tabernacles of his palace between the seas, in the glorious Holy Mountain,' [in Jerusalem] but he shall come to his end and none shall help him.

Could Nicholas conquer the world, he would establish the fifth universal Monarchy; but this he can never do, for the fifth kingdom is the kingdom of God which is now specially nigh at hand. There can however be no doubt but that the design of Nicholas is, to have universal dominion at some time, and he will begin his effort soon if it is not now begun, and he will prosecute that work just as far as the prophet hath said and no farther—then will he come to his end. 'This work will be a short work, 'he shall come like a whirlwind,' and having reached Constantinople he will only have to command and the crescent must and will be lowered: God hath said he shall pass over—and then as before named, he can command and Egypt must obey. Recent accounts confirm the position I have herein taken, and also show us that the appearances are that Russia will soon conquer and command the Dardanelles, and the effort may be making while I write. How should the Christian watch and keep his garments with peculiar care!

Between this hour and that when the king of the north comes to his end, the saints will be caught away—it may be ere this sheet shall reach the press, at any rate it must be right soon, for I think I see evidence to believe that the conquest of Constantinople by Nicholas is the contents of the sixth vial, and is the drying up of the river Euphrates, 'that the way of the kings of the east may be prepared.' If so, then hear the Lord Jesus—Behold I come as a thief, blessed is he that watcheth and keepeth his garments, lest he walk naked and they see his shame.' Our loins should be girded now and our lights burning, or soon it will be forever too late to obtain eternal life.

J. TURNER.

P. S. I cannot forbear a remark or two relative to the four angels, commanded to hold the four winds of the earth. These have been understood to be the four allied powers of Europe, but my present opinion is that America is one of those angels from the fact that they were seen standing on the four corners of the earth; and also America has done as much to hold the winds as any other nation on the globe. With this view I have been led to watch with special interest the onward course of the Mexican war, believing that one of the angels is letting go his hold. Again, recent movements in Europe of which Bro. Marsh has already apprized his readers, convince me that the preparatory steps are being taken in order that the other powers may have an excuse to let go their hold, and it is evident that the Alliance must soon be sundered. My abiding opinion is that the last angel to let go his hold is Nicholas—and as shown in the foregoing article, he must and will soon do so; then will the sealing time be over and the work and sufferings of the true church will end for ever. Then shall the dead be raised, the living righteous changed and caught away, or gathered to the place 'called in the Hebrew tongue Armageddon,' (the mountain of fruits.) Then shall the faithful be blessed for ever. Amen. The movements of the nations at the present time are peculiarly ominous, and should be watched with deep concern, and if we are seeking for glory, honor and immortality, and if we expect to attain unto it, we should not rest a moment short of perfect purity in heart and life.

Poland, Me., Jan. 16th, 1847.

"What of the Night?"

State of the world at the present moment, viewed in the light of prophecy:—the prospect ahead.

Foreshadowing the coming of Christ, signs, physical, moral, and political, are given by the Savior, apostles, and prophets. Signs in the sun, moon, and stars—on earth, distress of nations, with perplexity—sea and waves roaring—men's hearts failing them, &c. &c. On some of these indications, I purpose to remark:

First—The aspect of nations. For more than thirty years, peace between the nominal Christian nations of the world has been preserved, with comparatively slight interruptions. Instance the difficulty between Belgium (aided by France) with Holland, in 1832, and the rupture between this country and Mexico, the present year. The civil broils in Spain and Portugal, and the Polish insurrection, did not bring any of the existing powers into collision with each other. France and Britain, which had been antagonistic for ages, of late years, to all appearance, have been friendly and courteous, as formerly hostile and offending. But, "behold how great a matter a little fire kindleth!" The marriage of the youngest son of Louis Phillippe with the sister of the queen of Spain, has broken up this cordiality.—The bare probability of undue French influence in the peninsula, has awakened English jealousy, and the leading journals have vented the feelings of the nation on this matter. But, on the very heels of all this, another difficulty springs up.—The small republic of Cracow, the last vestige of Polish nationality, is, to the surprise and indignation of Western Europe, pounced upon by Austria and added to her empire, Russia and Prussia consenting.

This despotic act, or rather, act of a despotic power, is a plain breach of the treaty of Vienna, "which," says the Tribune, "is the basis of the existing general settlement and balance of power in Europe." The French and British governments are understood to have formally and solemnly protested against the deed, which is looked upon as a daring insult to both nations. Since the days of Napoleon, has no such breach of power been exhibited in Europe. Russia, it is tho't, allowed Austria to take the whole of Poland's last remnant, that she might secure her sanction to the further annexation of Turkish territory, than which nothing is more calculated to provoke the ire and jealousy of England. No wonder that sage observers predict a general war as not far in the future. The amicable feeling between the allied powers is gone. France and Britain are on unpleasant terms with each other, and both these powers prefer a charge of breach of contract against Austria, Russia, and Prussia, while the people of the last named country seem wholly displeased at the participation of their government in the deed of spoliation. An intelligent correspondent of the N. Y. Observer writes from Europe, that civil war in Switzerland seems inevitable, unless the great powers interfere. Dr. Baird testifies to the deeply-rooted disaffection in the minds of the German people towards their rulers. Portugal is in actual and general rebellion, and the queen is expected to be compelled to abdicate. The popular measures of the present papal government are effecting a great change in the aspect of European affairs.

Thus, within the space of a few months, we have witnessed the outbreak of war on the American continent—the cessation of intimacy between the courts of London and Paris—the violation of a treaty constituting the basis of amity between all the great powers of the eastern hemisphere—an intolerant and bigoted pontiff, cultivating the friendship and aid of despots, succeeded by the most popular and liberal pope that ever the world saw, carrying out his plans of reform at the risk of offending the most thorough Catholic power in existence—the Protestant and Catholic Swiss cantons arraying themselves in hostility against each other—the deep murmurings of popular discontent beginning to be heard from Germany—rebellion in Portugal—and widespread and general perplexity! So far, the political aspect of the nations of the world.

Secondly—"Upon the earth, distress of nations, with perplexity; the sea and the waves roaring;" is rendered by Campbell, "Upon the earth, the anguish of desponding nations; and roarings in the seas and floods." Famine stalks abroad in some countries—the pestilence sweeps off its thousands elsewhere, and now threatens Europe and America with its desolations. Inundations have spread destruction over one of the fairest districts in France—scores of villages in Egypt, by the same scourge, have been destroyed. But what ever equalled the destruction on the waters since August last? But I view these as only the beginning of troubles which will cause 'men's hearts to fail them for fear,' &c. Campbell renders the portion of scripture here referred to, "Man expiring with the fear and apprehension of those things which are coming upon the world; for the powers of heaven shall be shaken." Then trouble, anguish, and despair, are before the world. But O glory! Lift up your heads, ye children of God—your redemption approaches.

Prepare to stand before the Son of Man, reader. Unless you know the Lord for yourself, you cannot endure the presence of the Judge.—Follow Christ, and you shall not walk in darkness, but have the Light of Life.

Syracuse, N. Y., Dec. 25, 1846.

Impious.

Paragraph from Gov. Edward's proclamation for a Thanksgiving in the State of Missouri.

"And whereas, the abundant fruitfulness of the year—and the protection of the State from invasion, though engaged in waging a rightful war with a foreign power at this time—protection from insurrection, from intestine commotion of all kinds, the protection of our citizens from the dire plagues of pestilence and famine, call for a return of thanks to Him whose will has caused these blessings."

This is looking up into the very face of God to thank Him for his mercies and in the same breath to tell him that the war we are waging against Mexico is all perfectly right! to tell him that He knows we are amply justified for burning and battering down their cities and slaughtering their fathers and sons; their mothers, wives and daughters!

Expanding the sentiment, it would run thus: 'Lord, thou knowest that in the first place we wanted Texas in order to make our slave system really valuable, and to strengthen the slave power in our great and righteous nation; and of course we took it.'

"Then we thought it would be a good idea to call it all Texas up to the Rio Grande, and we marched our army to take possession accordingly. Now, Lord, thou seest that this brought on 'the war with a foreign power'—'a rightful war';—Eternal Justice can make no other decision. Lord, we thank thee that while we are sending pestilence and famine and the sword into the heart of a sister republic, thou art giving us 'protection from these dire plagues.' We praise thy name, that while we are invading others and pouring all the horrors and devastations of war over their fields and villages, yet Thou graciously givest us 'protection from invasion, protection from insurrection, and from intestine commotion of all kinds.' O it is so blessed that we are permitted to fight and distress our neighbors and be so exempt from the evils of war ourselves! Our slaves too have all been kept down, and we have suffered nothing from 'insurrection!'

And this is the chief magistrate of Missouri—giving utterance to a people's gratitude before a holy and just God! If Jehovah were altogether such an one as they—if He were the oppressor's Friend and the sufferer's Foe:—if he were the Patron of slavery and war and selfishness, all this were a reasonable thanksgiving proclamation! As it is, 'we tremble for our country when we remember that God is just!'—Oberlin Evan.

Voice of Truth & Glad Tidings

"The wise shall understand."

ROCHESTER, FEBRUARY 3, 1847.

Delinquents, Look at This.

This is the last number we shall send to quite a number of our subscribers, until we hear from them. Their names have long been our books as paying subscribers, but many have paid nothing, or but a mere trifle. We have repeatedly called upon them to let us hear from them, either in the way of payment, or an acknowledgment that they are unable to pay. As they treat our calls with neglect, we conclude they care but little about the paper: we therefore shall no longer send it to them, until they order it again, with an explanation of their past course in this case.

We wish it distinctly understood, that these remarks have nothing to do with the case of the worthy poor on our list, but they relate to those who have long been on our books as paying subscribers, but have paid nothing, and from whom we hear nothing.

Time of the Second Advent. NO. VI.

Our object in this number is, to further examine the question, what is the Bible position on the time of the advent of Christ? We consider this question fairly settled in our number for last week, which we request the Bible student to read again. But as some will not be satisfied with the simple testimony of the Bible on this point, but will call for 'line upon line, and precept upon precept,' before they can relinquish former favorite opinions, and receive the truth, we will try to answer the wants of such ones. In doing this we propose to show

1. That the gospel presents but one position on the time of the advent.
2. That that position may be understood and believed by persons of the most common abilities. And
3. That that position is as immutable as the word God is true.

1. That the gospel presents one, and but one, position on the time of the advent is evident

(1st.) From the Word itself. No where do the Scriptures call upon us to take but one position on the time of the advent, and that is—'Nigh, even at the doors.' And they do call upon us to take this very position: for they three times command us, 'When ye shall see' the signs, then to know that Christ and his kingdom are 'nigh, even at the doors.' Matt. xxiv. 33; Mark xiii. 29; Luke xxi. 31.

(2nd.) We argue from the nature of the case, that there can be but one gospel position on the time of the advent. Some, and perhaps many, will admit that 'nigh, even at the door,' is one or a position of the time, but think that the Word now does or will at a future day reveal another position on the time. This cannot be: for it would destroy the unity and perfection of the Bible. The Bible or the Revelation of God is a divine unit. It reveals one Lord, one faith, one hope, one baptism, one body, one Spirit, and one God and Father of us all; (Eph. iv. 4-6.) and, we confidently add, one position on the time of the advent. And it would be just as incompatible with the unity of the gospel to contend for more than one position on the time as it would be to hold that there is a plurality of Lords, faiths, hopes, baptisms, bodies, spirits, and Gods, or Fathers. This statement we admit is a strong one, but all who look at it candidly will see that it is no stronger than the infallible nature of the case will justify. Then, the fair conclusion is, that there can be but one gospel position on the time of the advent, and that that position is—'Nigh, even at the doors.'

2. That this position may be understood and believed by persons of the most common abilities is evident

(1.) From its simplicity. 'When ye shall see these things, then know that he is nigh, even at the door,'—is not an abstruse declaration, beyond the grasp of the common people. All, the learned and unlearned, may easily understand, and believe it.—The faith of all may readily take hold on a position so easily understood. Not so the positions which have pointed to forty-three, forty-four, the tenth day, forty-six, and now forty-seven, and as many more intermediate times, which might be named. They have all been more or less perplexing and difficult to be understood by the common people. Many a good Christian has said—I cannot understand these things, but I hope your position is right: for I believe the coming of the Lord is near, and love his appearing. Such ones have had no real faith in these different times, for the very good reason that they could not understand much if anything about them.

(2.) The nature or genius of the gospel. The whole economy of grace is adapted to the capacity of the most ignorant and fallen of the human race. There is no fundamental proposition, or position of that economy, but that may be readily and easily grasped, so as to become a matter of genuine gospel faith, by all. No one will understandingly dispute this. Then, if it is contended that faith on the time of the advent is required of all, we are necessarily driven to the conclusion that the position on time must be simplified down to the understanding of the lowest capacity. Such is the position, Nigh, even at the door: it therefore must be the true one. No other position, compatible with the genius of the economy of grace, can sustain this essential character, therefore all other positions, on the time, that have been or yet may be assumed, must be wrong.—The very nature of the case renders this conclusion unavoidable.

3. That the position, Nigh, even at the door, is as infallible as the word of the Lord is true, is clearly evident (1st.) From the Word itself. In immediate connection with this position the Savior says, 'Heaven and earth shall pass away, but my words shall not pass away.' Matt. xxiv. 35. The same is recorded by Mark xiii. 31, and Luke xxi. 33. This position, then, is immutable; it must therefore be the true one; for there cannot be a plurality of immutable positions on the time of the advent, any more than there can be on any or all of the fundamental principles of the gospel. All other positions on the time of the advent, must therefore be mutable, and consequently wrong.

(2nd.) The nature of the case furnishes an unanswerable evidence in favor of the view we entertain on this question. True faith cannot stand on any other than an infallible position. God has never required it to stand anywhere else. If it does stand there it will never be ashamed or confounded. He requires us to believe in the time of the advent of his Son—therefore the position he calls upon us to take on the time is an infallible one: Nigh, even at the door, is the only infallible position on this point, hence it alone is the true position on the time of the advent of our Lord.

To this reasoning we invite the strictest criticism, in the love of the truth; the closer the better: for the principles which we have laid down, we have the fullest assurance are based upon sound reason and the immutable word of God.

Having as we fully believe fairly shown that 'Nigh, even at the door,' is the only true gospel position on the time of the advent, we will now notice some of the most prominent objections which we have heard urged against this view of the subject.

(1st.) It is called a "sliding position." The meaning of which we suppose is—it opens a door to insensibly slide from faith into unbelief, or from definite into indefinite time, and finally into unbelief altogether on the advent question. The same objection may with equal propriety be urged against every proposition, or position of the gospel. It addresses man as an intellectual, understanding, moral agent, capable of obeying or disobeying the righteous and plain requirements of God. He does not place men under an arbitrary irresistible power or constraint to compel him to obey Him. The door is wide open, in every object of faith, for man to slide if he will, into unbelief and sin. But woe unto that man who does it on any position of the gospel,—'Nigh, at the door' not excepted. A man who wishes an excuse for unbelief, like Pharaoh, will find many, but fearful destruction will be the result. But one who desires to believe and obey God in all things, will find nothing in the position, 'nigh even at the door,' to warrant his putting off the coming of the Lord a single moment.

(2nd.) It leads to infidelity. Not so; for, 'nigh, even at the door,' through all of our mistakes and disappointments, has been our rallying point, our safe retreat, and sure defence against infidelity.—Well, bless the Lord, have said the disappointed ones, if our definite times have disappointed us, we will not give up our blessed hope yet: for our feet still rest on a sure foundation—'We know that he is nigh, even at the door.' On this position we can stand and rejoice in hope of soon seeing our Lord, under all of our mortifying disappointments. We think it has been unscriptural positions on the time which has opened wide the door to unbelief and infidelity. 1st. February of A. D. 1843, was the time when many confidently looked for the Lord. 2nd. The spring of '43 was another time. 3rd. The spring of '44 was another prominent time. 4th. The tenth day, or fall of '44 was another prominent time. 5th. '46 was another prominent time. 6th. And now '47 is being made another prominent time.—Besides these times many less prominent periods have been marked by not a few for the advent of our Lord. Well, what of all this? In the first place, a position has been assumed that the Lord would come at each of these respective dates. The same testimony, with little variation, has been successfully used to sustain each position. Every time the position has failed, the testimony in the case has suffered in the estimation of very many of the disappointed ones, until not a few have not only lost all confidence in all positions on the time, but believe all the evidence which has been brought forward for their support is defective and spurious. Oh, how the divine testimony, the infallible truth, has been mpeached again and again, in the estimation of many, by our forcing it repeatedly to sustain a false position. The Lord forgive this unintentional wrong; and enable us to rally once more on the true position—Nigh, even at the door, which will never endanger the veracity of the divine testimony, nor disappoint our most sanguine hopes.

(3rd.) It takes away the trial. If it is meant that it takes away the trial of planting our feet upon false positions, and falling into mortifying disappointments, as those positions fail, and betray our confidence, then we should bless God that he has guided us to that position which will not subject us any more to these things. God never tries his children by holding out false pretences, in order to disappoint them. Our trials on definite time have sprung from our own mistakes. We should not charge them upon our unerring heavenly Father: he never deceives nor disappoints the faith and hope of his confiding ones. No, no, let God be true though every man be found a liar. If we suffer for well doing happy are we; but if for our own faults, there is no reward. But if 'nigh even at the door' is the position which the Lord requires us to take; and if we believe and obey Him as we should, live out our faith every day and hour, we shall have sufficient trials to make us humble, and feel our dependence on God as he requires. He who looks for his Lord every moment, knows well what it is to have his faith constantly tried. He also fully understands what it is to watch for the return of his Lord hourly. In a word, he well knows what it is to walk by faith, and not by sight as he would had he a specific precise definite time in the future to look at.

(4th) The prophetic numbers are rendered useless. Not so; but they are, by this view, freed from many of the perplexities which the opposite view throws around them, and at once ranked in divine harmony with the other witnesses in the case, and to all is given the tongue of inspiration, to proclaim with infallible certainty the appearing of Christ and his kingdom 'nigh even at the door.' But these things will be made clear, the Lord helping us, in their proper place, in this investigation.

We consider it now settled by sound reason and revelation, that 'nigh even at the door,' is the Bible position on the time of the advent of Christ. Our next object will be to show from the overwhelming evidence in the case, that we are now, this very moment, occupying this fearful position. The Lord keep us from falling, that when he shall appear we may be accounted worthy to appear with him in glory.

Sting of Death.

We believe there is no dispute about the true meaning of the life and death discoursed on by Paul in the the fifteenth chapter of first Corinthians: it is literal death and a resurrection to a literal life, eternal life. In concluding his masterly arguments on this highly important subject, and in view of the victory the saints will obtain over death and the grave in the resurrection morn, he triumphantly exclaims, "O Death, where is thy sting? O Grave, where is thy victory?"

The sting of Death is sin; and the strength of sin is the law. But thanks be to God, who giveth us the victory through our Lord Jesus Christ."

The beauty of the doctrine taught in this scripture seems to be this: In consequence of sin all men die, sin slays all. Sin is the sting, the virus, or deadly dissolving poison of death, which will most surely prove the eternal dissolution of man, unless this sting, virus or deadly poison, is extracted, washed or cleansed away by faith in the blood of Christ. Or, in other words, this virus must be removed, and the Spirit of Christ must take its place, in order that our mortal bodies may be quickened into eternal life. All such, in the resurrection morn, will gain the 'victory through our Lord Jesus Christ,' and rejoice as Paul has said.

All others, or those from whom the sting of death, the virus or poison of sin, is not extracted by true faith in Christ, must perish, literally and eternally perish: for Paul says the strength of sin is the law. That is, the law recognizes sin, and punishes it with death: 'the wages of sin is death.'

To illustrate. What is it that gives magnitude or strength to crime, sufficient to punish men with death? Why, it is the law. Annihilate all law, and crime would not be recognised as such, and of course would have no strength to punish the perpetrator. But while law exists it recognizes and gives magnitude or strength to crime to punish the offender.—So with sin: there would be no crime in what is now sin, had not God defined and prohibited sin. His law has made 'sin exceeding sinful,' and punishes the one who commits it with death. The law punishes with death, but gives no life to the offender. The only way any one can have life is through Jesus Christ. The sinner who dies in his sins has rejected Christ, has not believed and obeyed Him, and as a matter of course has not been 'justified by faith;' but dies under the full sentence of death, the sting not having been extracted; he is under the whole strength of sin, and there can be no hope for him.—He can never have life—he must inevitably perish. There is no principle in reason or revelation that will give him life, in any sense of the word. Death, cessation of being, must be his portion. O that he would turn from the error of his ways and live.—Why will you die, perishing sinner?

Children of our glorious Lord, look up—lift up your heads and rejoice; for the day of your eternal redemption is at hand. Soon the victory over death and the grave, through our Lord Jesus Christ, will be obtained; and life, eternal life, or ceaseless being, will be your glorious reward. "Therefore, my beloved brethren, be ye steadfast, unmovable, always abounding in the work of the Lord, forasmuch as ye know that your labor is not in vain in the Lord." No, no; an eternity of "glory, honor, immortality, eternal life," in the peaceful kingdom of God, will fully compensate for all our light afflictions here: "Our labor is not in vain in the Lord."

The letter from Br. St. John, in this number, will be read with great interest, by all the lovers of the good cause. It also opens to our view, an interesting field at home, where our brothers, kindred and neighbors dwell in darkness, and are perishing for the want of the knowledge of the truth. Who, in the name of the Lord, will go and help occupy this important field? The inducement we hold out is not money, but the satisfaction of doing good in this life, and a crown of glory in the world to come.—Missionaries who will labor for these objects, are now wanted for the far west: men who can trust in God, as did the apostles, and as did the ministers of this precious faith, at the commencement of the advent message in our land. Only let them be found in the way of their duty, and the means for their support will not be wanting. If they will let their wants be known, hearts, hands and purses will be open to supply all their needs. We might organize a missionary society, raise funds, and offer a reward in dollars and cents, for men to engage in this work. But this we shall not do: for we have no fellowship for such worldly parade and policy. It is not according to the simplicity of the gospel of Christ.—Who will go to the far west?

To Correspondents.

Bro. J. W.—We think your remarks on the "7th month" movement, as they are mostly matters of opinion, would do no real good to publish them.

Bro. J. G.—We think it would do no good to agitate the subject on which you speak, at least for the present. There are other highly important questions, on which good brethren differ, now under investigation in our papers. It is not wisdom to crowd too many subjects before them at once. Let us be patient; test every doctrine and spirit by the plain Word; receive what will bear the trial, but reject all that will not.

Bro. W. P. will see the reasons, in the note to Bro. J. G., why we defer noticing his questions now. At another time, we may investigate the whole matter thoroughly. If any have the gift of healing, the fruits of their faith or gift will be good evidence in the case.

Bro. WESTON ON THE TIME.—We cheerfully publish Bro. Weston's article in this number, on 'Nigh, even at the Door,' because the time of the advent we dearly love; it is a Bible doctrine, and brings the consummation of our most blessed hope so near, 'nigh, even at the door,' which is now, and will be now, until the Lord shall come.

We still love definite time, but not in the indefinite sense in which Br. Weston leaves it. He says there is a "dispute of three or four years when the 1230 years began, but only of a few weeks when they ended."

This is too indefinite to suit our faith: the precise definiteness of the infallible words suits us best, viz: "nigh, even at the door," which, as before said, is and will be now, this moment, until the Lord shall come. Br. Weston's whole argument confirms this position, and so do all the infallible evidences on the time, as we hope, the Lord will, soon to show.

We wish not to detract in the least from the merits of Br. Weston's article. We hope all will read and profit by it; remembering, however, not to indulge in the deferred hope that the Lord may or will not come before some time in April or May next, as Br. Weston's indefinite view supposes; but keep before your mind the solemn truth, that his coming is "nigh, even at the door"—that you have no warrant for the continuance of time another moment. Be ready, now; "for in such an hour as ye think not, the Son of Man cometh."

For a further answer to Br. Weston, see our article on the Time of the Advent, in this number.

Bro. TURNER'S ARTICLE.—His article in this number we publish not because we endorse the sentiment it advocates; but because it breathes the spirit of candor; and if it takes a correct view of the prophecy it investigates, it is important that we should know it. But if our former views are correct, the objections Bro. Turner has raised against them should be heard and candidly answered. Pressing duties prevent us from critically examining the real merits of this question now. We therefore request others to do it, who have the time and ability for such a work. Let no one be hasty in giving up old and well understood opinions, or doctrines; nor prejudiced against receiving new ones because they are new. Let all be tested by truth and facts, and those which bear the trial receive, but those that will not, reject.

The valuable article from Br. Heyes, headed "What of the Night," was, through mistake, placed in the wrong box, and consequently has not appeared until this late date. It, however, has lost none of its value by the delay, as all will readily see who will read it with care.

"Nigh even at the Doors."

I want, my Bro. Marsh, the privilege of showing through your paper, (and I am sure you will not deny me) that the infidelity into which some are falling, who once believed in the time of the Lord's coming, is the legitimate effect of the 'nigh even at the door' doctrine. True, when Jesus gave signs that should precede his second coming, he said by these we could determine when he was nigh even at the doors—but I think it will soon appear that we have something from Jesus more definite than this: 'For the testimony of Jesus is the spirit of prophecy.' Rev. xix. 10.

That we have something more definite in prophecy than Matt. 24th, appears evident,

1. Because Jesus refers his disciples to the prophet Daniel, Matt. xxiv. 15.

2. Because Peter (2 Pet. i. 17, 19) after telling us of the kingdom of Christ which he saw in miniature on the mount, (Luke ix. 28—35) when the Savior appeared in the glory in which he will come the second time, and Moses appeared the representative of all the dead saints that would arise at the first resurrection, and Elijah the representative of all the living, who would be caught up to meet the Lord in the air, tells us there is something more sure than his eyes saw and his ears heard on that Mount. 'We have also a more sure word of prophecy, whereunto ye do well that ye take heed.' Here Peter argues from the less to the greater.

3. Because by the oath of Jesus Christ in Daniel xii. we have definite time reaching to the resurrection from the dead.

That Dan. xii. 2, 3, refers to the resurrection and the saints shining in glory, I presume no adventist will deny. Taking this for granted, I pass to verse 5—'Then I Daniel looked, and, behold, there stood other two; the one on this side of the bank of the river, and the other on that side of the bank of the river. And one said to the man clothed in linen, which was upon the waters of the river, How long shall it be to the end of these wonders? End of what wonders? The only topic of conversation is the resurrection and glorification of the saints, and every candid person will acknowledge that the question is this, 'How long shall it be to the resurrection and the shining of the saints in their Father's kingdom?' 'And I heard the man clothed in linen, which was upon the waters of the river, when he held up his right hand and his left hand to heaven, and swore by him that liveth forever that it shall be for a time, times and an half; and when he shall have accomplished to scatter the power of his holy people, all these things shall be finished.' All what things shall be finished? No infidel I presume would dispute, that as the question was, How long to the resurrection? the answer to that direct question being plain and definite, also refers to the length of time, from a certain point to the resurrection. And what gives this answer additional importance is, that it is given under the most solemn double oath—with both hands uplifted! And will any but an infidel take the responsibility of saying that this most solemn oath was taken and recorded to mock and tantalize the people of God? or that it was given in language they never could understand!! Certainly none but the most hardened infidel would be bold enough for that. That this time was not understood by Daniel, I admit—but by the Revelation of Jesus Christ to John we can understand the definite length of that time. In Rev. xii. 14, we find the same 'time, times and an half,' as in Dan. xii. 7, and referring to the same event. In Rev. xii. 6, we have the same time in days—1260 days. In Rev. xi. 2, in months—forty-two months.

Having ascertained the length of time, times and an half from the Bible, can we from the same source find the length of time contained in the expression, 'When he shall have accomplished to scatter the power of the holy people?' I think we can. All admit, I believe, that the seven times of punishment in Lev. xxvi. 20, are seven prophetic times or years—or twice 1260 prophetic days is 2520. In this punishment the professed people of God are spoken of as being scattered by the kings of the earth. (Lev. xxvi. 33. Deut. iv. 27, and xxviii. 64; Jer. i. 17.) By subsequent prophecies we find that during the half of these 7 times—3½ years, 42 months or 1260 days, the saints were to be given into the hands of the little horn of Dan. vii. 8, 25. Paul's man of sin, 2 Thes. ii. 3—9, or the Roman Catholic power. This power according to Gibbon, was not completely established until the spring of A. D. 542. (of which we shall see more by and by,) whose 1260 prophetic days would carry us to the spring of A. D. 1802. But beginning the reign of Popery in A. D. 542, the scattering power of the kings—their 1260 days or half of the 7 times was not fulfilled when Popery began. For beginning the first captivity of the Israelites by the Assyrian kings, (2 Kings xxi. 9; 2 Chron. xxxiii. 10) in the spring of B. C. 674, as many chronologists do, and as time has shown that we must, the kings of the earth could have but 1215 full years before the saints were given into the hands of Popery—consequently the kings of the earth must have 45 years more for scattering the powers of the holy people, after the fall of Popery, to make up, with the 1260 of Popery, the 7 times, or 2520 days of prophetic punishments. Lev. xxvi. 28. This would end in the spring of A. D. 1847. But I proceed.

'And I heard, but I understood not; then said I, O my Lord, what shall be the end of these things? And he said Go thy way Daniel, for the words are closed up and sealed till the time of the end. Many shall be purified and made white and tried—but the wicked shall do wickedly and none of the wicked shall understand, but the wise shall understand.' By the wise, we shall all agree, is meant the people of God. But they shall understand what? No grammarian in a similar case would hesitate a moment in supplying this ellipsis. The question in verse 6, was concerning the length of time to the resurrection. The answer gave the time under the most solemn oath, and it was this time that Daniel did not understand—but he was told that it should be understood at the time of the end. For aught that appears, this promise, that the wise should understand this time reaching to the resurrection, was given under oath as well as the time itself. The Lord, in answer to Daniel's question, What shall be the end of these things? now proceeds to give Daniel the time in numbers which he could understand. Though Daniel's question was, What shall be the end of these things? the answer shows that his question implied when. 'And from the time that the daily sacrifice shall be taken away, and the abomination that maketh desolate set up, there shall be a thousand two hundred and ninety days. Blessed is he that waiteth and cometh to the thousand three hundred and five and thirty days. But go thou thy way until the end be, for thou shalt rest and stand in thy lot at the end of the days.' The expression, 'Thou shalt rest and stand in thy lot at the end of the days,' shows conclusively that the resurrection will take place at the end of the 1335 days.

We are all agreed that the daily sacrifice means Pagan Rome, and the abomination that maketh desolate, Papal Rome. We are also agreed that Pagan Rome was subverted 30 years before Popery was set up. The 30 years added to the 1260 of Papal rule, is 1290. And it is evident without argument that the 1290 and 1335 days begin at the same points; and we can all see that the 1335 are 45 more than the 1290. Let me talk to the children a little that they may understand this too. If we take 10 off of 45 there will be 35 left—put this 10 on to 90 there will be another 100; so that instead of 1200 we shall have 1300 and 35 more, making 1335. Now if we can determine where the 1290 begins or ends, we can determine where the 1335 will end; because the 1335 will end 45 years from the time the 1290 end. There is a dispute of 3 or 4 years where the 1290 begin, but there can be no dispute of more than a few weeks where the 1290 end, for they must end where the 1260 days or years of Papal rule end. I have shown above that Pagan Rome was subverted 30 years before Popery was set up—and 30 added to 1260 is 1290, which shows that the two numbers end together, as the 1290 begin 30 years before the 1260. Well, where did the 1260 years of Papal rule end? We supposed, when we preached in 1843, that they ended in 1798, because in February of this year the French army entered Rome and took the Pope prisoner; and 45 years from 1798 would end in 1843. But as time has compelled us to make more diligent search, we find that in 1800 Napoleon treats with the Pope of Rome as a sovereign power, thereby showing that his power was not yet lost. And this power of the Pope continued until it was formally surrendered by the Pope in signing the treaty called the Concordate. By this treaty the Pope lost his distinctive powers; and from this time the saints were no longer given into his hands. This treaty was drawn up and signed by the plenipotentiaries (as Thiers in his history of the Consulate tells us) July 15th, 1801—and signed and ratified by the Pope of Rome between the 10th and 18th day of September following. But we all know that a treaty must be ratified by both of the governments concluding the treaty, before it is of any effect; so here, the Pope having signed and ratified this treaty in September, 1801, waited with impatience the action of the French government. On the 8th of April this treaty was ratified by the French government, who fixed upon April 18th for its promulgation as the law of France and Rome. The 18th of April, 1802, was accordingly ushered in with all the pomp and display so important an occasion demanded. In May, 1802, the treaty of Amiens went into effect, by which all the powers of Europe acknowledged the change in the Roman government. The evidence is then clear and conclusive that the 1290 days could not have ended before the spring of 1802; nor can the 1335 days (45 more than 1290) extend beyond April or May, 1847. The 45 years of the 1335 beyond the 1290, are the same as the 45 for the scattering the power of the holy people, beyond the time, times and an half of Papal rule, mentioned in verse 7. Now with such clear evidence for the termination of the 1335 days—the termination of the time for the scattering the power of the holy people—the time for the resurrection—all which time was given under the most solemn oath, connected with the promise that the wise should understand that time, can any one turn away and talk about 'definite indefiniteness,' or, 'we can only determine that he is nigh, even at the doors?' 'There is such a discrepancy in chronology that we can determine nothing definite about Daniel's numbers.' And can we not trace back chronology 45 years without a mistake? But this is virtual infidelity—for it not only charges God foolishly, charges Him with revealing in his word that which intimately concerns us, yet, which we can never understand—but such unbelief nullifies the oath and promise of God. Our disappointments have been in fulfillment of prophecy; and I had rather have another such than turn Infidel. But we have no reason to expect another disappointment. We have, as shown above, the most indubitable evidence that the 1335 days will end—the resurrection take place, and Daniel stand in his lot in the coming spring!

J. WESTON.

CORRESPONDENCE.

LETTER FROM BRO. J. S. ST. JOHN.

Dear Bro. Marsh:—We yet feel truly like pilgrims and strangers, without any continuing city or abiding place; and, although disappointed, we continue looking for our Lord. We have been here more than a year, and have found none who sympathise with us in our hope, until, in answer to our prayers, our Father has sent us two of his children, who have gladdened and encouraged us in our pilgrimage. Bro. Daniels and sister Parks visited us and lectured a number of times to crowded congregations of highly interested and anxious hearers, who listened with almost breathless silence for two hours or more, many of whom were melted into tears.

Bro. Daniels has gone to Springfield: the news from him is cheering indeed. Our sister remains with us—has been lecturing, about ten miles from here, among the Freewill Baptists, (who seem to be very liberal people)—they truly were astonished at the doctrines taught in the Bible, especially the promise of the restitution, two resurrections, the kingdom, and inheritance, &c.—The preacher and his wife stated these were new ideas to them; the latter, notwithstanding that her prejudices had been so great before she had heard on the subject, when sister P. was about to leave, threw her arms around her neck, while the tears were streaming down her face, exclaimed, 'O, how blind have I been!' The truth is, they had been taught to believe in the conversion of the world and a temporal millenium, but these views were completely swept away by the Bible truth. Others have likewise fallen in love with these Bible truths, and we trust much good is done in that place.

Our sister has also lectured six times at Mount Morris, a pleasant little village, situated on a beautiful eminence, about ten miles from here, and has a theological seminary belonging to the Episcopal Methodists, in which the lectures were given to crowded congregations, which were entertained from one hour and a half to three hours.—There were from six to twelve preachers in attendance, among whom were some of the professors of the seminary, but none of them were able to refute the doctrines preached by our sister; but many testified, by their tears and hearty responses, to the truth of what they had heard—and among the students were some who were so dissatisfied with their former teaching, that they left their theological books and took their Bibles, with a determination to know whether these things are so. And there is such a desire manifested in that place to learn on this blessed subject, that a certain brother stated that he could distribute a box of books among the people, if he had them. We let him have what we had to read and circulate. The truth is, the people love the truth and must and will have it. They find the truth alone can make them free. The good that has been done in all these places, eternity alone will reveal.

Our sister has more calls to lecture that she can possibly fulfil. O that God would send more of his faithful laborers to help in this western region; the field is large, and calls are numerous; sinners are perishing; the precious cause is bleeding; the truth is suffering, on account of the unfaithfulness of the unfaithful watchmen, who have left the walls of Zion, and are crying peace and safety. But this is loud preaching to the Bible observer; for he sees in this an awful fulfilment of prophecy.

Sister Parks expects to go north about thirty miles, in a few days, to a village called Freeport, where she has a call to lecture.

Yours, in hope,

J. S. ST. JOHN.

Buffalo Grove, Ill., Jan. 11, 1847.

Bro. A. Howe, Gorham, Dec. 29th, on the advent of Christ, writes:

O! then will our joys be complete—then we shall enjoy the most perfect freedom and communion with the blessed God—there faith will be swallowed up in vision, and hope in fruition—there the spirits of just men will be made perfect and join the innumerable company of angels in singing anthems of eternal praise to God, and Christ our exalted Redeemer. There we shall be crowned with crowns of eternal honor, and decked with robes of brightest lustre, forever shining forth like so many suns in the kingdom of our heavenly Father! O! the glories, the ravishing glories of the heavenly world! O! those blessed scenes of permanent and everlasting joy and delight! There all tears are wiped away from our eyes! There we shall be delivered from the molestations of the old serpent and a sin-cursed earth! Nothing will enter those peaceful regions that defileth or that worketh abomination or maketh a lie! Not one spot or stain will be seen on the walls of the New Jerusalem! Not one sullied pillar in the upper temple of God! Not one slumbering string or untuned harp in all the heavenly concert! O! my brother or sister, could the curtains of your eyes be drawn aside, that the heavenly world might at once pour its heavenly light on your astonished vision! could you hear the loud hallelujahs that ring through the arches of heaven! the hosannas that drop from every tongue, and the name, the ever blessed and glorious name of Jesus, sweetly breathed in every accent, how would your soul spring in your bosom for joy! How would you long, ardently long, to take wing and be gone hence and be with Christ, which is far better! O, the folly! the egregious folly of mortals who make this world their wonder, their gold, their god, and their coffers their heaven! Can immensity be measured with a line? or an atom weigh down the boundless creation? As well may earthly pleasures yield satisfaction to an immortal mind. All the views and discoveries we have here below of the heavenly state, are but as through a glass darkly; but in heaven it is face to face—there we shall know as we are known. But oh! how narrow are our views! how faint our ideas! how feeble and glimmering are all our discoveries of the great and glorious things God has prepared for them that love him!

Be patient, brethren, and wait till your change come. By and by, He who hath the keys of death and hell will unlock the prison of the grave! then shall our bodies spring from the dust fashioned like the glorious body of the Son of God! crowned with honor and decked with robes of brightest lustre, shining forth like so many suns in the kingdom of our heavenly Father! Yet a little while and he that shall come, will come, and will not tarry, and I know that his reward is with him! The hour is at hand! he is at the door! Even so, come Lord Jesus! come quickly!

Bro. W. Watkins, Baltimore, Md., Jan. 7th, writes:—

Never did I witness a more cordial and uninterrupted union between any people, than that which has existed for many months among the Baltimore brethren. They love each other, as it seems to me, with a pure heart fervently. They seem to be of one heart and one mind. If they hold any discordant views, they are either not known or scarcely perceptible. The law of love reigning predominantly, they can find not a moment to contend about non-essentials. They are self-sacrificing—they sympathise practically with any of the body who may be in poverty or distress. They would rather meet in their little upper room where they can speak and hear of the blessed hope—their hearts being unawed by human authority, and their tongues unchained by ecclesiastical interdicts—than to worship in the most splendid temples in the land in which there is no sympathy for those who love, and are looking for the appearing of the Lord—in which not a sound is ever heard in regard to the near realization of the Christian's hope at the resurrection—nay, in which such a doctrine is regarded as a contemptible heresy, or the hallucination of a pitiful fanaticism. I feel that I can never be sufficiently thankful to my heavenly Father for casting my lot among these despised ones. Whenever I worship with them I feel that I breathe a heavenly atmosphere, that I am with a company of pilgrims who love and fear the Lord, and consequently, that 'the angels of the Lord encampeth round about them that fear him.'

Bro. W. G. Ruggles, Three Rivers, Jan. 6th, writes:—

Where is Bro. H. F. Hill, Bro. Barringer and others, who so often gave us such blessed epistles? Will they not speak again to the scattered remnant? heaven will smile upon them if they will. The good cause is prospering in this place and vicinity, and the saints are truly desiring a better country, where faith in sight will be swallowed up, hope in glad fruition lost—where earth (now groaning under the curse) will become like the garden of the Lord—where the ransomed will return and come to Zion with songs and everlasting joy upon their heads, and where sighing and sorrow shall flee away. Amen.

Bro. S. Bean, East Bethel, Jan. 1st, writes:—I would just say to the praise of God, that the conference in East Bethel was one of deep interest; so large a congregation and so attentive, has not been seen in this place since '43 and the '7th month;' and Bro. Thurber says he has not felt such a burden for souls this two years, nor witnessed so much deep conviction: the most hardened sinners and backsliders were melted under the word which was preached with power.

The few brethren in this place are well united, and strong in the Lord, and are laboring to gird the whole armor on, so that we shall be enabled to stand the trials of these last days, which we believe will end soon.

Bro. J. Sadler, Shiremanstown, Pa., Jan. 2d., writes:—

Under the blessing of God and the indefatigable labors of Bro. T. Osler, we have had quite a refreshing time in this place. During a protracted meeting a short time since, ten or twelve presented themselves for prayer, and we trust were all hopefully converted to God. The brethren and sisters are strong in faith, believing the kingdom of God is nigh at hand.

Bro. J. G. Hooks, Coneord, N. H., Jan. 9th, writes:—

There are a few in this place who are still looking for that very 'same Jesus' to come in like manner as he went away. The little flock here have been scattered and divided as in other places; but we hope to overcome through the blood of the Lamb and the word of our testimony. We are resolved to go on, hoping that soon the chariots of Israel will appear for our deliverance.

Bro. J. Mudget, Meredith Village, N. H., Dec. 29th, writes:—

The brethren here stand firm in the truth of God's word. We have had blessed meetings of late; backsliders are reclaimed and souls are made happy in God, and believing the Lord is near.

Bro. B. F. Perry, Darlington, C. W., Dec. 19th, writes:—

The good Lord is reviving his work in this neighborhood. Eight or ten are converted!—Praise the Lord.

Missionaries for Christian America.

The glaring inconsistency of Christian men who withhold the Bible from their slaves and make it penal to teach them to read, and often penal for them to meet for prayer and mutual Christian sympathy and instruction is set in a strong but a just light by Frederick Douglass in one of his English speeches. Surely it is a sufficiently palpable fact that men who can hold slaves and forbid them the Bible need to be themselves converted, however much piety they profess to have. They ought to see that a system which compels them to shut off souls from the light of revelation ought not to live another day.

"I wish to say a word about another thing, and that is to the friends of the spread of the Gospel and the circulation of the Bible—I want you to remember that there are three millions of people within fourteen days' sail of your own island, who know not what it is to have the Bible, who are denied by American Christians to learn to read the name of Almighty God. These men are redeemed by the blood of Christ, and I hope you will consider them as such; they are your brethren—I hope you will consider them as such. (Cheers.) They have no Bible, and it is penal to instruct them to read. I have a proposition for British Christians, and I will call on them to aid me in what I am now about to propose. It is this, that a large sum of money be raised in England for the special purpose of procuring Bibles, with the express understanding that they are to be placed on ship-board, and for the purpose of supplying the negroes, not in heathen lands, but in Christian America. (Cheers.) I should like to see that ship loaded with the gospel, loaded with Bibles, her sails spread to the breeze, manned by a Christian crew, and a Christian captain, having on board true Christian missionaries to expound the words of the Inspired Volume to those slaves, with the understanding that they were to land on the American shores. I should like to see that ship riding before the gentle gale, freighted with light and life, to the United States. (Cheers.) I should like to see another result that would follow. I know that the slaveholders would shoulder their muskets, buckle on their swords to fight with the Bible, to fight away Christianity. They dread the spread of the Gospel among the slaves. (Hear, hear.) But the experiment is worth trying. What a spectacle for men and angels to look upon,—Christian England demanding the right to preach the Gospel, coming to the very doors of St. Peter's, to Hindostan, to China, but baffled off by the arms of the Christian Evangelical States of America."

Appalling Distress in Ireland.

The condition of Ireland continues to be the absorbing objects of attention. Day after day the distress continues to increase, and famine is doing the work of death in various parts of the country.

Immense numbers of poor, half-starved creatures find their way across the channel and beg and subsist as best they can, by appealing to the feelings of the inhabitants in the great towns of England.

The number of these poor creatures in Liverpool, Manchester and the manufacturing districts, natives of the sister country, who have fled from the wretchedness of their homes, is adding seriously to the local taxation of the places named. The parish of Liverpool feels the pressure so painfully, that they have memorialized the Government on the subject, but any measure to be effected must be general in its application, and be hands of the Government are too full of Irish misery to pay much attention at the present time to ad misericordiam appeals from other quarters.

The distress is so overwhelming, that the Irish landlords have become alarmed for the safety of their estates, and are combining to devise measures to arrest the ruin which seems to be impending over their heads.

Panaceas of all kinds to meet the calamity are as plentiful as blackberries; and the chronic diseases of Ireland pass of course, in review, in compassing measures of amelioration. But the present is the time for action, not declamation—and accordingly, Parliament is to be called together on the 19th instant to consider what ought to be done in this crisis of the people's fate. Lord John Russell has issued a circular to his supporters in the House of Commons, soliciting their attendance at the opening of the session, as measures of great importance are to be immediately considered.

Some idea of the state of society across the channel may be inferred from the fact, that in the county of Mayo alone, no less than thirty-two or thirty-three deaths are alleged to have taken place from starvation!

Terrestrial Convulsions.

We have in a former number alluded to some extraordinary disturbance in the atmosphere, noted by Prof. E Meriam, on the 3d of September. Mr. M. has since obtained intelligence from various parts of the world, and ascertained that at about the same time there were a succession of convulsions which he mentions in the following order:

Iceland was heaved by Earthquakes and Volcanoes on the 22d of August; Earthquake on the rivers of New England and its sea coast on the 25th; throughout Tuscany in Europe on the 27th of August—on the 2d of September at Java; at Grenada on the 6th; at Trinidad on the 10th; at Deerfield, N. H. on the 12th; and Cape Haytien on the 15th of September, thus making eight convulsions in as many different and distant locations in 24 days—followed by fearful tempests—dreadful gales—terrific hurricanes—hail, rain and snow—destroying thousands of human lives, and casting into the lap of ruin millions on millions of property. At Java, at the date above mentioned, the Gunung Merapi, a high mountain on that island, was throwing out immense volumes of fire and smoke, and a river of burning lava was running down the mountain side. This mountain has not before been convulsed for 1000 years.

P. S. Since writing the above we have seen another report of Meriam's observations, stating that for 36 hours on the 27th and 28th of December there prevailed an equilibrium of the atmosphere which strongly indicated a convulsion in some distant part of the earth.—Sci. American.

Alarming Occurrence.

GRAFTON STEAM MILLS, }
Grafton Harbor, C. W. Jan. 9. }

SIR:—A most singular phenomenon occurred at this place yesterday afternoon, about 3 o'clock, which may be thought worth a place in your paper. The lake was calm, and the wind in the north, when suddenly the lake receded from the shore in one immense wave, upwards of 350 feet, leaving the beach perfectly dry for that distance; it seemed to gather itself into a vast cone, and immediately returned in one unbroken wave, four feet higher than it usually is, burying the wharf completely, and overflowing its usual boundaries upwards of a hundred yards, sweeping everything before it, accompanied by a dreadful noise. This happened eight or nine different times, gradually decreasing in violence until the lake resumed its usual appearance.

THOMAS THOMSON,

Miller, Grafton Steam Mills.

Our readers will remember that in 1845 we chronicled an occurrence similar to the above, as having taken place in our own harbor. The same convulsion that affected the lake at Grafton Harbor on Friday, ran along the coast from that place to Port Hope. It was, however, unattended with the heavy thundering sound heard at Grafton. We know the writer of the above letter, and place every confidence in his statement. We have also received a confirmatory letter from the proprietor of the Grafton Steam Mills, A. G. Allan, Esq.—Cobourg Star.

A VOLCANO AT WORK—MORE WONDERFUL CONVULSIONS.—We yesterday recorded a wonderful convulsion of the waters of Lake Ontario, as having taken place week before last. A similar one occurred at Rice Lake, about 12 miles north of Cobourg, last week. The Lake was seen to be in great commotion, the ice (18 inches thick,) undulating in every direction. Presently it burst with a noise like thunder, and a large piece from the centre of the Lake, was, in a few minutes, thrown up in a pile to the height of ten feet, in which position it now lies. This is no doubt related to the earthquake which caused the awful commotion in Lake Ontario at Grafton.—Advertiser.

Several slight shocks of earthquake have lately been felt in the neighborhood of Marsailles.

MEETINGS IN ROCHESTER.

Our meetings in this city, are held three times on the Sabbath, also Tuesday and Friday evenings, in Shaw's New Brick Block, east side of the River, corner of Main and Stone streets; entrance from Stone street. The Lord's Supper will be administered in the afternoon of the first Sabbath of every month.

APPOINTMENTS.

Bro'n J. V. Himes and F. G. Brown are expected to hold meetings in this city Feb. 14th, and as much longer as duty may dictate.

J. C. Bywater appoints to be with the brethren at Le Roy the first Sabbath in February.

Bro. E. R. Pinner appoints to lecture at Scottsville Friday evening, Feb. 5th, and continue his meetings as duty may dictate until the Wednesday following.

W. P. RABSON.

Scottsville, Jan. 22d, 1847.

BUSINESS NOTES.

Bro. Himes—You will credit John Mudgett on Voice of Truth $2, and charge the same to my account.

We are in want of Macknight's Testaments and small Hymn-books. Please bring some, and also a copy of the Advent Herald since vol. 9, when you come to Rochester: also your Book account.

T. M. Preble—We have given you credit $1. The papers are regularly sent. Great complaints about the Eastern mails of late; we hope there will be cause for no more.

J. Stevenson—The paper for Bro. Cochrane was discontinued by order of some one; it is now re-ordered. The amount due to close of vol. xiii will be $2.50, if he pays for the one sent to J. Cochrane Toronto, C. W.; but if for the one only sent to Scotland, $2.

L. D. Fleming—The paper for 'Mrs. George Newark, N. J.' has been regularly sent since vol. xii no. 2. The fault must be at your Post Office. We find H. Ball credited to close of vol. 10, but can't tell where the money was received. Bro. Arnold is in Illinois or Wisconsin territory; is not expected until spring.

W. G. Moore—Your debt is 75 cts.

J. P. Jacobs—S. Pangbourn's paper is marked 'free.' If he wishes to pay, it will be $2.50 to close vol. xiii.

M. Whitaker—Bro. Herron is confident that the 50 cts only paid to close of vol. xi. So our books stand; hence, Sister C. is mistaken. She is now paid to close of vol. xii. All shall be made to her full satisfaction.

W. G. Ruggles—We have not sent his paper to Three Rivers, but to Springfield as you ordered.

H. H. Johnson—It was sent to Smithfield to C. F. S., till no. 11 of vol. x, when it was ordered discontinued, at which time was due $3.40. But if Bro. Sweet will inform us how long he received it at that place, we will cancel the balance.

R. Andrew—You are paid to close of vol. xiv.

C. Crawford—Your and A. Beebe's accounts, as you direct, are squared to close of vol. xiii.

J. C. Bywater—We can't find F. S. on our book. Be particular and give the full name and address, that the dollar may be credited.

J. Varney—We have given you credit to close of vol. xiv.

Time Lingers Not.

Time lingers not—another year
Has sped its flight—is gone—
The resurrection morn draws near,
Its glories soon will dawn!
Soon shall the time of the release
Of waiting Israel come,
When they shall gain the promised rest,
And dwell with Christ at home.

Soon they'll exchange this gloomy scene
Of sorrow, sin and woe,
Temptations, trials, death and pain,
Where tears increasing flow—
For the abode of righteousness—
A seraph choir become—
In purest strains Jehovah bless,
And dwell with Christ at home.

There tears and death, sorrow and pain,
Cannot their peace invade,
And God himself shall dwell with them,
And all things new be made!
There nought of that which e'er defiles
Or makes a lie shall come,
But victors over Satan's wiles
There dwell with Christ at home!

Lift up your heads, ye purified,
Redemption draweth near,
For those who in the Lord abide,
And his commandments fear,
All who in white unspotted robe,
Through Jesus' blood of mercy,
Shall safely reach the highest abode,
And dwell with Christ at home!

The Bible a Sufficient Creed:

A DISCOURSE DELIVERED AT FORT WAYNE,
IOWA, FEB. 22, 1846.

BY CHARLES BEECHER.

"All Scripture is given by inspiration of God, and is profitable for doctrine, for reproof, for correction, for instruction in righteousness, that the man of God may be perfect, thoroughly furnished unto all good works."—2 Tim. iii. 16, 17.

In the further consideration of the subject this morning presented to your view, having already established the first proposition, viz: 'The Bible is a creed, sufficient under God's blessing, to regulate the belief, experience, and practice of the whole Christian world;' I now proceed to establish the second, viz: 'The substitution of any other creed for any of these purposes, is one step to APOSTACY.'

But what is the substitution of any other creed? Not the publishing, in book-form, of a system of doctrines, which any man, or body of men, suppose to be contained in the Bible. It is right to compare, to harmonise, systematize; it is right to publish, to defend, to propagate. This is not what we mean by substitution.

Nor is it the mere publication, defence and propagation of a book, by any man, or body of men, as containing the system of doctrines taught in the Bible. That this would be an unwise presumption, I must believe. Man's mind is finite; the teachings of the Bible, infinite. How can men, then, give the system, while their minds are physically too small! Humbly must we confess that there is scarce a question started in God's word which does not depend for its complete solution on facts and relations unseen; which does not revolve in an orbit so vast, that the small arch we see cannot afford the elements necessary to form a calculation; which does not sweep out far beyond our horizon and link in with invisible emergencies.

Hence, to pronounce the results of the research of three-score years and ten, the system, is a daring deed, as daring as for the astronomer to say, this is the system of astronomy, ignorant as yet, on what unknown path, about what unknown centre our sun is travelling; as daring as for the geologist to say, this is the system of the earth, ignorant, as yet, of what is twenty miles below the surface; as daring as for the chemist, or the physiologist to say, this is the system of chemistry, or physiology, ignorant, as yet, of the nature of electricity, or the vital principle; or rather, as daring as for an Academy of Sciences to come forward and say, this is the system of universal science, while there is not a science in the sisterhood yet out of swaddling bands.

Would not these exhibit presumption? But if the Bible be of God, is it not vast as nature? And is it not a precisely similar presumption to say, this is the system of Doctrines contained in the Bible? How much more fitting to say, 'These are parts of his ways; but the thunder of his power who can understand!' Yet however we may censure such a course as unwise presumption, it is not the substitution which we are to examine.

What, then, is such substitution?

It is, after having presumed to publish such a book, and to say, 'This is the system of doctrines contained in the Word of God,' to go further and require the acceptance of that book by every candidate for licensure or ordination, as a test of his qualification. It is this which I shall attempt to show is one step to APOSTACY.

1. Because it is a direct contradiction of the unequivocal teaching of the Holy Ghost.

The estimate which God has set upon his word is, the Man of God, who sincerely receives and adopts the Bible in the best exercise of his natural faculties of interpretation, is PERFECT, THOROUGHLY FURNISHED UNTO ALL GOOD WORKS.

We contradict this. We virtually declare the Man of God who sincerely receives and adopts the Bible in the best exercise of his natural faculties of interpretation, is NOT perfect; NOT thoroughly furnished unto all good works. Nay, he is so imperfect, so poorly furnished, that we will not license, nor ordain him. That is to say, he shall suffer the natural inconvenience and penalty that such refusal inevitably will bring.

Having thus virtually annulled God's statute, and affixed a penalty to the obedience of it, we set up our own statute, viz: the Man of God who sincerely receives and adopts the Bible, and this creed, according to the best of his natural faculties in interpreting them, is perfect, thoroughly furnished unto all good works.

This is what must strike every unprejudiced mind as real apostacy. Let me illustrate. Compare this with a well known feature of the Romish apostacy. The Bible declares that there is one mediator between God and man, Jesus Christ the righteous, and that there is salvation in none other; that his blood cleanseth from all sin, &c. What, in this cardinal point, is the very gist of Roman apostacy? Denying Christ? No. Denying that he is the Mediator? No. What then? She adds other mediators—the virgin, the saints. This is recognised by all Protestants as the very essence of her apostacy on this point. But, men and brethren, I submit to you whether the case in hand be not precisely parallel. God declares that the Man of God, who sincerely receives and adopts the Bible, is perfect, for certain specified purposes. We declare that the Man of God who sincerely receives and adopts the Bible, and this creed, is perfect for the same specified purposes.

God declares that Christ as a mediator, is perfect. Rome declares that Christ and the saints, as mediators, are perfect. Now, if the latter be apostacy, why not the former? Do not we and Rome, so far, stand on precisely similar ground?

2. But I judge it to be a real step in apostacy, because it has arisen and is advancing, in the same mysterious, stealthy way, out of the midst of good men, and good motives, that saint-worship arose. The rise of saint-worship was prophesied by St. Paul, as a revival, under a Christian dress, of the ancient pagan worship of good demons. 1 Tim. iv. 1.

Now, how was it brought about in its earliest stages? By bold, bad men? By a general vote of apostacy? Ah, no! These 'hypocritical liars,' with 'consciences seared as with a red hot iron,' mentioned by the apostle, were the product and the support of the mature, full grown apostacy, stalking forth a grim and ghastly ghost of defunct paganism, evoked from hell and clad in the fleecy vestments of the Lamb.

The stupendous mystery of Satanic skill was, that he contrived to have martyrs substituted for discarded demons, by the pious, unsuspecting co-operation of godly men—men, ready in their turn to become martyrs. They were the unconscious tools, in the hands of the arch-plotter of ruin, to bring about the fatal resurrection of that very old paganism, (under a truly godly form,) from whose fires they had barely escaped.

How did it begin?

In a pious and decent respect for the memory of the martyrs. Nothing more. In cherishing and defending their memories. It was fostered, creeping step by step, from affectionate remembrance to respectful veneration; from respectful veneration to superstitious adoration by such men as Eusebius, Theodoret, Basil the great, Gregory Nazianzen, Gregory Nysen, Chrysostom, and almost all the fathers of the fourth and fifth centuries.

Innocently it flourished in their unsuspecting hands, and peacefully and piously it passed beyond their day, to a horrid consummation.

So it was with fasting from meats.

So it was with forbidding to marry.

So with every feature of the Romish Apostacy.

Precisely in the same manner is this feature of what I must call Protestant apostacy, now arising—creeping stealthily through its first innocent stages among good men, from good motives; and precisely in the same manner will it pass beyond our day to a similar consummation.

Our best, most humble, most devoted servants of Christ, are fostering in their midst what will one day, not long hence, show itself to be of the spawn of the dragon. They shrink from any rude word against creeds, with the same sensitiveness with which those holy Fathers would have shrunk from a rude word against the rising veneration of saints and martyrs, which they were fostering. They would have supposed that he who should have plainly remonstrated with them, and told them that they were taking a step in apostacy, was an enemy to religion. They would have told him perhaps, he was doing the devil's work, just as our holy Fathers with equal solicitude, say, when one attempts to disclose the necessary tendency of creeds. While, in point of fact, in both cases, it is the holy Fathers themselves who are doing the devil's work. For,

3. This is a radical feature of Romanism revived under a Protestant form, just as really as saint-worship was a radical feature of paganism revived under a Christian form.

What has been a radical feature of the Roman apostacy from the first, more marked than this one thing as admitted by all Protestants, that she claimed the solo right of interpreting the Bible? Has not Rome always either deprived the people of the Bible altogether, or else set up that ineffable Church fog of tradition for an infallible interpreter? And how was it that this celebrated feature of the Romish system took its rise? I answer in the voice of history, by creed-making. It was the creed-making power which began in the second century, crept slowly and stealthily forward, was first exercised in a general council in the fourth century, which afterward centred in the Vatican, and set its veto on the Bible.

The making an authoritative creed, to which the clergy were compelled to subscribe, was the first step; the absolute prohibition of the Bible to the people was the last step. The difference between was only the growth of the principle. For, the right to dictate what a man shall find in the Scripture, and the right to dictate that he shall find nothing, are one.

Look at the facts. The apostolic churches, during the whole of the first century, had no creed but the Bible. The apostles' creed, even, the simplest, oldest, most harmless of the species, was not made by the apostles. 'There is,' says Mosheim, 'indeed, extant, a brief summary of Christian doctrines, called the apostles' creed, and which from the fourth century onward, was attributed to Christ's ambassadors themselves; but at this day, all who have any knowledge of antiquity, confess unanimously that this opinion is a mistake, and has no foundation.'

And still more, when it was made it was not used as a test. It will be observed that in this argument, 'Creed' means not articles of belief, but articles made authoritative tests.

There was no such test in existence during nearly the whole of the first two centuries. They never were heard of until after Councils appeared. During the whole of that time churches were independent, all members equal. Each church chose its own officers, and each church was a Presbytery in itself. The modern forms of Presbyteries, Synods and General Assemblies, were unknown. The first idea of them was borrowed from the political world by the Greeks, who were versed in such features of civil administration. The idea of an authoritative creed is, therefore, exclusively political. It is not of Christian parentage. 'These Councils,' says Mosheim, 'of which no vestige appears before the middle of this (second) century, changed nearly the whole form of the Church, for by them, in the first place, the ancient right and privileges of the people were very much abridged, and on the other hand, the influence and authority of the Bishops were not a little augmented.'

By thus consolidating the churches, by delegates, into a political union, was formed a Hierarchy. For the delegates, little by little, transformed themselves into legislators, and avowed that Christ had given them power to make laws of faith and practice for the people.

Things went on gradually until A. D. 325 when the first General Council was called, and the first general creed made, viz: the Council of Nice and the Nicene Creed.

How was this Council called?

By the authority of Christ? By the authority of the Church? It was called by the authority of a man who was not even a member of the Christian Church—a man who was an Emperor, and that of Rome. The Roman Emperor, by his absolute political power, assembled a General Council of the Christian Church! Three hundred and eighteen Bishops fully settled the doctrines taught in the Bible, banished Arius into Illyria, and compelled his followers to subscribe. Here is the happy origin of authoritative creeds. Had I time, I could go on to show you how they multiplied in swarms; creating and fomenting those very divisions they were designed to suppress—part and parcel of that ambitious and apostate Hierarchy. I would show you how the creed-making power, thus unknown to apostolic times, thus a political idea, thus first generally exercised under a Roman Emperor's mandate, became the constant, inspiring spirit of the apostacy in all its stages, and having marked and gagged the Bible with creed upon creed, tradition upon tradition, fable upon fable, lodged at last in the Papal chair, and launched imperial thunders against the Bible itself. This is what I mean by saying that the creed-making power was a radical feature of Roman apostacy; and this power it is that we are now reviving under a Protestant form. For,

4. We are doing the self-same things by which the creed-making power then and there began; and, strange to say, are using the self-same arguments therefor. What were the Romish arguments, from the days of the Nicene debate, down to the pontifical anathema? They were, Truth is one—therefore true believers cannot differ. But they do differ. Therefore there is heresy. Heresy must be kept out. Make a creed to keep it out; and as to which side is heresy, 'Quod semper, quod ubique, quod ab omnibus,'—that is, heresy is the opinion which is in the minority. A strange rule in a world, where wise heads are certainly not generally in the majority, but a rule eminently convenient and practical. Yes. Shear off the troublesome thinkers and sing stagnant hallelujahs! This by way of keeping the Church pure! This has been Rome's policy. Mother of harlots! How holily has she protected the Purity of the Church!

Now, unless my ears deceive me, Protestants are using the same arguments; only for church, read denomination. We must keep the denomination pure! We must keep out heresy, i. e. the opinion of the minority; and although God has said his Bible is PERFECT for this very purpose, we say, No. We want a creed to boot. And is not this just the same as it was when Rome said it? Was saint-worship any better than demon-worship? Is denomination creed-power any better than Catholic creed-power?

5. Especially when we consider that the Protestant Church is making progress towards the same results; a virtual prohibition of the Bible—progress more silent, but more rapid. Let one fact suffice.

When the Westminster Assembly of divines formed their Confession and Catechisms, it was proposed by the Scots Commissioners, that the answers of the shorter catechism should be subscribed by the members of that body, the proposal was rejected after discussion, as an unwarrantable imposition; and not for forty years was subscription made a test of ministerial standing. Three hundred and twenty-five years were necessary to protestant denomination, only forty years to turn what their own Assembly scouted as an unwarrantable imposition, into an iron rule.

This shows the rapid movement of Protestant apostacy. At this rate, how long before the ultimatum? Do you say it is impossible that creeds such as ours, in the hands of such good men, such holy men, so busy in spreading the Bible every where, can yet result in the prohibition of that Bible?

I answer that the Nicene creed was as good as our creed, and the Nicene Fathers as holy men; but they ended in a prohibition of the Bible. So shall we, unless we stop short: yea, even though it should rain Bibles. For,

6. The creed system is now exerting upon the clergy of the Protestant churches, a secret, unsuspected, but tremendous power against the Bible—a power of fear. Yes, while it professes to venerate and defend the Bible it is virtually undermining it. That is always Satan's way. He revived pagan worship in the midst of men who were fierce against it. How? He cheated them! He baptised. They thought it was pious. So do we. Busy in fighting Rome, wide awake to see she does not snatch our Bibles and burn them, we are yet letting him cheat us out of them in a new way, a pious way. We do not see him.

Oh, that God might unscale our eyes before it is too late! or our Bible will be dead and buried and hope lost! Do you ask me to explain this mystery? How they are ushered on the stage?

They generally go from the bosom of the family to college, without seeing the world at all. There they are secluded for four years, which seems in after life like an elysian dream. Thence they step directly into the Theological Seminary; and thence, after three years more of seclusion, into the pulpit.

What chance have they to know the world? All they have known is HOME, and seven years' sequestered study. What do they know of business? What do they know of men and things, and the stern struggles of life? They go forth, in a majority of cases, babes in worldly wisdom; rich, perhaps, in literary lore, in piety and purity; but ah! wholly unaccustomed to buffet the wild world's waves. The severest crisis of their whole life is, when they are beginning the lesson of practical life.—They are dependent, hopelessly dependent on their profession. Like new-fledged birds, they have never fairly tried their wings. Sensitive, sincere, timorous, naturally anxious for success, in suspense, the least professional failure strikes like a knell at their heart.

I have heard my father say, that when a situation was first offered him, he felt as though if he failed in that, he never should have another chance as long as he lived. And all this you will perceive is but the natural effect of their training. Now, what sort of an ordeal is prepared for them in society? i. e. religious society, for they know no other. Let us see.

The religious world has what is called a public sentiment of its own, and this is formed chiefly by the great evangelical denominations. Other denominations are, owing to their paucity of numbers, less perceived. By one or the other of these denominations, the first fact is, the young candidate is to be licensed; for public sentiment has settled that an unlicensed preacher is no preacher at all. He must have a license, then; all his hopes centre on that. But there is not one of these great evangelical denominations from which he can get license, unless he will subscribe to the creed of that denomination. In other words, the Protestant evangelical denominations have so tied up one another's hands and their own, that, between them all a man cannot become a preacher at all, any where, without accepting some book besides the Bible.

It is true each denomination says, 'We inflict no penalty—we only decline to receive into our ranks one who does not agree with us.' And this is so specious, it sounds so reasonable that it might deceive the very elect; but it is the most consummate stroke of infernal craft and doubly-dissipated jesuitism.

It is like Rome, handing over the victims of the Inquisition to the civil arm, charging it to do no harm, and then piously lauding her own lamb-like disposition. It is true, the denominations do not do the candidate any harm, they only silently leave him to his inevitable fate.

Unlicensed, without moral affinities with the minor sects, alone, before he has formed the self-sustaining habits of a man, before he has yet tried his armor, self-distrustful, generally poor, often in debt, inexperienced, he finds an invisible, intangible Power has entangled and enveloped him in complicate, writhing folds. The frown of society is upon him, public sentiment is against him—the public sentiment of good men, yea, of the best and most devoted! He is whispered to be unsound, unsafe, heretical. He is called by every sectarian name most frightful to ears evangelical right or wrong; and yet nobody does it. He is smitten; he looks here and there, behind and before; he can see nobody. And thus he is politely, and respectfully, and silently, and invisibly crushed. He is in the religious world what a broken down candidate is in the political, dead.

Now, there never was a torture of the Inquisition more exquisitely suited to extort conformity from an agonized victim. Not the body, but the mind is on the rack. Every most noble feeling is tried to the utmost. His natural need of livelihood, his care of family and of friends, his sense of reputation, his honest ambition, his tastes, his intellectual habits, his hopes of usefulness, yea, the very inmost, sacred emotions of his devotional experience, are here taken hold of—in the dark—by an unseen, relentless, truthless hand—and are wrung, and racked, and wrenched to the last extreme of mental torture. And there is no eye to pity, no arm to save. The public will not hear him. He is nobody; an outcast, a madman.

Thus, my friends, is the penalty which good men out of good motives unconsciously, yet really, are proposing to the eyes of every candidate for the ministry—this intense spiritual martyrdom. During seven years it stares him in the face, during the whole forming-time of his opinions. And for what?

For daring to say, 'I do not receive your creed as containing the system of doctrines contained in the Bible,'—for daring to say what God has said, 'With that Bible alone I am perfect, thoroughly furnished unto all good works.' For repeating and holding on upon this declaration of God, he falls a spiritual martyr. And is not that an apostacy, then, that martyrs him? And is not the Protestant church apostate? Oh remember, the final form of the apostacy shall rise, not by Rome's aggressive march; not by the Pope's long arm, outstretched to snatch our Bible; not by crosses, processions, baubles. We understand all that. Apostacy never comes on the outside. It developes. It is an apostacy that shall spring into life within us; an apostacy that shall martyr a man who believes his Bible ever so holy; yea, who may even believe what the creed contains, but may happen to agree with the Westminster Assembly, that proposed as a test, it is an unwarrantable imposition! That is the apostacy we have to fear, and is it not already formed?

Accept the Bible and the book, and you may put your own private construction on both, as every one does. Accept the Bible, and put your own private construction on that—the great paw of the Beast is upon you. This is what I called taking the Bible out of the hands of the ministry.

Will it be said that these fears are imaginary? Imaginary! Did not the Rev. John M. Duncan of Baltimore, in the year 1825-6 or thereabouts, sincerely believe the Bible? Did he not even believe substantially the confession of faith? And was he not, for daring to say what the Westminster Assembly said, that to require the reception of that Creed as a test of ministerial qualification, was an unwarrantable imposition, brought to trial, condemned, excommunicated, and the pulpit declared vacant?

There is nothing imaginary in the statement that the Creed power is now beginning to prohibit the Bible as really as Rome did, though in a subtler way. During the whole course of seven years' study, the Protestant candidate for the ministry sees before him an authorized statement, spiked down and stereotyped, of what he must find in the Bible, or be martyred. And does any one, acquainted with human nature, need be told that he studies under a tremendous pressure of motive? Is that freedom of opinion?—the liberty wherewith Christ maketh free? Rome would have given that. Every one of her clergy might have studied the Bible to find there Pontifical creed on pain of death. Was that liberty?

Hence I say, that liberty of opinion in our Theological Seminaries, is a mere form. To say nothing of the thumb-screw of criticism, by which every original mind is tortured into negative propriety, the whole boasted liberty of the student consists in a choice of chains—a choice of handcuffs—whether he will wear the Presbyterian handcuff, or the Methodist, Baptist, Episcopal, or other Evangelical handcuff. Hence it has secretly come to pass that the ministry themselves dare not study their Bibles. Large portions thereof are seldom touched. It lies useless lumber; or if they do study and search, they dare not show their people what they find there. There is something criminal in saying anything now. It is shocking to utter words that have not the mould of age upon them.

For through the ministry the same spirit has been conducted to the people. The same penalties hang over them. The demonstrations are so nearly balanced, the strife for power is so keen between them, that every fancied departure from that creed, is seized to make political capital, as really as in any political campaign. Houses must be built; salaries must be raised. This requires wealth. Wealth requires numbers and patronage. This creates a servile dread of novelty, for every thing that another party can get hold of, strikes at the gold. Therefore, the people watch their minister, and the minister is afraid of his people. For if he studies independently, if he goes outside of the book, if he slips the handcuff, the people tremble—it will not please—the opposition will seize it—we shall be unpopular—we shall not succeed!

Oh, woful day! Oh, unhappy church of Christ! Fast rushing round and round the fatal circle of absorbing ruin! Thou sayest I am rich and increased in goods, and have need of nothing; and knowest not that thou art poor, and miserable, and blind, and naked! Thus are the ministry of the Evangelical, protestant denominations, not only formed all the way up, under a tremendous pressure of merely human fear, but they live, and move, breathe, in a state of things radically corrupt, and appealing every hour to every baser element of their nature, to hush up the truth, and bow the knee to the power of apostacy.

Dinly does every one now and then see that things are going wrong. With sighs does every true heart confess that rottenness is some where, but ah, it is hopeless of reform. We all pass on, and the tide rolls down to Night.

The time has come when men having itching ears, and forms of godliness without the power, are heaping to themselves teachers, when they will not endure sound doctrine, but are turned aside unto fables. And the whole has come about stealthily, nobody knows how, among good men, out of good motives!

Was not this the way things went with Rome? Are we not living her life over again? And what do we see just ahead? Another General Council! A World's Convention! Evangelical Alliance and Universal Creed!

And what then is to be done? I know not what others may say, but if ever I shrink from declaring that the Bible, the whole Bible, and nothing but the Bible, is the perfect and thorough furniture of the Christian minister and the Christian Church, then may my right hand forget her cunning and my tongue cleave unto the roof of my mouth.

Brethren, you see the standard that has been unfurled this day. What will you do? It is the standard of the Cross. It is the banner of the Spirit of the Lord! Rally around it. Away with your fears of other denominations! Away with false policy! Rally around this central principle, look to the Lord, and you are impregnable. The waves of the coming conflict which is to convulse Christendom to her centre, are beginning to be felt. The deep heavens begin to swell beneath us. 'All the old signs fail.' 'God answers no more by Urim and Thummim, nor by dream, nor by prophet' Men's hearts are failing them for fear, and for looking after those things that are coming upon the earth. Thunders mutter in the distance. Winds moan across the surging bosom of the deep. All things betide the rising of that final storm of divine indignation which shall sweep away the vain refuges of lies. When 'the Lord shall cause his glorious voice to be heard, and shall show the lightning down his arm, with the indignation of his anger, and with the flame of devouring fire; with scatterings, and tempests, and hail-stones;' in that day what shall save us? For judgment will begin at the house of God. What shall be our defence? Put your trust in Him, whose eyes are as a flame of fire, on whose head are many crowns, whose name is called THE WORD OF GOD! For 'behold! a king shall reign in righteousness, and princes rule in judgment, and A MAN shall be as a hiding-place from the wind, and a covert from the tempest!' Even so, Lord Jesus! Come quickly! AMEN.

Concluding Reflections on the Visions of Daniel.

BY T. R. URSE, M. A.
FELLOW OF TRINITY COLLEGE, CAMBRIDGE, ENGLAND.

DAN. II. 27.—"The king answered unto Daniel and said, Of a truth it is that your God is a God of gods, and a Lord of kings, and a revealer of secrets, seeing that you couldst reveal this secret."
VIII. 25.—"Hitherto is the end of the matter. As for me, Daniel, my cogitations much troubled me, and my countenance changed in me; but I kept the matter in my heart."

The later prophecies of the New Testament fill up with an ampler detail the outline of these two visions, and supply still further and fuller light in illustration of God's wonderful Providence. But even the three maxims named already, and which result from the most general survey of these visions, are rich in spiritual instruction to every Christian mind. They are the first elements in all the philosophy of history that deserves the name. Unlike the dreams of the infidel theorist, they light up the secret depths of the heart of man, while they anchor our hopes on the covenant of God.

Read in the light drawn from these prophecies, how rich and various a field of thought will the history of the world open before the eye of the Christian! For now he can realize the presence of God amidst all its changes. Babylon, and Persia, Greece and Rome; the conquests of Cæsar, the downfall of Augustulus; the Gothic devastations, the times of feudal anarchy, and all the changing alliances of later times, are now seen to lie open under the eye of God, and to be the steps foreappointed, by His wisdom, to prepare the way for his own blessed kingdom. A new source of interest now enters into every record of the past. We feel and know that here the most high God has been working out a part of his own counsels. We feel it, not with the cold assent extorted by an abstract doctrine we dare not deny—but with the lively conviction paid to a truth, of which the evidence is before our eyes. Here is Rome, the head of the fourth empire, still in being, and still the centre of a power ceaseless in its activity, and unbounded in its claims. Here are still the divided kingdoms of the West, with their perpetual variety of alliance and intermarriage, and with a jealous rivalry of independent power, not less perpetual and unchanging. The landscape revealed by the Holy Spirit twenty-five centuries ago, in the court of Babylon, has risen into being, and answers in every part, to the portraiture which He had drawn. And hence we gather, with a full assurance of faith, the lesson taught the proud monarch in the hour of his abasement, that 'the Most High is ruling amidst the kingdoms of men, and giveth them to whomsoever He will.'

And how does this one truth grow into deeper interest when the Christian learns to unite it with the other truths of the same word! He who is thus present, and ordering all things around us, is the living God, the Creator of all things, and for whose pleasure they are and were created. He who rules amidst the kingdoms of men, is the God of Abraham, who still to the latest age remembers his covenant, and looks with compassionate love on His outcast and rebellious people. The presence which meets us, wherever we turn, in the page of Grecian or Roman History, is the presence of that Son of God who bare the sins of men in his own body on the tree. And thus, as we meditate on the words of the vision, we may rise into the delightful assurance that love, holy love, is around us on every side. The thought of our Christian poet is beautiful, and beautifully expressed, that the presence of Christ may be seen in all the works of nature, and that there is no flower which marks the unrivalled pencil of that Savior who was crowned with thorns for our redemption. But these visions lead us to a higher attainment, and teach us a still harder lesson. They enable us to realize the presence of redeeming Love, not merely in the scenes of natural beauty, but in the artificial scenes of courts and senates, amidst the horrors of war and bloodshed, and through ages darkened with anarchy, violence, and crime. All are parts in this sure counsel of the Most High. The Son of God presides over the whole, and while he causes the wrath of man to praise him, is hastening, amidst the seeming confusion, his own kingdom of righteousness, peace and joy.

The second main truth which these visions disclose is not less important to the Christian, as a key to the right use of all his researches into history. There is a constant tendency in the heart to sink to the level of those examples and maxims which are most frequently in view. All history thus partakes, in some degree, of the character which the apostle ascribes to the word of God. It is a mirror which, while we gaze into it, changes us gradually into the likeness of the objects it reveals. The warrior inflames there his military ardor, while he traces the campaigns of Alexander, or Hannibal, or Cæsar; and, like Trajan, kindles at the sight with a dangerous emulation, destructive to the peace of other ages. The poet awakens all the energies of his slumbering powers, while he muses on the fane, or the writings, of all the great masters of song. Every age of history, when made the object of continual study, has a surprising power to stamp the mind with its own image, and to transfuse its own spirit, whether warlike or luxurious, whether romantic or refined, into the bosom of the reader. And if it be true, alas, that the prevailing tone of thought has always been evil, it is evident that a great and serious danger must ensue.

But here, again, the prophecy interposes its shield; and, like Elisha's cruise, turns the very source of infection into a wholesome fountain of Divine and spiritual wisdom. For here we learn to look upon history in the light of heaven. The deceptive veil of sophistry or worldly expedience is torn away. The corruption of man is seen in its true light, and illustrates more brightly the grace and long-suffering of God. The conquests, which awakened before a sinful emulation, are now disenchanted, and become only the ravaging of a beast of prey. The physical, the merely intellectual, becomes nothing; the moral, the spiritual, becomes every thing in our view. The religion of pomp and splendor, though graced by architecture, and music, and royalty, and popular acclamation, if love and holiness be wanting, is seen to be only a refined idolatry, that will lead on quickly to persecution and open ungodliness. The past is stripped of its false and deceitful coloring; that our thoughts may rest, with more earnest longing of desire, on the true and undecent glory of Messiah's kingdom.

Clothed in the armor which this truth supplies to him, the Christian will be shielded from delusion on the right hand and on the left. When the spirit of superstition would revive its pretensions, and entangle him in a thick cloud of ecclesiastical forms and shadows, he will gaze here on the inspired record, and forbear to look for his standard or search for his authorities, in those ages which saw the predicted rise of the apostasy, and the first triumphs of the little horn. When a liberal philosophy, falsely so called, would allure him with its specious, but infidel boasting, and lead him to look for the world's regeneration by the triumphs of the popular will, he will consult these faithful oracles once more, and be undeceived. Here he will learn that, even till the last vial of judgment, rebellion and ungodliness will abound; and that it is not by the triumph of a godless liberty, but by its final overthrow, and sore judgment on the rebellious, that truth and righteousness will at length prevail in the earth. And thus in the conflict of principles, which every day becomes more intense, he will find these holy prophecies to be 'the armor of righteousness on the right hand and on the left,' to shield him from opposite dangers, and preserve him in the straight path of Christian integrity and wisdom.

But, most of all, these visions will aid us in the right improvement of all history, by infusing a new element of hope and joy. 'The stone became a great mountain and filled the whole earth.' 'The saints shall possess the kingdom for ever and ever.' Here, in a few words, the final issue of the whole drama of Providence is clearly revealed. And how delightful is the prospect—righteousness, peace and joy, triumphant over sin, universally diffused, immortal and everlasting!

Now it is plain that a hope like this, distinctly and firmly realized, will shed an influence backward on the whole range of past history. The Christian will now see that the providence of God, like the Divine law, is a shadow of good things to come. Whatever he finds in its whole course, pure, lovely, and of good report, he will carefully sever in thought from the surrounding evil, and cherish it as a grateful earnest of the future blessing. If his eye rests on bright examples of holy zeal, and self-denying affection, on the patience of martyrs, or the zeal of apostles, or quiet and tender forms of domestic love, he will use them to raise his conceptions of the world to come, where all these separate rills of joy and holiness shall meet together; where every Christian grace shall be fully expanded, and earth and heaven shall be blended in one delightful fellowship of love, and that for ever.

Such, then, will be the lessons on the use of history which the Christian will derive from these visions, and such the spirit in which they will lead him to meditate on all the past. Every where they will reveal to him the Almighty God, controlling, directing, and overruling all things by the word of His power. Every where they will be present with him as a Divine antidote to the spirit of the world; will reveal its unsuspected corruptions, and unmask all the delusive semblances and shows of earthly greatness. In the view of each past event, they will animate him afresh to hope and prayer. They will teach him to see, in every form of evil, a shadow that will soon disappear; and, in every form of truth and holiness, a seed that will presently blossom into eternal beauty in the kingdom of God.

Voice of Truth & Glad Tidings

"The wise shall understand."

ROCHESTER, FEBRUARY 10, 1847.

Delinquents.

Agreeably to notice given last week, we have erased from our books the names of about three hundred professedly paying subscribers, but who were each indebted from $2 to $7; making the whole sum $872, 30. We have not discontinued these papers because the persons to whom they have been sent have not paid, but because they have not let us hear from them. Had they written to us that they could not pay, we would most cheerfully have balanced their accounts, and continued the paper to them free of charge. And should any of the worthy poor desire it on these terms now, by informing us their requests shall be cheerfully complied with. If they are poor and cannot pay, it will be all the same. All we want is to know that the paper is read, and is doing good.

Time of the Second Advent.

NO. VII.

Having shown, as we think, conclusively, in our former numbers, especially the last two, that 'nigh even at the door' is the only Bible position on the time of the second advent of Christ, the next thing in order is, to enquire whether the testimony in the case warrants the conclusion that we are now occupying this fearful position. Let it be remembered that thus far in this discussion, the leading object of our enquiries has been, not so much to know whether the time of the advent is now actually near, but to show that 'nigh, even at the door' is the only position which the Bible ever has warranted, now does, or ever will warrant being taken on the time of the second advent. Our object now is to show from an overwhelming amount of infallible testimony, as infallible as the word of God is true, and stubborn facts are immutable, that we are now actually living at the fearful moment when the coming of our long absent Lord is emphatically nigh, even at the door!

The first testimony which we shall adduce in support of this position is, the signs named by the Savior, in Matt. xxiv. 29-33, and the corresponding texts in the gospels by Mark and Luke. It will do each lover of the truth good to carefully read again this familiar yet important testimony, as recorded by these three faithful historians. Matthew says:

"Immediately after the tribulation of those days shall the sun be darkened, and the moon shall not give her light, and the stars shall fall from heaven, and the powers of the heavens shall be shaken.

And then shall appear the sign of the Son of man in heaven: and then shall all the tribes of the earth mourn, and they shall see the Son of man coming in the clouds of heaven, with power and great glory. And he shall send his angels with a great sound of a trumpet; and they shall gather together his elect from the four winds, from one end of heaven to the other.

Now learn a parable of the fig-tree: When his branch is yet tender, and putteth forth leaves, ye know that summer is nigh: so, likewise ye, when ye shall see all these things, know that it is near, even at the doors."

In Mark's record it reads:

"But in those days, after that tribulation, the sun shall be darkened, and the moon shall not give her light; and the stars of heaven shall fall, and the powers that are in heaven shall be shaken.

And then shall they see the Son of man coming in the clouds, with great power and glory. And then shall he send his angels, and shall gather together his elect from the four winds, from the uttermost part of earth, to the uttermost part of heaven.

Now learn a parable of the fig-tree: When her branch is yet tender, and putteth forth leaves, ye know that summer is near: so ye in like manner, when ye shall see these things come to pass, know that it is nigh, even at the doors." xiii. 24-29.

Luke records it thus:

"And there shall be signs in the sun, and in the moon, and in the stars; and upon the earth distress of nations, with perplexity; the sea and the waves roaring; men's hearts failing them for fear, and for looking after those things which are coming on the earth: for the powers of heaven shall be shaken.

And then shall they see the Son of man coming in a cloud with power and great glory.

And when these things begin to come to pass, then look up, and lift up your heads; for your redemption draweth nigh.

And he spake to them a parable; Behold the fig-tree, and all the trees; when they now shoot forth, ye see and know of your own selves that summer is now nigh at hand. So likewise ye, when ye see these things come to pass, know ye that the kingdom of God is nigh at hand." xxi. 25-31.

Dr. Campbell's translation sheds some light, we think, on this highly interesting testimony. We will therefore give it on Luke xxi. 25-31.

"And there shall be signs in the sun, and in the moon, and in the stars; and upon the earth the anguish of desponding nations; and roarings in the seas and floods; men expiring with the fear and apprehension of those things which are coming upon the world; for the powers of heaven shall be shaken.

Then they shall see the Son of Man coming in a cloud with great glory and power.

Now when these things begin to be fulfilled, look up and lift up your heads, because your deliverance approacheth.

He proposed to them also this comparison:—Consider the fig-tree, and the other trees. When ye observe them shooting forth, ye know of yourselves that the summer is nigh. Know ye in like manner, when ye shall see these events, that the reign of God is nigh."

This testimony indisputably teaches us, 1st. That certain signs were to be given as sure harbingers of the appearing of the Son of man. And 2d. That when those signs were all seen, then the appearing of the Son of man would as surely be nigh, even at the door, as that summer is nigh when the fig-tree puts forth its leaves in the spring.—There can be no dispute on these points. But the question on which a difference of opinion exists, is, Have those signs actually been seen? We contend that they have, from the undeniable facts that the sun was 'darkened,' and the moon did 'not give her light,' in May A. D. 1780, and the stars did 'fall from heaven' in 1833, just as this testimony, and that given by John, Rev. vi. 12, 13, clearly predicts.

That the sun was darkened, that the moon did not give her light, and that the stars, or luminous bodies, did fall from heaven, at the time we have named, every body now admits, consequently it would be superfluous to offer evidence to prove it: and it would be a waste of labor and time to do it. The question in dispute is, Have the real signs predicted by the Savior actually been seen? We unhesitatingly say they have. And

(1.) From the consideration that the facts in the case literally fulfil the prediction given. All will readily admit that the rise and fall of the Babylonian, Medo-Persian, Grecian and Roman empires are subjects of prophecy; and the first advent, and a great many other things, too numerous to name here.—

Well, how would you prove the fulfilment of these prophecies? You are ready to answer, By comparing them with historical facts to which they refer. That is right. In this way you would infallibly prove that the wonderful prophecies concerning Babylon, Medo-Persia, Grecia, and Imperial Rome, the first advent of Christ, the rise, and twelve hundred and sixty years bloody reign, of Rome Papal, and many other equally accurate prophecies, have all been most strictly fulfilled. You could not be made to believe otherwise. You would plant your feet upon the immutable facts in the case, and say, I know from such testimony as this, viz; stubborn facts, that these prophecies are fulfilled. Well, can we not do the same in reference to the Savior's prediction relative to the signs of his coming? Most certainly we can. We can say, without fear of contradiction, we know his word has proved true in this case, from the undeniable and well known facts, that the sun has been darkened, the moon also, and the stars have fallen, as the Lord predicted they would, and consequently his coming is now nigh, even at the door.

(2.) Prophecy is never fulfilled but once. These signs have been seen once, consequently the prophecy which predicted them is fulfilled, and the conclusion is unavoidable that the appearing of the Son of man in the clouds of heaven, with power and great glory, is nigh, even at the door.

We say that no prophecy is ever fulfilled but once. We wish to impress this truth upon every mind: for some advent believers doubt here. Or in other words, they are looking for these signs to be repeated, or to appear again before it can be known that the coming of the Lord is nigh, even at the door. They admit that the sun and moon were darkened, and that the stars did fall, but not in so striking a manner as they think the prophecy warrants them to expect. But ask them to tell how the darkness of the sun and moon, and falling of the stars, could more literally fulfil the prophecy, and be signs of the advent near, and they are dumb. The fact is, it is unbelief that causes any one to look for these signs in the future, or to be repeated. They have been seen once, and will never be seen again as tokens of the coming of the Lord being near. The unerring word which predicted them has been strictly fulfilled once, and we have no more reason to expect that it will be fulfilled the second time, than any other fulfilled prophecy. As well might we call for the rise and fall of the four universal empires, of Daniel's prophecy, the second time, in order to fulfil that wonderful prophecy, as to call for these signs again, in order to fulfil the Word which foretells them.—In a word, it would be no more absurd to call for a second fulfilment of the prophecies which relate to the first advent of Christ, and every other fulfilled prophecy, than to ask for a repetition of the signs.

Supposing these signs should be repeated, would those who now reject them believe? No: it would only serve to strengthen their scepticism. They would then have cause to say, These things are no evidence that the end is near; for they have been seen twice, and may be seen many times more for aught we know.—At any rate they cannot be subjects of prophecy: for prophecy is never fulfilled but once, and what the fanatical call the signs have been seen twice or many times. Thus might the unbeliever justly reason, if these signs should appear the second time. But no one can now justly reason thus. It is true some have vainly tried to do so; but stubborn facts have confounded them, at every hazardous step they have impudently taken. Those facts yet stand recorded on the clear and open pages of the history of these last days of wonders. Facts, as immutable as the throne of the Highest, which stand as living monuments of the truth of the word of the Son of God, and as sure evidences that his second glorious appearing is nigh, even at the door. In view of these things let unbelief forever depart from every mind—and let faith, unwavering faith, take hold on this unailing testimony, and rejoice in the blessed assurance of soon seeing Him whose coming these signs most certainly proclaim to be at the door.

There are some other important thoughts connected with this part of our subject which must be deferred for another number. Let what we have already said be carefully compared with the word of the Lord, and the facts in the case. But above all other considerations, we do most solemnly entreat all to be ready for the fearful crisis, the coming of the Son of man, which cannot be far distant.

HAVE ME EXCUSED.

"I pray thee have me excused," has been the petition of many a professor of godliness, when urged to duty, especially when pecuniary interest has been concerned in the matter. The great mass of religionists of this day excuse themselves from the work of benevolence, without costing them, in the way of cash, or its equivalent, one single penny. Another large portion are, or think they are excused from duty in this case, on the condition of paying a mere trifle.

The case is like this; God's worthy poor, our own brethren need help. The case is presented before the family. All see that the demand is just and urgent. But instead of cheerfully enquiring how much the afflicted Brother or Sister needs, many go to work to ease their own conscience by paying as little as possible, and perhaps nothing at all. In effect, they buy themselves off from this work of charity, of benevolence. One seems to say, I can be excused from this work for this small sum, another for half that amount—another for six pence, some for a penny, and many by foolishly saying, I am not able to do anything now. While a few, instead of buying themselves off from the case for a mere trifle, or nothing at all, interest themselves in the matter, make the case their own, and never consider themselves discharged from it until the wants of their poor brother or sister are reasonably supplied. Such benevolent souls will be greeted by the Savior when he comes, with the heavenly welcome, "*come ye blessed of my Father—*forasmuch as ye have done it unto the least of these my brethren, ye have done it unto me, enter thou into the joy of thy Lord." While the others, covetous ones, those who have prayed to be excused in this case for a small sum, or nothing at all, will be confounded with the awful sentence, Depart, for I know you not!

Never pray to be excused, or never try to buy yourself off from such works of benevolence, if you would be happy here, and share in the incorruptible inheritance in the world to come. None will have a right there who is not a child of God; and no one is a true child of God unless he loves his brother, and that love must be, not in word and tongue only, but in DEED and TRUTH. Oh, how many are deficient here. And what makes the case still more painful is, their covetousness, their love of the world, blinds them to their own wretched condition. The Lord open their eyes to see their poverty, that they may, by a proper use of the mammon of unrighteousness, or this world's goods, secure to themselves the true riches; or by obeying the Lord in this respect, secure his divine favor.

We speak not because we are in want—but in behalf of the worthy minister who labors for you, his lonely and needy family, and the destitute poor around you. Your religion is all a deception unless it will open tride your heart, your purse, your granary, your cellar, and all your deposits, to the wants of these your brethren.

Deep Affliction.

Br. and Sister Tanner, of Buffalo, have recently been called to pass through deep afflictions. Two of their little sons have been suddenly cut down by the hand of death, and at the last accounts another member of their family was dangerously ill. The disease, we believe, is the croup. Br. Pearson has spent several days in Buffalo, to administer the word of comfort in this hour of sorrow and mourning, as Br. Porter during the time, and for some time past has been quite ill. Br. Pearson, or some other one, will we trust, soon furnish the particulars of this painful dispensation.

May God raise the sick to health, if it be his will; comfort the hearts of those who mourn the loss of their children, with the blessed hope "that their work shall be rewarded; for there is hope in their end; for they shall come again from the land of the enemy.— Therefore refrain thy voice from weeping, and thine eyes from tears," ye bereaved ones. Soon this glorious promise will be fulfilled, when the pious and innocent ones, whom death has parted here, will meet in that better country, where there "shall be no more death, but eternal life, and uninterrupted joy. Therefore, rejoice ye who now weep.

Mr. C. Beecher's Sermon.

We have no apology for occupying so much room as we have in this number, with the Sermon from Charles Beecher, son of Dr. Lyman Beecher. Read it, every word of it, and thank God that the cause of truth, of the Bible, has so able an advocate; but more deeply mourn that the protestant church has so far departed from the principles of that abused Book, and has so nearly patterned after the Mother of harlots, in the work of apostasy. With the truths of this invaluable sermon before any one, we cannot see how he can for a moment entertain the delusive hope of the conversion of the world to Bible Christianity by the influence of the protestant sects.

☞ A correspondent wishes some one to reconcile Zach. 8: 14, with Rev. 21: 1. He says "Zachariah has Seas brought to view in that day, and the Revelator says, there was no more Sea." As we cannot examine these texts now, we request some other one who can to do it. We love to see brethren searching their Bibles, when they are actuated by the motive which moved the noble Bereans to this praise worthy act, viz: "to see whether these things were so." But when merely speculative motives influence us, we may search the sacred word to our own hurt. Let truth, for the truth's sake, ever be the object of our enquiries and investigations, and we shall not search the Scriptures in vain; true wisdom will be our invaluable reward.

The Souls of the Dead Conscious.

The article bearing this title, in this number, we cheerfully publish, not because we endorse the sentiment it advocates, but because we think it right to give both sides of this question a candid hearing.— We make no reply to Br. Lathrop, because other duties now claim our attention. Perhaps Br. Needham, or Br. B. Morley, or both, will feel at liberty to give us the light of the Bible on this subject.

To CORRESPONDENTS.—Several valuable and some lengthy communications are necessarily deferred in order to give place to the valuable Sermon of Chs. Beecher. Our correspondents will not complain at this, especially when we assure them that their communications shall appear soon.

'Men ought to be more considerate in writing than in speaking, because a rash and indiscreet word may be corrected presently; but that which is written can no more be denied or amended, but with infamy.'

"Be not Conformed to this World."

The part of the subject most deeply impressed upon my mind, is, that which relates to adorning with ornamental and costly array, not only of women professing godliness, but also men. I know it is often said, "It is no matter what our habilitment is, if the heart be not set upon it." But, does not the heart dictate in this matter? If, professing to be strangers and pilgrims here, we settle down in the fashions and customs of the world, where is our influence? is it on the Lord's side, drawing perishing mortals to the fountain of life? or is the power of the holy people scattered, divided, tending to strengthen the hands of the wicked, and drive unbelievers farther from God? Alas! they consider us either insincere in our professions, or inconsistent in our practices.— They express great astonishment at our being so 'particular about arraying our persons and furnishing our houses, if we are, as we profess, seeking a heavenly country, and expecting soon to enter the beautiful city with gates of pearl and streets paved with gold.' I have heard these and similar remarks with anguish of heart, without being able to offer a word in vindication of the accused. And while they have occasion to cherish such opinions of us, we cannot, I think, exert a salutary influence over them.

Another very serious consideration is, by conforming to the fashions of the world, we deprive ourselves of the means to fulfil the requirements of the gospel—"Do good, and communicate," not only to our particular friends, but when "distributing to the necessity of saints, if your enemy hunger feed him," and, "as we have opportunity, let us do good unto all, especially unto them who are of the household of faith." Oh, could we once have a view of the vast amount of suffering which, by self-denial, we might be enabled to prevent, would we ever again desire to gratify the "lust of the eyes and the pride of life"? Let all things be done decently and in order, is a requirement of the gospel; and can it not be complied with and much expense saved? O that our affections were set on things above—not on earth. Let us, who profess to be followers of Him who pleased not himself, not seek to please himself, but God. Let us not spare Agag, and the best of the flocks, (our most darling sins) and destroy only the "vile and the refuse," for we are commanded to destroy all. Let us put away all our goodly Babylonish garments and wedges of gold, and adorn ourselves with good works; for we can no more stand before the enemy, with those forbidden things in our tents, than could the Israelites of old.

Can the children of the Most High employ their time, minds, and money, in adorning their "vile bodies," while the Macedonian cry is sounding through the land, and many, whom the 'Holy Ghost hath called to the work,' are prevented by the lack of pecuniary aid (and some of them, I fear, at the peril of their souls) from devoting themselves to the ministry of the gospel? My heart is pained at the view of these things; and when I read the lamentations of these error-stricken souls, I am led to cry, in the bitterness of my soul, "Is it time for you, O ye, to dwell in your ceiled houses," with your superabundance in store, while the watchman whom the Lord hath set upon the walls, and bid not hold their peace—men 'after God's own heart,' with spirits soaring above this vain world, and hearts breaking with the longing they have to break the bread of life to their fellow-mortals—are necessitated 'to dig' for their bread, and for the sustenance of their families? But, say some, "It is better for ministers to labor a portion of the time; exercise is beneficial to health. Truly, 'bodily exercise profiteth little;" and what faithful minister of Christ is exempt from exercise to considerable amount, in the performance of his duties? Besides, that the intense mental labor and wrestling in spirit of those who truly fear, love, and honor God, is exceedingly diminishing to physical strength and health, is abundantly testified, not only in word, but by the various diseases and premature deaths of many of the most devoted servants of God.

O that the stewards of the Lord's money might realize the great necessity that at present exists, for efficient laborers in the field, to keep awake the active, arouse the slumbering, and alarm the careless; and that it is necessary, in these perilous times, for the minister to give himself wholly to the ministry, that his profiting may appear to all, as it was in the days of the Apostles. May it be considered, too, that the Lord's watchmen are men of like infirmities as other men; many of them possessing frail constitutions and feeble health, need other relaxation from their toil than labor with their hands; and "the laborer is worthy of his hire."

Let us give heed to the admonition of the Apostle to those who "have ministered to the saints, and do minister, to shew the same diligence to the full assurance of hope unto the end."

To the dear heralds of the cross, I would say, Go forth in the name of your Master, trusting in Israel's God, praying him to sustain your helpless little ones; and let the declaration of the aged Psalmist solace your aching hearts—"I have never seen the righteous forsaken, nor his seed begging bread." Though ye have not "two coats," and are necessitated to wrap yourselves in sackcloth, to screen you from the inclemency of the season, "go; and as ye go, preach, saying, The kingdom of heaven is at hand." Let not your preaching be of enticing words of men's wisdom, but in demonstration of the spirit and of power, "then shall your feet be beautiful upon the mountains as you bring good tidings of good, and publish peace and salvation to captive exiles; and may you strengthen the things that remain, and pluck some souls as brands from the burning, that shall be brilliant stars in your crown of rejoicing. O that we may be found with our work done, when the cheering mandate shall go forth from our God, "Gather my saints unto me, those that have made a covenant with me by sacrifice."

Souls of the Dead Conscious.

I notice under your date of the 9th of September and under an inviting caption, an attempt of a poet to burlesque the truth of God on the subject of the soul's condition betwixt natural death and the day of judgment. And as I have noticed no repulsion of the error, I wish you to present a few testimonies on the subject; the design of which is, to prove, 1st. That the soul or spirit of man does not become unconscious of its own existence (like the body) at death. 2d. That the personality of the deceased is designated or recognized by the soul just as it is by the body, when we say this person is dead. 3d. That the person leaving this world by death, enters on an eternal consciousness of divine approbation and enjoyment, or of guilt, condemnation and misery. Job, (xiv. 14,) speaking of the resurrection of his dead body, saith, 'All the days of my appointed time will I wait till my change come!' But waiting is expressive of knowledge, motive and action; neither of which are the dead capable of. (Ecc. ix. 5, 10.) Therefore Job knew that his soul was destined to live when his body was returned to the dust of which it was formed (Gen. ii. 7.)— 'And the Lord God formed man of the dust of the ground, and breathed into his nostrils the breath of life, and man became a living soul.' The soul or spirit was not formed of the dust, but received its existence from the breath of God and was designedly rendered self-conscious of its intelligent existence, whether in the body or out of it. Hence it is written, (Ecc. xii. 7) 'then shall the dust return to the earth as it was, and the spirit shall return unto God who gave it.' This text is a simple testimony of the separate condition of the spirit from the body at death, and of the superiority of the spirit of man to the spirit of the beast, which goeth downward to the earth. See Ecc. iii. 21. The notion that the soul becomes unconscious at death has no foundation in revelation, but is abundantly provided against. The promises made to the souls of God's people, are in point: 'Your heart shall live that seek God.' Ps. lxxix. 32. 'Fear, and your soul shall live, and I will make an everlasting covenant with you.'—Isa. lv. 3. All the promises contained in the following references, are made to the soul, exclusive of the body that must die. See Luke xxiii. 43; John vi. 27, 50, 51, 57, 58, 68, chap. viii. 51, 52, x. 28, xi. 26, xiv. 19, 27; Isa. xlv. 17. As an expression of God's love to the world, and as the highest inducement to repentance and faith, he not only gave and sent his only begotten Son into the world that we might be saved, but made his will and gave eternal life to all that would be reconciled to him. John iii. 16, vi. 40; Rom. vi. 23. And O! what unparalleled condescension, and loving-kindness, that he should make and send us a record of his will! 1 John v. 11, 12. Moreover, he actually put the soul in present possession of his bequest on its believing. John iii. 36, iv. 14, v. 24, vi. 47, 48, 54; John v. 13. Will the reader impartially receive the testimony of our Savior, in Luke xvi. 19—31? If this testimony is not evidential of the intelligent existence of souls separated by death from their bodies, nothing can be evinced by any testimony whatever. Let us now read a part of the multiplied testimony of the apostles on this delightful subject: 1 Cor. iii. 21—23; Phil. i. 21—23; 2 Cor. iv. 16—18, v. 1—8; 2 Tim. iv. 6; 1 John ii. 17, 25, iii. 14, iv. 9; Rev. vi. 9—11. In relation to the perpetuity of future rewards and punishments, the Scriptures place them exactly on a par; of course we have no more authority to deny the endlessness of one than the other—for, if the words everlasting and eternal evince perpetuity in the one case, they certainly do in the other. The joint testimony of the inspired prophet, and our Savior put the subject beyond dispute. See Isa. lxvi. 24. 'And they shall go forth and look upon the carcasses of the men that have transgressed against me, for their worm shall not die neither shall their fire be quenched, and they shall be an abhorring unto all flesh.' See Mark ix. 43—48.

CORRESPONDENCE.

LETTER FROM BRO. B. CARTER.

Dear Bro. Marsh:—It is now about twenty months since I took the parting hand with the dear brethren and sisters in your county and its vicinity, to seek the far off West—not a home or a continuing city, but a place where I might tarry for a night while passing through this wilderness world on my pilgrimage journey to Mount Zion; during that time we have only once been permitted to meet with any who were fully of like precious faith. Last fall, sister Doud from your city and three or four brethren and sisters from Stillwell Prairie gave us a passing call, but were so pressed for time that they could not even enter the house; and you may be assured that the weekly visits of your little sheet are very acceptable, and hold a place in our affections next to the blessed Bible. We have had many invitations to put on again the shackles of sectarianism, but the Son having made us free we are determined to remain free indeed, and thus as they tell me, (and which perhaps may be the case) doors of usefulness are closed against me; but I have faith in God, and verily believe that if he has any work for me to do, he will open the doors, though they were barred with steel. There are I trust some good Christians around us who are anxious for the salvation of souls and the glory of God—but they are generally so cramped up and tied by their beloved isms that they dare not launch out on the broad platform of God's word, and thus their usefulness is much curtailed if not destroyed. But infidelity in some form or another is clearly in the ascendant, and if all the world is waxing worse as fast as this section of country, surely the vine of the earth must be nearly ripe, and the snare so visible to the Bible student, is about to grasp its prey. I find but few especially in the churches who will openly contend against our blessed hope, but rather treat it with contempt and studied neglect—a state of mind which I consider more hopeless than open hostility, because it shuts out all investigation. The cry, 'Behold he cometh with clouds,' has never been publicly given here, and few know anything more about it than that it is Millerism, and ought to be avoided by all means and at all hazards. O that some faithful brother capable of giving the trumpet a certain sound would come this way, and peradventure some might be snatched as brands from the burning and hid in the day of His wrath. If Bro. Chandler or sister Parks could give us a call and preach the word to the people, it would rejoice our hearts. The court-house is open for preaching at all times when not otherwise occupied, and the Lord will reward them if not before, at the resurrection of the just.

One word to the dear brethren and sisters in Western New York, many of whom we have taken sweet counsel with, and walked to the house of God in company. Together we have rejoiced, and together we have wept—together we have prayed, and together we have suffered reproach for Christ's sake, esteeming his cross greater riches than all the treasures and honors of the world. But now we are separated, perhaps to meet no more on this sin-cursed earth—but shall we meet no more at all? or shall we meet again when angels shout the harvest home? Who among us will turn back now on account of the roughness of the way, and thus lose our reward after toiling so long? I hope no one, but that all will continue to watch. This is emphatically the watching time, when the just must live by faith, but it will be but a little while till He that shall come will come and will not tarry. O that we may all be ready! Yours waiting for the kingdom,

B. CARTER.

Bro. P. Livingston, St. Johns, Antigua, West Indies, Dec. 29, writes:—

The work is progressing, and our heavenly Father is owning and blessing our labors. The prospects are cheering, answering our every expectation: for we did not expect multitudes would embrace our views of the truth, but here and there one: this has been the case. Backsliders have been reclaimed and sinners converted to God. Hearts are being warmed, and drawn out towards us and the truth. Most of the ministers still stand aloof, and do not feel quite at ease on the promulgations of our views. Though we have been told that the superintendent of the Moravian churches has expressed himself something like this, that our coming here was providential; for if the preaching of the second coming of the Savior would not arouse the people from their apathy, no other preaching would. How true this is I know not.

Two Wesleyan ministers called on us, and seemed to be in an inquiring posture of mind—and two Wesleyan exhorters are strongly imbued with the truth of the speedy coming of the Savior.

Indeed one of them is a believer in full. On the other hand the arch-deacon and Presbyterian minister are opposing us. These dignitaries remind me of what the 2d chapter of Isaiah says will come to pass in the last days.

I called at the asylum some time ago to visit the inmates, but was told I could not obtain admission without permission from the arch-deacon, who I met a few days after, and to whom I expressed my wish; with an uncourteous expression and demeanor, he said they needed no foreign aid, and that they were not neglected, &c. These dignitaries feel, no doubt, that we are invading their territories.

I feel it my duty to return to America, and will probably embark the first part of next month. Bro. Mansfield has not yet determined what course to pursue. May God direct.

Bro. C. F. Sweet, Ulster, Pa., Jan., writes:—
Bro. Marsh:—You said relative to me, I had been and was an exhorter in the Methodist E. church—I wish to correct you. I said I had applied for license to exhort, and expected it would be rejected, on account of my believing all of the truth of God's word. Two or three weeks after I wrote you, my case came before the class, and as I had expected, they said, the male members of course, with one common consent, if I would preach what they called Methodism, they had no objection to my having license; but if I was going to preach 'Millerism,' or in other words, the Savior near, they would not tolerate it nor give consent. I then told them that I wished one of three things to be done, as I could not quite pronounce their Shibboleth—I wished license, or a letter of honorable discharge, or if my character was such that a letter could not be given, they must proceed and expel me: so the matter remains now. My heart is fixed, my heart is fixed—I will sing and give praise!

Bro. W. Whitford, Addison, Vt., Jan. 11th, writes:—

Bro. Burnham preached with us on the last Sabbath. At the close, the ordinance, instituted by the great Head of the Church, in commemoration of his dying sufferings until he comes again, was duly solemnised, in which 25 or 30 brethren and sisters participated. May the good Lord keep us all, to patiently wait for the coming kingdom, that when he who is our life shall appear, we may also appear with him in glory!

OBITUARY.

Bro. Marsh:—We are called to mourn the loss of our dear mother, Comfort Wood, who fell asleep as we trust, in Jesus on Friday, the 15th, aged 87 years, 9 months and 12 days. We sorrow not as those that have no hope! ho, no—our hope is a living, lively hope, springing up in exercise and faith of seeing our mother again in a few days or months at most, for the resurrection morning will soon come, without which we should for ever despair of seeing her or any of our dead. She often spoke of the dark day, the 19th of May, 1780, and used to say that she thought she should live until the Lord come; but 'blessed are the dead which die in the Lord,' &c. for they will escape the time of trouble that is fast coming upon the earth.

Will the Herald and Advocate please to publish the above.

Lines

COMPOSED ON THE DEATH OF BRO. TANNER'S LITTLE SON.

The loved, the bright, the beautiful,
From earth must pass away,
And bitter are the tears that fall

Alas! 'tis hard to part with thee,
My little darling boy,
Yet well I know 'tis promised thee,
'To rise to perfect joy.

Oh! I shall miss thy joyous laugh,
And shout of childish glee;
And listen oft with throbbing heart,
For thy footstep light and free.

And oft in slumber shall I meet,
Thy small mouth's rosey kiss,
And waken with a bitter pang,
Thy twining arms to miss.

A vacant place is at my board,
A void is in my heart,
My child, my love, my beautiful,
'Tis hard with thee to part.

'To lay thy little form away,
Within the silent tomb,
Then turn and leave thee there alone,
In darkness and in gloom.

Yet, Willie, darling, short thy stay Within that narrow bed!
Thy little form may scarcely feel 'Corruptions' withering tread—

Ere thou wilt hear thy Savior's voice,
Arise ye dead and sing!
Where is thy victory now, O Grave!
And where, O Death, thy sting!

MARIA.

What shall we say?

The sort of religion possessed by most professors, is not the sort required to overcome the hindrances to our own salvation and the conversion of the world. The religion of the great majority in all our churches, differs in many respects from that exhibited in the examples of the Bible. One must take a long search, before he will find even a single example of faith like that of Abraham, or of Moses; or of repentance like that of David; or of zeal and self-denial like that of Paul and the band of apostles; or of consecration of all worldly substance to Christ and his cause, like that of the first converts, who had all things in common, and counted not the things they possessed their own. Every one must admit that such religion is far from being a common, everyday thing among us. And if we thus fall short of the examples of Bible Christians who, whatever their attainments, were still imperfect, how much more are we below the standard of Bible precept, which is perfect!

Yet it is evident that we need as much religion as the early Christians. We need as much for our personal safety and peace; for our success in the conflict with sin and Satan, and to enable us to do good in a perishing world. Providence is placing us in situations which require the decision of Moses when he preferred affliction with the people of God, to the pleasures of sin. We are daily in circumstances which call upon us to feel as David did, when he said—"Rivers of water run down mine eyes, because sinners keep not thy law." We are placed in the very same world of sin and death in which Christ suffered and died for lost men, and where he commanded his disciples so to let their light shine that men should be constrained to glorify our heavenly Father. In short, every reason and every obligation which ever existed to enforce eminent piety, exists now. How great would be our gain in every respect, if we should return to the primitive stamp of devotedness and love. Even should we encounter the old enemies and persecutions, afflictions and distresses for Christ's sake, which assailed the church in her early days, it might be no real loss. We might be infinite gainers in the loss of all things, if at the same time we could win Christ as Paul did.—A. Y. Evangelist.

Thus talks the Editor of the New York Evangelist. If he tells the truth, and facts say that he does, then the present age of the church falls short, in a most fearful manner, of coming up to the standard of piety lived up to by the apostolical church. We mourn that the Evangelist, or any other journal, has just cause for such remarks. But we are more deeply pained that these very watchmen who see and acknowledge these things are by some cause blinded to what they really indicate. They think they see in this very state of society sure indications of the speedy conversion of not only an acknowledged apostate church, but of a deeply corrupt world, to primitive godliness. Mistaken ones. May they see that this great departure from the primitive faith and purity of the church is one of the sure tokens that 'the end of all things is at hand;' that the Lord of glory will soon come, cleanse his sanctuary and people, destroy them which corrupt the earth, and reign forever and ever upon the throne of his father David. And as they see these things; may they prepare themselves, and, instead of crying peace, peace, do all they can in warning others to be ready to meet their soon coming Lord and King in peace.

Famine in Ireland.

LETTER TO THE DUKE OF WELLINGTON.—Mr. Cummins, a magistrate of the county of Cork, in a public letter to the Duke of Wellington, gives the following awful account of the state of things in Skibbereen, which indeed, would almost appear incredible, if it were not so well authenticated:—Having heard so much of the distress in the western part of the county, I went on the 15th inst. to Skibbereen; I was surprised to find the wretched hamlet apparently deserted. I entered some of the hovels to ascertain the cause, and the scenes which presented themselves were such as no tongue nor pen can convey the slightest idea of. In the first six famished and ghastly skeletons, to all appearance dead, were huddled in a corner on some filthy straw, their sole covering what seemed a ragged horse cloth, their wretched legs hanging about naked above the knees. I approached in horror, and found, by a low moaning, they were alive—they were in fever, four children, a woman, and what had once been a man.

It is impossible to go through the detail; suffice it to say, that, in about a few minutes, I was surrounded by at least 200 of such phantoms, such frightful spectres as no words can describe. By far the greater number were delirious either from famine or from fever. Their demoniac yells are still ringing in my ears, and their horrid images are fixed in my brain. In another case—deceit would forbid what follows, but it must be told—my clothes were nearly torn off in my endeavor to escape from the throng of pestilence around me, when my neckcloth was seized from behind by a gripe, which compelled me to turn. I found myself grasped by a woman, with an infant, apparently just born, in her arms, and the remains of a filthy suck across her loins, the sole covering of herself and babe.

The same morning the police opened a house on the adjoining lands, which was observed shut for many days, and two frozen corpses were found upon the mud floor, HALF DEVoured BY RATS! A mother, herself in fever, was seen the same day to drag out the corpse of her child, a girl about twelve, perfectly naked, and leave it half covered with stones. In another house, within 500 yards of the cavalry station at Skibbereen, the dispensary doctor found seven wretches lying, unable to move, under the same cloak. One had been dead many hours, but the others were unable to move either themselves or the corpse.

A VILLAGE DESTROYED BY LIGHTNING.—The Journal des Debats of Paris, publishes the following letter, dated Munich, Oct. 20th, 1846: 'On Friday, the 16th October, a terrible storm accompanied by lightning, fell on the village of Schledorf, situated at three leagues distance from our capitol, and in less than two hours it completely destroyed that large and handsome village, of which no trace remains. The greater number of the houses were broken to pieces by the tempest, and the remainder were set on fire by the lightning and totally consumed. The flames communicated to the neighboring forests, which continued burning for four days. During this disaster the thermometer marked at Munich 24 deg. Reaumur, and suffocating heat was experienced, an extraordinary fact in the month of October. The sky was of an ashy hue.

The massacre of the Christians continues in Turkey. Mar Yohannan, the Nestorian Bishop who visited New York some years ago, has been impaled alive by Bedrhan Bey. The Nestorian Pastors had oil poured over their bodies and were then roasted alive before a slow fire, amid the jeers and savage yells of their tormentors. Sixty-seven villages have been laid waste, and eight hundred Christians put to death by torture, by the Mahomedans. Neither women nor children were spared in this savage butchery.

THE CHOLERA.—A letter from Constantinople of the 17th of December, has the following:

News has been received from Persia that the cholera was still raging and sweeping off thousands. At Oroomiah the mortality was upward of 200 a day on the poor population of 10,000. I have just seen a doctor, assuring me that, according to his statistics, the deaths had greatly exceeded the worst year of the plague; he calculates that more than 100,000 have been destroyed. I myself do not think the statement exaggerated in the least.

The suffering population in the Highlands and Islands of Scotland, is estimated at 100,000!

The French Government have protested against the suppression of the Polish Republic.

Life is continually ravaged by invaders; one steals away an hour, and another a day; one conceals the robbery by hurrying us into business, another by lulling us with amusement: The depredation is continued through a thousand vicissitudes of tumult and tranquility, till having lost all, we can lose no more.

Life is half spent before we know what it is.

MEETINGS IN ROCHESTER.

Our meetings in this city, are held three times on the Sabbath, also Tuesday and Friday evenings, in Shaw's New Brick Block, east side of the River, corner of Main and Stone streets; entrance from Stone street. The Lord's Supper will be administered in the afternoon of the first Sabbath of every month.

APPOINTMENTS.

Br'n J. V. Himes and F. G. Brown are expected to hold meetings in this city Feb. 11th, and as much longer as duty may dictate.

BUSINESS NOTES.

S. W. Thurlur—Your paper was discontinued by order of some one; it is now sent again. The money you sent for Br'n Rubitee and Tewksbury was placed to their credit on book.

M. B. Hart—The paper has been regularly mailed to Sister E. Barry, Boston. It is now sent to the care of the Christian Register.

E. L. A. Hemenway—We have sent the $1 to B. B. Brown, Metropolitan, Ill.

L. D. Fleming—Your Post Master has just informed us that Mrs. George does not call for her paper, and orders it discontinued. Last week you informed us that it was not received. Please explain.

F. Steen—We have sent but one paper; some friend must have sent the other. You are now paid for the one we send to close of vol. XI.

Time's Sun is Fast Setting.

BY DR. HARDY.

Time's sun is fast setting,
Its twilight is nigh;
Its evening is falling
In cloud o'er the sky.
Its shadows are stretching
In ominous gloom;
Its midnight approaches—
The midnight of doom.

Then haste, sinner, haste, there is mercy for thee,
And wrath is preparing—flee, lingerer, flee!

Rides forth the fierce tempest
On the wing of the cloud:
The moan of the night-blast
Is awful and loud.

The mountains are heaving,
The forests are bowed,
The ocean is surging,
Earth gathers its shroud.

Then haste, sinner, haste, there is mercy for thee,
And wrath is preparing—flee, lingerer, flee!

The vision is hearing—
The Judge and the Throne;
The voice of the Angel
Proclaims, "It is done!"

On the whirl of the tempest
Its Ruler shall come,
And the blaze of his glory
Flash out from its gloom.

Then haste, sinner, haste, there is mercy for thee,
And wrath is preparing—flee, lingerer, flee!

With clouds He is coming!
His people shall sing:
With gladness they hail Him
Redeemer and King.

His iron rod wielding—
The rod of his ire,
He cometh to kindle
Earth's last fatal fire!

Then haste, sinner, haste, there is mercy for thee,
And wrath is preparing—flee, lingerer, flee!

Concluding Reflections on the Visions of Daniel.

BY T. R. BIRKS, M. A.

FELLOW OF TRINITY COLLEGE, CAMBRIDGE, ENGLAND.

DAN. II. 47.—"The king answered unto Daniel and said, Of a truth it is that your God is a God of gods, and a Lord of kings, and a revealer of secrets, seeing that couldst reveal this secret."
VII. 28.—"Hitherto is the end of the matter. As for me, Daniel, my cogitations much troubled me, and my countenance changed in me; but I kept the matter in my heart."

II. THE PROTESTANT CHARACTER OF THE TRUE CHURCH is a further lesson which results evidently from these prophecies. The one great evil they reveal, in these latter times, is the reign of the little horn, and his boastful words against the Most High. It has been proved, by many clear marks, that this power denotes the Roman papacy. And surely the inference must be plain; that we ought to watch, both as Christians and as citizens, against the first approach of so great an evil, and should flee, as if from a serpent, from every taint of Romish superstition.

This general warning might be viewed in three aspects, and each alone would need a volume for its full development. It affects the Christian in his relations to the state of which he is a citizen, to the church of which he is a member, and in the secret work of religion in the heart. One or two remarks on each of these aspects are all that can be offered here.

But, first, a caution seems needful to remove a prejudice that lies in the way. The application of these prophecies as a weapon against Papal corruptions appears to be more than ever in disrepute, and has been assailed latterly, even by nominal Protestants, with peculiar vehemence. One reason, doubtless, has been its actual abuse by mere partizans, without Christian love or tenderness of conscience in their coarse denunciations of error. Even the first reformers, with all their faithful zeal, were exposed to the mixture of human infirmity, and a false fire sometimes mingled with their testimony. But this became still more true of their successors. The great conflict often degenerated into a political or national feud, a strife of contending factions. No wonder, then, that carnal minds should abuse a weapon of warfare so powerful as this, and bring the truth itself into discredit, so as to pave the way, in many instances, for a ruinous and fatal reaction. To use these prophecies aright in the Protestant controversy, we need, therefore, to impose on ourselves a triple restraint. We must use them honestly; from a deep, serious, and deliberate persuasion, that such is their true meaning, and not merely from a strong impression how effective they will be in maintaining a favorite cause. We must use them impartially, receiving with equal readiness whatever warnings they supply against the lawless spirit of the last days. And above all we must use them with tenderness, and in the spirit of real love; mourning for the sins of others as if for our own, and humbling ourselves, with deep reverence, at the warnings of God's holy word. For if these prophetic warnings be handled deceitfully, or in a fiery and heartless zeal, doubtless the threatening will apply to such Protestant zealots.—'With what judgment ye judge, ye shall be judged; and with what measure ye mete, it shall be measured unto you again.'

On the other hand, those who believe firmly, after their most diligent and patient search, that these prophecies really refer to the Papal tyranny, must feel that it is no light sin, under whatever pretext, to deprive the Church of this Divine safeguard. One sin or the other we cannot avoid, if we interpret this prophecy amiss. Either we become false witnesses against our fellow Christians, or else we abrogate and annul the gracious warnings of the Spirit of God. It is idle, then, to complain that such interpretations infuse bitterness into religious controversy. The bitterness is already there, so long as the kingdom of darkness continues in the world. The simple question must be, what is the truth of God, the real meaning of the Holy Ghost? And if the truth be most solemn, this is no reason why it should be kept back or concealed; but rather why it should be fully proclaimed. Only it must be with a serious, tender, humble spirit; lest the truth itself be made odious, when taken up by lips that are full of bitterness and pride.

The warning, then, of the prophecy applies to us, as British citizens, at the present day. Long sheltered by the providence of God behind the bulwarks erected by our fathers, the Protestants of our land had come to regard the Papacy as an antiquated and powerless thing. They have now begun to be undeceived, or deceived doubly, by embracing what before they had despised. The political barriers have been removed, almost entirely; the ecclesiastical are shaking in their turn; and a road, 'smooth, easy, inoffensive,' seems to be preparing by the great enemy, by which we may reunite with the apostacy we seemed to have forsaken for ever. So that now, among our statesmen, there are those who account themselves sturdy Protestants, while they bargain for a half chance of being in the right, and account all certain assurance in matters of faith to be a dangerous contradiction to the spirit of freedom. With such maxims, and such a slippery faith, what can we expect but that our country, by slow degrees, will be sucked into the terrible whirlpool, of delusion first, and afterwards of Divine judgment?

One most powerful means to deliver us from this fearful danger, if deliverance be yet possible, would be the careful study of this Divine prophecy. It is the means which God himself has specially provided. Other predictions of the New Testament supply a fuller detail and variety of cautionary truths. But here the main lesson stands out in broad relief, clear and conspicuous, so as might arrest the attention even of mere statesmen, if not totally blind. It is plain at what time the Roman empire was broken into many fragments. It is plain what potentate then rose stealthily into power, diverse from all the rest, and usurped and exercised dominion over the whole. It is evident, on the merest glance at history, what power has used great and boastful words, beyond all precedent, to advance its authority. Therefore it is plain also of what power the God of heaven commands His people to beware, and what power it is from whose fatal and paralyzing touch a Christian statesman will seek to preserve the land of his birth. To endow Popery once more, in a land that has been rescued from its yoke, is a madness little short of direct high treason against heaven.

And how, then, shall we be delivered from the counsels of a godless expediency, time-serving, and changing with every wind, and careless alike of God's promise and His threatening? By a heedful attention to the warning of the vision. There we see that the Papacy in its tyranny, its blasphemous pretensions, and its bitter persecutions, is marked out by the God of heaven as the enemy of national peace, and the procuring cause of national judgments. For here the evils, elsewhere dispersed and scattered, unite under one head, form one compact system, and embody themselves into one organized confederacy to trample down, and hide out from the world, the truth of God, and the salvation of the Lord Jesus. There may be, and alas, there are, abounding evils and crimes even in Protestant lands. But these are dangerous to their welfare, because they predispose them to link themselves afresh with the centre and seat of the rebellion. The infidelity which seems to reject all national religion, the formality which would exchange the kernel of truth for the husk of ceremonies, become politically fatal, because they lead us back into the embrace of this grand delusion, and thus they involve us in its predicted judgment. All other national sins are punished by this one sin to which they lead the way, a blind surrender once more, after the experience of ages, to the Papal tyranny. But this one sin is reserved itself for a direct and immediate judgment. 'I beheld, because of the great words which the horn spake, I beheld till the beast was slain, and its body destroyed, and given to the burning flame.' 'Blasphemies, unrepealed, and by its pretence to infallibility, unrepealable, are written on the brow of Papal Rome. The nations which league with her involve themselves in a share of her guilt; and God, even the Most High God, will compel them also to share in her judgments.

Beware of Bad Books!

Why, what harm will books do me? The same harm that personal intercourse would with the bad men who wrote them. That "a man is known by the company he keeps," is an old proverb; but it is no more true than that a man's character may be determined by knowing what books he reads. If a good book can be read without making one better, a bad book cannot be read without making one the worse. They are to the mind what ardent spirits are to the body; both dissipate.

Lord Bacon makes the pithy remark, that "in the body there are three degrees of that we receive into it, aliment, medicine and poison; whereof aliment is that which the nature of man can perfectly alter and overcome; medicine is that which is partly converted by nature and partly converteth nature; and poison is that which worketh wholly upon nature, without nature being able to work upon it; so in the mind, whatsoever knowledge reason cannot at all work upon and convert, is a mere INTOXICATION, and endangereth a dissolution of the mind and understanding."

Bad books are like ardent spirits; they furnish neither "aliment" nor "medicine;" they are "poison." Both intoxicating—one the mind, the other the body; the thirst for each increases by being fed, and is never satisfied: both ruin—one the intellect, the other the health, and together, the soul. The makers and venders of each are equally guilty and equally corrupters of the community; and the safeguard against each is the same—total abstinence from all that intoxicates mind or body.

Here we have a definition of what we mean by "bad books:" whatever books neither feed the mind nor heart, but have the effect to intoxicate the mind and corrupt the heart. Works of science, art, philosophy, history, theology, &c., furnish "aliment" or "medicine;" books of mere fancy, romance, infidelity, war, piracy and murder, are "poison," more or less diluted, and are as much to be shunned as the drunkard's cup.—They will "bite like a serpent and sting like an adder."

Books of mere fiction and fancy are bad in their character and influence. Their authors are commonly bad men, and wicked men do not often write good books. A stream does not rise higher than its fountain. Their principles are often corrupt, encouraging notions of chivalry, worldly honor, and pleasure, at war with the only true code of morals. They insult the understanding of the reader, by representing as truth what is confessedly false, and by assuming that the great object of reading is amusement instead of instruction. The effects are such as might be expected. A habit of reading for amusement simply becomes so fixed that science loses all its charms; sober history becomes dull and tedious; whatever requires thought and study is cast aside; the Bible becomes a wearisome book; religious treatises, like those of Baxter, Bunyan, Flavel, and Doddridge, though glowing with celestial fire, become insipid and uninteresting; and sermons lose their power; or if any religious impression is made upon the conscience, the bewitching novel furnishes a ready means of stifling conviction, and grieving away the spirit of God. The gospel is thus undermined and souls lured to ruin, by a pleasant and easy but straight road. Beware of the habit of indiscriminate novel reading. Although this may be the fermented beverage from the literary dram-shop, it is intoxicating and poisonous, and excites a thirst for what is maddening and destructive.

Beware of the foul and exciting romance. All that is said above of the character and influence of the ordinary novel, will apply with ten fold intensity to this class of reading, for which it paves the way. The writer of modern romance chooses his scenes from the places of debauchery and crime, and familiarizes the reader with characters, sentiments and events, that should be known only to the police. Licitious scenes and obscene imagery are unblushingly introduced, and the imagination polluted by suggestions and descriptions revolting to the pure in heart. It was lately testified in open court by the father of one whose guilty course had brought ruin upon herself, disgrace upon her family, and death upon her lover, that all was occasioned by his daughter's "reading the impure works of Eugene Sue and Bulwer." To yield to such a hellish charm, is like the voluntary sacrifice of one's body and soul on the drunkard's altar. Mental delirium tremens is as certain a consequence of habitual intoxication from such reading, as is that awful disease the certain end of the inebriate. Beware of it!

Beware of infidel books, and of all writings which ridicule the Bible. You will meet them, in a more or less guarded avowal of their object, in the newspaper, the tract, and the volume. Infidelity is a system of negations; it is nothing—believes nothing—does nothing good. Beware of it, in whatever form it approaches you, as you value temporal happiness and prosperity, the peace of society, and eternal well-being. No man enters eternity an infidel.

Beware of books of war, piracy and murder.—The first thought of crime has been suggested by such books. The murderer of Lord William Russell confessed on the scaffold, that the reading of one such book led him to the commission of his crime.—Another, who was executed for piracy, was instigated to his course by a book filled with piratical tales. The State prisons are filled with criminals who were incited to crime by similar means. They stimulate the love of adventurous daring, cultivate the baser passions, and prompt to deeds of infamy. Away with them; beware of them!

Do you still need to be persuaded to beware of the poison that would paralyze your conscience, enervate your intellect, pervert your judgment, deprave your life and perhaps ruin your soul?

Beware of bad books, because if you, and others like you, will let them alone, they will soon cease to be published. Every such book you buy encourages the guilty publisher to make another. Thus you not only endanger your own morals, but pay a premium on the means of ruining others.

Beware of bad books, because your example is contagious. Your child, your servant, your neighbor, may be led to read what will be injurious for time and eternity; or not to "touch the unclean thing," as your example may prompt.—Which will you do?

Beware, because good books are plenty and cheap, and it is folly to feed on chaff, or poison, when substantial, healthful food may as well be obtained.

Beware of bad books, because they waste your time. "Time is money"—'tis more—it is eternity! That time is redeemed. Can you squander it on the means of ruin?

Beware of bad books, because principles imbibed and images gathered from them, will abide in the memory and imagination forever. The mind once polluted is never freed from its corruption—never.

Beware of them, because they are one of the most fruitful sources of eternal destruction. They are read in solitude. Their ravages are internal. Foundations of morality are undermined. The fatal arrow is fixed in the soul, while the victim only sees the gilded feather that guides its certain aim. He is lost, and descends to a hell the more intolerable, from the contrast with the scenes of fancied bliss with which the heart was filled by the vile, though gifted destroyer. The precious Book of Life was given to show you how you might have secured the enrollment of your name among the saints in light; but you chose the Book of Death, with present fascinations of a corrupt press, and the surest means of securing a dreadful doom. If your epitaph were truly written, the passer by in ——— grave-yard would read:

"M——— acquired a taste for reading bad books; died without hope, and 'went to his own place!'"

Shall this be your epitaph, dear reader? If not, make this pledge before God: "Henceforth, I will beware of bad books, and never read what can intoxicate and deprive the mind and heart!" —N. Y. Evangelist.

Looking for the Lord.

I still feel quite an interest in the cause of Christ and especially in the coming and kingdom of our Lord and Master, as advocated through the Voice of Truth. I rejoice to hear from so many parts of the country, where there are some of God's elect who are looking for redemption in Israel. I fully believe that in a very short time they will realize the consummation of their dearest hopes. The world at large do not seem to understand why we attach so much importance to the coming of Christ. 'Can we not live good, humble, devoted, Christian lives and be saved, and at the same time not be looking for Christ's coming?' This is a question which is used by some, who I think wish to evade the Lord's coming, and if possible represent it as an event of little or no importance. They take the ground that 'if we are only ready for it, it is no matter when it comes.' Now I do not wish to answer this question except in the light of God's word, lest I be accused of exclusiveness. Therefore, let us examine a few passages of Scripture on this point, which may not be uninteresting if not profitable. Now, we believe the grace of God, or spirit of God, and the word of God, both teach one and the same thing, and we believe it will teach all of Christ's true followers alike. It will not teach one humble devoted follower one thing and another as truly devoted disciple another thing right to the contrary—no, no; this would make God contradict himself, which thing he never can do.

In Paul's epistle to Titus, (Ti. ii. 11-13) we read, 'For the grace of God that bringeth salvation, hath appeared to all men, teaching us that denying ungodliness and worldly lusts, we should live soberly, righteously, and godly in this present world.' And is this all that the grace of God teaches us? No: for the next verse says, 'Looking for that blessed hope and the glorious appearing of the great God and our Savior Jesus Christ.' Ah, says one, I see you mean to make it appear that if a man does not look for the coming of Christ he is not taught of the grace of God. Well, I would candidly inquire if there can be any other fair conclusion derived from the above text? Does it not positively follow that if the grace of God teaches one child of God to look for his coming, that all those who do not look for him are not taught of this same grace of God? But this is not all—the apostle Peter speaking of the 'elements melting with fervent heat, and the works which are in the earth being burnt up,' says, 'Seeing then that all these things shall be dissolved, what manner of persons ought ye to be in all holy conversation and godliness, looking for and hastening unto the coming of the day of God.' Here we see again that 'all holy conversation and godliness' is not all that is required of the true child of God; he is also to be 'looking for and hasting unto the coming of the day of God.' Are those who say, 'No matter when he comes if we are only ready for it,' obeying the injunction of the apostle? Are they 'hasting unto the coming of the day of God?' Are they 'lifting up their heads and knowing that their redemption is nigh?' Are they receiving the blessing promised in Isaiah xxx. 18, where it is said 'Blessed are all they that wait for him?'

Again, we read in Heb. ix. 28, 'So Christ was once offered to bear the sins of many, and unto them that look for him shall he appear the second time without sin unto salvation.' Will he appear 'unto salvation' to those who are not looking for him, who may be alive when he comes, when he has expressly commanded, 'Let your loins be girded about and your lamps burning, and ye yourselves like unto men that wait for their Lord? Blessed are those servants whom the Lord, when he cometh shall find watching.' Will any be saved that neglect to obey this commandment of the Lord Jesus? He says in Rev. iii. 3, 'If therefore thou shalt not watch I will come on thee as a thief, and thou shalt not know what hour I will come upon thee.' Awful must be the situation of those on whom the Lord will come as a thief! for we read in 1 Thes. v. 3, that 'Sudden destruction cometh upon them as travail upon a woman with child, and they shall not escape.' And our Lord teaches us in Luke xxi. 36, that those alone who are watching, shall be counted worthy to escape the destruction which is coming and to stand before the Son of man. Now let all such as have hitherto believed we can live a godly life and not look for the appearing of the Son of man, examine closely and candidly, and see if watchfulness in these last moments of time is not necessary in order to salvation. If one command of Christ is to be obeyed are not they all? It seems so to me. And in taking this view of the subject, I am led to the conclusion that the obedient, and they alone will eat the fruit of the land. Some seem willing to adopt the plan of salvation, if the second advent of our Lord is only left out; but if you leave out this, the whole plan of salvation is like a carriage wheel when the hub is gone; for like as the spokes of a wheel all centre in the hub, so does all prophecy and the whole plan of salvation centre in the coming of Christ. Therefore, I look to that day as the one that completes our salvation, and that brings our brethren who are in the land of the enemy into their promised rest and inheritance! O what an interest there is clustered around that day, to the true believer. My prayer to God is that we may stand ready to hail the glad day! O. D. GIBSON.

Houghtonville, Vt. Jan. 1847.

Work of the Spirit.

Has God's Spirit been withdrawn from the world by reason of the rejection of the advent proclamation? Ans. I conclude that the principal evidence that God's spirit has been in the world up to the time of the advent proclamation being made, is found in John's record of the Savior's promise to the disciples. John xiv. 16, 17. In the 16th verse it is said that this Comforter shall abide with them; and verse 17th says this Comforter is the Spirit of truth. Now this promise must either have been designed for the apostles exclusively, or to them and all their posterity in the Christian faith. If it was intended to apply to all Christians, as is generally believed, by what authority is it said that God is recalling that spirit from the world unless it be first shown that there are no Christians in the world, and therefore no place for the spirit to abide? But if to avoid this difficulty any should contend that the above promise applies exclusively to the apostles, then it is equally an error to suppose that it is withdrawn from the world, having, to a great extent, rejected the time doctrine of the Bible, for in that case the spirit could have no direct connection with the event, it having been limited to the age and agency of the apostles. Now I believe it is generally understood that the promise in verse 16th is an assurance to all Christians that the spirit of God shall continue with them to be their religious instructor in cases where the written word may fail to instruct them, but that the more important office of that spirit is continually to labor with the unbelieving world, to impress upon them their own guilt and also the truth of the Christian religion.

Now it is well understood that God so loved the world as to give his Son for them. And if in addition to this it has been his purpose to send his spirit to continually admonish the world of sin, it is to me a strange idea, that because the world have unfortunately been duped to believe the adversary, and reject a crowning doctrine of the Bible, that therefore God should by way of retaliation withdraw his spirit from them, and leave them with half the necessary means to reclaim them. Why not for the same reason also withdraw the Bible from them and thereby retaliate more abundantly for their folly? I believe it is a mistake that any such withdrawing of the spirit it has taken place as has been supposed. But the crowning mistake I think lies much deeper than this. Christ in conversation directly to the apostles tells them that when he should have gone away he would send the spirit. Now if the promise of the spirit is to all Christians, why not also the command, Tarry ye in Jerusalem until ye be endowed with power from on high. Compare Luke xxiv. 47 with Acts i. 4, 5. This introduction of the spirit or baptism of the Holy Ghost, conferred upon them the power of working miracles. This power the Lord also gave to others through the intercession of the apostles. But they had never the ability to transfer the gift to others. Therefore, when the apostles and those to whom they gave such power had all died, the power of working miracles ceased, and the gift of healing among the rest; this display of power was given to confirm the Messiahship of Christ. When this fact was sufficiently tested there was no further call for such an agency in the world, therefore it was no longer continued. Why then did Christ say my spirit shall abide with you for ever? I will also ask a question: Why did he say that he himself would be with them until the end of the world? It is well understood that neither Christ nor the apostles remained in the world but a short time; how then shall Christ, the apostles, and the spirit, all continue in the world until its end? All precisely on the same principle: the character and authority of Christ—the life and example of the apostles—the power and agency of the Holy Spirit have all been written in a book, which is being made the property of all mankind.

How do we learn the character and authority of Christ? By reading the Bible. How do we learn the life and example of the apostles? By reading the Bible. How do we learn the power and agency of the Holy Spirit? By reading the Bible. Amen.

But are not Christians to be filled with the spirit of Christ? Most certainly—for if ye have not the spirit of Christ ye are none of his. And how is this? I understand that to have the spirit of Christ is to be moved by the same principle or rule of action that he was moved by. By what rule was Christ governed? By justice, mercy, truth, and above all, love and entire submission to the will of God; so must the true Christian be governed. Did not holy men of old speak as they were moved by the Holy Ghost? The apostles says they did; but if I read correctly, in all cases of importance they obtained their knowledge of what to speak and write from the words of the angels of God that came to instruct them. But was not John in the spirit on the Lord's day, &c.? He says he was. But did that spirit teach him what to write to the churches? He tells us that every word that he wrote he received from the angel that talked with him. But to close with a single remark by way of application.

The mistake I wish to expose is this: It is believed that when a sinner has any desire to holiness, that that desire is produced by the agency of God's spirit, sent to move upon his heart; if he has a desire to repent, it is from the same cause. That these desires, so far as they approximate the purity of God's purpose, are of the same spirit I freely admit. But that it is the direct agency of the Holy Ghost, sent expressly to produce such effect, I cannot believe, from the fact that such does not appear to have been the effect of the spirit in the days of its direct operation. Its agency to the apostles was chiefly to remind them of what Christ had told them, and to enable them to speak with tongues. The unbelieving Jews now saw its effect upon the apostles; but its effect upon the Jews was only to fill them with astonishment. But when they heard the words which Peter spoke, they were pricked in the heart.

Some of the evils growing out of this mistake are these: People are told and made to believe that they are going down to perdition: this produces grief. They are then informed that it is the operation of the Holy Spirit, and if they will yield to his instruction he will lead them to God. After an excessive exercise of the organs producing melancholy, a reaction must of necessity occur, and an opposite set of organs predominate, producing a calm and quiet state of mind. This they are informed is positive proof direct from the Holy Ghost, that God has had mercy on them and forgiven their sins, and an assurance that they have become Christians, when as yet they have not taken the first step in the way of obedience. In addition to this they are told that the Holy Ghost having thus taken his abode in their hearts will never forsake them. Thus they are left to rely on a simple imagination and perish at last. Precisely in this way multitudes get an impression that the Holy Ghost has singled them out for the ministry; that he requires them to be religious teachers, and of course requires the church to sustain them in it. Thus we have a mass of men imposing themselves upon the indulgence of the unsuspecting, as religious teachers, who would scarcely be an ornament to a public barroom; and who never would receive countenance as ministers, were it not for this deception about the office of the Holy Spirit. Just let men come to understand and know that these impressions are nothing more nor less than the natural production of their own organized system, and you would soon see that those who expect redemption would expect it on the ground of practical obedience to the requirements of the Bible, rather than because they have at some time within the period of their recollection received an impression, or came to believe that God had pardoned them and therefore they shall be saved.

OUR DUTY TO EDITORS.

We never should be in debt to the editor. He is engaged in a great work—great responsibilities rest upon him. He is considered to be in debt to hundreds and thousands of people. His income must be great for the satisfaction and peace of his own mind, for his outgoes are large. He stands in front of the battle. The errors of the society with which he is connected, are generally charged to the editor. He is expected to expose error and hold up the truth, and to him we never should be in DEBT!

Some people think that they give a great deal for the cause; but they do not—they are only paying their honest debts. It is a shame, a disgrace to any people, to suffer—nay, to oblige the editor to do the painful task of publishing dunning letters to collect his honest dues! Alas! a fearful account will some have to give, for the use they have made of the Lord's money!

Voice of Truth & Glad Tidings

"The wise shall understand."

ROCHESTER, FEBRUARY 17, 1847.

Time of the Second Advent.

NO. VIII.

In our preceding number it was clearly shown that the signs named in Matt. xxiv. and the corresponding chapters in the records of Mark and Luke, when seen, infallibly prove that the appearing of the Son of man in the clouds of heaven, with great power and glory, is nigh, even at the door. This truth, abstractly, is generally admitted by our brethren. But the character of all the signs named, and whether they have all yet been seen, are to some extent unsettled questions among us. Our object in this number is to impart the true light on these points.

Character of the signs named. We conclude they were all either to be literal or figurative, for the very good reason that there is no distinction in this respect made in them, by either of the divine writers: they give us no authority to call this sign literal and that figurative; hence, we conclude that they are all to be either literal or figurative.

We think they were all to be literal. First—Because neither figurative, symbolic, metaphoric, nor parabolic, but plain language is used by the Savior in describing them. Second—Because we should always give the words of the Bible a literal interpretation when the subject on which they speak will admit of it. The signs will admit of a literal interpretation: we conclude therefore that they are to be literally understood. Third—Immutable facts show that a part at least, as all will admit, and we think all of them which prove the coming of the Lord nigh, even at the door, have been literal: the literal sun and literal moon have been darkened, and the literal stars (or luminous bodies, according to the scriptural import of this kind of stars) have fallen from the literal heavens. Hence we infer, that the signs were to be and actually have been literally seen.

Admitting that this view is correct, then a serious difficulty, in the estimation of some, arises in our way. They think that the shaking of the powers of heaven and the sign of the Son of man in heaven, are included in the signs, which were to proclaim the coming of the Lord nigh, even at the door; these signs they think, if literally understood, have not yet been seen, consequently we do not yet know from the signs that the appearing of the Lord is nigh, even at the door.

This objection is valid providing that the sign of the Son of man and the shaking of the powers of heaven were designed to be classed with those signs by which the appearing of the Lord might be known to be at the door. But if they were designed not to be thus classed, but were to be intimately connected with the coming of Christ, then the objection is groundless. That they were to be intimately connected with that event, and consequently not signs, appears evident from the fact that when the sign of the Son of man is seen, all the tribes of the earth mourn. Matt. xxiv. 30.—Here is the only place where the sign of the Son of man is named, and whatever it will be when seen, according to the testimony in the case, it will be understood by all the tribes of the earth. Not so the signs which proclaim the Savior near: none but the watchful righteous will understand them. The sign of the Son of man will produce general mourning. Not so the other signs: they are unheeded by the great mass, and instead of producing mourning they create joy in the hearts of the watchful few who understand them. No such general mourning has yet been witnessed; neither does other prophecy warrant the expectation that it will take place, until the actual scenes of that dread day open upon a guilty world. Till then the world will eat and drink, plant and build, marry and give in marriage; be lovers of pleasure, enchanted at the song of of peace and safety, and fear no evil: but when the sign of the Son of man is seen, or the scenes of the day of judgment begin to open, with all the glory of the heavenly world, than there will be mourning among all the tribes of the earth. Hence we conclude that the sign of the Son of man will be so intimately connected with the actual appearing of Christ, that it is not to be classed with those signs by which the Christian may know that his Lord is at the door.

Powers of heaven—what are they? The heaven named must be the literal heavens, for the very good reason that no other is named in the discourse; with the exception of verse 31, which reads, 'They shall gather together his elect from one end of heaven to the other.' Dr. Campbell renders it correctly, 'Who shall assemble his elect from the four quarters of the earth, from one extremity of the world to the other.' In the discourse it is said, 'The stars shall fall from heaven—Sign of the Son of man in heaven—Son of man coming in the clouds of heaven—Heaven and earth shall pass away, but my people shall not pass away. Heaven, in all of these places, must be literally understood; and it would be doing violence to every just principle of exegesis to make the heaven named in the expression, 'powers of heaven,' anything more or less than the literal heavens.

When we understand that it is the powers of the literal heavens that are to be shaken, we may easily determine what those powers are. It is true that they are nowhere defined in the Bible, and it is not necessary that they should be: for common sense will tell us what are the powers of any and everything, viz; the laws by which they exist. They are the very foundation of the being and order of all things. Hence the powers of heaven are the natural laws of heaven, by which the natural heavens exist. Hence whenever the powers of heaven shall be shaken, then the present heavens will cease to exist, for the very powers, laws, or principles, by which they do exist will be shaken, dissolved, destroyed, or changed.

Shaking of the powers of heaven, we think, is expressive, not of a great or small shaking or commotion of the moral, religious, or political heavens, to which the world has ever been more or less subject. These things do not affect the powers even of those metaphorical heavens, and much less the literal heaven. Neither do we think it is the convulsions of the earth, seas, and atmosphere, which have as yet been witnessed: for they have always occurred and will continue to occur, only they will be more frequent, wild, and destructive, until the powers or natural laws of nature, or of heaven, shall be finally shaken, dissolved, and the great and dreadful convulsion of heaven and earth takes place at the appearing of Christ. Hence we infer that shaking the powers of heaven will be shaking heaven itself. They seem to be the strongest, most significant words that could be used, expressive of the commencement of the dissolution of the present heavens and earth, 'when the Lord shall rise up terribly to shake the earth.'

That shaking of the heavens means their dissolution is evident from many passages of scripture.—We will give two examples. 'For thus saith the Lord of hosts, Yet once, it is a little while, and I will shake the heavens, and the earth, and the sea, and the dry land, and I will shake all nations, and the desire of all nations shall come.' Hag. ii. 6, 7.—Paul, in speaking of the dissolving of all things, quotes this text, thus, 'But now he hath promised, saying, Yet once more I shake not the earth only, but also heaven; and this word, Yet once more, signifieth the removing of those things which are (or, may be) shaken, as of things that are made, that those things that cannot be shaken may remain.'—Heb. xii. 26, 27. Thus it is clear that the shaking of the heavens, or shaking of the powers of heaven, which is evidently the same, will be their dissolution. This evidently is the meaning of the Savior's words as recorded Luke xxi. 25–27. We will give Dr. Campbell's translation of the text. 'And there shall be signs in the sun, and in the moon, and in the stars; and upon the earth the anguish of desponding nations; and roarings in the seas and floods: men expiring with the fear and apprehension of those things which are coming upon the world: for the powers of heaven shall be shaken.'

It is evident that certain things named in this testimony are to take place because of the powers of heaven being shaken. It is true that nations have been and now are perplexed and distressed to some small extent, and that dreadful storms on the seas have been witnessed; and that these things will increase as preludes, or premonitory symptoms, of the convulsion of all things, we do not doubt; but that the real anguish of desponding nations, or as Matthew says, mourning of the tribes of the earth, and roaring in the seas and floods, and the expiring of men through fear, have been witnessed, we do not believe. Indeed, they cannot take place in harmony with other prophecy, which speaks of a time of peace and safety, until the actual shaking of the powers of heaven, at the appearing of Christ. The mourning of the tribes of the earth, at the appearing of the sign of the Son of man, named by Matthew; the expiring of men through fear, at the shaking of the powers of heaven, named by Luke; and the weeping of all the kindreds of the earth, at the appearing of Christ, named by John, Rev. i. 7, we think refer to the same time. And if they do, then it is certain that the sign of the Son of man, and the shaking of the powers of heaven, are inseparably connected with the actual coming of the Son of man.

According to this view of the matter, the sign of the Son of man and the shaking of the powers of heaven are not to be taken as signs of the near approach of the coming of the Son of man, but are to be intimately connected with that event. All have been seen, and in the exact order described by John, whose testimony should not be overlooked in this case. He says, Rev. vi. 12–17, 'And I beheld when he had opened the sixth seal, and, lo, there was a great earthquake; and the sun became black as sackcloth of hair, and the moon became as blood; and the stars of heaven fell unto the earth, even as a fig-tree casteth her untimely figs, when she is shaken of a mighty wind: and the heaven departed [was shaken, or rolled together] as a scroll when it is rolled together; and every mountain and island were moved out of their places. And the kings of the earth, and the great men, and the rich men, and the chief captains, and the mighty men, and every bondman, and every freeman, hid themselves in the dens and rocks of the mountains; and said to the mountains and rocks, Fall on us, and hide us from the face of him that sitteth on the throne, and from the wrath of the Lamb: for the great day of his wrath is come; and who shall be able to stand.'

According to this graphic account, the next thing to be witnessed is the departing of the heavens as a scroll. The next moment the dread scene may begin. And who shall stand when the Son of man appeareth?

Other testimony that the coming of the Lord is near, will be considered in our next.

Take heed to Yourselves.

The ultimate object or end of the gospel, the whole gospel, is to save fallen mortals. This glorious design is seen in the whole economy of grace. God so loved the world that he gave his only begotten Son that whosoever believeth on him should not perish, but have everlasting life. He gave his Son that the world might be saved through him.—for this glorious object the Savior died. For this purpose the Spirit and Word have been given; and for this end the apostles labored: they desired if by any means they might save some.

Is this heaven-worthy object seen in all of our labors as a people or as ministers and members of the church of Christ? If not, we have departed from our high and holy calling. We are in imminent danger here, and should carefully take heed unto ourselves lest we depart from the Lord at this fearful point, as others have done to their own hurt, if not ruin.

The salvation of man has clearly been seen to have been the prominent, or the only object of all the labors of every religious sect, in the days of their infancy, simplicity and purity. While this most worthy of all motives governed all their doings, great blessings attended their labors: souls were converted; yes, very many have been brought to a saving knowledge of the truth by such pure disinterested works of benevolence. Our own history as a people justifies these remarks. But where are we now? Do other motives than the salvation of our fellow men govern our spirits, words and acts, either as a body, or as individual ministers or members of the body? We fear we are not without sin here. A love of self, of a peculiar sentiment, of party, and man-made or worldly policy, we fear is too much the object of our labors. Let us all take heed to ourselves lest we stumble and fall here.

The older sects have uniformly soon lost sight of the worthy object for which they first begun to labor. Instead of the salvation of souls, or the glory of God, being kept as the ultimate object of all their work, they have soon begun to toil hard to build up their own party, church, or denomination. As soon as this unholy work has been seen to be the motive by which they have been actuated, instead of the plain and simple word of the Lord being made their exclusive rule of faith and practice, the doctrine of expediency has been embraced to justify in carrying out a worldly policy, of their own devising, or that which had been wrought out by the older and more popular sects before them. This work once fairly begun, has seldom if ever ended until those engaged in performing it have found themselves, or rather been found by others, widely departed from God, wholly swallowed up in the exclusive principles of their own party, and safely enclosed within the cold walls erected by their own unscriptural sectarian creed.

A work of this kind is not done at once: it is perfected by littles. It generally begins like this:—Our cause, or the cause of the Lord in which we are engaged, demands something more at our hand. Well, what is it? Why, error is creeping in among us, and the cause thereby is likely to suffer, and we must see to this matter. Our strength also is divided, and in order to do the greatest possible good we must take measures to unite that strength, so as to act in harmony in our common cause. And the field for doing good is wide, and all ripe for an abundant harvest, and we must devise measures and provide the means to occupy this field to the glory of God.

Thus plausibly but deceptively has the arch tempter reasoned with every young sect, when they have begun to be a little elated with their prosperity, and feel that they were doing an important work for God. The wrong has not been in their desiring to keep out error from the body, to preserve union, unite their strength in doing good, and feeling deeply anxious to occupy every important field that may have been open for their labors; but the great error, the sin, the departure from God, has lain in the manner these things have been attempted to be done. Instead of being guided solely by the word of the Lord, they have unwisely resorted to human policy, to accomplish the desired objects. Hence, Councils, Conferences, Assemblies, Associations, and Synods have been created, almost without number: Creeds, Confessions, platforms, Disciplines, Covenants, Articles of Faith, and tests, in swarms nearly as numerous, and more of a scourge than the frogs or locusts of Egypt, have infested the Church: Societies have been formed for the spread of the Bible, for missionary objects, and for nearly if not quite as many moral, religious, and benevolent purposes as there are such principles named in the Bible; and to keep this vast human machinery in motion, Money, Money, Money has been needed, and repeatedly called for, and received, from the haughty king in possession of his millions down to the widow dependant upon her daily labor for the support of herself and orphan children. Every resort, lawful and unlawful, has been made to get 'the money' to keep the wheels of this wonderful machinery moving.—Money has been the life, the soul of this many headed monster.

It is not for us to calculate the amount of good or evil that this worldly policy, under the name of religion, has done to the church and the world: the Judge of all alone can decide this case. But it is our duty to enquire, whether this policy is either directly or indirectly taught or justified by either precept or example in the Bible. And whether this very mammoth machinery, this human policy, is not now the great, the powerful, and nearly if not quite the most determined unyielding enemy of the glorious and crowning truths of the Bible, viz; the appearing of Christ and his kingdom. To the first enquiry, we fearlessly say that such policy is nowhere taught in the Bible, and we should take heed to ourselves, lest we be deceived by its bewitching influences. And to the second enquiry, we also say that this human policy now is the most powerful foe against which the simple truth, policy, or rather economy of grace has to contend. Let us take heed, therefore, lest we be found strengthening these anti-christian influences.

Certain measures, policy, or doctrine, not in strict accordance with the plain word of the Lord, for the time being may appear expedient, plausible and right, but if not plainly revealed in the Bible, they should be let alone: for they will most surely be productive, in the end, of evil. The Divine Law-giver knew perfectly well the wants of his church in all ages, and made full and perfect provision in point of doctrine and practice, in all things, for all its wants. And it is an indirect impeachment of the perfection of the perfect law, to adopt the very least policy of our own, or of human origin, to regulate the affairs of his house. Our wisdom is to shun the many fatal quicksands of this character, on which the older sects have foundered. And our only safety is in cleaving to the word of the Lord, and nothing else, in matters of this kind. We should not only be zealous to do all the Bible requires, but we should be equally zealous to do no more than it demands.—Let us take heed to ourselves on these things.

Fearful State of Things.

Poor down-trodden Ireland, steeped in crime of every die, and grovelling in darkness and papal superstition, is now suffering the awful scourge, the Famine. Thousands are in actual starvation, and hundreds are daily dying for want of bread. Poor Scotland, too, is, to a fearful extent, in a similar condition. The same scourge also is felt in some portions of France.—In Asia, the Cholera is cutting down its hundreds of thousands; and, according to present indications, will soon spread devastation over Europe, and America. The Famines now raging will most fearfully facilitate the rapid spread of the terrible Cholera. Worldly observing men begin to have fearful forebodings on account of these already existing and threatened evils.—Fearful and unheard of Storms and desolating Floods, are of frequent occurrence.—Earthquakes have recently shaken every quarter of the globe.—The friendly Alliance in Europe is nearly destroyed, and a general rupture is the threatened result.—Crime of every grade and kind stalks at large over the entire globe, bidding defiance to the laws of God and man.—The godly man ceaseth in Zion—and the Church has turned away from the truth unto fables; and but here and there one who cries and sighs for the abominations that are committed in the land.

Truly, these are trying, fearful, perilous times; clearly indicative, however, of the end of all things being at hand. O, let us not be blind to their sure but fearful import. But may we be ready for the dread crisis, the final day of retribution, which is just before us.

The article from Bro. Jacobs, in this number, contains many good things. It aims to correct certain errors into which the church has fallen, which have doubtless contributed very largely in bringing about her present moral wretchedness. But if we mistake not, Bro. J. sails very near at least another equally dangerous coast: that is, a denial altogether of any influence of the Spirit, independent of the Word. Perhaps he does not entertain a sentiment so repugnant to the plain word of the Lord, and the experience of every true child of God. There is no truth more clearly revealed than that the Lord will give the Spirit to those who ask for it according to his word. Let us be careful in shunning the danger on one side of the bridge that we do not plunge into the stream on the other side.

We learn that the cause at Buffalo is yet in a prosperous condition. Bro. Pearson recently baptized several happy converts there. A number were seeking the Lord, and some had recently been justified by faith in Christ.

Bro. Porter has been considered dangerously ill, and although the symptoms of his disease at the last accounts were more favorable, still he was considered in a very critical condition. If he recovers, it is thought that he will be unable to preach very soon again, if ever. The Lord raise him to health again, and make him strong to do his will, is the prayer of many.

A CONFERENCE AT SPRINGWATER, has recently been called for, and a notice of the appointment received from Bro. Johnson, in behalf of the brethren. The reason the notice has not been published, is, we were confident that the help depended on to attend the meeting could not be obtained at the time named in the notice; we therefore did not publish it. Will Bro. Galusha, Bywater and Hill attend a Conference at Springwater the first Sabbath in March? and will this time suit the friends there? Let each answer immediately, and the appointment shall be given accordingly.

Primitive Faith.

The following extract is from the work of 'Eusebius, Bishop of Cesarea in Palestine,' who wrote a history of the Christian church from its commencement to the year 324, at which time he lived. I thought it would interest your readers, as it clearly shows what was the faith of those Christians who lived in the days of the apostles, their immediate successors, concerning the appearing of the kingdom of Christ, and may be appropriately read in connection with my article on 'The throne of Israel.'

Eusebius says, (page 100) 'Titus was succeeded by Domitian, his brother, after he had reigned two years,' &c., and on page 102 and 103, 'Domitian issued his orders that the descendants of David should be slain. Some accused the descendants of Judas, the brother of our Savior, according to the flesh, because they were of the family of David. Eusebius quotes from Hegesippus, 'The grandchildren of Judas were brought to Domitian by Evocatus, for the Emperor was as much alarmed at the appearance of Christ as Herod, [afraid of their loss of temporal power.] He put the question whether they were of David's race, and they confessed that they were. He then asked them what property they had or how much money they owned? and both of them answered that they had between them only nine thousand denarii (each nearly 15 cts.) and this they had not in silver, but in the value of a piece of land containing only about 36 acres, from which they raised their taxes and supported themselves by their own labor. Then they also began to show their hands, exhibiting the hardness of their bodies and the callosity formed by incessant labor on their hands, as evidence of their own labor. When asked also concerning Christ and his kingdom—what its nature, and when and where it would appear, they replied, 'that it was not a temporal nor an earthly kingdom, but celestial and angelic; that it would appear at the end of the world, when coming in glory he would judge the quick and the dead, and give to every one according to his works.' Upon which, Domitian, despising them, made no reply, but treating them with contempt, as simpletons, commanded them to be dismissed, and by a decree ordered the persecution to cease.'

By this we can see that the faith of the purer ages of Christianity was, that Christ's kingdom was to appear at the end of the world, to be introduced by the judgment. O may we be ready with those relatives of our Lord, according to the flesh, and all the patriarchs, prophets, apostles, and martyrs, for an entrance into that glorious kingdom.

CORRESPONDENCE.

LETTER FROM BRO. G. HENLEY.

Bro. Marsh:—We are yet pilgrims and strangers in this wicked world, proclaiming the important truth of the speedy coming of Christ, his kingdom, the resurrection and glorification of the saints, with many more important truths connected, the fulfillment of which I pray may soon be realized. Is not this the prayer of God's waiting people at this time? Yes, I think it is,—I think we should make this important subject the prominent theme in preaching, and prayer meetings, and in our conversation with friends and neighbors, brethren and sisters; do we thus delight in the Lord's coming so as to make it our grand theme? Nothing is more calculated to wean us from the love of the world. Who can have their imaginations captivated by the things around them or their hearts pledged to earthly joys, that sincerely believes Christ will immediately appear in all his glory? Who will be covetous after the worthless treasure of this world that believes the unclouded glories of the great God may any moment be revealed, and they then share in those glories? Who will be dazzled with this world's low ambition and paltry splendor, that has in his eye the speedy attainment of a crown of glory? Oh Savior! there is a practical good and joy of heart in the meditation of thy speedy return to receive thy people unto thyself! Here is a powerful motive to inspire us to Christian duty; what motive so constraining as the speedy coming of Christ? A sense of these things being near makes us bold in professing our faith and proclaiming its glorious truth to a cold, lifeless church and a guilty world. And in view of the glories soon to be revealed, the humble child of God is made to look up, and lift up his head, because his redemption draweth nigh! Glory to God! it will soon come! Amen.

Attention to the writings of the apostles will show that they preached and conversed about the near approach of our Lord for the consolation and edification of Christians: also, on account of its practical tendency, our Savior taught us to pray for his kingdom to come—and as an object of comfort and consolation, the apostles assured Christians at Thessalonica that they should again see their departed friends who had fallen asleep in Jesus, and adduced the resurrection of Christ as a pledge of their resurrection, when the Lord Jesus shall descend from heaven! See 1 Thess. iv. 13. Paul himself in view of the hour of his departure, is consoled with the hope of a crown of righteousness, which he, with all the redeemed, will receive at that day. 2 Tim. iv. 6. Peter, when reminded of the brevity of his own life, writes an epistle to his people, the object of which is to confirm their faith in the coming of Christ, and in the expectation of living in the new heavens and the new earth. He also in exhorting the elders to feed the flock of God, comforted them with the promise that when the Chief Shepherd shall appear, that they shall receive a crown of glory that fadeth not away. James in his epistle does not encourage those to whom he writes with the hope of their reward until Christ comes; in view of their tribulations he exhorts them to be patient until the coming of the Lord, the period when they shall see in the most striking light that the sufferings of the present time are not worthy to be compared with the glory that shall then be revealed. Why does he earnestly exhort them to bear patiently their trials? The answer is found in chap. i. 7—'That the trial of your faith being much more precious than of gold that perisheth, though it be tried with fire, might be found unto praise and honor and glory, at the appearing of Jesus Christ.' John comforts us with the prospect of seeing Jesus as he is, and being like him. It is evident therefore, that the apostles, instead of dwelling on death as the period when Christians will enter upon their enjoyment, rather urged them to look forward to the coming of our Lord, when the hope of the pious will be consummated by the revelation of Jesus Christ.

The doctrine of Christ's speedy coming is a consoling subject! Are we depressed in body or mind, the near prospect of glory cheers the heart! O, afflicted believer, cast thine eye forward on the bright realities of the future! lift up thine head, for thy redemption draweth nigh! the Lord is coming! Be steadfast through hope, and the light of life shall shine around thy path—thy sorrow shall be turned into joy, and thou shalt rejoice in hope of the glory of God!

This doctrine is precious to those who love Christ's appearing—is powerful to create zeal and love for the cause of Christ, and it will excite diligence to perform every duty in the fear of God. Can any one continue cold or lukewarm, who is expecting the judge of the quick and dead immediately to appear? No: but in proportion as this truth is felt, every nerve will be strained for exertion, every energy put forth, every moment employed and every talent turned to the best advantage, for the promotion of the cause. Thus the Christian is stirred up to every duty, and led to a nearer communion with his God.

What a motive to perseverance we have but just before us! Can we lose sight of such an event as the appearing of our king—the resurrection of our departed friends—putting off mortality and putting on immortality—when death shall be swallowed up in the victory of a resurrection to eternal life—when all our Father's family shall meet in a glorified state? Can we forget or lose sight of these things? No, no; they are our hope and crown of rejoicing! and may God help us to make them the prominent theme in our preaching, in our prayer-meetings, in our conversation with friends and neighbors, the motive for ourselves to prepare to meet God. There is a practical good derived from believing these important truths; it leads to Christian holiness. Peter says 'what manner of persons ought ye to be in all holy conversation and godliness. Wherefore beloved, seeing that ye look for such things, be diligent, that ye may be found of him in peace without spot and blameless.' Brethren, be steadfast, unmovable in your faith and obedience. Be strong in the Lord. May the speedy coming of our Savior have a practical bearing on me and on you: may it stimulate us to do the will of God from the heart—for blessed is that servant, whom his Lord when he cometh, shall find so doing; waiting and longing for the return of his Lord.

Yours, expecting soon to meet you all in the morning of the resurrection,

GEO. HENLEY.

LETTER FROM BRO. BYWATER.

Dear Bro. Marsh:—I believe we have entered the last year of our pilgrimage, and before it shall close, our deliverer will come out of Zion, and turn away ungodliness from Jacob. See Isa. 44: 21, 23; also chap. 47: 24—26. It is but a little while now, and the indignation shall cease. O, how solemn is the thought; but we are nearing the crisis; God seems to be gathering in the last gleanings of the grapes, and soon the vine of the earth will be thrown into the great wine press of his wrath. It seems to me that now, emphatically, we are called upon to be watching and waiting for the day and hour of his coming; i. e. being in a state of constant preparation to meet him, not knowing the day and hour, but knowing it is nigh, and may open its grand and glorious scenery any moment. I expect the first scene in this grand event, will be the sign of the Son of man, and I am inclined to believe that Bro. D. T. T., Jr. is correct in his views as to the location of the last signs, and I think we have them traced down in order, in the 6th chap. of Revelations, from the 12th to the 17th verses; also 2d Peter, 3: 10, and many other places.

I will now give a few reasons why I think the Lord will come this year, and not to go over the ground which has so often been surveyed, I would say that the 2300 years of Daniel 8: 13, 14, define the time for the saints to be trodden down, spoiled and afflicted, at the termination of which, the indignation will cease, and deliverance will come. See Isa. 10: 25, Dan. 12: 1: We find that 70 weeks, or 490 years were cut off on the Jews to end their dispensation, and 1810 years measures the times of the Gentiles, when the fullness of the Gentiles will come, i. e. the dispensation of the fullness of times of both Jews and Gentiles, that God may gather together under Christ, all things, both in the heavens and upon the earth, even under him. We find also, that 453 years of this 2300, ended at the birth of Christ, and 1847 after his birth, completes the vision. Now, according to Gentile time, this year ends the Gentile dispensation. Now, is there no rule by which we can determine whether this be the true '47 or not? I think there is. See Daniel, 12: 12. "Blessed is he that waiteth and cometh to the 1335 days, or years." We all understand that the 1335 days are cut off from the last end of the 2300, and consequently they both end together. Now, take 1335 from 2300, and it leaves 964, from which take 453, the time which had elapsed when Christ was born, and it leaves 512, as the data from which to reckon;—1335, and 512 added together, make 1847. The only query arising from the premises, is, did the 1335 come in the vulgar era, 512? If they did, then this is the true '47, and no mistake. That they did not commence before, time has proved. Date them in 513, or later, and we have too much time. But I think that we have another period that will settle this point, 11th verse.—"And from the time that the daily (Paganism) shall be taken away, to the removing of the abomination, (the papacy or the dominion, see Dan. 7: 26,) there shall be 1290 days or years. Commencing this period at the same 512, and it ends in 1802.

This reckoning, let us understand, is Bible time, and cannot be disputed. Now, time has proved that this period did not end in 1801, and consequently the Justinian code did not go into effect in 541, nor end in 1801; and I believe no writer fixes upon any later date for the signing of the Concordat, than 1802; and if the concordat was signed that year, it proves this to be the true '47; and the Gentiles being their own time keepers, and why should they not? for the Jews kept their time, and the Savior pronounced a curse upon them, because they knew not the time of their visitation. See Luke, 19: 43, 44. So then, if this be the true '47, and I must believe it is, then we are on the very threshold of the mighty event. Amen. Even so come Lord Jesus. Yours in the hope of a speedy deliverance,
J. C. BYWATER.

Niagara, C. W., Jan. 24, '47.

LETTER FROM BRO. I. R. GATES.

Dear Bro. Marsh:—You will see by the date of this letter that I am in this cold northern region, Vt., hunting up the sheep and lambs of my Redeemer, and comforting them with the blessed assurance that the Shepherd of Israel is soon to return.

Our meetings at Waterbury, Johnson and Lowell were excellent, especially the first two. The brethren came in from all the surrounding country with warm hearts and glad countenances, which you know always is a certain pledge of a good meeting, when souls are saved and God is honored!

I find the brethren generally settled and grounded in the truth of the Lord's speedy coming; and notwithstanding there exists a diversity of opinions on the subjects that are now agitated in the 'Voice' and 'Herald' touching the conscious state of the soul between death and the resurrection, &c. I observe one noble trait in the character of all, and that is, a willingness to think and let think, to believe others equally honest with themselves—in a word, to prove all things and hold fast that which is good. Now as long as our brethren keep from making 'tests' of these minor considerations as have the papers and the sects on the thousand and one opinions that have come up, they will be able to profit by the canvassing of this as well as all other subjects in our papers. Should any think of being sectarian and proscriptive in this matter, let me advise them to go to Jesus, Paul, and the beloved John, and take a lesson of Christian charity.

As ever yours in hope,
I. R. GATES.
Montgomery, Vt., Jan. 8th, 1847.

P. S. I am now at Montgomery. Our meeting here has continued two days. It is fully attended and of an excellent character. The ministers present are Elders Stone, Green, Sampson, Cumings, Rust and myself.

The cause in this place is in the most flourishing condition, owing much to the judicious and faithful labors of Bro. Stone and others. Our beloved brother, Columbus Green, was present, but was unable to take any part in the services, owing to ill-health, which was brought on by his arduous labors in the advent cause. And I sincerely hope that our good brethren in Canada and Vermont who have been so remarkably blessed through his instrumentality, will not let him 'want for any good thing.' God will make all grace abound, but the covetous heart is looked upon in a similar light to a leachy piece of land. I go from here to Patton, C. E. and Derby Line.

Sister S. Seger, Utica, Jan. 15th, writes:—In this city, the little church is reduced almost to annihilation; I am left nearly alone. I need not conceal from you what my feelings were respecting the sad and painful scene, and how deeply I suffered at the time when I was called to witness the breaking up of our little church, and the scattering of the once devoted little band that had so long met together in harmony and love. Memory has registered many impressions and events of that period.

Dear brethren and sisters, the Lord is soon coming! I feel confident that the days of our earthly pilgrimage cannot be extended beyond the present year. Human passions and prejudices should be laid aside, that we may be prepared for the reception of the Bridegroom. For some months I have been deeply impressed with the important truth, the hastening on of the glorious event. Earth's scenes are rapidly drawing to a close, and the grand millennial era is about to commence! Let the message visit every dwelling! let the joyful tidings be heard! Soon, very soon, we shall enter upon new scenes, and another and a better state of existence, where death can no longer triumph and parting will be no more, and the ties of love and affection that here binds us to kindred and friends, and renders home and the family circle a paradise, will no more be severed.

Bro. J. A. Packard, Stratton, Vt., Jan. 21st, writes:—

We are nearing the great day of God—that day that will try men's souls. O, dear brethren, how faithful we ought to live. We say that we believe the Lord is coming; do we act like it? do we obey the words of the blessed Jesus, Luke xii. 35—'Let your loins be girded about and your lights burning?' Do we meet often and exhort one another as we see the day approaching? Do we watch and pray as we are taught by our glorious Lord? Finally, are we striving to be more and more like our blessed Master? O, my brethren, prove yourselves and see whether you are in the faith or not. It is no time to sleep—the Lord is coming! The crown is about to be placed upon the heads of the faithful, the glories of an earth made new are soon to be realized by the saints. O, my brethren, wake up! we have got almost home! Well, fight on, pray on, toil on, a few days more, and all will be over, heaven will be yours. God is faithful who has called you—the promises of God are yea and amen in Christ Jesus to every one that believeth! Fear not little flock, it is your Father's good pleasure to give you the kingdom!

Bro. I. Varney, Brunswick, Me., Jan. 25th, writes:—

There is a remnant according to the election of grace in this place and Topsham who are standing firm in this time of trial and temptation, and are rejoicing in hope of the glory of God. We are united in the faith and hope of the gospel, believing that this year is the year of the Lord's redemption, and that redemption will come before its close.

THE BODY OF MOSES.

I have for some time past been looking at the question, whether a dead man knows anything or not? I have read the arguments published in the Advent Herald on that subject, and am more convinced than ever that the dead know nothing. In conversing with people on this subject, I find their strongest argument against the unconscious state of the dead is, that Moses was seen on the Mount of Transfiguration, and it is supposed it must have been his spirit, and which, it is thought, proves that he exists out of the body. I must beg leave to differ from this view of the matter.

Now I wish to show by a strong inference that Moses was raised from the dead before he was seen on the mount. In Jude, the 9th verse, it is said that Michael and the Devil had a dispute about the body of Moses. What was there about the body of Moses, as a body, to be called in question? I think the devil claimed his right to hold his power over death, when Michael was commissioned to raise Moses from the grave; hence, the dispute was on the claim that the devil has power over death. See Heb. ii. 14. The resurrection of Moses was an exception to the general rule.

The fact that Moses was seen on the mount, coupled with the evidence above, shows that he had a resurrection. The Savior appeared to his disciples after his resurrection, and they thought he was a spirit; but he said, 'A spirit hath not flesh and bones as you see me have.' In these words he corrected the erroneous notion of the existence of a person's spirit separate from the body, which to me is evidently not a doctrine of the Bible.

OBITUARY.

Died, at his residence in White Water Township, Dubuque county, Iowa, the 10th ultimo, Mr. Samuel Jenks, aged 62 years. He was born in the State of Rhode Island, but early in life he removed to Western New York, when he became acquainted with the Christians, and was converted under the preaching of Elder Hathaway and Blodget, and during a period of over 25 years he lived a consistent and devoted Christian, and a member of that connection. But five or six years previous to his death he became acquainted with the doctrine of the 2d advent of Christ. During his sickness, which was about three months, his whole conversation was on the subject of the advent, exhorting all to be ready for the end of all things. And his dying testimony was, 'Time is short!' He died in the triumphs of faith and has gone from labor to rest, and left a large circle of relatives and friends who deeply mourn their loss.

Also, at Casdade, Dubuque county, Iowa, on the 26th ultimo, Mr. John Millett, aged 35 years, son-in-law to Samuel Jenks. He never made a profession of religion, but always sustained the reputation of a good moral man; but a few days previous to his death he gave evidence of a preparation for his departure, and while his companion and friends were weeping around his dying bed, he exclaimed, 'Weep not for me, for Christ is soon coming.'

"How long, dear Savior, O how long, Slight this bright hour delay!"

What men call grandeur, glory and power, are, in the sight of God, but misery and folly.

A Song of Sorrow.

BY J. A. WHITFIELD.

The British Anti-Slavery Reporter of 1st of 12th month last, gives an affecting extract from the journal of James Richardson, the philanthropic African traveller, whom we have already noticed:

"SERAH, Oasis of Fezzan, 10th March, 1846.

"This evening the female slaves were unusually excited in singing, and I had the curiosity to ask my negro servant, Sa-id, what they were singing about. As many of them were natives of his own country, he had no difficulty in translating the Mandara or Bornou language. I had often asked the Moors to translate their songs for me, but got no satisfactory account of them. Sa-id at first said, 'O! they sing of Rubee,' (God.) 'What do you mean?' I replied impatiently. 'Oh, don't you know,' he continued, 'they asked God to give them their Atka!' (certificate of freedom.) I inquired, 'Is that all?' Sa-id—'No; they say, 'Where are we going? The world is large. O God! Where are we going? O God!'" I inquired, 'What else?' Sa-id—'They remember their country, Bornou, and say, "Bornou was a pleasant country, full of all good things; but this is a bad country, and we are miserable." 'Do they say anything else?' Sa-id—'No; they repeat these words over and over again, and add, "O God! give us our Atka, and let us return again to our dear home."

"I am not surprised I got little satisfaction when I asked the Moors about the songs of their slaves. Who will say that the above words are not a very appropriate song? What could have been more congenially adapted to their then woe-ful condition? May Heaven hear their prayer, give them their liberty, and restore them to their country. It is not to be wondered at that these poor bondwomen cheer up their hearts, in their long, lonely and painful wanderings over the desert, with words and sentiments like these; but I have often observed that their fatigue and sufferings were too great for them to strike up this melancholy dirge, and many days their plaintive strains never broke over the silence of the Desert."

The following is an attempt to versify this melancholy appeal of distressed human nature to the help and justice of God. Nothing can be added to its simple pathos:

SONG OF THE SLAVES IN THE DESERT.

Where are we going? Where are we going?
Where are we going, Rubee?
Hear us! Save us! Make us free;
Send our Atka down from thee!
Here the Ghibber wind is blowing,
Strange and large the world is growing!
Tell us, Rubee, where are we going?
Where are we going, Rubee?
Bornou! Bornou! Where is Bornou?
Where are we going, Rubee?
Bornou-land was rich and good,
Wells of water, fields of food,
Bornou-land we see no longer,
Here we thirst, and here we hunger,
Here the Moor man smites in anger;
Where are we going, Rubee?
Where are we going? Where are we going?
Hear us, save us, Rubee!
Moons of warches from our eyes,
Bornou land behind us lies;
Hot the desert wind is blowing,
Wild the waves of sand are flowing!
Hear us! Tell us, Where are we going?
Where are we going, Rubee? (Nat. Era.)

Our Earth's Distance from the other Planets.

To convey to your minds any idea of the immense distance which separates us from those twinkling orbs which nightly gem our firmament, is utterly impossible. We may talk of millions and thousands of million of miles, but this serves only to perplex and confound the feeble intellect of finite man. I may tell you that light which flies at the rate of ten millions of miles in a second, and which is conveyed to the distant planet of Le Verrier, and reflected back to us in the short space of a few minutes, will require ten years in coming from the nearest fixed star; and if that star was suddenly blotted from existence, it would continue to shine for ten long years in the place it once occupied. Even were it possible for us to transport ourselves to the very confines of our system, or to the planet of Le Verrier, we should still continue to see these objects in their old places, and to all appearance no nearer than before. Here would be Sirius blazing in its wonted splendor; yonder we should see Orion; and there the Polar Bear.—Prof. Mitchell.

THE 'LIBERAL' POPE.—If any innocent Protestant has been beguiled into a hope that something for liberty and light is to be expected from the new Pope, we fear he will have to dismiss it as a delusion. An encyclical letter has been issued from the Vatican, which out-Popes all his modern predecessors, in virulent denunciation and bigotry. Old mediæval dogmas which are becoming the laughing stock of the world, find a patron and an asserter in the Pope; and if the tone and spirit of the letter afford a ground of judging, the church was never farther from liberality and reform than under the present occupant of the chair of St. Peter. The infallibility of the Pope; the exclusive possession of the way to heaven; and the sole and utter purity of Romish doctrines are among the things claimed. Secret societies are denounced, and also "insidious Bible Societies which," says his Holiness, "renewing the crafts of the ancient heretics, cease not to obtrude upon all kinds of men, even the least instructed, gratuitously and at immense expense, copies in vast numbers of the books of the sacred Scriptures, translated against the holiest rules of the church into various vulgar tongues, to the end that Divine tradition, the doctrine of the fathers and the authority of the Catholic church being rejected, every man may interpret the revelations of the Almighty according to his own private judgment!"—shocking crime! "That horrible system," also comes in for a share of sacred abuse, as "extremely repugnant even to the light of natural reason, of indifference to any kind of religion, by which these impostors, abolishing all distinction between truth and falsehood, between honesty and baseness, pretend to secure eternal salvation to men of any form of worship whatsoever." Anathemas are also hurled against "that infamous conspiracy against the sacred celibacy of the clergy, which, oh! shame, has been encouraged even by some ecclesiastics; who, miserably forgetful of their proper dignity, have suffered themselves to be overcome and drawn aside by the seductions and the blandishments of illicit pleasure." "That most foul plague of books and pamphlets" also greatly disturbs his apostolic serenity. These are specimens of the teachings of a Christian chief pastor—a successor of the Apostles, in the middle of the nineteenth century.

IRELAND.—The state of Ireland is of the most distressing character. The "Roscommon Journal" states, that the poor-house there, though built to contain but 800, now contains 1100, and that not less than twelve die daily from starvation! This is a fair sample of the destitution that pervades almost the entire land. And what is strange, though awfully ominous, is the fact, that those who can scrape together money enough for the purpose (notwithstanding they may be pinched with hunger,) are expending their last penny for fire-arms. The English journals state, that the sales of fire-arms is enormous; so much so, that Government has manifested some alarm, and admonished all magistrates to double their vigilance. Notwithstanding this state of things, but few outrages, comparatively, have been perpetrated. But a people so hasty and rash as are the Irish, will not long remain quiescent, with the instruments of death in their hands.

The suppression of Cracow by Russia, Prussia, and Austria, and its annexation to the crown of the latter, has produced a deep feeling in Europe, particularly in France. The French press are unanimous in their call for a reconciliation between France and England, in order that they may present an united protest against the extinction of the Polish Republic. But England declines the coalition, and protests single-handed.

BLISS' GEOGRAPHY.

"ANALYSIS OF GEOGRAPHY."—By S. BLISS. This is a work prepared some years since, and is on a new plan, from which its author used to teach. It will be of interest to families as well as schools. Price, 62½ cts., or $6 per dozen.

Some are bound in paper covers, to be sent by mail. Postage (to any part of the Union,) 12½ cts.

Orders should be addressed, J. V. Himes, Boston, Mass.

The following notice from one of the teachers of the Collegiate Institute, in this city, presents the work in its true light:

Mr. S. BLISS—Sir: After a hasty perusal of your "Analysis of Geography for the use of Schools, Academies, &c." I have no hesitation in saying, that I deem it a work well designed to aid any one wishing to acquire a practical knowledge of Geography.

It differs from other similar works in the arrangement of the topics to be studied. Your classification of the Rivers, Chief Towns, Cities, &c., is good; so is your arrangement of "Descriptive Geography." The tabular arrangement is well applied to this subject. For example: you have presented on p. 36th and 37th, in the first and left hand column, a brief and comprehensive description of the five grand divisions of the globe; in the 2d column, their climate; in the 3d, surface; 4th, soil; 5th, productions; 6th, agriculture; 7th, manufactures; 8th, commerce; 9th, minerals; 10th, government; 11th, religion; 12th, character of the inhabitants; 13th, employment, and 14th, exports. All of the political divisions of the globe are described in a similar manner.

The maps are colored, and present to the eye of the learner in juxtaposition the natural and political divisions, enabling the scholar to view the earth as it was before the political divisions were made.

I think from a hasty examination of your book, that the classification of topics is such as will enable the learner better, with the aid of the "Synthetical Key," to arrange and combine his geographical knowledge, than any work of the kind which I have seen.

Yours, with due respect,

LEANDER WETHERELL.

APPOINTMENTS.

The Lord willing, I will preach at—Attica—Evening of Feb. 17th.
Buffalo—Evenings of Feb. 18th and 19th, and three times on the 21st (Sabbath).

Lockport—Evenings of Feb. 22d, 23d, and 24th.

J. V. HIMES.

A Conference is appointed to commence in Vergennes, Vt., on Friday, March 5th, at half past 10 A. M., and close the Sunday evening following. Bro. Edwin Burdick is expected to attend. Come up, my brethren, in the name of the Lord and help us.

G. W. BERNHAIN.

BUSINESS NOTES.

S. Marsh—We have credited $2 to Bro. R. Ireland as you wished us to do.

Did you know all the facts, you would not be grieved, but would approve of our course.

Bro. Bywater—We have no Testaments; neither can we find West Middlebury on our books. Is not the Post Office called by another name?

Bro. J. J. Porter—Bro. C. Friend has paid $1, which we have placed to your credit on Voice of Truth.

Sister Hall—For West India Mission $5; sent to Wm. Ide, 111 Wall street, New York.

R. Oliphant—Credit on book account 65 cts. All satisfactory.

Bro. W. Robbins—We have none but the bound Harp—consequently cannot send by mail. Have credited the whole on account of paper: Is this right?

J. Skinner—we will do what we can for the cause at Toronto.

Receipts for Week ending Feb. 12th, 1847.

I want to go Home—take me Home!

BY R. OLIPHANT.

In infancy's days, on my mother's pure bosom,
While resting secure on that unsmiling breast,
I would not exchange it for haubt or blossom,
For that was my ideal haven of rest;
And when from her lap by the maid I was taken,
And, with me in her arms, o'er the meadows she'd roam,
My cry was unceasing—my purpose unshaken—
"I want to go home—take me home—take me home!"

In harder hours—in hoisterous childhood,
With happy companions in innocent play,
When bounding through meadow, on hill-side or wild-wood,
With spirits, as audacious air, light and free,
The pasture soon wearied, and lost its enjoyment—
No longer could I from the lov'd dwelling roam;
And I sighed, while desiring domestic employment,
"I want to go home—take me home—take me home!"

In still later times, when strong manhood had crown'd me,
(From the homestead I lov'd by a Providence torn),
Though charin'd with my wife and my children around me,
I still was unconcill'd—lonely—forlorn;
Though bless'd with each comfort the heart could inherit Nearth the roof of a cot or magnificent dome,
My heart was depress'd, and I murmur'd in spirit,
"I want to go home—take me home—take me home!"

And now, while awaiting, on Jordan's chill borders,
The flow of the stream, and return of the tide,
To land me where sorrows, and wants, and disorders,
No more shall annoy on the opposite side,
I feel a desire, when sanctified wholly—
When bidding adieu to life's turbulent foam,
To say to a convoy of angels most holy,
"I want to go home—take me home—take me home!"

Concluding Reflections on the Visions of Daniel.

BY T. R. BIRKS, M. A.

FELLOW OF TRINITY COLLEGE, CAMBRIDGE, ENGLAND.

DAN. II. 47—"The king answered unto Daniel and said, Of a truth it is that you are a prophet of gods, and a Lord of kings, and a revealer of secrets, seeing thou couldst reveal this secret."
VIII. 25—"Hitherto is the end of the matter. As for me, Daniel, my cogitations much troubled me, and my countenance changed in me; but I kept the matter in my heart."

For let us consider for a moment what would be implied in a revived supremacy of Popery at the present day. All its ordinances against heresy and its statutes of persecution remain unchanged. And their temporary disuse, the result of judgments without, not of repentance within, would serve only to whet the appetite for vengeance. The seeming triumph would be taken as a pledge of entire success, and be attended by the rise of a fierce and fanatic zeal. So that the smouldering flame of persecution would blaze with a double violence, and the little horn, even at the last, make itself drunk with the blood of the martyrs of Jesus. Who can view such a scene as even possible, nay perhaps near at hand, and not long to preserve his country from so fearful a sin, and its attendant judgments?

But the subject affects us, even still more nearly, as members of the visible church. It cannot surprise us that statesmen should grow dim-sighted to the impending evil, if the Church is infected with the plague, and the light itself is turned into darkness. Yet such is the danger that begets us at this very hour. And no full remedy can be found for this evil also, but a humble, patient meditation on these words of prophecy.

*These remarks have been left in their original form. The events now passing are a painful confirmation of their truth; and show the mournful blindness to which statesmen are given up, in God's righteous anger, when they reject the lessons and warnings of His word. He who sits in the heavens takes delight in confounding such schemes of ungodliness, and brings to nothing the understanding of the prudent, when they would secure that peace which He only can bestow, by promoting what He has condemn'd. And thus we shall see before long, if this measure become law, the scheme of fancied conciliation will become God's engine for shaking our empire in pieces, for purifying His church, and hastening on the predicted judgments.

Here, indeed, is one mark on the Church principles, so called, which some would revive at the present hour, that most plainly brands them as involving a spirit of delusion. Their admirers and champions shrink from the sure word of prophecy. It seems their object to impress on the Church, not how much, but how little, is to be learned from its page. This alone might prove them unfit to guide the Church of Christ aright in the hour of danger. A pilot, who should seek to persuade the mariners that all charts and observations were useless, until the vessel was in sight of the harbor, would be thought an impostor or a madman; and well would it be if the vessel, under such guidance, were to escape shipwreck long before it had reached its haven. Very similar is the case of those who maintain that prophecy reveals nothing to the Church, save the events of three or four years just before the Second Advent. The light is thus quenched which God himself has provided, and what wonder if both teachers and disciples stumble in thick darkness?

A lively faith in this one prophecy of Daniel, will be a sure bulwark against these ecclesiastical delusions. Once let us realize the true meaning of the Little Horn, and the whole structure of mere ceremonial religion, like the walls of Jericho, falls in a moment. This truth is like a powerful medicine, applied by a wise physician to the seat of the disease. The sacraments were duly administered in their outward form; ordination conferred in canonical succession; church authority went on increasing; and the goody building of traditional Christianity grew to its full height, more imposing in worldly grandeur at every stage. And behold, when these principles have achieved their full triumph, and have developed themselves in perfect manhood, the whole fabric is found to answer, in every jot and tittle, to the hateful and accursed dominion of the little horn. An antidote is thus provided to resist the first inroads of the evil. Its dangerous tendencies are clearly exposed. The church is warned, as with a voice from heaven, to beware of this blind dependence on outward forms, and to aim at the power and life of inward holiness; without which holy sacraments become hideous mockeries, and the perfection of Church order a prelude for the tyranny of hell.

Ignorance of church history, it has been said, is the great source of religious controversy. And in one sense this may be true, though in a sense widely different from that which was designed. When church history is read without any other guide than the various predilections and tastes of the reader, instead of healing controversies, its tendency will be to multiply them a hundred fold. But the history of the church, read in the light of the prophecies, would indeed be a cure for many and dangerous errors. For then we should see God's own sentence passed on the various ages of the church, their spiritual features unveiled, the steps of apostacy, the times of partial revival, fore-shown; and a clear and steady light reflected on those changes where the spirit would otherwise lose itself in its own devious wanderings. This is eminently true of the New Testament prophecies, but the remark applies even to this simpler vision. Those who follow its plain teaching could never be guilty of the sin or folly of depending, for their main standards of discipline and practice, on that very age which witnessed the fall of the fourth empire, and the first budding of the predicted Little Horn.

But the lesson to be drawn from the prophecy applies, with equal power, in the more secret experience of the Christian life. For neither laxity and indifference to Divine truth in the state, nor Romish principles in the church, could arise to trouble us, unless there were a deeper form of the evil at work within the heart. That secret evil is the spirit of unbelief as opposed to faith, the tendency to rest on human authority in religion, in contrast with divine. Man shrinks, in his fallen state, from direct intercourse with his Maker. He shrinks from the supreme authority which divine truth, clearly seen, maintains over the conscience. He loves to shelter himself in an atmosphere of doubt, a maze of uncertain opinions. It matters not whether those opinions are loosely formed for himself, or, as a still easier course, taken on trust from others. It is enough that they be opinions merely, not direct, immediate, and living convictions, based on the authority of God alone. He is willing even to set them up as idols, and to fight for them with a bigot zeal: if he may only be suffered to retain his secret unbelief, and be relieved from the authority of the truth, forced on his own conscience by the Spirit with the very light of heaven. Thus incredulity and blind servility to man form a secret compact, by which each strengthens its own dominion. And thus all the reasonings of those who strain ecclesiastical authority to its highest pitch are infidel reasonings at heart. They are based on the darkness of the Scriptures, and the uncertainty of truth. They treat its discovery as a matter of chance; and the doctrines of God's word as matters of chance also. Therefore the only way of quieting the conscience in such an atmosphere of doubt, and where salvation is at stake, is to repose blindly, and with implicit faith, on the authority of the church; and to settle for ourselves, blindly and at a venture, where that authority must reside.

Such is the deep and secret nature of the evil, as it affects the inward experience of the Christian. The remedy must correspond, and it is fully supplied by this and similar prophecies. The blind subjection to human authority is here swept away; for it is this very subjection by which the kingdom of antichrist grows up to maturity in the church of God. But not only is the authority of the church brought down to its just level, but the authority of God himself is brought nearer, and made to apply with a closer and deeper power.

We have here the mind of God revealed to us, not merely in abstract truths delivered long ago, but in His express judgment on the various ages of the church down to the present day, and on the principles and maxims which have successively prevailed. From such a judgment, once clearly apprehended, there can be no appeal. The authority of man is mute and silent in presence of the supreme Judge, and the very delusions which would else distract our faith are turned into the means of its surer confirmation.

It is true that this part of Divine truth, when severed from the rest, may lead in its turn to serious evils. Among these mysterious predictions, an unbridled fancy may sport itself to its own hurt; and a spirit of rash judgment may be cherished, most injurious to real humility and Christian love. But the remedy is not to neglect these prophecies, but to combine their lessons with other and contrasted truths. Seen in their true harmony, they will not tempt us to dishonor or slight those authorities which God has, in express terms, commanded us to honor and revere; but only to temper obedience with caution, and submission with faithfulness; to mark, with a jealous care, the first step towards a blind and servile idolatry; and, as St. Paul withstood Peter himself to the face, to stand fast in the liberty of Christ, and refuse to be entangled with a yoke of anti-Christian bondage. (To be Continued.)

Two-Horned Beast.

When I gave my last article on the two-horned beast of the 13th chapter of Revelation, it was not my intention to trouble the brethren further upon this subject. But when I look at the awful judgments written against those who worship the beast or his image, and that none can stand upon the sea of glass except they who get 'the victory over the beast, and over his image, and over his mark, and over the number of his name,' and then reflect that many of the dear brethren are standing exposed to those judgments, (perhaps from lack of knowledge) the importance of the subject is magnified to my mind to that degree, that I am brought into condemnation by withholding from them any evidences which the Lord has been pleased to throw in my way, calculated to impart light upon a subject of such vital importance to the true child of God. I therefore communicate the following, hoping, through the blessing of the Lord, that the brethren and all others who are seeking after truth may be aided and enlightened upon this subject, and may the God of all mercies be pleased to give us grace to be able to achieve such a victory over these powers, that they may be permitted 'to live and reign with Christ a thousand years.' Rev. xx. 4.

In my former communication published in the Voice of Truth, the 19th of August last, I proved, or attempted so to do, that the allied powers of Europe was the two-horned beast; that that power was the 8th form or head of the 4th or Roman kingdom, and was yet of the 7th, i. e. the same power referred to in the 17th chapter, under the emblem of a scarlet colored beast full of the names of blasphemy, having seven heads and ten horns, upon which the woman (papacy,) was seated, and which power was to carry her to the judgment; that the names of blasphemy were the different kingdoms or powers of earth over which the allied powers exerted a controlling influence and synchronized with the number of his name in the last verses of the 13th chapter, and I now add that both from the prophecy and the facts of the case there adduced, that that power must of necessity embrace the entire earth, and is or has been more extensive than was either the Babylonish, Medo Persian, Grecian kingdoms, or imperial Rome, when the decree went forth that all the world should be taxed: consequently, events occurring even in these United States in accordance with the prophecy, may with propriety be placed under the two-horned beast.

As some do not understand how the allied powers can be the 8th form and yet of the 7th, and as there is manifestly some ambiguity in my former articles upon this point, I now, in order to make (if possible) this point clear, make the following brief statement; but will first remark, that I understand the term dragon as used in the 12th and 13th chapters, to denote the imperial or absolute secular power of the 4th or Roman kingdom, lodged in the emperor or head of the government. But to proceed—

The head in verse 3d denotes the 6th or imperial form. The wound was made when imperial Rome was taken out of the way to make room for the papal or 7th form; that during the 1260 years of papal domination, the 6th head or form, so far as noted in this prophecy was dead, as the end of which time the 7th or papal form was killed by the sword by Bonaparte, as mentioned in verse 10th. At the downfall of Bonaparte arose the alliance, composed of emperors, kings, &c., (mark, the people had no part in it and were not represented) which power manifestly has ever spoken 'like a dragon,' i. e. like imperial Rome whose will was absolute: when this power arose the deadly wound of verse 3d was healed under the two-horned beast as mentioned in verse 12th. Then was restored the form 'that was' (when the Revelator wrote) 'and is not' (during papal Rome) 'and yet is,' 'he is the eighth and is of the seven and goeth into perdition.' I think none acquainted with history can doubt but what the will of the allied power is equally absolute as that of imperial Rome; its will is and has been the law of the nations of the earth since A. D. 1614.

Exposition of verses 13, 14: I have long been at a loss to know whether we were to look for a literal calling down of fire from heaven or something figurative; and as most of the chapter is clearly figurative, I have been led to look for a corresponding fulfilment, but have recently changed my views, and now offer the following extract from a work recently published by a Mr. Forbush upon 'Electricity,' as a literal fulfilment—who says, 'When we use the word Electricity it conveys to our mind the idea of that marvelous and mysterious agency which spans the heavens with its livid flames of fire, in the form of lightning, &c. Now when we consider that an agency so vast and diffusive, may be seized upon by the grasping hand of man, its lightning wings tamed, its fiery darts controlled, its potency directed and made to subserve the purposes of man in a variety of ways; when we consider that at his bidding it may be caused to communicate his more important business intelligence as well as his most private correspondence from one part of the country to another, with the extraordinary speed of 200,000 miles in a second! The importance of the principle, and the important bearings it will have in accelerating the progress of the human mind, in bringing the distant nations of earth into one neighborhood, and uniting the great family of man in one common bond of brotherly love and unitary existence, is neither duly appreciated or understood.' Again he says, 'Ancient fastings are cut loose—circumscribed and intolerant views discarded, and we find ourselves in one broad unfathomed ocean of mind, with the elements for our ministers and a spark from the central fires of the universe for the propelling power.' This to my mind is one of the great wonders which this beast had power to do in the sight of men; all can see it.

The miracles (or signs according to Campbell) in verse 14th, which this two-horned beast had power to do in sight of the beast, (papacy,) whereby the dwellers upon earth are deceived, I think is nothing more nor less than the astonishing results arising or developed through the arts and sciences and improvements of the present day under the liberal and fostering care of the various Protestant governments of earth. Look for instance at the magnetic telegraph referred to above, which is being extended throughout Europe, and is expected to be extended, soon, over the entire earth: then at our Railroads, Steamboats, Canals, &c., the boast and glory of this so called golden age; then at the discoveries made in matter and mind, the laws that govern them, also the elements and the laws which govern them, were amidst the mighty 'whirlwinds,' which of late have gone up from the coasts of the earth, carrying terror and destruction to those who go down upon the great deep, extending over nearly half of the earth. Turn your eye whichever way you will, and we see the same onward progress in almost every department, so much so that every intelligent observer is constrained to say we are truly living in an age of wonders.

The inquiry naturally arises as to the effects these wonders have produced upon the minds and hearts of the dwellers upon earth. Does it lead them to believe that we according to the Scriptures are living in that little period of time, called the time of the end, when many should run to and fro and knowledge be increased? or in other words, does it lead them to God and his truth, to see what it is that is really coming upon the earth, and to seek in Christ that preparation that shall stand when the earth shall reel to and fro like a drunken man? O no—directly the reverse! all who are engaged or much interested in these things, are like Mr. Forbush, deceived into the vain and delusive hope, that through these instrumentalities the nations and great family of man, are soon to be brought into 'one common bond of brotherly love and unitary existence, and are rushing forward with telegraphic despatch in their own deceiving, down the broad road to destruction, amidst all the blaze of gospel light which shines around them, and soon, yea, very soon, 'a spark from the central fires of the universe' will involve them and all their delusions in the flames of the burning day! Even the learned and devoted Dr. Beecher is so intoxicated with these delusions, as to declare in the metropolis of the world, (London) that these improvements are to constitute the second coming of Christ in His Glory! Also the celebrated Dr. Bushnell of Hartford has drank so deep of the same spirit, as to declare very much the same thing! which declarations are in fact, the faith of the so called orthodox churches of the land, and are re-echoed back by nearly the whole ministry of the various denominations. O! how fearfully and awfully are the dwellers upon earth deceived! could the deception be more perfect? I think not. I fear that nothing will break the delusion but the strong voice of the arch angel, and the shrill notes of the trump of God, summoning them to judgment! then it will be forever to late.

But what beast is it in whose sight these wonders are performed? I answer the papal beast, from the fact that amidst all the improvements of the day referred to above, the papacy has taken no part in the matter. Instead of aiding them forward has opposed and stood aloof, occasionally muttering anathemas against them, on account of their encroachments upon his rights. Has manifested much the same spirit as that of the chained mastiff whilst being robbed of his prey without the means of redress. The late Pope denounced Rail Roads &c. as works of the devil, and entirely prevented their construction in the papal states of Italy. The present Pope who manifests a disposition to favor improvements has already so incensed his Cardinals and Bishops, as to render his life unsafe in their hands.

Last clause of vs. 14th, 'saying to them that dwell upon the earth that they should make an image to the beast that had the wound by the sword and did live.' In my former article I think I proved that it was the 42 month, or papal beast, which had the wound by the sword, and that it was made by Buonaparte about the commencement of the present century, when v. 10 was fulfilled upon that power, and that it commenced living again under the acts of the allied powers in the Vienna Congress of 1814. Consequently we must look for an image to the papacy, that is, something that shall in its rise and progress resemble that power. That we may see this resemblance in the power I am about to introduce to the reader's notice, it will be necessary to examine briefly into some of the peculiarities of the papacy, its rise, progress &c., up to the time of its full development, as 'the abomination of desolation,' and then place alongside of it that which I verily believe to be the image, and if we find the resemblance perfect in its leading characteristics, then I shall claim that we have found the real 'image.'

I now give the following abridgement and extracts from one of the sermons preached by Charles Beecher at Fort Wayne, (Iowa) in Feb. 1846, in which I think both the papacy and his image can be plainly seen by the reader. Taking all things into consideration, I think his statements and declarations to be good authority, viz:

Text—2 Tim. 3:16—17 'All Scripture is given by inspiration of God and is profitable for doctrine &c., that the man of God may be perfect, thoroughly furnished unto all good works. In his first discourse he establishes the fact that the Bible, of itself, is a sufficient creed for the church in every age and circumstance. He then proceeds with his second proposition, viz; The substitution of any creed in addition thereto, is a step towards apostasy. In the progress of his discourse he proves from history, that during most of the first two centuries, the apostolic church was without any other creed than that of the Bible. During that time churches were independent, all members equal, each church was a presbytery in itself. That the modern form of Presbyteries, Synods and General Assemblies were unknown. That they were borrowed by the Greeks from the political world. 'The idea of an authoritative creed is therefore exclusively political. It is not of a Christian parentage.—That about the middle of the second century councils began to arise, creeds began to be made by which the rights of the people were abridged, and the authority of the Bishops augmented.—'By thus consolidating the churches by delegates into a political union, was formed a Hierarchy. For the delegates little by little transformed themselves into legislators and avowed that Christ had given them power to make laws of faith and practice for the people. Things went on gradually until A. D. 325, when the first general council was called, and the first general creed made, viz; the council of Nice and the Nicene Creed.' That that council was called by a Roman Emperor (Constantine) and consisted of 318 Bishops, 'who fully settled the doctrines taught in the Bible,' banished Arius into Illyria, and compelled his followers to subscribe. Here is the happy origin of authoritative creeds.' The creeds thus established fomented divisions instead of suppressing. Having thus mashed and gagged the Bible, they went on adding 'creed upon creed, tradition upon tradition, fable upon fable, lodged at last in the papal chair, and launched imperial thunders against the Bible itself. This is what I mean by saying that the creed making power was a radical feature of Roman apostasy, and this power it is that we are now reviving under a protestant form.' He then adds, 'We are doing the self same things by which the creed making power then and there began, and strange to say, are using the self same arguments therefor. What were the Romish arguments from the days of the Nicene debate down to the pontifical anathemas? They were, Truth is one, therefore true believers cannot differ.—But they do differ, therefore there is heresy. Heresy must be kept out, make a creed to keep it out, and as to which side is heresy, 'Quod semper, quod ubique, quod ab omnibus'—that is, heresy is the opinion in the minority, a strange rule in a world where wise heads are certainly not generally in the majority, but a rule eminently convenient and practical. Yes shear off the troublesome thinkers and sing stantant hallelujahs! This by way of keeping the church! This has been Rome's policy. Mother of harlots! How holy has she protected the purity of the church.'

'Now, unless my ears deceive, Protestants are using the same arguments, only, for church, read denomination. We must keep the denomination pure! We must keep out heresy, i. e., the opinion of the minority, and although God has said the Bible is perfect, for this very purpose, we say No. We want a creed to boot. And is not this just the same as when Rome said it? Was saint worship any better than demon worship? Is denomination creed power any better than Catholic creed power? In another part of his discourse after referring to the unhappy state of the church, he adds; 'Dimly does every one now and then see that things are wrong. With sighs does every true heart confess that rottenness is somewhere, but ah, it is hopeless of reform. We pass and the tide rolls down to Night. The time has come when men 'having itching ears,' &c. 'and will not endure sound doctrine, but are turned aside to fables;' and the whole has come about stealthily, nobody knows how, among good men out of good motives. Was not this the way things went with Rome? Are we not living her life over again? and what do we see just ahead? Another general council! a world's convention! Evangelical Alliance and universal creed.'

As the acts of that council are in the past and become matters of history, we can plainly see that Mr. B.'s forebodings have been more than realized—and I venture the assertion that the 'Nicene Council,' or any other that ever assembled independent of the Pope and his cardinals were ever more reckless and made greater sacrifices of principle and truth, than did that body in attaining their object of a universal creed. Their nine articles taking into consideration all the circumstances of their adoption, &c., the ostensible object of which, like that of the mother of Harlots, was to keep the churches or denominations pure, marks them indelibly as the legitimate daughters of their apostate mother, and disclose itself to the world as the full grown image.

As to what is denoted by killing, &c., may be considered hereafter. I am sorry to be brought to the foregoing conclusions relative to the churches of the day. But facts are stubborn things, and those before me will not justify in speaking otherwise than I have done. May the Lord add his blessing, and aid all who may yet be lingeringly worshiping the beast or his image to escape while they yet have space and opportunity, lest the judgments of Almighty God be poured out upon them without mixture. Amen. P. ALLING.

1 John ii. 15.

Let me remind you, my brethren, whom 'God hath called out of darkness into his marvellous light,' of some very important reasons why we should not love the world:

1st. Because we are required to love God, and it is impossible to love him and the world at the same time. 'If any man love the world,' says John, 'the love of the Father is not in him.' The blessed Savior has also instructed us, that no man can serve two masters: for either he will hate the one, and love the other; or else he will hold to the one and despise the other. Ye cannot serve God and mammon. It is a command of God, that we should love him with all our heart, mind, soul and strength; and those who, in disobedience to this great command, love this world more than they do him, are subjects of his wrath, and will finally be accursed unless they repent of such wickedness. 'But if any man love God, the same is known of him,' and will in the end, if he continues in his love, inherit the glorious and eternal kingdom which he hath prepared to such. If we love God, we shall keep his commandments, and love one another. 'God is love; and he that dwelleth in love dwelleth in God and God in him.' 'We love him because he first loved us.'

2d. We should 'love not the world,' neither the things that are in the world,' because we cannot do so without being covetous; and covetousness is idolatry. We may be assured, that that man who is eager to gain property, and lay up treasures upon earth, 'loves the world.' The reason why people 'put their money out to usury,' is because they 'love money,' which Paul declares 'is the root of all evil; which while some coveted after, they have erred from the faith, and pierced themselves through with many sorrows.' I care not who it is, 'that putteth his money out to usury,' if it is one who professes to be looking for the immediate appearing and kingdom of Christ; he does so because he 'loves money,' and is eager to gain more. The reason why certain ones amongst us, who have this world's goods, shut up their bowels of compassion from the needy, neglect to pay those who preach the gospel to them, and in many instances to pay for the advent papers which are sent them, is, because they 'love the world'—they 'love money,' and therefore the love of God is not in them. How can such consistently hope to inherit the kingdom of God? they cannot: for that glorious and immortal kingdom is promised to those that love God, and to those only. Therefore, my beloved brethren, as you value the kingdom of God, 'love not the world.'

3d. Another reason why we should 'not love the world,' is, because it will soon pass away with the lust thereof. God's word plainly and positively declares, that the day cometh that shall burn as an oven; in the which the heavens shall pass away with a great noise, and the elements shall melt with fervent heat; the earth also, and the works that are therein shall be burnt up. We find the following solemn declaration from the mouth of the Almighty in Deut. xxxii. 22. For a fire is kindled in mine anger, and shall burn unto the lowest hell, and shall consume the earth with her increase, and set on fire the foundations of the mountains. Let us therefore diligently heed the exhortation of the apostle, 'love not the world,' set our affections on things that are heavenly, and, like holy men of old, 'of whom the world was not worthy,' desire a better world, that God may not be ashamed to be called our God. But if any man will 'love the world,' he may expect to share the awful fate of all the proud and wicked in the day of God, viz; to be burnt up!

May the Lord direct your hearts into the love of God, and into the patient waiting for Christ; who will in a very few days, as he promised, 'come again,' and receive us unto Himself.— Amen. WESLEY BURNHAM.

Exeter N. H., Feb. 11, 1847.

ASHAMED OF THE GOSPEL.—Words that the Lord himself and holy prophets and apostles have spoken, are not to be omitted to suit the hypocritical delicacy of this unholy age. While filthiness, foolish jesting, &c. will not be named among the true and sanctified children of God, they will not take from His word (which is a discernor of the thoughts and intents of the heart) truths and illustration given to tell upon the heart and conscience. I know that the word 'harlot' might be substituted for another, which we meet frequently with in the Bible, without detracting from the force of truth. But when you read the Holy Scriptures, don't omit verses and sentences to please your audience. You may feel it a severe cross—take it up—love the praise of God more than the praise of men. It will not harm the good. To the pure all things are pure, but to the defiled is nothing pure: their mind and conscience is polluted!—Lecturers in quoting 1 Thess. v. 3, have often omitted comparisons contained in the verse—one given to convey to the mind the terrors of the coming day: and a stronger and more telling simile could not be used—and oh! my brethren, in view of that approaching time, be not ashamed of the gospel, lest Jesus be ashamed of you when He comes in glory to judge the quick and the dead, and reward His faithful ones.

Time of the Second Advent.

NO. IX.

Pressing cares prevent our continuing, this week, the investigation of the infallible evidences that the advent of our Lord is nigh, even at the door. We therefore notice the following interrogations, which relate to what we have already written on this highly interesting question, and hope to be able to resume the regular investigation of the subject next week. We shall divide the questions, for convenience sake, in answering them, as in so doing, it will not in the least affect their meaning.

1. How will you reconcile the following paragraph in your editorial for Jan. 27—1847. 'If the proposition nigh at the doors, is a Scripture one, then no conflicting proposition can be sustained by that perfect book. To say that the Savior did not fully or definitely define the position he designed to have his children take on the time of the advent, is questioning the perfection of his teaching. To say that this position is not the most positive and definite position the more any where warrants, is indirectly charging the Son of God with leaving the impression on the minds of his children, that the precise time could not be known, when in fact it could be known and is actually revealed in other parts of the inspired word.'

'We deem it proper to remark here, to quiet the fears of some and remove the prejudices of others, that the prophetic numbers never appeared to us more perfect and harmonious in the time of the advent than now; they speak with divine certainty on this deeply interesting question; and in perfect harmony with the numerous other infallible witnesses in the case.' How to reconcile the above, you can probably tell, but I and others cannot. Nigh at the doors, does not determine the year nor the ten years, but the prophetic numbers do determine the year, because God has in them given a day as a symbol of a year.

When we shall have spoken on the prophetic numbers, you will see perfect harmony where you now think you see a discrepancy. Your impatience to have us change the marked order of this investigation, and speak on the prophetic numbers before we have noticed other equally divine testimony, evinces a partiality for an abstract truth that never should be seen in a lover of the whole Bible; especially one who is a teacher of the precious truths contained in that inspired Book.

We will just say here, that it is very evident that the prophetic numbers do reveal the definite number of years between certain events and the advent of Christ. But that the precise and definite year of the occurrence of those events, is positively revealed, no one has yet been able to show; a degree of uncertainty of a few years is thrown around every one of them, as every understanding honest man will acknowledge. God designed this or it would not have been so. Consequently the ending of those definite numbers of years which extend from those events to the advent, cannot be exactly determined; there must necessarily be the same degree of uncertainty about the termination of those definite numbers of years, as there is about the time of their commencement. But though there is a degree of indefiniteness, not in the number of years, but in their commencement, and consequently in their termination, yet such is the nature of the testimony in the case, nothing can be more evident than that the time of their termination is not far distant, should be watchfully and prayerfully looked for every moment, is nigh even at the door. But more on this point at another time, and in the proper place.

2. Do we not read in Rev. ix. 10. 'The testimony of Jesus is the spirit of prophecy.' Was it not, therefore, the same personage that gave the prophetic numbers in Dan. xii. that gave 'nigh even at the doors' in Matt. xxiv. Compare Dan. xii. 7, and x. 5-6, with Rev. i. 13-15.

Admitting it was the same personage, what then? We see no difficulty in the case. He swore in Dan. xii. 7, to the number of years to the resurrection, but not to the precise year of their commencement, or termination. And if the personage is the same in each case, of course he would not contradict himself, and his last conversation must explain the first, if an explanation is necessary. Nigh at the door is in the last conversation, and as nothing contradicts it in the first we therefore conclude that nigh at the door, is the correct position on the time.

3. Did not Jesus refer the disciples, Matt. xxiv. 15, to the prophet Daniel for something more definite than he was then teaching?

No. We think he referred to something about as definite as nigh at the door. He referred to the same that is referred to in Luke xxi. 20. 'And when ye shall see Jerusalem compassed with armies, then know that the desolation thereof is nigh.' And when the signs of Christ's advent are seen, we are told to 'know that he is nigh even at the doors.'—Hence the definiteness of the two cases is about the same.

4. If he had given the time, a day for a year, by the prophets, why was it necessary to give the time again, but only the signs that should indicate his coming and the understanding of these prophetic numbers?

We fear we do not fully comprehend the design of this question, we will not, therefore, attempt to give an answer.

5. Does not Peter show, 2 Pet. i. 16-20, that there is something more sure and definite in the prophets concerning the Second Advent than any where else in the Bible—cise why does he tell of the more sure word of prophecy, whereunto we do well that we take heed, if there is something more definite somewhere else?

We think the common version does not give the true meaning of the text to which you refer. Mac-knight's rendering, we think, is correct. It reads, 'And so we have the prophetic word more firm [instead of a more sure word] to which ye do well to take heed.' &c. Mr. A. Campbell's Testament gives the same rendering.

6. Do you now discard the sentiments in your editorial, Vol 10, No. 13, headed 'Mr. Campbell before '43.?'

We have not examined that article, and cannot therefore answer this question. We would examine it however, and give a direct and full answer, if our former opinions were to be made an infallible criterion now in deciding what is and is not truth relative to the time of the second advent. When searching for truth we do not consult any uninspired man's opinions, not even our own, but the Bible, and would our brother do this we think he would save himself some perplexities and unnecessary fears which he now seems to have.

In conclusion we say, that an overwhelming amount of infallible testimony is at hand, besides what we have already given, to prove that the appearing of the Son of Man will soon, very soon be witnessed. May our anxious brother, and all, be found ready to meet him in peace.

Parable of the Rich Man & Lazarus.

Several persons have solicited our opinion on this much controverted but very imperfectly understood parable. A crowd of other duties have prevented a compliance with these requests until now.

The parable is contained in Luke xvi. 19-31. To understand its design, we must know in the first place that it forms a part of one of the Savior's discourses, which commences in Luke xv. 3, and closes in chapter xvii. 10. The circumstances which led to this discourse are clearly stated in chapter xv. 1, 2. 'Then drew near unto him all the publicans and sinners to hear him. And the Pharisees and Scribes murmured, saying, This man receiveth sinners and eateth with them.'

From this account we learn that the proud Pharisees and Scribes murmured, or would not receive the doctrine of the Savior, because the poor despised publicans and sinners, tax gatherers, and the poorer class, received it. It was beneath the dignity of these rich haughty ones to associate with such company. To justify his course, and to show the reward of those despised yet worthy poor, and the fearful doom which awaited those murmuring Pharisees and Scribes, the Savior spake five parables, the last of which is the one concerning the rich man and Lazarus.

Keep before the mind the charge preferred against the Savior, at the commencement of this discourse, viz: This man receiveth sinners and eateth with them, and the beauty and force of all these parables will be readily seen. In justification of his conduct, the Savior first speaks the parable of the lost sheep, recorded in chapter xv. 4-7. The import of this parable evidently is this, as though the Savior had said, You murmuring Pharisees and Scribes, you would justify a man in taking much pains to find a lost sheep, and approve of his rejoicing over it when restored to the fold. On what principle then will you condemn the Savior, the true Shepherd of Israel, for taking much pains to seek and save these poor and lost ones, your own brethren, whom you, Pharisees and Scribes, have made poor by your oppression, and whom you now despise and call publicans and sinners? Are they not worth saving? worth more than a lost sheep? Whether you covetous and proud Pharisees and Scribes think so or not, they are considered of great worth in heaven: for, I say unto you, that likewise joy shall be in heaven over one sinner that repenteth, more than over ninety and nine just persons which need no repentance. v.7. Therefore, instead of those Pharisees and Scribes murmuring, they should have rejoiced on account of the sinner repenting of his sins.

Verses 8-10 contain the parable of the lost piece of silver; the design of which evidently is the same of that of the lost sheep. As the proud and murmuring Pharisees and Scribes would justify a poor woman for taking much pains to find the lost piece of silver, and rejoicing over it when found, so they should, like the angels in heaven, rejoice over the repentant sinner, whom Christ came to save.

The next parable in the discourse is that of the prodigal son, which occupies the remainder of the chapter. The design of this parable evidently is not only the same as that of the two preceding ones, but was designed as a most severe rebuke to those murmuring Pharisees and Scribes, who had condemned Christ or rejected his doctrine, because he had received sinners and eat with them. In this case the Savior addresses himself to the sympathies, the benevolence, of every true father. If a kind father would gladly receive a returning penitent prodigal son; run to meet him; embrace, and freely forgive his prodigality; clothe him with the best robe, kill the fatted calf, have a time of rejoicing over him, and finally restore him to all the lost blessings of the family, we say, if a natural father would do all this for a penitent son, should not the benevolent Savior receive a perishing but penitent sinner, who might come to him for mercy? Most certainly.

Again, as the eldest son is represented as being angry, murmuring, treating his lost prodigal brother with contempt, and, though entreated by his father, would not go in to the feast, would not associate with his brother, so these murmuring Scribes and Pharisees thought themselves too good to receive the blessings of the gospel on a level with their poor, and perhaps morally degraded brethren: whom they contemptuously called, 'publicans and sinners.' And as every benevolent person, especially a father, would condemn the conduct of the eldest son in the parable, so would he condemn the murmuring Pharisees and Scribes, for their conduct towards Christ and the poor whom he received.

The next parable in the discourse is that of the unjust steward. It, and its explanation, occupies the 16th chapter to the 18th verse. A prominent design of this, to many hard to be understood, parable was, to exhibit and condemn the unjust worldly principle by which these murmuring Pharisees and Scribes were actuated. They were stewards over God's house, the Jewish church, but had not proved true to their high calling. Like the unjust steward in the parable, they had wasted the Lord's goods for their own selfish purposes. The time had come when the Mosaic law, the Jewish theocracy, was soon to end, and these Pharisees and Scribes were no longer to be stewards. But instead of acting wisely, as the unjust steward did in making provision for his future wants, they foolishly persisted in their course of covetousness and self-justification, to their own everlasting disgrace and ruin. Hence in verse 9th, the Lord said, in explanation of the parable,— 'Make to yourselves friends of the mammon of unrighteousness.' Or of the riches of the world. That is, make wise and benevolent use of the riches you possess—feed and clothe these poor despised ones, made so perhaps by your oppression, whom you now call publicans and sinners, but whom Christ has received, that when you Pharisees and Scribes fail, you may not find these very poor and despised ones witnesses against you, but ready to bid you a hearty welcome to the joys of the Lord.

That to rebuke a selfish covetous use of this world's goods was a special object of this parable is nearly or quite certain from the conversation that immediately follows the parable. Verse 13 reads— 'No servant can serve two masters—ye cannot serve God and mammon.' That is, you should have served God with your substance, but instead of doing it, like the unjust steward, you have served yourselves. The next verse shows the correctness of this view of the subject: for it reads, 'And the Pharisees also, who were covetous, heard all these things: and they derided him.' The deep corruption of the hearts of these hypocritical Pharisees and Scribes was now clearly developed. And in view of their depravity the Lord gave them the following just rebuke.

'And he said unto them, Ye are they which justify yourselves before men; but God knoweth your hearts: for that which is highly esteemed among men is abomination in the sight of God.'

Verse 16. 'The law and the prophets wore until John: since that time the kingdom of God is preached, and every man [occupant, Camp.] presseth into it, even the despised poor, the 'publicans and sinners'; while those Pharisees and Scribes, who were teachers of the law, murmured at Christ, and rejected the counsel of God against themselves.

Verse 17. 'It is easier for heaven and earth to pass, than one tittle of the law to fail.' The design of this strong expression, in this place, evidently was, to assure those rotten-hearted Pharisees and Scribes, who boasted of the law, that if they transgressed the law, they would surely receive the penalty due: for the law could not fail; it threatened the sinner with death, and the penalty would surely be inflicted on all who murmured against or rejected Christ. In verse 18, we think the Lord refers those self-righteous Pharisees to a violation of the law, of which they took the lead in committing. It was the sin of putting away a wife, and giving a bill of divorce, which the law prohibited, except in case of fornication. This sin, it seems, was prevalent in the days of Christ's ministry, and doubtless those unjust, covetous and murmuring Pharisees and Scribes took the lead in this as well as all other kinds of iniquity prevalent among the Jews. The verse reads, 'Whosoever putteth away his wife, and marrieth another, committeth adultery: and whosoever marrieth her that is put away from her husband committeth adultery.'

The next thing in order in the discourse is, the parable of the rich man and Lazarus. In the preceding part of the discourse, the Lord had exposed the corruption of the murmuring Pharisees and Scribes by showing them that they would condemn him for saving a sinner, but would justify a shepherd for saving a lost sheep, a woman for seeking a lost piece of silver, and a father for receiving a penitent prodigal son. He also had exposed their unfaithfulness as stewards, and sin in justifying themselves in their covetousness. And finally, though these corrupt leaders boasted of the law, the Lord had showed that they were flagrant violators of it, and stood exposed to the awful penalty it threatened upon every transgressor. In short, these Pharisees and Scribes were clearly proven to be more corrupt, more worthy the appellation of sinners, than the poor ones whom they contemptuously called 'publicans and sinners'; and as a matter of course their doom would be most fearful, while those publicans and sinners who received Christ would be rewarded with eternal life. And to show the fearful doom of the one, and the glorious reward of the other, evidently was the parable of the rich man and Lazarus spoken. It is an isolated, unmeaning parable to give it any other application. But to give it this application, its design is clearly seen, its application is made easy, and its meaning appears most weighty.

The length of this article admonishes us that we must reserve the conclusion of our remarks on this subject for next week.

Bro. J. V. Himes' Visit.

The numerous friends and brethren in this city and surrounding vicinity, were happy to greet a few days since Bro. Himes again in this part of the Lord's vineyard. His labors for the past year at home and in England have been incessant and abundant, in consequence of which he appeared to be much care-worn—still the energies of the soul were vigorous, and as ever wholly devoted to the cause of our coming Lord.

Saturday evening, Feb. 13th, a small congregation met in our stated place of worship, where Bro. Himes delivered a good discourse on the practical duties of the Christian. It was timely, or meat in due season to those who heard.

Sabbath morning and evening and Monday evening we held our meetings in Minerva Hall, one of the largest halls in the state. On each occasion a large number attended. On Sabbath evening, it was estimated that near two thousand were present, and some hundreds went away for want of room.

The discourse Sabbath morning was founded on the position that the "Protestant movement is a failure." That is, that the reformation commenced by Martin Luther, and attempted to be carried out by the Protestant sects, now is, not will be, but now is a failure. Bro. Himes showed that Protestantism had not only not made any proficiency in converting the world for the last two hundred years, but has actually lost ground to an alarming degree in every quarter of the globe. England, the bulwark, the strong hold of Protestantism, was referred to for an example. A fact or two named is all we can mention here. It was stated on good authority that there are one million of souls within eight miles of the very heart of London, the seat and centre of Protestantism, who do not attend public worship of any kind, but spend their Sabbaths in the commission of every species of crime. This looks not much like the speedy triumph of Protestantism in the conversion of the world to Christianity. And if this is the condition of the soul of Protestantism, surely the extremities or members of the body must be in a wretched condition indeed. Another fact stated was that out of sixteen thousand priests of the English church, twelve thousand were now Puseyites! Certainly Protestantism is a failure in England at least, and similar facts say it is in the entire world.

The discourse Sabbath evening was on the threatening attitude of the Catholics in the world, especially in England, the seat of Protestantism. It was assumed that the Catholic church aims at the conquest of the world, and that she now occupies the position predicted by the Revelator, Rev. xviii. 7— "I sit a queen and am no widow, and shall see no sorrow"—words that she was to use in the eve of her destruction.

The proof offered in this case we can only hint at. It was stated that Rome has organized a universal government and divided the world into several provinces, and appointed her Jesuitical emissaries, secretly to carry out her designs as soon as possible. This looks like aiming at the conquest of the world. Again, the Catholics by a decree of the Pope, have withdrawn all their children from Protestant schools and educate all the Protestant children they can.

In England, France, and doubtless in all parts of the world, Rome has appointed a litany, a solemn form of prayer, to be used every week for the conversion of England to Catholicism. England, the soul, the centre, the strength of Protestantism, is the prominent object of attack of the Mother of abominations. If she can gain this point, conquer this strong hold, this citadel of Protestantism, she is pretty sure of easily gaining the victory over the entire globe. Well, what are the present prospects in the case? It was stated on good authority that twenty-four Peers of the realm, twenty-three Barons, fifty wealthy country gentlemen, and forty members of parliament were Catholics, and that the British house of commons is now under Catholic control, and out of sixteen thousand priests of the established church, twelve thousand are Puseyites. Justly was it said, in view of these and other equally startling facts in the case, that if the world stands five years longer, England will be under the full control of the Pope of Rome. But, thank the Lord, this can never be; for 'in the days of these kings' will the stone smite the image, and the God of heaven will set up his everlasting kingdom. We ardently pray, 'Let thy kingdom come'—and its speedy coming is our only hope of delivery from the giant tread and bloody grasp of the man of sin.

Monday evening Bro. Himes spoke on some of the doings of the Evangelical Alliance; and from the general tenor of his remarks, we were more than ever confirmed in our former belief, viz: that the cause of Christian union by that enlightened body, was basely sacrificed at the bloody shrine of American slavery. The discourse or relation of facts, was a triumphant defence of the fearless, just and philanthropic course of our brother in that Alliance. It also presented certain members of that Alliance in the unenviable light in which their misdoings have justly placed them. We envy not their position, nor covet the smittings of their conscience in view of the betrayal of their sacred trust, to retain the good graces of Southern slaveholders. The fearful lack of Christian integrity, moral honesty and true philanthropy, in the Alliance, composed as it was of the leading ministers of the Protestant sects of the world, greatly strengthens the position that Protestantism is a failure, or in other words, we have nothing to hope from the Protestant ministry and church of the present age in converting the world.

Sabbath afternoon the Lord's supper was eaten by a large number of the disciples of Christ, who appeared to be not only grounded and settled in the truth of the advent near, but were patiently and joyfully waiting the return of their Lord. On this occasion, Bro. Himes gave a brief account of his and others' recent labors in England, Ireland and Scotland, and the state of the cause in those countries. The report, though it did not speak of many of the wise and noble, or of the great mass of the common people embracing the faith, it did inform us that a goodly number of the humble poor, and some of the rich in those countries, with us, are rejoicing in hope of soon reigning with Christ on the new earth. In short, the report was highly interesting, and served to confirm many who heard it, that this work is of God; that it is not confined to a small portion of the earth in North America, but is being carried on in every quarter of the globe. When the everlasting gospel shall have been fully preached to every people, kindred, tongue and nation, then the end will come, and the immortal family will be gathered into their eternal and happy home. Let the message go forth, sped on its way by our prayers and treasures according to the will of God.

During the meeting Bro. Pearson baptized five disciples of Christ, some of whom we believe have but recently embraced the faith. And on Tuesday evening the meeting closed with a discourse from Bro. Himes on the time of advent. Though he repudiates the idea of setting the day and hour, or even the year, with positiveness, for that event, yet he is strong in the faith that it will soon be witnessed; and he showed by the most infallible testimony that this faith is well founded.

Finally, this visit of Bro. Himes has, as all who love the appearing of Christ will bear witness, proved a signal blessing to the cause here. The Lord strengthen him for the good work in which he is and has been so faithfully engaged, and soon gather us all into the kingdom for which we now joyfully suffer.

West India Mission.

The letter below from Bro. W. Ide will to some degree show the condition of the cause in Antigua, W. I., and the wants of Bro. Mansfield who labors there. He should not be caused to leave that field for the want of pecuniary aid. Let the Lord's stewards do their duty in this urgent case, and what is done should be done cheerfully, and quickly.

We highly approve of the measures taken by our brethren in New York to aid in carrying out the objects of the West India Mission. Let those who may wish any of the valuable papers for distribution at home, observe Bro. Ide's terms and directions and obtain all you need for the good of those around you.

While on this subject we will say just a word about the English Mission, and the cause at home. Each should be sustained according to the will of God; and the everlasting gospel should be sent to every people, kindred, tongue and nation, by the ministers and stewards of God. The world is the field of our labor. While we remember the cause abroad, its wants should not be forgotten nor neglected at home; neither should we be so anxious about things at home, as to neglect to do our duty abroad.

There is talent and wealth enough among us, if rightly used, to occupy all the fields of labor, at home and abroad, to the glory of God. Let each do his or her duty in the case, and the good work will be done, and well done, at home and abroad, when our Lord shall come.

LETTER FROM BRO. W. IDE.

Bro. Marsh:—I received your communication dated Jan. 16th, enclosing $10 from 'a friend'; also yours of Feb. 8th, enclosing $5 from sister Hall, and a communication from Bro. Levi Bronson, West Martinsburg, enclosing $10—for the West India Mission. The above, with the exception of two donations of one dollar each received and forwarded some time since, is all that I have received since Bro. Mansfield's departure. Bro. Himes has forwarded to me a box of books, valued at about $60 for that purpose.

Letters have been received in this city from Bro. Mansfield, dated Jan. 7th, in which he states that his health is good; that the interest has not abated; that the subject is creating a great stir throughout the island; that professors have consecrated themselves anew to God; many have been converted; and that the prospect is encouraging. Bro. Livingston has left for St. Lucia and Barbadoes. Bro. Mansfield will remain in Antigua for some months.

He has been particularly desirous to have some of the visions of Daniel and John printed and forwarded to him. The brethren in this city have made arrangements to have them printed. They are to be printed from the plates on which they were formerly printed in the old Midnight Cry, viz: the 2d and 7th of Daniel, and the Trumpets of Revelation, with the Image and Beasts. Bro. Miller's Address and Bro. Jones' article, published in the Extra Herald, will be substituted for the other matter; making a paper of 8 pages, the size of the old Midnight Cry, designed to be circulated together or in four different parts. Bro. Himes and Jones approve of the measure, and think they would be useful for circulation at home also.

If you think favorably we would be glad if you would notice it in your paper. We have about 3000 ordered for the West India Mission, and 1000 for home distribution. They will be published on Monday next.

Orders may be sent to J. Hall, corner Fulton & Cliff Sts., or to Willard Ide, 111 Wall St.

Yours in faith of the blessed hope,

WILLARD IDE.

THE TWO HORSED BEAST.—The lengthy communication in this number from Bro. Alling, on the two horned beast, we publish not because we think he has given a true solution of the chapter on which he has written, but because he has spoken in candor, and has told many valuable truths. A writer or speaker may make a wrong application of a text, and yet his communication, in the main, may be filled with truth, or, in other words, he may tell many valuable truths, but quote some irrelevant passages of scripture to prove them. Such is the light in which we view Bro. Alling's communication: while it contains many valuable truths, we are constrained still to dissent from his application of the chapter, or a certain important portion of it, under consideration. We had designed to have given our views on this chapter in full before now, but have been hindered. We still mean to do it, but cannot promise when.

Greatly Mistaken.

The editor of the Day Dawn and one of its correspondents, have fallen into a number of very serious mistakes in that paper for Feb. 11th.

It is a mistake to more than intimate that we have published that simply, the 'weekly expenses of our paper are about sixty dollars.' We have stated and state again that the weekly expenses of our paper, including all other expenses, of living, &c., have been about sixty dollars. By certain arrangements, we have for a few months past, reduced that expense a few dollars, so that now it amounts to not far from fifty dollars a week, to say nothing about what we give for benevolent purposes and the extra papers we occasionally strike off for gratuitous distribution.

It is a mistake that we have 'received within the last year a number of thousand dollars from our own property at Union Mills,' or any where else. There is not a shadow of truth in this statement.

It is a mistake to suppose that the article in the Voice of Truth for Feb. 3d, headed 'Delinquents Look at This,' was designed as a dun, as any honest man will decide who will take the pains carefully to read the whole of that note.

And it is a mistake to intimate that we are getting rich in this world's goods, for instead of doing that, we have cheerfully expended besides donations and the avails of the paper, between one and two thousand dollars of our own funds for this best of all causes, and what little we have, or may yet have, will as cheerfully be expended for the same blessed object, as in our judgment the cause may demand. All we have and are is dedicated to the cause of the Lord.

If the Day Dawn loves the truth, and the Editor of the Voice of Truth, as it professes, it will publish this statement of facts without delay, and no more bear false witness against an innocent neighbor, to build up an unjust cause.

Since the above was in type, we learn from a gentleman just from the place that Mr. H. Edson, the correspondent of the Day Dawn, who has taken an active part with the editor of that paper in making the above incorrect statements and allusions, but a few days since had a revelation as he supposed from God, to punish his son about fifteen years of age. He accordingly took him to the woods, had his coat taken off, tied his hands, cut six beech whips, and whipped him so unmercifully that by the cries of murder of the son, the neighbors were called to his relief, and Mr. Edson was tried by a jury of his country, and fined $15 for his barbarity.

Mr. Edson and the editor of the 'Day Dawn' have run into the wild delusions of the doctrine of the shut door, and its kindred absurdities; and we have deemed a relation of these things due to the cause of truth and decency, that it may be known what are some of the fruits of that impious error, and what kind of spirits are trying to traduce our character, in order to build up their own wild delusions.

Bro. H. Tanner of Buffalo informs us that Bro. J. J. Porter is yet quite ill; it is doubtful whether he will recover very soon, if ever. Our brethren in Buffalo are in want of help, and Bro. Tanner requests Bro. B. Morley to visit them; will he respond to this request, or inform Bro. Tanner why he cannot do it? The cause in Buffalo is yet in a prosperous condition.

"The great God seems to have given that commandment, (KNOW THYSELF) to those men more especially, who are apt to make remarks on other men's actions, and forget themselves."

CORRESPONDENCE.

LETTER FROM BRO. B. MORLEY.

On Tuesday, Jan. 12th, I left Buffalo and went to North Boston, 15 miles south. Called on Brother and Sister Andrew. They said they had a very interesting meeting in their house the Sunday evening before. A young man (licensed by the Free Will Baptist church,) preached to them, and was to preach there again that evening.—Quite a number came in, and the young brother took the following for his text: "But this I say, brethren, the time is short." He preached as tho' the text read—"time is short;" and seemed to possess the right spirit, and to be well engaged. When he was through, I made some remarks in harmony with what had been said—"that it was important we should spend some of our time in secret prayer;" and more than that, we should "pray without ceasing;" or, in other words, we should be able at all times and in all places, to say from the heart, "Thy will O God be done." I then requested the brother and all present, to bear with me while I gave my view of the text. I stated it as it reads, "the time is short," and referred them to the next verse but one, for the event which is to transpire at the end of the short time—to wit: "the fashion of this world passeth away." Then connected Romans 13, 11, 12. "And that knowing the time," that "the night is fast spent, [more than two-thirds gone in Paul's day,] and the day [of our salvation or redemption] is at hand." With this, the testimony of the same witness recorded in Acts, 13, 20, which gives about 155 years more than is allowed by Usher, to the reign of the Judges, and consequently to the age of the world. The conclusion to which we were inevitably brought, was that the short time is almost gone—soon, the heavens and the earth having waxed (six thousand years), old, will be folded up and gloriously changed,—soon all the righteous will keep Sabbath with Christ in the new earth, where will be no more curse—under the new heaven, in which will never be cloud or storm. But the sinner must die, and never see life. Must be cast into the furnace of fire, where there will be wailing and gnashing of teeth. Must be burned up like chaff with unquenchable fire. I then requested any who were not prepared for the end of time, to rise if they desired us to pray for them. No one arose until near the close of the meeting, when a young married man rose up, apparently deeply convicted. His wife was the first to pray for him, confessing her own sins with weeping and anguish. She was much engaged in the fall of '44, but had wandered far away from Christ and the blessed hope. Several others prayed for the young man, and we were about to close the meeting, when he arose again, and with tears, entreated the Christians not to forget to pray for him. We then told him that he must pray for himself, and confess his own sins to God—that then was the time, and he ought to make no delay. Finally, he gave utterance to his feelings in confession and prayer, and when he was about to leave, we asked him if he could trust in the Lord—he said he could, for the Lord says, "who-soever cometh unto me, I will in no wise cast out."

I arrived at home the next evening, and found a prayer meeting in my "own hired house." As both these meetings were unexpected by me, and seemed to be attended with God's blessing.—It made a solemn impression on my mind. And it still seems to me that God is waking up his people, and the few sinners whose hearts are susceptible of divine impressions for the last time.

I fulfilled my appointment at Cuba, January 17th. There appeared to be more interest than I had ever seen there before. They had kept up their prayer meetings well, since the Conference in November. During the week, I visited Friendship, and preached to 12 or 13, but had a good meeting. Bro. Robbins and a few others, declared their unwavering faith in the immediate coming of Christ. On the seventh day, I had the privilege of preaching to the church which keeps that day. I preached on "the hour of his judgment is come." A solemn impression seemed to rest on the minds of most who heard. And one of their leading men gave his voice in favor of the doctrine. This I believe he had done before, as Bro. Robbins frequently preaches to them and Bro. Bywater preached to them as he was passing that way in November.

The next day I preached at Cuba (or about 2 miles west of the village,) and baptised a sister who was a member of the Presbyterian church. Her minister had visited her once to reclaim her from her errors. He expressed great surprise that she should believe the New Jerusalem would be a literal city. And, said he to her, "Do you suppose the saints will shine like the stars? this is all spiritual." Well, Daniel said they would "shine as the brightness of the firmament, and as the stars, for ever and ever." Amen! At the water side, a young woman, (whom we knew to be under conviction) was observed to be much affected. In the evening we had a season of prayer with her, when she gave good evidence that her sins were all washed away. I asked her why she wept at the water side? She said that she wished it had been her instead of the sister who was baptised. I said, Not instead of her, but with her. Bless God, the pool is large enough, and all those who are planted in the likeness of Christ's death, knowing that the old man is crucified with him, shall be also in the likeness of his resurrection. Blessed ordinance! Blessed hope! This young woman was baptised on Tuesday and went on her way rejoicing. She has long sought for happiness in balls and parties, but has found it in Jesus and the Bible. Her father became much interested in the advent doctrine. One of her brothers appeared very serious through all the meetings; may he also embrace the Savior before mercy is gone for ever. I preached one evening on Hascall Flats, where one backslider declared with tears, her determination to return to her Father's house; another, who had been trying to enjoy religion and keep it to herself, openly confessed Christ. I preached once about five miles from Franklinville, within the bounds of the Baptist church to which Bro. Bywater formerly preached. Many are very anxious to see him again, and hear from him the reason of his hope. Will Bro. B. visit them as soon as possible? I think no one else can do the work there as well as he. But may we all remember that without Christ our labors though many will amount to nothing.

BUTLER MORLEY.

Yorkshire, Feb. 7th, 1847.

LETTER FROM BRO. H. F. HILL.

Dear Bro. Marsh:—Through some inquiries, which have reached me by letter and otherwise, I judge that some have the impression that I have renounced the advent faith, or at least ceased to labor for the cause. Perhaps this impression has gone abroad, because I have not written for the Voice of Truth lately. I conceive it to be a matter of no small consequence to intrude our thoughts upon so large an audience as one has through a paper which comes before thousands.

I have often written letters for the press and laid them aside to save the editor the trouble and pain of so doing; for no doubt it is a severe trial to the editor to lay aside letters coming from good brethren, which he must necessarily do when unfit for the press. But seeing the calls through your paper to hear from me, with such tender acknowledgments, I venture again to write; and would say that it is cause of grateful feeling to know that I am not forgotten by those who love his appearing. It may be that it will give them joy to know that through the tender mercy of God I am still alive, proclaiming the gospel of the kingdom, and am ready to proclaim it to the learned and unlearned, fearing only to offend my Lord whose return I am looking for, believing that he is nigh even at the doors. Since the conference at Livonia, Stab city, I have been preaching there most of the time. Quite a number have through that conference embraced the blessed hope and do manifest a love for 'his appearing.' O may the number increase there and in other places until Jesus comes.

The unconscious state of the dead and its kindred doctrines I do not believe—but have not the least objection to the subject being examined in the Voice of Truth, if we may have both sides of the question. I see that many of your able correspondents have embraced those views; why do we not hear something on the other side? I should have written myself if I had not known that a good cause suffers with a poor advocate. But if none more able will stand up for the cause, I will in meekness offer a few reasons why I do not believe the doctrine, with your permission.

Yours in the blessed hope,

H. F. HILL.

Geneseo, N. Y., Feb. 6th, 1847.

Of course, Bro. Hill, our columns are open to candid remarks on both sides of this question; and we have no fears that any other than candid ones would come from your pen.—EDITOR.

LETTER FROM H. H. JOHNSON.

Bro. Marsh:—From the Hornby Conference of which you have had a notice from Bro. Bywater, I visited Bro. C. F. Sweet, of Ulster, Penn., where I had an opportunity to give the reasons of our hope, in 12 or 13 discourses, which appeared to take deep hold upon many of the hearers; the effects of which, though now partly visible, will, I trust, be fully developed in the day of accounts. Bro. S. is laboring publicly in his region to confirm the word. From that place I visited Owego, Ithaca, Lansingville and Reading; in all of which places I found some brethren strong in the faith, daily more and more confirmed that soon we shall be free. From thence I came to Bath, the place of my residence; and here I wish to pause and express my gratitude to God for what he has done for us. Last fall there were but four or five in this place in the faith, while now there are about fifteen, who are looking for the consummation of their blessed hope.

Bro. Bywater lectured with us after the Conference at Hornby, and we were very much blessed. Among others who have recently embraced the faith, there is a Freewill Baptist Elder. We now are able to hold our regular meetings, both for prayer and the dispensation of the word; and still the good work is progressing. In taking a survey of the whole range of Scripture prophecy with the 11th chapter, and the first three verses of the 12th of Daniel, and profane history from the first year of Darius the Mede, until 1815, where Bonaparte comes to his end, and none to help him—I am led most confidently to proclaim to the world that the next great event in this world's history, is the coming of Christ. For nearly 2520 years, each succeeding revolution has pressed heavily upon God's people, but that which is in the future will be in their favor; for then they shall be delivered, every one that is found written in the book.

In hope of soon seeing Jesus,

H. H. JOHNSON.

Conesus, Jan. 20th, 1847.

It is a noble science to know one's self well; and a noble courage to know how to yield.

LETTER FROM BRO. S. J. RONEY.

Dear Bro. Marsh:—There are a few in this section that still are looking for the fulfilment of the 'promise made of God unto the fathers;' some that love to hear the 'glad tidings' of the 'kingdom at hand;' some that are 'rejoicing in hope of the glory of God;' some that expect to have their 'vile bodies' changed and 'fashioned like unto his glorious body;' some that believe this year will be the year of Jubilee, when we shall realize the full fruition of all our hopes and our faith, swallowed up in blessed reality when we come in sight, and be inheritors of that 'rest, that remains to the people of God.' But, my dear brethren, those that bear those distinguished marks from the proud, haughty and nominal professor are but few indeed, and I often fear that those few will be dwindled down to a still less number than they are; the adversary of all righteousness is about like a roaring lion seeking whom he may devour; for he knows that he has but a short time, and no marvel if he comes at times like an angel of light, clad in the 'livery of heaven,' to deceive, if possible, the very elect. O, my brethren, let us not be 'ignorant of his devices;' these times of trials and temptations will soon be over—our peace will no more be marred nor our garments be in danger of being spotted and soiled by sin, and its effects. Soon the 'works of the devil' will be 'destroyed' and the last enemy conquered, and the 'redeemed of the Lord' shall return and come unto Zion with songs, and they shall obtain joy and gladness, and sorrow and sighing will flee away.' Then my brethren and sisters, if we would be among that number, we must be holy, we must be pure, we must have the spirit of this world all out of our hearts, and have implanted there the spirit of the coming kingdom, that by it (when Jesus comes) our mortal bodies may be quickened. Let me say to those that are of a 'fearful heart, be strong—for the Lord your God will come and save you;' he will soon come, 'ratch and be sober,' lest that day come upon you unawares.'

Yours waiting, S. J. RONEY.
Chateaugay, Feb. 2d, 1847.

Bro. L. Dudley, Perry Mills, N. Y., Jan. 15th, writes:—

The work of the Lord is still progressing in a glorious manner in this section, in Champlain, in Cadwell's Manor and Stanbridge, C. E. Since '47 came in I have witnessed the conversion of eight or ten souls, and the brethren all through this section are on the wing for glory, in full faith that this year will end all troubles, and that the saints of the Most High will take the kingdom, under the whole heaven. We are almost home—our journey's end is near—we shall soon rest. O how my soul sighs for home! I want to see all the saints of God in the promised land, where all the people will be righteous. My brethren, look up, your redemption draws near; and in that day this song will be sung in the land of Judah: 'We have a strong city; salvation will God appoint for walls and bulwarks!' None but the pure in heart can see God. O for holiness of heart! I learned a good lesson the other day from a young convert: she said, 'O Father in heaven, prepare me now, for it is better to be ready a year too soon than to be one moment too late.'

Sister L. Bixby, Brookfield, Vt., Jan. 12th, writes:—

Bro. Marsh:—I received your bill which you sent to N. Bixby, requesting him to pay you that which was your due. It now becomes my painful duty to inform you that he is no longer an inhabitant of earth. One year ago last October he bid adieu to this fleeting world, with the bright hope of soon meeting the dear saints in the kingdom. I was then left in this cold world; my dearest earthly friend, who had long provided for myself and family, laid in the silent tomb. It was truly with me a day of trial, such as I never before witnessed. While drinking deep of the cup of affliction, it was a consolation to read the glad tidings of the kingdom, which so often came to my lonely dwelling, laden with the rich treasure of the gospel: yet I could see no way that I could meet the demand you would have against me. I requested Bro. Cram to write you, which he did, giving the account of the death of my companion, the situation of my family, which you published in the Voice of Truth, Dec. 18th, 1845.

I have read your paper with deep interest and should be glad to send you that which is your due, but feel that my present situation will not permit. My way through this unfeeling world looks dark—but when I look a little beyond this vale of tears, and behold, by an eye of faith, that heavenly land, the saints' abode, the prospect of better days brightens before me. There, in that better country, is my inheritance—my heart, my affections are there; there my best friends and kindred will forever dwell, and there my Savior will ever reign.

The bill to our afflicted sister was a mistake. We cheerfully send her, as we do many others in similar circumstances, our humble sheet free of charge. The Lord enable them to be 'rich in faith that they may be heirs of the kingdom.'—EDITOR.

Sister C. Benjamin, Furnace Village, Ct., Jan. 11th, writes:—

The cause in this place is prospering. One year ago, no advent meetings were held here, but now we have regular meetings on the Sabbath and during the week. We have to worship at private houses, because we are not considered worthy of a church or school-house; but we must be willing to be counted as the offscouring of all things, and as fools for Christ's sake. If they call the Master of the house Beelzebub, how much more they of the household. I am not discouraged—praise the Lord for what he has done in this place: some have come out from a dead church, others have been converted of late. I trust the Lord will still work here through the labors of Bro. Hastings and Mathewson. We number about sixteen. The Lord will reward his dear servants who are not afraid to travel through storms of snow and rain, over these New England hills, to give meat in due season to the household of faith. I pray God that much good may yet be done, more souls be converted to the knowledge of the truth, more holiness of heart sought after, without which no man can see the Lord.

Bro. L. T. Hooker, Arcade, Jan. 28th, writes:—

There are some few in this place who are not satisfied that the old theory of the world's conversion and Christ's coming after the millennium is correct. There has been a meeting in the Congregational church in this place, on each of the two last Sabbaths, at the suggestion of two of its members to investigate this subject, and a few met. Some gave it as their opinion that the old theory was correct, without much proof. I assure you a little was said upon the other side of the question, and here the matter was left for the present. Col. Shepard remarked just before the close of the last meeting, among other things, that 'some of the Scriptures were written in such ambiguity that we could not understand them;' seeming to forget what Paul says, 2 Tim. iii. 16, 17—'All Scripture is given by inspiration of God, and is profitable for doctrine, for reproof, for correction, for instruction in righteousness, that the Man of God may be perfect, thoroughly furnished unto all good works.' When shall we learn that Christ meant something when he said, 'without me ye can do nothing.' There are a few here who are willing to give up all for Christ and his cause.

A REQUEST.

Some Bible student who is capable of doing it, will please comply with the following requests:—EDITOR.

Please give an exposition of the 23d verse of the xliith chap. of Isaiah. The first clause I have supposed fulfilled in the past and present; but the second and last clause of said verse seems to me, the last especially, to be fulfilled when Christ comes: or, is it not the same sentiment presented in Psalm xxxivth, 21st and 22d verses? The whole chapter is one on which the nominal church rest with much confidence in support of a temporal millennium; therefore, a brief exposition of the whole chapter would, no doubt, feed the flock of God. I am not so well acquainted with the history of the church in the past to point to the most signal fulfillment of the 23d verse. Was it fulfilled in the days of Constantine and his successors? which, if I am not mistaken, was previous to the rise of the Papal form of Christianity. Does they, in the 2d clause, refer to the Gentiles?

Yours waiting and searching for truth,

MEETINGS IN ROCHESTER.

Our meetings in this city, are held three times on the Sabbath, also Tuesday and Friday evenings, in Shaw's New Brick Block, east side of the River, corner of Main and Stone streets; entrance from Stone street. The Lord's Supper will be administered in the afternoon of the first Sabbath of every month.

APPOINTMENTS.

Bro. Himes will lecture at Seneca Falls March 4th, and at Oswego March 11th and 12th. It would be exceedingly glad to respond to the many calls of the brethren to attend meetings with them, but is absolutely prevented from so doing by imperative duties.

CONFERENCES.

A Conference will commence here, the Lord willing, on Thursday evening, the 25th inst., and continue over the Sabbath. Brethren and friends abroad are cordially invited to come and participate with us in the "feast of fat things" we expect on the occasion. On Saturday and Sabbath, Bro. Himes and Galusha are expected to be with us. Yours hoping, L. P. JUDSON, Jamestown, N. Y., Feb. 12.

Also, a Conference is appointed to commence at Sidney, near the Trent, C. W., the 5th of March, and continue over Sunday. A general attendance is solicited, especially of ministering brethren. G. HENLEY, P. HORON, Feb. 11, 1847.

Also, a Conference is appointed to commence at Springwater, N. Y., in the Methodist chapel, Thursday evening, March 4th. A general invitation to brethren from abroad to attend is cordially given. Bro. J. Pearson, H. F. Hill, H. H. Johnson and the Editor may be expected to attend.

BUSINESS NOTES.

A. N. Bentley—J. Minor owes $2.57.
G. Needham—A friend at Springfield, Mass., has sent $8 for you, which we have forwarded to your address, Cazenovia, N. Y.
F. Farrington—Indebted $1.25
H. Pratt—it cannot be sent by mail, as all we have are bound; we have therefore credited the dollar to your account, which pays to vol. xiv no. 7.
T. Sanborn—we have credited S Stokes as you direct, which pays to close of vol. xii, and leaves you paid to close of vol. xiv. Is this right?
C. F. Sweet—we have credited you to vol. xiv no. 9.
Bro. W. B.—S. S. Knowlton don't take it now; it was discontinued, owing for past volumes $4.75—this is his debt now!
N. A. Hitchcock—$3.50 on book account.
Will the Bro. at Hamilton, C. W., who has recently sent us $1, give his name that the money may be credited?
A. A. Holt—Bro. Himes could not come that way.

N. A. Hitchcock's address is Summit, Wisconsin Ter.
C. R. Griggs' address is Brimfield, Mass.

TERMS—50 cents per Volume of 13 Numbers. $2 for Five Copies Without Charge to those who are unable to pay.

All communications for the 'Voice of Truth,' and orders or remittances for Books, should be addressed to Joseph Marsh, Rochester, N. Y., post paid. Subscribers' names, with their Post-Office, should be plainly written.

The Coming of the Lord.

Hear the glorious proclamation,
The glad tidings of salvation,
Hear the glorious proclamation
Of the Savior near.

CHOIRS.

While the choir of angels,
While the choir of angels,
While the choir of angels,
Shall be chanting through the sky.

Hark! the tidings onward rolling,
Jesus comes the world controlling;
Hark! the tidings onward rolling,
Jesus comes to reign.

Suddenly a burst of thunder,
And the concave parts asunder,
Suddenly a burst of thunder,
And the skies depart.

See the 'sign' in Heaven appearing,
And the blazing chariot nearing,
See the 'sign' in Heaven appearing,
And the Savior there.

See the earth in terror shaking,
And the dead to life awaking,
See the earth in terror shaking,
And the saints arise.

Now on wings of light ascending,
With a shining host attending,
Now on wings of light ascending,
See them mount the skies.

See the banner waves in glory,
While ten thousand tell the story,
See the banner waves in glory,
And the saints are there.

They are saved from death forever,
Praise to Him who did deliver,
They are saved from death forever,
And to die no more.

Concluding Reflections on the Visions of Daniel.

BY T. R. BIRKS, M. A.

FELLOW OF TRINITY COLLEGE, CAMBRIDGE, ENGLAND.

DAN. II. 47.—"The king answered unto Daniel and said, Of a truth it is that your God is a God of gods, and a Lord of kings, and a revealer of secrets, seeing that couldst reveal this secret." vs. 28—"Hitherto is the end of the matter. As for me, Daniel, my cogitations much troubled me, and my countenance changed in me; but I kept the matter in my heart."

(Concluded.)

IV. Finally, the visions which have now been explained exhibit to us THE UNSPEAKABLE GLORY OF THE WORLD TO COME. A few remarks on this boundless subject will be not unsuited as a close to the whole inquiry.

Two thousand four hundred years have now passed since the later of these visions was revealed to the prophet in his exile at Babylon. The angel summed the whole message in one short contrast. "These great beasts, which are four, are four kings that shall arise out of the earth. But the saints of the Most High shall take the kingdom and possess the kingdom for ever, even for ever and ever." Through long ages the former sentence has been fulfilled. Babylon, Persia, Greece and Rome, have prevailed in succession; and the Little Horn, as here predicted, has practiced and prospered in the latter half of these times of the Gentiles. But all this has only been a preparation for the fulfillment of the rest. The history of so many centuries is revealed by the Holy Spirit as only a brief and transitory introduction to the kingdom in which Christ and his people shall reign for ever.

And yet how vast is the scheme of providence, even in this part alone, which is only a magnificent porch to the temple of God! What millions of immortal beings have appeared on the stage! What wars, and triumphs, and victories, what changing scenes, what deep emotions, and what a ceaseless variety of stirring interests from age to age, make up this Divine introduction to the promised kingdom! Every form of art and science, of eloquence and genius, of military daring and heroism, and religious devotion, are united in the history of these four prophetic empires, which have only been preparing the way for the everlasting dominion of the Son of man.

Now if the preparation merely be so vast and wonderful, how glorious must that kingdom be which it is designed to introduce! The mighty empires of the earth, with all their grandeur, are set aside as unworthy to be compared with the glory that shall follow. It seems as if God had permitted men to exhaust the resources of their pride and genius, to build up their most stately politics, and lavish all the treasures of natural wisdom in adorning these kingdoms of the world, that the superior glory of true holiness and righteousness might be displayed, with a brighter contrast, in the kingdom of heaven.

But this truth, however important, is not the whole of the lesson implied in the sacred vision. Amidst the moral contrast, there is still a perfect unity of design. The same God who will hereafter manifest His sovereignty in the kingdom of our Lord, even now is ruling in the kingdom of men. So that every event in the whole history of the four empires is a link in the one chain of His providence, and contributes, by a sure and mysterious process, to help on the glory that shall be revealed.

This truth is seen, most eminently, in the life of our blessed Lord himself. Midway almost in the course of these predicted empires, the Son of God was born for our salvation. The mystic stone was cut out without bands. It was a decree of the Roman emperor which fulfilled the prophecy of Messiah's birth-place. It was a Roman governor before whom He appeared at His trial; it was a Roman mode of punishment to which he was sentenced; and the very form and manner in which the world's redemption was wrought out was the result of their actual dominion over the land of Israel. Here we see, in a striking light, how the political changes of the earth have been working out the counsels of God, and will be found to be linked for ever with all the highest and holiest mysteries of the world to come.

And as it was in the person of our Lord, so must it be also with the history of His people. During the course of these empires the saints of God are brought out from the darkness of sin, and prepared for their inheritance, who will reign hereafter in this kingdom of their Savior. All the changes of providence are subservient to this great end. If empires rise and fall, if kingdoms emerge from obscurity, or sink in gradual decay, the work of grace is unceasing amid every change; and each event will be found to have been fitting the servants of God, by mercies and trials, by peace or conflict, for their final inheritance. The same principle extends also to the whole course of national providence here on earth. The discovery of human corruption, the various forms of sin and evil, are preparing the way, by the gift of dear-bought experience, for a more hearty and living reception of the grace of Christ. The beautiful scenes of nature are all shadows of good things to come. The stars, in their courses, not only fight against the enemies of God, but prefigure the holy dignity of the children of the resurrection. (Judges v. 20. Dan. xii. 3.) The flowers of the field announce, with a silent prophecy, the brighter and more excellent clothing which God will there bestow on His people. (Matt. vi. 30.) The precious stones, sought out from the bowels of the earth, polished and set in the high priest's breast-plate, prefigure the servants of Christ, prepared and renewed by the Holy Spirit to shine as a royal diadem in the hand of God for ever. (Isaiah lxi. 2.) Not even the least event in these thousands of years, or through the whole extent of these mighty empires, but will be found to have borne its part in heightening the glory of the future kingdom when it shall appear. As the bones of Joseph were carefully preserved in Egypt, and carried through the wilderness for forty years, till a place was found for them in the land of Canaan, where our Lord conversed afterwards with the woman of Samaria; so will every trophy and memorial of death in past ages be treasured up in the memory of God's people; till they shall hereafter, in the kingdom of Messiah, be seen issuing, each of them, in some nobler message of Divine grace and fuller triumph of redemption. Not greater is the contrast between the tombs of Egypt and the lifegiving promise of the Savior on the well of Sychem, than between the history of the four empires read with a worldly eye, and the same history, treasured in the memory of the faithful, and hereafter revealed in the light of heaven as one continual preparation for the everlasting glory.

Here, then, is a field for the meditations of the Christian, wider than all which can occupy the thoughts, or employ the researches of mere human learning. To read the past in the light of inspired prophecy, to trace in every event of time some link of God's eternal counsel, and thus to learn, in every part, the grace and compassion of that Lord, who once suffered for us on the cross, and now reigns in heaven, is the high calling of the church at the present hour. Every day and year of continued forbearance and long-suffering is only to prepare for a fuller display of holiness and love, and to add fresh elements of delight and joy to that exceeding and eternal weight of glory, which now remains for the people of God.

Such are a few of the great lessons which are forced upon our minds by the survey of this wonderful scheme of Divine Providence, revealed, thousands of years ago, to the holy prophet amidst the splendor of Babylon. The walls of Babylon are now thrown down, her plains are a desolation; a few scanty ruins alone survive from all her palaces. But the truth of the Lord, which is here revealed, endures without change. Its lessons apply to the Church at the present hour, even with a deeper interest than in former years. "For all flesh is grass, and all the glory of man as the flower of grass; the grass withereth, and the flower thereof falleth away; but the word of the Lord endureth for ever."

And surely all these practical truths, drawn from the prophecy, converge and meet in one further lesson, which should be applied more directly to every conscience. It is the lesson taught in the words of another prophet, in the prospect of judgment—"Prepare to meet thy God, O Israel." It is repeated by the great Apostle, and addressed in a still more pointed form to every Christian. "Examine yourselves whether ye be in the faith: prove your own selves." That kingdom which is here promised will not come without a solemn and eternal separation. Each part of God's word closes alike by fixing our attention on this certain truth. "Then shall ye return, and discern between the righteous and the wicked, between him that serveth God, and him that serveth him not." "He that is unjust let him be unjust still, and he that is righteous, let him be righteous still; and behold I come quickly, to render to every man according as his work shall be." How little will it profit us to have our understandings enlarged by surveying the history of these empires, and our imagination awakened by the prospect here unfolded of Messiah's kingdom; and still to fall short of the promise through our own unbelief! How mournful and wretched would it be to hear the sentence pronounced against us, like the lord of Samaria, "Behold, thou shalt see it with thine eyes, but thou shalt not eat thereof"—to be in sight of heaven's gate, and miss the entrance, to be not far from the kingdom of God, and then to sink into the outer darkness! The words of the vision, which describe to us the dissolution of the great image, should remind us of the sentence pronounced against the unbeliever. "The ungodly are not so, but are like the chaff which the wind driveth away. Therefore the ungodly shall not stand in the judgment, nor sinners in the congregation of the righteous. For the Lord knoweth the way of the righteous, but the way of the ungodly shall perish."

In the prospect, then, of this searching judgment, let us turn, with a simple and earnest faith, to the cross of Christ, as the only shelter that can avail. His gracious promise has been given, to assure our hearts, and banish our fears. "Him that cometh unto me, I will in no wise cast out." Even in the hour of judgment, to them that look for him He will appear without sin to their salvation; and the prophecy be fulfilled in their blissful experience—"A man shall be an hiding-place from the storm, a covert from the tempest, as rivers of waters in a dry place, and as the shadow of a great rock in a weary land." Amidst the songs of angels and the joy of the universe, He will then accomplish those glorious promises, rich with hope and with everlasting comfort; to plant the heavens and lay the foundations of the earth, and say unto Zion, Thou art my people.

ST. JOHN, ANTIGUA, JAN. 20th, 1817.

Dear Bro. Marsh:—By the good providence of God we are still in the enjoyment of excellent health, and have strength to labor in this interesting field, which has increased in interest since we last wrote you. Our place of worship in this city continues to be thronged, and many persons have been recovered from a state of backsliding, who were or had been members of the various churches; some have been converted, and among these some of the most unpromising cases, who had imbibed the principles of the Socialists, or were under other ungodly influences. Many persons connected with the establishment and the Wesleyan church especially, have attended our meetings, and seem satisfied that the doctrines we preach are correct, and adhere to them, despite the opposition of the ministry and the bodies to which they belong. In short, the truth produces the same effect in the West Indies that it did in America. Some, devoted to the truth and not to partizan interests, are to be found here, and such cannot resist the evidences of the Savior's near coming when they are clearly perceived: neither can sinners remain altogether unconcerned in this land, but many have been led to inquire "What shall I do to be saved?" and with eyes filled with tears have sought our prayers and advice. I have found the words of Christ verified, "Lo I am with you unto the end of the world"—or at least thus far He has been with us in 'making disciples of all nations,' and not simply those who have once professed religion, but those who never before exhibited any evidence of piety, and who never made any profession of it.

I mourn over our perverse and deceived brethren in America, who are denying that 'long-suffering of God' is designed for 'salvation.' I do hope they have generally abandoned the pernicious error of 'the shut door,' and are laboring for the accomplishment of God's purposes and are endeavoring to secure to Christ the full number of His elect, which is evidently the Scripture reason for God's delaying 'the day of judgment and perdition of ungodly men.' I was especially grieved, upon looking over the 'Voice of Truth,' to see from Bro. Cook's letter his perseverance in the views of the shut door. It really seems strange that one of his capacity and piety, should suppose there had been, 'in advent history,' a literal fulfillment of the portion of the parable of the ten virgins, relating to the shut door. The only evidence which has or can be adduced in favor of such a position, is the assumed fact that the preceding events had received their accomplishment, while nothing in the history of the advent people corresponds at all to the portion of the parable relating to the 'shut door.' To say 'there has been a clamor about the shut door,' is a very short hand way of disposing of this most important portion of the parable. It ought to be shown that those who have come to the door have not gained admittance, which cannot be shown in reference to any door about which there has been 'a clamor.' The only door about which there has been 'a clamor,' is the door, which if one enter, he is Christ's, and this door has not been shut, as I have the most abundant evidence, and so may every one else who will admit evidence when presented.

When I see the same effects from the preaching of the word now, which were produced by the same word three or four years ago, and perceive the same moral phenomena in sinners, awakened, convicted, submissive to and confiding in Christ, and see infidels hitherto, now bringing forth the fruits of the spirit: 'Love, joy, peace, long-suffering, gentleness, goodness,' &c. &c., can I doubt that our Lord is still waiting to be gracious? By no means.

Toward the brethren who have taught that 'door is shut,' I have none but the kindest feelings, and my heart has dissolved when thinking of such as have been particularly associated with me in time past in the advent cause, who have since denounced and forsaken me, and far away in this strange land, I have not ceased to love them, and would if possible do them good. When I think of some with whom I have taken sweet counsel, of whose godly sincerity and many sacrifices in the cause of truth in time past I have no doubt, I think of the separation which has taken place between us in spirit, (not in distance) I can hardly forbear weeping; and if I have been unnecessarily and uncharitably severe in my remarks upon them, God forgive me! I would only do justice to them and the cause of truth at the same time.

While I have been writing, I have received five copies of the 'Voice of Truth,' (in addition to two copies received several weeks since,) which greatly comfort me in this remote and isolated condition. The communications of beloved brethren with whom I have taken so much enjoyment in the anticipation of meeting our Lord Jesus Christ, are very interesting though some of them of painful interest, especially that of Bro. Oliphant in reference to the distracted state of things in Oswego. I was much grieved to learn that the divisions there had not been healed, as I hoped would have been the case before this. I regret the continuance of that alienation of Christian hearts which was produced by erroneous teachings, unsanctified zeal. O! that those whom God has so much blessed, might be again united and made happy in obedience to the command, 'Little children, love one another.'

I am happy however to learn from the general tone of your paper and the 'Herald,' that the cause of truth is still prospering; may the Lord continue to bless you. I feel to sympathize with dear Bro. Pearson in his illness, and hope by this time he is quite recovered, for the laborers are few! Bro. Pinney is still able to lecture, for which I am thankful: as also Bro. Bates, altho' still in feeble health. Could he have accompanied me to this island, and enjoyed the balmy and mild breezes of a winter in this latitude, I have much hope that his health would have been much improved, and he could have been eminently useful here. I hardly know what I shall do here alone in so wide a field as this, and many adjacent islands present, which seems already white for the harvest. Emphatically an open door is set before us. Last Sabbath I preached nine miles distant from St. Johns, in an Episcopal chapel, belonging to an owner of a large estate, and had an audience of two or three hundred, who seemed impressed with the truth, and the manager of the estate seems converted to the doctrines I preach, and is anxious to have me visit them again.

In this city a large congregation has been gathered, and they have been much awakened and revived and are evidently satisfied, as many have expressed to me personally, that the truth is preached and the day of God immediately at hand. Many are pressing me most earnestly to stay with them, as they cannot bear to think of going back to the teachings of the churches and they express an entire willingness to support me in my labors. You would be surprised to see how God has opened the hearts of the people not only to receive the truth, but to receive us in the name of the Lord.

Bro. Livingston left this island for St. Lucia, where his son-in-law resides, about ten or twelve days since, when friends came forward and offered us another house, (for we did not need so large a house after Bro. and Sister L. left,) ready furnished, in a most healthy and pleasant location, and now the friends in the city supply all our wants, 'without money and without price.' If some faithful and devoted brother could come from America and assist in this wide field, those who have been awakened and blessed might be established, and other islands might be visited, when, with God's blessing, the same results would follow as here. If some one does not come out, I think I cannot consent to remain on one island, (though there is in this a large field for one man) but must sound the alarm also in other places. If however I leave them now, I fear the influence of the ministry will be the occasion of their defection from the truth, and consequently backsliding; and you can hardly conceive how hard it would be to leave without an under shepherd.—The dear saints here, despite all reproach, have firmly adhered to the truth of God, and have given the most conclusive demonstration of their attachment to the truth by a willingness to sustain it by liberal contributions.

If I were to remain in this city and island, I have no doubt my wants and the wants of my family would be met; but if I go to other islands, I need more publications and money. Bro. Livingston proposes to go to Barbadoes and see what can be done, and then write me; if therefore the field is open, I shall probably go on after a few weeks or months: however my address is always to this island, (Antigua) until I write otherwise. I hope our more wealthy brethren in America will remember this mission, and I could tell them of the sacrifices of some here who have but just heard the truth, which ought to put some to the blush.

My funds were nearly exhausted when our friends here took us under their protection, and our visits to other islands will depend much upon our means. The English steamers ply between all these islands often, so there is frequent communication, but the fare is expensive. Dear brother advise us in reference to duty—and should our brethren meet in any general meeting I hope they will take the mission into consideration, both in reference to funds and in reference to new laborers. It is the most promising field I ever occupied. Pray for us. My wife unites in love to all the brethren and sisters in our native land.

Yours waiting,

L. DELOS MANSFIELD.

Life and Death.

NUMBER II.

"For the love of Christ constraineth us who judge thus. That if one died for all, certainly all were dead; and that he died for all, that they who live should no longer live to themselves, but to him who died and rose again."—2 Cor. v. 14, 15.

The doctrine plainly taught here is, that the whole human family are somehow, or in some way, dead. Let us inquire how, or in what way they are dead?

That they have life or animated existence, is true: but what is the nature of this life? is it temporal or eternal? To all, except those who 'receive the abundance of grace and the gift of righteousness' and who 'shall reign in life thro' the one man, Jesus Christ,' it is temporal, and must end with the second death. To those 'who receive abundance of grace and the gift of righteousness,' and who persevere unto the end, it is eternal; their sleep in the grave is only a suspension, not an end of life. Their 'life is hid with Christ by God,' and cannot end or be lost. This argument, I think sustains the position, that God looks upon the whole race as dead through Adam, and only made alive through Christ.

In the one case life is suspended a little season, in the other, death. Neither, in the eye of God terminate: the one class tread in the footsteps of Adam, the first transgressor, which 'way seemeth right unto man, but the end thereof are the ways of death.' The other turn from the 'ways of death,' 'receive the overflowing of grace and the gift of righteousness,' follow in the footsteps of 'the second Adam,' and reign in life by him.' If such is not the doctrine taught here and elsewhere by the apostle, I confess I cannot understand my Bible. What else can he mean? Surely the apostle does not mean to contradict himself and facts, and say they were dead, while he knew himself and others were alive. The assertion of the apostle is this: 'that he judged thus, that if one died for all, then were all dead.'

Has any man a right to say that 'died,' when applied to Christ, signifies the giving up the spirit on the cross; but when applied to the 'all,' 'dead' signifies 'alienation from God,' or something else? I trow not; it is taking liberties with God's word that are fearful. Analogy, philology, common sense, corresponding passages, all combine to confirm the position, that 'died,' 'die,' 'dead'—'live,' 'life,' &c., all have a corresponding meaning, and can be understood in no other way, than in the common acceptance of the terms.

Again—'He died for all.' Not the few who were on earth when he died—nor those who had preceded him only; but also the then unborn millions, including you and me, dear reader, who have come after. How could the apostle say unborn men 'were dead,' except on the principle that God saw the whole race perish in the first transgression? I see no other way. With this in mind how beautifully the fifth chapter of Romans comes in! How beautiful the resurrection! What is it but a restoration to the life lost by Adam? That would have been protracted without end but for sin—but it was lost! Where now is man? Gone—perished! Christ gives 'himself a ransom for all to be testified in due time.' 'The gift of God is eternal life through Jesus Christ our Lord.'

Again: The apostle is discoursing about the resurrection; this is proved by the context. Paul has been vindicating his ministry, recounting his trials, &c., till he comes to the 13th verse of the 4th chapter, when he speaks of his faith, making it the basis of action—and then in the 14th verse carries our minds to the resurrection. The resurrection and judgment continue to be the subjects of discourse. Let me give you Macknight's rendering of the first four verses of the fifth chapter: 'For we know that when our earthly house which is a tent, is destroyed, we have a building from God, a house not made with hands eternal in the heavens. But yet, in this tent, we groan earnestly, desiring to go permanently into our habitation which is heavenly, and surely if we go in we shall not be found destitute. But yet we who are in the tent groan, being burdened; not because we desire to go out, but to go permanently in, that what is mortal may be swallowed up of life.'

Man's probationary time or stay on earth, is here represented by a person residing or sojourning a little while in a tent—a temporary dwelling place—one that from its nature can last but a short time; but the future or immortal state, by a permanent habitation. 'But yet we who are in the tent groan, being burdened, not because we desire to go out, [no, that is not what we groan after] but to go permanently in, [i. e. we groan after immortality and the eternal inheritance of the saints,] in order that the mortal [the dying] may be swallowed up of life.'

That it is resurrection or eternal life is farther proved by the 10th verse—'For we must all appear before the tribunal of Christ, that every one may receive a reward or punishment in the body according to what he hath done whether it be good or bad.' Now if resurrection is a reanimation of being, (and so the original teaches) death must be a suspension of that being. If in its most comprehensive sense it is reanimation of being, with glory, honor and felicity, then death in its most comprehensive sense must be extinction of being, with ignominy, shame and misery.

Life and death in the simplest form, signify, the one, to exist, the other, to perish, or cease to exist. Thus, I repeat, God looks upon the race after the first transgression, as perishing—dead; and only as living by accepting of life at the hand of Christ.

LETTER FROM BRO. W. SILK.

Dear Bro. Marsh:—The Scriptures affirm that a meek and a quiet spirit in the sight of God is of great price, and I trust we know something of this reality by experience. Yes, and all who are exercised thereby are enabled in patience to possess their souls. How much patience the children of the bridegroom need while traveling here as strangers to the land of promise. I say we need patience, and why? When we look abroad on the world as it now is and behold the wickedness that abounds, we need patience—yes, we truly need the whole fruit of the spirit: love, joy, peace, long-suffering, gentleness, patience, meekness, &c. &c. to sustain us. One blessed assurance is ours: Jesus once dwelt in this wicked world and was tempted and tried, consequently he knows how to succor, and will not suffer his believing children to be tempted more than they are able to bear. Glory to that blessed Jesus for this! none shall be able to pluck his faithful ones out of his hands! Hallelujah! glory!

We are less or more associated with those who are fallen from rectitude; we live in a corrupt, apostatized world: depraved, carnal, consequently at enmity with God, not subject to his law neither indeed can be, while unreconciled to him. We may of course then expect that an unregenerated world will practice wickedness—I say this may be expected. It was this that Jesus came to remedy; but what shall we say of those who profess allegiance to God, to be saved by grace divine, and yet strike hands with the wicked in carrying out the very vilest and most abominable wickedness possible for demons to conceive of here?

But do the professed Christians unite with the world? Let it not be thought that I exultingly answer in the affirmative; no, verily, it is painful to me to give such an answer—to see the bright, effulgent, and glorious principles of the gospel lowered down and trampled under foot, is no cause of exultation to the Christian; but the truth must be spoken—we will endeavor to do it in love.

Then who have been responsible for all the wretchedness, misery, ruin, death, pauperism and crime, resulting from intemperance during the period of this (N. Y.) State's independence? (so called.) I think I hear some one say, 'The rum-seller. But stop a little; who is this rum-seller? In all probability his name is on the record of some (professedly) Christian church! Whether it is so or not he is one privileged and protected by (what is called) law, to traffic in this deadly poison, to the bitter and hopeless ruin of all who may come within his unhallowed grasp. But who protects him by this law? The board of excise. Who are they? The agents of the people who compose the law-making power. Then of course the people are responsible; and who are the people? I have no hesitation in saying that a respectable proportion of them are members (as they say) in good and regular standing in the different churches throughout the State; shocking to relate! to think that a people professing so much piety as do the people of this State, should be so reckless to the interests of mankind! In this respect then have they struck hands with the wicked.

But do they stop here? No, verily. Behold the plains of Matamoras and Monterey! There hear the groans and sighs of the wounded and dying! There see the torrents of human blood! the mangled limbs! the mutilated and dead carcasses of men, strewed all over the plains! The horrible sight of it is sufficient to make demons turn away with disgust! But who are engaged in this human butchery? who! again who!! Christians (by profession) are there side by side with the worldly and profane! But it is the private church member. Yes, verily; and not only so, but the professed Minister of the Gospel is there also! One who was an editor of a religious periodical said to his subscribers that he had no time to attend to religious subjects; he must away to Matamoras TO FIGHT THE GOOD FIGHT OF FAITH!!!

But again: what is the object to be obtained by this wholesale slaughter? To extend and perpetuate American slavery with all its abominable contingencies; to multiply misery and woe, whips and gags, iron collars and thumb screws, hand-cuffs and balls and chains, to crush and brutalize and chattelize MAN, whom God so loved, as to give his son a sacrifice to redeem! to sever for ever the dearest ties that bind man to man—to sell children by the pound from their kind mother's embrace—to sell husband from wife, parents from children, brother from sister, friend from friend!

But are Christians engaged in this barbarity? Those who profess to be Christians are—from the private membership, through all their different orders up to the Bishop himself! Oh lamentable, truly lamentable to relate! to behold the minister come from the pulpit and sell his fellow, his brother, and perhaps cast his price into the treasury to send Bibles and ministers to the heathen! But is not this spoken of by the church as wicked? No; the great men of the land, the Doctors of divinity, Ministers of the Gospel, generally affirm that slavery is a divine institution, that God approves of it, that it is sanctioned by the Bible!

Now let me close this letter by putting forth one problem. How long, in view of this state of things, will it require to introduce a temporal millennium, if the church has been laboring (as they say) for eighteen hundred years to bring to pass that happy period wherein no war, no slavery, no intemperance, shall have place!

Voices of Truth & Glad Tidings

"The wise shall understand."

ROCHESTER, MARCH 3, 1847.

CHEERING INTELLIGENCE.—The cheering letter from Bro. Mansfield, in this number, will be read with joyful interest by all who, like the angels in heaven, rejoice in the salvation of sinners. And that joy will be greatly increased in reading the account given in Bro. Collins' letter of the many who have recently turned to the Lord, in his vicinity.—Who will longer doubt relative to there being mercy in store for all who seek for it? Away with infidel, wicked unbelief: and you who have entertained it, humble yourselves in dust and ashes before the Lord, that you may receive his pardoning mercy, and again become an active useful member of his church. Oh, how fearful and impious is that position which opposes the salvation of perishing sinners, for whom Christ died! Abandon it! abandon it, my brother, or sister, without delay, lest it prove your ruin.—Remember, God will have judgment without mercy, on him who has showed no mercy.

Bro. Mansfield's call for help should be heeded. Some efficient man of God, in whom the brethren have the fullest confidence, should go. Where can such an one be found? and who will aid in defraying the necessary expenses? The Lord direct in this matter.

Time of the Second Advent.

NO. X.

The evidences of the advent near, designed to be presented in this number, if noticed at length in detail, would furnish sufficient matter for several lengthy essays. But as they are generally understood, especially by the majority of our brethren, a simple reference to them will be sufficient.

The moral condition of the church and world, is a very conclusive evidence that the end of all things is at the door. All admit that the entire world is in a sad state of moral wretchedness; but many think there is nothing alarming in the case, nothing more than what has been before. They say the darkest time is just before day, and a great and glorious change, perhaps their temporal millennium, is soon to take place. Mistaken souls! great is their delusion. Would they diligently consider the circumstances under which the church and world are now corrupt, they would see at once that the corruption at no former period has been as deep as it now is.—They would also understand that the change looked for, will be nothing less than the fearful destruction of all the workers of iniquity, at the appearing of the Son of man.

That the church and world at different times have been deeply corrupt, and undergone important changes, we readily admit; but the corruption has been in times of ignorance, which is not the fact now: for we are now living under the full blaze of all the heavenly light, which the Father of lights has caused to shine upon man's pathway for six thousand years. This light has been rejected; all the motives to holiness, which God in his wisdom has seen fit to give, or ever will give, have not stopped the church and world in their downward course to ruin. No higher motives to reform will ever be presented, than have already been given. Hence there is no hope of a reformation and salvation from the ruin threatened. Destruction is inevitable, to both!—This is the change which the very nature of the case, and the clear word of prophecy, warrants us to look for next. And the question to be decided is, have the church and world reached that degree of moral corruption, in which the Scriptures predict they will be, just before their final doom? By comparing their present condition with a few of the many passages of Scripture which speak on this point, it will be seen that they are in that condition.

The prominent sin of the last days is, not the open and general commission of every species of crime, as some have supposed, but a general rejection of, or a departure from the holy and benevolent principles of the gospel, and a universal prevalence of a worldly, covetous, proud, and pleasure seeking spirit.—That such is the general character of the world, including the nominal church, Catholic and Protestant, no one will understandingly deny. It is as the Savior predicted it would be just before his second coming, viz: with the great mass, a time of 'eating and drinking, planting and building, marrying and giving in marriage,' or indulging excessively in the things of this world. The multitude, the world over, in and out of the church, are 'lovers of pleasure, more than lovers of God.'—'They will not endure sound doctrine,' have 'turned aside unto fables'—are crying, 'Peace and safety'—are 'mockers,' or 'scorners,' saying, Where is the promise of his coming? &c.

This (painful to contemplate) is the condition of the great mass in church and state, of the entire globe. The fashions, pleasures and riches of the world have united and bound both under a fatal charm, which countless mercies, faithful warnings and fearful judgments have failed to break, and which we fear never will be broken until the terrors of the great day shall do it. In a word, this state of things furnishes the Bible student with sure evidence that the end of all things is at hand, or that the harvest of the earth is nearly ripe, and soon will be gathered.

Another sure indication that the coming of the Lord is at the door, is seen in the present attitude of the European powers. It is generally admitted that the universal national peace which has reigned since the formation of the Holy Alliance, soon after the fall of Buonaparte, is clearly a subject of prophecy, in the seventh chapter of Revelation, under the symbol of four angels holding the four winds.—Those winds were to be held until the servants of God were all sealed; then the Lord will come and gather home his children, as the chapter clearly shows. That those winds will not much longer be restrained, amounts to almost a demonstration, to those acquainted with the present condition of the allied powers.

The late marriage of a French Prince to a Spanish Princess, has broken the friendly alliance between England and France. The annihilation of the free state of Cracow, by the united act or consent of Russia, Prussia and Austria, is met with injured feelings and protests, by England, France and Sweden. Finally, such is the state of things, that worldly wise men confidently look for a general European war before the close of the present year. Says the London correspondent of the Boston Atlas:

"An article in the London 'Spectator,' of the 9th Jan., under the head of 'Topics of the Day,' on

'The Coming War in Europe,' has attracted considerable attention. The writer commences by saying that "The year opens with general presentiments of war in Europe, and we cannot deny that the balance of probabilities is against its continuing much longer. Some of our readers may have heard that England's patient obstinacy in maintaining peace has been calculated, by men deeply versed in the science and practical application of numbers, to last only till the year 1847! Certainly the actual posture and tendencies of affairs are not pacific." After speaking of the blessings of peace, and the horrors of war, the writer says, "The question remains, at what point will war break out, when it does come? This question involves not only the difference between that which is inevitable, and that which is not inevitable, but also the difference between what would be a gratuitous and unmitigated calamity, and what might be a rough road to better things." It is found that Russia is the point where war will break out. "Russia, the empire which subsists on the most rude and naked basis of main force, is the grand depository of warlike menaces; and the advance of her encroachment has now reached such a point that the next step seems certain to involve Europe in a war of resistance. Every step has been successful. Province after province has had the Russian mark placed upon it, and has been seized with an advance as steady as that of the backwoodsman with his axe in the forest." These provinces are named, and a remarkable correspondence of the year 1815, is alluded to, in which Lord Castlereagh remonstrated, but unsuccessfully, with the Emperor Alexander against his aggression on Poland! In 1846, we see the annihilation of Cracow, and the absorption of Warsaw! A strong impression, it is said, prevails in London, that Russia is about to pounce upon Austria! Austria is weak on every side, "and when Russia seizes the Christian provinces of Turkey, the aggression will be upon Vienna, rather than upon the Porte. All Germany is indignant at the Cracow blunder. Switzerland is tempting Austria into suicidal projects of intervention, if not of partition. In Italy, Austria is threatened with multiplied dangers. Prussia, too, trembles. Overreached by Russia, she is placed between two fires. In glancing over the volcanic regions on the map of Europe, the "Spectator" finds that in all of them war is imminent—but the advance of Russia on Europe would provoke a war of Europe on Russia."

In view of all these things, who can doubt that the day of redemption of God's people, is near? No one who sees them in their true light, and loves the appearing of his Lord. O, may we be found worthy to be hid in his pavilion in the day of the Lord's indignation, against the workers of iniquity.

Parable of the Rich Man & Lazarus.

We closed our remarks on this parable last week with the statement that its design was, to show the fearful doom of the murmuring Pharisees and the glorious reward of the poor 'publicans and sinners,' who came to Christ, and were received by him, &c. And our object now is to show that the parable, standing as it does, connected in one unbroken discourse with four other parables, can have no other meaning. In detail, the sentiment it teaches evidently is this—

As the rich man, in the parable, is represented as wearing purple and fine linen, and feasting splendidly every day, so did the Pharisees and Scribes. As the poor man Lazarus, covered with sores, lay at the gate of the rich man, desiring to be fed from the crumbs of the rich man's table, and having his sores licked by dogs; so these poor outcasts, 'publicans and sinners,' were morally polluted, from the crown of the head to the sole of the foot, and though they lay at the gate, or were under the teaching, of the Pharisees and Scribes, to whom was committed the lively oracles of God, the balm of Gilead was not poured into their wounds: they were not healed: the despised Samaritans, or even the Gentile dogs, had a deeper concern for their well being, than had the Pharisees and Scribes.

As the poor and the rich man in the parable are both represented as dying, so were Pharisees and Scribes, and their poor brethren, soon absolved from the law of Moses by its death, or abrogation; which fact seems to be referred to in verse 16. 'The law and the prophets were until John: since that time the kingdom of God is preached.' As the poor man in the parable is represented as being in Abraham's bosom, and the rich man in hell, so after the abrogation of the law, all who received Christ, even those poor publicans and sinners, became Abraham's children, by faith in Christ, while the Pharisees and Scribes, who rejected him, were shut out from the Abrahamic covenant, and subjected to all the wrath which has fallen upon the Jewish nation, and finally to everlasting banishment from the presence of God.

Wrath has come upon the Jews, to the uttermost, and is upon them to this day. They have been, since their final rejection of Christ, in torment, and like the rich man in the parable calling on Abraham, in whom they boast, not on God nor Christ, for the water of life; but disappointment has met them at every step. They have been in the condition predicted by Isaiah, viii. 21, 22, 'And they shall pass through it [the law] hardly bestead and hungry: and it shall come to pass that when they shall be hungry, and shall fret themselves, and curse their king and their God, and look upward, [to father Abraham] and they shall look unto the earth; and behold trouble and darkness, dimness of anguish, and they shall be driven to darkness.' Chapt. ix. 5, 'For every battle of the warrior is with confused noise and garments rolled in blood; but this shall be with burning and fuel of fire.' The next verse tells why, 'For unto us a child is born, &c. Read the context, and you will see that this state of things was to come upon the Jews, for their rejection of Christ. Then it is not difficult to find the anti-type of that part of the parable which represents the rich man being in torment. It evidently is the nation of the Jews, especially the Pharisees and Scribes, or spiritual rulers of that nation.

The impassable gulf, in the parable, between Abraham and the poor man in his bosom, and the rich man, and the non-intercourse named, doubtless refers to the utter impossibility of the Jews, after the death of their law, ever as a nation, coming into the Abrahamic covenant. Could the Judaizer see the force of this parable, he would no longer advocate the return of the Jew, according to the flesh, to the land promised to Abraham: for between them and their father Abraham lies an impassable gulf: they never can inherit the promised land with him.

The five brethren, in the parable, are to be understood as the whole house or family of the rich man, and doubtless represents the whole Jewish nation. The urgent yet fruitless entreaties of the rich man in the parable, not to God nor Christ, but to 'father Abraham,' may represent the unwearied yet fruitless desires and efforts of the blinded Pharisees and Scribes or leaders of the Jewish nation, to save their nation from the judgments which have come upon them. Abraham, or the covenant with him, cannot help them in their unbelief, nor as a nation. For, some at least, if the true heirs are already in his bosom, are in the true faith, and there is no provision in that covenant for any other ones. All who would share in the blessings promised to Abraham, must submit to the terms of the covenant made with him; or, in other words, come to Christ, and be received by him, as some of the poor publicans and sinners did.

'They have Moses and the prophets'—in whom the whole nation professed to place the most implicit confidence; and if the Jew would not hear and believe his own favorite law and loved prophets, no testimony, though one from the dead should give it, would convince them that Christ was the true Messiah. This has actually been proved true in the resurrection of Christ. The Jews have not believed, though he demonstrated the truth, the divinity of his character and mission, by his resurrection from the dead.

'This we think is the true light of this parable.—In the detail it has its anti-type in the history of the Jewish nation from the preaching of Christ to their banishment from the kingdom of God, at the final judgment. It cuts them off forever from all the promised blessings to Abraham and his seed, but secures to the true heirs, all who are Christ's, a portion in the kingdom of God.

Some other things relating to this parable may be noticed next week.

Bro. Gross on the Time.

'The household have been asking bread on this subject, but too often they have been turned off with a stone,—they now ask for the truth, and shall we turn them away to evidences partially given, and thus prevent them looking forward from Sept. 1846? No; give us bread, is the cry; and if the one class of followers hold their peace, yet truth they will have, even though the stones were made to preach the time. The pledge is given under oath to the God of heaven, that 'the wise shall understand how long to the end of these wonders!'

We either live in the last part of the last year of 'the time of the end,' or we do not live in the time of the end. Which will we choose? The Papal power to make war was taken away, fully done before May 1802, and has continued thus ever since; if that change did end the 1260, then we are near the close of the 1335 years; but if that change did not end the 1260, then the ending of the 1335 is more than 45 years in the future. Let us be believing, and bold to confess the truth, that we may be confessed before the Father and his holy angels.—Amen.

A WORD TO BRO. MARSH. Dear Brother:—Will you look to certain articles published by you in the 'Voice of Truth,' from March to December 1845, from me; and then examine your remarks on the same; and then decide who has as continually changed as the wind, on the subject of 'knowing the time' of the coming of Christ—and also decide who has become not a safe expositor of prophecy. * * * I have no fears of the result: if it is of God, it will stand, though Pilate and Herod are made friends in fighting against it.'

We regret very much to see these remarks, and the article from which they are taken, of a similar character, come from the pen of one who is looking for the appearing of the Son of man, in April or May next, and published in a paper, a leading object of which is to advocate the same doctrine, or that the advent is near. It is not the sentiment advocated at which we are grieved, but the unkind spirit manifested—and in this respect we are not so much hurt on our own account, as for others. Such things never do any good, but always hurt. They wound the already deeply grieved feelings of our greatly tried brethren, and serve to alienate them from one another more than unite them in truth and love, and prepare them to meet their Lord.

We spoke in kindness when we told Bro. Gross why we could not publish his articles on the time.—We did not cast him off as being unworthy of our fellowship. We only thought him not a safe expositor of the word of God, and gave our reasons for thinking so. He is highly offended at this frank expression. In this we think he errs; and for the peace of our dear brethren, we hope he will see this mistake, and correct it as soon as possible. And may our dear brother, and all of us, remember that it is not only our duty to understand all we can about the time of the advent, but, in order to be ready to meet our Lord, we must have his spirit, and not grudge one against another.

Such expressions as 'the household have been asking bread on this subject, but too often have they been turned off with a stone'—'though Pilate and Herod are made friends in fighting it'—&c., do great injustice to those for whom they are evidently designed. We do hope our brethren who may read such sentiments, will not imbibe the spirit which inspired such inuendos, which never should be made the weapons of warfare of him who professes to wield none other than the sword of the Spirit.

The positive manner in which Bro. Gross speaks about our living 'in the last part of the last year of the time of the end, or we do not live in the time of the end'—then the ending of the 1335 is more than 45 years in the future,—reminds us of a similar positiveness manifested by our dear Bro. Storr., in the 7th month excitement: he was sure, if the Lord did not come at that supposed Jubilee year, he would not come for fifty years. Such fearful conclusions are unwarranted by the word of the Lord, and always, if persisted in, end in fatal results. They originate in the same principle which leads a man to say—'If this conclusion of mine is not correct, then the Bible is untrue. It is a species of religious gambling: staking the veracity of the Truth, the word of God, on the correctness of human calculations. This never should be done: let God be true, though every man be proved a liar.

Relative to the time set, by Bro. Gross and some others, for the advent, if their opinions should be generally received by our brethren, then we should be very confident they would meet with another disappointment, by the event occurring either before or after the time they had set for it to take place: for the Savior has said that at such an hour as ye think not the Son of man cometh. Heaven and earth will pass away, but his word will not fail.

Finally, we say to all, we love the time, Bible time, of the Lord's coming—we rejoice in the light which we or any one else has shed upon this fundamental doctrine of the Bible. We are still investigating the subject, and hope others will not be backward in the good work. This glorious truth should be kept before the people; with its kindred truths, it constitutes the meat in due season for these last moments of time.

We cannot say that the Lord will come in '47, which any one can and should say without an if, if he has genuine gospel faith that he will come this year: for true faith never suffers its possessor to become confounded, it never disappoints. But we can say that we believe without a doubt that he will come very soon; we cannot see how he can delay his coming beyond this year: and such are the evidences in the case we think we are justified in looking for it every moment. And certainly all who take this position will be as likely to be found ready to meet the Lord at any hour, as those will be, who put his return off to a definite time in the future.—Surely there is not sufficient difference in our views to make it a matter of grief between us, or a breach of our Christian fellowship. Especially those who set the time in the future have no just cause of complaint against those who are really looking for the return of their Lord every hour. Let there be no strife among us, for we are brethren, and the Judge standeth before the door.

CAUSE IN THE WEST.—Read Bro. Chandler's letter, and then decide whether you can do anything, and how much, for the cause in the West. Brother Chandler is well known by our brethren generally, to be a man of worth, on whom funds may be bestowed, with the fullest assurance that they will be devoted to the glory of God. He should be constantly in the field: his efficient labors are greatly needed in the far west, where duty seems to have cast his lot. Who, of the Lord's stewards, will help sustain him in the good work of winning souls to Christ?

Those who may comply with this request, if they choose, may direct their free-will offerings to this office, which shall be acknowledged in our paper, and forwarded to Bro. Chandler. Or, they may be sent directly to Bro. M. Chandler, Emerald Grove, Rock Co., Wis. Ter.

BRO. J. B. COOK.—In the same 'Advocate' in which the article from Bro. Gross on the time is found, is an article from Bro. J. B. Cook on the immortality of the soul, or rather against that dogma. Now, though we may fully endorse the sentiment advocated by Bro. C., we cannot approve of the unkind spirit, the undue severity, which runs through the whole of his article. Suppose the 'Herald' is in error on this point, it is not our place to deal in bitter words and an unkind spirit towards it. No, no, Christ has told us differently—and the already bleeding cause of our Lord loudly calls upon us all to pursue a different course from this. If we cannot differ in sentiment without calling each other hard names, what better are we than the proscriptive sects around us? Ah, our condemnation will be greater than theirs: for we have greater light.—'By this shall all men know that ye are my disciples,—if ye have love for one another.' O for the spirit of him who said this, to fill our souls, and influence our acts at this perilous moment.

R. R. Y.—Your request relative to leaving the church with which you are connected was overlooked until this late hour. Taking into consideration the circumstances under which you are placed, and certain requirements of the Lord, (2 Cor. vi. 14-18,) we should advise to leave. But do it in love, and never let any other principle govern your acts towards your old brethren, or any one else.

E. M. H.—We are sorry to find you apologizing for Slavery and the Mexican war. So your communication appears to us.

Our correspondents have our warmest thanks for their rich offerings for the columns of our humble sheet. Certain lengthy articles have caused a delay in publishing some of their communications. We crave the indulgence of the writers: hope they will continue their favors, and we will give all a hearing as soon as possible.

Who, of the messengers of the everlasting gospel, will listen to the Macedonian cry from sister Carvin? See a note from her, among the extracts of letters, on another page.

LETTER FROM SISTER E. S. BRYANT.

Dear Bro. Marsh:—Our number here is very small, but we are not disheartened on that account, for we remember that it is the little flock to whom the kingdom is promised, and that our blessed Savior has promised to be where the smallest number that could assemble together, should meet in his name, and we often find by our happy experience that he is faithful to his promise and is in our midst to comfort and strengthen us, and our hearts rejoice in the glorious prospect of soon seeing him as he is, having been made like him! Surely such a blessed hope may trials well endure! We have long felt that we have as much cause for gratitude to God for the afflictions he sends upon us, as for the mercies we enjoy; for they are as much a token of his love—they are needful for us and designed for our good. We would not be without chastisement whereof all are partakers, but pray that with every temptation he will make a way of escape, that we may be able to bear it—that we may have strength to endure, and may come forth as gold refined. Surely it is an honor to be counted worthy to suffer shame and reproach for the cause of Christ. I rejoice to be identified with my suffering brethren and sisters, for I have no doubt they have the truth. Who would peril their salvation with a religion which the church and world in this degenerate age of Christianity approve of? There must be a forsaking of all for Christ—a going forth without the camp bearing his reproach. A worldly, temporizing religion will not do; we cannot go to heaven on such flowery beds of ease, nor walk with the multitude down the broad road and enter at last through the gates into the city. If we are not setting our faces as a flint Zionward, and urging our onward course with the feet, in the narrow way, however rugged, our hope will in the end be as the 'spider's web.' May God enable us all to examine ourselves, to see if we are built on the only sure foundation, if we have Christ formed in us the hope of glory—for all ruses of lies will soon be swept away.

The thought is very painful that multitudes, who have now high hopes of heaven, will soon find them end in utter hopeless despair! Oh, that they would heed the many warnings God is in mercy giving them, and awake to a sense of their true condition, and flee for refuge to the hope set before them in the gospel, for we have every reason to believe, that soon, man's probation will close!

That the earth waxeth old as doth a garment, is very evident from the remarkable phenomena in the air, the sea and the earth itself, all indicating its speedy dissolution. The present threatening aspect of the political world, the suffering and distress endured by thousands, the unparalleled prevalence of crime and the failing of many hearts, looking for those things that are coming on the earth, all show that the end is nigh—that he whose right it is, will soon take to himself his great power and reign.

We still very highly prize the Voice of Truth, as it comes to us richly laden from week to week—but we hope our dear brethren writing for it, will direct their attention more to the state of the living than the dead.

We have a very interesting Sabbath school—but are much embarrassed for want of teachers and suitable books and papers. Have you anything in your office we could make good use of? What hymn books have you? Could we get the Children's Advent Herald from your office?

Your sister, in the faith and hope of the gospel, ELIZABH S. BRYANT.

We have no hymn books for Sabbath schools. We have a supply of question books, such as you need. The Children's Advent Herald you had better have sent from the Advent Herald office, Boston, Mass.—EDITOR.

LETTER FROM BRO. M. CHANDLER.

Dear Bro. Marsh:—I am still rejoicing in the blessed hope of soon seeing Him whom my soul loveth. I am far from believing that we shall ever see Christ till he comes in the clouds of heaven. A professed minister of Christ said to his congregation but a short time ago, that it makes no difference when the Lord comes—he did not care if he never came! For, said he, I shall go directly to him as soon as I die. I heard a Methodist minister preach but a short time since from Heb. x. 25—'Not forsaking the assembling of yourselves together, as the manner of some is—but exhorting one another; and so much the more as you see the day approaching.' He remarked that it may be asked, what day? He said, not the day when the Lord is to come and burn the world up and annihilate the wicked, as the Millerites tell us; not the day of judgment, for there is a day of far greater importance to us than that, viz: the day of our death. Then what day does it refer to? it may be still asked. The answer was, the destruction of Jerusalem, for Christ told his disciples that some of them should not taste of death till they had seen the Son of man coming, and he gave them signs which should precede his coming, which took place before the destruction of Jerusalem; the sun was darkened before that time and the moon turned to blood, and the stars fell from heaven, and Peter and John lived to see these things, and to see the Lord come at the destruction of Jerusalem! O my God! how long will the shepherds cause their flocks to drink the water fouled by their feet! When will men cease to pervert the word of the Lord? Oh! what a fearful account they must give! How different the doctrines taught by Christ and the apostles! Christ tells us when we see these signs, then know that the kingdom of God is nigh—not the destruction of Jerusalem! Paul tells us that if the dead rise not, then is our preaching vain and your faith is also vain, and ye are yet in your sins, and they who have fallen asleep in Christ have perished. God by Isaiah hath said, 'Wo unto them that draw iniquity with cords of vanity, and sin as it were with a cart rope; that say, Let him make speed and hasten his work that we may see it, and let the counsel of the Holy One of Israel draw nigh and come, that we may know it. Wo unto them that call evil good and good evil, that put darkness for light and light for darkness, that put bitter for sweet and sweet for bitter. Wo unto them that are wise in their own eyes, and prudent in their own sight.' Isa. v. 18-21. God will soon put an end to all these evils: the Lord hasten it! I thank God that some have been induced to apply to the great Physician for eye-salve, and have and can now see. I find a very few scattered through this Western country who have been enabled to see and cut loose from the wicked influences around them, and are prepared to receive the truth.

I have travelled considerable since I came out here, but my travels have been limited on the account of sickness and for the want of means. I was taken sick the first of September and have been ill for the most part of the time since. We have had considerable sickness in our family, and now I have to labor with my hands to supply the wants of my family for the most part, but I get out when I can. I have been laboring part of the time for a few weeks in Illinois. I find a few brethren there who are looking for their King. Many doors are opened to receive the truth. I have just returned from a place where I gave a course of lectures—where they have never heard before. Some were ready to receive the truth, and rejoiced in it. One infidel attended who had been a great reader of history, and when he saw the harmony of prophecy with profane history, gave up his infidelity and is much interested in the coming of the Lord. One Universalist also was ready to receive the gospel of the kingdom.

I think much good was done; some precious souls were plucked as brands from the burning. I should be very glad to devote all of my time in travelling if I could be sustained. I feel that time is short, and all that is done must be done quickly. There is a large field here and but few to occupy it. The Lord open the way that the true light may shine. Every thing around us speaks in thunder tones that the Lord is at hand! My prayer is, come quickly!

Yours as ever looking for the King,

MOSES CHANDLER.

P. S. Bro. Daniels is in Springfield, Ill., and Sister Parks is in the vicinity of Buffalo Grove, Ill.: both are doing good. The Lord bless them and give them souls for their hire. M. C. Jamesville, Ill., Feb. 8th, 1847.

LETTER FROM BRO. J. S. BALDWIN.

Bro. Marsh:—I have felt unhappy that I have not been able to forward you the money for the Voice of Truth before now. There has been a multiplicity of reasons, all of which may not be expedient to name now; some however may be proper. There are a few laboring in this territory against a corrupt public sentiment on the subject of American slavery, on account of which they have not unfrequently been obliged to abandon their pulpits and put to the expense of moving to another place. There is at the present time a mighty struggle between the true friends of God, and the oppressed, down-trodden, despised and bleeding humanity, and the pretended friends of each. Does a minister believe in the second advent being nigh, he is not in his sane mind, especially at this stage of the advent cause when the funeral sermon of Millerism has long since been preached. Even some are so fearful lest they will be esteemed adventists they will not mention the awful scenes of the judgment. Oh! how many there are who love the praise of men more than the praise of God. God is placing men in circumstances in which their true characters are being developed; seemingly he is trying their hearts, and every effort is made by them not to commit themselves on either of the above named subjects, but are determined to keep on the side of popularity. Such we feel cannot inherit the rest which is in reserve for those who are waiting the return of their Lord.

Your paper is a welcome visitor, for I deem it based on the principles of unaltered truth. God will sustain you, my brother, for he will uphold the true and the right. J. S. BALDWIN.

Vernon, W. T., Jan. 21st, 1847.

LETTER FROM DR. J. B. COLLINS.

Bro. Marsh:—I do most cordially agree with you in the position you take on the subject of time: it is the true gospel position.

We have of late had one of the most glorious times here. The subject of the near approach of the advent of our Lord and Savior had lost all its influence in this section, except with a few individuals. The churches too were in the most cold apathetic state imaginable, until about the first of January, '47. The people seemed to wish to hear nothing more on what they termed the delusions of Millerism, when Elder John Green, a Seventh day Baptist, (the same that was mentioned by a Cuba correspondent of your paper,) commenced a series of meetings in this vicinity, declaring his full faith in the speedy coming of the Lord: and such a time of revival in all the churches and through the entire community, I never before witnessed. In the space of four weeks, there were nearly 100 converts baptised, and more than treble that number of dead or cold professors brought to life, and the progress still continues and is extending. Holiness to the Lord, seems to be the motto; and there never was a time when the people seemed so anxious to hear or learn the truths of the gospel as at the present, since my residence in this place, which is 27 years!

Yours in the bonds of affection and in full faith, steadfastly looking for the return of our absent Lord,

JOHN B. COLLINS.

Alfred, N. Y., Feb. 10th, 1847.

Sister L. Carvin, Botetourt Springs, Va., Jan. 25th, writes:—

The expectation of soon meeting my Lord and Savior is a source of unbounded comfort and joy, whilst contending with the fiery trials of time and sense. The anticipation of soon being delivered from all this world's pollutions and receiving the reward of the righteous in the mansions of eternal bliss, where the wicked cease from troubling and the weary are forever at rest, makes my soul leap for joy, and my constant cry is, Come Lord Jesus, come quickly, and take thy ransomed people home! O that the whole world could see and understand, and do the things that pertain to their eternal welfare! But O, the dreadful state of the wicked! this awful thought draws a gloom around my brightest joys, and I can only say, Lord, have mercy on them and bring them to a speedy repentance.

Will you endeavor to send some brother to this destitute region, where the people are sleeping on the verge of the great day, perfectly secure in the love of this world? Let them come in the strength of the Lord, He will not desert them.

— M. B. Hart, South Reading, Jan. 28th, writes:—

I am led to ask where are those faithful ones, who were willing to bear a part of the burden of the glorious work which you are engaged in? I am fearful that the friends of Jesus are diminishing rather than increasing. It is true that of the many who started with us, few only can be found sustaining the word of God. Oh, how many there are who would have been led joyfully to the stake in '43, who now cannot endure the trial of watching for one short hour. Such may sleep on a little longer, but their rest will be short: the Judge stands at the door! they will soon be awakened from their slumbers.

Sister P. Neal, Fort Hill, Ill., Dec. 31st, writes:—

The appointed time for the end of all things has not yet arrived, yet we know that He is faithful that has promised, and when the times are full the vision will speak. Yes, then the day so long expected will at length have dawned—the waiting saints whose hearts had grown almost weary will then be gathered—death will be swallowed up in victory, and the glorious restitution spoken of by all the prophets since the world began, will make the earth like Eden again.

"O glorious hope! O best abode!
Shall I be there and like my God?"

It does seem that time cannot pass far into the future. May the Lord help us all to stand ready, that if this night the trump should sound, we may escape the things that are coming to pass, and stand before the Son of man.

Bro. A. P. Barringer, Troy, N. Y., Jan. 29th, writes:—

There are a few in East and West Troy who still cling to the true hope of the gospel, that will be realized when 'this mortal shall have put on immortality,' and, besides, believe that the day is near at hand. Bro. Preble preaches in the above places as regularly on Lord's days as the health of his family will permit. Prayer-meetings are held steadily week day evenings. Bro. M. Batchelor of Pownal, Vt., preached to us last Sunday three discourses, and again on Monday evening to great acceptance, edifying the brethren much. Bro. B. is one of the Lord's chosen ministers truly, as I think all the brethren and sisters will testify who have heard him. Bro. Preble is much endeared to the friends in Troy; his afflictions of late have been very severe by sickness in his family.

A WORD TO PARENTS.—Parents are taught and commanded to govern children, as much as children are to obey parents; and if these betray their trust, they have to thank themselves if the conduct of their sons and daughters make their houses scenes of anarchy, and themselves ashamed. How the heart aches when we witness the unseemly and irreverent behavior of boys and girls from childhood upwards, toward their parents and seniors. It is hard to keep silent, although in another one's house, from speaking our minds on some occasions. To say nothing about those who make no profession of godliness, what I now write is doubly, trebly, yea tenfold more strongly applicable to many who call themselves Methodists, Christians, Baptists, Presbyterians, and last, but not least, Adventists and Advent Preachers. Did not our eyes see and our ears hear what they do? we should be slow to credit the same upon the evidence of others. How can we forbear speaking on this glaring reproach upon the Christianity we avow? Unfaithful Parents! Advent Lecturers!! ye who succumb to the disrespect, the rebellion, the sins of your children, remember the case of Eli. God requires His fear and service in your own households, and if you cannot govern them, where is your fitness to govern the church of Christ? Much more might be added, but a word to the wise &c. &c.

THE BIBLE ADVOCATE.

I have sent two letters for publication to the editor of this paper, and neither of them have been published. The reason they have not been, I cannot tell. They contained some arguments against a resurrection of all the dead at the coming of Christ. There is no positive Scripture in the Bible to prove that all the dead will be raised at one time, but right to the reverse. For the dead in Christ SHALL RISE FIRST! And they who are accounted worthy to obtain that world and the resurrection FROM the dead [wicked dead] neither marry nor are given in marriage, neither can they die any more. There can be no resurrection FROM the dead if ALL are to be raised at once. But the righteous will be raised FROM and BEFORE the wicked, one thousand years. Better be found in the closet upon our knees imploring wisdom from God, than to be advocating errors for Bible truth.

CHARLES CRAWFORD, Jr.

Fredonia, N. Y., Jan., 1847.

Get this principle wrought in your heart:—
That there is nothing got by sin, but misery; nothing lost by holiness, but hell.

OBTUARY.

"Blessed are the dead who die in the Lord."

DIED, in East Hartford, Conn., Dec. 28th, Mrs. MARY ABBEE, in the 57th year of her age, in the full and glorious hope of a speedy resurrection from the dead to immortality and "eternal life," through our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ. By this afflicting dispensation, the Church of God has lost a faithful and devoted member, and her children a dear and beloved parent. Her's has been a life of trial and affliction, such as, perhaps, very few are called to pass through. Many of these were brought upon her by her adherence and faithfulness to the cause of Christ. At an early age she embraced religion, which alone can cheer the fainting pilgrim on his way, and dry the fountain of his tears. She embraced fully the doctrine of the speedy coming of our Lord in the summer of '43, in Rochester, N. Y., at the time Bro. Himes visited that place with the great Tent, since which time she has been a firm believer and consistent advocate of the same precious faith. Previous to embracing the doctrine, for the space of six years she had been impressed with the belief that the King of kings would soon come. With sorrow have I often read of the departure of the dear saints of God, to sleep awhile, till the power of the great Enemy shall be broken by the mighty Conqueror's arm: but it is now with double sorrow that I tell you of my mother's death. Ever active in the discharge of Christian duty, and ready to give a reason for the hope within her, she failed not to warn of coming wrath, and exhort to flee to Christ. But she is gone to swell the unnumbered throng, and make one more of that mighty host that soon will burst the world's great charnel-house in the eternal Jubilee. I feel not to sorrow as do others, for the great God has said, "Thy dead men shall live." Soon, if I hold to the end, shall I behold her in immortal beauty, with all the risen and redeemed, in the deathless and heavenly land! O! praise the Lord for this glorious hope! Eternal life is the gift of God.

M. M. MUMFORD.

Windham, Me., Jan. 24th, 1847.

PRADELIA ROGERS, wife of Bro. S. W. Rogers, formerly of this city, died at Lockport, Jan. 28th, 1847, aged about 32 years. She was confined to her bed for about two years previous to her decease, eighteen months of which she was blind and not in possession of her senses. But three days before her death she expressed a readiness to depart this life. We trust she sleeps in Jesus and will soon have a part in the first resurrection.—[COM.

European News.

THE FAMINE IN IRELAND.

Of the progress of the famine, the European Times says:—

The eyes of the nation are fixed on Ireland, where death is doing its work through the instrumentality of starvation. The details are horrible, sickening. The poor try to escape, and thousands find their way daily to England and Scotland. Liverpool and Glasgow are overrun with these poor creatures. In the former town as many as 100,000 have received out-door relief in a week! The pressure of local taxation on the rate-payers is likely to ruin many small house-keepers, and leave them without covering or shelter. The pressure has become so overwhelming that Parliament has been appealed to, but has hitherto given no relief.

A determined effort is being made by the wealthy classes in England to assist Ireland by means of private subscriptions, and by abstaining as much as possible from any superfluous consumption of food. A Queen's letter has appeared, addressed to the Ministers of the church of England, requiring subscriptions to be made, and large sums have thus been collected in every place of worship, and by every form of faith in the kingdom. Unhappily the state of the Highland poor is nearly as bad as that of the destitute Irish.

But the distress is not confined to Scotland and Ireland; there is much at present existing in England. The high price of provisions and the reduction of cotton, are amongst the causes that have aggravated the condition of the operatives in many of the large towns of Lancashire and Yorkshire.

FRANCE.—The scarcity of the last harvest has occasioned great distress in this country, and this distress has led to serious, and even alarming disturbances in many departments, among others Angoume, Ile et Velaine, Cotes du Noad and Cher. At Chateauroux the population rose and destroyed several houses, murdered several persons, and committed acts of gross violence. At Rennes, too, most serious disturbances have taken place. At one time great alarm was felt by the government, but the violent rioting now appears to be calming down. Nevertheless, it is dreaded that there will yet be more violence and bloodshed. The misery of the lower classes is dreadful, and even people comparatively well off complain of the extraordinary dearness of food.

To add to the general distress arising from scarcity of food, a severe pressure has weighed upon the money market.

Although, the present position of this country is really alarming. Its relations with all the great powers are unfriendly, not to say hostile; thousands are literally starving; food is unprecedentedly dear; and there is an extraordinary scarcity of money.

BELGIUM.—The misery in Flanders and other parts of this kingdom, is dreadful—as bad as it is in Ireland.

SWEDEN.—Stockholm, Jan. 22.—Our Government has protested against the annihilation of the free state of Cracow, being entitled so to do as one of the parties to the famous treaty of Vienna.

All throughout Germany great distress exists. Corn and bread are very dear. The Government do all they can, but they cannot prevent great suffering.

RUSSIA.—The Government is concentrating troops on the Polish frontier of Galicia—for what purpose it is not stated; and it is whispered that it is preparing for some grand coup in the provinces of Danube.

SWITZERLAND.—Geneva, Jan. 25.—Considerable agitation exists in the public mind of this country, and there has been some attempts at disorder. On the 6th inst. the discontented and fac-tious, aided by the inhabitants of Morat—a district distinguished for its Protestantism, but which, nevertheless, makes part of the Catholic Canton of Fribourg—took arms and marched against Fribourg, with the intention of overthrowing the local Government. The authorities took measures for resistance, and were aided by forces sent by Berne, now the Votort. They soon came to blows with the insurgents, and after a short contest, defeated them. The victors then took possession of Morat.

HUNGARY.—Perth, Jan. 15.—According to an official report, several thousand persons are in danger of dying from hunger before next spring. A demand for 50,000 florins was made to the aristocracy, but only 8000 florins were accorded; and yet that aristocracy takes all the wealth of the country, and keeps the people in slavery and misery.

HEATHEN NOTIONS OF CHRISTIANITY.—The following is an extract from the journal of a converted African attached to the mission established under the labors of Rev. Wm. Raymond, in the Mendi country. This heathen convict was sent out to prepare the way for a new missionary station. He writes:

This morning I called 'Bu-raw,' (a chief) and said to him, 'If you please, I want you to call the people together, that I may preach to them in the Mendi language about Christ.' He said, 'What you say is very well; you do not care for anything but book-palaver, and God-palaver. But I cannot call the people together to hear you talk God-palaver, because I am a war man. I have gunpowder and cutlass in my hand to fight with. If I call the people together to hear God-palaver to-day, and to-morrow begin to fight and kill, they will laugh at me. If you want to talk God-palaver, you can call your two men, and if I like I will myself sit down to hear you.'

This shows the utter darkness of heathenism. This benighted chief had not learned that war and fighting were consistent with Christianity, and that in Christian countries clergymen not only call people together to hear God-palaver one day and fight the next, but even pray to God to bless them in the work of butchery. Perhaps he will think better of Christianity when he finds that a profession of its principles does not involve the necessity of throwing away his powder and cutlass.—N. Y. Tribune.

THE GENTLENESS OF CHRIST.—What an expression! How much is there in that short sentence! How much to admire; how much to imitate! Christ performed great deeds, such as no one ever did; but not that we should imitate them. He spoke to the tempest, and stilled the rolling billows, but not that we should lift up our voices when the wind blows, and the thunders roll, and the waves are piled mountain high, and attempt to hush them to peace. He stood by the grave and spoke; and the dead man left his tomb and came again to life—but not that we should place ourselves by the graves of the dead and attempt to restore them to life. He opened the eyes of the blind, and taught the lame man to leap as a hart, and the tongue of the dumb to sing—but not that we should imitate him in this, or attempt by miracles to give vigor to the feeble, or health to the diseased. But Christ was meek and gentle, that we might be so too. Christ was benignant and kind, that we might be so too. Christ patiently bore reviling, that we might do it also; he was not irritable, and uncharitable, and fretful, and envious, and revengeful—and in all these we may imitate him. His was a life of benevolence; diffusive like the light of a morning without clouds; a life undisturbed by conflicting emotions; unbroken by a harsh and dissatisfied temper; kind when others were unkind; gentle when the storms of furious passion raged in their bosoms; and tranquil and serene while all around him were distracted by anger, and ambition, and envy, and revenge. To us may the same spirit be given; and while the world around is agitated with passion, and pride, and wrath, in our hearts may there reign for evermore 'gentleness of Christ.'

THE POOR THURST OUT.—Rev. Theodore Parker has gained the reputation of saying many peculiar things, but the following extract from a sermon which he recently preached before his society in Boston 'on the Perishing Classes,' is altogether too notoriously true to be peculiar:

To make their degradation total, their name infamous, we have shut them out of our churches. Once, in our Puritan meeting-houses there were 'body seats' for the Poor; for a long time free galleries, where men sat and were not ashamed. Now it is not so. A Christian society about to build a church, and having $50,000, does not spend $10,000 for making it a church for all, and keep $10,000 as a fund for the poor. No, it borrows $20,000 more, and then shuts the poor out of its bankrupt aisles. A high Tower, or a fine-toned Bell—yes, Marble and Mahogany are thought better than the presence of these little ones whom God wills not to perish. I have heard ministers boast of the great men, and famous, who sat under their preaching; never one who boasted that the Poor came into his church and were fed, body and soul! You go to our churches—the Poor are not in them. They are idling and lounging away their day of rest, like the horse and the ox. Alas, me, that the Apostles—that Christ himself, could not worship in our churches till he had sold his garments and bought a pew! Many of our houses of public worship would be well named, CHURCHES FOR THE AFFLUENT. Yet religion is more to the poor than to the rich. What wonder, then, if the poor lose self-respect when driven from the only churches where it is thought respectable to pray!

In the morning, think what you have to do, for which ask God's blessing; at night, what you have done, for which you must ask pardon.

MEETINGS IN ROCHESTER.

* Our meetings in this city, are held three times on the Sabbath, also Tuesday and Friday evenings, in Shaw's New Brick Block, east side of the River, corner of Main and Stone streets; entrance from Stone street. The Lord's Supper will be administered in the afternoon of the first Sabbath of every month.

Should the days of anguish come,
When the fig-trees cease to bloom;
When the vine no more shall yield,
And no herb be in the field—
And flocks and herds be gone,
Dried the streams, the valleys lone—
Yet will I lift up my voice,
In my grief I'll still rejoice!
He will succor and direct,
He will sustain and me protect,
While the dreadful judgments last,
'Till the indignation's past!

The following compilations are made from Jamieson, and from an article by Prof. Stowe, in the Biblical Repository for July, 1840. These representations, however, should be understood as relating to the earliest periods of the church, antecedent to the sad declensions which soon overshadowed the cloudless light in which Christianity arose upon the world, [for about 200 years.]

Primitive Christians.

OF THEIR MODE OF LIFE.

Among the primitive disciples, Christianity made no essential difference in their relations to society and the external world, more than it does among their followers in the present day. Apart from the faith they had embraced, and the altered estimate it led them to form of the scenes and the pleasures of the world, their new views occasioned no change in their rank, their profession, or their outward circumstances in life. In general they lived like other men around them—speaking the same language, partaking of the same fare, observing the same intervals of labor and repose, and in every thing that was honorable, pure, and of good report, conforming to the rules and the habits which custom had established. The mechanic wrought at his trade, the husbandman prosecuted the labors of the field, the merchant repaired to his shop—men went, from day to day, and from place to place, obeying the calls of business and friendship as before; and instead of separating from their former acquaintances, or withdrawing into solitude from the avocations to which they had been bred, and by which they lived, they gave no symptoms, in any of these respects, of a change of habits, except that, being furnished with higher motives, they attended with an activity, a diligence, and fidelity greater than ever, to all the claims of society and the offices of life. In earliest times, indeed, when persecutions were frequent and severe, there were many Christians, male and female, married and unmarried, who, justly persuaded that nothing should come in competition with their fidelity to Christ, and fearing, at the same time, their own inability to remain steadfast and immovable amid the fiery trials by which they were assailed, resolved on abandoning for a time their place and possessions in the world, and fleeing to distant mountains and inaccessible deserts, where they spent their time in the service of God, and continued, at a distance from temptations to apostasy, the exercises of meditation and prayer. But when peace was restored, and the profession of Christianity was no longer prescribed and dangerous, this measure of prudence was no longer resorted to,—those who had found it expedient, for the preservation of their Christian fidelity, to take such a step, quitted their temporary retirement; and although there were some who having come, through habit, to prefer a solitary life, remained in their adopted habitations in the wilderness, the great majority of these voluntary exiles returned to the circle of their families and friends, and mingled as before in the wonted scenes and activities of life. Indeed, it was no part of the creed of the primitive Christians, that on embracing the religion of Jesus, they were required to give up all concern in the secular business, or to become dead to the comforts and innocent enjoyments of the world.

"We are no Brahmins," says Tertullian, Apol. c. 42, "we are no Hindoo Fakirs, we are not eremites or hermits who flee from life. We are well aware of the obligations we owe to God, our Creator and Lord. We reject the enjoyment of none of his gifts; and seek only to preserve the requisite moderation, and to avoid abuses. We do not live in this world without participating in your markets, your baths, your public houses, your workshops, your auctions, and every thing which pertains to commerce of life. We engage with you in navigation. * * * * * in agriculture, in trade. We engage with you in manufactures, and devote our labor to your benefit."

OF THEIR DRESS AND FURNITURE.

Nothing may appear more purely a matter of indifference, than a choice of the fashion and color of dress; and yet, in the circumstances of the primitive Christians, articles of that nature did acquire such an importance in their eyes, that they gradually fell into a style of clothing peculiar to themselves; not that they affected any singularities in their personal appearance; and Christians, whether they were found in the high, the middle, or the lower ranks, were accustomed to equip themselves in a manner suitable to the decencies of the state or professions to which they belonged. But, looking to the moral influence of dress, desirous of avoiding every thing that might minister to vanity, or lead the wearer to forget, in attending to the outward man, the ornament of a meek and quiet spirit, they studiously rejected all finery as unbecoming the humility of their character, and confined themselves to a suit of apparel, remarkable not so much for the plainness of the material, as for the absence of all superfluous ornament. Every thing gaudy or sumptuous, that partook of the costly stuffs, or the crimsoned dyes that suited the luxurious state of the times, was discountenanced by the spiritually-minded followers of Christ; and, though many of them were entitled by birth or otherwise to appear in the flowing folds of the graceful toga, yet, even that favorite garb, while it was retained for the valuable privileges it conferred, was looked upon as too gay and splendid for ordinary use, and was by most, if not by all Christians, laid aside for the common pallium or cloak, to which the preference was given on account of the air of greater modesty and gravity that was supposed to belong to it.

The same simplicity and plainness reigned throughout the domestic establishment of the Christians. Most of the primitive disciples, indeed, were in circumstances that offered no temptation to indulge in the splendor or variety of ornamental furniture. Their inventory of goods embraced only a few simple articles of use, which their personal and family wants required, and it may be supposed, therefore, that there was nothing remarkable in the absence from their houses, of all traces of pomp and elegance, which they neither possessed the means, nor entertained the hope of acquiring. But even those of their number, who were persons of rank and opulence, amply provided with resources to gratify a taste for ornament, chose to content themselves with such things as were recommended by their utility rather than their elegance, and calculated to answer the purposes of necessity and comfort, rather than to gratify the lust of the eye and the pride of life. Seats and cabinets, finished with the costly veneering of tortoise shell, and couches ornamented with the rich embroideries of Babylon;—vessels of gold and silver, the numberless statues and other graceful accompaniments, of all sizes and forms, which adorned the chambers, the porticoes, and the gardens of the rich, and indicated the epicurian taste that distinguished the age, disappeared from the houses of the Christians, as inconsistent with a humble and mortified life; and however refined and exquisite the taste which, through education and the habits of society, any of them had acquired, they learned to subject it to the higher principle of denying themselves of every thing that tended too much to captivate the senses, and increase their love to a world, the fashion whereof they thought was soon to pass away.

But to a people on whose minds the doctrines of Christianity had burst with all the force and vividness of a new and important discovery, and among whom the impression almost universally prevailed, that the years of the world were about to close, it was natural to regard with jealousy and treat with neglect all the forms of earthly pomp and beauty, that tended to supplant their desires for the objects and glories of that better world on which their hearts were fixed.

Life and Death.

NUMBER III.

How can we understand the text commented on in a former communication, except in this sense? [Col. iii. 3.] Death and life are here set in antithesis—the one is exactly the opposite of the other. Yet we are living beings, in every possible sense a Christian can be in this world. I can see no other possible position, except the one I have taken. Surely, I feel no partiality for this particular view: but I can understand the word to teach nothing else. I am driven to the conclusion, and as an honest man and lover of truth, I can but adopt it.

But why attach so much importance to it? Because we want the TRUTH: all truth, or the truth on every subject is important. It saves us from error. Error, in a dreadful blighting form, has been promulgated as a motive to repentance, to holiness, to patience, to perseverance. In the first place by adopting the false idea of 'Spiritual Death,' men have been led to make the penalty of the law, no penalty; and then substitute one of their own. From this point of error, they have gone on, to make life a metaphor, and death, to be life.

Let us analyze the doctrine. I remark, God no where requires us to believe a doctrine that involves an absurdity. If this, however, does not involve a bundle of contradictions and absurdities, that make darkness visible, I cannot understand language. But a few hours since, I heard a minister say from the pulpit, 'without doubt the text in John v. 25, must be metaphorically understood, as being moral death and moral life,' and then went right on to beat the Universalists, for adopting the same principle of interpretation, in the 25th verse. Why! I thought (to use metaphorical language,) a Universalist would, 'morally,' have beat, his 'moral' brains out, with the 'moral' cudgel, he had put into his 'moral' hands. Here is one of the benefits of error. Brother, do you want it?

But let us go on: When God said to Adam, 'In the day, &c., thou shalt surely die'—'O yes,' says the spiritualist, 'but that means spiritual death, or death in trespasses and sins—alienation from God, &c.' Here, at last, we have it analyzed. Now, what is alienation from God, but sin, or a sinful state? Very well: then the penalty amounts to just this, and no more—'In the day thou sinnest thou shalt be a sinner!' What a tremendous penalty! Pshaw! brother do not, for God's sake, thus tamper with and fritter away his word!

Again: When God says, 'The soul that sinneth it shall die'—'Yes,' says the spiritualizer, 'to die, there means, to live forever alienated from God, with the loss of all good.' Again: 'the wages of sin is death'—'that is,' says he, 'eternal life, in conscious torments.' Is it of no account, that God's word should be thus treated? What right have I, to add to or diminish from God's word, whenever it suits my theory or convenience? If God meant the very reverse of what he has said, could he not have told us so? Had 'holy men of old' no words, wherewith to clothe the ideas of the Spirit, without resorting to those conveying an exactly opposite meaning? Let me entreat every dear brother and sister, 'not to add to his words, lest he reprove thee, and thou be found a liar.' Prov. xxx. 6.

Again: But the worst absurdity is that, which makes Christ a sinner! There are some, who are great sticklers for vicarious offering, on the part of Christ. If so, their theology or no theology, makes him a sinner.

Let me throw it into a syllogism: Christ suffered the penalty of the law: the penalty of the law is 'spiritual death'; but spiritual death is sin: therefore Christ was a sinner! Render! if you do not like the conclusion, discard, at once, the premises.

Again: Another absurdity that follows at the heels of the doctrine of 'spiritual death' is, a denial of the resurrection. Why not? If the penalty of the law is 'spiritual death,' the recovery therefrom must be by a spiritual resurrection; and can be nothing else. I have known some good brothers and fathers to complain about the views that were some time since promulgated through the 'Bible Advocate,' while themselves were holding with pertinacity, to the very premises, from which those conclusions were drawn. Why complain of the conclusion? It was logical—more; absolutely necessary.

Again: It unhinges the atonement—sets it aside—abrogates it. I use the term atonement in its more general, not in its strict etymological sense. Origen, that Prince of Spiritualizers, held to vicarious atonement. He concluded, that as Christ had satisfied the demands of the moral law, that it could have no more claim on man: therefore all men must and would be saved. A certain class of theologians, seeing the absurdity of such a conclusion, yet unwilling to give up their premise—'spiritual death'—take indefinite ground, amounting to just nothing at all: generally expressed by the phrase, 'he magnified the law, and made it honorable.' Never, could I get from one of these men, a definite idea, about the sacrificial offering of Christ; nor can they explain it. I have asked after the truth often enough. I was not within the walls of a theological seminary by the space of two years, without making some effort, for an explanation of these questions. Yet my present views were called heresy. That is an easy way to dispose of a troublesome question: but the whole trouble is, their premises are rotten. Let us plant our feet on the truth and we shall remain unmoved.

G. NEEDHAM.

Where are we?

NEAR THE HAVEN, OR NOT?

How many there are who are making this inquiry among the weary and weather-beaten sailors, who have been sailing for years on the stream of time towards the ocean of eternity: and yet, when we look at the vast multitude who throng that stream and are moving along on its heaving billows as fast as the current of time can carry them, to their eternal destiny, how few there are among the multitude, that appear in any way interested about their near approach to the harbor, and of being in readiness to enter the grand metropolis of the 'Kingdom of David.' But there are some, blessed be God, who are making the inquiry with the deepest anxiety, and who are searching the 'chart' with untiring zeal, to see if they can ascertain where we are—whether we are near the haven or not—whether we have passed all the land-marks or not. Well, my fellow-sailors, where are we? Whereabouts on the stream of time are we sailing? Are there no sure way-marks to tell how near we are to the harbor of endless rest? Methinks there are.

Let us examine the 'old chart.' See, here is the stream laid down on the chart, and on its banks the metallic pillars standing in plain view, so that every passer-by may be admonished, and know how near he is to the great ocean. Now you see we have, from a certain starting place on this stream to its entrance into the boundless ocean: 1st. A pillar of gold. 2d. A pillar of silver. 3d. A pillar of brass. 4th. A pillar of iron mixed with clay: and on a little further we see the pillar of iron divided into ten smaller ones—and the next thing we see is the throne of David which stands in the metropolis.

Now let me repeat the inquiry—'Where are we?' How near the haven? What shall we see next? Have we passed the first pillar? Not one will dispute this. Have we passed the second? Most certainly. Has the third also been passed? O yes, many hundred miles in the rear! And the fourth? Yes, we have passed the large pillar of iron, and the small ones reach down to the end, or to the establishment of David's throne. Now who cannot tell what next will be seen? O, ye weary and tempest-tossed sailors, cheer up, cheer up, the kingdom of heaven is at hand! The haven of eternal rest is just before you: we have passed all the way-marks and the light-house, and soon we shall see the Great Pilot heave in sight to conduct us into the harbor. But says a reader, 'when shall we enter the port?' The definite day or hour when we shall enter, we cannot tell; but one thing we do know, (if we can put any confidence in the chart; and we can, for it was drawn by the infallible Pilot,) that it is 'NIGHT AT HAND.'

But here is something else on the 'chart' that arrests our attention. What is it? Why here we have a road that leads to the 'cleansing of the sanctuary,' or to the establishment of the kingdom, and the length of it given from a certain starting point. What is the length of it? Just 2,300 miles —and along this road there are mile-stones or way-marks, and the distance between each of them is given. Come, let us reckon, and see how many miles we have traveled and how many more we have got to go. 'O,' says a good brother, 'we cannot tell anything by those numbers!' Why not? 'Because we have been disappointed two or three times in reckoning them up, and we thought we could tell how far we were from the kingdom; but we were mistaken, and therefore we think we can arrive at no definite conclusion from them.' What! shall we not try to understand how near we are to the end of our journey by those numbers, because we have been mistaken before? What means that caption over the 'vision' in such plain language? 'THEREFORE, UNDERSTAND THE MATTER, AND CONSIDER THE VISION.' If we can understand nothing by it, why are we admonished? Suppose you were to travel from Utica to Boston, the distance being 2,300 miles: now when you arrive at the line between New York State and Massachusetts, you find there an infant in a manger: you travel on 53½ miles farther (in the State of Mass.) and you find the infant grown to be a man and hanging upon the cross; go on 3½ beyond the cross, and you find a man upon the house-top in a trance; now you stop and reckon up the distance you have traveled; (for here you find engraved upon a mile-stone the end of the 490 miles,) well, you find you have traveled just 37 miles in the State of Massachusetts, and just 453 in the State of New York—those numbers put together make the 490 miles. Now how much farther have you got to travel in the State of Massachusetts to arrive at Boston? Just 1810 miles. Now how many miles would you travel in all, in Massachusetts, from where you saw the infant in the manger? Just 1847 miles. Well then, just so sure as your chart is a correct one, (and it is,) then you would arrive at Boston at the end of 1847 miles.

Now you see, my brethren, we have the length of time given from a certain starting point down to the consummation. That length of time is 2300 years—and as we are admonished to 'understand the matter and consider the vision,' where are we? The 2300 years are divided into two grand divisions, 490 and 1810 years. The 490 are divided into smaller divisions of 7 weeks 62 weeks and 1 week. At the end of 7 weeks or 49 years we find Jerusalem rebuilt, 404 years from that time we find the infant Savior in the manger, 30 years from that time we find him baptised in the river Jordan by John, 3½ years more and we find him on the cross, 3½ years more and we find Peter on the house-top receiving his commission to preach to the Gentiles. So you see 453 years (of the 490,) were fulfilled to the birth of Christ, and the remainder (37 years) were fulfilled or reached down to the year A. D. 37. Now how many years remain to fill up the length of the vision? Just 1810 years which brings us to the year A. D. 1847. O, my brethren, I think we are upon the last year of earth's great drama. Even so I believe, and for aught I know the last sand may drop from time's hour-glass while I am writing, and the great white throne appear in view! Lord prepare us for that solemn hour. Jesus is certainly 'near, even at the doors.' Soon the wicked will be hurled over the awful cataract into the dark abyss of eternal ruin! Let us watch and pray—pray and watch.

At the Door!

How full of consolation to the Christian are the words, 'near even at the door.' Our Savior knew the wants of his people, and left on record the above words to cheer and comfort them while contending against the evil influences with which they would be surrounded, and as a warning to watch and pray, lest coming suddenly he should find them sleeping. It is true there are but very few at present of the immense number of beings now inhabiting the earth, that desire any consolation from the consideration that the Lord Jesus Christ is speedily to be revealed in the clouds of heaven. Why is it so? Ah! there is a voice within whispering the doom which awaits them, unless they keep the commandments of Christ. To them it will be a day of darkness and gloominess—a day of clouds and of thick darkness, when the Lord shall destroy all that know not God and that obey not the gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ.

Every thing indicates the speedy consummation of all things.—‘The distress of nations with perplexities—the sea and the waves roaring.’ Luke xxi. How strikingly has that Scripture in Joel i. 14–17, been fulfilled; causing distress of nations and increasing their perplexities. The sun has been darkened, the moon also, and the stars have fallen to the earth as a fig-tree casteth its untimely figs when shaken of a mighty wind, clearly showing us that the last events of the sixth seal, Rev. vi. 13, 14–17, are about to be consummated, viz: the next in rotation to the falling of the stars—the heavens departed as a scroll when it is rolled together, and every mountain and island were moved out of their places, and the kings of the earth, and the great men, and the rich men, and the chief captains, and the mighty men, and every bondman, and every freeman, hid themselves in the dens and in the rocks of the mountains, and said to the mountains and rocks, fall on us and hide us from the face of him that sitteth on the throne and from the wrath of the Lamb: for the great day of his wrath is come, and who shall be able to stand?’

The second, seventh, eighth, eleventh and twelfth chapters of Daniel proclaim that the time will soon come when all earthly thrones will be cast down, ‘and the Ancient of days will sit, whose garment was white as snow, and the hair of his head like the pure wool: his throne was like the fiery flame and his wheels as burning fire. A fiery stream issued and came forth from before him, thousand thousands ministered unto him, and ten thousand times ten thousand stood before him: the judgment was set, and the books were opened.’

Of late years, the facilities for publishing the gospel in all nations has greatly increased, and evidently has been thus published: therefore we may expect the end will soon come. Truly the angel or messenger, noticed in Rev. xiv. 6, ‘has flown in the midst of heaven, having the everlasting gospel to preach unto them that dwell on the earth, and to every nation, and kindred, and tongue and people; saying with a loud voice, Fear God and give glory to him, for the hour of his judgment is come.’ ‘The four angels standing on the four corners of the earth, are evidently loosing their hold of the winds, (opinions of men) and the great battle of God Almighty will soon, (if he has not already) commence. Rev. vii. 1–3. The term quickly, between the second and third woe, will soon terminate, and the seventh angel will sound. ‘And there were great voices in heaven, saying, The kingdoms of this world are become the kingdoms of our Lord and of his Christ: and he shall reign for ever and ever. And the nations were angry, and thy wrath is come, and the time of the dead that they should be judged, and that thou shouldst give reward unto thy servants the prophets, and to the saints, and them that fear thy name small and great, and shouldst destroy them which destroy the earth. Rev. xi. 14–18, compare Rev. x. 7; 2 Tim. iv. 1; Rom. viii. 18, 19, 23; Phil. iiii. 20, 21; 2 Pet. iii. 11, 12; 1 Pet. iii. 3–5, 13; 1 Pet. iv. 12, 13; Jas. v. 7, 8; Math. xxv. 31, 34; Job, xix. 25–27; Col. iii. 4; 1 John iii. 2; 2 Tim.

iv. 8; Math. xvi. 27; Rev. xxii. 12; Heb. x. 36, 37; Heb. xi. 29, 40; 1 Pet. v. 4. ‘The prophetic periods, evidently, are near their termination. Yea, who can say the year 1847 is not the grand point when they will in whole numbers terminate?’

The physical, moral and political state of the world, the signs of the times, fulfillment of prophecy, speak forth in trumpet tones the glorious truth that the coming of Christ ‘is near, even at the door.’ May we all who profess to be his servants, dedicate ourselves anew to his service, and by exhortation and example, encourage each other to diligence in every good word and work, that we may finally hear the words addressed to us, ‘well done good and faithful servant, enter into the joys of thy Lord.’ H. BARRINGER.

Troy, N. Y., Feb. 14th, 1847.

Be ye not Followers of Men.

Brethren, Jesus is coming, and his reward is with him, to give to every man according to his works. Look to yourselves, that ye lose not a full reward for the things ye have wrought. The advocates of Judaism, and of every ism under heaven, are laboring to pervert the truth and draw away disciples after them—follow them not. Satan rages violently, knowing that his time is short, and O how eager his children are to do their father’s will. Let us also do the will of God, and then we will have evidence that we are his children. In the first place let us take heed to the warnings and admonitions of the Lord and his apostles, against false teachers. We can only state a few: ‘Beware,’ says Jesus, ‘of false prophets, which come to you in sheep’s clothing, [soft, fine wool] but inwardly they are ravening wolves;’ ‘ye shall know them by their fruits’—corrupt doctrine cannot produce holiness of heart, nor purity of life, but the reverse, and without holiness no man shall see the Lord. The truth alone maketh free. Lay fast hold of it: for it is thy life now, and leads to endless life and unending pleasures evermore.

Again, when they point to every quarter but the right one, and say, ‘Lo here is Christ, or there’—‘Behold he is in the desert, go not forth; behold he is in the secret chambers, believe it not.’ Why, Lord? ‘For as the lightning cometh out of the east and shineth even unto the west, so shall also the coming of the Son of man be.’ Our miscalculations and failures, regarding the day and hour, should teach us caution on that point, but let us beware of rejecting what the Scriptures teach on definite time, or the loss will be irreparable. Certain it is, that the advent of the Lord will be sudden and surprising to saint and sinner, from the flood of glory and divine majesty that will beam forth on our dim, drowsy world. O may we search the Scriptures, and be ready to hail our coming Lord!

Next hear Paul, in reference to the false teachers, which were to arise among the brethren. After speaking of his entire devotion and consecration to the blessed cause, he solemnly admonishes the elders of the Ephesian church, (Acts xx. 28, 30,) ‘Take heed therefore unto yourselves, and to all the flock, over the which the Holy Ghost hath made you overseers, to feed the church of God which he has purchased with his own blood; for I know that after my departure shall grievous wolves enter in among you not sparing the flock: also of your own selves shall men arise, speaking perverse things, to draw away disciples after them.’ In view of this, he exhorts Timothy, i. 4, 13, ‘Till I come give attention to reading, to exhortation, to doctrine;’ v. 15, ‘Meditate upon these things—give thyself wholly to them, that thy profiting may appear to all;’ v. 16, ‘Take heed unto thyself, and unto the doctrine, continue in them, for in doing this thou shalt both save thyself and them that hear thee.’ Again, 2 Tim. 4, 1–4, ‘I charge thee therefore before God and the Lord Jesus Christ, who shall judge the quick and dead at his appearing and kingdom; preach the word; be instant in season and out of season, reprove, rebuke, exhort with all long suffering and doctrine: for the time will come, [the perilous times of the last days,] when they, [nominal professors, having a form of godliness, but denying the power,] will not endure sound doctrine, but after their own lust shall they heap to themselves teachers, having itching ears, and they shall turn away their ears from the truth and shall be turned unto fables.’

How painfully true is this in our experience at the present time. In city, town and village, the groaning pilgrim may see the prophetic portrait, true to the life, as drawn by the inspired penman. O what fearful blindness! what dreadful infatuation has come over the corrupt professors of the 19th century! Can the prophetic features of the sects be changed? Where are the men who will new model and fashion them after the pattern of the apostolic gospel? Where? we ask, and echo answers where?

Now hear Peter: ‘But there were false prophets also among the people, even as there shall be false teachers among you, who privily shall bring in damnable heresies, even denying the Lord that bought them and bring upon themselves swift destruction. And many shall follow their pernicious ways, by reason of whom the way of truth shall be evil spoken of,’ &c. 2 Pet. ii. Now if we would escape the fast approaching doom of these ‘false teachers,’ we must shun their corrupt doctrine and licentious practices; verses 18, 19, ‘For when they speak great swelling words of vanity, they allure through the lusts of the flesh, through much wantonness, those that were clean escaped from them that live in error. While they promise them liberty, they themselves are the servants of corruption; for of whom a man is overcome, of the same is he in bondage.’ This is plain to the simplest capacity: may the Lord seal instruction on our hearts. Jude calls them ‘ungodly men, turning the grace of our God into lasciviousness, and denying the only Lord God, and our Lord Jesus Christ. But ye, beloved,’ says he, ‘building up yourselves on your most holy faith, praying in the Holy Spirit, keep yourselves in the love of God, looking for the mercy of our Lord Jesus Christ unto eternal life, and of some have compassion making a difference; and others save with fear, pulling them out of the fire, hating even the garment spotted with the flesh. If at this late hour we can be instrumental in plucking some as brands from the fire, let it be done in the fear and love of God. Says Paul, ‘Let all your things be done with charity.’ In our efforts, we must, like the apostle, cleave to the truth, speak it in love; but make no compromise with error or errorists.

THE MAN CLOTHED IN LINEN.

Dan. xii. 6, 7. It has been generally supposed that the man clothed in linen was Jesus Christ; the following facts in the case will show this opinion to be wrong: It is conceded by all that Michael, (xii. 1,) is Jesus Christ—but in chapter x. the man clothed in linen told Daniel, 13th verse, that the Prince of the kingdom of Persia withstood him one and twenty days, or three weeks, as in the 2d verse, which compare with the 12th verse. ‘But Michael came to help him;’ therefore the man clothed in linen was not Michael. Again, in the 21st verse he says, ‘There is none that holdeth with me in these things but Michael your Prince;’ therefore the man clothed in linen was not Michael the great Prince, which standeth for the children of thy people.’ xii. 6. "The wise shall understand."

ROCHESTER, MARCH 10, 1847.

Time of the Second Advent.

NO. XI.

The history and present attitude of the Catholics, or Papal kingdom, must form the subject matter of this number. That this power holds a conspicuous place in the prophecies of Daniel and John, the writings of Paul, and other inspired penmen, will be admitted. To suppose that a power laying the highest claims to infallibility and holiness, yet the most fallible and corrupt, which has martyred millions of saints, and for more than a thousand years has been the chief actor in the bloody drama of the church and the world, is not noticed in prophecy, would virtually be a denial that any opposing power to the true faith, has been a subject of prophecy.—Some of the most prominent points only, in the prophetic history of this anti-Christian power, will now claim our notice.

1. One prominent point in prophecy concerning this kingdom is, that for a certain length of time it should have the power, and would put to death many of the saints. This is clearly predicted in the following declarations:—And the same horn made war with the saints, and shall wear out the saints. Dan. vii. Shall destroy the mighty and holy people. Dan. viii. They shall fall by the sword, and by flame, by captivity, and by spoil many days. Dan. xi. And it was given unto him to make war with the saints and to overcome them. Rev. xiii. From these quotations, it is evident that a prominent trait in the Papal kingdom would be, to make war with, wear out and destroy the saints. This has emphatically been its character; for over fifty millions of the dear saints have suffered the most cruel martyrdom, under its cruel and bloody reign.

2. The power of putting to death the saints, was to be taken away from this kingdom before its final overthrow, as the following predictions will show:—And they shall be given into his hands until a time and times and the dividing of time. Dan. vii. 25. And they shall fall by sword, &c., many days; and some shall fall even to the time of the end. Dan. xi. 33, 35. And power was given unto him to continue, or as the marginal reading is, to make war, forty and two months. With whom? And it was given unto him to make war with the saints to overcome them. Rev. xiii. 5, 7. Here we should carefully observe, (1.) That the saints were to be given into the hands of the Papal kingdom, 'UNTIL' a certain time. (2.) To that time would be 'MANY DAYS.' (3.) And that those many days would reach down 'TO THE TIME OF THE END.' What then? Why of course, the saints would be taken out of the hand of the papal kingdom; and it would no longer have the power to cause them to 'fall by the sword, by flame, by captivity, and by spoil.' Its power of putting the saints to death would be taken away.

Now, leaving the time for the commencement of this prophecy out of the question, say nothing about the manner of computing the time which Daniel and John have marked for its termination, and omitting the date of its termination, we ask, has it not all, in the strictest sense, been fulfilled? It most certainly has. The saints have been given into the hand of the Catholic kingdom. That power, for many days, has put the saints to death. And it no longer has that power. These are no longer matters of prophecy, but historical facts, so plain, so abundant, and so universally admitted, that it would be superfluous to record the evidence in this article.

3. The prophecies clearly reveal that after the dominion, over the saints, of the Papal kingdom should be taken away, it would then, through policy and craft, prosper, (Dan. viii. 25) or prevail against the saints until the Ancient of Days shall come; (Dan. vii. 21, 22) and would in its last moments, before its final destruction, magnify itself in heart, (Dan. viii. 26) or say in heart, I sit a queen, and am no widow, and shall see no sorrow. Then shall her plagues come, in one day, death, and mourning, and famine; and she shall be utterly burned with fire: for strong is the Lord God that judgeth her.—Rev. xviii. 7, 8.

Under the long and bloody reign of Papacy, until its dominion over the saints was taken away, it made war against and put the saints to death, by virtue of its civil power; but since the loss of that power, it has only prevailed against the saints by policy and craft. This is the last mode of warfare, to be carried on by the Papal kingdom, against the saints, and it is only to cease with the final destruction of this kingdom, at the coming of the Ancient of Days.—Dan. vii. 21, 22, and 2 Thess. ii. 8. We now candidly ask every observing mind, have these prophecies, concerning this last state of the Papal kingdom had their fulfilment? Stubborn facts say they have, excepting those which relate to its destruction at the actual coming of the Lord. In proof, we offer the following facts.

"It is only about fifty years since the first Papal See was created by the Pope in these United States. It is now estimated that there are in this country 2,000,000 of Papists under the government of the Pope, and that the annual increase is about 150,000.

There is now an Archbishop of Baltimore, 21 Bishops, 16 Sees, and 801 Priests and Clergymen. The number of Churches is 606; Missionary Stations, 530; Ecclesiastical Seminaries, 21; Female Seminaries, 46; Colleges and Literary Institutions, 21; Female Convents, 33; besides 165 other Institutions, such as schools for the Sisters of Charity, day schools and Asylums, with about 15,000 pupils.

The Popish Almanack says, 'We count Canadas, with 2 Bishopsricks, 8 Bishops, 133 Priests, and 500,000 Catholics. French Colonies, 240,000 Catholics; three Spanish Colonies, with 1000; Mexico, Guatamala and South America, with 14 Bishopsricks, and 23,000,000 of Catholics. Total, for the new world, 74 Bishopsricks, and 26,541,000 Catholics.'

In the Rhenish provinces, the Roman Catholic population amounts to 1,678,745. In the whole Prussian dominions, inclusive of those provinces, the number is 6,000,000. In Nassau, they form nearly three fifths of the population. In Austria, they constitute the mass of the community. Such, also, is the case in France, Spain, Portugal, Italy, Belgium, Poland, Silicia, Sardinia, South America, Madeira, parts of Greece, Ireland, the Azores, the Cape de Verd Islands, the Phillipine Islands, Martinique, Isle of France, &c. &c. The number of Papists in the world, is not less than 156,000,000; the number of Bishops is 818; the number of Priests 400,000; the number of Monks and Friars, 600,000. Thus in every part of the world, Popery is pursuing its triumphant course, is trampling on the consciences of mankind, rendering whole countries desolate of the Word of God.

The same elements which are at work in other countries, giving Popery such victories, are at work in this new world. The priests are equally diligent; the public press is, to a very great extent, in the hands of the Papists; men in high offices in our land are disposed to assist them. Modern Liberalism, Infidelity, ultra High Church doctrines, the principles of Expediency—all these things have joined to help popery forward in its prosperous and triumphant career. There are other symptoms of extraordinary zeal and activity.

Money from the Leopoldine Institutions of Austria, and from the Propaganda.

In 1841, the subscriptions collected by the Associations for the propagation of the Papal faith throughout Christendom, amounted to 1,752,214 francs:—in France, 1,479,434 francs; Bavaria, 210,000; Ireland, 195,000; Belgium, 159,000; England, 33,000; Portugal, 48,000; Holland, 18,000; the Roman States, 77,000; Naples, 61,000; Switzerland, 33,000;

Prussia, 85,000; Tuscany, 41,000: and finally, the sums received from other countries of Europe, from the Levant and America, amounted together to 110,000 francs.—Presse.

The following statistics are from the papal paper, the Freeman's Journal, published in the city of New York.

Fellow citizens and Christian brethren! What are we doing to check these invaders of our civil and religious liberties?—Bapt. Record.

THE COLLEGE OF THE PROPAGANDA.—"This College is located at Rome, and is designed for the education of Roman Catholic missionaries. The natives from all quarters of the globe are brought here, and thoroughly indoctrinated in all the principles of the Papal Church, and are thence sent back to their several countries, by which means the whole body are bound together by indissoluble ties. The College contained in May, 1842, ninety pupils: of these as we learn from a foreign quarterly, 5 were Chinese, 10 Chaldeans, 6 Armenians, 4 Georgians, 5 Syrians, 5 Maronites, 4 Egyptians, 9 Greeks, 5 Albanians, 3 Bulgarians, 1 Illyrian, 3 Wallachians, 4 Germans, 6 Dutchmen, 4 Englishmen, 5 Scots, 5 Irishmen, and 6 Americans. After a pupil has been six months at the establishment, he is expected to bind himself by an oath to devote himself to the foreign missions. The usual period of study is ten years, but this is frequently shortened. When the pupil has finished his studies, he enters into priest's orders, and is furnished with the means of returning to his native country, where it is intended he should devote himself to the duties of his vocation as a missionary."

About all the languages in the known world are taught in the above institution.

FINANCIAL STATISTICS OF THE CHURCH OF ROME.—An English paper calculates that the Romish clergy in Ireland, receive upwards of 7,000,000 of dollars per annum: say $1,500,000 for concession, $150,000 for christenings, $300,000 for unctions and burials, $1,800,000 for marriages, $500,000 for purgatory prayers, $2,500,000 for collections at chapels. Out of such taxes the clergymen are paid, churches repaired, and all provisions made for public religious service.

These statistics were published in our paper for Jan. 1844. The estimate then was that the annual increase of the Catholics in the United States is 150,000. It was thought that they then numbered 2,000,000; then according to that estimate they now number 2,450,000. This estimate however is evidently far too low, for doubtless they now number in these United States over 3,000,000. The following statistics from the recent Pastoral Letter of Bishop Hewes, Bishop of the diocese of New York, will give some idea of the rapid increase of the Catholics in our country. Says the New York Evangelist:

"The Bishop gives his flock some statistical information which may be of general interest. He tells that when he was charged, in 1839, 'by the supreme authority of the church,' with his episcopal office, the number of his clergy was less than fifty. They have since increased to a hundred and twenty. The congregations have not only more than doubled their number, but have become larger in themselves, and nearly sixty new churches have been erected. At the period of his installation, 'there was not either a seminary for the education of candidates for the holy ministry, or a college, or a religious house of education for the youth, male or female, of our growing Catholic population.' In the mean time, a college has been established at Fordham, a few miles from New York, at an expense of more than $100,000, with 'the rank and privileges of a university'; a theological seminary has been instituted with suitable buildings, &c. at the same place, at a cost of nearly $10,000; and 'houses of religious and enlightened training have been established for the education of our female children.'"

In a discourse recently delivered in this city by Bro. Himes, the following startling facts were mentioned, viz: That Rome has organized a UNIVERSAL GOVERNMENT, and divided the world in several provinces, and appointed her Jesuitical emissaries, secretly to carry out her designs as soon as possible. By a decree of the Pope, all Catholic children are withdrawn from Protestant schools, and all the Protestant children which can be secured, are educated in Catholic schools. In England, France, and doubtless in all parts of the world, Rome has appointed a litany, a solemn form of prayer, to be used every week for the conversion of England to Catholicism. England, the soul, the centre, the strength of Protestantism, is the prominent object of attack of the Mother of abominations. If she can gain this point, conquer this strong hold, this citadel of Protestantism, she is pretty sure of easily gaining the victory over the entire globe. Well, what are the present prospects in the case? Twenty-four Peers of the realm, twenty-three Barons, fifty wealthy country gentlemen, and forty members of parliament are Catholics, and the British House of Commons is now under Catholic control, and out of sixteen thousand priests of the established church, twelve thousand are Puseyites!

In view of all these facts, and many more of like character, what can be the hope of the Protestant world at this fearful crisis? According to their views of the very remote period for the coming of Christ, they can justly have nothing to hope, in this respect, but much to fear: they can but fear, as Dr. Beecher said near five years since, that within ten years the Catholics "will conquer the world, unless they meet with some unforeseen check in their unparalleled success." They have met with no check whatever, but have increased in numbers, strength, wealth, extent of territory and boldness, in a manner to show every understanding mind that Dr. Beecher's prediction, to all human appearances, will prove true before his ten years shall end. In a word, facts, stubborn facts, prove beyond a doubt that the Catholic power has actually reached the exalted position clearly predicted by the angel in Rev. xviii. 7, 8, that she would occupy just on the eve of her final destruction, at the revelation of the Son of man.—She now 'saith in her heart, I sit a queen, and am no widow, and shall see no sorrow. Therefore shall her plagues come in one day, death, and mourning, and famine; and she shall be utterly burned with fire: for strong is the Lord God who judgeth her.'

Nothing can be more certain, from this and other like prophecies, and their literal fulfillment in the Catholics, than that the day of her destruction is at the very door; and consequently the revelation of the Son of man; for her destruction takes place at his appearing. Who then can longer doubt that the coming of the Lord of glory will soon, very soon, be witnessed? 'Those who rightly understand these things cannot. No, no, they are, by these infallible evidences, made stronger and stronger in the precious faith and blessed hope of the gospel. Then lift up your heads, ye children of the Bridegroom for soon your Deliverer will come.

Parable of the Rich Man & Lazarus.

In our previous remarks on this parable, the object has been to give its simple meaning, without stopping to notice certain objections which some urge against its being a parable, and the improper use some honestly make of it, to sustain the doctrine of an intermediate state of conscious being, between the death of the body and the resurrection.

If it is not a parable, but a simple relation of certain facts, in the past, then there can be no good reason assigned why those facts were named by the Savior at this time of reproof, as he was, the murmuring Pharisees and Scribes for condemning him for receiving publicans and sinners. Luke xv. 2. But when it is viewed in the light of a parable, the very best of reasons may be offered for its being given at the time and under the circumstances it was.

If it is said that it is not a parable, because it commences in the positive, 'There was a certain rich man,' &c., then two other parables, in the same discourse, which can be viewed in no other light than parables, are not parables, because they begin in the positive. We refer to the parables of the prodigal son and the unjust steward. One commences, 'A certain man had two sons'—the other, 'There was a certain rich man who had a steward,' &c. The parable of the lost piece of silver, in the same discourse, is not called a parable, but no one doubts that it is such.

The true light of the case appears to be this: The Savior commenced and closed his conversation without saying anything about any part of his discourse being a parable. But Luke, the historian, understood his Lord's manner of address so well, that he knew he spoke in parables; hence he commences the narration by announcing this fact, 'And he spake this parable unto them, saying'—xv. 3. Then follows the parable of the lost sheep. When he speaks of the next parable, the lost piece, Luke does not say—'and he spake another parable,'—but simply gives the words of the Savior, 'Either what woman having ten pieces,' &c. The same rule is observed by the historian through the remainder of the discourse. The three remaining parables, though not named as such, are nevertheless evidently parables, from the circumstances under which they were spoken, and the manner in which Luke records them, and the preceding ones in the same discourse. The account therefore about the rich man and Lazarus can be nothing more nor less than a parable.

But, says one, I admit that it is a parable; but as parables are made up of real matters of fact, then the doctrine of a conscious state of the dead is true: for the facts in the parable clearly prove this. And besides, it is contended that if it is not true, the Savior, instead of speaking a parable calculated to strengthen that view, would have corrected it.—We admit that there is some plausibility in this reasoning, but still

We think it is incorrect, because the Savior did not always correct the erroneous doctrines of the people when he alluded to them. For an example see John ix. 1-3. 'And as Jesus passed by, he saw a man who was blind from his birth. And his disciples asked him, saying, Master, who did sin, this man, or his parents, that he was born blind? Jesus answered, Neither hath this man sinned, nor his parents, but that the works of God should be made manifest in him.' The error was, a belief in the transmigration of souls; that is, that the soul of the blind man had existed in some other body, and that the blindness of its then present body was a punishment for some sin he, or his parents, had committed, before the birth of the blind man, or the existence of the soul in its blind body. That this was the gross error of the time, see Dr. Clarke on this text. Also, Enc. Rel. Knowl., art's Hindooism, Metempsychosis, and Pythagoras.

In his answer Christ did not teach that this doctrine was untrue, but simply said, 'Neither hath this man sinned, nor his parents,' leaving them to understand that the blindness came for the reason named, 'that the works of God should be made manifest in him,' without intimating that the transmigration of souls is an error. Perhaps it was with the apostles at this time as at another, when Jesus said unto them, 'I have many things to say unto you, but ye are not able to bear them now.' John xvi. 12. At any rate, the doctrine was an error, and was not corrected by the Savior at this particular time.

So we think the parable of the rich man and Lazarus was drawn from a popular but erroneous doctrine of the times, without designing to approve or disapprove that error, but to show the Pharisees and Scribes who held to this error, their fearful doom, which in reality awaited them, for rejecting Christ. It would be, not a punishment in their imaginary hades, but, the sorest calamities on their nation, and their final rejection from the kingdom of David, the inheritance of their father Abraham.

Again, All will admit that the parable of the rich man is used to illustrate or impress the mind with the greatest, the most severe punishment which God will ever inflict on man. Very well, then the parable can be drawn from that real punishment, no more than the type can be the anti-type, or the shadow, the substance. It is true of parables, that the lesser object is always taken to illustrate the greater. Then the things named in the parable of the rich man cannot be the reality, nor as great as the things represented, but it must have been drawn from some object or doctrine inferior to that of which it was a type; and we think that the fabled yet popular error of an intermediate state, called hades, was that very doctrine, from which the parable was taken.

Whether Christ corrected or not the error of the transmigration of souls, and their conscious existence in hades, no truth can be more clearly demonstrated than that which says they are both not doctrines of the Bible, but of heathen origin. Our object is to disprove the latter, to do which we give the following testimony.

1. The Bible no where directly teaches such a doctrine. The only evidence which ever has been or can be drawn from that book to sustain it, is mere inferences; and we think they are more the conclusions from wrong premises, than legitimate deductions from the word of the Lord. No doctrine can be considered sufficiently proved to be a subject of faith, that is solely dependent on inferences: this is the case with the doctrine under consideration, therefore we are not called upon to believe it.

2. If this is not a doctrine of the Bible, then from whence did it originate? The following testimony will tell.

"Before the Captivity, and the Macedonian and Roman conquests, the Jews observed the most profound silence upon the state of the deceased, as to their happiness or misery. They spoke of it simply as a place of silence, darkness, and inactivity. But after the Hebrews mingled with the Greeks and Romans, they insensibly slid into their use of terms, and adopted some of their ideas on such subjects as those on which their oracles were silent. Hence the abodes of Elysium and Tartarus became familiar amongst the Jews; and as the Greeks and Romans had their gardens and fields of delights in hades, and their Tartarus in the same region; so the Jews assimilated to them, and had their garden of Eden, or Paradise, and their Tartarus, all within the boundaries of Hades. So Abraham's bosom, or Paradise, was the abode of the happy separated spirits, and Tartarus the abode of the wicked.—Alex. Campbell's New Test., Appendix, No. 31.

It is due to Mr. Campbell to say that he is a believer in the intermediate conscious state of the dead, and that the design of the note, from which this extract is taken, is to prove that doctrine. But all will readily see that the facts in the case are decidedly against him: for they clearly prove that the entire theory of hades being a place for the abode of departed spirits, is of heathen origin; and of course is not a doctrine of divine revelation. This conclusion is unavoidable, and as a matter of course incontrovertibly proves that the parable of the rich man and Lazarus is founded, not on real facts revealed in the oracles of God, but on things taught in the false yet popular religion of the times, supposed to be facts by the murmuring Pharisees and Scribes, whose fearful doom the parable was designed in a special manner to portray.

3. Certain expressions in the parable, are very good evidence that it is not the real language of disembodied spirits, but a parable drawn from the mistaken sentiments of the times. For a disembodied spirit to cry for 'mercy,' to 'Abraham,' instead of God, to call for another disembodied spirit to dip 'the tip of his finger in water' to cool the 'tongue' of a disembodied spirit—for Abraham to talk about the 'lifetime' of a living disembodied spirit, and other like expressions, we seriously think cannot be reconciled with the view that the account is a relation of real facts, but they can be reconciled with the supposition that it is a parable, drawn from the false theory of the times.

4. If it is not a parable, or if it is a parable founded on real facts, then it should be applicable to Gentiles as well as Jews; for we presume it will not be contended that there will be a distinction made between Jew and Greek, in the, so called, spirit world. The parable makes no provision for the case of the Gentile, but it does for the Jew. A lost Gentile spirit would not be very likely to call Abraham his 'father'; neither would Abraham be likely to call him his 'son,' which never was the fact. Neither would Abraham be likely to say that the Gentiles 'have Moses and the prophets,' which in fact were never given to the Gentile world.

These and other equally strong objections, seem to us to lie as immovable barriers in the way of applying this parable to support the conscious intermediate state theory: but they perfectly harmonize with the view that it is a parable, drawn from the incorrect theory of the times, and was designed to have a direct bearing on the Jews exclusively, and especially the Pharisees and Scribes, whose wicked murmurings caused the Savior to speak it.

PRIMITIVE CHRISTIANS.—The article in this number, on the Life, Dress and Furniture, of the early Christians, with other similar valuable articles, compose a pamphlet of 24 closely printed duodecimo pages, published by Bro. D. I. Robinson. Price, $4 per hundred copies.

Bro. Robinson has also published another pamphlet of the same size, 12 ps., on the Character of the "Christian Ministry." Price, $3 per hundred copies. They can be had at this office, or of D. I. Robinson, Cleveland, O.

Bro. D. I. ROBINSON, Cleveland, O., Feb. 24, writes:—"I expect to leave for the east in a month or two. If any good brother can come and labor for the cause in this region, he can do good and live. There is more opening for lecturers in this field of labor than for two years past." Who will occupy that important field? Truly, laborers are few—O Lord send forth more faithful laborers into the field already ripe for the harvest.

CORRESPONDENCE.

TIME OF THE ADVENT.

I have been listening to the arguments for the advent of the Lord next spring, soon after the time of the Jews' passover. While I think we acted as fidelity and love would dictate, in looking with feelings of great interest at every former point of expectation, according to the best light we had, I think there is clustering around this future time, evidence, which if seen and rightly understood, would cheer up the fainting spirits of the household of faith. To promote this object, I beg the privilege to present, through the Voice of Truth to the brethren scattered abroad, the following inquiries and brotherly salutation:

1st. Did the 69 weeks of Daniel end till after John was put in prison? See Mark, i. 14, 15. 2d. Was John cast into prison till after the passover in the spring after Christ's baptism? John ii. 13; iv. 24. If not, will not next spring be the proper time to look for the end of the 2300 days, with all that assurance of expectation that we looked for the end last fall, on the supposition that the days ended at Christ's baptism?

Now look at the date for the taking away of the Papal dominion and commencement of the time of the end. Would it not more properly be when the negotiation between the contending parties was fully accomplished, and the Concordate ratified by the French as well as by the Roman government, and when it took effect as the law of the nations? If so, would it not be proper to move the time of expectation from the fall of 1846 to the spring of 1847? If 1802 is not the right date for the taking away of Papal dominion and commencement of the time of the end, or 45 years, shall we not have to acknowledge that we don't know anything about when it was or will be? And if our most definite expectations are to be based on the signs, what to us will be the 2300 days, about which the loved Daniel labored and prayed and fasted for our benefit? 1 Pet. i. 11, 12. Or what will be any of the periods of prophetic calculation but prophecy of private interpretation? 2 Pet. i. 19—21. Sealed not only to the time of the end, but to the end itself. And will it not be true that the opposers of our hope, that have scoffed at the idea of our calculating the time of the advent from the prophetic numbers of Daniel, are rather to be entitled to credit as the wise? While we ought to be careful about being positive when supported only by inferential evidence, I hope we shall not be afraid nor ashamed to declare truth properly supported by Bible testimony, on account of any preconceived opinions or any mistakes in the past, but keep a straight onward course from Babylon to the Canaan we love, giving meat in due season to the household, till the blessed Lord shall say, 'Come ye blessed of my Father, inherit the kingdom.' May the Lord have mercy on us for his mercy's sake—Amen. H. C. ROBBINS.

LETTER FROM BRO. N. A. HITCHCOCK.

I have not time to say all I would, but I will write a few things. With reference to the past I find many things over which I mourn. I find during my connection with the advent movement, a period of a few months during which I was tossed by the tempest of conflicting elements until I had lost almost all confidence in every one but God; and I never saw my own weakness so clear as under these circumstances, and never before so manifestly hid away from self and every one but God, and felt as though I never could relinquish my hold upon his arm, though I might die in the struggle. Although these perils have been the most trying of any connected with my own experience, still I have no judgment to pass upon any; I shall leave this with Him whose right it is, and who will soon make manifest the counsels of every heart. I have ever felt that the spirit of judging and denouncing was repugnant to the word of truth, and have had no communion with it.

That there has been an error in adopting the view that the work of intercession by Christ was closed up in the autumn of '44, and thus the door of mercy or of access to God through Christ shut forever, I am sure. It appears clear to me that Isa. xxvi. 20, Matt. xxv. 10 and Luke xiii. 25, will be fulfilled in a moment, at the sudden appearing of Christ.

I presume to think that some of my brethren have inquired after me; I think so because the inquiry often arises with me thus, concerning many of those living and spiritual-minded ones that I once knew and so frequently heard from. Where, O where are all those dear brethren that were rejoicing previous to the memorable 10th day? But in answering the inquiries of brethren concerning me, I want to say I am in the far West, in Wisconsin—have been here a little over six months. With respect to temporal things, I am permitted through the opening hand of my heavenly Father to enjoy all I need from day to day. I claim the promise that I shall have enough. He who takes care of the ravens will also take care of me and my little family, while we trust in him.

When I arrived here, my friends seemed willing to assist me. One of them said if I would settle near him, he would give me a deed of forty acres of land; another said he would give me all I wanted: these were generous offers truly.

On removing to this country, I have ever felt that God directed my steps, and in locating I feel the same; but I have accepted of no portion here further than to find a comfortable dwelling for my family; this has been provided through the assistance of my friends, where I have the privilege of staying as long as duty shall direct.

With regard to my present position, concerning the advent movement, as it has been denominated, my decided view is that it is stamped with the most incontestible evidence as being of God, and will fulfill the predicted purposes of himself, with reference to alarming and moving the world on this point in trumpet tones, being the last work of God on earth before the separation of the wheat and tares; it is saying intelligibly 'the great day of the Lord cometh!' it is nigh at hand! It is saying the Bridegroom is coming, make ready! That it will accomplish his purpose in preparing a people to receive with joy, the long absent but returning Lord.

Some are inquiring again, where are you? Have you fallen? What is your state of mind? How are you prospering in spiritual things? and what are you doing? O how I love to hear brethren thus inquire! I can but believe they are in a similar manner inquiring after others; this is right. Let me here say again, I want to know where you are? Are you conscious of being ready for the soon coming one? Is it not right that brethren should give a short testimony upon this point?

"Let strife far ever cease,
And envy quit the field."

In answering the inquiries of friends with regard to myself, my testimony is, that my mind is at rest. I never felt so calmly stayed upon God and his truth as at the present time. I never had so few cares, and my care was never so great. You will understand this, when I tell you this care is to understand and do the will of my heavenly Father; I find this to be the best position I ever occupied. Let men be tested upon this point and they may find where they are. It is sure the greatest enjoyment is with the mind, sanctified to God. O, what peace this is, how precious, how free, how pure the atmosphere! it is religion sweetened ten-fold. Some of my brethren at heart, scattered abroad, know what this is. You ask what am I doing? I am in the field—our work is not quite done. There are gleanings at least—there is a finishing up of God's moral government on earth among men, preparatory to the establishment of his everlasting kingdom under the whole heaven, which kingdom will be given to the people of the saints of the Most High, at the revelation of the Son of man in the clouds of heaven! which event, so full of glory, must terminate the indignation of God, which has given the earth and people of God to be broken and trodden under foot unto 483 years from the going forth of the commandment to restore and to build Jerusalem unto the baptism and anointing of Christ, and from this point 1817 years. How near we are this point! how sure it looks to me!

The Lord willing, I will soon write again—I will give a little account of present labors here, the effect and the general state of things in this country so far as I know. I leave this place this afternoon to attend an appointment, and give three discourses on the second coming of Christ, where the subject has never been publicly presented.

A companion of all that fear God and keep his precepts. Ps. cxix. 63.

LETTER FROM BRO. M. BATCHELOR.

Dear Bro. Marsh:—I returned last evening from Troy and Albany, where I have been for a few days preaching and visiting. While I was at East Troy on Sunday and while seeing such a good congregation as I saw of attentive hearers, I thought of a communication that was published in your paper some months ago, from a brother that passed through Troy. He stated that there were no meetings of the adventists in East Troy. He must have called at the wrong place, as an advent lecturer did, who was there last Sunday. I was informed in the evening that there had been a Bro. B. there through the day, but he never came near us.

The truth of the case is this: at the time of the seventh month movement, there was a large congregation, but Peavey, Williamson, and others of like faith and spirit, lay round there until the band was about broken up. Those who believed with them met privately, the others knew not what to do; they had a large rent to pay and of course gave up the place of worship, and for two or three months had no regular place to meet; but since that time have held meetings at Benton's Hall and the Market Hall. For some time past they have been at the Market Hall.

I preached at West Troy in the morning to a good congregation, and best of all, the Lord was there. In the afternoon and evening I was at East Troy; I should think there were 100 hearers who listened to the word of life; but if that brother had called at the same place as he did when there before it is likely he would have been told that there was no advent meeting there; but praise the Lord there is—such a meeting now composed of those who love the blessed hope and who are disposed to help those who will endeavor to help themselves. I preached at West Troy Monday evening to a full congregation, and I was never more satisfied of the truth of our position than this, viz: that the Lord is near, and that the day of reckoning will declare that good was done. Tuesday evening I met with the brethren at Albany. There was a good congregation considering that the devil had so many calls on the people that evening of various sorts. It was a melting time, and it could well be said, it is good to be here. Upon the whole this visit has done me good, and sharpened my appetite to go out again as soon as I can, believing that others had their appetites sharpened for glory—and I hope that some will be led to look at the subject clothed in linen, &c., and in the 16th and 17th and prepare to meet their God.

My object in writing this is, chiefly to correct the mistake in reference to East Troy, because some who are travelling that way may pass by, thinking there is nothing to be done there. I am as ever yours in love,
M. BATCHELOR.

PROSPECT, Ct., Feb. 1.

Well hath it been said, 'buy the truth and sell it not,' for it is not only in and of itself the greatest blessing, but it puts a right construction upon all things else. Surely if men are wise, they will buy the truth, for without it they are slaves: slaves to fashion and lust—slaves to the enemy of all unrighteousness, and enemies to God and their best earthly friends: therefore let us buy the truth and be free. Let us improve our time according to the will of God. Let us 'be diligent in business and fervent in spirit, serving the Lord. Let us obey the command, 'Six days shalt thou labor and do all thy work, and if we can gain any time let us not spend it in vain conversation, but in searching for the truth, that we may know what the mind of the Lord is—knowing that he will soon call us to an account for that which he has committed to our trust. I used to think that God exercised no special agency in the secular concerns of men, but only required that a portion of the time should be spent in prayer and at meeting—but thanks be to his blessed name, I have since learned that the Bible is a rule, designed to measure every act of a man's life, and that whatsoever he does may be done to the glory of God. How is it brethren, that there are so many on this busy stage of action that become involved in difficulties in various ways? I can speak for one, for I have been involved in years past. Was it because I idled away my time? No; but because I did not manage my affairs with discretion. I did not order my goings according to the instructions of my heavenly Father. I did not realize the necessity of consulting his word in matters pertaining to the necessities of this life, and therefore every thing worked against me. My expectations were continually defeated, and I know by experience that the way of transgression is hard; and I believe the same to be true of others, who have and are experiencing similar affliction. Still if we should get along without chastisement, we should have no evidence that we were sons; for whom the Lord loveth he chasteneth, and scourgeth every son whom he receiveth. Therefore, let us endure chastening, and faint not when we are rebuked of him. My object in writing these few lines is, to impress the minds of my brethren with the importance of being obedient—not in pretence, but in reality. Let us not be hearers only, but doers of the word, always remembering that faith without works is dead being alone; and if therefore 'we have not been faithful in the unrighteous mammon, who will commit to your trust the true riches?' Now faithfulness consists not altogether in doing a great deal, but in doing it as we are commanded, that God may be honored and his people blest.

THE KING—DAN. XI. 36, 45.

Bro. Turner thinks the 12th chapter of Daniel ought to have been placed between the 9th and 10th chapters. The following reasons will show that he is mistaken: The 10th chapter, 1st verse says, 'In the third year of Cyrus, king of Persia, a thing was revealed unto Daniel, and the thing was true; but the time appointed was long.' Now there is no time appointed in this vision unless it includes the 12th chapter. Again, commencing with the 4th verse, Daniel says, 'As I was by the side of the great river Hiddekel, then I lifted up mine eyes and looked, and behold one verses he speaks of two like the similitude or appearance of man or the sons of men; then the one clothed in linen gives a prophetic history of events down to the resurrection—after which Daniel looked and behold there stood other two, the one on this side of the bank of the river and the other on that side of the bank of the river; and one said to the man clothed in linen (the same as described in the 10th chapter, who gives the prophetic history) how long shall it be to the end of these wonders? and the time appointed, which Daniel says was long, was given as the answer.

Again, Bro. Turner says, 'Now having followed Popery from her beginning quite down to the resurrection, and consequently to the coming kingdom, &c., some other power must be presented in verse 36, which actually continues until the indignation is accomplished, which indignation, he thinks, refers to the last hours of this world. If this position is correct, then how can the king of the north remove this king or power before the time of trouble, at the standing up of Michael, at the resurrection?

The characteristics of this king or power might perhaps well be applied to Mahomedanism, if all the other facts in the case would harmonize; but I see not how they can be made to do so from the above considerations.

COVETOUSNESS.—How blinding is the sin of covetousness! Not long since I read in your paper a letter from an individual upon time, yes, upon time, and to look at it one would suppose he was waiting for the Lord, and expecting him within a few months, confidently. And this same individual has treasures laid up in money to a large amount, besides owning land worth thousands of dollars, but unwilling to part with one dollar to the relief of needy brethren, or the advancement of the cause of God. Yes, he could give a thousand dollars to the proposed English mission, and still be a rich man. Repent, before it is too late.

OBITUARY.

DEAD, of Typhoid Lung Fever, at Sugar Hill, N. H., Feb. 5th, Bro. Moses Atwood, in his 41st year. He died full in the faith of the glorious resurrection near, and informed his brethren at the last meeting he attended, that his work was about done. Although we deeply feel our loss, yet we sorrow not as those that have no hope, for we believe that those that fall asleep in Jesus will God bring with him.

His last admonition to his brethren in public, was to carry out the principles of pure and undefiled religion, which he said was to visit the widow and fatherless in their afflictions. We doubly feel the force of his exhortation, since he was then in perfect health; and now, after a painful sickness of one week, has left a widow and eight sons, many of whom are quite young. He was a man strong in faith and powerful in exhortation and prayer. He never was ashamed of the blessed hope, but vindicated the cause any where and every where with great zeal and energy. He read the Bible much and with great delight, and it thoroughly furnished him with arguments that were hard to resist. He has often reminded me of Daniel of old, who prayed with his windows up, while his voice was heard in prayer every morning, in deep humility before God in his family. His funeral was attended on Sabbath by a large concourse of people, many of whom were mourners indeed.

Sermon on the occasion by the writer, from Isa. lxi. 1-3. May God's blessing rest on the surviving friends.

Lord's Prayer.

Fine.

Our Father who in heaven art, Hallowed be thy name; Thy kingdom come. Thy will be done, In heav'n and earth the same. Come, my Sa-D. C. Thou wilt we sing our sull'rings o'er, And praise thee ever more; Then wilt we sing our sull'rings o'er, and praise thee ev-er more.

viour, O my Sa- viour, Come and bless thy peo- ple now, While at thy feet we hum- bly bow, O come and save us now, D. C.

II
 Give us this day our daily bread:
 Our trespasses forgive:
 As we forgive our fellow-men,
 May we thy grace receive.
Come, my Saviour, &c.

III
 And in temptation leave us not;
 From evil us defend:
 For thine, O Lord, the kingdom is,
 For ever, without end.
Come, my Saviour, &c.

IV
 Thine is the power, O Lord, to bring
 The kingdom down to men:
 Thine is the glory, now and ever,
 And kingdom without end.
Come, my Saviour, &c.

V
 In that glad day shall all thy saints
 A joyful tribute bring,
 Of praise, and pow'r, of joy, and song,
 To their exalted King.
Come, my Saviour, &c.

MISCELLANY.

THE SECRET.—'Mother,' said a girl of ten years of age, 'I want to know the secret of your going away alone every night and morning.' 'Why, my dear?' 'Because it must be to see some one you love very much.' 'And what leads you to think so?' 'Because I have always noticed that when you come back you appear to be more happy than usual.' 'Well, suppose I do go to see a friend I love very much, and that after seeing him, and conversing with him, I am more happy than before, why should you wish to know anything about it?' 'Because I wish to do as you do, that I may be happy also.'

'Well, my child, when I leave you in the morning and the evening, it is to commune with my Saviour. I go to pray to him—I ask him for his grace to make me happy and holy—I ask him to assist me in all the duties of the day, and especially to keep me from committing any sin against him—and above all I ask him to have mercy on you, and save you from the misery of those who sin against him.' 'Oh, that is the secret,' said the child: 'then I must go with you.'

THE POPE'S PASTORAL LETTER.—The recent pastoral letter of his Holiness the Pope, "to all the patriarchs, primates, archbishops and bishops of the Catholic church," contains the following blasphemous directions relative to prayer:

"And that the most merciful God may more readily bear our prayers and grant our desires, let us have recourse to the intercession of the most Holy Mother of God, the immaculate Virgin Mary, our most sweet mother, our mediatrix, our advocate, our firmest hope, the source of our confidence, and whose protection is most powerful and most efficacious with God. Let us invoke also the prince of the apostles, to whom Christ gave the keys of the kingdom of heaven, whom he chose for the foundation stone of his church, against which the gates of hell shall never prevail, and his co-apostle Paul, and all the saints of heaven, who, already crowned, possess the palm, that they may shed down upon all Christian people the treasures of divine mercy."

ROMAN CATHOLICS.—The Catholic Almanac for 1847, says that the number of priests in the United States is eight hundred and thirty-four, being an accession of ninety-eight in one year; and also that there are eight hundred and twelve churches, seventy-two of which were erected this year. In addition to this number, there are five hundred and seventy-seven stations visited by clergymen, but as yet without any commodious place of worship.

WHAT NEXT?—The Nashville (Tenn.) Union, of the 12th ult. contains the following choice item of intelligence:

"At a Missionary meeting held in the Methodist church, on Monday night, funds were raised for making Gen. Taylor, Col. Campbell, Col. Anderson, Capt. Cheatham and Capt. Foster life members of the Conference Missionary Society. These compliments will be duly appreciated by the brave officers, who are winning laurels on the field of battle."

We have heard of people stealing "the livery of heaven to serve the devil in," but this is the first instance that has come under our notice, in which a society of professing Christians have furnished the aforesaid livery unsolicited and gratis. The next piece of intelligence that we expect to be called upon to record is, that active measures are to be taken for raising the necessary funds in order to constitute Gen. Taylor and all his subordinates, including Captains Coy and Cullum, as Life Members of the AMERICAN PEACE SOCIETY.—Christian Citizen.

MEETINGS IN ROCHESTER.

Our meetings in this city, are held three times on the Sabbath, also Tuesday and Friday evenings, in Shaw's New Brick Block, east side of the River, corner of Main and Stone streets; entrance from Stone street. The Lord's Supper will be administered in the afternoon of the first Sabbath of every month.

The End of Time.

"The groans of nature in this nether world,
Which Heaven has heard for ages, have an end.
Foretold by prophets, and by poets sung,
Whose fire was kindled at the prophet's lamp.
The time of rest, the promised Sabbath, comes.
Five thousand years of sorrow have well nigh
Fulfilled their tardy and disastrous course
Over a sinful world; and what remains
Of this tempestuous state of human things,
Is merely as the working of a sea
Before a calm, that rocks itself to rest;
For He, whose ear the winds are, and the clouds
The dust that waits upon his sultry march,
When sin hath moved him, and his wrath is hot,
Shall visit earth in mercy; shall descend,
Propitious, in his chariot paved with love;
And what his storms have blasted and defiled
For man's revolt, shall with a smile repair."

Behold the measure of the promise filled;
See Salem built, the labor of a God!
Bright as a sun the sacred city shines;
All kingdoms and all princes of the earth
Flock to that light; the glory of all lands
Flows into her; unbounded is her joy,
And endless her increase.
From every clime they come
To see thy beauty and to share thy joy.
O Zion! an assembly such as earth
Saw never, such as heaven stoops down to see.

Come then, and, added to thy many crowns,
Receive yet one, the crown of all the earth.
'Thou who alone art worthy!' It was thine
By ancient covenant, ere nature's birth;

Thy saints proclaim thee king, and thy delay
Gives courage to their foes, who, could they see
The dawn of thy last advent, long desired,
Would flee for safety to the falling rocks."

WILLIAM COWPER.

Primitive Christians.

THEIR DIET AND MODE OF TAKING THEIR MEALS.

The tables of the primitive Christians were distinguished by the greatest frugality and temperance. Their grand principle was to eat and drink in order to satisfy the cravings of nature, and invigorate their bodies for a renewal of their necessary labors; and while, on the one hand, they knew nothing of the austere and painful abstinence, which after ages of ignorance and superstition came to practice and extol as highly meritorious, they were equally careful, on the other hand, to check the indulgence of a nice and fastidious taste in the gratification of the palate. There was nothing, indeed, which they seem to have been more solicitous to avoid than any imitation of the excessive luxury and epicurean habits of their contemporaries; and justly accounting all excess, whether in eating or drinking, as incompatible with the maintenance of purity, and attention to spiritual duties, they inflexibly adhered to the rule of abstaining from every thing that tended to inflame the passions, or to engender any hankering after the pleasures of sense. On no species of food did they lay an interdict, except on things strangled, and on blood, according to the counsel of the apostles, which, for many ages, continued in force among the Christians,—and such high-seasoned viands as were henting to the frame. Those of the East, indeed, who, living in a warmer climate, were always distinguished by their habits of austerity and abstinence beyond Christians in other places, preferred the flesh of fish or fowl to the grosser and more succulent flesh of quadrupeds. Many of them even lived wholly on a diet consisting of preparations of milk, or of vegetables, or such light food as figs and dates;—to have made sumptuous preparations for the table,—to have betrayed much anxiety about the cookery, or produced a great variety of viands and spicery at their entertainments, would, in those early days of Christianity, have brought discredit, if not ruin, on the religious character of the individual. And yet there were no austerities then in vogue among the Christians. Looking upon all the creatures of God as good for food, they deemed themselves at perfect liberty to make use of them as suited their convenience and their taste, at such times and in such a measure as temper, constitution, or age, required; and they never dreamed of imposing any limits to the enjoyment of the comforts of life, beyond what reason and religion prescribed. But justly accounting an ill-regulated and luxurious appetite as the source of innumerable evils, and placing their highest ambition and pleasure in the attainment of spiritual excellence, they practiced the greatest abstemiousness, confining themselves to the plainest and simplest fare; and then never carrying their indulgence in the pleasures of the table further than that temperate use of them which was necessary to repair the bodily vigor, and which left the mind free and ready, as occasion offered, to engage in prayer or other exercises of religion. The object they proposed to themselves by the practice of such singular moderation was that of mortifying the senses, and enabling them to wield with a firmer hand the reins of discipline over the motions and appetites of their corrupt nature; and they entertained not the most distant idea of making a vain and Pharisaic parade of their abstinence, or were accustomed to regard it in no other light than as simply a means of promoting the great end of their moral and religious improvement. Thus admirably did the primitive Christians observe the golden mean, by avoiding equally the extremes of sordid penury and luxurious gratification of the senses. Their frugal diet acquired a relish from their previous labors; and while they never denied to themselves any of the good things of life, as far as was consistent with the ends of sobriety and religion, they considered it their duty always to keep within the bounds of that "temperance which is a fruit of the Spirit."

The manner in which they conducted their repasts was itself an effectual preservative of temperance, while at the same time, it was eminently characteristic of the piety and spirituality of the primitive age. When dinner had been served, and the family had taken their seats at the table, the master of the household, with a grave and solemn voice, and in a prayer of considerable length, acknowledged their dependence on the care of their common Father, expressed their gratitude for the past tokens of his bounty, and invoked him to bless, for their health and comfort, the provisions of which they were to partake. During the progress of the meal, some member of the family entertained the company with select portions of the Scriptures; for so strong and insatiable was their appetite for spiritual food, that they could not rest satisfied and happy without providing suitable refreshment for the soul at the same time that they were enjoying the comforts of the body. The viands being removed, the family circle was drawn more closely together,—for now were unfolded, and put into the hands of all, the precious scrolls in which, in those days, the Scriptures were written. The head of the family then read aloud a few passages, both from the Old and New Testament, accompanying them with some plain and simple admonitions of his own, or recalling to the memory of his audience the public exhortations which, on the preceding Sabbath, had been founded on them in the church; or he taught the younger branches of the house to repeat after him the beautiful prayer which was dictated by the lips of the Savior; and told them, in simple phrase, of the love which God bears to the young, and of the blessedness of remembering their Creator in the days of their youth. These readings and exhortations were always short, and diversified, at intervals, by sacred music,—of which the primitive Christians were passionately fond. Sometimes one, distinguished by taste and talent for spiritual songs, sung some favorite piece of sacred melody; at other times, the shrill voices of the women and the children were blended in full chorus with the deeper tones of the men,—till, as the hour set apart for refreshment drew towards a close, the venerable parent, whose look and attitude called for momentary silence, gave thanks to the Giver of all good, for the enjoyment of their natural and spiritual comforts, and prayed that his presence and blessing might be with them during the succeeding period of labor and duty. Thus, among the primitive Christians, their ordinary refreshments were sanctified with the Word of God and with prayer; and thus were the words of eternal truth interwoven, in the most agreeable and captivating manner, with the habits and pleasures of everyday life.

THEIR DAILY DEVOTIONS.

Instead of consuming their leisure hours in vacant idleness, or deriving their chief amusement from boisterous merriment, the recital of tales of superstition, or the chanting of the profane songs of the heathen, they passed their hours of repose in rational and enlivening pursuits, found pleasure in enlarging their religious knowledge, and entertainment in songs that were dedicated to the praise of God. These formed their pastime in private, and their favorite recreations at their family and friendly meetings. With their minds full of the inspiring influence of these, they returned with fresh ardor to their scenes of toil; and to gratify their taste by a renewal of these, they longed for release from labor, far more than to appease their appetite with the provisions of the table. So far were these sacred occupations from being regarded as mere matters of routine by the primitive Christians,—so much were the sentiments and the melody of the sacred songs engraven on their memories and dear to their hearts, that after they had left the family group and repaired to their respective employments, they were wont to cheer themselves in private, amid the various processes of labor, with repeating the songs of Zion. Young women sitting at their distaff, and matrons going about the duties of their household, were constantly humming some spiritual airs. And Jerome relates of the place where he lived, that one could not go into the field without hearing the ploughman at his hallelujahs, the mower at his hymns, and the vine-dresser singing the Psalms of David.

But it was not merely at noon, and in time of their meals, that the primitive Christians read the Word of God and sang praises to his name. At an early hour in the morning the family was assembled, when a portion of Scripture was read from the Old Testament, which was followed by a hymn and a prayer, in which thanks were offered up to the Almighty for preserving them during the silent watches of the night, and for his goodness in permitting them to meet in health of body and soundness of mind; and, at the same time, his grace was implored to defend them amid the dangers and temptations of the day,—to make them faithful to every duty, and enable them, in all respects, to walk worthy of their Christian vocation. During the day, they had, like the Jews, stated seasons, at the third, sixth, and ninth hours, corresponding respectively to nine, twelve, and three o'clock, according to our computation, when those who had command of their time, were wont to retire for a little to engage in the exercises of devotion. In the evening, before retiring to rest, the family again assembled, when the same form of worship was observed as in the morning, with this difference, that the service was considerably protracted beyond the period which could be conveniently allotted to it in the commencement of the day. Besides all these frequent observances, they were in the habit of rising at midnight to engage in prayer and the singing of Psalms,—a practice of venerable antiquity, and which, as Dr. Cave justly supposes, “took its origin from the first times of persecution, when not daring to meet together in the day, they were forced to keep their religious assemblies in the night.”

While the Christians, in their family capacity, observed these periodical seasons of devotion, they laid hold of many opportunities, both stated and occasional, of praying in private. In addition to the secret supplications which every morning and evening they addressed to the throne of grace, they were accustomed, on every proper and convenient occasion, to begin and terminate all their actions with prayer,—either audible or silent, according to circumstances. On receiving any personal or domestic token of the divine goodness, when engaged in any important undertaking, such as sowing their seed, or reaping their harvest,—laying the foundation of a house or taking possession of it,—placing a web in the loom, or putting on a new suit of clothes,—entering on a journey, or going into a bath,—forming a new relation, or parting with a friend,—mingling with company,—at the beginning or closing of a letter,—they indulged in the aspirations of prayer: and so much did they familiarize themselves with its spirit and its sentiments, that they seemed to have cultivated the habit of constant mental intercourse with their heavenly Father. Prayer, indeed, was the grand element that pervaded the life of the primitive Christians; for that spiritual exercise, being not so much a separate and formal act, as a habit and frame of mind, and consisting of all the various elements of praise and thankfulness, confidence and hope, obedience and love, so these principles of a new nature, being established in their minds, and diffusing a sanctified influence over the whole tenor of their walk and conversation, gave vigor to their faith, stability to their virtue, and fed, like a perpetual spring, all the streams of Christian activity and excellence, for which they were so remarkable.

The epistle to Diognetus, written early in the second century, contains the following description of Christians: “They are not distinguished from other men by their place of residence, their language or manners. Though they live in cities of the Greeks and barbarians, each where his lot is cast, and in clothing, food, and mode of life, follow the customs of their country, yet they are distinguished by a wonderful and universally astonishing walk and conversation. They dwell in their own native land, but as foreigners; they take part in every thing as citizens, they endure every thing as foreigners. Every foreign land is to them their native country, and their native country as a foreign land. They live in the flesh but not after the flesh. They dwell on the earth, but they live in heaven; they obey the existing laws, but by their life elevate themselves above the laws. They love all men, and are persecuted, misunderstood, and condemned by all. They are slain and made alive; they are poor and make many rich; they suffer want in every thing and possess abundance in every thing; they are cursed and they bless. In one word, what the soul is in the body, that Christians are in the world. As the soul is diffused through all the members of the body, so the Christians are spread through all the cities of the world. The soul indeed dwells in the body, but it is not of the body; so Christians dwell in the world, but they are not of the world. The invisible soul is shut up in the visible body; and so men know Christians as inhabitants of the world, but their life is hid with Christ in God.”

BELIEVED BRETHREN:—We have all broken the holy law of God—a law indited by infinite wisdom—prompted by infinite love, and given to us for our own good. This, too, we have done willfully and often. The penalty of this law is death—eternal exclusion ‘from the presence of God and the glory of his power;’ yet the reverse of this penalty is all that we need—all that wisdom can desire. The worth of eternal life is more than the mind of man can estimate. What is eternity? The giant thought, laden with this inquiry, leaves all the past and flits away, with more than ten times lightning speed, into the mystic regions of futurity—it passes quick the bounds of millions on millions of ages and millions heaped on millions more; still, on it speeds—and on—till weary with the flight, it wastes itself away and brings no message back! Another messenger is then despatched, and where the other failed there it begins. Acquainted with the former’s fate, it clothes itself with greater strength, and swifter speeds away. Supported by ambitious hope, it long boars on its course with rapid, tedious flight, till having gone far, far beyond all measurable bounds, it pauses in its course to take a backward look upon its measureless path—when, lo! it finds itself not half a span removed from where the inquiry first arose, and still eternity stretches on, far—infininitely far beyond the reach of keenest gaze. Insolvable extent! What, then, is eternal life? God only, who is eternal, can estimate it; and yet we have carelessly forfeited our right to it.

Who can heal the breach he has made in God’s holy, inflexible law? God himself cannot heal it. The act once put forth can never be recalled—the law once broken must remain broken eternally. This is self-evident. The Eternal Godhead might die in our stead, (were it possible) and thus suffer the penalty of the law for us, yet that would not make the broken law unbroken. Who among us has not broken the law of God? Not one! Who then is without sin? (sin is the transgression of the law—1 John iii. 4.) None: ‘no, not one.’ ‘If we say we have no sin, we deceive ourselves and the truth is not in us.’—1 John i. 8. If we say that we have not sinned, we make him (Christ) a liar, and his word is not in us.—ver. 10. The law says, ‘The soul that sinneth it shall surely die,’ and the word of God says, ‘There is none righteous, no, not one: there is none that understandeth, there is none that seeketh after God. They are all gone out of the way, they are together become unprofitable: there is none that doeth good, no not one. Their throat is an open sepulchre, with their tongues they have used deceit, the poison of asps is under their lips: whose mouth is full of cursing and bitterness. Their feet are swift to shed blood. Destruction and misery are in their ways: and the way of peace have they not known. There is no fear of God before their eyes.’—Rom. iii. 10. This, Paul says, includes ‘both Jews and Gentiles, that they are all under sin.’—ver. 9. ‘There is not a just man on earth that doeth good and sinneth not.’—Eccl. vii. 20.

Who then shall be saved? ‘for all have sinned and come short of the glory of God,’ (Rom. iii. 23) and it is the irrevocable decree of heaven, that ‘without holiness no man shall see the Lord.’ ‘Be ye holy, even as your Father who is in heaven is holy,’ is a requirement of the law whose penalty is death. How can we escape the penalty? This is the most important question that ever agitated the mind of man. Therefore, if I attempt to answer this question, I trust I shall not be accused of wasting ink and paper and time, if I do not do the subject great injustice.

Do you say, ‘we all know the way and need not to be told?’ I am heartily glad if all who are looking for the coming King know the way and follow in it perfectly. But as there is only one way, and as many who say ‘Lord, Lord,’ and who will claim in the last day to have done ‘many wonderful works’ in the name of the Lord, will be rejected as strangers to him,’ (Matt. vii. 23); it becomes him who ‘thinketh he standeth,’ to ‘take heed lest he fall,’ and be counted in that number. I do not pretend that the way is hard to be known; but so great is the ‘deceitfulness of sin’ that we are apt to be flattered by it, and duped and ruined. God gave ‘his only begotten Son’ to suffer the penalty of the law for us, and has promised, if we will come unto him, to ‘cover’ our sins, ‘blot’ them out, ‘remember’ them no more against us, ‘impute’ them not to us, and to ‘cleanse us from all unrighteousness!’ so that, as far as we are concerned, (although we are sinners still against the law,) we shall be as ‘free from the law of sin and death,’ as though we had never known sin. ‘Where then is boasting?’ It is excluded; it is all of the ‘free gift of God’—‘all of grace.’ Glory to God for his love to us, ‘in that while we were yet sinners Christ died for us.’ Here the day breaks in. The former scene was dark and gloomy; but now the sun has risen in his glory. ‘Glad tidings of great joy’ have come. Sin and death have found an opposing foe. Their shackles are broken off from every captive who is willing to be free. The ‘way’ is opened and ‘all the ends of the earth’ are invited to ‘come and be saved.’ Hallelujah!

Now God has done all that is necessary on his part for our salvation; but the chain is not yet complete—an all-important link is lacking yet. We have a part to perform. The way being opened, and the means provided, it remains for us to ‘work out our own salvation with fear and trembling.’ It all depends now upon our own exertion. If we do our part we have no business to meddle with God’s faithfulness to perform all that he has promised. Here is a dangerous error. We are apt to expect and ask of God to do the very things which he has commanded us to do. We are commanded to ‘turn ourselves from all transgressions,’ ‘make ourselves a new heart and a new spirit,’ (Ezek. xviii. 30, 31.) ‘sanctify ourselves,’ (Lev. xx. 7.) ‘keep ourselves pure,’ (1 Tim. v. 22.) ‘work out our own salvation,’ (Phil. ii. 12.) ‘save ourselves,’ (Acts ii. 40 and 1 Tim. iv. 16.) and to save others, (1 Cor. ix. 22 and 1 Tim. iv. 16.) The whole work while we live is our own. True, God has promised to do all these things for us; but only on condition that we be ‘co-workers with him.’ God will attend to his part. It is enough for us to attend to our own, and not leave any minute part for God to do alone, but take hold of it ourselves, and then God will join and help us—not before.

Does any one ask, 'What shall I do? and how shall I know how much it is my duty to do? since there is such difference of opinion in the world about 'Christian perfection.' I answer, first cast away from you 'the doctrines and commandments [comments and creeds] of men,'—which are a usurpation of God's right—and take for the man of your counsel the 'words' that 'shall judge you in the last day'—the pure, unsophisticated word of God; which, alone, of itself, is the complete furniture of the Christian, and is 'able to make you wise unto salvation.'—2 Tim. iii. 15-17. All the opinions on Bible doctrines, of the wisest and holiest uninspired men that ever wrote are worth less than nothing. They may be correct, and they may not. If they lead us to truth they have accomplished no good—the Bible would do that without them. But, if they lead us into error, the hurt is immense. All who rely on the doctrines or comments of men, reject the greater number of them and receive a part, while others reject those they receive and receive those they reject.

Those learned men who have written comments on God's comments (as though they were wiser than God and could comment better than he on his own word,) tell us that the popular version of the Scriptures gives the sense of the original as near as it can be expressed in our language. Having given us this assurance they should have stopped. What they have done more than this has been arrogating to themselves the right to think for others, and correct God! Why have they written? For the specious pretence of making the word of God plainer. And for this purpose they have heaped up volume on volume of intricate writings that would require a thousand more commentators to explicate them: thus, in these 'last days' have been 'heaped up teachers,' a hundred upon one and thousands upon the hundred. Follow not after them, or you are bewildered and lost. Come far back, from whence they started, and once more place your feet upon the firm, pure word of God—the whole word of God—and nothing but the word of God. There is no mystic Scripture that is not somewhere made clear, in the Scriptures. God has attended to this. See 2 Pet. i. 19-21 and ii. 1-3. If you would know 'what is truth,' 'search the Scriptures,' and compare Scripture with Scripture. And 'if any among you lack wisdom, let him ask of God,' and not of men. Give no heed to any man's inferences or opinions of Bible doctrine; no matter who he is or how plausible his argument. If he brings plain Scripture for proof then believe that; but not his inferences, in any case. If he says this Scripture is figurative or this not, be sure, before you credit his assertion, to learn how he knows so, from Scripture.

After this is done, we are then just ready to learn our duty from the Bible, and receive its instructions, because they are contained in the Bible, and not because they are incorporated into our creed or the doctrines of our denomination, without which we should be bound to reject them. We will then be ready to learn that it is our duty to 'awake to righteousness and sin not;' (1 Cor. xv. 34,) to 'be holy and without blame before God in love;' (Eph. i. 4,) 'not having spot or wrinkle or any such thing; but holy and without blemish;' (v. 27,) to 'serve him without fear, in holiness and righteousness before him, all the days of our life;' (Luke i. 73-75,) to 'be perfect, even as your Father which is in heaven is perfect;' (Matt. v. 48,) to be 'as obedient children, not fashioning yourselves according to the former lusts in your ignorance: but as he which hath called you is holy, so be ye holy in all manner of conversation; because it is written, Be ye holy, for I am holy;' (1 Pet. i. 14-16. Herein is our love made perfect, that we may have boldness in the day of judgment; because as he is, so are we in this world. 1 John iii. 17. Little children let no man deceive you; he that doeth righteousness is righteous even as he [God, ver. 3] is righteous.' 1 John iii. 7. If we are the temples of God we must be pure. If we have fellowship with the Father and are one with him and the Son, we must be holy, for 'what fellowship hath righteousness with unrighteousness?' It is the word of inspiration that he who has hope of seeing God, 'purifieth himself even as he is pure;' and none but 'the pure in heart' have any promise that 'they shall see God.' Forasmuch then as Christ hath suffered for us in the flesh, arm yourselves likewise with the same mind; for he that hath suffered in the flesh has ceased from sin—that he no longer should live the rest of his time in the flesh to the lusts of men, but to the will of God. For the time past of our life may suffice us to have wrought the will of the Gentiles. 1 Pet. iv. 1-3. For in that he [Christ] died, he died unto sin once; but in that he liveth he liveth unto God. Likewise reckon ye also yourselves to be dead INDEED unto sin, but alive unto God through Jesus Christ our Lord. Rom. vi. 10, 11. How shall we that are dead to sin live any longer therein?—ver. 2. This is a strong figure. Language could not express greater freedom from sin. We are required to do no more sin than if we were dead. Entertain not for a moment the thought, that if we live not up to this requirement, God will make allowance for our infirmities and the temptations that flesh is liable to. Such an expectation has no foundation in the word of God. It is an acknowledgment that our strength is not in God. God is faithful, who will not suffer you to be tempted above that ye are able; but will with the temptation also make a way to escape, that ye may be able to bear it. 1 Cor. 10, 13.

Life and Death.

NUMBER IV.

(Concluded.)

Tell me where in God's word, the law—'Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and thy neighbor as thyself,' demands death?—death in any sense? I have yet to find it. No, brother, that law remains unsatisfied. Christ has not paid the demand—he could not. The sinner must repent and believe on the Lord Jesus; that will satisfy the demand of the law, and that alone. Then he does just what the law demands. But if Christ suffered the penalty, which the sinner must have suffered without such intervention, then the penalty is satisfied, and the law can demand nothing of the principal.

But that law was a specific one. 'Thou shalt not eat!' was the fiat of Jehovah. 'If thou dost, death is thy doom.' He did eat, and death was his doom. But for the interposition of Christ, that would have been death without a resurrection—utter extinction of being.

'But men die now: how then did Christ satisfy the penalty?' Ans. 'As by one man sin entered into the world and death by sin, so death passed through to all men, because all have sinned.' Here we are taught it is for their own sins that men die: but to 'those who receive the overflowing of grace and the gift of righteousness,' it is only a suspension of animated existence—they 'shall reign in life, through the one man Christ Jesus.' I believe we are all agreed that this is a consequence, both upon the righteous and the wicked; the latter, however, suffer the second death, which is a positive infliction for the rejection of 'the overflowing grace,' or offer of life through Jesus Christ.

I utterly deny the doctrine that Christ's death 'magnified the law and made it honorable.' It is not taught in the word of the living God! Read for yourselves the 19th, 20th, and 21st verses of the 42d chapter of Isaiah. Not one word is here said about the death of Christ. But his whole life was one continued exemption of the law. This is what is here foretold.

Here is one class of theologians, frittering away the atonement entirely, yet professing to believe in vicarious offering. On the other hand, is another class, holding the same sentiments about death, who have been driven, in order to be consistent with their theory, to make Christ suffer 'all the elect would have suffered, eternally in hell torments.' Both these classes equally set aside the true offering of Jesus Christ. How simple, yet how forcible are sound words—'Christ hath abolished death, [rendered death ineffectual—Macknight,] and brought life and immortality to light through the gospel.' Here Death and Life are set opposite to each other. We have only to inquire: Did Christ die on the cross? Yes. What death did he die? There is but one answer—extinction of being. This must have been the sinner's doom.

Again: The original words all convey the simple idea of Life or animated existence, and Death or cessation of animated existence. If 'spiritual death' is alienation from God, 'spiritual life,' it's opposite, must be love to God. Now where the word Life is used, even metaphorically, I find, (and these are few) the simple idea of consciousness, animation, or something kindred to it, is maintained. I will give some of the original words used in the New Testament, and rendered 'life,' 'immortal,' 'never dying,' etc.:

Zoe:—Life, animated existence, etc.

Aphtharsia:—(fr. alpha, neg. and phtheiro, to destroy,) incorruptibility, incorruption, immortality.

Aphthartos:—Incorruptible, immortal, eternal.

Athanas:—Immortal, ever-living, never-dying, perpetual.

Athanazo:—(fr. alpha neg. and thanatos, death) to deify, immortalize, to free from death.

Athanasia:—Immortality, endless life.

In more than six hundred places, where the words life, live, etc., are used in the Old and New Testaments, not one of them will warrant the idea of 'Spiritual Life.' I glory in the fact, that the time will come, when the saints of God will be made 'spiritually alive.' That time will come in the resurrection—but it is not now, although it is at hand; praise the Lord! Amen. 'It is a faithful saying,' says Paul, 'if we be dead with him we shall also live with him.'

In conclusion: After a most patient and thorough search, I am satisfied the doctrine of 'Spiritual Life and Death,' is not taught in the word of God. It ought to be scouted. It is the source of misification and confusion. I have no objection to using the terms, metaphorically, to express the wakefulness of Christians, to the subject of religion, or the opposite. This is all very well; but when we put them into God's word, and then undertake to make the one a penalty of disobedience, we are about fearful business. To call disobedience a penalty of disobedience—hatred a penalty of hatred—alienation a penalty of alienation, and such like, is too great an outrage on the reason, intelligence and understanding of man and the word of the all-wise God, to be borne in silence. When will you, my brethren, burst the bonds of heathen philosophy, of scholastic theology, of the divinity of metaphysics? When will you cease to praise Socrates for discovering a falsehood, flatly contradicting the word of God? O for emancipation for all my brethren! O for a repudiation of heathen philosophy, and a new consecration to the word of God!

ROCHESTER, MARCH 17, 1847.

Letter from Charles Beecher.

[The following letter from Bro. CHAS. BEECHER was written in answer to a private note of ours on business, and perhaps was not designed by him for the public eye. But as it chiefly relates to the Advent faith; and as the writer is evidently laboring under mistaken views relative to that faith; and as we have good reasons to suppose that truth is his object, we therefore take the liberty to make public his frank and friendly letter, with a few remarks.]

FORT WAYNE, IOWA, JAN. 29, 1847.

BROTHER MARCH:—

The articles to which you allude are in publication in the "Watchman of the Valley," from Cincinnati, O. There are ten numbers now out—which I fear will be of little weight to you, for which reason I am the more anxious that you should see them.

I do believe in the near approach of our Lord's return—even hoping at times I may be permitted to "remain unto it." But have never ventured to fix day and year, wherein I think you sin. I also believe that the Covenant People will be restored to their own land, (a portion at least,) and will be converted by "looking upon Him whom they have pierced."

That portion will go back (rather are now going back—for the movement is begun,) in unbelief;—and will be subjected to a crisis of unparalleled suffering. The balance will be gathered by the Lord after his appearing.

I am disposed to censure the Advent papers generally for a wrong course in this matter.

1. Unwillingness to look at the evidence of this subject; and fear to spread it before their readers.

2. Total direction of their own principles of interpretation. Applying to the promises made to Abraham, and to his seed, and to Judah, and to Israel, principles of spiritualizing, exactly the same with those used by the Post-millennarians in denying the Pre-millennial Advent.

So long as you spiritualize all the strong language to the natural Israel, you cannot blame them for spiritualizing language not a whit stronger as to the advent. You furnish them all the principles they require. They are on the high road to infidelity, but you started them. You are only a little way behind them. Thus

1. Spiritualize all the prophecies of Restoration of Jews.—One step.

2. Spiritualize all promises of a Millennium connected.—2d step.

3. Spiritualize all 'promises of his coming' connected with Restoration and Millennial era.—3d step.

4. Spiritualize all promises of the Res'n or conflagration connected with Millennium.—4th step.

5. Here Bush and Swedenborg & Universalists come in and take all remaining promises of his coming and spiritualize them.—5th, and this is the last step.—There is no coming—no Judgment.

Now, whoever takes the first step must take the second; and whoever takes the 2d, the 3d; and so on. There is no stopping place, and the only thing that keeps you from running through, is an inconsistency more creditable to your piety than your logic.

Excuse this freedom. I speak plainly, but sincerely—and am your Brother.

In the patient waiting for Christ.

CHARLES BEECHER.

REPLY TO MR. BEECHER.

DEAR SIR:—There is a difficulty in replying to your letter, from the fact that the reasons you give for "censuring" the "Advent papers" are not specific enough to be specifically met. In replying to a general charge, we are in great danger of "beating the air;" from not knowing the evidence, either actual or supposed, on which the accusation is based.—Thus you think that must have been arrived at, without having been fully aware of the extent of our examination and presentation of the evidence in question. We speak of the "Advent papers" as a whole, because you thus refer to them. We believe that we have carefully examined all the arguments which have been adduced by all the various writers, who advocate the Jew's restoration; and we also believe that both sides of that question have been very fairly and fully presented in the "Advent papers." This was particularly done in the "Signs of the Times," (now "Advent Herald,") published in Boston, in 1841 & 2, the first two years of its publication. In the establishment of that paper, the Jew question came up very prominently for discussion, and the columns of that paper were open to its discussion, until the great body of Adventists in this country were fully settled in the position we occupy. Since that time, the same question has frequently come up, and as frequently been heard and met in the "Advent papers." And the only reason why the arguments, on the side the reverse of which we hold, are not now presented and canvassed, is because we know of no arguments on that side of the question, but what have been fully and sufficiently met. The evidence we believe has been examined with a prayerful spirit, and with a willingness to arrive at the truth. For it is our sincere wish, if we can fathom the desires of our hearts, to know the truth, and to conform our opinions to the teaching of the Bible. If we are in error on this question, we can certainly gain nothing by persisting in it. The truth, and not our opinions, will avail us anything. But as advocates for truth, when we discern a want of soundness in the argument by which any view is sustained, we cannot present it as sound reasoning, or give it publicity without also pointing out its defects in point of logic.

2d. In the second place, you think we depart from our own principles of interpretation, and spiritualize the promises made to the Jews, the same as "Post-millennarians" spiritualize the Scriptures which sustain the "Pre-millennial Advent." If this were the case, we should certainly be very faulty in so doing. We must not apply principles of interpretation to one portion of Scripture which we may not to other portions. No doctrine can be scriptural, which is sustained only by a rule of interpretation, which would not be valid when applied to other doctrines. If then your view of the Jew question is sustained by the same mode of argument, that our view of the pre-millennial advent is, it must be equally valid.—The question here arises, wherein do we depart from our principles of interpretation? As the charge is general, and not specific, we hardly know how to meet it. Had we been shown wherein we spiritualize the promises to Israel, it would be very easy to meet the objection, and show the uniformity of our principles of interpretation. As the objection has not been specifically presented, we can only meet it in a general manner. We would therefore argue that,—

1st. When we deny that prophecies, which manifestly were fulfilled in the Babylonish restoration, can have respect to a future restoration of the natural Jew, we neither spiritualize them, nor depart from our literal principle of interpretation, in showing their true application.

2d. We neither spiritualize, nor depart from our principles of interpretation, in denying the application of prophecies to the chronology of the second advent, which were fulfilled in the first.

3d. We are not liable to the above charge, when we apply the promises made to Abraham and his seed, as they are applied by the inspired commentators—the writers of the New Testament.

4th. The same is true, when we regard the neglect to comply with the conditions of conditional promises, as invalidating those promises. And

5th. We are also guiltless, when we apply to the righteous portion of the whole house of Israel those promises which can consistently, only be fulfilled in them.

In one or other of the above classes we believe all the scriptures come which are applied to the restoration of the unsanctified Jew; and consequently instead of proving recreant to our principles, when we approach the Jew question, we conceive we are pursuing the only course we could pursue, and legitimately carry them out. As therefore we are not conscious of taking the 1st step in your series of steps, we do not conceive that we are in the road they lead, and recognize no issue upon them. We have not here taken up the various scriptures, applied to the restoration of the natural Jew, and shown how they belong to the above classes, because you have not adverted to any scriptures as sustaining their return; and although we might occupy much space in such classification, we might still have omitted the ones which bear the strongest in your mind, in favor of that view. We will therefore content ourselves by noticing the only text you have quoted,—viz: Zech. xii. 10. "They shall look upon me whom they have pierced." This you apply to the second advent. But the inspired John (xix. 37) expressly applies it to the time of the crucifixion, and quotes it as then fulfilled. Speaking of the crucifixion, he says:—"For these things were done, that the scripture should be fulfilled, A bone of him shall not be broken. And again another scripture saith,—They shall look on him whom they pierced." Now when this is expressly applied, by John, to the crucifixion, have we a right to say, as one advocating its application to the second advent once said to us, "I beg leave to differ from the Evangelist"? No one will accuse John of being a spiritualizer. If he was not, we do not spiritualize in adopting his interpretation.

We might proceed to point out the many contradictions of scripture necessarily involved in the theory of the restoration of the natural Jew. It might however be here a work of supererogation. As we have shown why we are not liable to the objections you advance, we will close by expressing our belief that ours is the only consistent scriptural view of the prophecies which point to Israel and the Advent. If there is a more perfect way we should be glad to see it, and walk therein.

Our Position—Bro. Gross, & the "Bible Advocate."

Some few of our good brethren object to the Bible position on time, "nigh, even at the door," because they think it is not sufficiently definite. Now my brother I presume you will admit that we should never object to a doctrine or theory until we are prepared to show its absurdity, and can present a better. This we have done, in reference to the day and hour theory, and the nigh-at-the-door: we have shown from infallible testimony that the day and hour theory is defective, and, from the same kind of testimony, that the one we have presented is according to truth. But you have not done this; you have not, to our knowledge, attempted to tell what the Savior did mean, in the expression "nigh, even at the door;" neither have you told us what your more definite position is. Now, truth is what we desire above all things else, and if you have got it, we would most kindly thank you for it. Understand us: we do not call for an expression of your feelings, impulses, fears, your dreams, affirmations, or opinions; but truth, Bible truth, and facts. To such testimony we will joyfully submit, and gladly lay it before our readers, and no other.

We say you have not told us what your more definite position is. We readily admit that you repeatedly and confidently affirm that you believe the year may be known; and you also say you fully believe the true '47 will be that year, and that it is your strong conviction that this year is the true '47.—Now this is about as positive a position as we have been able to get any one to take, who talks so much about our in-definite and then definite position on the time.

Now, according to our understanding of the meaning of 'nigh at the door,' we think that our position is more definite or positive than the one above named. We believe the grand prophetic periods will end and the Lord come in the true '47; and it is highly probable that this is that very year, but we are not positive that it is. But we can be no more positive about anything than that the Lord is at the door; and with us, at the door means, and will mean,—now, now, until the Lord shall come. Let the wise judge whose position is the more definite, positive, and more according to the word of the Lord. The fact is, the contention some seem disposed to make here, is a mere splitting of hairs, and is a work in which we should not be engaged: it is incompatible with our profession, as believers in the near advent of our Lord, to be found doing such things.

Again, Some few whom we know, and others we do not know, honestly we suppose, think we are opposed to having much if anything more said on the prophetic numbers. This is not so: and we have repeatedly given assurances to the contrary, have published all, with one exception, which has been furnished on this subject, stand ready to publish more, and shall, the Lord willing, soon speak on the prophetic numbers ourself. This complaint we suppose has arisen from the fact of our refusing to copy from the "Advocate" Bro. Gross' articles on the time. Some have thought that those articles were sent directly to our office, but this is a mistake: they were sent to the "Advocate," and we were requested to copy them. We declined, not on account of the time advocated, but the manner it was advocated; and besides we had published nearly or quite the same articles from Bro. Gross' pen, in a former volume of our paper. There is no just cause for complaint here. We want it distinctly understood that we have rejected no one's article on account of the time it advocated. But we did reject Bro. Gross' articles for the reasons named, and as a Christian, a brother, he should not treat us unkindly for doing this. Has an Editor no rights? must he publish everything which every one requests him to publish? and if now and then he declines an article, should he be rebuked, chastized, and unkindly treated, and that too in a paper which professes to be a co-worker in the same good cause? Let the candid answer.

Another point the good of the cause makes it necessary to notice here. We learn that a prejudice is being waked up to some extent, against the "Advent Herald" and "Voice of Truth," and in favor of the "Bible Advocate," on the time of the advent. We do not say that any person, or number of persons, have, designedly, been engaged in producing this prejudice, but we do say, if we are rightly informed, that it is groundless. We are told that the conductors of the "Bible Advocate," in the main, agree with the "Herald" and "Voice" on the question of time; and we have seen nothing in that paper to convince us that this information is incorrect.—It is true the "Advocate" has published communications from correspondents, who take a different view from ours on time. But this is no more than the "Voice of Truth" and "Herald" have done. But the opinions of correspondents do not decide what are the sentiments of the conductors of these respective papers. The question to be settled is, do the conductors of these papers take the same, or essentially the same position on the time of the advent? We say they do. If we are mistaken, we hope the "Advocate" will show wherein; but if correct, then we request it to affirm the truth of what we say. We make this request not on our own account, but for the peace of our greatly tried brethren at this perilous moment.

We do not say that the "Advocate" has been in the fault in this case; but we do think that when the conductors of that paper are informed that such evils exist, it will be their pleasure as far as possible to aid us in removing them, that imaginary causes of trial may speedily be taken away from among us.

Finally, we do most earnestly entreat our dear brethren, one and all, to guard at this time of sore trial against the wiles of the devil. He will divide and scatter you if he can. His work of darkness will be done in a manner you least expect. We say again, Beware of his devices, lest you lose the crown, when you are so near possessing it. If you have not the spirit of Christ you are none of his. His spirit leads its possessors to love one another, not in word and in tongue, but in deed and in truth. Oh, how many are deficient here! May they see their poverty and wretchedness before it shall be too late to obtain the true riches.

A HOPELESS CASE.—The advocates of a temporal millennium fully believe that wars of every kind will cease before that long looked for day shall dawn upon the world. They confidently expect, too, that the world will be converted from the spirit of war, through the preaching of the gospel by the ministry of the present church. But their cause is a hopeless one, as the following facts, with a vast amount of other infallible evidence, clearly show:—

THE FUNERAL OBSEQUIES.

"Yesterday was certainly the most beautiful day of the season. At near 3 o'clock the procession began to move from the Battery up Broadway.—The military escort, with appropriate music, made a grand but solemn display; then followed the clergy, and behind them the remains of the lamented soldiers who fell gallantly fighting at Monterey. First, the remains of Captain Morris, with eight colonels as pall bearers; second, the remains of Captain Field, with eight captains as pall bearers; and third, the remains of Captain Williams, with also eight captains as pall bearers. The procession moved through Broadway, Chatham and Chambers streets, then down Broadway, into St. Paul's Church. The three coffins were placed on settlers in the central aisle, that of Capt. Morris next the pulpit. As these were carried into the Church, a clergyman led the way, reading in a solemn tone the service of the Episcopal church, beginning, 'I am the resurrection and the life.' &c. To this the low plaintive tones of the organ lent their solemn accompaniment.—The pulpit was occupied by the Rectors of St Paul's and Trinity. The choir sang the anthem 'Glory be to the Father and the Son,' after which the 15th chapter of 1st Corinthians, beginning at the 20th verse, was read. The ceremony was the reading of the solemn service for the dead peculiar to the Episcopal church. This was conducted by Dr. Berrien, of Trinity. There was evident disappointment in the immense throng, three fourths of which were ladies, as a sermon was expected. Much praise is due the efficient corps of officers for the order that prevailed. Nor was it all a cold and formal show. Every heart beat in unison, and all had a place in their affections for the memory of the brave who purchased so glorious a victory at the cost of such valuable lives. After the ceremonies, the bodies were removed to the City Hall, where the City Guard held watch over them all night. At an early hour this morning they will be taken to the Albany boat."—[N. Y. Sun, Saturday morning.]

In view of these blasphemous acts, who can hope that the ministry and the church can ever convert the world from the spirit of war. No one, of a sound enlightened mind. Instead of converting the world from the murderous spirit and practice of war, the 'clergy,' and of course the flocks of their care, sanction and uphold these wicked things. They cu-logize and almost canonize those who have fallen on the field of bloody strife, covered with the blood of those who have fallen by their murderous hands!—O my God! what blindness has come over this professedly enlightened age. The church and the world are hand in hand on the verge of destruction, and they know it not! O that they would see and flee from the inevitable ruin that lies but just before them.

THE MEETING AT SPRINGWATER—which we recently attended, was one of deep and joyful interest. A good number of brethren from abroad attended, strong in the faith, and joyful in the hope of the gospel. The meeting had been in progress one day when myself and Bro. Smith of this city arrived.—We found Brn. H. H. Johnson and — Stocking on the ground, well engaged in the good work. The many fervent prayers and warm exhortations, from brethren and sisters, during the meeting, were very good evidence that their religion consists in something more than a mere theory or outward show: we trust they love not in word and tongue only, but in deed and truth. Our communion season Sabbath afternoon, was a joyful and strengthening moment to the happy guests who then came around the table of their absent Lord, to show forth the Lord's death until he come. May all be counted worthy to eat bread with all the redeemed in the kingdom of God.

Sabbath evening was a time of deep interest.—The power of truth reached the heart of the impatient and unprepared to meet the Lord; a number rose for prayers, and some confessed their backslidings from God. May all these humble seekers after salvation, and many more in that region, be saved in the day of the Lord Jesus.

The cause in Springwater has suffered much from the disgraceful scenes which have been acted there by the Spiritualizers of that place, and those who congregated with them from other parts of the country. But they became divided amongst themselves; denounced each other, and scattered to the four winds, leaving the blight of death behind them, and one family and a relative or two, in the place, as monuments of the sad consequences of a departure from the word of God. We think we now have good reason to hope that the bleeding cause of our soon coming Lord will again raise its drooping head in Springwater, and exercise a healthful and saving influence over at least a portion of the inhabitants of the place, and of the surrounding country.

We left Brn. Johnson and Stocking to continue the meeting, and hope soon to hear that their labor has not been in vain in the Lord.

Our remarks on the time of the second advent and several valuable communications from correspondents, are necessarily deferred for another week.

The Alarm.

We are living, we are dwelling,
In a grand and awful time;
In an age on ages telling,
To be living is sublime.

Will ye play, then, will ye dally,
With your music and your wine?
Up! it is Jehovah's rally!
God's own arm hath need of thine.

What! still hug thy dreamy slumbers!
'Tis no time for idling play;
Wreaths, and dance, and poet-numbers,
Flout them—we must work to-day.

Fear not; spurn the worldling's laughter
Thine ambition trample thou;
Thou shalt find a long hereafter
To be more than tempts thee now.

Ou! let the soul within you
For the truth's sake go abroad!
Strike! let every nerve and sinew
Tell on ages—tell for God!

Instead of complaining of infirmities, and making them an excuse for trampling under foot the requirements of God, do like Paul: he says, 'I besought the Lord,' etc.—and he said unto me, 'My grace is sufficient for thee: for my strength is made perfect in weakness. Most gladly, therefore, will I rather glory in my infirmities, that the power of Christ may rest upon me. Therefore I take pleasure in infirmities, in reproaches, in necessities, in persecutions, in distresses, for Christ's sake: for when I am weak then am I strong.' 2 Cor. xii. 8-11. How many precious promises God has left on record, for this present life, to those who will do his commandments!—so many, and so great promises, that many have held the doctrine of 'once in grace always in grace,' notwithstanding there is no promise to any but those who endure to the end: and it is said, 'When the righteous turneth away from his righteousness and committeth iniquity, he shall die in the sins he hath committed, and all his righteousness that he hath done shall not be mentioned,' etc.—Ezek. iii. 20 and xviii. 24, and xxxiii. 12, 13, 18.

I will not stop to enumerate the many baneful influences that are in the world, at the present day, which tend most powerfully to lead the humble followers of Christ away from the God he loves. We cannot be mistaken that 'perilous times' have come, and that every power of the Christian is in need of being exerted to the utmost to keep him alive to God. Streams of pollution arise from thousands of sources, and, all combining, rush, in one mighty flood, across the way of holiness, uprooting every 'green tree' that is not firmly 'rooted and grounded in love.' Yet these circumstances furnish no excuse to any for not being 'steadfast, immovable, always abounding in the work of the Lord;' but to the contrary they afford a powerful inducement for the child of God to cleave closer than ever to his 'Rock of defence.' We have been forewarned of these things; (2 Tim. iii.) and if we suffer ourselves to be moved by those influences the fault will be our own. The most dangerous of all those influences is, that which leads us, first, to the use of 'idle words' and 'foolish talking and jesting;' then 'profane and vain babblings,' which 'will increase unto more ungodliness,' such as 'evil speaking,' 'filthy communications,' 'tattling,' 'backbiting,' 'cursing,' and, finally, 'blasphemy!' Oh, that I could give to this danger a voice of roaring, louder than Sinai's thunders, that it might awake the child of God to a full sense of terribleness, before it should come near enough to crush him, like the car of Jugernaut, beneath its deadly wheels. The danger is entirely avoided by heeding our Savior's command: 'Let your communications be yea and nay; for whatsoever is more than this cometh of evil.' Use no words, dear brethren, only such as are 'with grace' and 'unto edification;' for, 'if any man among you seemeth to be religious and bridled not his tongue, that man's religion is vain.'—James i. 26.

If any one doubts that I have applied the text, 'there is none righteous,' etc. according to the design of God, let him read Romans 3d and 8th chapters inclusive; for these are all taken up with Paul's comments on that text. They are better than any uninspired comments. Read, also, 1st John.

'Abstain from all appearance of evil, and the very God of peace sanctify you wholly; and I pray God your whole spirit, and soul, and body, be preserved blameless unto the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ. Faithful is he that calleth you, who also will do it.' 1 Thes. v. 22-24.

Souls of the Dead Unconscious.

A word in answer to Bro. Lathrop upon the article, 'Souls of the Dead Conscious,' published in 'Voice of Truth' Feb. 10th. In the first place, we need to see well to it that love, and the spirit of Jesus, characterize our productions, and then though we differ in sentiment, our zeal which we manifest on the side of what we think is truth, will not cause schism in the body of Christ. I think no one of our friends who love Jesus' coming, has a desire to 'burlesque the truth of God' on any subject, and much less the one under consideration.

I think the good brother has failed to prove his three positions. His texts presented, with a few exceptions, militate against his own views, or else have no particular bearing upon the subject. The soul or spirit he understands does not become unconscious like the body at death. In the first place, he errs, while blending the soul and spirit together. The soul and spirit are not the same: therefore Paul prays that the whole spirit, soul and body may be preserved blameless unto the coming of the Lord Jesus Christ. 1 Th. v. 23. But to the law and the testimony, Gen. ii. 7—'And the Lord God formed man of the dust of the ground, and breathed into his nostrils the breath of life, and man became a living soul.' We see that God formed man and he was lifeless; God then breathed into his nostrils the breath of life and then man became a living soul. The body was not a soul without the spirit, neither was the spirit a soul without the body; but spirit and body united constituted a soul. Adam was lifeless and knew nothing till the breath or spirit entered into him; (spirit and breath are the same: see Eccl. iii. 20, 21,) and now if our brother will tell me how much the breath or spirit know before Adam had it, then I will tell him how much a man knows when he is dead: for God says in Eccl. xii. 17—'Then shall the dust return to the earth as it was (before God formed Adam,) and the spirit returns to God who gave it.' This I firmly believe; so we see that Adam has no more consciousness now than before he was created.

Job xiv. 14, is quoted to prove the conscious state of the dead. The connection gives us the plain meaning of the text; read from 10-14; he is speaking of the resurrection, and asks to be hid in the grave and to be kept secret till thy wrath is past, and wants a set time to be remembered, and then asks the question: If a man die shall he live again? and then adds, 'all the days of my appointed time will I wait, till my change come.' Where will he 'wait?' In the grave where he is now 'hid.' What appointed time will he wait for? For the time when they that die shall live again. Whon is that? At Job's 'set time,' when God 'remembers him.' And when is that? 2. Tim. iv. 1, 'At his appearing and kingdom; 1 Thes. iv. 15-17, 'When the dead in Christ rise first.' I think this is the truth in the case. The brother says, 'The notion that the soul becomes unconscious at death has no foundation in revelation.' Let us see: Eccl. iii. 19—'For that which befallth the sons of men befallth beasts, even one thing befallth them, as the one dieth so dieth the other; yea, they have all one breath: so that a man hath no pre-eminence above a beast. All go unto one place—all are of the dust and all turn to dust again. See Psa. xlix. 15—'God will redeem my soul from the power of the grave.' It must be in the grave or else it could not be redeemed. Psa. lxxxix. 48—'Shall he (man,) deliver his soul from the hand of the grave.' Psa. cxv. 17—'The dead praise not the Lord, neither any that go down into silence;' and consequently they are 'unconscious.' Psa. cxlvi. 4—'His breath goeth forth, he returneth to the earth, in that very day his thoughts perish.' Eccl. ix. 5—'The living know that they shall die; but the dead know not any thing.' 1 Cor. xv. 16—'For if the dead rise not, then is not Christ raised; and if Christ be not raised, your faith is vain, ye are yet in your sins; then they also which are fallen asleep in Christ are perished.' This must be unmeaning language if the third position of our brother be correct.

If the person at death enters upon an eternal consciousness of divine approbation and enjoyment, he would not perish though he had no resurrection. Though I love our brother, I must believe God's word, and place my only hope of 'divine approbation and enjoyment,' in the resurrection of the just. Take this away and like the brute we perish. Let us search the Scriptures to see whether these things are so.

Luke xxiii. 43 is presented to prove the position of our brother. The thief asked to be remembered when Jesus should come into his kingdom. Jesus answered in the following manner: 'Verily I say unto thee, to-day shalt thou (or thou shalt) be with me in Paradise.' Punctuate this passage as it should be, and all is plain. But was Jesus in Paradise that day? Not without you call the grave Paradise. The other texts have no particular bearing upon the subject, only that we shall have life by believing in Jesus, and consequently no life if we have no faith. I believe we have eternal life by faith in Christ Jesus, but no immortality till the resurrection. Impartially receiving the testimony of our Savior, in Luke xvi. 19-31, I find a difficulty in harmonizing it with either view so as to satisfy the objector; but it will be seen to be quite as difficult to apply it to the conscious and unconscious states—for if to the conscious, we must admit that a spirit has hands, a bosom, and can talk and hold conversation, and consequently must be in the resurrection state. I admit a difficulty, but the great amount of Scripture is upon the side of God when he says, 'The dead know not anything.'

Again, Phil. i. 21-23 is quoted. I am of Paul's mind, to die (or sleep in Jesus) would be gain—I then should be done with the trials of life and sweetly repose in my Jesus till the resurrection. He would rather be with Christ, and who would not? But Paul did not expect his crown until the appearing of Jesus Christ. He said he was ready to be offered, (and so is every Christian,) and that the time of his departure was at hand; but he did not say that the crown was then to be given—but he does say that it will be given at the appearing of the Savior. 1 Pet. v. 4, says, 'When the chief shepherd shall appear, ye shall receive a crown of glory that fadeth not away.'

Rev. vi. 9-11. This text, I admit, is difficult to harmonize with the above view—but as I said above, the Scriptures abound in proof that the 'saints sleep in Jesus' till the resurrection, and 'them that do sleep in Jesus will God bring with him;' and if they sleep they are unconscious, for what does a man know when he is asleep? I answer, nothing.

'In relation to the perpetuity of future rewards and punishments being placed on a par,' I will say that the texts quoted prove nothing to the point, (as I understand them) for if their worm don't die it will prey upon them till they are destroyed—and if their fire is not quenched, it will burn them up. For an illustration take the house all on fire—if the fire is unquenchable, or can't be put out, it will burn the house to ashes: so with the wicked, they are to be burned up, root and branch; and if this be so, there is nothing left that looks like consciousness more than in the stick of wood that now is a heap of ashes. O! that men would let go of tradition's deadly grasp and believe the word of God as it is.

The good brother says the SOUL at death enters upon an ETERNAL consciousness of divine enjoyment or of misery. Does he forget that God says, 'The SOUL that sinneth it shall DIE!

Ezek. xvii. 20. And does DIE mean LIVE? Dan. ii. 35, says, 'The stone smote the image on the feet and it was carried away, and no PLACE FOUND FOR IT. Bro. L. where is it? If the wicked are in existence it is some where: but God says NO PLACE found for it. Job xviii. 18, declares that they shall be driven from light into darkness, and chased out of the world! We read in the 37th Psalm that they 'shall be like the fat of lambs; they shall consume, into smoke shall they CONSUME AWAY.' If this be the case, where in the universe of God can they be found? But I forbear, hoping that nothing has been said that shall wound the feelings of the honest inquirer after truth and praying God to bless the truth and save us from error, and deliver us from the portion of the wicked, that we may reign in the peaceful and happy kingdom of our God forever.

CORRESPONDENCE.

LETTER FROM BRO. C. R. GRIGGS.

LORRAINE, N. Y., Feb. 13, 1817.

Dear Bro. Marsh:—As I am about to bid farewell to my present field of labor and the friends of Jesus in this section of country, I have felt that the cause of God demanded and his children would be comforted, with an account of things as they were six months ago, and as they now are. Two years ago there was a band of about fifty. 'Spiritualism,' as advocated by Mr. Peavy and others prior to his going to the 'Shakers,' was what divided the once happy company, and left them as sheep without a shepherd. A few however remained steadfast, and continued to meet together to comfort one another with the words that Jesus was coming. Six or eight held on to the strong arm of God, and still looked for the blessed hope and the glorious appearing of the great God and our Savior Jesus Christ. In this state I found the friends at Lorraine. We commenced our meetings with a desire to do good; some good we are satisfied has been done; but how much we cannot tell—eternity alone must decide the question.

Bro. Pinney's visit and the truth presented by him some weeks since, we feel has been blessed of God to the good of souls. Since that time a goodly number have given up their 'shut door' views, and are now united in the common cause of our Redeemer with those 'who have stood stiffly for the word of God,' amid the storms of mysticism and fanaticism, which have pervaded our ranks for the last two years. For this we praise our good Lord, and tremblingly hope that they may so remain, daily growing in grace and in the knowledge of our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ, till the Lord shall come.

In Adams I labored in company with Bro. S. Bragg, about four weeks. Some embraced the truth and are now looking for Jesus. In Copenhagen I preached three weeks; held meetings every evening but two. Some that never before had heard upon the advent, came out to hear,—some were converted to the truth as it is in Jesus and are waiting his coming from heaven—but the great mass of the people are fighting Jesus and his truth. Some of those that became interested under the labors of Bro. Pinney some weeks ago, are now pouring their contempt upon God and his truth, and those too, who occupy a high standing in the professed church of Christ! O, how true, that truth proves a savor of life unto life, or of death unto death. And again, how true, that when truth and light are rejected, it brings darkness, and ruin follows in its train.

From thence we went to Martinsburg. We held a few meetings with them and the Lord was with us. At Watson I spent two evenings with Bro. Bates—the last one, there were six forward for prayers; two or three found the Savior precious to their souls, and the others were resolved to be for God. The work is going on well under the labors of our devoted brother. May God give him strength and wisdom to labor for his glory. O how needful that the heralds of the cross be deeply embued with the Holy Ghost, and the wisdom which comes from God; and how important that all who are looking for Jesus should be child-like and Christ-like, and daily ripening for the kingdom of God. Soon it will come, and who shall be able to stand when he appeareth? The saint upon whom is found the spotless robe of Christ: he, and he alone, will stand amid the conflagrations of the last great day, and with admiration, behold the heavens and earth as they pass away to be here no more.

Yours in expectation of soon witnessing this happy yet solemn scene,
C. R. GRIGGS.

OWEGO, N. Y., Jan. 30.

It may perhaps help to strengthen and confirm the brethren that the end of all things is at hand, to mention that Dr. W., Presbyterian minister, Owego, has preached three sermons to show that there must be a temporal millennium before Jesus can come. I will give his own words, as I took them down at the time. The text was Rev. xx. 6—'Blessed and holy is he that hath part in the first resurrection.' We do not believe that this means a resurrection of the body from the grave, but a spiritual resurrection from nature to grace, from sin to holiness—then the earth shall be full of the knowledge of the Lord, when God shall pour out his spirit on all flesh. He may enable men to convert men by millions: then kings shall be thy nursing fathers and queens thy nursing mothers; there shall be no premature deaths then—deaths will be few and rare—peace shall then prevail—their children shall be all taught of God in the millennium—their children shall be all kings and priests to God, and they shall reign with Christ a thousand years; they will be born in sin, but early raised to spiritual life—no disease in their crops, no murrain among their cattle—in fact, it will be Christ's harvest—souls shall be gathered in: all nations, kindreds, tongues and people, shall be his in the first resurrection. He has been dashing the nations in pieces, but then He will gather all nations to himself. These days are begun; men may do much to hasten these glorious days by joining together in aiding Bible and missionary societies: the Jews also must possess their own land before Christ can come, &c. &c. Enough to show how blind these men are, saying peace and safety, when sudden destruction shall come upon them.

Our faith is strong, and we believe all things are now fulfilled, so that the blessed Jesus may come at any time.
A. NISBET.

NORTH YARMOUTH, Feb. 16.

AT THE DOOR.—Bro. Marsh: As time yet lingers, I feel a desire to give my testimony in favor of the views expressed by you in relation to the time of the advent being near, 'even at the doors.' This view to me looks as clear as the light of the sun at mid-day. I believe this view of the subject to be the only one made known in the Bible on which we can rest with unwavering faith. And how evident it is, that in order to possess true faith we must have a foundation for that faith that cannot be shaken.

I know some speak and write against such a faith, and no doubt honestly think they desire something more tangible. They want a faith that will lay hold on some particular time, and such ones think perhaps that those who take the ground first named are not walking in God's truth. In all kindness and love I wish to ask such brethren what views they would have us take of the Savior's instructions, as quoted by you in your articles on the time of the advent? It seems to me the Lord Jesus has given us all the information we need. If we lay hold on this with increasing, unwavering faith, trusting in God, we need not fear of falling away or of being found off our watch when our Lord shall come. O, brethren, let us walk every moment by this faith, keep all the Lord's commandments, and when He shall appear, we shall also appear with Him in glory!

R. R. YORK.

CALAIR, VL, Jan. 25.

The cause of our coming Redeemer is progressing in this vicinity. The saints, all the scattered and persecuted, are looking up and saying, 'Come Lord Jesus!' I have lately attended three conferences: one in Williamstown, one in Bethel and one in Strafford. I found the brethren cut down but not forsaken of the Lord. Those who once gave them the word of life, had left them a prey for the wild beasts. The saints gathered in from the different towns, and the Lord blessed them. Several wanderers came again to Father's house. One sinner found mercy, and gave God the glory. The meetings were well attended: the weeping spirit fell on all present, and there are signs of good yet being done in that vicinity. The harvest is truly great and faithful laborers are few. I hope the dear brethren will remember that those watchmen who cry day and night, and families to feed, need some of the Lord's fullness; 'the earth is the Lord's and the fullness thereof.'
S. W. THURBER.

CHICKOPEE FALLS, MASS., Jan. 22.

I do feel very grateful to my heavenly Father for what he has done and is still doing for some dear souls in this place. There have been very recently three converted to God, and they are looking for and hasting unto the coming of the blessed Lord. There are a few of us in this place who are striving to 'enter in at the strait gate.' The Lord has been with us, and still is with us, and has promised to be with us to the end. Two weeks since Bro. L. Boutell preached the word to us: a few weeks since Bro. Thompson fed us with meat in due season. The Lord rewarded them for their labor of love. O, my heart says 'praise the Lord; let every thing that hath breath praise his holy name.' I expect soon, very soon, if faithful, to meet all of the faithful in God's everlasting kingdom, to go no more out for ever. O, what a blessed hope is ours!

EMILY L. A. HEMENWAY.

FLEMINGVILLE, N. Y., Jan. 24.

I find a number, and even some ministers, who, I think, love the appearing of Christ, who cannot reconcile the 39th chapter of Ezekiel with the common advent faith, and yet do not believe in the old millennium doctrine. Will some competent brother give the true light of that chapter, and also the 62d verse of the 14th chapter of Mark? Did Christ mean those high priests that he then spoke to? and how shall they see him coming in the clouds of heaven? W. BRINK.

NORTHFIELD, Mass., Jan. 31.

We have had a conference here, which commenced Feb. 21st, and held over the Sabbath, and a heavenly time it was! the truth of God had a good effect. Bro. L. Boutell and W. Pratt were here, and truth prevailed over error. In short, the church here are strong in God. The last evening one soul was born again; so we see the Lord is ready to save all that will come unto him.
ANSON GAGE.

HORNBY, N. Y., Feb. 3.

The brethren here are steadfast and have been growing in grace since our conference in Nov. last. We meet every Lord's day to talk of the kingdom that we expect soon to inherit, and pray for the Holy Spirit to direct and keep us in this time of trial, and we feel that God hears and meets with us, and we are looking daily for the realization of our hope.

LETTER FROM BRO. J. R. GATES.
WATERBURY, VT., FEB. 10th, 1847.

Dear Bro. Marsh:—I have fulfilled my appointments, and am now at Waterbury, Vt., on my return home. I have visited and preached to the brethren at Derby Line, Glynes Corners, Barnston, Hatley, Bolton, Farnham, Shefford and Dunham Flats, and Canada East: found them looking steadfastly for the Lord and expecting very soon to see 'the King in his beauty.' I went from Dunham to Richford, Vt., and commenced a conference Thursday, Feb. 9th. Friday morning I was taken with a severe attack of pleurisy, combined with rheumatism, which so prostrated me, I was unable to attend meeting till Sabbath morning, when I preached an advent ordination sermon from these words: 'I have set watchmen upon thy walls, O Jerusalem,' etc. Bro. John Porter, of Waterloo, C. E., and Bro. Jonathan Cummings, of Troy, Vt., were then set apart for the ministry.

I have candidly read the views of some of our brethren upon definite time, and am of opinion, 1st. That the prophetic periods have not terminated as yet. 2d. That they must terminate about this time—and 3d. That your position, 'nigh, even at the doors,' is the true and only safe one; it honors God and is adapted to the capacity of all his creatures.

Yours in hope of speedy redemption,
I. R. GATES.

LETTER FROM BRO. B. B. BRIGHAM.
NORTH PLAINS, Mich., Jan. 23d, 1847.

BRO. MARSH—The Voice of Truth seems a medium by which the scattered flock, the few and far between, can meet sympathetically and mingle their desires and prayers while hastening unto the coming of our Lord Jesus. Not only our Savior endured the cross, despising the shame, but both Old and New Testament saints had trial of cruel mockings, were destitute and afflicted, were made a gazing stock both by reproaches and by becoming companions of them that were so used. Those who are to reign with Christ must here on earth suffer with him—not through popular applause but through much tribulation we enter the kingdom. Neither is it a cause of rejoicing when all men speak well of us, but when they shall revile and persecute for righteousness sake. A crown of righteousness is not for those who hate, but for those who love the appearing of Christ. Not unto them who close their eyes lest they should see evidences that he is nigh, but unto them that look for him will he appear the second time unto salvation. To confess Christ and his word was given as a test of discipleship; those who are ashamed or deny him and his words, he will deny.

It is in this region a dry place and weary land. No watchman that can tell us of the night, or whether the sun of righteousness is soon to rise, or if his glory beaming star yet gilds the mountain tops of our benighted land. The Christian Herald, (a Baptist paper,) for a long time past mentions no revival or protracted meeting in the State. The editor, in his recent prospectus, speaks of aiming at a 'Scriptural revival of religion.' His readers understand his italics to imply that past revivals have not been Scriptural—he is certainly not alone in his opinion. If so, the church is filled with such as have a strong delusion, that they should believe they are Christians when they are not. Awful consideration! May the eyes of the great ones be opened that they may see what means are used in 'Scriptural revivals of religion.' Not many wise men after the flesh, not many mighty, not many noble; but foolish, weak, base, despised, and things that are not, has God chosen to bring to nought things that are; and hides from the wise and prudent, things that he reveals to babes.

That D. D. at the present day signifies the same as Rabbi 1800 years ago, is confirmed by their own definitions. Its common usage in their religious communications is evidence conclusive that they love to be called so. To believe that such can escape the damnation of hell, is no less false than Universalism. Rabbi sits in the temple of God, showing himself lord over God's heritage, making void the word of God by creeds and traditions of men, and blinds the minds of them that believe not, lest the light of the glorious gospel of Christ should shine unto them. But the hail shall soon sweep away the refuge of lies, and the waters overflow the hiding places, when the overflowing scourge shall pass through the land.

In haste I close, expecting soon to hear, as it were, the voice of a great multitude—of many waters—of mighty thunderings, saying: 'The marriage of the Lamb is come, and his wife has made herself ready.' B. B. BRIGHAM.

VERGENNES, Vt. Feb. 5.

We closed an interesting conference at Essex, Vt., last Sunday evening. Like other meetings of the kind it proved an occasion of revival to the waiting children who attended. I wish such meetings were more general through the land. Satan is doing his last work 'in great wrath' and how should we stand? May the great judgment tell that we 'kept God's word and denied not his name,' in that 'awful hour of temptation'—that 'for his name's sake we labored' for one another's good, and fainted not—so that from his lips may descend the blessed welcome, 'enter into the joy of thy Lord.'

Bro. Himes gave us several interesting lectures through this section recently, the result of which is manifestly good, not only with the advent brethren, but several professors who are not with us in our views of the speedy termination of prophecy, were much edified, and some expressed the expectation of Christ's personal advent as their only hope. God speed him and all his faithful servants on their way, till labors and conflicts shall be exchanged for ceaseless rest.

From the Boston Traveler.

Highly Important News from Germany.

We are indebted to Rev. Dr. Baird, who came passenger in the Cambria, for a copy of a "London Universe," of the 29th of January, which contains intelligence from Germany which is of the deepest interest and importance—namely, that the King of Prussia is about to extend to a liberal degree, the religious liberty of his kingdom, and to give to his people the long expected Constitution.

The King of Prussia will, in a few days, issue an edict, or law, granting a very large measure of religious liberty to his kingdom—a measure quite as large as could possibly be expected in the present condition of things in that kingdom, especially under the maintenance, and even the existence of the Prussian National Church.

In a very few weeks the long-expected Constitution will be given by the King of Prussia, and the States-general of the kingdom will be convoked to carry it into effect. This body, it is decided, will be the union of all the provincial assemblies in the kingdom—eight in number. This is a great movement, and may be followed, and doubtless will be, by the most important consequences. May God give wisdom and guidance to all who take part in it! If Prussia should succeed in establishing a wise and good constitutional government, it will be a great thing for humanity entire, and especially for the whole German people. We shall watch closely both the movements alluded to above, and give our readers the earliest and most authentic information respecting them, which may come to our hands. They are movements to which no Christian—no friend of human liberty and human rights—live where he may—can be indifferent. We are approaching momentous times. Great and extensive changes in the state of the world, are not far in advance of us—or we are wholly mistaken. Come what may, let us hold fast to the true source of consolation and of confidence: "The Lord reigneth: let the earth rejoice, let the multitude of the isles be glad thereof."

POPERY AND THE BIBLE.—In the year 1833, a poor family in Ireland, of the name of M'Gennis, was greatly distressed by the painful illness of a young girl, who, after lingering some time, gave signs of approaching dissolution. She was attended by the priests of the Romish church, to which the family belonged, one of whom discovered, shortly before her decease, that she had repaired for support and comfort in her affliction to a forbidden source. In the wretched hut was a Bible, which the sufferer had received as a reward, at a Protestant minister's free school; and the priest commanded that it should be instantly destroyed. The dying girl shuddered; the aged parent entreated that the book might be spared; but he was inexorable, and demanded that it should be burned in his presence. The father now declared that it should not be done under his roof; and the incensed priest, rushing from the hut with the Bible in his hand, placed it upon a fire of turf, kindled in the open air, and thus deliberately destroyed it in the day-time, in the presence of numbers, and in the high road! Nor is this a solitary case.—Errors of the Times SLAVERY.—We translate the following from "La-Patria," the Spanish paper published at New Orleans. "In an account of slavery recently published in a Paris magazine, which we have before us, we find the present number of slaves in the Western Hemisphere, to be as follows:

In the Spanish Colonies,	500,000
" French do	250,000
" Holland, Danish and Swiss do	100,000
" South American Republics,	100,000
" Brazil,	3,000,000
" United States,	3,000,000
	7,250,000

Bury not your faculties in the sepulchre of idleness, but those endowments wherewith Providence hath any ways enriched you, let prudence always manage; and evermore endeavor to secure every minute to a commendable, sober, or pious employment.

MEETINGS IN ROCHESTER.

Our meetings in this city, are held three times on the Sabbath, also Tuesday and Friday evenings, in Shaw's New Brick Block, on the side of the River, corner of Main and Stone streets; entrance from Stone street. The Lord's Supper will be administered in the afternoon of the first Sabbath of every month.

APPOINTMENT.

BRO. P. A. Smith appoints to be with the brethren at Le Roy, Sabbath, the 21st instant.

Day of Retribution.

Let the seventh angel sound on high—
Let shouts be heard throughout the sky:
Kings of the earth, with glad accord,
Give up your kingdoms to the Lord.

Almighty God thy powers assume,
Who wast and art and art to come—
Jesus the Lamb who once was slain,
For ever live, for ever reign.

The angry nations fret and roar,
That they can slay the saints no more—
On wings of vengeance thies our God,
To pay the long arrears of blood!

Now must the rising dead appear,
Now the decisive sentence hear!
Now the dear martyrs of the Lord,
Receive an infinite reward.

[We have received several numbers of the Watchman of the Valley, a Presbyterian paper, published in Cincinnati, O., containing a series of letters from Charles Beecher, to his brother, H. W. Beecher, on the Pre-millennial Advent of Christ, and the Return of the Jews according to the flesh, to the land of Palestine, at or near the time of the advent, &c.—We design to select from these letters such portions as have a direct bearing on the pre-millennial advent. At another time we may notice those which relate to the other question. We commence with the first letter in the series.]

Pre-millennial Advent.

BY CHARLES BEECHER.

Eighteen hundred years ago there lived a man upon the soil of Palestine, whose whole career was an inexplicable enigma to the generation in which he appeared.

Himself the centre of all prophetic oracles, he yet seemed to reverse every expectation prophecy had created. Probably no man ever excited such intense and universal expectations. Certainly no man ever so completely changed expectation into bitter disappointment. The nation and the world expected a conqueror and a king. They received only an executed convict, an expiatory sacrifice.

Yet the results of that first appearing, humble as it was, and utterly subversive of the wishes of a world, have developed themselves for ages, and are yet shaking all nations.

If then, a second advent of that same singular personage be nigh, how much greater disappointment of a nation's, yea, a world's anticipation, may it not involve! How much more tremendous consequences may it not produce!

That that "same Jesus shall so come in like manner as they saw him go up into heaven," we distinctly believe. And if that coming should prove to be the beginning and the cause of millennial prosperity, while the universal church are thinking it only the consummation and the close, would not their astonishment exceed that of the church, before his first appearing?

And if that first appearing, without splendor, without judicial authority, without the manifest assertion of regal power among the nations, has wrought results of wonder, what results might not ensue, should millennial hours be ushered in, not only by the mighty movings of the Holy Ghost, but by earthquake shock, and trumpet note,—by the flaming apocalypse of Him whose face is as the lightning, conveyed by angels of his might, descending with the clouds of Heaven, to stand upon the Mount of Olives.

And if to the previous expectations of the Jewish mind the after developments of the gospel dispensation were a mystery, inscrutable, into which scarce the prophetic gaze of an Apostle might penetrate, how much more may the developments of the regal era, the millennial reign, be expected to be a mystery to the professing church and to the world, until the very splendors of the day itself flash upon their startled eyes.

But is that second coming of the Son of Man, so nigh at hand? Is it, in other words, the commencement and the cause, or the climax and the product of the millennium? This is the simple question now in the providence of God, first claiming the solemn attention of the churches. That He shall return in majesty to judge the earth, we all believe: "For God hath appointed a day in which he will judge the world in righteousness by that MAN whom he hath ordained." The simple question where we differ, is

WHEN?

To the answer of this question, I believe the church is solemnly called. Do you say that it is in vain to pry into unfulfilled prophecy? There is a mode of interrogating prophecy, I am aware, in regard to days and hours and minute details, which savors of presumption. But such is not the nature of this great inquiry. It is a subject on the contrary upon which the church has already pronounced; upon which the popular strain of modern preaching has uttered oracular decision. And it is no longer a question whether it be a legitimate subject of opinion, but which of two opinions already formed and boldly expressed, is legitimate?

It will be my object in succeeding letters, to show by Scriptural argument, that the coming of Christ to judgment is Pre-millennial; and consequently near at hand. In prosecuting which intention, I pray that the Holy Spirit may grant me aid, and enable me to exhibit his mind and will, contained in Scripture, as to arouse attention and inflame the ardor of all true believers, to prepare for the coming of their Lord. And I pray God that our whole soul, and spirit, and body, be preserved blameless unto the coming of our Lord.

Day of Judgment!

For the great day of his wrath is come, and who shall be able to stand?—Rev. vi. 17.

What a solemn day is about to rush in upon us! The apostle says, speaking of that day, 'As I live saith the Lord, every knee shall bow to me, and every tongue shall confess to God. So then every one of us shall give account of himself to God.' All will then, willingly prostrate themselves before God and confess their wickedness, but alas! too late! No Savior nor mercy at that late hour! The harvest is past—no mercy's door to open—it is closed forever!

Again, says the apostle, in that day 'God shall judge the secrets of men by Jesus Christ, according to my gospel.' Says our Savior on this point, 'There is nothing covered that shall not be revealed, and hid that shall not be known.' Let us hear him again, 'But I say unto you, that every idle word that man shall speak he shall give account thereof in the day of judgment: for by thy words thou shalt be justified, and by thy words thou shalt be condemned.' 'Rejoice, O young man in thy youth, and let thy heart cheer thee in the days of thy youth, and walk in the ways of thine heart and in the sight of thine eyes: but know thou, that for all these things God will bring thee into judgment; for God shall bring every work into judgment, with every secret thing, whether it be good or whether it be evil.' Viewing the subject in this light shall we not be led to inquire, Shall I be able to stand the test in that solemn day? If we look into the sure word, we shall find there will be many expecting to be saved who will find themselves mistaken, and will be so much surprised at their own deception, that they will plead for admittance into the kingdom on account of their wonderful works. Hear our Lord on this point: 'Not every one that saith unto me, Lord, Lord, shall enter into the kingdom of heaven; but he that doeth the will of my Father which is in heaven. Many will say unto me in that day, Lord, Lord, have we not prophesied in thy name, and in thy name have cast out devils, and in thy name done many wonderful works? And then will I profess unto them, I know you not; depart from me ye that work iniquity.' Here we see many professors of religion, and those who have in the name of the Lord done wonders, even to the casting out of devils, will be cast off in that day. Says the objector, 'these persons were never converted; if they had been they would never have fallen.' Why not? angels fell—our first parents fell—and the Jews were broken off on the account of unbelief! Paul speaks of those who had made shipwreck of their faith, and had overthrown the faith of others. Now if any man abide not in the vine by living faith till Christ comes, he will be cast forth as a branch, and I fear, found among those crying 'Lord, Lord, open unto us'—we have done many good things. But, says the Lord, 'I know you not.' W. P.

Are the Dead Conscious?

In considering this question, I desire continually to bear in mind that important truth in Psa. cxix. 89—'For ever, O Lord, thy word is settled in heaven.' Hence for me to give rein to 'the unbelieving zeal of nature' and contend for my understanding of that word, or any portion of it, would be folly in the extreme. While 'we know in part' our views of truth will necessarily be imperfect, yet we may collect the clear, literal, positive testimony on any Bible question, with the certainty of finding a manifest preponderance one way or the other; because there is in reality but one side to any such question. Now, since God has caused something to be written in his book on the state of the dead, it is, therefore, a lawful investigation to search it out, and try to understand it.

In the first place—it is evident from the Bible, that the dead are not to be rewarded or punished until their resurrection. Christ assures those who shall make a feast for the poor (who cannot recompense them) that they shall be recompensed at the resurrection of the just. [Luke xiv. 14.] He also says, 'They that have done good shall come forth unto the resurrection of life, but they that have done evil unto the resurrection of damnation.' [John v. 29.] We have also the testimony of Paul in 2 Cor. v. 10—'For we must all appear before the judgment-seat of Christ; that every one may receive the things done in his body, according to that he hath done, whether it be good or bad.' Heb. ix. 27, 28—'And it is appointed unto men once to die, but after this the judgment; so Christ was once offered to bear the sins of many; and unto them that look for him shall he appear the second time, without sin, unto salvation.' 2 Tim. iv. 1—'I charge thee therefore before God, and the Lord Jesus Christ, who shall judge the quick and the dead at his appearing and his kingdom.' Here we have the doctrine that the judgment which comes after death, comes not until the appearing and kingdom of Christ.

Again: At the sounding of the seventh trumpet the saints shall be rewarded; [Rev. xi. 18,] but this is not until the dead are raised, [2 Cor. xv. 52,] at the coming of Christ. [Rev. xxii. 12.] Many other passages might be quoted on this point, but let these suffice with a remark or two: Job, David and Paul do not speak of receiving their reward until their Redeemer stands upon the earth at the latter day—they see his face in righteousness—be made like him—and receive their crown at his appearing. [Job xix. 23; Psa. xvii. 15; 2 Tim. iv. 8.] Abraham and all who have 'died in faith not having received the promises,' will not obtain their reward until they 'obtain that world [which is to come in the restitution of all things] and the resurrection from the dead'—because the world is promised to them: Rom. iv. 13—'For the promise, that he should be the heir of the world, was not to Abraham, or to his seed, through the law, but through the righteousness of faith.' Gal. iii. 29—'And if ye be Christ's, then are ye Abraham's seed, and heirs according to the promise'—and they are now sleeping in its dust. Isa. xxvi. 19—'Thy dead men shall live, together with my dead body shall they arise; awake and sing, ye that dwell in dust: for thy dew is as the dew of herbs, and the earth shall cast out the dead.'

The dead, ~~thou~~ have not yet come into possession of their reward: where, then, are they, and what is their state? That they are not in heaven the following passages prove: John iii. 13—'And no man hath ascended up to heaven, but he that came down from heaven, even the Son of man which is in heaven.' Also Peter, in his pentecost sermon, declares that 'David is not ascended into the heavens:' but 'is both dead and buried, and his sepulchre is with us unto this day.'—Acts ii. 29, 34. Dan. xii. 2, seems to teach that all, both righteous and wicked, are sleeping in the dust of the earth, and that many of them [all whose names are found written in the book] will awake when the time for their reward shall have come. Also, John v. 28, 29, teaches, that both righteous and wicked are in their graves, and will not come forth from them until called by the voice of the Son of man. The language of the Bible in describing the state of the righteous dead, is, that 'They also which sleep in Jesus will God bring with him.' 1 Thes. iv. 13, 14.—'We are then informed how it will be done: 'The Lord himself shall descend from heaven with a shout, with the voice of the archangel and the trump of God, and the dead—shall rise.' How much this sounds like waking up the sleepers. All is appropriate—the morning has come—the Sun of righteousness has arisen—the shout, the voice and the trumpet is heard—'tis time to arise and sing. God calls, and Job answers from his hiding place in the grave—David awakes with the divine likeness—takes one of the harps of God and joins the immortal choir—Daniel stands up to receive his lot—Paul, with all them also that love his appearing, puts on immortality—a crown of righteousness!

Also the state of the righteous, dead and living, is compared to sleeping and waking: 1 Thes. v. 10—'Who died for us, that, whether we wake or sleep, we should live together with him.' 1 Cor. xv. 51—'Behold, I shew you a mystery: We shall not all sleep, but we shall all be changed.' Now if the term 'wake' or waking, perfectly describes the state of the living, does not the term sleep or sleeping as perfectly describe the state of the dead? And as the sound sleep of a healthy person is a dreamless sleep, so we may infer that those who sleep in Jesus, sleep soundly and sweetly. We have no account that Jesus of Nazareth was ever sick, or that he ever dreamed; but that he slept in perfect unconsciousness while the ship in which he lay was tossed upon the boisterous deep. (See Mark iv.) Tradition and a certain kind of philosophy may not agree with this view, but I think they cannot disprove it. The Bible first—philosophy afterwards—and the traditions of men last,—and we shall be less liable to look at the truth through a distorted and a distorting medium. That there are apparent difficulties and objections connected with this subject, I will not deny; but will consider some of them, if the Lord will, at a future time. B. MONLEY.

Distress of Nations.

When our Lord told us that there should be distress and perplexity of nations foreshadowing his coming, he did not design to leave his people to conjecture and doubt as to the particular season or character of such realities. No! Palpable as other indications, marked and manifest as other fulfillments of his word, would this be, and readily discerned and understood by his simple and believing children. Such a cloud of adversity as now spreads gloom and despondency over the nations of Europe (in particular) has not darkened the world for ages. See France, containing near double the population of the United States, aghast at the gaunt presence of famine! Populous Flanders, Prussia, Hungary, North of Scotland, Ireland, and smaller continental States, together comprising a larger population than the whole of North and South America—still more miserable! The forebodings of monetary crises and commercial stagnation, are exhibited daily in the columns of the press, both in France and Britain: low, deep mutterings of approaching conflict between nation and nation begin to be heard; disasters on the land and sea, by fire, and storm, and tempest, are multiplying: The first thing the King of the French mentions in his speech is the nation's distress! The first thing the Queen of Britain names is distress!! Yes; and the cloud still darkens, portentous of hastening judgment! He who sees not in these calamities tokens of the swiftly approaching downfall of the thrones and dominions of earth, and the introduction of Messiah's reign, is blind! Oh! the multitude of the Watchmen are blind!! and had I a voice to reach each minister's ear in the land, I would proclaim 'He who sees not the Lord's coming just at hand is blind!! Better to perish by hunger and disease than endure Jehovah's frowns! Oh! reader, realize if you can the fact, that the great God, the maker and sustainer and Emperor of the universe, is about to visit this earth! Watch and pray always, that you may be accounted worthy to step the things coming to pass and to abide the stupendous scene!

H. HEVES.

P. S. I have been favored with the perusal of some New York daily papers, containing the latest foreign news. The suffering now existing, has no parallel since the destruction of Jerusalem, and is far more extensive. I hope you will publish extracts in the Voice.

Qualifications for the Kingdom of God.

Isa. lxii. 6, 7—'I have set watchmen upon thy walls, O Jerusalem, which shall never hold their peace day nor night: ye that make mention of the Lord keep not silence; and give him no rest, till he make Jerusalem a praise in the earth.'

This is one of the prophecies which declare that before the saints of God shall be glorified, there shall be a class of men called to the work by the spirit of God, who will proclaim to the church and the world the coming of Christ. The 10th verse, gives us the work of these watchmen, 'Go through, go through the gates; prepare the way of the people; cast up, cast up the highway; gather out the stones; lift up a standard for the people.' In the 11th verse we have the message—these watchmen will proclaim: 'Behold, the Lord hath proclaimed unto the end of the world, Say ye to the daughter of Zion, Behold, thy salvation cometh; behold, his reward is with him, and his work (margin, recompence) before him.'

Here we have a clear and exact description of the sacred advent movement, for the last few years. It stands forth as an indisputable fact in evidence, that this movement is of God, and that those who have engaged in this work were called of God: we learn also, that however much a corrupt and fallen church may desire and even expect that the voice of these messengers of God will be hushed in silence, still the word of God assures us that they shall never hold their peace, until Jerusalem be made a praise in the earth—until Christ shall come and reward his people.

My object in presenting this subject is to address those who are or have been engaged in this work of warning the world of its approaching destruction, and preparing the hearts of the children of God to meet their judge and king. There are two classes of these men: those who are now doing and have been doing all that they can, and those who have engaged heartily in this work in time past, but now have slackened in their efforts or ceased altogether to cry out in the ears of the world, 'Behold he cometh with clouds, and every eye shall see him.'

To the first class there is every encouragement to go forward and continue faithfully in this work that God has assigned you, and glory, immortality and eternal life, shall be yours in the kingdom of God.

But I wish more particularly to say a few words to the second class: how many there are in this situation, God only knows,—but we do know that some whose voices were once lifted up with strength, in proclaiming to Zion the speedy return of her King, are now doing but little or nothing in this great work. The first question we would ask such individuals is, whether in their labors in the past, while going through the land proclaiming the message, they were called of God? Let this question be decided at once from the light that God's word and providence in connection with the spirit afford you. If the Lord did not call you to the work, who did? The enemies of our glorious hope will tell you that it was the devil. Then Satan would be divided against himself. That Satan has endeavored to entrap and ensnare those watchmen that God has placed upon the walls of Zion, there can be no doubt. That some have fallen beyond the hope of recovery, we know. That some have been so far seduced by this arch enemy as to cease their labors, and no longer trouble Satan's kingdom with this message, is also true; but that Satan ever called a man to this work, I cannot believe. You went because you felt the duty so strongly impressed upon your mind that you could not rest until you had discharged it—you then thought it the voice of God. If you are satisfied that God did not call you, then you ought to confess it to the world, and repent of it before God. Are you prepared for such a position? If on the contrary, you decide you were called of God, where is your authority to cease in this work? God has said those whom he would call to the work, shall never hold their peace day nor night, until he make Jerusalem a praise in the earth. It is the sole and only business of these watchmen to ceaselessly cry out in the ears of the church and world, the coming of Christ. But, say you, I must labor for the support of my family, and therefore I cannot give myself up to this work. If God has ever called you to this work, this must be the talent committed to you, which, if you neglect to improve, you may meet the doom of the slothful servant; where much is given much will be required, and no plea of worldly policy or interest will avail in the great day of account. Obey God and leave the consequences with him—he has promised to provide for your necessities if you trust in him. That the advent brethren have failed in bestowing the Lord's goods in their hands in many cases on the needy preacher, is true; but the preacher is some to blame for not urging home this duty on the brethren and holding up the sin of covetousness in its true light. We have shown in our former articles on this subject, the guilt of hoarding up the treasures of earth; but we would now solemnly ask all of the preachers in the advent ranks, whether they have held up this sin—exposed its delusive influences and its fatal tendencies as they ought? Surely if you have not faithfully discharged your duty on this point, the blood of souls ruined by this sin may be found in your skirts. But, says one, there is now a sufficiency of laborers in the field, and those are but little regarded. But has not God said it should be so, that his watchmen should be but little regarded? Christ was beloved on but by a few, yet his labors were incessant in preaching his own gospel. Peter and Paul and the other apostles were able to gain but a few despised converts to the faith of Jesus, yet they labored on, unwearied by all the difficulties they had to encounter; and shall we, in these last days, when iniquity abounds and unbelief prevails, expect to be more successful than Christ himself and the early apostles? They fainted not, but toiled on though dangers and death stood in their pathway: let us imitate their example and cease not in our efforts till the Master calls us home.

To know if the field is fully occupied, let us look at God's message for his watchmen, and then turn to the world and see if it has been given in every place that God has required: Isa. xl. 1, 2—'Comfort ye, comfort ye my people, saith your God: speak ye comfortably to Jerusalem, and cry unto her, that her warfare is accomplished, that her iniquity is pardoned: for she hath received of the Lord's hand doubly for all her sins.' Whereby shall we comfort God's people? By proclaiming the return of their King: 5th verse—'And the glory of the Lord shall be revealed, and all flesh shall see it together; for the mouth of the Lord hath spoken it.' By whom shall the Lord speak? By his watchmen: 9th verse—'O thou that tellest good tidings to Zion (margin) get thee up into the high mountain—O thou that tellest good tidings to Jerusalem (margin) lift up thy voice with strength; lift it up, be not afraid: say unto the cities of Judah, Behold your God, behold the Lord God will come with a strong hand, and his arm shall rule for him; behold his reward is with him and his work before him.' When is this message to be given? When the people of God are about to be glorified by the coming of Christ. To whom is it to be given? To the daughters of Zion—to the Christian church. How far is the message to go forth? Unto the end of the world. Is there any intimation that God would have the watchmen hold their peace until the glory of Zion shall be consummated? No: for God tells them to get up into the high mountain—to lift up their voices with strength, to be not afraid, and to never hold their peace until Jerusalem be made a praise in the earth. Now has this message been delivered unto all of the daughters of Zion? I think not. To be sure the sound has gone forth unto the ends of the earth; but a vast multitude have never heard the reasons of our hope. God must have designed that his people should be comforted, by having the reasons of their speedy redemption spread out before them; for how can the doctrine of the speedy coming of Christ comfort them unless they believe it? and how can they believe without the evidence? and how shall they see the evidence unless the faithful watchmen present it unto them? Let us remember our own former darkness, and not condemn those who have not had the evidences of our hope presented to them, of willful blindness.

Let us look first to our own country. In New England we find the tidings have been extensively circulated. But has every town and church been visited by this comforting messenger? We pass on to the Middle States: here too we have considered the work to have been general—but let us stop and point you to one case of destitution in Western New York—we refer to that part between Lockport and Rochester. We find Medina and Albion, considerable villages on the canal, besides other smaller ones. In them are no companies of the waiting saints. Why do we find advent bands in Rochester, Lockport and Buffalo? The answer is plain: these places have had a faithful presentation of the reasons of our hope. On the other hand, but little effort has ever been made in the former places—consequently, the saints of God in those places have not been and are not now comforted by the welcome tidings of the speedy return of Zion's King. Yet God's voice is ringing in the ears of his watchmen, to lift up their voices with strength, and to say unto the cities of Judah or Christendom, behold your God! We pass on to the Western States, and how faintly has the light dawned upon the people. We pass on to the Southern States, and in that dark charnel-house of slavery, we find but faint glimmerings of this glorious light. Surely God has a people in that land of abominable wickedness, or long ere this they would have met the fate of Sodom for their sins: and if a people there, God requires us to comfort them, by proclaiming the coming of Christ. We will not stop in Catholic Mexico, nor the Catholic nations of South America, neither will we look at Asia and Africa shrouded in the darkness of Mohammedanism and paganism, nor Catholic Europe—in them all we may find work for us to do. But we will turn to a nation speaking our own language, the kingdom of Great Britain. There we will find a vast multitude whose ears have not been saluted by the voices of those who are bringing good tidings to Zion.

My dear brother, have you left the walls of Zion, and is the trumpet of alarm feebly sounding in your hands? If so you cannot be guiltless while so large a field of labor is unoccupied both in our own and other countries. Excuse not yourselves by the plea that you must spend your time in earning your food and clothing, for there is enough of this world's property in the hands of his servants to supply all your wants. If ever called of God to this work, the word of God to you now is: To lift up thy voice with strength, lift it up and be not afraid, and to cry out, Behold the Lord God will come with a strong arm, to reward his children and to destroy his enemies.

Time is the most precious, and yet the most brittle jewel we have: it is what every man bids largely for, when he wants it, but squanders it away most lavishly when he has it.

Nigh even at the Door.

BRO. MARSH—It is with a good degree of consolation that I have perused your arguments on 'Nigh even at the Door.' This to me seems to be the prominent doctrine of the Bible. I for one object to the set time proposition, for various reasons. For instance, suppose we fix on March or April, or some other time—even designate the day of the month for the advent of our Lord; bring this to bear on the mind and our faith seems to centre there: consequently, we seem to put away the great and glorious morn when the consummation of all things shall take place—hence the danger of his coming upon us 'as a snare.' While those that believe that, according to the signs of the times, he is 'nigh even at the door,' their faith is centered there, and they are daily and hourly expecting their release.

I believe that we are warranted in the belief that the signs are all about being fulfilled, and the next great event in historical prophecy is the ushering in of the ~~great~~ King. Look at the condition of our world—wars and rumors of wars, distress of nations! When was there ever a time like the present? Look at the old world—scourged with almost every disease, devastation and death. The cholera is destroying its thousands and its hundreds of thousands—famine stalks abroad in Ireland: men, women and children are perishing by hundreds for the want of the necessaries of life. Our own beloved country is also the scene of distress: it is cursed with war, that blight of all human happiness. O how many wives are made widows, and their children fatherless, by this awful scourge brought about by wicked and ungodly men that rule. The sea and waves are roaring—distress upon the land and upon the sea! earthquakes in divers places. Every sane mind must or should discern the signs of the times—they are sure precursors of the near approach of Him whose right it is to reign.

'Nigh even at the door,' yes, how glorious! how consoling the thought that the King of Israel is soon to reign! Then shall the curse be removed, the earth renewed, the tabernacle of God shall be with men. No more distress of nations—no more shall we hear the lamentable cry of poor perishing mortals for bread: no more shall war, pestilence and famine spread their devastating influence over the land: no more shall its inhabitants say I am sick or distressed; but all who are faithful and endure unto the end, will soon bask in its sunshine of glory. O glorious hope!

BRO. M., don't be discouraged; maintain the truth as it is in Jesus. Notwithstanding the labored efforts of some of the writers of the Day Dawn to refute the nigh at the door doctrine. O that we all may be wise, that we may be found watching when the Master shall appear. Let us lift our heads and rejoice, for our redemption draweth nigh. Yes, the resurrection, the consummation of the Christian's hope, is soon to be witnessed!

I would just say to all God's children, prove faithful yet a little while—seek to know the truth—be not carried about by every wind of doctrine taught by those who set themselves up as teachers, and way-marks in Israel; but like the noble Bereans search the Scriptures to see if these things are so, and when you have found the truth, cleave, cling to it with undying grasp. Remember that the Lion of the tribe of Judah is mighty and will prevail. O Lord hasten on the time when righteousness and peace shall take the place of war, pestilence and famine, sin and death.

Voice of Truth & Glad Tidings

"The wise shall understand."

ROCHESTER, MARCH 24, 1847.

CLOSE OF THE VOLUME.

This number closes the present volume of the Voice of Truth. We thank the Lord for being enabled to continue it so long. We still crave his blessings in further prosecuting the work before us, and also the faithful co-operation of all who love the appearing of our Lord. Soon he will come—then if faithful here, we shall be called from labor to our eternal and most glorious reward.

"Protestantism a Failure."

Under this caption, in a recent number of the 'New York Evangelist,' the Editor offers some strictures on the discourse preached in this city, Feb. 14th, by Bro. Himes, on Protestantism now being a failure in the world. What is said about Bro. Himes being a member of the Christian Alliance, his visit to Great Britain, the "object he has to accomplish," and the editor's "pity" for him, we leave for Bro. Himes to notice: he will see that justice is duly administered to that part of the article. That portion which is designed to have a more general bearing on the advent faith, properly falls within the jurisdiction of our notice. We will first hear the Editor of the Evangelist. He says—

"Why does he not openly avow, what his system necessarily supposes, that

THE GOSPEL IS A FAILURE?

The bold doctrine that the gospel has done its work, and failed of effecting a world's deliverance from sin, is the ground already taken by believers in the personal reign, and by Millenarians on this and that side of the ocean. They maintain "that the millennium will never be brought about by the means now used." "They have no faith "in the universality of the gospel dispensation;" in the universal spread of the gospel, until a new dispensation shall be introduced, of which this is but preparatory. They maintain that "the gospel itself furnishes a body of evidence against the idea of universality." They teach "that the binding of Satan will not take place during the present dispensation," that "the world will never be converted by the means now used." Look at the language of one of their number: "I think," he says, "that those who set about this work, with this view, propose to themselves an end that will never be accomplished." Another, speaking of religious societies, says, "To assign to them the instrumentality of bringing in the millennium, I regard as a species of idolatry." Says another, "Not one word was ever said by Christ or his apostles about a great and universal change in the world to be produced by the preaching of the gospel."

These testimonies might be multiplied to any extent. They show that there is, on the part of those who hold the second advent views, a radical unbelief in the adequacy of the gospel to convert the world. They do not believe that the world ever will be converted by the preaching of the gospel. Their position is, that so far as the conversion of the entire world to Christ is concerned, the gospel is and will be a failure.

Consequently, just in proportion as these views gain currency, must the work of missions be retarded and crippled. The very basis on which the system of missions is built, is the promise of God to give the whole world to his Son for an inheritance. The friends of missions believe, that according to the Scriptures, the result is to be brought about by the preaching of the gospel. Convince them that these views are erroneous, and at once you put an end to their scheme. Persuade them that the world never can be converted in this way, that Christ is to come as a great conqueror, and dash the nations in pieces as a potter's vessel, that the wicked are to be destroyed, and the earth peopled by colonies of glorified saints from heaven, who are to accompany the Redeemer at his advent to take possession of their bodies at the resurrection, and you put an end, an effectual end to the enterprises of religious benevolence for the conversion of the world.

Most sincerely, therefore, do we deprecate the prevalence of Millerism, and Millenarianism. Earnestly do we admonish our readers to look at the tendency of these views, before they allow themselves to be carried away by the magnificence of the doctrine of the speedy coming of our Lord, by whomsoever advanced. Most fully do we believe that the gospel is adequate in the fullest degree to remove the evils of sin, as well from the universal world of mankind, as from the individual sinner. Most confidently do we believe that it will yet remove them, and that the earth shall be filled with the glory of the Lord, by the foolishness of preaching. Believing this, we cannot embrace a system which subverts the faith of God's people in these sublime promises and hopes, which makes the word of God of none effect, and gives occasion to the infidel to turn upon the very God of heaven with the sneer—"He began to build, and was not able to finish!"

"THE GOSPEL IS A FAILURE." This is necessarily no more the position of the Pre-millenists than Post-millenists: for the latter no more believe than the former that all will be saved for whom Christ died. Shall the editor of the Evangelist, therefore, and all who agree with him in sentiment, be charged with holding doctrines which, if carried to their legitimate conclusion, would lead to the position that "the gospel is a failure"? This would be unfair: for though they believe that the great mass of the human family will be lost, it does not necessarily follow that they should take the position that the gospel is a failure.

Had the gospel been given to save the whole human race unconditionally, then if any were lost, it would be a failure; but there can be no failure if the great mass are lost, when we understand that the gospel makes salvation conditional. The failure, if any, is in man—there can be none in the gospel: it is "the power of God unto salvation to every one that BELIEVETH." If all would believe, then all would be saved; but the great mass never have and never will believe, and consequently will be lost. So the Presbyterians, so every so-called evangelical sect, and so we believe; and if one is worthy of being charged with making the gospel a failure, all are. We say neither is guilty of the charge.

Again: We think it is not a necessary consequence, as the Evangelist supposes, that as the pre-millennial advent "views gain currency, must the work of missions be retarded and crippled." It does not necessarily follow, that because we are not assured that all for whom we labor, will appreciate or be benefited by our labors, that "an end, an effectual end" is put to all benevolent enterprises to save some. If so, then Christ and the Apostles should have put an end to the gospel dispensation: for they knew that all for whom they labored would not be saved. And certainly the missionary "scheme" should long since have ended: for it has aimed, we suppose, at the conversion of the world long before this day, but disappointment has been its lot. Paul did all in his power that he "might by all means save some." Whether the editor of the Evangelist, and all the sects, missionary and benevolent societies included, do or do not act on the apostolical principle of trying "by all means to save some"—it is an undeniable fact that they have all acted on this very principle: for they have been trying to "save some." But because they have been the means of saving comparatively but a few of the great mass, they have not charged each other, nor been charged by any but Universalists and scoffing infidels, with making "the gospel a failure," nor of putting "an end, an effectual end" to missionary and benevolent enterprises. These charges as justly belong to every one of the sects, to Paul, to his fellow apostles, and to the Son of God, as to those against whom they are preferred by the editor of the Evangelist: it is unjust to prefer them against either.

Whatever effect the pre-millennial advent faith, in the estimation of others; may have upon its believers, it is an undeniable fact, that according to their numbers and wealth, no people have done as much as they have, since they came into this faith, for the cause of home and foreign missions. And they are moved to these acts of benevolence, by the very doctrine, of saving "some," and which the Evangelist repudiates, and warns its readers to beware of. The opposite doctrine is one of peace and safety, and as a matter of course will not move its believers to do all they can that they "might by all means save some."

We have the promise and oath of God (Num xiv 21) to justify the hope that the earth will be filled with the glory of God. But, that it will be thus filled "by the foolishness of preaching," we cannot believe on the unqualified though positive assertion of the editor of the Evangelist, nor on his perversion of the inspired word. The perversion to which we allude is of Psa. ii. 8. The Evangelist refers to it in the following words, to prove that the world will be converted. "The very basis on which the system of missions is built, is the promise of God to give the whole world to his Son for an inheritance." We readily admit that such a promise is made in verse eighth; and had the Evangelist given the doctrine of verse ninth, its readers would have been told in part on what principle the world will be filled with the glory of God, or become the kingdom of our Lord. The verse tells us it will be by breaking the nations "with a rod of iron," and dashing "them in pieces like a potter's vessel," instead of converting them, as the Evangelist tries to make the previous verse prove!

That the world will not be filled with the glory of God, by the "foolishness of preaching" is evident.

1. From all analogy in the case. The church and the world are now deeply corrupt—We have not an example on the page of either sacred or profane history of a kingdom, city, or government, or institution civil, moral, or religious, when once fallen into corruption, of becoming pure again: destruction has been their portion. Then, reasoning from all analogy in the case, we conclude that destruction, and not conversion, will be the inevitable end of a fallen church and corrupt world.

2. Sound reason. Admitting, which is far from being true, that the gospel is as pure and unadulterated now, as when it fell from the lips of Christ and his Apostles; and that the world is no more refined, legalized, systematized, moralized and Christianized in wickedness now than then—we say, if the gospel failed to convert the world then, certainly it will not do it now: for it was then attended with miracles, and was proclaimed by the Son of God himself, and the inspired Apostles; but now it is accompanied with no miracles, and, mixed up with the dogmas of men, is proclaimed by an inefficient, uninspired, and divided ministry. Surely, under these circumstances, it is unreasonable to suppose that the gospel will convert the world.

Again: It would be well for the editor of the Evangelist, and all Post-millenists, to look at the work to be done, and the agency they are expecting to do it, before they take the position that the world is to be filled with glory "by the foolishness of preaching." We will name a little of the work.—War, Slavery of every kind, Infidelity, Heathenism, and every false religion; all divisions among Christians, and their impure doctrines and worship; the covetousness, pride, and all the sinful practices of the entire globe, must be done away. Who are to do this work? The church and ministry, of course. But it is unreasonable to expect this: for the very church and ministry, by their example, countenance and uphold these very sins. We speak advisedly, and fear not contradiction on a single point named.

Sound reason; then, in any and every light in which the matter may be viewed, forever blasts the delusive hope, that the world will be filled with the glory of God "by the foolishness of preaching," especially by the present church and ministry.

3. The word of God. "Thou shalt break them with a rod of iron; thou shalt dash them in pieces like a potter's vessel." Psa. ii. 9. The stone "shall break in pieces and consume all these kingdoms." Dan. ii. "The same horn made war with the saints, and prevailed until the Ancient of Days came." vii. 21. The wheat and tares; righteous and wicked, continue together until the harvest, or end of the world.—Matt. xiii. Near the end, the corruption of the world will compare with the corruption of the days of Noah and Lot. Matt. xxiv. 28, 29; Luke xvii. 26-30. "In the last days, perilous times" will be brought about by the corruption of the church, or those who have "a form of godliness"—"Evil men and seducers will wax worse and worse"—The church "will not endure sound doctrine, but after their own lusts will heap to themselves teachers, having itching ears, and they will turn away their ears from the truth, and will be turned unto fables." 2 Tim. iii. & iv. This looks not much like the church and ministry of the "last days" filling the earth with the glory of God, "by the foolishness of preaching."

Again: Under the seventh trumpet and third woe, the kingdoms of this world become the kingdom of our Lord and his Christ. But how? "We give thee thanks, O Lord God Almighty, which art, and wast, and art to come; because thou hast taken to thee thy great power, and hast reigned. And the nations were ANGRY, and thy WRATH is come, and the time of the dead that they should be judged, and that thou shouldst give reward unto thy servants the prophets, and to the saints, and them that fear thy name, small and great; and shouldst DESTROY them that destroy the earth." Rev. xi. 14-18.—Such testimony as this, and almost any amount more of the same kind, which might be given, forever settles the truth that the earth cannot be filled with the glory of God, as the Evangelist supposes, "by the foolishness of preaching."

4. The impossibility in the case. The curse is upon this literal earth, air, and water—the "foolishness of preaching" will never remove it, and bring all back to their Eden state,—and the glory of God can never fill the EARTH until this is done; hence the principles laid down by the Evangelist in this respect must be incorrect.

The principle on which the glory of God will fill the whole earth, is clearly revealed in the inspired word. It is true that the "foolishness of preaching" is a means, or a subordinate work, to prepare for the ultimate end, or the crowning glory of the whole economy of redemption. But the great and glorious work will be consummated by the Lord of glory, at his second appearing, in power and great glory! and will consist in raising the sleeping saints and changing the living ones from mortality to immortality and glory; the destruction of all the wicked in the conflagration which will then dissolve and cleanse the earth; the formation of new heavens and new earth, wherein will dwell righteousness; the establishment of the everlasting kingdom of God under the whole heavens; the descent of the New Jerusalem to the new earth, in which will be the throne of God and the Lamb. In a word, all the glories to which the sure word of promise points, which will then fill the whole earth.

When this glorious work shall be accomplished, we assure the editor of the Evangelist, "the infidel will have no occasion to turn upon the very God of heaven with the sneer—'He began to build, and was not able to finish.' " But then admiring angels with redeemed millions will more fully see that none of the wise designs of their God have been frustrated, but that all have resulted in His everlasting glory; and under an enraptured sense of the infinity of his wisdom and boundless goodness, the innumerable host will fill the heavenly regions with the high and joyous shout—"Halleluia! for the Lord God omnipotent reigneth!"

Time of the Second Advent.

NO. XII.

The next evidence which we shall present that the advent of the Lord is emphatically at the door, will be the literal fulfilment of historical prophecy, which commences with certain events, and terminates with the setting up of the everlasting kingdom of God. This kind of proof is abundant, and would fill a volume to give it all in detail: we shall therefore only briefly notice some of the most prominent witnesses in the case.

Dan. ii. will first claim our attention. My brother or sister, do not be unwilling to carefully examine again the important national events most clearly pointed out in this prophecy. We know they have become very familiar to you; but this familiarity, instead of weakening, should serve to strengthen your faith in the sure and speedy fulfilment of the most glorious predictions the prophecy utters, viz; that the kingdom of God will ultimately fill the whole earth.

Take your Bible and carefully read the account of Nebuchadnezzar's dream and its interpretation, and compare the same with the well known and acknowledged history of our world, from the days of Babylon's most powerful monarch down to the present time, and candidly say what the inspired account or prophecy warrants you to look for next. You know that all the earthly kingdoms named in that wonderful prophecy have risen and passed away in the exact order predicted, with the exception of the very last form of the last one mentioned. Babylon, Medo-Persia, Grecia, Imperial Rome, and Rome divided for more than thirteen hundred years, are matters of history. In the days of these divisions, or in the 'days of these kings,' when some would have the strength of the iron, and some would be weak and ready to crumble to ruins, like the brittle clay, then the God of heaven was to set up his everlasting kingdom. That this is precisely the character of the ten kingdoms now, facts clearly prove. Then the next thing the prophecy warrants us to look for is, the destruction of these kingdoms by the smiting of the stone cut out of the mountain without hands, and it to become a great mountain and fill the whole earth.

This conclusion is greatly strengthened from the very singular fact that worldly wise men, in every quarter of the globe, have been for a few years past confidently predicting a general revolution in the nations of the earth, and especially in the old world. No one acquainted with the present condition of the European powers, and in fact of the whole world, will doubt that just causes now exist to warrant the expectation of great and important revolutions at a day not far distant. Well, what will that revolution be? Let the sure word of prophecy answer. "And in the days of these kings shall the God of heaven set up a kingdom which shall never be destroyed; and the kingdom shall not be left to other people, but it shall break in pieces and consume all these kingdoms, and it shall stand forever." Dan. ii. 44.

Another strong evidence to justify the conclusion to which we have come on this prophecy is, the exposition which all expositors give it. We believe it is generally admitted, by the first men in every Protestant sect, if not Catholic, that the prophetic history in the second chapter of Daniel is nearly complete. So Mr Dowling, Dr Cox, and others of equal note, have recently preached or written. There is no difference between them and advent believers, in understanding the prophecy down to the setting up of the everlasting kingdom of God. Here we differ: They think that the prophecy warrants the expectation of an important change in the kingdoms of this world soon, but think that that change will be the conversion of the world to pure Christianity.—The plain word shows that they are sadly mistaken here: for it says the kingdoms of the world will be 'broken in pieces together, and become like the chaff of the summer threshing floor; which the wind carried away; that no place was found for them.' Dan. ii. 35. Common sense knows that this is not the language used in reference to the conversion, but the utter destruction of the nations of the earth. Then, the united testimony of our opponents, relative to the fulfilment of this portion of the prophetic word, with the exception of the nature of the last event predicted, together with the literal import of the word relative to what that event will be, brings us to the irresistible conclusion that the fearful crisis is at the very door, when the Son of man will come, in the clouds of heaven, with power and great glory, to 'destroy them which destroy the earth,' and to reign for ever and ever over the kingdom of God.

Dan. vii. All the landmarks in this chapter down to the kingdom of God, evidently are passed. The four empires symbolized by the four beasts exist only on the page of history. The division of Rome into ten kingdoms, symbolized by the ten horns of the terrible beast, the plucking up of three of them by the little horn, its rise and bloody reign over the saints for twelve hundred and sixty years, the loss of its civil power, and its prosperity since, for near forty five years—These predicted events are all all in the past—and the next one in the account is clearly described in the following words—

"I beheld till the thrones were cast down, and the Ancient of days did sit, whose garment was white as snow, and the hair of his head like the pure wool: his throne was like the fiery flame, and his wheels as burning fire. A fiery stream issued and came forth from before him: thousand thousands ministered unto him, and ten thousand times ten thousand stood before him: the judgment was set, and the books were opened. I beheld then, because of the voice of the great words which the horn spake: I beheld even till the beast was slain, and his body destroyed, and given to the burning flame.—I saw in the night visions, and behold, one like the Son of man came with the clouds of heaven, and came to the Ancient of days, and they brought him near before him. And there was given him dominion and glory, and a kingdom, that all people, nations and languages, should serve him: his dominion is an everlasting dominion, which shall not pass away, and his kingdom that which shall not be destroyed.—And the kingdom and dominion, and the greatness of the kingdom under the whole heaven, shall be given to the people of the saints of the Most High, whose kingdom is an everlasting kingdom, and all dominions shall serve and obey him." Dan. vii. 9-14, 25

These glorious words—these exceeding great and precious promises not only tell us what we may confidently look for next, but they, with the context, infallibly assure us that the great, the glorious, the crowning event of all prophecy, is at the very door. Blessed be the Lord for such an assurance, and for the lively hope it inspires. 'Let thy kingdom come;' and may the unworthy writer and the dear reader share in its inestimable and eternal blessings.

Other historical prophecies contained in the book of Daniel, are complete: the things predicted on the unbroken chains of events down to the cleansing of the sanctuary, and the standing up of Michael at the resurrection, when Daniel will stand in his lot, are all matters of history, and leave us on the high road of prophecy, with nothing to look for but the end of our journey in the kingdom of God, for which we joyfully suffer.

The New Testament prophecies should not be forgotten in this important case. In 2 Thess. ii., a prophetic chain is stretched from the 'falling away' of the church, to the destruction of the Man of Sin by the brightness of the coming of Christ. In the history of the church and world, we can find corresponding facts to every one of the links of this divine chain, excepting the one which relates to the coming of our Lord, and the everlasting destruction of the Man of Sin.

Everything predicted under the opening of the six seals, in the 6th and 7th chapters of Revelation, is fulfilled, with the exception of loosing the four angels, which were commanded to hold the four winds until the servants of God were sealed. And from the present indications in Europe those winds will be restrained not much longer. And when they are loosed, then the sealing time will end, and the great day of the Lord will come—and who shall be able to stand!

The history of the trumpets and woes in chapters 8th, 9th, 10th and 11th, is nearly complete. Six trumpets have already sounded, and 'the second wo is past; and behold, the third wo cometh quickly, and also the sounding of the seventh and last trumpet! We are living, and have been since the fall of the Ottoman supremacy, Aug. 11, 1840, in the fearful moment called quickly! and no assurance that it will continue another instant! And what should we look for next? Let the infallible Word answer:

'The second wo is past; and behold, the third wo cometh quickly. And the seventh angel sounded; and there were great voices in heaven, saying, The kingdoms of this world are become the kingdom of our Lord, and his Christ; and he shall reign forever and ever. And the four and twenty elders which sat before God on their seats, fell upon their faces, and worshipped God, saying, We give thee thanks, O Lord God Almighty, who art, and wast, any art to come: because thou hast taken to thee thy great power, and hast reigned. And the nations were angry, and thy wrath is come, and the time of the dead, that they should be judged, and that thou shouldst give reward unto thy servants the prophets, and to the saints, and them that fear thy name, small and great; and shouldst destroy them that destroy the earth.' Rev. xi. 14-18.

If such an overwhelming amount of such testimony as this will not convince any one that the coming of the Lord is at the very door, then nothing would. Though one should rise from the dead and proclaim it, or an angel from the upper world should do it, the testimony would not be credited. O let us beware lest there be in any of us a heart of unbelief, and so that day come upon us as a snare, to our everlasting destruction. Let faith, unwavering active faith, live in our hearts, and be made perfect by our works, then we shall please God, and consequently be ready every moment to meet our glorious Lord and King at his sudden appearing.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.—T. T. H.—We think you do not fully understand the subject on which you have written, and besides a controversy on those points would be unprofitable now.

A. G. C.—Your questions if answered might lead to a controversy on a point which could result in no real good. Christ came at his first advent to save lost mortals. At his second advent he will come to judge the world. There can be no salvation to the unaved, after Christ leaves the mediatorial seat.

E. Bellows.—We never laid the stress on "this generation" which some have. Many good critics in the Greek say it means race. At another time we may give our views in full on it.

Relative to your other question we say, we have not a doubt that the advent movement, as a general thing, has been of God, but we do think that our errors, our mistakes, our presumptions, have not been of God. Our setting the precise definite times which we have, we cannot suppose has been of God, consequently, harm has been done; how much, we cannot say. May God forgive our unintentional wrongs, and overrule them all to his glory.

Bro. J. J. Porter, Buffalo, March 4th, informs us that his health is improving, yet thinks it will be some time before he will be able to preach again. The cause is yet prospering in Buffalo, though it is not free from trials.

The brethren at Bath, N. Y., want a conference in that place, and request Bro. J. C. Bywater to say when he will attend, and to make the appointment. This request, by mistake, has been omitted a short time.

We are sorry to learn by a friend from Seneca Falls, that the health of Bro. Pinney is quite poor again; we believe he is 'unable to be out much.' The Lord heal the infirm shepherds of the scattered flock; for the sheep and lambs need their faithful care at this time of dearth and perils.

Bible Time.

It was time, definite time, which first called us out to investigate this great truth; yet it seems to be by many neglected. They say we cannot depend upon human testimony, and therefore we must not be too positive; and I think they are right in saying so, if we had only human testimony to depend upon. I believe I can give Bible testimony both for the commencement and termination of all the prophetic numbers.

Can I find the true age of the world at the birth of Christ? I believe I can. From the whole age of the world, 6000 years, take 2300 days or years which of course reach to the end, and we have 3700, the age of the world at the commencement of the 2300 days. Now, as Christ was born 453 years after the going forth of the commandment, by adding 453 to the 3700 we have 4153, the true age of the world at the birth of Christ, to which add 1847 and we have 6000 years. I wish it to be remembered that the 60 weeks being fulfilled in A. D. 30 is the key to all the prophetic numbers.

Bible time for the commencement of the 1335 days. It is the same abomination mentioned in Daniel 8th chapter as in Daniel 12th, as I shall show by the following passages: Dan. viii. 13—'How long the vision, the daily, and the transgression of desolation?' Dan. xi. 31—'And shall take away the daily and place the abomination that maketh desolate.' Dan. xii. 11—'And from the time that the daily shall be taken away and the abomination of desolation set up, shall be 1290 days,' &c. The 1335 days are only the latter part of the 2300. Now by finding how many years of the 2300 were past when the 1335 began, I can show you the Bible date of the taking away of the daily, and commencement of the 1335 days. Thus: from 2300 take 1335, and we have 965 years, which reach from the commencement of the vision to the taking away of the daily; and as these 965 years began 453 before Christ, by taking the 453 from the 965, we have 512 which is the true year in our A. D. when the 1335 began—to which add 1290 and we are brought to 1802 full years after Christ, for the ending of the 1290 days, and also the ending of the 2300 and 1335 in 1847 full years after Christ. This calculation is all Bible, and settles at once all dispute about the different dates given in history for the commencement of the 1335 days.

Bible time for the commencement of the seven times: By finding the age of the world at the commencement of the 2300 days, and the age of the world at the commencement of the seven times, we can find the true year before Christ when the 2520 began. Thus, from 6000 years take 2520 and we have 3480, the age of the world when the seven times commenced. Now as I have before shown that the 2300 began the year of the world 3700, from this take 3480 and we have 220 years, then add 453 which began at the going forth of the commandment, and we have 673 B. C., for the commencement of the seven times; then add to 673 B. C., 1847 A. D., and we have 2520.

I wish it to be understood that these calculations do not prove that this is the true '47, but they only give a definite Bible time for the beginning and ending of the prophetic numbers—yet I have no doubt but we are living in the true year which will bring the resurrection. May we all be found ready.

R. HUMPHRIES.

Buffalo, March 3d, 1847.

The Time.

I am still of that number that have often to confess they are 'strangers and pilgrims in the earth,' and believing that our Lord will soon permit us to be citizens in the New Earth. For this faith I am called a heretic, fanatic, and the like, to which I do not object, but rather confess that after the 'way which some call heresy, so worship I the God of my fathers, believing all things written in the law and prophets.' Among the 'all things' written in the prophets, I find the prophetic periods which the prophet Daniel says bring to the 'last end of indignation,' and also the time when he expected to 'stand in his lot' at the end of the days: not before the end nor after—but 'at the end,' PRECISELY. He furthermore declares, 'the wise shall understand.' Do the wise understand? I think they do. What do they understand? 1st. They understand these periods have some meaning, and, rightly applied, bring us to the end. 2d. They have not yet run out, for the end has not come. 3d. They think they have the right application, and thus believe with all their hearts. 4th. That they have not rightly understood the time for some wise purpose, I will allow; but as these words have stood out like so many beacon lights—'the wise shall understand'—they have continued to believe and search, being satisfied those periods reach to the end, and that it is the Lord's will that we should know when they end. 5th. The latest dates, or the farthest point to which these periods can be stretched, which all must allow, is to this present spring, with the present application, which we think is correct. Now if the Lord comes this spring, it will be certain we have understood the truth of the matter by obeying his word. Time must decide.

Now the latest point that can be found (all that have written agree) for the termination of the periods, falls on this present year. Some however, think the 2300 days may be prolonged a little space—but no one contends that the 1335 days can be stretched beyond this coming spring, with the application we have made. Now I ask, who believes the application is correct? Very many do. As a body, we hold the same as Bro. Miller: that the 1290 days commenced at the taking away of the daily, (Pagan Rome) and the 1335 commenced at the same point; that the 1290 ended with the 1260, which brought us to the time of the end; 45 from that point completes the 1335. In this all agree. Well, if we are satisfied the application is correct, should we not look with deep interest for our Lord this spring? If we are consistent we must. We must look for our Lord this spring or we must give up the 1335 days; there is no 2 or 3 years dispute in chronology in this matter now; the disputed chronology we have passed, and the data for this period, (1335) to end, cannot reach beyond this spring, unless we have some new light.*

For one I am satisfied we have the right application, and as a consistent man I look for our glorious Redeemer to raise the dead and cause Daniel to stand in his lot at the end of the days, this coming spring. This brings the Lord nigh, surely, and makes our Savior's words of great force, 'nigh even at the door.' Glory to the God of heaven! Amen.

The question now comes home with force to my soul, Are we ready to meet the event? One request I have to make to the scattered flock:—See that you have an entire consecration to God. Keep not back part of the price, but keep your lamps trimmed and your lights burning. To the brethren in the field—permit me to say one word to you: Preach in the name of Jesus the whole truth; covet no man's silver or gold or apparel, but trust in that God who feeds the ravens. He will provide and take care of you all. Amen.

WALTER PRATT.

* We must caution our brethren against coming to such hazardous conclusions. The 1335 days are inspired numbers, and cannot be given up on any consideration. A faith that will lead us to take such a fearful position must be defective some where. We cannot be too confident on the plain word of the Lord—but on our own, or any other one's conclusions or inferences, we should speak with caution. We have good reason to look for the Lord before next April or May, but should he not come until after that time, we can have no reason for giving up the 1335 days, or any other portion of the inspired Word. No, no—let that be true though all of our theories fail.—EDITOR.

CORRESPONDENCE.

LETTER FROM BRO. L. P. JUDSON.

JAMESTOWN, March 18, 1847.

DEAR BRO. MARSH—Our conference, attended by Bro. Himes, closed last evening. We accepted an invitation from the Wesleyan society of this place, to occupy their house of worship, and it was filled—crowded, at most of our meetings. I did not form, nor have I heard, an estimate of the hundreds present, but the attendance was good, notwithstanding the extremely inclement weather which we had on Saturday and Sabbath.

Bro. Himes was much fatigued by incessant labors, yet his expositions were lucid, forcible and effective. On Saturday morning Bro. Bywater, who accompanied him, gave us some very seasonable and timely remarks on the danger of coming short of the inheritance promised. In the afternoon, Bro. Himes gave the saints a rich feast, in an interesting exposition of the 4th and a part of the 5th chapter of Paul's second epistle to the Corinthians—and in the evening, he gave as the argument on time, taken from the age of the world, and the seventh millennium as being the great Sabbath or 'rest,' that 'remains for the people of God.' This argument was presented in such a clear light, and there was so much of the spirit of God in the congregation, that much conviction must have been secured on the minds of many, that the day of the saint's deliverance was 'at hand,' whether they obeyed the truth by acting accordingly or not.

On the Lord's day, in the morning, he presented the heart-rending picture, afforded us in the prophecies and fulfilled in the facts that now exist, in the exceeding degeneracy of the great mass of those professing godliness at the present day; in the afternoon, he showed the very strong probability, if time continues long, that 'the Man of Sin' will wield his bloody sceptre over the world; and in the evening he gave us a view of the flight of the 'angel having the everlasting gospel to preach to them that dwell on the earth, and to every nation, and kindred, and tongue, and people, saying with a loud voice, Fear God and give glory to him, for the hour of his judgment is come.

Two souls rose for the prayers of God's people, and after the second dismissal the people retired. The meetings were solemn; the spirit of God was present—and much good, we believe, will result from the efforts. Some have already expressed their change of views on various points. 'Brethren, pray for us.'

Yours in the faith,
L. P. JUDSON.

NORTHAMPTON, Ill., Feb. 13.

The cause of our Lord runs low in this country at present, and I see no prospect of its rising unless some of our advent brethren can come over and help us. I do not think that this Christian conference would reject the doctrine if held forth in its full and true light, but we have no one thus minded that is able to do it. If any one of our eastern brethren who is able to come and show himself a workman, approved unto God, &c., I will do my best endeavor to assist him so far as it respects a living; further encouragement I cannot give. If any one should see fit to comply with this request, and will inform me when he will come, I will meet him at Chicago or get some one to do so, and bring him here. If our Lord does not come and help the afflicted out of their trouble before navigation opens in the spring, then I hope that some one of his servants will come over and help us.

There are a dozen or more half believers in the advent doctrine, scattered about here, who have fell asleep or nearly so since 1843, but I think they might be awaked again. Here is a vast field for a faithful laborer, where I think much good might be done.

My place of address is Northampton, Peoria County, Ill.; I am situated 140 miles from Chicago. The expense for any one from the State of New York to Chicago by water cannot be great. From there it would cost nothing, if my directions should be complied with. This is perhaps as healthy as any part of the State.

Z. G. BLISS.

SUTTON, Vt., Feb. 22d, 1847.

The brethren in this place generally are firm in the faith that the Lord is at the door, and watching with intense anxiety to see him as he is, and be made like him. Bro. Benj. Reynolds was with us a few days, week before last, and there seemed to be somewhat of an awakening among the people, and the interest still remains—and our prayer is that we may see the work of God in the salvation of souls. I rejoice while I learn from the Voice that souls are being converted to God; and O that all who are looking for the speedy coming of the Lord, may feel the importance of faithfully laboring for the salvation of our fellow-men. We should not try to excuse ourselves with the notion that they will not receive the truth. We should continue to present the truth in the love of it, that if possible we may induce some to turn to God and live—that at the appearing of Jesus Christ, we may be prepared to hear the welcome sentence, 'Well done good and faithful servant, enter thou into the joy of your Lord.'

J. E. HAZEN.

WHITE PIGEON, Mich., Feb. 7.

It rejoices our hearts to hear from the dear children of God, who are scattered abroad on the face of the earth, but it would gladden us much more to see them. O that the Lord would 'direct the steps' of some of them this way! Tell them they will find a cordial reception at the house of David Rollins, White Pigeon, Mich.

Myself and husband have been members of the

M. E. Church for more twenty years, but have (from a sense of duty, taking the Bible for our guide) withdrawn. We therefore cast in our lot with those who believe in the speedy coming of that dear Savior who is gone to prepare for himself a 'kingdom,' and to return

"And take his faithful children home!"

A. S. ROLLINS.

REDFIELD, Feb. 19th, 1847.

There are only five or six in this town who are looking for the return of that same Jesus as he went away. Some are looking for him spiritually, and some, the great mass of professors, are not looking for him at all. Bro. Enoch S. Tickner preaches for us once in two weeks, and the few who love to hear him appear yet to stand firm upon the rock of their salvation, willing to bear their daily cross and the scoffs and frowns of fallen churches. O, my brother, I feel to praise God that he has a few on earth, scattered abroad, who are looking, waiting and watching for the return of our long absent Lord and King.

A. S. HANDREX.

RAYS HILL, Pa., Feb. 9.

The old and popular doctrines of a millennium before the coming of Christ, the soul going immediately to heaven at death, has a separate existence from the body, together with a multitude of kindred doctrines, have all dwindled into insignificance in my estimation, and I look upon the popular churches, so called, as poor samples of primitive Christianity, and see more and more the necessity of cleaving to the sure word of prophecy. I consider myself a servant of Christ, consequently under no obligations to men that I should serve them, but to serve the Lord Jesus I trust is my meat and drink—and to lay hold on eternal life which is the reward when he comes, for which I wait and watch.

W. G. PROCTOR.

MARRIAGE CERTIFICATE.

BRO. AND SISTER ONGLEY—At the earliest opportunity I sit down to drop you a line, and answer your inquiries. I cheerfully certify to the fact that I married Wm. Ongley to Mrs. Mary Bone, of Brookfield, Stark county, Ohio, I think about twelve years since, in the above mentioned place, and in the house occupied by Mrs. Bone; and I knew her before and after her husband's death, Mr. Bone—and also was acquainted with him at the time of his death. I have not time to write further,—suffice it to say that I am still trying to preach Jesus and live forever.

Yours with respect,

GEORGE SMITH.

Albion, Mich., Jan. 25th, 1847.

P. S. I have in my possession the necessary documents to substantiate the above fact, among my old papers: you will find it certified to and on record in the clerk's office, at Canton, Stark county, Ohio.

G. S.

The reason why we pub'ish this certificate is, Sister Ongly with her husband is constantly travelling and lecturing on the advent of Christ, &c. Mr. C. F. Gillett, whom we recently published, has told in several places that Bro. and Sister Ongley were not married; this certificate corrects this report.—EDITOR.

THE SABBATH.

Some months ago the Sabbath question was presented to me in a manner I felt I could not shun with an approving conscience. Gladly would I have avoided the discussion of the subject, as I would any other tending to discompose the minds of our precious brethren and sisters, who have already smarted sorely through the various agitating messages, new lights, &c. &c., which have been presented for the last two or three years. Since September last, I have read, reflected and conversed much on this topic, and, for a time, I considered the arguments of our Seventh-day brethren superior to their opponents, and for my own part I regarded the day as binding upon us to keep sacred, and so frequently expressed myself. Now, in honesty, and feeling my mind set at rest on the matter, I disavow the Seventh-day theory, and acknowledge the articles in the Voice of Truth, published in the year 1845, in reply to Br'n Preble and Whitten, (which I had not seen until very recently,) the main, but not entire, instrumentality by which I have been brought to this decision, which I feel satisfied is an abiding one: and to any who may feel disturbed about this question, I would recommend the candid and attentive perusal of those articles. The main spoke in the Sabbatarian theory, being (to my view at all events) therein seized and broken. With the heartiest remembrance of my esteemed Seventh-day brethren, I remain still waiting for our coming King.

H. HEVES.

Oswego, March 1st, 1847.

BRISTOL, R. I., Feb. 8.

The Lord is pouring out his spirit in this place in a glorious manner; not particularly among the advent believers, although the brethren are strong in the faith waiting the consolation of Israel; but more especially among the Methodist congregation, where they are holding meetings, night and day, and hundreds are flocking to the altar with a desire to flee from the wrath to come. To God be all the glory. We will rejoice if Christ is preached and sinners are saved, altho' he may employ other instruments than ourselves to accomplish this; but how far the preaching of the Bridegroom nigh has been instrumental in leading sinners to flee from the wrath to come, the great day alone will disclose; but of this I am certain, they have been faithfully warned of their danger. We have in time past been destitute of regular preaching of the word, but have made arrangements with Bro. Howell to supply the desk, the brethren coming forward and liberally subscribing the amount necessary for his support.

PRACTICAL THOUGHTS.

Matt. v. 13-15. Christians are compared to salt, and to a light, and to a city. It is said 'they are the salt of the earth,' but salt would be of little use if we could not use it but one day in seven, it would be like the religion of some who appear to be satisfied to have it appear one day in seven, and then to lay it aside as they do their Sunday clothes.

Again: are there not many who for fear of opposition, or for fear of the laugh and ridicule of those in darkness—the ungodly—keep their light (if they have any) under a bushel, so that none may see it? Now what is a light good for if no body can see it? Nothing.

But how many of either class are amongst the advent believers, is not for me to say—God knows—and they that are such may know. Then let every professing Christian consider these things, and examine themselves daily and hourly, to see whether they be in the faith or not, and take heed to themselves. 'Let your light so shine before men, that they may see your good works and glorify your Father which is in heaven.'

Brethren, think of these things. If we are compared to temporal things let us strive to equal such things as we are compared to. Oh, for that love and holy zeal that characterized the apostles and primitive Christians, that we may be prepared to endure crosses, trials and persecutions.

A. N. B.

Dr. Bushnell on the Alliance.

"Another result of the meeting at London, which we earnestly deprecate, is that, without having attempted anything in behalf of Protestantism, they have done what they could to tighten the bigotry of Protestantism and modernize its title to odium. It lay with such an assembly, gathered in such an age as this, from all parts of the habitable earth, to make some demonstration of enlarged views and catholic feelings. And above all, when they came together professedly to realize the unity of the Spirit and fortify the bonds of love. Still more, when the love was so manifestly kindled to a living glow in their assemblies. And yet, they dared to love only by their creeds and catechisms. They could not pray and offer praise to their Redeemer, without propositions on their table to sanctify the exercise. Not having it on hand to establish a new church—not undertaking even to be responsible for the Christian soundness of their members, they must yet have a creed as a test of membership. Undertaking only a spiritual and practical unity, they were yet jealous of the spiritual and practical, lest possibly it might appear that some men are able to love God and his people, whose names and opinions they a little more disliked than they did others held among themselves. What could be more frightful than to think of loving God in common with a pious Quaker, Catholic, or Unitarian, who might choose to come into their assembly! No doubt there may be such; this they were obliged to confess, but they were afraid to embrace, in love, all whom God embraces. So to make the unity of the Spirit more select, they must still go back upon their dogmatism, making this the test and measure of that spiritual grace, which is the basis of practical unity; and then, to relieve their predicament, doubling its absurdity, by the formal concession that it is no test at all, and that many are excluded who are as true disciples as themselves. And thus they are seen to have made up, designedly and with their eyes open, a schismatic unity, subjecting themselves to a charge which does not lie against the closest forms of church order—a unity composed of one of God's elect, to the exclusion of another—and this in a grand effort after the very unity of the body of Christ."

Progress of Crime.

The following paragraphs are taken from a recent number of Eclectic Review, (an English periodical) which present facts worthy of the profound consideration of every one that has an interest in the well being of his race:

We are weary of the talk about this enlightened age—this advanced stage of civilization—the marvels of the middle of the nineteenth century, &c. &c. In what does the progress of the age consist? What are the merits of our times compared with former times? What new lessons have we learned from the experience of our forefathers? How much of their wisdom have we overlooked to our own hurt? Of course the laudation of our age is pleasant, and the wisdom of our ancestors a joke which may be kept standing in type. However, there is mischief in this talk. It is a way of lauding progress which impedes advancement.

Talk about the wonderful progress of the age, confirms comfortable people in their dislike of confronting the crying evils of the needy and the outcast, with a view to the application of remedies. Few seek, consequently, the blessing attached to considering the poor. Few aspire to the crown of glory won by reclaiming the outcast. Nothing considerable can now be done, but by acting on the convictions of the ruling classes in this country—the persons who derive their opinions and purposes from the press. We wish to disturb the complacency of this class, by asking to look Crime in the face. We would remove the beautiful colors of rhetoric which cover the horrors of the age, and silence the eulogies on our intelligence and advancement, by pointing to the dark facts which show the Progress of Crime.

For the sake of a most important, but painful subject, we have wished to disturb the complacency with which many regard the present stage of civilization. We object to pictures of our condition which omit the progress of crime. Last session Sir Robert Peel said in his place in parliament—"From the first record in 1805, down to 1842, when the commitments attained the maximum hitherto recorded, the increase in crime progressed from year to year, until it had extended to above six hundred per cent." Another calculation estimates the increase at two hundred and sixty one per cent. in the last ten years. The statistical calculations which have traced a decrease of crime to a great leniency in punishing it, have, we fear, been found to be fallacious. Substantially the last statistical approximation to the fact of the increase of crime, displays a progress rapid and fearful, of two hundred and sixty-one per cent. in the last ten, and six hundred per cent. in the last thirty-seven years.

PROCESSION OF THE HOST IN LONDON.—For the first time, so far as is known, since the Reformation, and in spite of the statutes which explicitly forbid it, the Popish procession of the Host, the carrying of the consecrated wafer through the streets, was openly performed lately in one of the suburbs of London, with the lights blazing, and in full procession, to visit the death bed of a dying Catholic. The Catholic paper which records the scene, says: "The sensation created among the Protestants in the neighborhood is indescribable. With recollected looks, the women bowed and the men took off their hats, as they beheld, for the first time, with what awful and profound veneration holy Church surrounds the adorable sacrament." Though there are several stringent laws against—one as late as 31 George III. we are glad they are not enforced, and hope this event will lead to their erasure from the statute book of a free and enlightened nation. Laws against the enjoyment of religious liberty, whatever their nature, or against whomsoever directed, are unworthy of the age, and do no good.

EARTHQUAKE AT GREEN BAY!—On Tuesday morning last, a slight shock was distinctly felt in this town—the ground and several buildings trembled for a moment. About three miles south, on the east bank of the Fox River, the shock was more distinctly felt; and we are compelled to think it must have been a petite specimen of an Earthquake!—Republican, March 1st.

APPOINTMENT.

17 Bro. J. Pearson appoints to be at Scottsville, Sabbath, 25th instant.

BUSINESS NOTES.

J. C. Stoddard—It is laid over on account of its defects: it should be corrected by a competent hand before published.

L. Bronson—We find L. Jamerson credited in all $1, which pays to vol. xiv no. 9; and your whole credit is $3.87, which pays to vol. xiii no. 11. Is this right?

Mrs. E. K. Everett—The dollar sent last fall was received and credited on book.

17 We hardly know what to say to Bro. Judson's proposition about the conference he names. Such a meeting might result in good. Perhaps Bro. Judson had better, through the Voice, lay his plans before the brethren for their counsel, &c.

An Old Poem.

[The following is an excellent translation of a Latin Poem which has received the enthusiastic encomiums of Goethe, Dr. Johnson, Sir Walter Scott and other distinguished men. It is said that Dr. Johnson always wept in reading the 10th stanza.—The Earl of Rochester's eyes expired with the 17th verse upon his lips. The original was written by a Monk in the 13th century. We find the translation in the Newark Daily Advertiser.—Ath. Ev. Jour.]

I.
Day of wrath, that day of burning
All shall melt, to ashes turning,
As foretold by Seers discerning.

II.
Oh what fear shall it engender
When the Judge shall come in splendor,
Strict to mark and just to render.

III.
Trumpet scattering sounds of wonder,
Rending vapours asunder,
Shall resistless summons thunder.

IV.
All aghast then Death shall shiver,
And great Nature's frame shall quiver,
When the graves their dead deliver.

V.
Look where every act's recorded,
All events all time afforded,
Shall be brought and dooms awarded.

VI.
When shall sit the Judge unerring,
He'll unfold all here occurring,
No just vengeance then deferring.

VII.
What shall I say that time pending?
Ask what Advocate's pleading,
When the just man needs defending!

VIII.
King Almighty and all-knowing,
Grace to sinners freely showing,
Have me, Pount of good o'erflowing.

IX.
Think, Oh Jesus, for what reason
'Thou endurest earth's spite and treason,
Nor me lost in that dread season.

X.
Seeking me Thy worn feet hasted,
On the cross Thy soul death tasted,
Let such labor not be wasted.

XI.
Righteous Judge of retribution,
Grant me perfect absolution,
Ere that day of execution.

XII.
Culprit-like, I—heart all broken,
On my cheek shame's crimson token—
Plead the pardoning word be spoken.

XIII.
Thou who Mary gav'st remission,
Heard'st at the dying Thiel's petition,
Cheer with hope my lost condition.

XIV.
Though my prayers do nothing merit,
What is needful, Thou confer it—
Lest I endless fire inherit.

XV.
Mid the sheep a place decide me,
And from goats on left divide me,
Standing on the right beside Thee.

XVI.
When th' accurs'd away are driven,
To eternal burnings given,
Call me with the bless'd to heav'n.

XVII.
I beseech thee, prostrate lying,
Heal it as ashes contrite, sighing,
Care for me when I am dying.

XVIII.
On that awful day of waiting,
Human destinies unveiling,
When man rising, stands before thee,
Spare the Culprit, God of glory.

Pre-millennial Advent.

BY CHARLES BEECHER.

To deny the pre-millennial coming of Christ, you must spiritualize every promise of his coming, connected with millennial descriptions, in the Bible.

Fully to show this, I should be obliged to notice every case of such connection. But as this would task your patience, I shall select a few cases—and challenge any opponent to produce an exception.

1. How often, dear Brother, have we heard our father, and other venerable ministers of the Gospel, apply to millennial times passages from the 102 Psalm.

"Thou shalt arise, and have mercy upon Zion, for the time to favor her, yea THE SET TIME is come, for thy servants take pleasure in her stones, and favor the dust thereof. So shall the Heathen fear the name of the Lord, and all the Kings of the earth thy glory." A little further on, we read that this refers to a time "When the people are gathered together, and the kingdom to serve the Lord." That these are millennial times, I suppose all agree. And if I mistake not, our respected father is one of those, who does not spiritualize the prophecies of the Restoration of the Jews, and who believes that at that time God will truly "Hear the groaning of the prisoner, and loose those appointed unto death, to declare the name of the Lord in Zion and his praise IN JERUSALEM."

But whether this be literal or not, is immaterial. It is confessedly millennial. If it is not the Restoration, it is at least the Conversion of the Jews. Now the question is, have we here any "Promise of his Coming?"

If we have, it is probably ver. 16—"When the Lord shall build up Zion, we SHALL APPEAR IN HIS GLORY."

Now the Apostles have well instructed us, that at his first "APPEARING" to set up the Gospel dispensation, these words could not apply. It "behooved him then to SUFFER," and to "enter into his glory" afterwards, when he should "appear the second time, without sin unto salvation." This "appearing in glory" then, of which the Psalmist speaks, and which is still future, is it here made to stand before or after the millennium? Evidently before. It is "when the Lord shall build up Zion." It is "when the set time is come." Suppose now, like our father, we believe in the literal rebuilding of Jerusalem at that time, I ask, will not the Lord then "appear in glory?" And if so, is not this Pre-millennial? And even if you deny the literal rebuilding of Jerusalem, and mean only the conversion of the Jews, will not that equally identify the TIME of such "appearing?"

To deny the pre-millennial advent then, what is necessary? You must spiritualize this "appearing in glory."

Now the word "shall appear" is the Niph'al of the verb Raah, and refers, if not exclusively, yet appropriately to visible manifestation. For example,

Ex. xvi. 10—"They looked toward the wilderness, and beheld the glory of the Lord appeared in the cloud." Gen. xii. 7—"And the Lord appeared unto Abraham." 2 Chron. iii. 1—"Mt. Moriah, where Jehovah appeared unto David." And what good reason can be given for here divesting it of its usual meaning? Is it not a well ascertained rule of interpretation that the literal and common sense of a word is always to be taken, unless some reason exist for substituting another? But what reason is there here, unless it be partiality for a certain theory? But is that a good reason? That is making your interpretation bend to your theory; rather than obtaining your theory by interpretation. Will you find any reason in the context? "In his glory?" But these are the very words to which the "Shekiah" of the later Jews corresponds, and which when united with Jehovah denote (says Prof. Robinson) "that fiery effulgence surrounded by dark clouds in which Jehovah is represented as appearing, or God himself surrounded by this effulgence from which lightnings proceed." e. g. Lev. ix. 2, 3—"And the Glory of the Lord appeared unto all the people." Compare Num. xvi. 35; Ps. xviii. 10-13; Ex. xvi. 7-10; Ex. xxiv. 16, 17; xxxiii. 18; Lev. ix. 6, 23; Ex. xl. 34; 1 Kings viii. 11; Ezek. xliii. 2, 5, &c.

Let me request you to examine these passages, and then answer this question—When David says that "at the building up of Zion" "the Lord shall appear in his glory" what reason have I for denying to these words their obvious and usual signification? Why, unless it be that only thus then can I escape the doctrine of the pre-millennial advent? But if this be spiritualized, then is that unhappy process begun, by which every "promise of his coming," connected with millennial descriptions will be eradicated from the Bible.

The World's Jubilee.

The following rich extract, is from an English layman's letter, addressed to Dr. Raffles, on a hymn composed by him for the "Jubilee year of the Missionary Society." The hymn rejoices in hope of the world's speedy conversion. The writer says:

"But ere I draw this letter to a close, let me ask you one question, Do you considerably believe that the earth is on the advance to such a consummation as your hymn describes?"

I am writing to you with the map of the world suspended before me. The map of this world, of which Satan is the god, and whose right to it, de facto, the Bible does not dispute, but recognize. Will you in your study, travel with me over the map or ground plot of the great usurper's dominions, and tell me where it is that you have discovered the cause of such jubilant acclamations as your hymn so joyfully, so sweetly breathes; for I confess that this map is to my eye, like Ezekiel's roll, full of "lamentations, and mourning, and woe."

Where shall we begin? With the dark places of the earth, which by universal consent are full of the habitations of cruelty? Poor Africa! I will not seem as one that mocketh, by asking you whether you find it there—whether, from the Isthmus of Suez to the Straits of Gibraltar, you can find a resting-place for the foot of your happy muse! Well, then shall we coast it down the Western shore, from the Straits of Gibraltar to the Cape? Oh, you exclaim, let us hasten on, for these shores are dyed with blood, so deeply dyed, and the stain so continually, hourly renewed, that the Atlantic waves cannot efface it. Back then, along the Eastern shore, with a sigh, a tear, and a groan for poor Madagascar as we haste along, and another for Arabia, miscalled "the happy," and its stony and its desert region, as we pass up the Red Sea to the point from whence we started. I ask not if we have yet found a spot where we could pause for a moment to chant our "Jubilee Hymn."

Let us then cross this mighty continent—we shall need no guide. The Pagan, the Mahometan, and the Christian slave-driver have marked ten thousand roads for us athwart the otherwise trackless deserts, and we have only to follow the track strewn with the bones and wet with the blood of poor Africa's children. Should these be not enough to guide us, let us listen to the cracking of the whips, and the shrieks of agony which fill the sultry air, the groans of the fathers, the wailings of the mothers, and the plaintive cries of the hapless children. But we must hasten on—all, all is dark, dark as midnight, gloomy and cruel as the caverns of hell.

But the Cape! you say. The Cape of Good Hope! Well we will return to the Cape, and to some other sweet oases in the great desert of the fell tyrant's dominions before we part company. At present let us hasten on; surely we may not spend many moments in that frightful continent of South America, which seems to look across the ocean to the continent we have left, and defy it to a rivalry of cruelty and woe.

From the Isthmus of Panama to Cape Horn, and from Cape Horn to the Isthmus of Panama, all, all around and within is true and faithful to its allegiance to its hellish master.

Onward, then, onward to the land of the "pilgrim fathers." We need not tarry, I hear you say, in the Gulf of Mexico, to look either to the West on Guatemala, or to the East on Cuba, St. Domingo, or the islands, which for ages have almost concentrated in themselves the groans of creation. Nor will you, I am sure, desire to linger in the slave States of the South, where the "Jubilee Hymn" could not even be heard were it sung by ten thousand voices, for the cry of bitter woe which would drown its notes—where the brutalized tyrant of the South imports and breeds human slaves for his own use, and that of the free-born sons of the pilgrim fathers of the North. Haste we, then, from the sickening scenes which your eloquent tongue and your eloquent pen have often in vain endeavored fully to describe.

And have you the heart to sing the hymn in the land of slave-holding Christians, among men who, even if they believe the black has been washed in the blood of Jesus, will buy and sell him, grind and oppress him, flog, torture, and murder him; and who, if you or I, or any other who knows what liberty means, should take him by the hand and call him brother, would hand us out of the pale of civil and Christian communion; and if we should be bold enough to propose to proclaim liberty to the captive and the opening of the prison to them that are bound, in any other than a spiritual sense, would not scruple to hang us up at the nearest convenient tree?

Linger here, my dear sir, and sing with such a people your "Jubilee Song" if you can: I could not join you if I would; my voice would falter, my tongue would cleave to the roof of my mouth, I should choke with indignation.

O but, you say, they have divines! I know they have, and many sound and good ones; and greater will be their condemnation. But they have among them one whom a monthly journalist describes in most glowing language; one who has just sent across the Atlantic a book called "Anastasis," written to prove that there is no resurrection of the body; that all the resurrection there is or ever will be, takes place simultaneously with the dissolution of the soul and body—a mere resurrection of the principle of animal life, and that this principle of animal life will, at the moment of death, pass into the spiritual bodies of the unseen world. I see you quiver, and well you may. Let America emancipate her negro slaves; and then let her talk of freedom. Let her burn in the market-place the books of professors which deny the resurrection of the body; and then let her talk of her divinity. Let her close the doors of infamy in which the 15,000 hapless victims of the sensuality of the citizens of her capital hide their shame and their sorrows (first comparing the number of these unfortunates with that of the adult male population of the city) and then let her talk of religion and morality. Meanwhile, it is no place for the strains of the "Jubilee Hymn," and it is almost a relief from the nausea caused by the scene we are hastening from, to have to pass through the Canadas, and such of the tribes of North American Indians as have escaped the cupidity of the degenerate sons of the "blessed pilgrim fathers," and crossing the Straits of Behring, to enter upon the vast regions of Asia. But where can we stop? In Siberia, or either of the Tartaries, Russian, Independent, or Chinese? In Turkey, Arabia, Persia, Thibet, Hindostan, or China? All, all belongs to the god of this world; all, all is peopled by the children of disobedience. And what of the great islands of the sea, Samatra, Java, Borneo, New Guinea, and that continental island, Australia, and its companions, Van Dieman's Land and New Zealand—what but the same sad, dark, and gloomy scene?

"Oh but," you say, "here we may stop; in Oceana among the sweet little islands of the Southern Sea—isles so green, so tranquil, so simple, so happy"—You need not press me; I sigh for something to remind me of Paradise, however faintly, however feebly. Well, I have brushed off the fly-spots which were mixed in with the happy little isles, and which had increased to my eye their apparent number. Yes, they are green and lovely, and seem almost as if they were rescued from the rent-roll of the great usurper by the hand of the faithful missionaries of the cross; as though the sword were beaten into the ploughshare, and the spear into the pruning-hook, and the reclaimed savages would learn war no more. But, dearly as we all love to be deceived by that which soothes and solaces, can we, I ask you, can we venture to stop even here, to sing your sweet song of triumph? It must not be at Tahiti, poor Tahiti, surely—rescued, well nigh rescued from the jaws of the dragon, to become the prey of the great papal harlot and her infidel paramour.

And what will be the fate of the rest of the islands of the Southern Ocean, whether Christianized or Pagan, God only knows; but he who calls himself the Vicar of Christ has marked them out for his own. They are part and parcel of his new diocese of "Oceana;" and Rome has friends, powerful enough and willing enough to aid him in bringing them under the pastoral crook of the hireling shepherd, as we have alas! seen to our sorrow.

Who is ignorant or unobservant of the strides Rome is making, of the energies she is putting forth, to subdue the world to her dominion? He who sees it not must be blind indeed, with the records of the Propaganda open for his perusal, and the scenes at home and abroad acting before his eyes. And who, with the Bible in his hand, knows not of the doom that awaits the Man of Sin, when he shall come in like a flood, and the standard shall be lifted up against him? When come to the full—when ripe for destruction—the Lord shall consume him with the spirit of his mouth, and destroy him with the brightness of his coming. But till Antichrist falls, I have no heart for the "Song of Jubilee." Come the day, and I trust then to join you in it; when the Universe shall hear, as it were the voice of a great multitude, and as the voice of many waters, and as the voice of mighty thunders, saying, Alleluiah! for the Lord God omnipotent reigneth. Let us be glad and rejoice and give honor to him; for the marriage of the Lamb is come, and his wife hath made herself ready. Amen. Alleluiah!

But we have yet another part of the globe to travel over ere we have finished the map." It is the seat of the beast itself—civilized, Christianized, enlightened Europe. Let us be here rather more minute, and take a glance at the different kingdoms, as they are composed of infidel, papal, patriarchal, protestant, and papal-protestant materials. Shall we begin with infidel Turkey! Pass on quickly, you exclaim. Shall we stop, then, in equally infidel, though nominally papal, France? Pass on. Italy? Austria? Spain? Portugal? The islands of the Mediterranean? I am not mocking, I assure you, I only want to take in detail that which may mislead or mystify if spoken of in the aggregate. Well, then, Russia and the lately revived kingdom of Greece, who, taught by the patriarch, and not by the pope, deem it an abomination to worship the image instead of the picture of the Queen of Heaven—the Mother of God?

True it is, that as we travel northwards, we escape from the denser regions of Christian idolatry; but are you willing to pause in Germany, Belgium, or Holland? In Prussia, Denmark, or Sweden? I deem you would rather be hastening on to the land of liberty—the land of Bibles—our own beloved island, the ocean queen. Oh what a relief! Here at least we can breathe after what we have passed through—

"Such regions dolorous—a universe of death!
Where all life dies—death lives!"

Here at least we may breathe freely. But where, O, where shall we find a resting-place to sing the "Song of Jubilee;" for here surely, if any where on the globe's surface, it may be chanted, and with lute and viol? Where shall we begin the strain? Let us search for a suitable spot. Surely we shall find it where those who represent the aristocracy of the land are gathered in one peerless assembly. Surely among those whom the people have chosen to represent the great community. I would not speak of dignities or of those in authority with irreverence; but I ask you, what would be the reception of the legislator who should propose, in either of those august assemblies, to frame a law on such a simple cardinal principle as this, "Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself," and adduce the authority of Jesus of Nazareth as his warrant for introducing a bill framed on such an obsolete maxim?

Shall we look for the spot in the ranks of our bravo soldiers, and invite the accompaniment of the trumpet and the drum? or among our gallant sailors, in some interval of cessation from oaths and blasphemy? Shall we find it with the conductors of our daily press, which leads while it follows the opinions of its millions of readers? Shall we find it in our commercial or manufacturing towns—or among our rural population?

You know something, sir, of both, and could give a description of each which would make us hide our heads for shame and sorrow. O what a tale do the beer-shops of our agricultural districts tell! And were it seemly to speak of those things which are done of the world, the fair-spoken; respectable-looking, well-dressed world, by our cities and towns, in secret, where could we hide our heads, or conceal our shame? You are not ignorant of the statistics of crime, soul-polluting, soul-destroying crime, which have been furnished to the public, of one town, for example—a town where the gospel is proclaimed continually with eloquence and with power, but a town which vies with the great metropolis itself in a sin which increases beyond the ratio of the increase of its vast population. I have before me a pamphlet, in which the philanthropic writer endeavors to grapple with the monster which is ruining its thousands, aye, sending its tens of thousands of our youth, our baptised youth, down quick into the pit—a pamphlet in which the writer avails himself of facts supplied by one of your fellow-laborers, a devoted minister in your town, of our denomination—facts which would seem incredible were they not given on unquestionable authority. Let this one speak for itself: but had it ten thousand voices, it would not tell one ten-thousandth part of the sorrows, the unutterable sorrows, which it is the key to. Hear it, ye men of pleasure—hear it, ye deceivers and deceived, ye who are hastening, with the gospel sounding in your ears, to the pit of destruction, and dragging with you the souls of your wretched associates in crime. There is spent in the town of Liverpool alone, in the course of a single year, upon one sin, so emphatically called in the Litany of the national church, “a deadly sin,” two hundred thousand pounds.

Ponder this one fact, with which you are already acquainted; follow it out through all of its details, causes, and influences, and I need not ask you whether you select such a town as this for the “Jubilee Hymn”—a town devoting the wealth it once earned in the service of Moloch, during the bloody days when its docks were crowded with slavers, to the service of Moloch’s great competitor and rival, the dissolute Belial. Such a town! and can we flatter ourselves that Liverpool stands alone? The statistics of crime tell, but too plainly, that it is rather but a sample of the mass of our civic population. Need I lift up the curtain which conceals the condition of the great metropolis, “the monster city,” as it has not been unfitly called? That curtain has been drawn aside by able and powerful hands; and what scenes of sickening corruption have been disclosed! “It must be admitted,” says a writer whom I have already quoted, “though the admission bring sorrow to the heart, that by far the great majority of men in every land are still in the gall of bitterness and in the bond of iniquity. In heathen lands vice assumes the most brutal forms, and gathers to itself innumerable victims—it is savage, cruel, relentless: but in those countries where civilization has advanced, there exists a refinement in vice which renders its approach more subtle and its blow more deadly. In the former, it is open and undisguised; in the latter, it is noiseless and secret. In the former, it is bold and daring, giving its victims the chance of escape; in the latter, it has a stealthy pace, and serpent-like, winds its folds around its victims, the more securely to crush them to the heart, without a ray of hope. The history of the world furnishes abundant proof that, as civilization has advanced, vice has become more refined, and has brought down certain desolation and ruin. Do not Greece and Rome present examples? and is not the truth of this remark manifest in this country, the land in which so much has been done and is doing to extend and perpetuate the blessings of religion and virtue? The great metropolis itself, in its leading thoroughfares, in its lanes and alleys, in its winding courts, testifies to the truth of the remark. Take but any of the vices with which London is deluged: mark well all its machinery, regard the modus operandi, and it will be discovered that fiendish arts and infernal contrivances are employed to entrap its victims. More especially is it so in reference to the vice of uncleanness, which holds an almost undisputed sway throughout the length and breadth of the land. Horrid and systematic schemes, intricate, but not the less fatal, are continually practiced, which have disturbed domestic peace, drawn thousands into ruin, and entailed a lasting disgrace upon the country.” But the subject is too fearful, too revolting, to be dwelt upon, though too fearfully true and significant to be suppressed. I speak as unto the wise. Judge ye.

Is there no spot, then, where Satan has relaxed his grasp of the territory he has won? Look at the wide sea, which has become almost as populous as the dry land—“the great highway of the world,” which no longer separates man from man, but brings all nations into familiarity with each other. Is there one man more proverbially godless than another—is it not the poor mariner? Thank God for the “Bethel flag.” But oh! what is still the condition of the tens of thousands of every nation, who live on the bosom of the great deep?—who fear neither God nor devil, and who look for a final state between heaven and hell; not fit, as they deem, for the one, because of their wickedness, nor deserving of the other, because of their bravery. Oh! could the different sea-ports of the world disclose the amount of guilt which every vessel that enters them leaves with its cargo, what a tale would they relate! It is said of our own seamen, that “the curses and imprecations of those they have injured in distant lands are poured upon them, and our country is denounced as the scourge and bane of the world.” What must be said, then, of the crimes of other nations who pretend not to rank with us in the scale of morality?

But while we are on the ocean, let us slack sail, and linger a moment, not for a jubilant hymn, but for a mournful dirge. Would the waters of the great Atlantic stand on a heap, a wall on this side, and on that, as did the waters of the Red Sea, in olden time, what would the pathway disclose, the pathway of “the middle passage?” what but the countless bones of millions of poor Africa’s sons and daughters—of those who have found a place where the wicked cease from troubling—a refuge from woe—woe past, present, and to come, at the bottom of the silent deep? Do I hear you say, ‘This can only tell of by-gone days? Would it were so. Thank God, O thank God! that we have washed our hands of the guilt of the hellish traffic in human flesh, and that we do what we can to atone for our past atrocities; but what is the state of that traffic at the present moment? Though more than thirty years have elapsed since the slave-trade was declared piracy by the law of England, and though millions have been spent by us for its suppression, the slave-trade has, instead of diminishing, doubled in amount, and every year witnesses the drainage from Africa of 500,000 of her hapless race, of whom the great proportion find a welcome—O how welcome, how sweet a grave!—in the heart of the deep. It is a stupendous fact; but could we hear the groan of one poor agonizing wretch, as it ascends from the hold of the slave ship—one shriek, one moan from the agonizing mother, one wail of the little child—the fatherless, motherless, homeless child, as it goes up to the ear of Him who records it all against the day of reckoning, it would leave an impression far deeper even than the one astounding fact, that half a million of such sorrowful creatures are yearly doomed to drink the cup of woe handed out to them by their fellow-man—one groan, one single groan, would drown the “Song of Jubilee” if raised by a thousand voices. But who can count the groans, the shrieks of mourning, lamentation, and woe, that every moment are heard, by day and by night, along the great pathway of the world?

Well is it for us that we cannot see, that we cannot hear, what we are impotent to heal. The heart would give way in its frantic struggle to stay or avenge it.

“No eye but ours could ever bear
To gaze all down the drear abyss,
Because none ever saw so clear
The shore beyond of endless bliss.”

No, the groans of creation are anything but jubilant; and well may we exclaim, “O Lord, how long!” The whole creation groaneth and travaileth, waiting for the manifestation of the sons of God—waiting for the appearance of the Lord, the Head of the new creation.

“O that the months would roll away,
And bring the coronation day.”

But it is time that I brought this letter to a close. Before doing so, I must fulfil my promise of visiting with you some of the little oases in the world’s great desert. Bless God there are many of them—sweet “little spots enclosed by grace, out of the world’s wide wilderness;” and there is no part of that wilderness where they are not to be found. In the frozen shores of the Arctic regions—in the burning sands of the deserts—in the east and west—in the north and south—on Greenland’s icy mountains—on India’s coral strand—in every country and in every clime—in the quiet village and in the busy town—in the palace—in the cottage—in the mansion, and in the garret and cellar—in the houses of parliament, and in the houses of correction for indigent poverty—God has a seed to serve him, and he is still gathering them out of the world that lieth in the wicked one, by the preaching of the gospel—by the evangelist at home and the evangelist abroad—from every kindred and nation and people and tongue. Great is the honor he puts upon Britain in making her a quiver for his arrows. The Bible Society, the Missionary Societies, the Tract Society, like three sister graces, look lovely apart, but O how lovely in their blended beauty! What has not God wrought by means of their work of faith and labor of love, (and by America, too,) notwithstanding our national crimes, in the one great cause of “spreading the knowledge of Christ among heathen and other unenlightened nations.”

Well, here, you say, here we may surely sing with a joyful heart. True: but it must not be a strain that tells of “the world’s jubilee” in the absence of the world’s rightful Lord—of the earth’s deliverance from bondage while “the god of this world” is triumphant, and making the whole creation groan. It must not be of a time anterior to that when the cry shall be heard, “The kingdoms of this world are become the kingdom of our Lord, and of his Christ, and he shall reign for ever and ever.” Tell me not that it is the preaching of the gospel that will do all this. It is only the province of the gospel to announce it. “The gospel of the kingdom” is one thing, “the kingdom” itself is another thing. The invitation is not the feast. We have come to talk about the gospel as though there were something cabalistic in the word. We have come to regard it very much as the Jew regards the law, or the papist the crucifix. It is a message—it is an announcement—it is not that of which it testifies—it is not the kingdom of Christ—it has done, and is doing, and will yet do its appointed work, gather out the little flock to whom it is the Father’s good pleasure to give the kingdom. But it will do no more. It will not heal the sick, for it is not its province. It will not give sight to the blind, nor hearing to the deaf, nor feet to the lame, for it is not its province. It will not raise the dead, for it is not its province. It will not cause waters to spring forth in the desert, nor make the wilderness flourish and blossom as the rose. It will not dethrone the god of this world, for it is not its province. It will not close the door of the world’s great hospital—

“The leazar house, sad, noisome, dark, wherein are laid Numbers of all diseased, all maladies
Of ghostly anguish, or racking torture, qualms
Of heart-sick agony, all feverous kinds,
Convulsions, epilepsies, fierce catarrhs,
Intestine stone and ulcer, cholick pangs,
Demonic frenzy, moping melancholy,
And moon-struck madness, pining atrophy,
Marasmus, and wide-wasting pestilence,
Dropsies and asthmas, and joint-racking rheums.”

But all this is to be done; and when the number of the elect is complete, that number known only to Him who keeps the book; “the Lamb’s book of life,” in which their names are written—when the last of the little flock shall have heard the Shepherd’s voice through the instrumentality of the preaching of the gospel—then the trumpet shall sound, and the dead shall be raised incorruptible, and we (the living) shall be changed in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye. And then the kingdom shall come, and God’s will be done on earth, as it is done in heaven, and the groans of creation shall cease. Let the angel speed, then, his flight through the midst of heaven, having the everlasting gospel to preach unto them that dwell on the earth, and to every nation and kindred and tongue and people, and say with a loud voice, "Fear God, and give glory to him, for the hour of his judgment is come." For then shall come the restitution of all things promised from before the foundation of the world. For, concomitant with and consequent upon the second coming of Christ, shall be—The resurrection of the sleeping saints—the change of the living saints—the casting out and binding of Satan—the destruction of Antichrist—the gathering of Israel—the descent of the New Jerusalem—the eradication of the curse from the earth—the deliverance of the creature from the bondage of corruption—the kingdom of Christ and his saints—the whole earth filled with his glory. And then shall the Redeemer see of the travail of his soul, and be satisfied. And we shall be satisfied too, "if by any means we may attain unto the resurrection of the dead," awake in his likeness, and share in his glory.

I do not know that I can better close this letter than in the closing words of "the declaration of the faith of the Congregational Churches:" "As Christ would have us to be certainly persuaded that there shall be a judgment, to deter all men from sin, and for the greater consolation of the godly in their adversity, so will he have that day unknown to men, that they may shake off all carnal security, and be always watchful, because they know not at what hour the Lord will come, and may be ever prepared to say, 'Come, Lord Jesus, come quickly.'—Amen." And to this I add my Amen also.

"The wise shall understand."

ROCHESTER, MARCH 31, 1847.

Time of the Second Advent. NO. XIII.

As further evidence that the advent of Christ is at the door, we offer the ago of the world. That the people of God before and after the christian era believed that the present state of the world would end at the close of six thousand years from the creation, is abundantly evident from the following testimony, which we copy from Bliss' 'Chronology of the Bible.' Speaking first of the faith of the Jewish Rabbins, the account says:

"As for my opinion," saith R. Menasse, "I think that after six thousand years, the world shall be destroyed, upon one certain day, or in one hour; that the arches of heaven shall make a stand, as immovable; that there will be no more generation or corruption; and all things by the resurrection shall be renovated, and return to a better condition." Menasse also assures us that "this out of doubt is the opinion of the most learned Aben Ezra," who looked for it in the New Earth of Isaiah 65: 17.

IRENEUS flourished A. D. 178. He was Bishop of Lyons, and says:—"In as many days as this world was made, in so many thousand years it is perfected: for if the day of the Lord be as it were a thousand years, and in six days those things that are made were finished, it is manifest, that the perfecting of those things in the six thousandth year, when Antichrist reigning 1260 years, shall have wasted all things in the world, &c., then shall the Lord come from heaven in the clouds, with the glory of his Father."

BARNABAS SAYS—"God made in six days the works of his hands, and he finished them on the seventh day, and he rested on the seventh day, and sanctified it. Consider, my children, what that signifies:—'He finished them in six days.' The meaning is this: that in six thousand years, the Lord will bring all things to an end. For with him one day is a thousand years, as Himself testified saying: 'Behold this day shall be as a thousand years; therefore, children, in six days (i. e. in 6000 years) shall all things be accomplished. And what is that he saith,—'He rested the seventh day?' He meaneth that when his Son shall come, and abolish the Wicked One, and judge the ungodly, and change the sun and moon and stars, then he shall gloriously rest in the seventh day." See sec. xiv. xv. Epist. Barnabas.

CYPRIAN, Bishop of Carthage, flourished A. D. 222. His writings are held in great esteem by all the godly. He speaks of the six thousand years' completion and perfection fulfilled. The testimony of all the fathers is so general and concurrent on the universality of this belief, that this point cannot be denied without impeaching their veracity.

LACTANTIUS, who lived about A. D. 310, says in his 'Book of Divine Institutions,'—"Let philosophers know, who number thousands of years, ages since the beginning of the world, that the six thousandth year is not yet concluded or ended. But that number being fulfilled, of necessity there must be an end, and the state of human things must be transformed into that which is better." This he proves from God's making the world in six days.

The learned JOSEPH MEDER, called the "illustrious Meder," says—"The divine institution of a Sabbatical, or seventh year's solemnity among the Jews, has a plain typical reference to the seventh chiliad, or millenary of the world, according to the well known tradition among the Jewish Doctors, adopted by many in every age of the Christian church, that this world will attain to its limit at the end of six thousand years."

The Rev. RICHARD CLARK, in his essay on the number seven takes a similar view. He also says in his treatise on the prophetic numbers of Daniel and John, that "The six thousand years preceding the Sabbath of rest" "will be cut short in righteousness."

THOMAS BURNET, in his "Theory of the Earth," printed in London A. D. 1697, states that it was the received opinion of the primitive church from the days of the Apostles to the council of Nice, that this earth would continue six thousand years, when the resurrection of the just and conflagration of the earth, would usher in the millennium and reign of Christ on earth.

Gibbon, in his "Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire," speaking of the faith and character of primitive Christians, says:—"The ancient and popular doctrine of the Millennium was intimately connected with the second coming of Christ. As the works of creation had been finished in six days, their duration in the present state, according to a tradition which was attributed to the prophet Elijah, was fixed at six thousand years. By the same analogy, it was inferred that this long period of labor and contention, which was now almost elapsed, [the early Christians supposed the world was about 6000 years old in their day] would be succeeded by a joyful Sabbath of a thousand years—and that Christ, with the triumphal band of saints, and the elect who had escaped death, or who had been miraculously revived, would reign upon the earth till the time appeared for the last resurrection."

John Bunyan, the pious author of the Pilgrim's Progress, says:—"God's blessing the Sabbath Day, and resting on it from all his works, was a type of that glorious rest the Saints shall have when the six days of this world are fully ended. This the apostle asserted in the 4th chapter to the Hebrews, 'there remaineth a rest (or the keeping of a Sabbath) to the people of God,' which Sabbath, as I conceive, will be the seventh thousand of years which are to follow immediately after the earth has stood six thousand years first. For as God was six days in the works of Creation and rested on the seventh, so in six thousand years he will perfect his works and providence that concern this world. As also he will finish the toil and travail of his Saints, with the burden of the beasts and the curse of the ground, and bring all into rest for a thousand years. A day with the Lord is a thousand years: wherefore this blessed and desirable time is also called a day, a great day, that great and notable day of the Lord, which shall end in the eternal judgment of the world.—God hath held this forth by several other shadows, as the Sabbath of weeks, the Sabbath of years, and the Great Jubilee."—Works vol. 6, p. 301.

Again he says:—"None even saw this world as it was in its first creation but Adam and his wife, neither will any see it until the Manifestation of the children of God: that is, until the redemption or resurrection of the Saints. But then it shall be delivered from the bondage of corruption into the glorious liberty of the children of God."—Ib. p. 329.

We may add to this testimony, the universal belief of the church, before the advent question was agitated by Bro. Wm. Miller and others. Mr. Dowling objected to Bro. Miller's theory because, as he supposed, the six thousand years from the creation had not expired. Such was our faith on this subject, that the first thing we did towards testing the truth of Bro. Miller's views was, to ascertain whether the world was six thousand years old or not. In short, such was the general belief of the church on this subject, that it was only necessary, in many cases, in order to produce at least strong conviction that the advent was near, to prove that the world was actually about six thousand years old.

That the seventh thousand years of our world's existence will be a Sabbath of rest, appears evident from Paul's reasoning in the third and fourth chapters of Hebrews. He says in chapter iv. 9, 10—"There remaineth therefore a rest (or keeping of a Sabbath, marg.) to the people of God. For he that is entered into his rest, he also hath ceased from his own works, as God did from his. The argument seems to be this: As God rested on the seventh day, so will his people rest or keep a Sabbath on the seventh day of this world, or the seventh day of the Lord; which is as a thousand years (2 Pet. iii. 8), that is, that portion of time which we count a thousand years, constitutes but one day with the Lord, in the anti-type, of the type, viz: the first seven days of the history of our world. As it was in the type so it will be in the anti-type, the seventh day will be a day of rest, or the long looked for glorious Millennium.

Is the world now about six thousand years old?—We say it is: and offer the following evidence in proof of the correctness of the assertion. Archbishop Usher, our standard chronologist, makes the age of the world at the commencement of the Christian era, 4004 years. Add to this 1847, and we have 5851, the supposed present age of the world; leaving it 149 years short of six thousand years old. Now that Usher has made a mistake of about this number of years, we think can be clearly demonstrated.—He has probably followed the doubtful or incorrect text in 1 Kings vi. 1, which makes the time from the exode of the children of Israel from Egypt to the fourth year of Solomon's reign, to be only 480 years. That this number is too small will be seen by the following testimony:

The sojourning of the children of Israel in the wilderness, according to Joshua v. 6, was	40
Joshua's reign and the time of the elders and anarchy, according to Josephus, was	43
Reign of the Judges to Samuel the prophet, Acts xiii. 20, was about	450
Time the ark abode at Kirjath-jearan, Judges vii. 2,	20
Saul reigned, Acts xiii. 21,	40
David " 2 Sam. v. 4, 5,	40
To Solomon's 4th year, 1 Kings vi. 1,	4

By this computation, we make 637 years, where Archbishop Usher counts only 480, making a difference of 157 years. Add 157 to the age of the world according to Usher 5851 and we have for the present ago of the world, 6008

Dr Jarvis gives to the elders and the anarchy only 41 years. There is also some doubt as to the exact correctness of the 20 years assigned to the ark while at Kirjath-jearan and Samuel's reign. Also to Solomon's fourth year may have included only three full years. But as the object of this investigation is not to show that the world is precisely 6000 years old (which we think cannot be accurately proved), but that it is about that age, we will therefore dispense with further remarks; only we will say that we are not far from the close of the 6000 years of the age of this world : If the testimony proves anything it proves this.

The conclusion is, that we have all the testimony which can be drawn from the universal belief of the church in all ages, that 6000 years will close the present order of our world, and bring in the Millennium—we also have the testimony of the Bible on this point decidedly in our favor, and the startling fact, according to the best evidence in the case, that the world now is about 6000 years old—we say that we have all this testimony to aid in proving that the coming of the Lord is emphatically at the door.

In view of these things we most seriously ask all, all, why has this almost overwhelming amount of the most infallible testimony been given? Reason and the inspired word unite in the answer—"that ye might believe; and that, believing, ye might have life."—O then, let faith, unwavering faith, take hold on the divine testimony, which we have presented in this and the preceding numbers, that the appearing of Christ and his kingdom will most surely soon be witnessed. There can be no mistake in this matter—therefore let no man deceive you, or cause you to become unbelieving, or to put far off that great and terrible day of the Lord. See that you are constantly ready; for, sudden as the lightning's flash will be the coming of the Son of man.

What do they Indicate?

The account on our last page, in Mr. Merriam's article which we copy from the Scientific American, of over fifty earthquakes having occurred in A. D. 1816; also the extensive convulsions which have taken place during the same length of time—and other wonderful phenomena which he names, should cause every sane mind most seriously to enquire, What do these things indicate? what must be their end? They are sure indications that some fearful crisis awaits our world not far in the future; and the unerring word of the Lord plainly tells us what that crisis will be, viz; the melting of the elements with fervent heat, in the great and terrible day of the Lord.

Blind indeed must be that person, especially with the Bible in his possession, who cannot or does not discern the signs of these fearfully ominous times. But such blindness does now exist to a most painful degree among the supposed wise ones of the day.—And we were never more forcibly reminded of this fact than a few evenings since, at a Scotch Relief Meeting, held at the first Presbyterian church in this city. Mr. Husbands, an eminent lawyer, and prominent member of that church, in his pathetic and eloquent address on the present Famine in Scotland, Ireland, &c., said he thought "God designed to use it as a means of evangelizing the world!"—We suppose were he to speak of the Afghanistan, the Chinese, and the Mexican wars—the fatal ravages of the Asiatic Cholera—the devouring fires—the resistless floods—the devastating tempests—the dreadful earthquakes, which have been witnessed for a few years past—we say, were he to speak of these and other sure indications that the end of all sublunary things is at hand, we suppose he would see in them convincing tokens that God designs to use them all as efficient means in evangelizing the world. Surely light is put for darkness, and darkness for light. The signs of the times are not understood by the great mass of the church and world; both are now in a perfectly fit condition to have the day of the Lord come upon them as a snare, as a thief. And doubtless it will so come upon them to their everlasting confusion, unless they soon make full preparation to stand when the Son of man shall appear.

Convention of Churches on Slavery.

Under this caption, says the New York Evangelist, "A large and very respectable convention of the Congregational and Presbyterian churches on Western Reserve, Ohio, was held at Akron, on Tuesday and Wednesday, Feb. 16th and 17th, for the discussion of subjects connected with the duty of the churches & ministry in regard to American Slavery." We are glad to learn that the following is the result of this meeting. Similar steps, we are told, have been and are about to be taken in other places, by the "orthodox churches." Let the work go on, and slavery will not only stand rebuked as it should by every christian and benevolent body, but it will soon be seen that we have not been alone in highly censuring the course taken by the American delegation at the meeting of the Evangelical Alliance in the city of London, last fall. The following are the resolutions of the Akron convention:

1. Resolved, 'That we bear our earnest and solemn testimony against slavery by not inviting slaveholders to our pulpits.'
2. Resolved, 'That slaveholders should not be admitted to membership in our churches.'
3. Resolved, 'That slaveholders should not be invited to the Lord's table.'
4. Resolved, 'That the churches ought to make an effort effectually to furnish the Bible to the colored and slave population deprived of it in the United States.'
5. Resolved, 'That ministers ought to preach expressly against slaveholding.'
6. Resolved, 'That the conduct of the American delegation at the meeting of the Evangelical Alliance on the subject of slavery was not justifiable.'
7. Resolved, 'That the discussion of the subject of slavery, and a declaration of sentiment respecting it, is appropriate business of the General Assemblies of the Presbyterian churches of the United States.'
8. Resolved, 'That the Missionary Boards with which we stand connected ought to make a declaration of sentiment, disapproving of the admission of slaveholders to the Mission churches.'

THE VOICE OF GOD : or an Account of the Unparalleled Fires, Hurricanes, Floods and Earthquakes, commencing with 1845. Also, some account of Pestilence, Famine, & Increase of Crime. Compiled by Thomas M. Preble.

This is a work of 84 duodecim pages recently got up by Bro. T. M. Preble, Albany, N. Y. Price, $7 per hundred—$1 per dozen, and 12½ cts per single copy. Orders for them should be addressed—T. M. Preble, Albany, N. Y. They may also be had at this office. They can be sent by mail.

Those who may wish to correctly inform themselves of the unparalleled destruction of life and property, for a few years past, by Fire, Flood, Storm, Earthquake, &c., had better obtain this book. God has spoken in these terrific ways to the world, for a few years past, but alas, few have heeded his warnings.

THIS NUMBER—commences the 14th volume of the Voice of Truth. In reviewing the past, we see many things to regret, as well as very many for which we should be truly thankful. We humbly crave pardoning mercy from the hand of our God, for all the hurtful mistakes which we may have committed and wrongs we may have done, during the term of our past imperfect labors in the best of all causes. May we in future more strictly than ever follow the unerring counsel of our God, and renew our diligence to serve him with faithfulness—that we may better glorify his name in all we do.

We crave the prayers and united and faithful co-operation of all our kind patrons, in the work before us; until it shall be accomplished, which doubtless will be soon.

We have not forgotten our proposition to enlarge our sheet without increasing the price; but cannot well do it now without too great sacrifice, as we have yet on hand a quantity of paper of the size we now use. When that is used up, the Lord willing, we will then soon give the enlarged sheet. We shall not be able to do it, however, without an increased number of subscribers, and promptness in payment on present dues. Let each do what is duty in the case, and all will be right.

TO CORRESPONDENTS. C. D.—Your exposition of a part of Rev. xviii., we think on the whole better not be published: it is more an expression of your opinion, than a critical exposition, sustained by sound reason and clear Bible testimony. We have commenced a re-examination of the Apocalypse, and may soon speak on the whole or a part of that very difficult to be understood book.

E. M. H.—We deeply regret to know that there is one, who professes to possess the peaceful spirit of the merciful Jesus, and pretends to be a believer in his immediate coming—who is an advocate of the murderous Mexican war, and the oppressive system of American slavery! Can it be possible! The Lord have mercy upon you, and show you your woful deception before it shall be too late to prepare to meet him. Your article in defence of these wicked abominations, of course is declined.

We commend to the careful examination of all, the lengthy article in this number, "The World's Jubilee." It is a part of a valuable pamphlet of 35 pages recently published by Bro. J. V. Himes, Boston, Mass., and may be had of him at $3 per hundred copies. Let it be circulated.

From the Day Dawn.

"The Voice of Truth."

DEAR BROTHER CROSTEN.—Having seen that it was the apparent wish of Elder Marsh to destroy the effect that our and Bro. Edson's remarks concerning the cost of the Voice of Truth, might have abroad, and having a desire that the truth as far as may be should be fairly laid before the Advent brethren, I have taken the pains to have a good practical printer, who is well acquainted with the prices Elder Marsh pays, and a man without whom dependence can be placed, make out a statement of the actual cost of his paper, including as you will see, all but the cost of folding and the usual duties of an editor. The folding, I have learned, and I think correctly, he pays one dollar for. This statement is given for the cost of 2,000 copies. He intimates that he sometimes strikes off a quantity of extra copies. Let it be so. You will see that it must still fall considerably short of the price spoken of by Bro. Edson. After saying that in all cases of doubt the figures are probably higher than the actual cost, the statement goes on to say:

Composition, averaging from 36,000 to 42,000 ems per week.
I call it 42,000 ems, at 1s. 6d. per thousand,	$7 00
2 reams of paper, at $3.50 per ream,	7 00
Press work per week,	3 50
Mailing papers,	1 50
Rent of Office,	1 50
In a postscript he says, there should be added, probably,
75 cents for placing the type in pages, which I add,	0 75
Also one dollar for folding,	1 00
Weekly cost of the paper,	$23 25

The above facts, the statement says, are obtained from actual knowledge and correct data, and can be relied on as correct.—Mailing, it says, is pretty high. I have now to add, that this is a matter that is easy to be got at; and should any one wish to investigate the matter further, they have only to take a number, and by the assistance of almost any printer, they can come very near the cost at any time. My request is if any one doubt this statement, before laying it aside as untrue, they will be to the trouble of satisfying themselves as to the cost. I am aware, however, that Elder Marsh gets his type set a little cheaper than the ordinary price. I am also quite confident that Bro. Edson's statement, with regard to the receipts being fifty dollars per week in Elder Marsh's paper, is below what they average. This any one can satisfy himself of, if he will but look for himself. According to this, we see that Elder Marsh has, I think, at least $25 per week income, above the cost of his paper. He says he expends about this amount. But is such an expense justifiable? I have a family composed of the same number of individuals, and yet my expenses are not above 6 or 7 dollars per week. It may be said, he visits and adds to his expenses; but this is not a considerable extent. Well, he intimates that he gives to charitable objects. Is it consistent that he should realize more than twice the cost of his paper, so that he can be charitable? Would it not be charitable to put his paper as low as he can and live by it? Well, he says in his prospectus, "Grats to those who are unable to pay." Well, then, whose gift is it to those poor, when the remainder who do pay make him realize more than twice the cost of his whole number? HARRY MASSAR, Rochester, N. Y., March 4th, 1847.

REMARKS ON THE ABOVE.

We are heartily sorry to be under the necessity of consuming time and space in our sheet, in correcting the foolish errors into which those concerned in sending out the above letter have fallen; but for their good and for the benefit of those who are likely to be hurtfully deceived by its statements, we do it.

1. Supposing we are as bad as or even worse than certain brethren of the "Day Dawn" represent; why should they trouble themselves about us? If, as they hold, the wise virgins were shut in to the marriage, and the foolish shut out, in the 7th month of '44, why trouble themselves any more about either foolish or wise? the fate of each, according to their hypothesis, must long since have been unchangeably sealed. They either act inconsistent with their theory, or do not really believe it: facts seem to indicate both.

2. In the first attack, made by Mr Edson and the editor of the Day Dawn, the latter judges, as he says, "from his own knowledge," that the weekly expenses of "the Voice of Truth" are not over $30. They have now learned, as will be seen by the above letter from Harry Marsh, from "facts obtained from actual knowledge," (we italicize) that the expenses of our paper per week are only $23.23. A little more such kind of knowledge (!), and our weekly expenses would all disappear, especially in the light of the "Day Dawn."

3. The following "correction" will show that this kind of knowledge is at best but a broken reed, and is very liable to pierce the hand of him who leans upon it. That the practical printer named by Mr. Marsh, is an honorable man, his "correction" will show; as well as the fact that it was offered unsolicited by us. When he learned what use had been made of his unguarded statement, like a gentleman and a Christian, he called on us and offered to make the necessary correction. Till then we knew not to what printer Mr. Marsh referred. The following is the

CORRECTION.

ELDER J. MARSH—Sir:—At the request of Mr. Harry Marsh, of this city, I furnished him with a brief statement of the probable expense, per week, of printing the "Voice of Truth," the substance of which he has since published in the "Day Dawn." Not knowing the purpose for which it was designed, I was probably not as particular as otherwise I should have been, for, as I was about to make the estimate, I was assured by A. (a printer) at my elbow, that B., (formerly in your employ,) informed him that the paper averaged from 26,000 to 30,000 ems per week—which, on inquiry of B., I find to have been a mistake. But on an accurate calculation which I have just made, I find it contains 47,000 ems; and the paper, which I was informed could be purchased at $1.50 per ream, I have now every reason to believe costs $1.50 per ream. It may appear strange that I should now correct a statement previously furnished by me, and which I then extracted as being "obtained from actual knowledge and correct data." I did so, relying upon the information received from others as correct. I attach blame to no individual—I should have been more careful.

As the statement published in the "Day Dawn," now appears, it conveys an idea different from what I intended, for, the type and material being your own property, it costs you more than the actual amount paid to your compositors, as the use, and consequent depreciation of type, &c., should be taken into consideration.

The price of the composition of 47,000 ems, at 18 cts. per 1000, would be $8.46
 Were you to employ me to furnish materials and perform the same amount of service, I should charge at least 25 cents per 1000 ems, which would amount to $11.75

In other words, I deem it but common justice, that you should be allowed the same per centage for the use of your materials, that would be exacted by other printers and publishers.

Yours respectfully,
 W. S. F.

Rochester, March 23, 1847.

This candid statement should satisfy every one of the great injustice done to us by the incorrect representations made by the mistaken brethren of the Day Dawn. A similar mistake occurs in nearly every specification they have made. Until a few weeks past (when we struck off several hundred delinquents) we have uniformly used from near a quarter to a ream of paper per week more than Mr. Marsh gives; and during the last year we have issued an edition of extras on Time, we think of ten thousand, and the Conference Address of, we believe, five thousand copies, both at an expense of not far from two hundred dollars: all the monies for which, and all donations, are acknowledged in our weekly receipts— which, if we have made no mistake in adding, for the past year have averaged a little short of fifty dollars per week. Our office rent, keeping books, folding and mailing papers, press work and incidental expenses have cost us not far from ten dollars per week. Add to this the fact that on the enlarged sheet up to 47,000 ems, our paper contained 47,000 ems, according to the "Correction" above, it would add to the price of composition $1.75. The amount of our weekly expenses nearer $23.23. Add to this our house rent and other expenses of every kind, and we leave the unfortunates who read these columns to decide whether we are prodigal in our business and living or not— even admitting that the "six or seven dollars per week" expense of Mr. H. Marsh must be made the model of our expenses. Our public calling necessarily brings much company, consequently our expenses are not infrequently considerable.

This estimate makes the composition 35 cents per 1000 ems, whereas we have never paid over 31 cents as our bills will show. It should also be remembered that this estimate relates to our business before we commenced using our own type. Since then our expenses have been reduced some, and which was absolutely necessary in order to sustain our business. By the strictest economy with the aid of funds we had on hand, with the rich blessings of our gracious Lord and Master, and with the faithful co-operation of true-hearted brethren, we have been enabled to continue the publication of THE VOICE OF TRUTH, AND GLAD TIDINGS OF THE KINGDOM AT HAND until this day of perils, for which we do most sincerely thank the Lord. We have endeavored to be a faithful steward over the treasure committed to our charge, and fear not the decision of our brethren and of our God in the great day upon our doings; but we do fear and tremble for those who unjustly and without a cause repeatedly judge in this matter. The Lord forgive them, for they know not what they do.

Time of the Advent.

The position taken on this subject by the Advent brethren, previous to '43 and '44 was, as I believe, Scriptural and safe. It is true we were disappointed at the end of both those periods, in not witnessing the consummation of our hope—but we believed that the advent movement 'was from heaven' and not of men; therefore we stood upon our watch to see what the Lord would say unto us; and we have not waited in vain, for light from on high has shone upon our pathway, and we can now see that our disappointments were but the fulfillment of prophecy.

What was our position in '43 and '44? Why, in relation to the 2300 days of Daniel, we believed they carried us to the end of time—and that the 70 weeks so explained the 2300 days that the humble believer in God's word might understand when they terminated: that ground was certainly Scriptural—was safe then and is safe now. 'All Scripture is given by inspiration of God, and is profitable,' &c. Then the 2300 days are for our profit—for our instruction. Again, Paul says, Rom. xv. 4—'For whatsoever things were written aforetime were written for our learning,' &c. We find also in the first epistle of Peter, that the prophets inquired and searched diligently into the time of the first and second advent of the Savior—they found the time, and left it on the page of inspiration, for the instruction of succeeding generations. And again, in connection with this subject, we have the positive promise of Him who cannot lie, that 'the wise shall understand.' These, with many other kindred passages furnish clear evidence that the time of the second advent of our Savior may be known. [I do not now say that we shall know the day and the hour.] The fact that the 2300 days did not end as we expected in '43 nor in '44, does not prove that we can never understand that period; nor does it prove that it is not now understood. I believe we do now correctly understand from the Scriptures that time will end in 1847. Thirty-seven years include the life of Christ and the confirming of the covenant during the last week of the 70. Then if we subtract the 37 years from the 70 weeks or 490 years, it leaves 153 B. C.; and 153 subtracted from 2300 leave 1847—the last year of the 2300—the time for the cleansing of the sanctuary—the year for the coming of the Son of man, to gather into mansions of everlasting blessedness his own children—but taking vengeance on them that have not obeyed the gospel. What a moment is just before us! a moment full of joy, immortality, eternal life to the righteous; but to the wicked, tribulation and anguish; for upon them God 'shall rain snares, fire and brimstone and an horrible tempest: this shall be the portion of their cup.'—Psa. xi. 6.

But the fearful, wavering, doubting adventist is ready to ask, 'What will you do, if the Savior should not come in '47?' I will continue to wait and watch and pray: God's word is true, and will never fail to comfort, enlighten, edify and build up in the most holy faith, His believing children. Therefore in God's strength, I will hold on to the light I have already obtained from His holy word, and search diligently for more as for hid treasures; trusting fully in His promises that if I seek wisdom I shall assuredly find. I hope I am not a worshiper of time; but Almighty Wisdom has revealed it to us in the Bible, and it is brought to view so frequently and so forcibly by the prophets, by the Savior and his apostles, that he who endeavors to hide this subject in the dark by false arguments, cannot be guiltless in the sight of Him who will soon judge the world in righteousness.

E. MARSH.

Tobacco.

DEAR BRO. MARSH—Permit me to say a few words upon this subject through your paper, to the brethren and sisters who are seeking to know and be conformed to the truth. I feel that some suggestions are demanded, and hope that these will not be altogether in vain. There are some, (I do not say how many, hoping there may be comparatively few,) even among those who are watching daily for the return of their Lord, who are in the habit of using tobacco, in some of its forms; and there are not a few who are grieved and troubled by it. Now, there may be among the former number those who have not seriously taken into consideration the evils resulting from this habit, but who are willing to look at it in the light of reason and Scripture, and be governed according to the light they may receive. To such I would kindly suggest some thoughts—and in the first place, tobacco is an actual poison. This has been fully demonstrated by those who are capable of understanding the subject, and facts that cannot be denied are brought to prove it. Medical men have become so well acquainted with its fatal effects, that they seldom now administer it as a remedy in disease. It is a well established opinion among them that it is a deleterious, pernicious weed—not fit for the human system. Experiments have been made by some of the most eminent physicians in our country, by which it has been ascertained that three drops of the distilled oil of tobacco dropped upon the tongue of a full sized animal, usually produces death in from three to ten minutes! Now who would doubt, from such a fact, that this was a poison of the most active kind? True, it is taken in moderate quantities and its effects are slow upon individuals, so that they are not always apprehended—and many who use it declare that they are not injured by it at all, although they may at the same time be at a loss to know why they have no more strength of nerve, and are so easily tempted to irritability. And can you, my brother or sister, persist in a habit which is so detrimental to the system? Will you thus injure the body, which you have professedly presented to God as a 'living sacrifice,' to be the temple of the Holy Spirit? and at the same time impair those powers of mind, (which suffer with the body,) consecrated to His service and fitting for eternal action? Look at it—think of it—pray over it, and then decide.

Again—using tobacco is an expensive habit. But little is expended at a time, it is true, but it is the accumulation of small sums that make a large amount. Who would believe, for instance, that simply cigar smoking in the United States, was an expense of ten millions of dollars annual.

ly! Yet such is reported to be the fact. How much of this sum, we may ask, is raised by the professed followers of Christ—yea, by advent believers? Do you ever think, when spending your money, though it may be coppers only, for this weed either to smoke or chew, of the many calls for funds in these last days to spread the gospel of the kingdom? to carry the glad tidings that Jesus is coming to those who are in the depths of sorrow and yet groping in darkness? How many pages of truth might be purchased with that small amount, and by the blessing of God made to enlighten some mind and inspire it with the glorious hope? Count up then what you expend in this way in one year, and then estimate how many Bibles or other publications might be procured with that amount, or how much provision purchased to supply the actual necessity of some of those watchmen upon Zion's walls, who are telling you through the papers and otherwise, that they have no means of support—are worn down with their efforts to sustain their families while preaching, and shall be obliged to leave the field, unless help is obtained? How much would that sum aid toward their support which you expend annually for your own gratification in the use of tobacco? My brother and sister, are you stewards of God? Has he entrusted any of this world's goods to your care, and is the time near at hand when he will demand the use you have made of them—that great day of reckoning—and will you, can you use these means in a self-gratification which is so decidedly ruinous to soul and body? See to it then, whether you have laid all upon the altar. If so, you will not—no, I am sure you will not, when fully convinced of the evil of this habit, or when the light in any degree shines upon your mind in regard to it, continue it any longer.

Again—this habit is exceedingly unpleasant in its nature, and offensive to those who have never imbibed it; and more than that, seems inconsistent with the high standing of a Christian, and one who is looking for a pure and glorified Savior. In a bar-room, at the gambling-table, or among any of the reckless throngs of earth, the fumes of tobacco do not seem amiss. We expect all that is low and unseemly there. But to find it among a company of Christ's disciples—those whose 'citizenship is in heaven'—who meet to talk of things that are 'unseen and eternal,' their glorious inheritance—then to come in contact with the fumes of this noxious weed, awakens feelings of the utmost repugnance,—we turn away heart-sick and sorrowful. This has been my own experience, and I doubt not that of many others. I have sat down to talk with a brother upon the doctrines of our blessed faith, when the smoke of the cigar, or pipe, or the strongly tobacco-scented breath would so sicken me, that it would be my earnest wish at least, to close the conversation and remove from his presence. Oh, there is such an inconsistency in such a practice with the purity of our faith, that I have felt to weep in secret places that it should be permitted to have a place among us. But I will not prolong remarks. I am addressing those who are seeking for truth upon all points, and when presented are ready to yield to it. And now I beseech you in view of the considerations presented, as you value your own interests—the good of a dying world, and the honor of that God whom you profess to obey, lay aside forever the poisonous weed.

Do you say that it is a habit long cherished, and you have not strength to overcome it? 'My God shall supply all you need,' saith the blessed word. He will give you strength to overcome. Decide resolutely and firmly, and look to Him for grace to help—others have done so before you—you can, you may, you ought to do it.

If there are any of our brethren and sisters among the number addicted to this habit who have already been convinced that it ought to be abolished, and yet will not use the self-denial requisite, let me refer them to that passage in one of John's epistles—'If our heart condemn us, God is greater than our heart and knoweth all things. But if our heart condemn us not, then have we confidence toward God.' My brother or sister, can you pray in faith while you are conscious that you are doing wrong in this thing? Look also at another Scripture found in the writings of the apostle Paul: 'Whether therefore ye eat or drink, or whatsoever ye do, do all to the glory of God;' and ask yourselves the question, whether this is for his glory. I leave the subject, praying that the truth may be made effectual to some minds and God be honored by it.

Your Sister in Christ.

CORRESPONDENCE.

LETTER FROM SISTER H. A. PARKS.

Jonestown, Rock Prairie, W. T., Feb. 11.

BRO. MARSH—I want to say to you, I am glad to see the proposition you made in reference to the paper. I will do all I can to aid in your undertaking by soliciting subscribers, and otherwise if possible, for I love to spread the glorious news of a coming Savior, in this as well as other ways. I send you a little (enclosed) to help in this work. The Lord has opened the hearts of the people where I have been laboring, so that I am well supplied, and by using economy, I find I have some to spare. May such as have administered so bountifully of their substance find the reward promised in Matt. xxv. 34.

I have been as far south as Buffalo Grove, Ill., and find some most faithful and devoted children of God scattered through this region. I have seen souls converted to God and numbers rejoicing in the evidences of the speedy coming of the Savior. Ministers and members of different names have embraced the faith, and some have said in tears of gratitude, that they thanked God for the privilege of meeting with a people that were despised and rejected by the proud and the popular. Wherever I go, I find open doors. I cannot comply with one-fifth of the calls which are coming from all directions.

Now, Bro. Marsh, I have not given this sketch to show what I have done—this I detest; but I have heard the cry, 'help, help,' so much of late, and none to help, that my heart sickens—and if ever I saw a time when I prayed earnestly for faithful, whole-hearted laborers to be sent into the vineyard, it is now. The brethren and sisters here wonder why it is that so many laborers stay at the east, where the field is comparatively burnt over, when there is a plentiful harvest here to be gathered in. Bro. Wm. Putnam and wife, (at whose house I am at present) are praying for God to send some holy and self-sacrificing man or men, who are able and willing to spend their whole time, independent of worldly interests, to spread the news of the approaching end. I do not mean that they should come here to starve, or be destitute of clothing; for if they will work for God, he is a sure pay-master: and again, there are brethren able and willing to administer to the wants of the speaker, if their wants are reasonable. And now, who will come? Can you recommend any of this description?

There has been a request made by a number of the brethren in different places, that it should be proposed that some brother from the east should come out in the spring (if the Lord does not come before) and hold some conferences, perhaps by taking a rout from Milwaukee through by the way of Rock Prairie, Buffalo Grove, Springfield, and so into Indiana, or wherever the friends may request: expenses will be paid. If any should come, it would be best to bring the old chart—it excites great interest, and gives great light to the people where they have never heard one advent sermon, and which is the case in many places in this region of country. I have met with some who wish to get charts for their own use—said they would pay any price for them.

Bro. Daniels is laboring in the south part of Ill., and a brother in this vicinity, seeing the destitution, has lately begun to lift his voice to preach the truth. These two are the only ones except myself, who are spending their whole time in the cause: there are two or three more who speak occasionally.

Your Sister in Christ,
H. A. PARKS.

BATTLE CREEK, Mich., Feb. 12.

The Lord has been with me since I came to Michigan. I have tried to preach the gospel to all in its simplicity, as often as practicable—have baptised two at Battle Creek, and left them as Philip did the eunuch, giving them the right hand of fellowship as belonging to the church of the First Born. Last Lord's day I commenced a course of lectures in Charleston to crowded and attentive congregations—shall preach next Lord's day in Charleston—have spent a few days in this wicked Sodom, where the gospel is not permitted to be preached in the so called houses of worship. I have seen the abomination of iniquity work in the M. E. Church. The said church, dedicated to the worship of God, was opened for temperance lectures, which were delivered in the highest theatrical style. I don't think you could find the drunkard, the rumseller, &c. acted out more perfectly in any theatre in New York. Such ironical, heaven-daring speeches and vulgar songs were enough to make an angel weep. I should say that the song of Old Dan Tucker was a religious song compared with those that came from the desk, dedicated to the worship of God! The house was kept in an uproar by stamping of the feet, spitting of hands, and high shouts of laughter. I thought that if God, Christ, and angels in heaven did not weep, it would be because they cannot weep in heaven. O how much these things resemble the feast of Belshazzar! But I leave this gloomy scene.

The dear brethren whom I visited after leaving Boston, will accept the humble thanks of their unworthy brother for their kindness in so abundantly supplying my wants. May God reward them with eternal life. Amen.

Yours looking for the kingdom of glory,
SAM'L G. CLARK.

DES PLAINES, Ill. Feb. 28.

BRO. MARSH—I thank God that through the liberality of brethren at the East, the Midnight Cry was sent here! I read and believed the blessed doctrine, and have since waited for the consolation of Israel.

I see in your remarks on Bro. St. John's letter you say, 'Who will go to the far West?' I say so too. The harvest truly is great here but the laborers are few who are willing to volunteer in the good cause. I have never yet seen an advent lecturer in this State. Professors of religion here generally manifest a dislike to the advent doctrine, and say all manner of evil against 'Wm. Miller, the false prophet,' and think Millerism all a humbug. I have lent the Voice to those of my neighbors who are willing to read it, and some of them are almost persuaded that these things are so.

I like the position you have taken on time. I think it to be the true Bible position and the only safe one for us to take.

Should any of our lecturing brethren come this way, they will find me three miles south of Des Plaines (on the Illinois and Michigan canal) twenty-five miles from Chicago.

Yours in the blessed hope,
R. CLEVELAND.

Earthquakes, Lightning Storms, Hurricanes, &c.

In compiling my Meteorological observations and records for 1846, the following facts appear:

In August, there were lightning storms on 21 days, and earthquakes on the 4th, 12th, 14th, 22d, 25th and 27th of that month.

In September, from the 1st to the 12th, both days inclusive, there were lightning storms on each day except the 10th, and on that day a severe shock of an earthquake was felt at Trinidad and a hurricane at Barbadoes. From the 6th of Sept. to the 30th, both days inclusive, there was a hurricane or gale on the Atlantic ocean between latitude 24 and 49° N., every day, doing immense damage to shipping. The gale of the 6th of September, commenced with an earthquake extending through the islands of St. Vincents and Grenada. There were more than 20 shocks of earthquakes in September; and on the 2d of that month, the mountain Gunung Marippi, in the island of Java, was at its summit heated to redness.

On the 10th of October, a hurricane commenced at Havana at 10 P. M., and traversed a narrow path via Key West, Charleston, S. C., Baltimore, Philadelphia, New York and Boston, reaching Boston on the evening of the 13th, in 72 hours from Havana. Its path was inscribed upon the terrestrial surface by the ruins it left as a remembrance of the extent of its labors.

On the 16th of October, a terrible lightning storm visited a village near Munich, in Germany, and entirely destroyed it. The fire spread to the forest and continued burning for four days: on the same day, a man was killed by lightning at Black Rock, Niagara, and the day following frost and snow traversed one-fifth the high latitudes of the northern hemisphere, and frost as low down as lat. 23.

There were upwards of fifty earthquakes in 1846.

On the 14th of June, 1846, the cholera broke out in a city on one of the rivers of India, at 8 o'clock in the evening, which in 72 hours carried off 8000 persons and then left, following the river and visiting every settlement upon its banks.

In June, 1846, the dysentery and measles extended their ravages over the whole district of Iceland, suffering from volcanic eruptions and earthquakes, and one-fourth of the inhabitants died.

In June, 1846, earthquakes were severe in Asia, on the coast of Africa, in South America and the West India Islands, and during one of the shakes the mountain volcano Soufriere, in the island of Guadaloupe, opened an immense natural laboratory containing a vast sulphur mine.

Our earth is extensively affected by convulsions upon its surface and these have occurred frequently for many months.

When the compilation of my observations are completed for 1846, I may be able to gather from them some interesting facts.

So far as my observations have extended, it appears that our snow storms at the north commence with lightning at the south, and the most terrific lightning storms come from earthquake convulsions.

SINGULAR PHENOMENON.—The Pensacola Gazette has the following notice of a singular phenomenon, which occurred at that place: "On Thursday of last week, (the 18th,) at half past 4 o'clock, P. M. was distinctly heard by several persons here, a violent explosion, like that produced by the firing of large guns or the blasting of rocks. This was instantly followed by a whizzing noise, like that of a cannon ball passing through air, but much more prolonged; this was succeeded again by what might have passed for the report of half a dozen or so of muskets, fired in very quick succession. What made these unusual sounds seem the more wonderful, was that they came from the north-east, a direction in which there is scarcely a cannon shot of New York, or a ledge of rocks short of the Alleghenies. On Saturday, intelligence was brought here that at the same time above mentioned, (Thursday, 4½ P. M.,) the same sounds were heard in Mobile Bay, sixty miles West of us; that the sounds were accompanied by the sight of a large meteor, and that the sound and the meteor were at the north-east from that point; thus showing that the phenomenon, whatever it was, was hundreds of miles away. Where and what was it?"

THE LAND OF VOLCANOES.—Italy seems to have other latent fires pent up in her bosom, than those which underlie her beautiful soil. A letter from Milan, lately published in a French paper in this city, asserts that "The people of Lombardy are about to make an attempt to redeem their country from its oppressions. "Death to the Austrians" is uttered by every one. During the week previous an outbreak had taken place at Milan, in consequence of an attempt on the part of the police to prevent the introduction of a Piedmontese Journal called Il Messaggero. The young men of Pavia resisted this conduct, and were joined by the students in the university. A conflict ensued, in which ten students were killed, and on the part of the Austrians thirty-five were killed, and more than a hundred wounded. In consequence, the university has been closed and the police are in pursuit of the students. Many have fled to Piedmont, and have been well received. Pamphlets were daily published in the Sardinian States also, and under the sanction of the government, in condemnation of the Austrian power. 'Be not surprised,' say the latter, 'if at any moment you should learn that all Italy had risen up as one man, to expel the tyrants.'"

The Pope too, seems to desire to breathe more freely than his Austrian harness permits. Austria first tried advice, on seeing the reform measures of the Pontiff, and then threatened to invade the Roman States. His Holiness is said to have replied with the old Roman firmness, that he considered himself an independent sovereign, able to take care of his own affairs. The Pope likewise protests against the Cracow outrage. How long this will last, is doubtful; but the Pope's encouragement of free principles may raise a spirit in the people that all his bulls and anathemas will not be able to lay.—N. Y. Evangelist.

Full of an Aerolite.

The inhabitants of Mindethal, in Bavaria, were scared from their Christmas festivities and yule-logs on the 25th ult., by the unexpected arrival of an aerial visitant. We subjoin a textual recital of this meteorological phenomenon from the Augsburg Gazette: "On Christmas Day, at two o'clock in the afternoon, a noise was heard in the environs of Mindethal, in a circumference of at least 18 leagues diameter, resembling, in the first instance, a distant cannonade. After 20 almost uniform discharges, this noise changed to a rumbling, the sounds of which strikingly resembled those of a kettle drum, tuned in F, and ended with sounds like those of distant trumpets. The whole phenomenon lasted about three minutes, and was heard in the same manner throughout the entire district. Every auditor imagined that he heard the noise over his head, but nothing was seen explanatory of the phenomenon. In the village of Schonenburg, however, westward of Mindethal, several persons discovered above the houses, a black ball rapidly descending, and a man saw this ball fall into a garden. The news of the event was soon spread abroad, and all the inhabitants, abandoning their fire-sides and family festivities, ran to the spot pointed out. They found an opening in the earth which emitted a sulphuric vapor. On digging with great zeal, a stone was discovered two feet below the surface, in the form of an irregular, truncated pyramid, with four narrow lateral surfaces, and a fifth somewhat wider; the base is smooth enough. The summit is prismatic, and the corners rounded. It weighs almost eight kilogrammes (44 lbs. and upwards.) Its dimensions are eight inches in height, seven in breadth and three in thickness. This stone bears marks of volcanic origin, and resembles a grunstein (greenstone.) The fracture is grayish white, spotted with white, and several crystallized metallic fragments were remarked on its surface, especially some octohedral crystals of iron, which attract the magnetised needle.—English Paper.

AURORA BOREALIS.—One of the most grand and sublime exhibitions of the 'Northern Lights' or according to scripture phraseology, "signs in the heavens," ever seen, was generally witnessed throughout the country on Friday evening, the 19th inst. Speaking of the Aurora being seen in this city, the American says: "We learn that it was equally splendid at Albany. A writer in the Evening Journal says—

'There is nothing recorded of the "Aurora Borealis" in this latitude to be compared with the unimaginable splendor which it assumed late last evening. We have seen it in various forms and at different periods. At one time spanning the whole visible heavens with one bright arch—at another imitating, as it were, the sublimest conceptions of gothic architecture—and then a quick flash, resembling that of lightning, would destroy the beauty of the new formed arch.—But never have we seen it so brilliant and so unaccountable as it appeared about 11 o'clock last evening.

Just after sunset the clouds from the northwest presented the appearance of a storm, and soon after the Aurora gradually developed its kaleidoscopic brilliancy. The zenith was the centre from which radiated long lines of every prismatic color, and of every tint which their combination can produce. At one time it seemed as if the flames of an immense conflagration were reflecting from the sky—at another as if the wheels of an Archangel's chariot, coursing through space, were whirling over our pitiable planet.'

MEETINGS IN ROCHESTER.

Our meetings in this city, are held three times on the Sabbath, also Tuesday and Friday evenings, in Shaw's New Brick Block, east side of the River, corner of Main and Stone streets; entrance from Stone street. The Lord's Supper will be administered in the afternoon of the first Sabbath of every month.

Death of an Infant.

A lovely infant sleeps in death—
How beautiful and fair!
Yea, even now, though void of breath,
God's impress still is there.

He made that form, that cherub face,
'Tis workmanship divine;
Consummate skill we there can trace,
And love and wisdom shine.

And if thus fair and lovely here,
Beneath Death's icy hand—
O will it not be lenientous there,
'Mid Heaven's own bright band?

When Jesus bids it rise and live
With all the saints in light;
A glorious body then he'll give,
Resplendent to the sight!

No pain shall ever rack it more,
No tear shall dim its eye;
'Twill dwell with Christ on Canaan's shore,
And never, never die.

Then Christian parents may not grieve
As "those who have no hope"—
The blessed promise they believe,
Will bear their spirits up.

Though nature weeps, when thus a tie
So strongly bound is riven,
Yet faith the Savior's words apply
"Of such the realm of Heaven!" A. C. J.

Pre-millennial Advent.

BY CHARLES BEECHER.

In my last I commenced to show that "To deny the Pre-millennial coming of Christ you must spiritualize every 'Promise of his Coming' connected with millennial descriptions, in the Bible."

2. Let any one attentively consider the 45th and 46th Psalms, in illustration of this point, and ask if they do not appropriately describe the Millennial Era? Christ is here described as triumphantly riding forth. The people fall under him. His throne is for ever and ever. At his right hand stands the queen, 'The Bride, the Lamb's Wife.' The marriage festival is celebrated. And scarce a feature of the whole description can fail to be recognized as belonging to the millennium; that blessed era when 'he maketh wars to cease unto the end of the earth.'

But in this millennial Psalm are there no passages to which St. Peter might have looked as 'promises of his coming?' Indeed, are there any which do not sustain that character? Is not this the glorious approach of one not 'more marred than any man,' 'without form or comeliness,' but now at length 'fairer than the children of men?'

Does he not come to sit, not at the right hand of the Father's throne, but upon what is here proclaimed His throne, for ever and ever. Does he not come to claim his bride 'the Church?' And is not the burden of triumph this 'Jehovah of Hosts is WITH US?' And do we not hear him quell the tumult of the nations by saying, 'Be still and know that I am God, I will be exalted among the Heathen, I will be exalted IN THE EARTH.'

Are not these promises of his personal return? Or must these fade before the waving of the allegoric wand? But what reason is there for spiritualizing the advent here described? Is a triumphal procession, and a marriage festival, a fit emblem of the outpouring of the Holy Spirit? Is it the third person of the adorable Trinity, which is the Bridegroom and must espouse the Church, the Bride? Or is it the second? And what good reason can be assigned for perverting these symbols from their usual, their obvious meaning, except that it is necessary to escape the belief of the Pre-millennial advent? Will not this be a second step in eliminating every 'promise of his coming' from the millennial prophecies of the Bible?

3. Consider next, Psalms 96, 97 and 98; all three closely related in spirit. Do not these manifestly allude to millennial times? When but in the millennial jubilee shall they 'Say among the heathen, 'the Lord reigneth,' let the heavens rejoice, let the earth be glad, let the sea roar in the fullness thereof, let the field be joyful and all that is therein, then shall all the trees of the wood rejoice.' 'Confounded be they that serve graven images, that boast themselves in idols, worship him all ye gods.' 'O sing unto the Lord a new song, for he hath done marvelous things, his right hand and his holy arm have gotten him the victory, his righteousness hath he openly showed in the sight of the Heathen, he hath remembered his mercy and truth towards the House of Israel. ALL THE ENDS OF THE EARTH HAVE SEEN THE SALVATION OF OUR GOD.'

But if these Psalms manifestly describe millennial times, what shall be thought of the solemn announcement—'Let the floods clap their hands, let the hills be joyful together before the Lord, for he cometh! FOR HE COMETH! TO JUDGE THE EARTH. With righteousness shall he judge the world, and the people with equity.' If this be not a 'promise of his coming,' thrice so solemnly repeated, to which St. Peter might refer, as a coming to JUDGMENT, where can such promise be found? How is his coming described? 'Clouds and darkness are round about him.' 'A fire goeth before him and burneth up his enemies round about.' 'HIS LIGHTNINGS ENLIGHTENED THE WORLD, THE EARTH SAW AND TREMBLED.'

Compare with this what Christ says, Matt. xxiv. 27: 'As the lightning cometh out of the east and shineth unto the west, SO SHALL ALSO THE COMING OF THE SON OF MAN BE.'

'The hills melted like wax at the presence of the Lord, at the presence of the Lord of the whole earth.'

Now if St. Peter could not refer to this as that day when the 'elements shall melt with fervent heat,' to what passage could he allude? And if this be wrested from his grasp by modern spiritualizing, well might the scoffier ask, 'Where is the promise of his coming?' and the apostle be puzzled for a reply. What answer could he give but, 'Nowhere! these spiritualists have given all those passages I used to rely on, a different meaning!'

And what reason for this spiritualizing? What reason for divesting these solemn Psalms of their obvious meaning? What, unless it be because the coming here described is evidently a coming at which the earth rejoices, and millennial glories begin? If this be his personal coming, it is pre-millennial. Therefore spiritualize it, and so add another step to that process of eviscerating any promise of his coming from the whole millennial writings of the prophets.

Pope Equal with God.

2 Thes. ii. 3, 4—'And that man of sin be revealed, the son of perdition; who opposeth and exalteth himself above all that is called God, or that is worshipped; so that he as God, sitteth in the temple of God, showing himself that he is God.'

The place in which the person spoken of in this passage was to be manifested, was the visible church—the time of appearance was subsequent to the first great apostasy from the faith and purity of the gospel, previous to the second advent of Christ. Beyond a doubt, the character pointed out is the Pope of Rome. The representation made in the above passage, and the account given of his mode of operation, in the 9th and 10th vs., will apply strictly, letter for letter, to no other character of which we have any account.

But the name and works of God have been appropriated to the Pope by the highest authorities and the most eminent theologians of the Romish church.

1. The name of God has been given to the Pope. His holiness has been complimented with the name of Deity, and the vicegerency of heaven has been accorded to him.

Jacobatius, Durand, Gilbert, and Pithou, on the authority of canon law, style the Pontiff the Almighty's vicegerent, 'who occupies the place not of a mere man, but of the true God.'—(Jacob. ii. 11; Durand, 22; Gilbert, 22; Pithou, 22; c. 3.)

Gregory II. says:—'The whole western nations reckoned Peter a terrestrial God; the Roman Pontiff, of course, succeeds to the title and estate. Labb. vii. 666; Bruy, ii. 100. This blasphemy, Gratian copied into the canon law. 'The Emperor Constantine,' says Nicholas the First, 'conferred the appellation of God on the Pope, who therefore being God, cannot be judged by man.'—(Labb. ix. 1572.)

According to Innocent III., 'The Pope holds the place of the true God.'

The canon law in the gloss, denominates the Roman hierarch, 'Our Lord.' (Extrao. Tit. XIV., c. iv., Walsh, p. 9.)

The canonists generally reckon the Pope the one God, who hath all power, human and divine, in heaven and earth.—(Barclay, II., iv. 220.)

Marcellus, in the Lateran council, and with its full approbation, called Julius, 'God on earth.'—(Labb. xix. 731, Bin. 9. 24.)

2. The works, as well as the name of God, have been ascribed to the Pope by Innocent; by distinguished Catholic writers, by the canon law, and the Lateran council. According to Innocent, Jacobatius, Durand, and Decius, 'The Pope and the Lord form the same tribunal, so that, sin excepted, the Pope can do nearly all that God can do.'—(Jacob. III.)

Jacobatius and Durand, say, 'The Pontiff possesses a plentitude of power, and none dare say to him any more than to God, what doest thou? He can change the nature of things, and make nothing out of something, and something out of nothing.'—(Extrao. Tit. IV., c. 2; Jacob. III.; Durand, 50, &c.)

These are not the views of these writers alone; they are found in all their blasphemy and absurdity in the canon law, which represents the Pope as responsible to no being in the universe, and attributes to him the power of performing the works of God, and making something out of nothing. The Pope, according to Lainez, at the council of Trent, 'has the power of dispensing with all laws and the same authority as the Lord.'

An Archbishop, in the last Lateran Synod, called Pope Julius, 'prince of the world.'—(Lab. xix. 100.)

Another orator styled Leo 'the possessor of all power in heaven and in the earth, who presided over all the kingdoms of the globe.'—(Du Pin iii. 602; II. Theis. ii. 4.)

This blasphemy, the holy, infallible Roman council listened to without expressing their disapprobation or dissent, and the haughty Pontiff himself, doubtless, with great complacency. The man of sin then 'sat in the temple of God,' or that which is so called, and both by his silence and his state, 'showed himself that he was God.'

'Some Popes,' says Coqueville, 'have allowed themselves to be called omnipotent.'—(Coqueville 403.)—Prot. Mag.

Qualifications for the Kingdom of God.

"And he said to them all, If any man will come after me let him deny himself and take up his cross daily and follow me."—Luke ix. 23.

Perhaps there is no Christian duty that is so little understood and so generally perverted from its true meaning as cross-bearing. Some think that if they make a profession of religion, attend the means of grace, pray and talk in the meetings for public worship and pay a little something for benevolent purposes, they are bearing the cross. As this is an important duty, and unless we conform to it we cannot be the disciples of Christ, let us search the word of God for a correct understanding of it:

Cross-bearing consists in part in becoming partakers of Christ's sufferings: 1 Pet. iv. 1, 2—'Forasmuch then as Christ hath suffered for us same mind: for he that hath suffered in the flesh hath ceased from sin; that he should no longer live the rest of his time in the flesh to the lusts of men, but to the will of God.' 13th verse—'But rejoice, inasmuch as ye are partakers of Christ's sufferings, that when his glory shall be revealed, ye may be glad also with exceeding joy.' Also Rom. viii. 17—'And if children, then heirs: heirs of God and joint-heirs with Christ.' Upon what condition are we heirs of God? 'If so be that we suffer with him that we may be also glorified together.' Thus we see that it is indispensably necessary for those who would be glorified at the coming of Christ, to become partakers of his sufferings. How are we to become partakers of Christ's sufferings? By denying ourselves as did the Savior. Surely it is not intended that we should suffer death upon a cross in order to partake of Christ's sufferings, but to deny ourselves of every desire of the flesh and to follow the footsteps of the Savior. Why did the Son of God take the lowest place among the children of men—taste the bitter cup of poverty—become an outcast in the earth, a man of sorrows and acquainted with grief, and pass through life a lonely pilgrim, spending his time in doing good to his enemies? Let Peter answer: 1 Pet. ii. 21—'For hereunto were ye called; because Christ also suffered for us, leaving us an example that ye should follow in his steps.' It is then by following closely the example of Christ that we become partakers of his sufferings. The Savior might have come in higher walks of life; he might have had place among the rich instead of the poor; he might have lived a life of ease, instead of labor and pain; he might have had the company of adoring angels instead of being an outcast among men; he might have had the joys of heaven clustering around his pathway instead of drinking the bitter cup of human woe, and still have accomplished the redemption of poor sinners and paid the ransom with his own blood. But no, he must tread with his own feet that way which was designed for his disciples to walk in, that he might be a perfect example for them to follow. Are any poor? so was the Savior. Are any afflicted? so was the Savior. Are any despised of men for obedience to the truth? so was the Savior. Are any persecuted for righteousness sake? so was the Savior. Can then the rich, the honorable, the pleasure-seekers and the ease-lovers be the disciples of Christ? No, for the Savior has taught us that the servant is not greater than his Master, nor the disciple greater than his Lord. Can the disciples be living in splendid houses, with furniture to correspond with the customs of the day, be rich and increased in goods, and be holding on to the treasures of earth with a tenacious grasp when their Lord was so poor that he had not where to lay his head? Can they be honorable, when he was despised and rejected of men? Can they live to enjoy themselves when he was a man of sorrows and acquainted with grief? Can they labor and toil for self-gratification, or to hoard up property when he spent his whole life in self-denial? No, for the first step for a disciple to take is to take the yoke of Christ upon him and follow the footsteps of his Master; this must be his first and last step in the way of life, and every step he takes in that way will be made by striving to follow the example of his Lord and Master. If then the disciple cannot be above his Master, and being as his Master, the highest state he can attain, it is certain that those who are above taking the self-denying position in life that the Savior occupied cannot be his disciple. It is then by denying self, that we partake in part of the sufferings of Christ—consequently unless we follow Christ in this particular we can never attain to the exalted station of being heirs of God and joint-heirs of Jesus Christ. In proof we have not only the example of Christ but of the apostles. Phil. iii. 9-11—'But what things were gain to me, those I counted loss for Christ; yea, doubtless, and I count all things but loss for the excellency of the knowledge of Christ Jesus my Lord, for whom I have suffered the loss of all things and do count them but dung that I may win Christ.'

Paul might have enjoyed the favor of the world—he might have held a high position on account of his great learning—his religious zeal, his blameless life, according to the doctrine of the Pharisees, the riches, the pleasures and honors of this world lay before him; and in addition to these the exalted station of being a great Rabbi, and swaying a commanding influence over a popular church: but he suffered the loss of all these things and did count them but dung! And why, Paul, did you suffer the loss of these things? 'That I may know him, and the power of his resurrection, and the fellowship of his sufferings, being made conformable unto his death, if by any means I might attain unto the resurrection of the dead.' It was by this course of self-denial that Paul sought to become a partaker of Christ's sufferings; knowing that if he partook of the sufferings of Christ, he should have a part in the resurrection of the just. If Paul found it necessary to practice such self-denial in order to have a part in the kingdom of God, is there any hope for any individual of entering the kingdom of God unless he conforms to the example of Paul? We find an answer in the 17th verse: 'Brethren, be followers together with me, and mark them which walk so, as ye have us for an ensample; for many whom I have told you often, and now tell you even weeping, that they are the enemies of the cross of Christ.' Again 1 Cor. iv. 8-16—'Now ye are full, now ye are rich, ye have reigned as kings without us; I would to God ye did reign, that we also might reign with you.' That is, he desired the kingdom to come when he and the saints might there and then reign: 'For I think that God hath set forth us, the last apostles, (margin) as it were appointed unto death; for we are made a spectacle unto the world, and to angels, and to men. We are fools for Christ's sake, but ye are wise in Christ; we are weak but ye are strong; ye are honorable but we are despised. Even unto this present hour we both hunger and thirst, and are naked, and are buffeted, and have no certain dwelling-place, and labor, working with our own hands; being reviled we bless—being persecuted, we suffer it—being defamed, we entreat—we are made as the filth of the world, and are the off-scouring of all things unto this day.' Why did Paul contrast the riches, the pleasures and honors of the Corinthian church with his own sufferings and labor? 'I write not these things to shame you, but as my beloved sons I warn you: wherefore, I beseech you, be ye followers of me.' Paul would warn them that unless they conformed to his example, they should have no part in the kingdom of God—yea, he would beseech them by all the glories of that kingdom to follow him, even as he informed them in chap. xi. 1, that he followed Christ.

Now let us bring this subject home and compare the teachings and example of Christ and also that of Paul with ourselves. How will adventists stand this test? I fear greatly that many when weighed in the balances will be found wanting. How many are hoarding up the treasures of earth while the cries for help of the needy laborer who has toiled incessantly in proclaiming the coming of the Lord, pass by unheeded by them while they hug more closely their hoarded treasures? How many, while they give much, are indulging in the fashions of the world, have large, costly houses, with expensive furniture, or adorn their persons with fine apparel, and thus spend the Lord's money to gratify pride? How many, though not rich, enjoy to the full all of the comforts of life and many of the luxuries, who give but a mite to the poor and suffering? If all the adventists followed Christ, funds would not be lacking for the English mission, or any other mission. The advent papers would not groan under the heavy burden of thousands of dollars unpaid from those who are able but do not pay their honest dues, much less give to other benevolent objects. Dear brethren and sisters, every dollar is the Lord's which you possess—are you ready to meet this test of Christian character we have been considering? Unless you are conformed to the example of Christ and are leading the same self-denying life as did Christ and his apostles—depend upon it, unless you are following Paul in suffering the loss of all things for Christ's sake, you are the enemies of Christ; and I would beseech you to be followers of him—let your property, your time, your talents, your all, be upon the altar of God, and show to the world that it is there, not by words merely, but by good works of benevolence.

A Portion for All.

I have recently been impressed with the peculiar adaptation of Scriptural instruction to all classes of learners, especially those portions which refer to the coming of the Lord. Does the mind delight in mathematical demonstration? here are the wonderful numbers of Daniel and John, with the encouraging declaration, 'The wise shall understand'—'Blessed is he that readeth the words of this prophecy'—'Here is the mind that hath wisdom.' The mind of the greatest mathematician has ample scope in these inspired numbers, and I bless God that some such minds have investigated this deeply interesting subject. Bp. Newton and Sir Isaac Newton were of this class—the former of whom remarked in his works on prophecy—'If we could tell when the 2300 days commenced, we would know when the world would end.' Mr. Birk, of England, affirmed that time is mentioned in more than twenty different places in Daniel and John. Now these numbers are not given in vain; are they not for a class of minds that will be still searching for something precise, something definite? And such minds have a powerful influence over others, who do not consider themselves adequate to the undertaking. But the great difficulty is, they are apt to be too positive; perhaps they might take some lessons of caution from philosophical minds. One person remarked in the year '41 or '42, he thought Mr. Miller was right only he was a little too fast—that things did not ripen so fast as he expected they would. The latter class of minds will have their eye upon the natural, moral, and political signs, and here they will have enough, for we live in an age of wonders; the harvest of the earth does indeed appear to be ripe. The natural signs have all been seen—the moral signs exactly correspond with the description the Bible gives of the last days—and the political signs are at this time awfully portentous of some great revolution just upon us. But there is still a large class of minds who make no pretensions to either mathematics or philosophy: this includes those far advanced in age as well as children, and those likewise whose advantages for information have been very limited. But are these left without excuse having no light? No, blessed be God, his word is adapted to the capacities of all, that all may be warned, and all who will may have salvation. The aged grandsire can tell the little prattlers around him of the dark day and night, and how the stars fell from heaven, and that our Savior meant that the people should know by these signs that he was soon coming. Besides, that which is best adapted to the lowest capacity is perhaps the safest basis for the mind of the highest order, for though 'Heaven and earth pass away,' Christ's immutable words can never.

I see not why the whole household may not be edified and comforted and built up—but let us remember we are all one family, though we are in different lessons in the same book. What should we say of a teacher who should call his pupil dull and stupid because he could not readily perform any sum in arithmetic before he understood the four fundamental rules, or because he could not dispose of any word in Pope's Essay before he could distinguish the different parts of speech in English grammar? O how condescending is our heavenly Father to adapt the instruction of his word to the capacities of all—and how well calculated the immense variety of mind to make one harmonious whole. Every one has some place to fill; the very pins in a building are of importance: 'The eye cannot say to the hand, I have no need of thee, nor the head to the feet, I have no need of you.' If we are all baptised by one spirit into one body, we shall have love one to another, so that when one member suffers all will suffer with it, or one member be honored all will rejoice. What can be more needful in these perilous times than love? it 'makes our unity'—it binds into one body with Christ our head. It appears too that every thing else is about to vanish away, but many waters cannot quench, nor floods drown, no, nor fires of the last day consume this heaven-born principle.

Corruptions of Shakerism.

MR. EDITOR—Dear Sir: Having a knowledge of the fact that the 'Shakers' have commenced publishing a paper at Union Village, O., in which I read that justice, purity and perfect equality reign among the inmates of their holy Zion—can we who have been brought up by them and lived with them more than twenty-five, and others more than thirty years, can we feel that we shall stand justified at the bar of God if we keep silent while we see the most glaring falsehoods imposed upon all around us who read their papers? Certainly not. Their practice has ever been to charge all who leave them to say nothing against them; but their fair promises of rewards to us, if we will keep still and say nothing about them, will do no longer. Their fair promises will neither feed nor clothe us who have served them as slaves from infancy, until our locks are white with the frost of many winters. Their promises of, 'We will give you something after a while if you will keep still and say nothing about us,' could not justify us for concealing the truth from public investigation.

We believe it to be a duty we owe to God and man, to draw aside the curtain which covers their whitened sepulchre, full of rottenness and dead men's bones. We know from personal observation, that among the ministers and elders of the disciples of Ann Lee there have been crimes committed, which if known would have consigned them to the State prison, and we are fully prepared to give the names and the particulars of the matters referred to if required to do so. These are the individuals who assume to stand as mediators between God and man! who assume to sit in judgment and settle our final destiny, both here and in the eternal world!

My readers no doubt will say, how could any one in their right mind believe such trash? I will explain as well as I can. We were taken to the Shakers before we were capable of judging between right and wrong. We heard this doctrine and nothing else. We never heard a man read a chapter in the Bible, or take a text and preach a gospel sermon, during the many years we resided with them, and we were never allowed to go to any other meeting. We were never allowed to read the writings of any other denomination, but if such books were found among them they were burned: and instead of reading the Bible in meeting as the Christian denominations do, the Shakers read some writings of their own denomination, giving the orders and commands laid down by Ann Lee or some of her disciples, and such like things.

One Sabbath when the hour of worship arrived, one of our ministers came before us with a paper in his hand, for the purpose of reading a vision—and what was it? It was the wild fruits of the imaginations of a drunken Negro, who had been to Lebanon with a load of things for market and had got brandy and concealed it in the stable and drank too much. He was not drunk enough to be stupid, but to make him raving all night. In the morning the brandy had lost its power—he then thought the best plan to conceal his drunkenness was, to say he had a vision, and did not know what he had done—for his soul was in the world of spirits conversing with Jesus Christ and Mother Ann! He said the people in eternity were not idle; they were busy at something. He said he saw Jesus Christ sorting broom-corn! and such like blasphemy, too absurd to be written for any one to read. But such wicked blasphemy often engrossed our whole attention during our meeting on the Sabbath.

It would be impossible for me in my limited space to give more than a brief hint of the scenes of idolatry I have witnessed, and can be abundantly proved. It would also be impossible to explain on one sheet the means they have resorted to, to crush down every thing like liberty of conscience, and to compel the ignorant young people they have raised to fall down and worship the image they have set up. I will here relate one circumstance out of many: A young woman who was raised from infancy at Union Village was not well, and thought she would not go to meeting that night, for she did not feel like dancing. After the family had assembled, about fifty in number, the Elder looked over the assembly and asked, Is Polly Holloway in? The answer was, Nay. He then told Nancy Serring to go and tell Polly to come in. Nancy obeyed the tyrant, and after an interview with Polly came in and said, Polly does not wish to come to meeting. The Elder then told two of the men to go and bring her in. Ashbell Kitchel and others went and dragged her down stairs and compelled her into the room in presence of the waiting assembly. Polly was exhausted and she sat down. The Elder, Sannuel Rollings, told her to stand up. She answered, how can I stand when you have nearly broke my legs? Her mother saw it, and with a bleeding heart stepped up to her and said, Polly, stand on your feet to keep them from abusing you any more. Elder Rollings saw Mrs. Holloway speak to her daughter, and he, with the voice of a tyrant, told the mother to let her be; for we do not want the flesh to interfere, said he! The prints of Kitchel's fingers could be seen for more than a week on her arms where the flesh was bruised and the blood settled, and not only her arms, but her whole body was bruised. Her brother saw the wretched abuse bared not say a word. Her sister was present, and many others, who will witness to what I have stated, if any one dispute the facts I have revealed. I feel certain that if all the facts could be known, they would stand no higher in the public mind than a band of highway robbers, or a band of the lowest horse-thieves that ever infested our country.

I, that now hold this pen, have been sent by the leading Shakers at Union Village to a secret place in the woods, to hide children from their father who was searching for them; and after dark they were taken and conveyed out of the State to another society, and their names changed so that their father never knew what became of them for years: His wife, too, was taken out of the State by a deacon of the church; and the deacon was ordered by Father David to do so, and her name was changed. I was told by the leaders of the society on another occasion to dress in men's clothes, and go in company with another woman dressed in men's clothes, and convey a girl to some hiding place so that her father could not find her! We did as we were told, for I thought I dare not disobey. I have always been taught by them that Christ has appeared the second time, and that that appearing was made in the person of Ann Lee! that she was the bride, the Lamb's wife! and that her successors, in the line of Eldership, were mediators between God and man! that the judgment day had come—that these mediators were judging the world! and as I believed my final destiny was to be settled by them, how could I disobey their command? In this ignorant condition I obeyed them twenty-seven years, and no doubt I should have been yet a servant to them and to their idolatry, had I remained ignorant of one fact, and that was, I found to a certainty that some of these mediators were liars; and being convinced beyond a doubt of that fact, I began to reason and compare one thing with another, and at length began to think for myself, although we had been taught that to reason was a dangerous thing, and that we should not even think for ourselves, but should be obedient and that was all we had to do: but as soon as those would-be mediators had destroyed all the confidence I had in them by immoral conduct, lying and deceit, I stopped my mad career and took a review of my wretched life. I became convinced I had all my life been believing a lie, and how was I to better my condition? I had never been taught to look to God for help; but through those disciples of Ann Lee, those mediators, I was to receive all that kind Providence had in store for me—and if I should forget their counsel and care, I must be eternally damned.

I had never been taught how to pray! I never heard but one prayer in that place, or in my life, and that was addressed to Mother Ann for the restoration of a sister that was sick; and on another occasion two of the Shakers who were stirring hay in the meadow, left their company who were cutting and stirring hay, and telling them to keep at work for it should not rain! They came home, went up stairs and on to the roof of the house, and at the top of their voices commanded the clouds to disperse in the name of Jesus Christ and Mother Ann! but the more they blasphemed the harder it rained.

It was their practice to make derision of the manner in which other denominations offered up their prayers to God. In confirmation of what I have stated, I will relate one circumstance: Three of their ministers were travelling in the Wabash country—they were out of provisions—had lost their way in a wilderness place, and were on the point of starving. Youngs proposed to Bates and McNemer that they had better kneel down and pray. Bates wishing to cheer the gloomy countenance of Youngs, for that purpose he made a vocal prayer. I will relate the prayer as I had it from the mouth of Bates:—"O Lord God, here we are, all-sufficient, self-dependent creatures, going up and down the universal world, ding-split, devil-like:—if we had our just deserts we would not be here, nor there, nor no where else!"

Dear sir, I have given you but a little of what I know about the Shakers and their idolatry. May God open the eyes of the people to see that the sheep-skin they have put on does not cover the whole wolf.

Yours truly,

JOANNA HOLLOWAY.

"The wise shall understand."

ROCHESTER, APRIL 7, 1847.

Time of the Second Advent.

NO. XIV.

It may be well here to remind the reader that in the previous numbers on this subject we have contended that the Bible position on the time of the second advent is, "nigh, even at the door." The evidence has been drawn from—The signs in the sun moon and stars, named by the Savior in Mat. 24,—The moral condition of the church and world, clearly foretold by different inspired writers,—The condition of the Allied Powers, as predicted under the symbol of four angels holding the four winds, in Rev. vii.,—The threatening attitude of the Catholics, as predicted in various portions of the inspired word, especially Rev. xviii. 7, 8,—The exact fulfilment of historical prophecy, from the proud kingdom of Babylon down to the last stage of the last form of earthly governments before the setting up of the everlasting kingdom of God,—And the startling fact that the world is now about 6000 years old, at the expiration of which time the universal belief of the church has been that the millennium will begin.

These infallible testimonies unite in divine harmony in proclaiming the end of all sublunary things at the door. There can be no mistake in their meaning—they most clearly shed the true light of the prophetic word upon the pathway of the Bible student, so that he knows he is near his journey's end. He is not in darkness nor doubt about these things; but sees the day of his eternal redemption rapidly approaching, and with unwavering faith rejoices in the blessed hope of soon meeting his Lord and King, to reign with him forever and ever.

Before publicly professing our faith in the speedy coming of Christ, we reasoned thus,—Now, if we should be disappointed in the prophetic numbers, or rather, should be mistaken in understanding them, there is a sufficient amount of Bible testimony, about which there can be no mistake, to prove beyond a doubt that the coming of the Lord is at the door.—Thus, we counted the cost, before publicly engaging in this work; consequently all of our mistakes on definite time, calculated from the prophetic numbers, have not in the least shaken our faith in the near coming of the Lord. We have, in effect, said—If the prophetic numbers were struck from the divine testimony, there would be other evidence sufficient to produce full unwavering faith in the advent nigh. We are still of this opinion; hence any mistake of ours, or misunderstanding of the prophetic numbers can have no effect to weaken our confidence in the advent faith. Our feet in this respect are planted upon the rock of eternal truth, imperishable as the word of God is immutable.

These remarks are not designed to convey the idea that we attach little or no importance to the prophetic numbers; but they are intended to express our strong confidence in the other kind of testimony in the case. We attribute, at least, as much importance to the prophetic numbers as we give to the other testimony. And indeed they seem to have been designed to serve an end which could not be answered by the less definite testimony. And that end is, to make it absolutely certain, beyond the possibility of a mistake, that the time of the advent cannot be far from a specific year, or a given number of years. They seem to serve as a sort of binder, thrown over the whole testimony, to bring all to bear upon a certain specific moment, time, season, hour, day, or in other words, a short number of years, for the advent of the Lord.

It may be well to simply mention here, that we do not find in the prophetic numbers the position on time, which we are called upon to occupy, but we do find in them the most convincing evidence to sustain the Bible position, viz: "nigh, even at the door." The prophetic numbers, with all the other testimony in the case, were designed, not to perplex, deceive and disappoint the hopes of God's confiding children, but to prove, infallibly prove something, in order to produce, not doubts and want of confidence, but faith, unwavering faith—and we ask what is that something? what point, what doctrine or position are all the evidences on time designed to sustain? It cannot be the advent in '33, nor in the 7th month of '44, nor in '46: for these dates, with many other specific ones on time, are all in the past. No one presumes to say positively, but probably, in '47, vulgar era, the Lord will come. But it must be remembered that we are talking about absolute certainties, and not doubtful probabilities: the nature of the testimony will admit of no uncertainties. Then the advent in '47 vulgar era cannot be the position that this testimony was designed to sustain. What, then, we ask again, was this superabundance of testimony given for? Certainly it was designed infallibly to prove something. Let the word of the Lord answer. "When ye shall see these things, then know that he is nigh, even at the door."

But this is not sufficiently definite for some—they think the prophetic numbers prove more, are more definite in their signification, and consequently, when correctly understood, bring us to more definite conclusions relative to the time of the advent. Let us in the light of the Bible see what they do positively prove. We will not enquire what we or others once thought they proved; nor what we or they now think, feel, hope, guess or affirm they prove—but what do the Bible and immutable facts say they prove?—and at the close of the investigation we will most cheerfully abide the right decision to which the truth may bring us. Then, to the law and the testimony, to settle this highly important question. If we are guided by the clear light of that precious book we shall not err, shall not walk in darkness, nor stumble upon doubtful uncertainties. But we have already extended these promiscuous, though we hope not unprofitable, remarks so far, that we shall be unable to enter far into this investigation, in this number, without making it more lengthy than would be profitable—we must therefore defer the matter for another week.

The Winds being Loosed.

We look at the fulfilment of the prophecy in Rev. 7th chapt. with deep and thrilling interest. It is a prophecy which relates to these very times—In this, there has been a uniform agreement between the great mass of Bible expositors. We think they have generally admitted that the holding of the four winds relates to the "Holy Alliance," or Vienna treaty formed by certain of the European powers, in A. D. 1815. That Alliance, as we have before shown, is evidently being dissolved. When it shall be fully broken, then the work of redemption, we think, will close, and the Lord will come. The following additional testimony to what we have before given, strengthens the conclusion that the Alliance is now being dissolved, and of course the winds of bloody strife, which so long have been held, will soon no longer be restrained. Says a "French correspondent of the New York Observer, in a Political Review of Europe for the year 1846:"

"There is now no longer in Europe any written law of nations. The alliance of 1815, and the letter of treaties are worthless. Possibly a state of inaction may last still some time, because none of the European powers are disposed to begin a general war; but they stand in a false position, to one another, and the genius of war poises on the wing over our whole continent. The free towns of Germany, such as Hamburg and Frankfort, stand in fear of the same fate as Cracow. The secondary States tremble for their independence. And indeed, where is now their security? If the conventions of 1815 have been violated in the case of the last venerable remnants of Poland, they may be also in the case of other States. All is thus put in jeopardy; and nothing remains but force,—physical force, to decide difficulties which may arise. What wise and good man but must shudder in view of such circumstances?"

Exposition of Rom. xi. 25, & 1 Cor. xi. 10.

A brother requests an exposition of those passages of Scripture. The last one reads,—“For this cause ought the woman to have power on her head because of the angels.” The marginal reading is,—“For this cause ought the woman to have a covering, in sign that she is under the honor of her husband.”—This doubtless is the correct meaning of the text. The verse with the context seems to teach, that as the angels are in subjection to the Higher Powers, so the woman should be in subjection to her husband, and as a sign of her subjection, she should have a covering on her head.

The other text reads,—“For I would not, brethren, that ye should be ignorant of this mystery, lest ye should be wise in your own conceits, that blindness in part is happened to Israel, until the fulness of the Gentiles be come in.” The next verse should be read in connection. It reads, “And so all Israel shall be saved: as it is written, There shall come out of Sion the Deliverer, and shall turn away ungodliness from Jacob.”

This portion of Scripture furnishes matter for a lengthy article. A few brief remarks, however, are all we can give now.

There was danger of the Gentile christians (to whom Paul wrote, see v. 13) becoming exalted on account of their being admitted into the Abrahamic covenant, and on account of the fall of the Jews (see vs. 18-21). This danger seems to have arisen from their ignorance of the unchangeable purpose of God to save "all Israel," so that in the end, when the Deliverer should come out of Zion, or when the Lord shall come the second time, and save all Israel, give the land promised to their Father Abraham, or the everlasting kingdom—then it will be seen that a gentile christian will have no preeminence over the Jewish christian: for as to the flesh, there is now, and certainly there will be then no difference between Jew and Greek. But as to the whole Jewish nation being saved, there could be no hope: for blindness had happened to a part of the nation, and would continue 'until the fullness of the Gentiles be come in,' or until the close of the gospel dispensation, at the coming of the Redeemer out of Zion,—then the door of salvation will be forever closed, and of course no more, either Jew or Greek, can be saved.

Israel, sometimes means the whole nation of the Jews, irrespective of religious or moral character, and sometimes it embraces none but the pure children of God. See chapter ix. 6. Also ii. 28, 29.—Read these and the corresponding texts in other parts of the book and of the Bible, and you will learn that "they are not all Israel which are of Israel." That is, they are not all embraced in the covenant made with Abraham, and confirmed by the prophets, who are Israel according to the flesh. God recognizes in his everlasting covenant with Abraham, in his prophecies and gracious promises, none as the true Israel, but the righteous, the holy seed or holy branches. See v. 16, & Gal. iii. 28, 29. These pure ones constitute "all Israel," or "the whole house of Israel," (Ezc. xxxvii. 11-14) who will be saved when "the Redeemer shall come out of Zion and turn away ungodliness from Jacob." (See Isa. lix., and especially the last of the chapter.) This is all the return of the Jews, to the promised land, which the word of the Lord warrants us to look for: and we shall soon see them gathered home; for the times of the Gentiles are evidently now on the eve of expiring—the coming of the Lord is at the door.

The late European news brings the most appalling accounts of the fatal ravages of the dread famine in ill-fated Ireland, and other parts of Europe. It will be seen by the news on our last page, that the enormous number of over fifty thousand deaths by starvation are reported in Ireland! and this is thought by some to be far below the actual number! The most lively imagination fails to comprehend but a small portion of the keen and protracted suffering which this dreadful calamity has brought upon those who have been and still are directly affected by it.—Alas, when the protecting hand of God is withdrawn from his rebellious creatures, how soon they perish!

CORRUPTIONS OF THE SHAKERS.—That the Shakers are corrupt in doctrine, organization and worship, is positively certain, from the clear testimony of the word of the Lord; consequently a corruption of morals must follow as a matter of course. It is not our object now to point out their impurities, but to call attention to the simple narration of JOANNA HOLLAWAY, on another page, relative to the corruption of the Shakers. We cannot vouch for the truth of her statements; but think they have the appearance of being true, and if they are, it is high time these things should be made known to the public.

We wish to do the Shakers no injustice, and would not knowingly say a wrong word about them; and do seriously caution others to be careful and tell nothing but the truth in this case. But we will tell as far as duty requires, and we are able to obtain it, the undisguised truth about them. And we call upon all to furnish all the facts you can substantiate, relative to the corruption of this people. If we have among us, professedly, the most pure people in the world, but who are guilty of the acts named by Joanna Hollaway, it is high time that their real character be exposed. Therefore, we again say to all, give us all the well authenticated facts about the corruptions of the Shakers—which you can gather, or induce others to give. We do this that if possible we may prevent any more of the uninformed from being deceived by them.

COMMUNICATIONS.

LIFE & DEATH.

I noticed in the Voice of Truth for March 10th an extract from the Pope's Pastoral Letter. You seem to think that the sentiment expressed in this extract is blasphemous—that is, invoking the Virgin Mary to intercede with Jesus in their behalf. Whether it be blasphemy or not I will not now say; but I will say, I think such people greatly err not knowing the Scriptures neither the power of God. The ground-work of this doctrine has its origin in the idea that men are living when they are literally dead to all intents and purposes—as much so as though they never had had a being. If it be right to ask a man of God in the flesh to pray for us, which I presume none will deny, why (if he has not died, but gone into God's presence where is fullness of joy, and to his right hand where are pleasures for evermore,) not ask him then to pray for us? it seems to me that such an one, if he could prevail with God while on earth, he certainly could when glorified in the presence of God. The doctrine that man lives when he is dead, has, in my opinion, blinded the minds of millions and robbed the great plan of Redemption of that splendor and beauty which rightly belongs to it. The penalty of God's law is DEATH—the gift of God is directly its opposite, namely, ETERNAL LIFE.

"Sickness and sorrow pain and death,
Are felt nor feared no more."

In this language there is no room for doubt—death is death, extinction of being—life is life, its opposite, re-animation of being: and if eternal life, then of course it must be an eternal ceaseless re-animation of being. The term eternal is used here in its broadest sense, because applied to immortal, imperishable substances—consequently, unlimited in duration. But the great pivot on which moves this great and flagrant error, (endless misery) is that of the immortality of the soul. If man is possessed of an indwelling inhabitant called a soul, and if that soul is capable of existing out of and separate from the body, and if such a soul is positively immortal, then the doctrine of spirits living when the bodies are dead is beyond all doubt true.

As this is the point of difference between those who believe the wages of sin is an endless life in misery and those who believe with Paul that the wages of sin is DEATH, I would like to say a few words, and in attempting to do so I feel confident that truth cannot be hurt by honest, candid investigation.

After the Lord God had formed man of the dust of the ground and breathed into his nostrils the breath of life, then what did he become? He (the man) became a LIVING SOUL. The whole man who was composed of the dust of the ground was afterward called a living soul. God said to this living soul, 'Because thou hast hearkened,' &c., 'dust thou art and unto dust thou shalt return.' Just so sure then as he was formed of the dust of the ground, just so sure he, in consequence of transgression, should return to dust. This, as I read my Bible, is the extent of the claims of God's law as expressed in Gen. iii. 17.

19. Now if it be true that this man had an imperishable soul within this dust, it is farther true that there is no mention made of it in this connection; it is also true that such soul if any there was, was not subjected to law, neither was it threatened with punishment or promised happiness, for the whole of God's conversation seems addressed to that which was formed of the dust of the ground: 'Dust thou art,' &c. Then why do we talk of 'damned spirits, &c.?' We should not charge God with torturing or punishing something which did not sin. Sin is a transgression of law, but where no law is there is no transgression; then if the soul was not subjected to law, but the body, then the soul has not sinned neither cannot. The soul, then, to be eternally, endlessly punished, seems to me not warranted by the word of God.

There seems to be something very forcible in the language of Solomon, in Eccl. iii. 18-20. Evidently all are of the dust, and as evident it is that unto dust shall they all return. But it is argued from the 21st verse that the spirit of man goeth upward and the spirit of the beast goeth downward. I reply, Solomon simply makes the inquiry, 'Who knoweth the spirit of man?' &c. &c.—not a positive declaration. But if the spirit of man goeth upward as is contended by those from whom I differ on this point, then all spirits go there; for man is here used in its broadest sense, as man is endowed with reason, i. e. all men: further, we infer that the beast is here spoken of as having a spirit that goeth downward. &c. I am certainly led to the conclusion that out of Christ there is no hope of life, the very seed of death seems sown in our nature.

'As by one man (Adam) sin entered into the world and death by sin, and so death passed upon all men.' What a catastrophe followed that transgression in Eden! Not only was death entailed upon all men, but the very inanimate creation seems convulsed: 'Cursed is the ground,' &c. Now what is the great embodiment of the Christian's hope if it be not the restoration of all things to their original rectitude, order and harmony, in which they were when he, who cannot lie, pronounced them all VERY GOOD! When all sin will have been removed—death destroyed—all the enemies of God and their great leader, the devil, all that do wickedly are given to the burning flame, when that great momentous day shall come that shall 'burn as an oven!' Oh my soul! 'When all the proud, (oh how many there are whose pride is their God!) and all that do wickedly.' Good God! it seems as if the world was burned in wickedness—but all shall be stubble in that great day that cometh! Sinner and proud, haughty professor, and you who make long prayers, and say often, 'Lord, Lord' hear this, 'The day cometh that shall burn them up, saith the Lord of Hosts.' It (the day) shall neither leave them 'root nor branch'—they shall go to the land of forgetfulness. How shocking!

Our Father, how kind he is—what love he bore to us—how often he has admonished us—how often he has said, 'Why will ye die?' 'Return unto me and I will return unto you'—'I have no pleasure in the death of a sinner, but rather that he would turn and live.' Ho! every one that thirsteth, 'come without money'—'Come, all things are ready'—'Whosoever will, may come and drink of the water of life freely.' In addition to all these and many similar entreaties, he has made it possible for us to come—he has given Jesus as a sacrifice to make it so. He died for the actual transgression of his believing children, and burst the bands of death and made plain the way how God could save sinners—the great mystery was revealed. In consequence of Adam's transgression man is destined to the grave, but voluntarily Christ brought the free gift of life and immortality to light. Now, in view of all this love so richly and lavishly bestowed upon us, how painful to think of the sinner's doom. See him at God's judgment—he has rejected every offer of life and immortality, and what is his fate? He is unworthy of a solitary place in the universe of God! destruction must be his portion! He must be blasted with the breath of God's mouth! and consumed root and branch as a tree 'twice dead plucked up by the roots.' May God in his mercy remember us when he comes to be admired of all them who believe in that day, is the desire of my heart. W. S. L. K.

Fulton, March 14th, 1847.

The Time.

We are assured that at the time appointed, the end shall be—and while you take the position, 'Nigh even at the doors,' will you allow me to say a few words through your paper on Definite Time as I understand it! I, for one, wish to have all the light which can be obtained on this subject. True, Jesus gave us signs by which we should know when his coming was 'nigh even at the doors—but I think that in the prophetic numbers given to Daniel, we have something more definite. Let me notice one of them, viz: the 2300 days, running from the command to restore and build Jerusalem, down to the cleansing of the sanctuary, or the last end of the indignation. Of this time there was to be 7 weeks and 62 weeks, (483 years) unto Messiah the Prince, and then is added, he shall confirm the covenant with many for one week, and in the midst of the week he shall cause the sacrifice and the oblation to cease. We find then that 69 weeks extend to the time when Jesus began to preach; consequently, if we can ascertain when he commenced preaching, we can determine when the 2300 days will end. Let us now turn to the New Testament for testimony on this point, and we shall find in Luke iii. 21-23, that Jesus was baptised when he began to be about 30 years of age; and this I think Bro. Halo has proved to be in the fall of A. D. 29. At any rate, it was before the passover A. D. 30, for we find after his baptism, John ii. 13, that the Jews' passover was at hand and Jesus went up to Jerusalem. And he had not then commenced his public ministry, (or confirming the covenant) for in ver. 24 it is said that 'Jesus did not commit himself unto them, because he knew all men.' And chap. iii. 22-24: 'After these things came Jesus and his disciples unto the land of Judea, and there he tarried with them and baptised: and John also was baptizing in Enon, near to Salim, &c. for John was not yet cast into prison.' And in Mark i. 14, 15, we read, 'Now after John was put in prison, Jesus came into Galilee preaching the gospel of the kingdom of God, and saying the time is fulfilled.' And Matt. iv. 12 says, 'When Jesus heard that John was cast into prison, he departed into Galilee;' and then adds, verse 17, 'From that time Jesus began to preach,' &c. Peter also tells us in Acts x. 37, 'That the word which was published throughout all Judaea, began from Galilee after the baptism which John preached.' And in Luke xxiii. 5, 'When tried before Pilate, the chief priests were the more fierce, saying, he stirreth up the people, teaching throughout all Jewry, beginning from Gallilee to this place.'

Here we have the testimony of Matt. Mark and Peter, that Jesus began to preach in Galilee, after John had done preaching and was put in prison: and also the testimony of the wicked priests that he began from the same place. Then it is evident that he preached only two years and a part of the third; for we find in John that he attended one passover between his baptism and his beginning to preach, and he was cut off at the fourth which he attended—making only two years and a part, from the time he commenced preaching until he was cut off; consequently, four years and a part remained to be fulfilled by the apostles: 'God also bearing them witness, both with signs and wonders, and with divers miracles, and gifts of the Holy Ghost'—and this would end the 70 weeks A. D. 37, and after the passover.

I see no way therefore, (to say nothing of the types of the 7th month,) but that the 2300 days must end between the time of the passover '47 and the passover '48. And then 'The Lord himself shall descend from heaven with a shout, with the voice of the archangel and the trump of God, and the dead in Christ shall rise first. Then we which are alive and remain, shall be caught up together with them in the clouds to meet the Lord in the air, and so shall we ever be with the Lord. Wherefore comfort one another with these words.' Amen, even so, come Lord Jesus.

Meat in Due Season.

BRO. MARSH—The word of God is so full and plain on the great truths of religion, that Christians who take that word for their only guide, will be essentially one. However, but few are sufficiently acquainted with the Scriptures by personal study or sufficiently sanctified from other influences at present, to be entirely agreed: we are being trained and tried for that world where we shall 'see as we are seen and know as we are known'—till then, love instead of faith must be our bond of union. Teachers ought to be 'sound in the faith.' We are to 'contend earnestly' (not angrily nor uncandidly) 'for the faith once delivered to the saints.' Let us all bless God for the word of truth. Read, meditate, pray over it, believe, obey it all. 'The Lord God is a sun and shield—he will give grace and glory, and no good thing will he withhold from them that walk uprightly.'

The first and second advent of our Savior are, it is generally agreed, the main pillars of our 'faith, hope and love'—let us hold them fast 'a little while' till Jesus comes. Let me remind the dear brethren scattered abroad of the 13th chapter of 1 Cor. as a suitable portion of truth to be heeded at the present time in relation to disputed questions. I wish also to say that the 1st epistle of John has been a blessed portion of 'meat in due season' to me in months past. O, that we may all obtain that 'perfect love' which casteth out the fear which hath torment, and be hid in the day of the Lord's anger, yes, and have boldness in the day of judgment.

SAM'L EVERETT.

North Leverett, Ms., March 10, 1847.

The Wages and the Gift.—Rom. vi. 2).

Adam in the garden was crowned with glory, honor and dignity, lord of the inferior animals, &c., (Psa. viii.) but subject in every sense to the great Creator. As the sole sovereign, God had a right to command and it was the glory of the creature to obey. So long as Adam did this, he stood erect in primal dignity—but the moment he transgressed, the crown fell from his head, and conscious guilt, shame and fear, induced him to hide away from the presence of his Maker. Adam, 'where art thou?' 'I heard thy voice in the garden and I was afraid, because I was naked, and I hid myself,' was the reply of the trembling, fallen one. Gen. iii. 9, 10. On perusing the whole account, the common sense reader will remark the prominence given to the personal pronoun thou, throughout. This, and the fact, that our progenitor knew nothing of the mystic, metaphysical dogmas of these 'last days,' will show the awful stupidity of the 'blind guides,' who think they serve the Lord by robbing his word of its spirit and life to make room for their fanciful expositions. Nathan did not more surely mean

David when he said, 'Thou art the man,' than the Lord meant Adam, aye, all of Adam the first—(Gen. iii. 17-19) which contains his doom, after he had by sin lost immortality, and brought death into the world and all our woes. Rom. v. 12.

'Man became a living soul' when the Almighty breathed into his nostrils, but when the vital breath ascended, Eccl. iii. 19-21, all that remained was dust, unconscious and inanimate, as before the Lord breathed life into it. It did not comport with the divine purpose to forthwith execute the sentence, but the rebel was disinherited and sent forth from the garden of Eden to till the ground from whence he was taken, lest, saith the Lord, he put forth his hand and take also of the tree of life, and eat and live for ever. He was no more a candidate for immortality on his own bottom, but a portionless outcast, doomed to bitter toil and sorrow till he mingled with his native element. Through the serpent, the devil had cozened him out of all, and had not Christ the 'promised seed,' who shall bruise Satan under your feet shortly, died to cancel his guilt, and burst the cerements of the tomb to plead his cause with God, that we might lay hold on the hope of eternal life, and be sealed with that Holy Spirit of promise which is the earnest of our inheritance until the redemption of the purchased possession, man must have for ever perished viewed thus. O how unspeakably glorious the first promise, (Gen. iii.) and how transcendingly great the grace, mercy and loving-kindness of our God to man in his low and lost estate.

Now hear the word of the Lord ye who tremble at his word, first concerning the wages of sin. 'So thou, O son of man, I have set thee a watchman unto the house of Israel; therefore thou shalt hear the word of my mouth and warn them from me, when I say unto the wicked, O wicked man thou shalt surely die; if thou dost not speak to warn the wicked from his way that wicked man shall die in his iniquity, but his blood will I require at thine hand—nevertheless, if thou warn the wicked of his way to turn from it, if he do not turn from his way, he shall die in his iniquity, but thou hast delivered thy soul.' 'Say unto them, As I live saith the Lord God, I have no pleasure in the death of the wicked, but that the wicked turn from his way and live; turn ye, turn ye, from your evil ways, for why will ye die, O house of Israel?' O that this testimony might penetrate to the heart of the 'dumb dogs,' who love to slumber, and arouse them before the trump summon them to the judgment. 'Let no man say when he is tempted, I am tempted of God; for God cannot be tempted with evil, neither tempteth he any man; but every man is tempted when he is drawn away of his own lust, and enticed; then when lust hath conceived it bringeth forth sin, and sin when it is finished bringeth forth death.'—James i. 12, 15. 'For if we sin willfully after that we have received the knowledge of the truth, there remaineth no more sacrifice for sin, but a certain fearful looking for of judgment, and fiery indignation which shall consume the adversaries.'—Heb. x. Well does Paul say to the brethren at Rome, For when ye were the servants of sin, ye were free from righteousness. What fruit had he then in those things whereof ye are now ashamed? for the end of these things is death. Rom. vi. 20, 21.

In these passages death and life are clearly contrasted, and as sure as life means to move and have being, death means unconsciousness and inactivity. Man giveth up the ghost and where is he? He lieth down and riseth not again till the heavens are no more. Till Jesus calls the sleepers forth, 'the dead know not anything.' Paul tells us that 'the Lord Jesus Christ shall be revealed from heaven with his mighty angels in flaming fire, taking vengeance on them that know not God and that obey not the gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ; who shall be punished with everlasting destruction from the presence of the Lord and from the glory of his power.—2 Thes. i. 7, 9. The day of the Lord shall, like a burning oven, destroy the proud and all them who do wickedly, and leave them neither root nor branch. So God assures us by his holy prophet, and for one I believe God without a voucher. Mal. iv.

The gift, everlasting life, is through Jesus our Lord; how is it to be obtained? By faith in God and in Jesus whom he hath sent to be the Savior of the world—without faith it is impossible to please God, and he is the rewarder of such as diligently seek him.—Heb. xi. At sundry times and in divers ways God spake to the fathers, but in these last days he hath spoken to us by his well beloved son, whom he hath appointed heir of all things,—Heb. i. The Father commands us to hear this beloved one. Matt. iii. 13, 17. Hear and your soul shall live, but they who refuse shall be destroyed, when Jesus comes to reign. Acts iii.; Luke xix. 27. Jesus is the seed, (Gen. iii.) who shall bruise the serpent's head, destroy death, the devil and his works, (1 John v. 9; Heb. ii. 14-18) and give eternal life to all who by patient perseverance in well doing seek for it. Rom. ii. The Samaritan woman (John iv.) knew not God's best gift, but it is written in the prophets, they shall be all taught of God. Every man, says Jesus, that hath heard and learned of the Father cometh unto me. Abraham believed God and it was imputed unto him for righteousness; and all those of like faith are blessed with Abraham, who is the father of us all. Rom. iv. 16, 25; Gal. iii. 6, 9. When will Christ give eternal life to his people? worms, says Job, shall destroy this body, yet in my flesh shall I see God. When Job? At the latter day, my Redeemer shall stand on the earth; then faith shall be swallowed up in sight, and hope lost in fruition. xix. 25-27. Then says David, 'I will behold thy face in righteousness; I shall be satisfied when I awake with thy likeness. Thou wilt show me the path of life; in thy presence is fulness of joy and pleasures evermore.' Now we know that this will be at the latter day when Jesus stands upon the earth, which the meek shall then inherit. Matt. v. 5; Psal. xxxvii. 9, 12. For evil doers shall be cut off, but those that wait upon the Lord they shall inherit the earth; for yet a little while and the wicked shall not be; yea, thou shalt diligently consider his place, and it shall not be, but the meek shall inherit the earth, and shall delight themselves in the abundance of peace. Moreover, Peter tells us that David is not ascended to heaven, but dead and buried in his sepulchre at Jerusalem. Acts ii. Once more, then, Isaiah's dead men, (chap. xxvi.) shall awake and sing for very joy of heart, and then, too, Ezekiel's dry bones will be reanimated and clothed upon, and stand up an exceeding great army, even the whole house of Israel. Thus saith the Lord God, Behold, O my people, I will open your graves and bring you into the land of Israel, and ye shall know that I am the Lord when I have opened your graves, O my people, and brought you up out of your graves, and shall put my spirit in you and ye shall live, &c. Ezek. xxxvii. 12-14. See also Rom. ix. 11. Thanks be to God for his unto speakable gift. 'Where sin abounded grace did much more abound: that as sin hath reigned unto death, even so grace might reign through righteousness unto eternal life by Jesus Christ our Lord.

DEAR BRO. MARSH—As I am confined much of my time from physical disability that almost exclusively prevents me from pursuing my daily business, and considering how very important the parables of our Lord and Savior are to the present age, and how much that divine teaching prescribes to the child of God, I have thought that it might not be unacceptable to my dear brethren and sisters if they were collected for their use and handed to you for insertion in your well-conducted and useful paper, the Voice of Truth. I have therefore transcribed them for that purpose, earnestly waiting the end of mundane affairs, and the speedy coming of our dear Savior.

I am yours in Christian love, C. F.

LETTER FROM BRO. W. BURNHAM.

EXETER, N. H., March 30, 1847.

DEAR BRO. MARSH—I pray God that you, with all the faithful in Christ Jesus, may be enabled to "hope to the end for the grace that is to be brought unto you at the revelation of Jesus Christ." I pray "the God of hope to fill you with all joy, and peace in believing, that ye may abound in hope through the power of the Holy Ghost." I pray the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, to "keep you by His power, through faith unto salvation, ready to be revealed in the last time." Though now you may for a season be in heaviness through manifold temptations, yet be encouraged, and remember what James says: 'Blessed is the man that endureth temptations, for when he is tried, he shall receive the crown of life, which the Lord hath promised to them that love him.' Yet a 'little while,' a very little while, and our glorious King and deliverer will come. Lift up your heads, ye waiting ones, and believe—unwaveringly believe, that your redemption is 'nigh even at the doors,' and pray with all your soul, 'Thy kingdom come,' &c. O! do not 'draw back,' but 'continue in the faith' a few days more and you will be 'delivered,' 'changed,' and 'caught up to meet the Lord in the air;' and so you will for ever, even for ever and ever be with the Lord! Be strong—fear not; behold your God will come and save you! O ye children of God, lay hold by faith upon his word—upon his promises, and FEAR NOT. The word of God will not, it cannot fail. God is faithful, and will, in 'his time' 'avenge the blood of his servants, and will render vengeance to his adversaries, and will be merciful unto his land, and to his people.' 'Wait on the Lord, and keep his way, and he shall exalt thee to inherit the land, when the wicked are cut off; thou shalt see it.' Be ready—O be ready, my brethren, every moment, 'for in such an hour as ye think not, the Son of man cometh.' 'And take heed to yourselves lest at any time your hearts be over-charged with surfeiting and drunkenness, and cares of this life, and so that day come upon you unawares.'

Yours looking for that blessed hope,
W. BURNHAM.

Troy, Vt., March 8th, 1847.

Now is a time of extreme peril in which we should give heed to the sure word of prophecy as to a light that shineth in a dark place, until the day dawn and the day star arise in our hearts, which I think will be a very different star from some at the present time. There are a few in this place who are looking for speedy redemption, with their lamps trimmed and burning and 'waiting for his Son from heaven.' I think the position you have taken on the time of the advent of our Savior is the true Bible ground on which we may all stand and daily look for our glorious King, whose coming I believe is 'nigh even at the doors.' I hope the Voice of Truth will be sustained as long as we are here in this wilderness world, and as long as it continues to be what it is at present.

An Imposter.

DARIUS CROUCH.—The individual who bears this name passes for a second advent lecturer among our brethren; but we are thoroughly convinced he is unworthy of this high profession, and also unworthy the confidence of any Christian community. We have our information from some of his nearest neighbors who are considered some of the excellent of the earth, and who have indeed helped Mr. Crouch and his family after a godly manner, and also exhorted and prayed with and for them that they might reform; but they have been rewarded evil for good. We understand Mr. Crouch has gone East, and we think the brethren should be apprised of his moral character. We wish him no hurt—it is painful for us to write these things; but the precious cause is actually suffering from his injudicious and immoral course. May he reform and prepare himself for that judgment unto which we are all rapidly hastening.

P. S. Since writing the above and while waiting for a quantity of goods to be proved that were found (on a legal search) in Mr. Crouch's possession, we have learned from the same credible source that he has been keeping, and that recently, a very bad house! Did duty call for them, we would send you the testimonies of many of the first citizens of Fredonia village that these statements are not to be doubted. Mr. Crouch returned to his home on Sabbath evening, and Monday night he took his family and left the place.

ENDOWMENT OF CATHOLICISM.—The cloven foot begins to show itself in Parliament. Notwithstanding Mr. Macaulay's protestations at the Edinburgh election, there are grounds to fear that the present Ministry will venture upon the public endowment of Romanism in Ireland. Mr. Roebuck is acting the fooler. He has proclaimed in Parliament that the only means of regenerating Ireland is to adopt the Roman religion as the state religion. The Spectator, an influential weekly paper, has followed in the same track.—If this be attempted, England will have become wonderfully altered if it does not raise a storm.

It is a singular coincidence, that the same disease which has attacked the potatoes in other countries, has attacked the cocoa in Jamaica.

Appalling Scenes in Ireland!

EXTRACT OF A LETTER DATED

Ballinasloe, Ireland, March 1.

The times are awful here. The people are dying in the streets from hunger, and are daily found dead in their beds. A man and his wife were found dead in their bed two days since, and were opened by the doctor. There was nothing whatever found in their stomachs but a few grains, and not a particle of fat on their inside. Another family here sold everything they had in the world to procure food except an old ass, which they could get no person to buy—they killed and eat of it, and were found dead next day. Another family lay down in hunger, and when they were found it was ascertained that they had lived three days without eating. The only thing that kept them alive was throwing some of the straw they were lying on out in the rain and then sucking it to moisten their lips. In fact the whole town are lying in fever, caused from want of food. It is not unusual to see thirty or forty corpses in the day.

There is a man and cart employed to bury them at one shilling each—and of course without coffins, there being no means to procure them. As for the poor house, they do not think of burying them until they have seven or eight dead. They then make a hole in the green or common and put them all down together. Who would think the loss of potatoes would be the cause of all this? Since I commenced writing this letter seven of my neighbors have died. Flour is selling at 4s sterling per stone (14 lb.); American flour at the same rate; oatmeal 3s 8d per stone; bread 4d per lb. As for meat they do not think of it. Great numbers are dying of dysentery also: they live only a few hours when they are attacked with it. Good God what will they do now, particularly that the summer is approaching. [Eve. Jour.]

THE FAMINE IN IRELAND.—The reports of the ravages of famine and fever received from Ireland are still more appalling than any that have yet appeared; for the destitution is hourly increasing, especially in isolated rural districts, and the wretched people, wasted by long suffering, sink under the first attack of disease. The people are dying by thousands. Referring to accounts from Macroom, Skibbereen, Castletownsend, Kenmare, Watergraphell, and other districts, the Cork Examiner says:—"If instant measures be not adopted to relieve our people, the whole south-west of Ireland will become one huge grave-yard."—The Waterford paper reports inquests on three persons who died of starvation. There are fourteen deaths from destitution reported from Sligo, nine more from Mayo, five from Galway, seven from Clare, four from the neighborhood of Ballyshannon, and as to the ill-fated Skibbereen, Bantry, and the extreme south of Cork, it may be observed, that the deaths are beyond all calculation. The Waterford Mail says:—"It would take up our whole paper to particularize the deaths by starvation, robberies, and killing of sheep and cows, robberies of flour, &c. murders, coroner's inquests, &c. All descriptions of the distress full short of the reality. Thousands die as well from want of sufficient covering as from want of food."

Another account says:—"Were it not for the famine that rages in Ireland, slaying its thousands outright, and preparing victims without number for the first disease that may pass by, more would be said of the destitution, if not starvation, which universally prevails. Only a few nights since, for example, it was asserted without contradiction by a member of the House of Commons,—'That in the county of Somerset, people are subsisting on a scanty supply of horse-beans, and rotten turnips, picked up here and there in the fields;—" and a Belgian journal of the 24th ult., says—

'The mortality, already frightful, has not yet reached the horrible acme to which it will quickly rise, and the reports of several physicians prove to us that the detestable food of the people of the country creates diseases, which must inevitably spread death around.'

THE DESTITUTION IN THE HIGHLANDS.—A deputation of the Free Church of Scotland has visited the Highlands, and an appalling report they bring back. They say that at this date there must be nearly two hundred thousand of their countrymen actually destitute of food; and of the other half, multitudes are daily falling into the same distressing and fearful state; the remaining produce of their soil expending and expended; while, ere the month of May next, they can but anticipate that the same condition will be universal, with exceptions (numerically) to be scarcely taken into account. A parallel more easily realized than perhaps Highland destitution, would be that of the population of one of our largest cities, by some dreadful and sudden manifestation, deprived, not merely of their household stores—not merely of their family resources, but also, together with those, deprived of their commerce and ordinary business—of all and whole the sources by which their whole bodily sustenance was wont to be maintained.

The liberality manifested in England and Scotland for the relief of these deplorable calamities, is creditable to the humanity of the country in the highest degree.—N. Y. Evan.

FRANCE.—There are serious complaints of scarcity in France, and the price of breadstuffs has become exorbitant. The rupture between England and France has been settled amicably, and in a manner satisfactory to the honor and feelings of both parties. The credit of this gratifying result is due to the interference of Count Appony, the Austrian Ambassador at Paris. The occasion of this misunderstanding was that Lord Normanby, the British Ambassador, took offense at some remark made by M. Guizot in his address to the Chamber of Peers, explanatory of the Spanish marriages. It took at one time quite a formidable aspect.

LEVERRIER'S PLANET.—The English papers announce, as the result of late observations and discoveries, that this planet is continually approaching the earth. When first discovered, it was with difficulty seen with the most powerful telescopes; but it is now nearly visible to the naked eye. It is said to travel at the rate of a million and a half miles in 24 hours; and as it is believed by some to partake of the nature of a comet, some philosophers apprehend serious results from its approach, and the most learned Professors in England and France are anxiously endeavoring to solve the mysterious problem.

THE NEW PLANET.—We understand that Professor Pierce of Harvard University, in a paper read at a special meeting of the American Academy of Arts and Sciences, held on Tuesday evening, announced as a result of his calculations upon observations made by Sears C. Walker, Esq., of the Washington Observatory, the remarkable fact that the planet known as Leverrier, the discovery of which at Berlin was a consequence of the computations of the mathematician whose name it bears, is not the planet which answers to those computations, nor one which according to Leverrier's theory will account for the perturbations of Uranus—that this is not the planet which was discovered by the calculations of Leverrier, but another which was accidentally discovered by the Berlin observer. The diameter of the orbit of the observed planet is said to differ from that of the computed planet by several times the diameter of the orbit of the earth, and by forty years in the time of its revolution about the sun.—Cambridge Chronicle.

In view of these things, which seem to greatly perplex and confound the wisdom of the wise ones of this world, we are reminded of the word of the Lord to similar ones, just on the eve of the destruction of ancient Babylon: "Thou art wearied with the multitude of thy counsels. Let now the astrologers, the star gazers, the monthly prognosticators, stand up and save thee from these things that shall come upon thee. Behold they shall be as stubble; the fire shall burn them; they shall not deliver themselves from the power of the flame."—Isa. xlvii. 13, 14.

Shout ye Heralds!

Shout, ye heralds of salvation;
Shout, redemption draweth near;
Raise the cry in every nation—
King of kings will soon appear.

Shout, ye heralds! from the mountains,
O'er the ocean bid it sweep,
Till the far-off isles shall echo
Back the wailings of the deep.

Shout, ye heralds! Zion sleepeth;
Drinking in her last repose,
While each faithful watchman weepeth,
As about her walls he goes.

Shout, ye heralds! Zion dreameth!
Shout, the day of wrath is near!
Cry, the dawn of morning beameth!
Bid her dreaming millions hear.

Shout, ye faithful heralds, weeping;
From the watchman's tower cry;
Rouse! O rouse the guilty, sleeping—
Loud proclaim the judgment night.

Soon thy message will be ended;
Soon thy warning voice will cease;
Then, from heaven to earth descended,
Ye shall hail the Prince of Peace.

I. I. LESLIE.

Pre-millennial Advent.

BY CHARLES BECKER.

I have in a previous number stated the necessary canons of interpretation by which to avoid the doctrine of the Pre-millennial second advent.

1. All passages in which either the Advent, Resurrection, Judgment, or Conflagration, stand connected with millennial descriptions, must be spiritualized, BECAUSE THEY UNIFORMLY PLACE THE MILLENNIUM LAST.

2. All passages in which either of these events stand alone, disconnected from any millennial descriptions, ARE TO BE TAKEN LITERALLY, BECAUSE IN THEM THE MILLENNIUM CAN BE ASSUMED TO BE FIRST.

I am now showing that these canons are practically indispensable to those who deny the Pre-millennial Advent.

A striking illustration of the application of these canons, may be found by comparing the different treatment given to equally plain language.

There is a Coming and a Judgment described in Psalm 51. There is also a Coming and a Judgment described in Psalms, 96, 97, 98. Let now the eye glance at the parallel columns which follow, and see which uses the most literal style of description.

Psalm 51.

Psalms 96, 97, 98.

"Out of Zion, the perfection of Beauty, God hath shined."

"His lightnings enlightened the world, the earth saw & trembled."

"Our God SHALL COME and shall not keep silence."

"A fire shall devour before him and it shall be very tempestuous round about him."

"He shall call to the heavens above and to the earth that he may judge his people. Gather my saints together unto me, those that have made a covenant with me by sacrifice, and the heavens shall declare his righteousness, for God is judge himself."

Would not any mind which should examine these parallel columns without any theory to maintain, say that the "Coming" and "Judgment" described in the right hand column, is as likely to be literal as that in the left?

And yet, the 51st Psalm I have had presented to me by a clergyman opposing the Pre-millennial advent, as an unquestionable prophecy of the Lord's final coming to judgment, while the 96, 97, and 98, were denied any such meaning.

I had urged upon him the fact, that if consistent, he must eradicate every "promise of his coming" from the Old Testament, and challenged him to produce one. He alleged this 51st.

Now I ask any candid reader to ponder on this a little. Is not the language in the two columns very much alike? Why is the coming and judgment literal in the one, figurative in the other? For no other reason that I can discern than that presented in the CANONS at the head of this article, viz: The 51st Psalm contains no very distinct allusion to millennial times, but the 96, 97, 98, do. These latter Psalms, from their whole structure, and from the use made of them by St. Paul, Heb. i. 6, are incontestably Pre-millennial, and hence it will not do to understand the Coming and Judgment literally. But the 51st Psalm, containing nothing to identify the time, it will do to understand the Coming and Judgment literally.

And here I remark another thing to be much pondered. The passages like Psalm 51st, which it will do to take literally are few, very few. Indeed I am at a loss where to find another so good an instance. But the passages like Psalms 96, 97, 98, which it will not do to take literally, are so abundant that I am oppressed with them. The Scripture is verily crowded with the strongest descriptions of "his coming" to Judgment, St. Peter could desire, all of which, owing to some unfortunate millennial item inwoven into the description, we must sprinkle with allegoric narcotine. While a few straggling, sorrowful, forsaken passages, free from any millennial taint, we must baptize with literal fire. Here are some specimens of what it will not do to take literally as any one may see by examining the context, and noticing the unfortunate millennial connection. Isa. 30, 31, 32, &c.:

"Jehovah shall cause his voice to be heard and Rejoice before the Lord FOR HE COMETH, FOR HE COMETH TO JUDGE THE EARTH."

"A fire goeth before him and burneth up his enemies round about."

"Clouds and darkness are round about him, righteousness and judgment are the habitation of his throne." "The heavens declare his righteousness and all the people see his glory." "Confounded be all they that worship graven images, that boast themselves of idols, worship him all ye gods."

shall show the lighting down of his arm with the indignation of his anger and with the flame of a devouring fire, and with scattering, and with tempest, and with hailstones." "Like as a young lion roaring on his prey so shall Jehovah of Hosts come down to fight for Jerusalem and for the hill thereof—AS BIRDS FLYING, so will Jehovah of Hosts defend Jerusalem, defending also he will deliver it, and passing over he will preserve it." "THINE EYES SHALL SEE THE KING IN HIS BEAUTY." Even so, come Lord Jesus. Come quickly.

Elihu Burritt on Ireland.

Mr. Burritt, 'the learned blacksmith,' has been making a tour in Ireland for the purpose of investigating the real condition of the people of that afflicted country. The picture he has drawn we transfer to our columns. Mr. Burritt is a competent witness, and his testimony tells but too plainly that Americans must not relax their efforts to save their fellow-men.

A Week in Ireland—Leaves from the Editor's Journal.

SKIBBEREEN, Feb. 20.

* * * Rev. Mr. Fitzpatrick called, with several gentlemen of the town, and in their company I took my first walk through the potter's field of destitution and death. As soon as we opened the door, a crowd of haggard creatures pressed upon us, and with agonizing prayers for bread, followed us to the soup kitchen. One poor woman, whose entreaties became irresistibly importunate, had watched all night in the graveyard, lest the body of her husband should be stolen from his last resting-place, to which he had been consigned yesterday. She had left five children sick with the famine fever in her hovel, and she raised an exceeding bitter cry for help. A man with swollen feet pressed close upon us, and begged for bread most piteously. He had pawned his shoes for food, which he had already consumed. The soup kitchen was surrounded by a cloud of these famine spectres, half naked and standing or sitting in the mud, beneath a cold drizzling rain. The narrow defile to the dispensary bar was choked with young and old of both sexes, struggling forward with their rusty tin and iron vessels for soup; some of them upon all fours like famished beasts.

There was a cheap bread dispensary opened in one end of the building; and the principal pressure was at the door of this. Among the attenuated apparitions of humanity that thronged this gate of stunted charity, one poor man presented himself under circumstances that even distinguished his case from the rest. He lived several miles from the centre of the town, in one of the rural districts, where he found himself on the eve of perishing with his family of seven small children. Life was worth the last struggle of nature, and the miserable skeleton of a father had fastened his youngest child to his back; and with four more by his side, had staggered up to the door, just as we entered the bread department of the establishment. The hair upon his face was nearly as long as that upon his head. His cheeks were fallen in, and his jaws so distended that he could scarcely articulate a word. His four little children were sitting upon the ground by his feet, nestling together, and trying to hide their naked limbs under their dripping rags. How these poor things could stand upon their feet and walk, and walk five miles as they had done, I could not conceive.

Their appearance, though common to thousands in this region of the shadow of death, was indescribable. Their paleness was not that of common sickness. There was no shallow tinge in it. They did not look as if newly raised from the grave and to life before the blood had begun to fill their veins anew; but as if they had just been thawed out of the ice, in which they had been imbedded until their blood had turned to water.

Leaving this battle-field of life, I accompanied Mr. Fitzpatrick, the Catholic minister, into one of the hovel lanes of the town. We found in every tenement we entered enough to sicken the stoutest heart. In one we found a shoemaker who was at work before a hole in the mud wall of his hut, about as large as a small pane of glass. There were five in his family; and he said when he could get any work he could earn about three shillings a week. In another cabin we discovered a nailer, by the small light of his fire, working in a space not three feet square. He too had a large family, half of whom were down with the fever; and he could earn but two shillings a week. About the middle of this filthy lane we came to the ruin of a hovel which had fallen during the night and killed a man who had taken shelter in it with his wife and child. He had come in from the country; and, ready to perish with cold and hunger, had entered this falling house of clay. He was warned of his danger, but answered that die he must unless he found a shelter before morning. He had kindled a small fire with some straw and bits of turf, and was crouching over it, when the whole roof and gable end of earth and stones came down upon him and his child, and crushed him to death over the slow fire.

The child had been pulled out alive, and carried to the work-house: but the father was still lying there upon the dung heap of the fallen roof, slightly covered with a piece of canvass. On lifting this, a humiliating spectacle presented itself. What rags the poor man had upon him, when buried beneath the falling roof, were mostly torn from his body in the last faint struggle for life; his neck and shoulders and right arm were burnt to a cinder. There he lay in the ruin, like the carcass of a brute beast thrown upon the dung-hill. As we continued our walk along this filthy lane, half-naked women and children would come out of their cabins, apparently in the last stage of the fever, to beg for food 'for the honor of God.' As they stood upon the wet ground, we could almost see it smoke beneath their bare feet, burning with the fever. We entered the grave-yard, in the midst of which was a small watch-house. This miserable shed had served as a grave where the dying could bury themselves. It was seven feet long and six in breadth. It was already walled round on the outside with an embankment of graves half way to the eaves. The aperture of this horrible den of death would scarcely admit the entrance of a common sized person. And in this noisome sepulchre living men, women and children went down to die; to pillow upon the rotten straw, the grave-clothes vacated by preceding victims, and festering with their fever. Here they lay as closely to each other as if crowded side by side on the bottom of one grave. Six persons had been found in this fetid sepulchre at one time, and with one only able to crawl to the door and to ask for water. Removing a board from the entrance of this black hole of pestilence, we found it crammed with warm victims of famine, ready and willing to perish. A quiet, listless despair broods over the population, and cradles men for the grave.

Returned from this painful walk, nearly wet through and sad at the thought that I could not administer any relief to my perishing fellow-beings. Spent this evening in writing letters to England. (To be Continued.)

"Even at the Door."

If the coming of the Son of man is 'nigh, even at the door,' it is high time that we all 'know' it—for when we take the position that that event is 'nigh, even at the door,' we have no right to take it in any other way than we have been authorized to by the Lord. We have no right to say, we believe so; this would not be in compliance with the directions that our Savior gave. What were those directions? But in those days [of Papal rule,] after that tribulation, the sun shall be darkened, and the moon shall not give her light, and the stars of heaven shall fall, and the powers that are in heaven shall be shaken.—Matt. xiii. 24, 25. When these things begin to come to pass, then look up, and lift your heads, for your redemption draweth nigh.—Luke xxi. 28. When ye shall see all these things, know that it is near, even at the doors.—Matt. xxiv. 33.

Now, we have no right to take the position that the coming of Christ is 'even at the doors' until we are certain that 'the powers of heaven' have been shaken: for, 1st. There is no such thing as believing we know a thing. 2d. The shaking of 'the powers of heaven' is included among 'all these things,' or signs. There is no more authority for cutting this off from the other signs than there would have been for cutting off the falling of the stars, if it had come last in order. They are all connected alike by the copulative conjunction 'and,' and in every way precisely the same without the occurrence of a period, or any point of distinction, from the darkening of the sun till after the shaking of the powers of heaven—the only difference made being in the order and character of the events. 'What God has joined together let no man put asunder.' Let us not presume to leap beyond the bounds that the Lord has fixed, but be sure that we have seen 'all these things' before we take a position we have no right to take until we have seen them all. There can be no reasonable doubt that the shaking of the powers of heaven is one of the signs that were to precede the coming of Christ, and the one by which the saints were to know it to be even at the door—not already come, but a very short time in the future. Neither was this sign to be the shaking of 'heaven and earth,' simultaneous with God's voice roaring out of Zion for this the wicked could not help understanding and on them it shall come 'as the lightning,' and they shall not know anything about it, more than those did who were destroyed by the flood in the days of Noah. Examine this matter, brethren, and, leaving things as God has placed them, strive to know the truth as it is—not as you imagine it ought to have been.

I commenced an article with a design to show that we were not yet warranted by the word of God in taking the position, 'near, even at the door' yet, because the signs had not been 'all' seen. But I followed on after the truth as well as I knew how till I drove myself off from my own premises and was forced if I followed my own convictions of truth, to acknowledge that the last sign had been fulfilled. So I laid the article aside, astonished at my own blindness. God knows I desire nothing but to know and teach truth and glorify him, and I earnestly beseech the brethren not to be too hasty in adopting my sentiments, but try them by the 'sure word,' and if they do not run parallel with that, reject them. Let not the word of God be bent to compare with any man's notions, though the whole world say amen to them.

A few words in regard to the character of the signs: Is there certainty that the events predicted by our Savior as precursors of his soon coming have been witnessed by this generation? I feel no hesitancy in answering, 'There is the greatest certainty. There are no less than ten prophetic series of events that reach to the judgment, the everlasting kingdom, etc., all which have become matters of history except the last and greatest event, and we are assured by them that that event cannot be far in the future. There are also three prophetic periods that reach to the end of time, none of which can be shown to reach to the end of this Jewish or sacred year. Then, if we look for the signs predicted by our Lord, when should we look for them but in this generation? Besides, they were to begin to come to pass 'immediately after that tribulation' of 'the elect' 'in those days' of papal rule; and those days have passed as every body knows. Still more: a more truthful history of the present day could not be given than is given in the prophecies of the 'last days,' just at the time that the judgment scene bursts upon the earth, and destroys them that corrupt the earth. The signs, then, must necessarily be seen near this time. But aside from all this the events which we have regarded as the signs of Christ's coming, bear, within themselves, complete evidence of their identity with the Savior's predictions.

1st. The order of the events has been precisely in the order in which they were predicted.

2d. They have been supernatural and extraordinary, and consequently unaccountable. If the darkening of the sun and moon in 1780 had been by eclipse or any ordinary or natural events, they would have been necessary occurrences, and consequently no sign of anything to come, except the same occurrence to be repeated at a stated period. But such was not the case; a Providential interference brought about these events, unforeseen but through the light of revelation. The other signs are of a different character from the first two. The sun and moon might, and have been darkened by natural, usual, necessary events. But the fulfillment of any of the other predictions would be events unusual and unnecessary to an agreement with the fixed order of creation at any time; though not necessarily unnatural, notwithstanding they have proved unaccountable. The stars (a star is 'a luminous body in the heavens,' no matter what its quality or dimensions,) fell to the earth in 1833, 'even as a fig-tree casteth forth her untimely figs when she is shaken by a mighty wind.' This every body knows, and every literate or sensible person knows, also, that that event fulfilled the Savior's prediction in the only way it could possibly be fulfilled. I remember when I was a boy and had a faint belief in the truth of the Bible and a little knowledge of philosophy and astronomy, I used to wonder how that prediction could ever be fulfilled; for I knew that not even one of the smallest of those ponderous orbs that glitter in the sidereal heavens could come in contact with the earth and be a sign to those who should be 'alive and remain' that the coming of Christ was 'nigh'—yet in the future; for such a collision would not leave a man nor beast alive. But the Lord in due time verified his word in a manner not to be doubted by any who love the truth. It could not be doubted because there is no other way that we can imagine that it could be verified. Thus far, then, there is no room for cavilling. We know we have seen 'these things begin to come to pass,' and consequently we know that our 'redemption draweth nigh.'

Now, to complete 'all these things,' let us examine the shaking of 'the powers of heaven,' and see if our redemption is any nearer than 'nigh.' Lord give us wisdom to discern the truth. It is certain that the 'heavens' here spoken of is the atmosphere that surrounds the earth: 1st. It is evident from the fact that the Bible almost always calls the atmosphere the heavens; as 'the birds of heaven'—'the clouds of heaven'—'the winds of heaven'—'the lightnings of heaven,' etc. 2d. Christ was then speaking of the heaven that should 'pass away' with the earth; and in whose 'clouds' he should be seen descending. 3d. There is no other heaven whose powers could be shaken without we take the presumptuous ground that the throne of God, in the 'third heaven,' can be shaken. 4th. The result of the shaking of the powers of heaven proves it to be the atmosphere. Only one of the Evangelists gives the result: the others only mention the thing itself. Luke says: 'Upon the earth distress of nations, with perplexity; the sea and the waves roaring; men's hearts failing them for fear, and for looking after those things which are coming on the earth; for [because] the powers of heaven shall be shaken.' This shaking is assigned as the cause of all these things 'upon the earth;' and, therefore, as we know what makes the sea and the waves roar, we cannot, I think, be mistaken about what is to be deranged or shaken.

There has been much philosophizing on the term, 'powers of heaven.' One brother has already written to a considerable length, in the Voice of Truth, to prove that the gasses that compose the atmosphere are the powers of it; and he brought proof from scientific sources, that unprecedented 'convulsions of the atmosphere' had been witnessed of late, causing 'unparalleled hurricanes and tempests on almost every sea and shore,' and also a deranged state of the elements or 'powers,' of the atmosphere, causing the seed to 'rot under the clod,' which has caused great 'distress of nation' and 'fear,' etc. But, as the Scriptures have not told us what is meant by the 'powers of heaven,' we ought, in our reach for truth, to turn ourselves from what they have not to what they have given us, and not attempt to be 'wise above what is written.' They have given us the results of the shaking of the powers of heaven. Let us look, then, at the results. Look at the maritime records and see if the 'sea and waves roaring' since last fall, has not been without a parallel. Look at the current news of the day—at France, Ireland, Scotland, Belgium, Prussia, Hungary, etc.; and see where, on the pages of history, is recorded such extensive and great 'distress of nations,' etc. Look at scientific investigations, and see if all these things are not attributed to a derangement of the atmosphere or 'heaven;' and if this prediction has been eminently fulfilled, then look at the sacred record and see what we are to expect next, and how soon we are to expect anything further important.

The idea that the coming of the Son of man has been 'even at the door' ever since the falling of the stars in 1833—nearly 14 years—is abundantly condemned by the expression itself—'near, even at the door.' If we have seen this last sign, we need not expect to be waiting many days for the consummation of our glorious hope! Even so, Lord Jesus, come quickly. Amen.

R. W. WELLS.

Life and Death.

NUMBER V.

Before commencing on the state of the dead, I wish to say a few words on the importance of investigating the subject. I do this because I frequently see such remarks as the following: A sister says, she 'hopes they [we] will direct our attention more to the state of the living than of the dead.' A brother in the last Herald calls it 'harping' on the state of the dead, and thinks we have 'forgotten the message of the angel, Rev. xiv.'

1. In the first place, I ask on what authority are such rebukes founded? on the word of God, or the judgment of those administering them? If the Bible forbids us investigating its sacred pages we may as well lay it aside, and lie down in eternal despair. But if man is to live by every word that proceedeth out of the mouth of God—if all Scripture is given by inspiration of God, and is profitable, then every thing revealed is a legitimate subject of inquiry.

How often have we been met as we were presenting the reasons of our precious hope with the objection, that this was an unimportant subject—that we had better preach Christ and him crucified—preach faith and repentance, &c. &c., and let the question of Christ's coming alone. In the estimation of these individuals, the Lord's coming—the time of the same, and every thing pertaining to it, was an intredicted subject. I ask my brethren and sisters, did you abide by such judgment—seal your lips and hush your voices in silence at the beck of your fellow-men? or did you reply in the language of the Scriptures above quoted, adding, perhaps, 'secret things belong to God, but those revealed, to us and our children forever, that we may do all the words of this law'—'whether it be right in the sight of God to hearken to you more than God, judge ye?' This is my answer. Truth is a unit. Every specification has a bearing on some other. 'Tenth or ten thousandth,' says Pope, 'breaks the chain alike.' There are no abstractions in God's great system. All doctrine has a practical bearing. I fully agree with Dr. Skinner, that there is no such thing as doctrinal and practical preaching: but all doctrinal is practical preaching. My judgment then is, that this is just as much a legitimate subject of inquiry as the resurrection from the dead. If we may not inquire into the state of man, we CANNOT understand from what, or whence he is raised. Are we to exercise a blind faith? Shall we receive the traditions of the elders, and join them in singing the old battle song: 'death is the gateway to eternal glory,' and finish up our prayers with the trite saying, 'crown us thine in death?' when the word of God is as clear as the bright shining of the sun in the mid-day heavens, that death is the gateway to darkness, gloom, solitude, silence, and no man receives his crown till the resurrection? Shall we hold our peace when we are constrained to hear at every funeral, doctrines preached, as wide of truth as heaven is of earth? Well do I remember while in Michigan, at the funeral of a neighbor's child, of hearing the preacher say, 'that child knows more than any of us, and probably before its parents joined it in heaven, it would be as far before them in divine knowledge as they were before it, when it yielded up the ghost.' O how that grated on my ears and heart! Since we came here, a relative of mine parted with a beloved child, some fifteen months old. A Presbyterian minister officiated on the occasion. 'Who,' asked he, 'if he could lift the veil and behold that child, now basking in the unclouded glory and bliss of heaven, could be so cruel as to wish it back again?' Now, our Savior (according to this man) was just as 'cruel' (?) as to pluck the little daughter, the widow's son and the beloved Lazarus, right down from 'the unclouded glory and bliss of heaven,' and give them back to the arms of their 'cruel' friends. Such is the comfort offered to mourning friends. Well might the words of Job be applied, 'How then comfort ye me in vain, seeing in your answers there remaineth falsehood?'

A late number of the Advent Herald, contains a little poem, meritorious in some respects, but intermingled with that baseless doctrine. I was rejoiced to see along with it a rebuke from the editor. How came any of us to be emancipated from this popular error? I answer, by investigating the word of God.

2. I have another reason for investigating this question. You cannot touch the resurrection, without involving this subject. I have endeavored to present the coming of Christ and the resurrection unencumbered with this question, but my hearers have come to me out of meeting and pressed me for an explanation of certain texts that involve it. They would have it. The truth concerning the consummation of the Christian's hope cannot be presented to a thinking audience, without inciting their minds to farther inquiry. Shall we then withhold it? I for one feel it my duty to 'study to show myself approved of God—a workman that needeth not to be ashamed, rightly dividing the word of truth.' Every specification of the great and (to mortals) unfathomable unit, has a relative importance; some have a greater than other. If I understand the apostle, he teaches us to 'study,' strive, endeavor to understand this, and thus be prepared to give every doctrine its proper place. In '43 and '44, I often heard applications of Scripture that pained my heart. I knew them to be enormous, but I believed the Lord would come soon and then we should all see right—Christ would not reject us on account of our ignorance: I therefore resolved to let them alone. Since the 10th day movement, we have reaped to our sorrows, the sad consequences of letting error alone. I do not say Christ's coming or the time of it, has been dwelt on too much, but I do say, this ought ye to have done and not to have left other things undone. A sister told me not long since, they had had time and the simple fact of the Lord's personal coming preached in their place till they but poorly understood anything else. So we may dwell on any class of truths till others are nearly or quite forgotten.

No one can deprecate more than I do the practice of mounting a hobby, without saddle or rein, and riding at full speed blindfolded. I deprecate too, that spirit which I have seen manifested by some, who have undertaken to discuss the question under consideration. In the last Advent Herald was a letter, the closing paragraph of which, especially, gave me great pain. If we cannot discuss doctrines without a controversial spirit, we had better retire to our closets with our Bible for a companion, fall on our faces before God and try to learn the meek, quiet, patient, forbearing spirit of our holy Savior. By that spirit I hope to be governed in all my investigations—if I depart from it, 'let the righteous smite me, and it shall be an excellent oil.' There are some who differ with us in regard to the state of the dead, who, I have as good evidence are Christians as those who are with us.

'Be courteous,' says the apostle. If I resort to 'the reductio absurdum,' it is not to hold a brother up to ridicule but to show the absurdity of the doctrine. Let us then discuss doctrines, not men, and we shall avoid an acrimonious spirit, love as brethren, maintain the spirit of Christ, and show to the world that although we do not now see eye to eye nevertheless our hearts are one, and when 'our life shall appear,' we may hope to be united to our living head, and reign forever in the resplendent glory of his eternal kingdom. Amen.

PAPAL POPULATION EAST AND WEST.—Our readers (says the American Protestant for March) may not be aware how large a portion of the Papal population of the United States is found east of the Allegheny mountains. As there is nothing more convincing than figures, we will furnish our readers with a few statistics on this subject. We select them as they have been published by the order of the Archbishop of the United States for the year 1847.

In the diocese of Louisville, 30,000; of Cincinnati, 70,000; Detroit, 75,000; Vincennes, 27,000; Dubuque, 6,500; Pittsburgh, 35,000;

Little Rock, 700; Chicago, 50,000; Milwaukee, 30,000—Total 324,200.

Diocese of Baltimore, 90,000; of New York, 230,000; of Boston, 75,000—Total 395,000.

Here we find in three dioceses east of the mountains, 70,800 more Roman Catholics than in nine dioceses west of the mountains. Could we add to this, the diocese of Philadelphia in which are 71 Roman Catholic churches, and 59 priests; and the diocese of Hartford, in which are eight churches, fourteen other stations, and nine priests; it would very much increase the number in the East. But this we cannot do, as the Archbishop has never published the population of these two dioceses.

Time of the Second Advent.

NO. XV.

The prophetic numbers will claim our attention in this article. And what do they prove, relative to the time of the Savior's second advent—is the question now before us. This subject is so generally understood by the brethren that it will be unnecessary to do much more than clearly state the case. And

1. The prophetic numbers are in the Bible, and of course have as high claims to inspiration as any part of that perfect book.

2. They constitute a part of that "all scripture which is given by inspiration of God, and is profitable for doctrine, for reproof, for correction, for instruction in righteousness, that the man of God may be perfect, thoroughly furnished unto all good works," and of course it is our duty to try to understand and profit by them.

3. We have the word of the Lord, the most exact fulfilment of prophecy, and the united opinion of the best expositors of the Bible of every sect and age, to justify the conclusion that, in symbolic prophecy a day stands for a year. Hence the 2300 days in Dan. viii. 14 mean so many years. The 1290 and the 1335 days in Dan. xii. are to be understood the one to mean 1260 and the other 1335 years. And so the prophetic numbers in the Apocalypse are to be interpreted, a day to mean a year.

4. These prophetic numbers were given to measure the time, from certain events to certain events, the last of which will be the appearing of Christ and his kingdom.

5. Admitting the truth of the foregoing propositions, all of which are sustained by the best of evidence, we are prepared to say what the prophetic numbers positively prove on the time of the advent of Christ. And

1. They positively prove that the Sanctuary will be cleansed at the end of the 2300 years, named in Dan. viii. 14: for it is there said,—"Unto 2300 days [years] then shall the sanctuary be cleansed."

2. They positively prove that the horns were to be given into the hands of the little horn, or Catholic power, for the term of 1260 years: for it is said, in Dan. vii. 25,—"And he shall speak great words against the Most High, and think to change times and laws: and they shall be given into his hands until a time times and a dividing of time. But the Judgment shall sit, and they shall take away his dominion to consume and destroy it, unto the end."—See also Dan. xii. 7, and Rev. xii. & xiii.

3. It is positively proved that from the taking away the daily, to set up the abomination of desolation, it would be 1290 years: for it is said, according to the more correct reading of Dan. xii. 11,—"And from the time the daily shall be taken away, to set up the abomination that astonisheth, a thousand and two hundred and ninety days," or 1290 years.

4. Admitting that the 1335 days, or years, begin with the 1290, which we do not question, then it is positively proved that Daniel (and we think every saint) will stand in his lot, at the standing up of Michael, or Christ, in the resurrection morn, forty-five years from the time the 1290 days, or years, in verse 11th, close: for in the next verses it is said,—"Blessed is HE that waiteth, and cometh to the thousand three hundred and five and thirty days. But go thou thy way until the end be, for thou shalt rest and stand in thy lot at the end of the days."

5. Admitting (which we do not dispute) that Daniel's 70 weeks are a part of his 2300 days, and that the first 483 of them reached to the commencement of Christ's public ministry, when he "began to be about thirty years of age" (Luke iii. 23), then it is positively proved that the sanctuary will be cleansed at the expiration of 1847 years from the birth of Christ, as the following figures will demonstrate.

From the going forth of the commandment to the baptism and anointing of Christ,	183
From the birth of Christ to the same time,	30
Leaving for the date of the going forth of the commandment,	B. C. 453
Now from the	2300
take the	-453

and the remainder is	1847
the number of years from the birth of Christ, for the termination of the 2300 days when the Sanctuary will be cleansed.

The 1335 days reach to the end, and as a matter of course terminate with the 2300 days, 1847 years from the birth of Christ. To find the number of years from his birth to when the 1335 years commenced, we must from

1335 and we have, for the date of the commencement of the 1335 years,
A. D. 512

To which, add	1335
and we have	1847
the number of years from the birth of Christ to when Daniel will stand in his lot, at the end of the days.

By this simple rule the exact number of years before, and after the birth of Christ, for the commencement and termination of all the prophetic numbers may be accurately determined. The mathematician has the rule before him and can test it to his own satisfaction. Let him remember that the thirty years of Christ's age, Luke iii. 23, are the key to a correct knowledge of this whole question.

The result of this calculation is nothing new, though the manner of arriving at it is new, at least to many. The result of all our investigations on the Lord's coming in '43, and '46, was, that he would come near the termination of the true A. D. 1847, or 1847 years from the birth of Christ: therefore, the result of all the late arguments on the prophetic numbers only goes to confirm the truth, the infallibility of our former position, viz: that the Lord will come at the end of 1847 years from the birth of Christ, or near the close of the true A. D. 1847.

Here the inquiry will naturally arise, if the grand prophetic numbers positively terminate 1847 years from the birth of Christ, have we not positive proof that he will come this year, for this is A. D. 1847? We think we have positive proof that he will come near 1847 years from the birth of Christ, but we have not positive proof that this year is the true A. D. 1847, hence it is not positive that the advent will take place this year, but highly probable.

Before the close of 1843, our most critical writers then showed that '43, vulgar era, was in fact '47, true era. Then again our most competent writers, before the close of '46, clearly showed, as we generally thought, that '46 vulgar era in fact was '47 true era. The arguments on '46 being the true '47 were considered unanswerable, being based in part as was supposed on infallible evidence drawn from astronomical demonstrations. But time (and not the arguments of those who now call this year the true '47) has proved that our former conclusive reasoning about '46 being the true '47 was incorrect, and as we have seen no positive evidence that the present is the true '47, we cannot positively say that it is.

Could the precise year, and month, &c., of the birth of Christ be positively ascertained, then we might determine with equal certainty the year and day of his second coming. But this cannot or rather has not yet been done. As with the time of the commencement of every one of the prophetic numbers, so it is with the birth of Christ, viz: a few years of uncertainty exists around each. But there is no more uncertainty about the meaning of the prophetic numbers, the number of years they represent, and the important events at which they end, than there is about the fact that Christ was actually born in a stable, in Bethlehem, and that he is the Son of God. Faith, positively takes hold of the evidences which prove that the Son of God was born about 1847 years ago. But because we cannot positively determine the month nor year of his birth, we do not reject the Son of God, nor charge others of having no faith in him, because they cannot precisely tell the year of his birth. It is so with the prophetic numbers: because we cannot tell positively the precise year of their termination, we do not necessarily conclude that they should be passed by as useless, or as being above our comprehension. No, they aid in proving to us, beyond all contradiction, that the Lord will come again, that his coming will be witnessed at or near the end of 1847 years from the birth of Christ; and that those years terminate about this time. This conclusion is in perfect harmony with the nature of the whole divine testimony in the case, as every informed mind knows; and of course most admirably sustains the Bible position, "When ye shall see all these things know that he is nigh, even at the door."

All who understand this subject know very well that there is a dispute of several years, among the best chronologists, relative to the commencement of every one of the prophetic numbers, consequently there must be the same chance for dispute about the time of their termination. But some think that this difficulty is all obviated, when once it is correctly ascertained when the Savior was born, or when our A. D. commenced. This knowledge, they take for granted, those possessed who first settled the time of the Savior's birth. But would they inform themselves, or be informed, on this matter, they would see that the same uncertainty has been thrown around the birth of Christ as exists about the commencement of all the prophetic numbers.

Relative to the month and day of Christ's birth there is no positive certainty, as the following testimony will show:

"Clemens Alexandrinus reckons from the birth of Christ to the death of Commodus, exactly one hundred and ninety-four years, one month, and thirteen days. These years, being taken according to the Egyptian account, and reduced to the Julian style, make the birth of Christ to fall on the 25th or 26th of the month of December. Yet, notwithstanding this, the same father tells us, in the same place, that there were some who, more curiously searching after the year and day of Christ's nativity, affix the latter to the 35th of the month Pachon. Now, in that year in which Christ was born, the month Pachon commenced the 20th of April; so that, according to this computation, Christ was born on the 16th of May. Hence we see how little certainty there is in this matter, since, so soon after the event, the learned were divided in opinion concerning it."—Enc. Rel. Knowl., art. Christmas.

The learned Clemens, or Clement of Alexandria, "was born about A. D. 217," and of course possessed all the means, which any one could afterwards have, of determining the month and day of the nativity of Christ—and if he could not accurately do it in that early day, certainly it could not be done hundreds of years after.

On the year of the nativity of Christ, the Christian Epoch, or commencement of the Christian Era, we give the following testimony, from an old "Dictionary of Arts and Sciences, published by a Society of Gentlemen," in London, A. D. 1764. Under the head, Epocha, it is said:

EPOCHA OF CHRIST.—"The Christian world generally reckoned from the epocha of the creation, the building of Rome, the consuls register, or the emperor's reign, till about 500 years after Christ, when the epocha of the nativity of our blessed Lord was introduced by Dionysius Exiguus. He began his account from the conception or incarnation properly called Lady-day. Most countries in Europe, however, at present reckon from the first of January next following, except the court of Rome, where the epocha of the incarnation still obtains for the date of their bulls and briefs. But here we are to observe, that there are different opinions touching the year of our Savior's birth. Capellus and Kepler fix it at about the 748th year from the building of Rome. Decker and Petavius place the incarnation in the 749th of Rome. Scaliger and Vossius make it fall on the 751st of Rome. Dionysius Exiguus, Bede, &c. fix the birth of our Savior to the year 751 of Rome; the diversity of these opinions proceeding from the difficulty of fixing Herod the great's death, who, as is evident from the evangelists, was living at our Savior's birth, the taxation of Cyrenius, and the time of our Savior's beginning his ministry.—But let this be as it will, it is generally agreed, that as to computation and use, the common epocha is to be followed, which places the birth of Christ in the 4713th of the Julian period, although the true birth rather corresponds with the 4711th of the same period."

From this and other testimony we learn that the Christian Era was not brought into use until the commencement of the sixth century, and that when it was first introduced, a difference of three or four years existed among chronologists, relative to the year of its commencement. That difference has never been harmonised, as our investigations for a few years past fully show. Hence it is impossible to determine with positive certainty on what year of the vulgar era the true A. D. 1847 will fall. But such is the nature of the testimony that we have the strongest possible assurance that the true '47 will very nearly correspond with the vulgar '47, if it does not perfectly tally with that year.

It should not be forgotten that there is one evidence in the case that seems to point with a great degree of certainty to this year, for the true '47, and that evidence is the adoption of the concordat, by Buonaparte and the Pope of Rome, in A. D. 1802. If A. D. 1802 is positively the year when the 1260 days, or years, of Papal bloody domination ended, then 45 years more, the time for the 1835 years, would bring us to A. D. 1847. Not however to any day, week or month of that year, but any time in the year, or more probably at or near the close.—For this kind of prophecy deals not in fractions, but in full years; and it may be required to have 1847 full in order to make the number of years in this case complete.

While we should carefully remember the apparent positiveness of the testimony in one case, we should also bear in mind that the great amount of evidence in this particular respect, is not so positive. We should also remember by former mistakes our liability to be mistaken in our very accurate calculations, when we are chiefly dependant upon human testimony to guide us, and we should bear in mind that a part of the very harmonious testimony which pointed to '43 for the advent, has never been made to harmonize on any other year. We refer to the 1260 days in Rev. 11th, of the sackcloth state of the two witnesses. The majority of our readers will at once comprehend our meaning here.

Another evidence (not positive but inferential) that '47 true era is '47 vulgar era, is the fact that the discrepant dates, relative to the commencement of the prophetic numbers, and also those which relate to the birth of Christ, all cover the space of four years. Such is the fact relative to the testimony in the "old Dictionary" named above: it covers a space of four years. Also, we find that the first of those dates, as in the case of the prophetic numbers, is placed at a time to make the termination of the grand numbers fall on A. D. 1843, and, as a matter of course, the last dates would bring that termination in A. D. 1847. Hence '43 and '47 are the extreme points on the ground covered by the disputed chronology. Consequently we are unavoidably brought to one of the following conclusions, viz:—that our whole theory of time is incorrect; or our chronologists are all mistaken; or that the Lord will come near the last extreme of this disputed ground. We confidently believe the last, and of course have no doubts about the correctness of our theory.

Finally, after a careful and impartial review of this very important question, we are immovably, we think, confirmed in the conviction that, with other testimony, the prophetic numbers infallibly prove that the coming of the Son of Man in the clouds of heaven, with power and great glory, is NIGH, EVEN AT THE DOOR. Such is the nature of the evidence in the case, that we felt and actually were justified in looking for this glorious event in 1843; we had stronger reason to expect it in '44; and still stronger to look for it in '45; and yet stronger in '46; and now in '47, should we hourly look for it, stronger than ever before; and should it be delayed till '48, we doubtless will have stronger reasons to momentarily look for it than at any former time, and so on until our Lord shall come. But our faith, our unwavering faith, does not suffer us to put off this stupendous event until '48, nor to the close of '47. The next moment—our long absent Lord and King may come. O then, let us all see that we are ready to meet him at a time most unexpected: for, in such an hour as ye think not, the Son of Man cometh.

Dr. Tyng and others

ON THE ADVENT NEAR.

We want no one to believe the doctrine of the coming of Christ near, because Dr. Tyng or any other uninspired man believes it: true faith stands not in the opinions of men, nor rests on the arm of flesh—it is based on the word of God. But we do think when we are informed that such men as Dr. Tyng have embraced an unpopular doctrine, that it should at least strengthen the faith of those who believe it, and induce others carefully to examine the real merits of its claims upon our faith. We do not wish to leave the impression on the mind of any one that the names we give below have embraced in full what is called the advent faith: they hold to fundamental doctrines different from that faith; but between us and them there is but little if any difference on the doctrine of the personal advent of Christ being near. On a recent lecture by Dr. Tyng, the Watchman of the Valley says,

"The Hartford Christian Secretary notices a lecture recently delivered before the Young Men's Institute of that City, by Dr. Tyng of New York, as "rather a novel" production for such an occasion; the subject of the Lecture being—"The Five Appointed Universal Monarchies of the Earth."—The Secretary says:

He commenced his lecture by repeating the substance of Daniel's visions, and then proceeded to show that they related expressly to the four great monarchies which successively held the reins of universal empire, beginning with the Assyrian and ending with the Roman empire, which he claimed was still in existence in its divided state. He went over the history of these monarchies, first historically, next chronologically, and then geographically, and showed, that so completely did they answer to the prediction of the prophet, that infidelity had been driven to the necessity of denying the prophecy and maintaining that it was written subsequently to the events described. The fifth kingdom, which the God of Heaven was to set up, he supposed to be still in the future, but near at hand. If the seven times, or twenty-five hundred and twenty years of Daniel, commenced with the birth of Nebuchadnezzar, then the Fifth Monarchy would commence in 1861; but if it commenced with the time he began his reign, it would carry the time down to the beginning of the next century. He was not positive as to the time, there might be mistakes in chronology, but he was confident the signs of the times indicated the near approach of the second advent of the Son of God—the time when Israel should be gathered to his native land, and Jesus should stand upon the Mount of Olives,—when the Fifth Kingdom, the everlasting kingdom which shall never be destroyed, is to be set up, by the personal advent and reign of the Lord Jesus Christ."

On the same discourse Bro. A. Clapp of Hartford in a recent number of the Adv. Herald remarks, "In the providence of God, this city has once more heard a good lecture about the speedy coming of our blessed Lord and Savior Jesus Christ. Dr. Tyng, of New York, delivered a lecture last week before the Young Men's Institute. In consequence of expecting a large number to attend, the American Hall, the largest in the city, was procured. The hall was thronged, and with the first class of our citizens. To the astonishment of all, his subject was the five universal monarchies in Daniel's vision. He showed from history, that four of them had risen and passed away in succession; that the fourth is in its divided state, that we are living in the very toes of the image, and that God is about to set up the fifth and everlasting kingdom. He also alluded to the signs spoken of by Christ as having been literally fulfilled, and said that the kingdom was nigh, even at the doors. He spoke of the fig-tree putting forth its leaves, by which we might know that summer was nigh; and so we may know the Son of Man is soon to come, by looking at those events spoken of by Christ that have and are now taking place in the world. I am glad that so many of our citizens have once more heard upon this solemn and all-important subject, that never do, nor would, knowingly, attend Second Advent meetings."

From articles already published in our paper it may be seen that Charles Beecher, son of Dr. Lyman Beecher, is with Dr. Tyng a believer and a strong and fearless advocate of the personal advent of Christ near. We might name many more, master minds, who do not identify themselves with the advent movement, some in this country, and many in England, who are and have been for some time mighty champions for the advent near.

But as our object is to notice those who have more recently come into, or rather made known their faith, we will name but one more. It is that of J. CZERSKI, a prominent actor in the recent reformation in Germany, headed at first by Ronge. Czernski was at the Christian Alliance, recently held in the city of London, but was considered by the "orthodox" members of that body as unworthy of being a member of the alliance, on account of some intidel sentiments which it was supposed he held. Since he has returned to Germany he has written and caused to be published in the "Evangelical Christendom," the organ of the British branch of the Evangelical Alliance, a brief statement of facts relative to the Ronge movement in Germany. In that statement he fully clears himself and many others of the charge of infidelity (though Ronge and others he admits are tainted with that fatal error) and avows his conviction that the coming of Christ is not far distant. In concluding his letter he says:

"May God bless the great Evangelical Alliance in your fatherland, and impart to it strength and courage to spread and establish his kingdom upon earth! May you likewise, my brother, devote all your energies to these ends, and be not weary in working, especially by means of your journal, to induce all Christendom to unite in drawing nearer to the Son of God, her Redeemer and Judge, that He also may draw near to her; since, perhaps, the interval is no longer very great between this present time and the appearance of that "cloud," seated upon which the Son will come to judgment."

Whether Czarski and his numerous German brethren are believers in the advent near, we are not informed; but we may reasonably suppose, that some at least of the led, in this respect, partake of the faith of their powerful and popular leader. At any rate, the fact that Czarski believes that "the interval is no longer very great between this present time and the appearance of that "cloud," seated upon which the Son will come to judgment," is cheering evidence that the true light of the everlasting gospel, to a certain degree, shines upon Germany, as well as upon England and our own highly favored country—God, doubtless, has witnesses of this blessed truth in every part of the globe, and when their testimony shall be fully given, then will the end come. The Lord hasten it in his own due time, and enable us all to be ready to meet it with joy.

CORRESPONDENCE.

To Bro. C. R. Griggs.

In your answer to Bro. Lathrop, you say, 'In the first place he errs by blending the soul and spirit together.' You quote 1 Thes. v. 23 for proof, in which Paul makes the spirit, soul and body three distinct things. You next quote Gen. ii. 7, from which you conclude that 'The body was not a soul without the spirit, neither was the spirit a soul without the body; but SPIRIT and BODY UNITED CONSTITUTED A SOUL.' Then if 'he errs,' your error is greater; you blend the three together: you say, 'Spirit and body united constitute a soul;' but Paul kept the soul a distinct thing from the body and from the spirit—so you see that what you bring against your brother comes against yourself with more power. Now I think we had better examine both sides of the question carefully, before we say 'he errs.' I will name to you a portion of Scripture in which you will see that the spirit and body does not constitute the soul, and perhaps you may think that Bro. Lathrop was not so far out of the way in 'blending soul and spirit together.' It is a case of resurrection: 1 Kings xvii. 21, 22.—'And he stretched himself upon the child three times, and cried unto the Lord and said, O Lord my God, I pray thee, let this child's soul come into him again. And the Lord heard the voice of Elijah, and the soul of the child came into him again, and he revived.' Brother, did it take spirit and body to constitute that soul which had been in that dead body and had gone out of the body, and in answer to prayer came back into the body again? Again, was there any spirit in that body while it lay there dead and the soul was out of it? And do you not think it had a spirit and soul both after the soul got back again? If you have been too fast in saying 'he errs,' acknowledge it frankly; but if you still think he erred, then acknowledge that your error was the greater. Shall we not now conclude that the word soul as used in the Scriptures is susceptible of different interpretations? that Paul was right when he made it distinct from the body and from the spirit, and that at other times it may mean the spirit and body or the whole man?

Bro. Griggs, although we are strangers, I trust you will receive in kindness what I write. I write not to examine the truth or falsity of your article, but the course you take to prove your brother in error, and you will bear with me while I farther say, you preface your article admirably, and I pray and write this that we may abide by those remarks; but at the commencement of your article, I think you make a very unkind assertion—you say, 'His texts presented, with a few exceptions, militate against his own views, or else have no particular bearing upon the subject.' If you remember Bro. Lathrop's article, he quoted much Scripture with very few remarks. Was he so void of understanding as to make choice of Scripture that had no particular bearing upon the subject, or else went against his views? You do not say you think so, or its your opinion, but you make the positive assertion—thus you treat him! Suppose he makes the opposite assertion, what will it prove? Do not treat your brother's judgment so lightly. Praying that the law of kindness may guide our pens, I am your brother in hope of that day when we shall see as we are seen and know as we are known.

H. F. HILL.

Geneseo, March 24th, 1847.

LETTER FROM BRO. D. DAVIS.

UNION, PENN. March, 1847.

DEAR BRO. MARSH—I have been much afflicted in mind by many facts which have of late been spread before the world: but none has more sorely pained my heart than the notice given of the action of the Methodist Conference in making Gen. Taylor and his subordinates life members of the missionary society! This was done, and for what? Surely not on account of their self-denying labors for a world's salvation, which is the professed object of that society. Professed object I say, for I cannot consider men sincere who honor thus their fellow-men for oppression and aggression enforced and carried forward by wholesale and cruel murder. If God can approve of such an act, I ask what deeds of villainy may be safely threatened with his frown? But I suppose those men whom the Methodist Conference delisted thus to honor, were not guilty of disturbing the peace of their Zion by inculcating the doleful doctrine that those whose probation they terminate by fire and sword, powder and ball, will finally cease to be conscious; but rather the consoling doctrine that their terrified spirits, dismissed by them, fly swiftly to the abodes of everlasting despair.

Has it come to this, that the road to religious preferment must be lighted up by flaming cities, and strewn with the bodies of the dead and dying! Are garments dyed in blood the sure passport to church and missionary preferment? If so, will they secure to those who fall on the battle-field a part in the first resurrection? Will the Lord, the righteous Judge for (notwithstanding) those reasons give them the crown of life? surely Paul sought it not by such means. By means of this character he gained the applause of the Christ-rejecting Jews, but not of the meek and lowly Prince of peace.

Can men be so deceived as to look for the conversion of the world through such a medium as this? Would it even be desirable if it could be effected? The Scriptures inform us, 'As is the mother so is the daughter'—that is, as is the church so are her converts or proselytes; they are as Christ has informed us they would be, viz: 'two-fold more the children of hell than themselves.' What! is the world to be converted to the support of slavery, war, and many other sore evils by the Bible! This never can be. But there is another view to be taken of this matter: it affords painful evidence that man is fast filling up the measure of his iniquities—that the time is rapidly approaching when the blessed Christ will come, and reward every man according to his just deserts. Then it will be, 'Blessed are the PEACE-MAKERS; for theirs is the kingdom of heaven.' It is a matter of consolation to me that the triumph of the wicked is short; that he who shall come, will come and will not tarry! Then he will give reward to all his saints and destroy them that destroy the earth.

Your brother waiting God's Son from heaven,
DAVID DAVIS.

LETTER FROM BRO. D. B. BROWN.

METROPOLIS, Ill., March 12th, 1847.

DEAR BRO. MARSH—Your short note of Feb. 1st came to hand about one week ago, in which was enclosed $4, said to be a donation from Sister E. L. A. Hemenway: it was most thankfully received I assure you. The Lord reward the giver a thousand-fold in this world, and in the world to come with life everlasting. Such donations I would not need at present, if I could collect where it is, and has a long time been my due. I have fair promises, and I hope, before long, if time last, to be free from present embarrassments, and able to assist the needy as others have assisted me. Yet promises, you know, from the wicked worldlings, and a time-serving church, are but little to be depended on in this day of apostacy. I feel grateful to you and to my Heavenly Father for your kind offer to send me the "Voice of Truth" free of expense. I should feel lonely without it. Yet I hope to be able to pay for it, for I am aware you have a vast number of delinquent subscribers, besides those who are unable to pay. O that men would be honest with themselves, with God and with their fellow-men—especially by those who subscribe for and read the advent papers, calling themselves servants of the Lord. But if they are honest, they will pay for those papers which come to their hands bearing the glad tidings of a speedy coming Savior, if in their power.

Since I last wrote you we have had severe trials from sickness and death around us. An epidemic is still prevailing which has swept off many. We have shared in the sickness, but still our lives are prolonged. Among the very sudden deaths about a week ago, was that of Anthony M. House, a beloved brother in the Lord, and fellow-laborer with me in the things of the kingdom. He was formerly a class-leader in the M. E. Church, but embraced the doctrine of the personal appearing and speedy advent of our Lord, soon after I came to this place, a little more than one year ago. He had for years maintained a life of piety; and when he was dead it was frequently said of him, 'the best man in our town is gone.' He died in the triumphs of faith, shouting 'victory over death,' and in the blessed assurance that very soon he should have his lot in the 'New Earth,' with Daniel and all the ransomed ones. I deeply feel his loss; he being the only male member in all this place with whom I could counsel; yet God's will be done—I will try to meet him in the 'land of rest.' And thanks be to God there is still a throne of grace for poor, weary pilgrim travellers; I wish to be often there.

For the winter past I have been confined principally to this city and its immediate vicinity. The general state of the advent cause in this place and in this country is on the advance, but very slow in its progress. There are a great many people who will readily admit the theory, but for want of faith, it has on them no practical effect. And one reason with many why there is such a want of faith is, they cannot read, and of course cannot examine for themselves. Probably two-thirds of the inhabitants of this country hardly know the English alphabet; and yet many of this stamp appear intelligent and are very shrewd. For the most part they live in poor, open, miserable cabins, without a simple pane of glass or other means for letting in the light, except it be at the door or between the logs. I have frequently while travelling, been obliged to stay at such cabins, in a cold stormy night, when I must have frozen on my pallet of straw, but for overcoats and other garments of my own. This is also a timbered country and rather new. The roads of course are very intolerable, sometimes almost impassable. There is no way for an advent preacher to get around through the country, but by private conveyance. He must have a horse, and travel for the most part on a saddle; and even then, he can make but slow progress, for there are no periodicals in circulation through which he can send out his appointments. He must go from one settlement to another and stay in each long enough to get up a meeting. At the different county-seats, the court-houses can generally be had for lectures in summer, when the weather will admit meeting in them without a fire. In other places we have to crowd into cabins, or in summer into a pleasant grove. Two or three able, faithful and self-denying brethren are very much needed to go through this country without delay. Who will heed the cry? They need not expect much from those for whom they labor but coarse fare and lodging, such as our Savior had at his first appearing; but they will find enough to do, and occasionally a warm heart. There are at Saratoga, Union county, a few sainted ones, who wait and watch for redemption. O that the number may be increased a thousand-fold. As soon as the travelling will possibly admit, I design taking a tour through that place, and so on to the north about two hundred miles. The 'Voice of Truth' and 'Advent Herald' I feel obliged to circulate broad-cast through the land for want of other helpers, though I should be glad to keep them in file for reference. May I soon meet you in the blessed kingdom of God's dear Son.

Yours in waiting hope,

B. B. BROWN.

N. B. Since writing the above I have received a letter, dated Athol, Mass., in which was a donation of $5, for which I wish to express my warmest thanks to the giver. I should be glad to know who it is from; but pray the Lord to reward whoever it is, with a crowd of life that fadeeth not away.

☞ We do not know the giver, but the Lord knows and will reward.—EDITOR.

Extract of a Letter from Bro. Himes.

DEAR BRO. MARSH—Since I parted with you my health has improved, and the Lord has dealt mercifully with me. Trials and conflicts yet attend me, and I expect will to the end. I thank God for them all; they work for my good. I see you are being attacked also of late; but fear not, trust in God, and do right, and all shall be well. I truly sympathize with you.

I am more and more impressed with the fact that the coming of the Lord draweth nigh. The prophetic numbers are to be relied upon and they are about out. We cannot be mistaken. We have not labored, and suffered or waited in vain. If there is more light to be given on the chronology, I am anxious for one to have it; till then, I must look to-day and to-day, till the Lord appears. May we all be found ready and watching.

LETTER FROM BRO. M. M. MUMFORD.

WINDHAM, Me., March 21st, 1847

DEAR BRO. MARSH—The "Voice of Truth" I should be very loth to part with. I have been a reader of its contents since its commencement, and take pleasure in assuring you at this time that I continue to receive with each succeeding number, instruction, satisfaction and comfort. From it, I hear of and from those with whom in past times I have enjoyed sweet conversation pertaining to the glorious and everlasting kingdom of our God. May it continue to be a source of rich blessings to all of God's dear children while 'Ho who is our life' shall stay away.

I think I can say that my feet have never yet rested on a surer foundation than at this time. The events of the mighty past, even to our own day, afford us the clearest and most ample evidence of the realization of divine prediction in mercy in all its fullness. From the earliest times and through successive ages, all have transpired, agreeing in all particulars with the prophecy, and so have been continually in the progress of development through all intervening time till the present. Why then should I or any who rely on the word of the Lord doubt? Though a specified point of time has passed, the great foundation of our faith is as strong, as sure, as it could possibly be made. One twentieth part of the evidence that we have to stand upon would settle in its favor any question of politics or morals in the mind of the world. It has often seemed strange to me that those who have in times past walked with us and professed strong faith in the great truths, should turn away and identify themselves with our opponents; surely a more clear and manifest evidence of the truth of our position could not be wished. The divine word yet remains sure in all its declarations and promises, and may God enable us to hold firmly our grasp upon it, watching and praying continually, lest that day come on us unawares.

Since I left Rochester I have greatly felt the loss of meeting with God's dear children there, with whom in times past I have enjoyed so many pleasant and happy seasons; but my heart has been with you, and oftentimes has my mind reverted to those scenes of our frequent meeting-together in Talman Hall, when dear Bro. Barry's voice resounded through its length and breadth, bringing words of comfort to our ears, and sounding the solemn alarm to the unprepared; but his labor is over and he sleeps in the dust. But we will not sorrow, for we shall soon behold him in the 'Land of the blest!' God grant it. Those scenes are dear to my heart.

Darkness like that of Egypt enshrouds the minds of nearly all in these parts, but now and then I find a sweet little 'oasis' in this wide desert. I have visited twice with the brethren in Poland, where is a joyful company of 'pilgrims and strangers,' who are strong in the faith. I have enjoyed pleasant seasons with them. I am alone almost, seldom seeing an adventist in these immediate parts; but I can still assure you of my unwavering faith as formerly in the truth of the 'kingdom at hand.' I am also trying to overcome that I may reign with our blessed King. I have not been backward in speaking these glorious things. May we all be found at our posts when the mighty Potentate shall come—for lo, he comes, the Conqueror comes, death falls beneath his sword. My beloved mother has lately fallen, but in our coming King I shall find an ample return, for the sleeping saints will rise with robes of light and crowns of glory to endure for ever! Oh, happy, glorious thought! We shall then die no more.

Yours waiting and watching,

M. M. MUMFORD.

A man cannot be truly happy here, without a well grounded hope of being happy hereafter.

SANDUSKY CITY, O., March, 8.

DEAR BRO. MARSH—I have recently been at Bloomingville presenting God's claims upon the sinner, their obligations to obey him: also, to comfort the saints as far as my abilities allowed. I was there about two weeks, and held meetings nearly every day and evening. The Lord was pleased to bless the feeble effort with 'power from on high.' Ten or more were hopefully converted—several backsliders were reclaimed, and the children of God 'built up in their most holy faith.' Though contrary to my former custom, yet I strove (and in this I was joined with my brethren and sisters) to keep clear from all excitement, except that which the Truth, the unadulterated Truth of God, accompanied by his Holy Spirit would produce. The result was glorious and far exceeded the most sanguine expectations, and to God be all the praise!

Bro. E. Miller delivered a course of lectures in this place last fall. At first we were favored with the Wesleyan chapel—but after a few evenings it became inconvenient for us to have it; but blessed be God, I lived in 'my own hired house,' to which we repaired and held several precious little meetings. There were several who admitted the 'Truth,' and some for a time seemed anxious to learn, but the 'Millerites' being so exceedingly unpopular, all but one, (Sister Brown) have entirely left us: but the Lord is good and abundant in his mercies!

We are still looking for 'that blessed hope and the glorious appearing of our Lord,' and are striving to live in such a manner that when he shall appear, we may exclaim, 'Lo, this is our God, we have waited for him!' It greatly rejoices us to hear from the brethren abroad, of their stability, faith and perseverance. Let us continue faithful in well-doing, 'for in due season we shall reap if we faint not.' 'Fear not little flock, for it is your Father's good pleasure to give you the kingdom.'

"Oh how sweet to reflect on the joys that await me!"

Yours my dear brethren in the Lord,

J. M. JUDSON.

PERRY'S MILLS, March 10, 1847.

Permit me, dear brother, to say a few words to the saints of God, through your paper:

BELIEVED BRETHREN AND SISTERS—We are living in a grand and awful time—we are nearing the marriage of the Lamb! The angels will soon be out after the Bride, the Lamb's wife! Are you ready to meet with holy angels and be conducted by them into the heavenly feast to enjoy the glorious things that the Savior has prepared for those who are his? It is a great thing to be ready to be changed in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye! We must have that spirit in us that raised Jesus from the dead, in order to have our mortal bodies changed to immortality. I can say that I never felt the importance of having my all consecrated to God as I do now.

The work of God is still going on in this section. Souls are constantly being converted on the Manor and in Stanbridge, and some in Champlain and in other places. I have baptised twenty since I last wrote. I am still in the highways and hedges, compelling a few in, that my Father's house may be filled. O, my brethren, do not be idle in this hurrying time; what is done must be done soon. I am expecting the return of the nobleman within a few months; I must be ready—I cannot bear the thought of being left on this earth when the righteous are taken away. Let us not forget the assembling of ourselves together, but pray for each other, and exhort one another, and so much the more as we see the day approaching.

Your companion in tribulation, looking for redemption this year. Praise the Lord for all his goodness!

The Asiatic Cholera.

The distresses of Europe are causing us to forget the scourge of Asia. The famine in Ireland and Scotland seems to be almost at our very elbows. Men and women and children, speaking the same language with ourselves, are dying by thousands for lack of bread. And the end is not yet. Without the merciful interposition of Providence, this work of death may go on for many months. Let there be another harvest like the last, and who will venture to foretell the scenes of the coming year?

But let us turn for a moment to Central Asia, and watch the progress, slow but resistless, of the king of terrors in another form. Early in 1846 it was announced that the cholera had commenced its ravages in Khorasan, the eastern province of Persia. About mid-summer it reached Teheran, where it swept off ten thousand souls in a few weeks. Going out from this centre of influence and power with a divided force, as from a conquered capital, it took the great roads north, south and west, spreading desolation and woe along its course. Soon it lays Ispahan under contribution—Bagdad is compelled to yield up seven thousand of its inhabitants; and in the whole pashalik thirty thousand fell below their relentless foe. Tabreez was spared till the 7th of October; but then it paid dearly for its reprieve. In forty days nearly seven thousand souls were hurried to the grave. Three weeks later, Oroomiah was smitten by the hand of the same fell destroyer; and two thousand persons shortly became the trophies of his power.

Here the disease was stayed in its westward progress by the mountains of Koordistan; but with the ready skill of an able general, it changed its line of march and proceeded south, scattering its deadly arrows on every side, and threatening very soon to find a practicable pass to Asia Minor and Europe. Indeed, in watching the advance of this formidable enemy, we have been constantly reminded of the tactics of war. It is careful to seize the great roads for its lines of communication. It moves forward with a solemn and measured tramp, as if in no haste, and yet sure of success. It attacks the great centres of business, as being the strong points which are in no case to be left unassailed. When it enters the walls of a populous city, it moves along from street to street, and ward to ward, as if treading upon the rear of a slowly retreating foe. In about forty days its work is done, and it emerges once more into the open country, and pursues its appointed journey.

And whether is it tending? Will it pause upon the sultry plains of Mosul? Will it stop its career of conquest under the walls of old Byzantium? Or will it sweep over Europe, finishing the sad work which famine has begun? And for us there is another question, more interesting still. Will the broad Atlantic arrest the march of this dreadful foe? In 1832 it proved to be no barrier. Will it avail us now? These inquiries are not propounded with the view of exciting premature and groundless fears; but rather that we look the danger in the face, ascertain its nature and extent, and do whatever true wisdom may enjoin.—Boston Traveller.

OUR COUNTRY A SODOM.—“The ‘Troy Female Moral Reform Society,’ in their memorial, say, there are not less than 150,000 females annually reduced to infamy in this country, and that licentious men add to their ranks 750,000. Truly, this is startling. It is asserted that in New York, as gathered from the minutes of an agent, there are 400 houses of ill-fame, and 12,000 wretched females, residing in that city, between the ages of 16 and 36. Their lives are estimated to last but five years on an average, after they commence the practice of prostitution. In New York, says a memorial, the city has paid, the last year, upwards of $11,000 for the nursing of illegitimate children, that have been thrown on public charity by licentiousness. A memorial from Western New York says, in a western city there are 19 houses of degradation, 300 abandoned women, and forty illegitimate births the past year.—Rochester Dem.

CHILDREN'S DEPARTMENT.

THE GRASSY BED.

“There is a grassy bed,
A cold and gloomy cell;
And there some youthful head
Will almost surely dwell,
Before another pleasing spring
The first young violet shall bring!

Or, if on yonder sky,
A hand of dazzling flame,
Should the blue heavens divide,
And write that young one's name:
His knees would shake, his blood run cold,
Like the Chaldeans' king of old.

Then, lest this lot be mine,
(As possibly it may.)
Great Savior! now incline
This thoughtless heart to pray.
Now, now to me Thy grace impart,
Help me to give Thee all my heart!

Then, though the grassy bed,
The cold and gloomy cell,
Should rest my youthful head,
For me it would be well:
Yos better far than joining here,
This sprightly band another year!”

DEAR CHILDREN—Some years ago, when in England, I remember reading the above verses in a little book. I thought they were quite pretty, and perhaps you will think the same; but I am not so well pleased with them now. We have something more inviting and glorious to think of than the cold grave. Instead of preparing for death as we formerly were taught, we can now look for the coming of our glorious King, Jesus Christ from heaven, and for an inheritance in a land where there is “no more death.” Oh! what a glorious hope! Now let us alter the verses:

There is a glorious land,
An everlasting rest;
There holy children stand,
In Jesus' presence blest:
Ere many months their course have run,
This happy state may be begun!
If now from yonder sky,
The Lord the names should tell,
Of those who will on high,
In His glad presence dwell:
How happy, joyful should I be,
If, Lord, with them thou called'st me.
But, oh! the dreadful thought,
If, when the Lord doth come,
Myself should be shut out,
From those blessed children's home!
Forbid it Savior! oh, impart
Thy grace to me, take all my heart!
Then, when in majesty
And splendor all arrayed,
With angels in the sky
The Lord shall be displayed:
I'll shout for joy, I'll mount above,
With all the saints to sing His love.

Now boys and girls obey your parents; be respectful to those who are older than yourselves; be kind and obliging to your brothers and sisters and companions; never speak wicked words. Give your hearts to Jesus, and then all will be easy that I have told you to do. Do you feel ready to meet the Lord? Oh! secure his love now, that when He comes He may place you on His right hand: then you will be happy for evermore.

H. HEYES,
Rochester, N. Y., March, 1847.

ERRING BROTHER.—Would you throw a brickbat to a friend that had fallen overboard? Would you gather stones and pile them on the bank that had fallen on a brother? Would you throw a keg of powder to the person who had fallen into the fire? Then why heap words of reproach upon who has erred from the path of duty? Why denounce him and spurn him from your presence? Can you be a stranger to the human heart—you who have so often fallen? Shame on you—shame!

He cannot know the human heart,
Who, when a weaker brother errs,
Instead of acting Mercy's part,
Each base, malignant passion stirs.

Harsh words and epithets but prove
That he himself is in the wrong—
That first he needs a brother's love—
To nerve his heart and guide his tongue.

Are there Tidings ?

Are there tidings ? Watchman, tell us ;
Are there tidings from afar ?
Are there words for Zion cheering ?
Watchman, tell us if there are.

There are tidings—there are tidings—
There are tidings from afar ;
There are words for Zion cheering,
Zion long in hostile war.

There are tidings—there are tidings—
Hark ! the watchman's hear them cry !
Louder, louder still they echo :
'Rouse' for Zion's King is nigh.

There are tidings on the mountains,
There are tidings on the plain ;
In the desert hear the echo
'Zion's King will come to reign.'

There are tidings on the ocean,
Sweeping o'er the troubled main :
And the signal has reached the nations :
'Zion's King is soon to reign.'

Swell the tidings—swell the tidings :
Watchman, swell them far and near ;
Blow the trumpet—blow the trumpet :
Zion's King will soon appear.

J. I. LESLIE.

Pre-millennial Advent.

BY CHARLES BEECHER.

I offer a few more remarks to show that the Pre-millennial advent can only be avoided successfully by the following canons of criticism :

CANON I. All passages uniting the Advent, Resurrection, Judgment, or Conflagration, with millennial descriptions, must be spiritualized because they uniformly place the millennium last.

CANON II. All passages not uniting said events with millennial descriptions, are to be taken literally, because in them the millennium can be assumed to be past.

There is a "coming" described in Daniel, ch.
vii., and in 1 Thes. iv.—Let us compare them.

Dan. vii.

1 Thes. iv.

I saw in the night visions and beheld one like unto the Son of man COME WITH THE CLOUDS OF HEAVEN.

The Lord himself shall descend from heaven with a shout, &c.
Then we which are alive and remain unto
THE COMING OF THE LORD.

Now which "coming" is most likely to be literal, so far as the mere language is concerned ?
And what reason can be assigned for making the left hand spiritual, the right hand literal ? Yet so it is, and so it must be done by any who will deny the pre-millennial advent. And the reason why is, that this of Daniel is so interwoven with millennial items that it will not do to take it literally, while that of Paul, not being so interwoven, it will do. That is, to a superficial observer, though I shall afterwards show that that of 1 Thes. iv. considered in connection with 2 Thes.
ii., is as manifestly pre-millennial as this. Still, to superficial readers this does not appear, and it is easy to assume a pre-millennial date. In this 9th of Daniel however, the pre-millennial connection is so manifest, that no resource is left but to spiritualize.

What kingdom is this but the millennial ?
"And there was given him dominion and glory, and a kingdom that all people, nations and languages should serve him." "And the kingdom, and dominion and the greatness of the kingdom under the whole heaven shall be given to the people of the saints of the Most High."

"I beheld and the same Horn (viz : Papacy) made war with the saints and prevailed against them until the Ancient of days came."

Here we see the Papal "Horn" prevailing until the "coming." And as every body expects the Papal Horn will be broken before the millennium, there is but one resource to escape the premillennial advent of Christ. Spiritualize the whole—which is accordingly done. And the "coming in clouds," and the "judgment set," and the "books opened," are what the Universalist and Swedenborgian, wish them to be, allegories.

Again. There are two descriptions of the Resurrection. The one contained in Isaiah xxv. and xxvi ; the other contained in 1 Cor. xv. Let us compare a few expressions :

And he will destroy in this mountain the face of the covering cast over all people and the veil that is spread over all nations.

As in Adam all die,
so in Christ shall all be made alive.

Dead, they shall not live, deceased, they shall not rise, because thou hast visited and destroyed them and made all their memory to perish.

Thy dead SHALL LIVE, MY DEAD BODY shall they arise. Awake and sing ye that dwell in the dust, for thy dew is as the dew of herbs, and the earth shall cast out the dead.

And it shall be said in that day, Lo ! this is our God ; we have waited for him, and he will save us : THIS IS THE LORD ; we have waited for him, we will be glad and rejoice in his salvation.

Then shall the moon be confounded and the sun ashamed WHEN THE LORD SHALL REIGN IN MOUNT ZION AND IN JERUSALEM before his ancestors gloriously.

For behold the Lord cometh out of his place to punish the inhabitants of the earth for their iniquity, the earth also shall disclose her blood and shall no more cover her slain.

HE WILL SWALLOW UP DEATH IN VICTORY.

It is sown in corruption.

It is sown in dishonor.

It is sown in weakness.

It is sown in a natural body.

It is raised in incor-ruption.

It is raised in glory.

It is raised in power.

It is raised a SPIRIT-UAL BODY.

Every man in his own order. Christ the first fruits, afterwards those that are Christ's
AT HIS COMING.

FOR HE MUST REIGN till he hath put all enemies under his feet.
Death, the last enemy, shall be destroyed.

The second man is the Lord from Heaven.

They that are Christ's
—at his coming.

So, WHEN this cor-ruptible shall have put

And the Lord God shall wipe away tears from off all faces, and the rebuke of his people shall be take away from off all the earth.

on incorruption, and this mortal shall have put on immortality, THEN shall be brought to pass the saying that is written, DEATH IS SWALLOWED UP IN VIC-TORY.

Now then, here are two parallel sets of allusions to a coming, a reign a resurrection. Can any good reason be found for making the right hand literal, the left hand figurative ? Yet, the best reason, viz : that it will not do to treat the expressions in Isaiah literally. They are too obviously interwoven with the restoration of the Jews, or if you please their conversion. It is immaterial which, for either must be pre-millennial. The Resurrection here is too closely interwoven with a glorious millennial reign in Jerusalem. Too clearly identified in time with that binding of Satan mentioned Rev. xx. 1, 2.

In that day the Lord with his great and sore and strong sword, shall punish Leviathan, the piercing serpent, even Leviathan that crooked serpent, and he shall slay the dragon that is in the sea.

And he laid hold on the Dragon, that old Serpent which is the Devil and Satan and bound him a thousand years.

It will never do to allow it to be literal. For "it shall come to pass in that day that the Lord shall beat off from the channel of the river, unto the stream of Egypt, and ye shall be gathered one by one, O ye children of Israel." A literal Resurrection under such circumstances will never do. More especially when this by St. Paul is so identified with that of Hosea xiii. 12-14.

Hosea xiii. 12-14.

1 Cor xv.

The iniquity of Eph-raim, (the ten tribes of Israel, which are the subject of Hosea's prophesy,) is bound up, his sin is hid. The sorrows of a travelling woman shall come upon him, for he could not stay long in the place of the breaking forth of children. I will ransom them from the power of the grave, I will redeem them from death, I will be thy plagues, O death.
O grave, I will be thy destruction.

So, when this mortal shall have put on immortality, &c. then shall be brought to pass the saying that is written,
Death is swallowed up in victory. O Grave, where is thy sting ? O Death where is thy victory ?

Should these be allowed a literal value, what can dislocate the Resurrection, and the Advent, from their firm pre-millennial standing ? It will not do. Spiritualize the whole, together with Rev. xx., throughout, as also every other mention of the Resurrection which stands at all related to millennial events, not excepting Dan. xiii.
2. "And many of them that sleep in the dust of the earth shall awake—these to everlasting life
—those to shame and everlasting contempt." Baptize all such passages in the Allegoric Heli-con, or Lethe, by whatever name the all-efficacious waters of spiritualism must be known, but as to 1 Cor. 15, and any other passages which are not infected with millennial allusions, allow them to go in unsprinkled literalness.

By this method you not only successfully refute the expectation of a near impending advent of our Lord, but you do much more, as I shall proceed to show.

SKIBBEREEN, Feb. 21.

• • • Dr. Donovan called at 2 P. M. and we proceeded together to visit a lane of hovels on the opposite side of the village. The wretchedness of this little mud-city of the dead and dying was of a deeper stamp than the one I saw yesterday. Here human beings and their clayey habitations seemed to be melting down together into the earth. I can find no language or illustration sufficiently impressive to portray the spectacle to an American reader. A cold drizzling rain was deepening the pools of black filth, into which it fell like ink drops from the clouds. Few of the young or old have not read of the scene exhibited on the field of battle after the action, when visited by the surgeon. The cries of the wounded and dying for help have been described by many graphic pens. The agonizing entreaty for "Water! water!! help! help!!" has been conveyed to our minds with painful distinctness. I can liken the scene we beheld in this low lane of famine and pestilence to nothing of greater family resemblance than that of the battle-field, when the hostile armies have retired, leaving one-third of their number bleeding upon the ground.

As soon as Dr. Donovan appeared at the head of the lane, it was filled with miserable beings, haggard, famine-stricken men, women, and children, some far gone in the consumption of the famine fever, and all imploring him "for the honor of God" to go in and see "my mother," "my father," "my wife," "my boy," "who is very bad your honor. And then interspersed with these earnest entreaties, others louder still would be raised for bread. In every hovel we entered we found the dying or the dead. In one of these straw-roofed burrows eight persons had died in the last fortnight, and five more were lying upon the fetid, pestiferous straw, upon which their predecessors to the grave had been consumed by the wasting fever of famine. In scarcely a single one of these most inhuman habitations, was there the slightest vestige of food of any kind to be found, or fuel to cook food, or anything resembling a bed unless it were a thin layer of filthy straw in one corner, upon which the sick persons lay, partly covered with some ragged garment.

There being no window, nor aperture to admit the light in these wretched cabins except the door, we found ourselves often in total darkness for the first moment of our entrance. But a faint glimmering of a handful of burning straw in one end would soon reveal to us the indistinct images of wan-faced infants grouped together, with their large, plaintive, still eyes, looking out at us, like the sick young of wild beasts in their dens. Then the groans, and the choked, incoherent entreaties for help, of some man or woman wasting away with the sickness, in some corner of the cabin, would apprise us of the number and condition of the family. The wife, mother or child would frequently light a wisp of straw, and hold over the sick person, discovering to us the sooty features of some emaciated creature in the last stage of the fever. In some of these places we found an old woman stretched upon a pallet of straw, with her head within a foot of a handful of fire, upon which something was steaming in a small iron vessel. The Doctor removed the cover, and we found it was filled with a kind of slimy seaweed, which I believe is used for manure on the seaboard.

This was all the nourishment the daughter could serve to her sick mother. But the last cabin we visited in this painful walk presented to our eyes a lower deep of misery. It was the residence of two families, both of which had been thinned down to half their original number by the sickness. The first sight that met my eyes on entering was the body of a dead woman, extended on one side of the fire-place. On the other an old man was lying on some straw, so far gone as to be unable to articulate distinctly. He might be eighty or ninety years of age. It was difficult to determine; for this wasting consumption of want brings out the extreme indices of old age in the features of even the young.

But there was another apparition which sickened all the flesh and blood of my nature. It has haunted me during the past night, like Banquo's ghost. I have lain awake for hours, struggling for some graphic and truthful similes or new elements of description, by which I might convey to the distant reader some tangible image of this object. A dropsical affection among the young and old is very common to all the sufferers by famine. I have seen men at work on the public roads with their limbs swollen to almost twice their usual size. But when the woman of this cabin lifted from the straw from behind the dying person, a boy about twelve years of age, and held him up before us upon his feet, the most horrifying spectacle met our eyes. The cold watery faced child was entirely naked in front from his neck down to his feet. His body was swollen to nearly three times its usual size, and had burst the ragged garments that covered him, which now dangled in shreds behind him.

The woman of the other family, who was sitting at her end of the hovel, brought forward her little infant, a thin faced baby of two years, with clear, sharp eyes, that did not wink, but stared stock still at vacancy, as if a glimpse of another existence had eclipsed its visior. Its cold, naked arms were not much larger than pipesteins, while its body was swollen to the size of a full grown person. Let the reader group this apparition of death and disease into the spectacle of ten feet square, and then multiply it into three-fourths of the hovels in this region of Ireland, and he will arrive at a fair estimate of the extent and degree of its misery. Were it not for giving them pain, I should have been glad if the well-dressed children in America could have entered these hovels with us, and looked upon the young creatures wasting away, unrummuringly, by slow, consuming destitution. I am sure they would have been touched to the liveliest compassion at the spectacle, and have been ready to divide their wardrobe with the sufferers.

SKIBBEREEN, Feb. 22d.

Dr. Hadden called to take me into Castlehaven parish, which comes within his circuit. This district borders upon the sea, whose rocky, indented shores are covered with cabins of a worse description than those at Skibberdeen. On our way we passed several companies of men, women and children at work, all enfebled and emaciated by destitution. Women with red, swollen feet partially swathed in rags, some in men's coats, with the arms or skirts torn off, were sitting by the road-side breaking stones.

It was painful to see human labor and life struggling among the lowest interests of society. Men, once athletic laborers, were trying to eke out a few miserable days of their existence by toiling upon these works. Poor creatures! Many of them are already famine stricken; they have reached a point from which they cannot be recovered. Dr. Donovan informs me that he can tell at a glance whether a person has reached this point or not. And I am assured by several experienced observers that there are thousands of men who rise in the morning and go forth to labor with the picks and shovels in their hands, who are irrecoverably doomed to death. No human aid can save them. The plague spot of famine is on their foreheads; the worm of want has eaten in two their heart-strings. Still they go forth uncomplaining to their labor; and toil, cold, famished and half naked, upon the roads; and divide their eight or ten pence worth of food at night among a sick family of five or eight persons. Some are kept at home, and prevented from earning this miserable pittance, by the fear that some of their family may die before their return.

The first habitation we entered in the Castlehaven district, was literally a hole in the wall, occupied by what might be called in America, a squatter, or a man who had borrowed a place for himself and family in the acute angle of two dilapidated walls by the road-side, where he lived rent free. We entered this stunted den by an aperture about three feet high, and found one or two children lying asleep, with their eyes open in the straw. Such at least, was their appearance, for they scarcely winked while we were before them. The father came in, and told a pitiful story of want, saying not a morsel of food had they tasted for 24 hours. He lighted a wisp of straw, and showed us one or two more children lying in another nook of the cave. Their mother had died, and he was obliged to leave them alone during the most of the day, in order to glean something for their subsistence. We were soon among the most wretched habitations that I had yet seen, far worse than those of Skibberdeen. Many of them were flat roofed hovels, half buried in the earth, or built up against the rocks, and covered with rotten straw, sea-weed or turf. In one which was scarcely seven feet square, we found five persons prostrate with the fever, and apparently near their end.

A girl about 16, the very picture of despair was the only one left that could administer any relief, and all she could do was to bring water in a broken picher to slake their parching lips.—As we proceeded up the rocky hill overlooking the scene we encountered new slights of wretchedness. Seeing a cabin standing somewhat by itself in a hollow, and surrounded by a moat of green filth, we entered it with some difficulty, and found a single child about three years old lying upon a kind of shelf, with its little face resting upon the edge of the board, and looking steadfastly out of the door as if for its mother.—It never moved its eyes as we entered, but kept them fixed towards the entrance. It is doubtful whether the poor thing had a father or mother left to her; but it is more doubtful still whether those eyes would have relapsed their vacant gaze, if both of them had entered at once, with every thing that could tempt the palate in their hands. No words can describe this peculiar appearance of the famishing children.

Never have I seen such bright, blue, clear eyes, looking so steadfastly at nothing. I could almost fancy that the angels of God had been sent to unseal the visions of these little, patient, perishing creatures to the beautitudes of another world; and that they were listening to the whispers of unseen spirits bidding them to "wait a little longer." Leaving this we entered another cabin, in which we found 7 or 8 attenuated young creatures, with a mother who had pawned her cloak, and could not venture out to beg for bread because she was not fit to be seen on the streets. Hearing the voice of wailing from a cluster of huts farther up the hill we proceeded to them, and entered one and found several persons weeping over the dead body of a woman lying by the wall near the door. Stretched upon the ground here and there lay several sick persons; and the place seemed a den of pestilence. The filthy straw was rank with the festering fever.

Leaving this habitation of death, we were met by a young woman in an agony of despair, because no one would give her a coffin to bury her father in. She pointed to a cart at some distance, upon which his body lay; and she was about to follow it to the grave; and he was such a good father she could not bear to lay him like a beast in the ground; and she begged a coffin 'for the honor of God.' While she was wailing and weeping for this boon, I cast my eye towards the cabin we had just left; and a sight met my view which made me shudder with horror. The husband of the dead woman came staggering out, with her body upon his shoulder, slightly covered with a piece of rotten canvass. Painfully and slowly he bore the remains of the late companion of his misery to the cart. We followed him a little way off, and saw him deposit his burden along side of the father of the young woman, and by her assistance. As the two started for the graveyard to bury their own dead, we pursued our walk still farther on, and entered another cabin, where we encountered the climax of human misery. Surely, thought I, while regarding this new phenomenon of suffering, there can be no lower deep than this between us and the bottom of the grave.

On asking after the condition of the inmates, the woman to whom we addressed the question answered by taking out of the straw three breathing skeletons, ranging from two to three feet in height and entirely naked; and these human things were alive! If they had been dead they could not have been such frightful spectacles.—They were alive; and wonderful to say, they could stand upon their feet, and even walk: but it was awful to see them do it. Had their bones been divested of the skin that held them together, and been covered with a veil of thin muslin, they would not have been more visible. Especially when one of them clung to the door while a sister was urging it forward, it assumed an appearance which can seldom have been paralleled this side of the grave.

The effort which it made to cling to the door disclosed every joint in its frame, while the deepest lines of old age furrowed its face. The enduring of ninety years of sorrow seemed to chronicle its record of woe upon the poor child's countenance.

About half way to Skibbereen, Dr. Hadden proposed that we should diverge to another road to visit a cabin in which we should find two little girls living alone with their dead mother, who had lain unburied seven days. But as it was growing quite dark, and the distance was considerable, we concluded to resume our way back to the village. In fact I had seen as much as my heart could bear.

In the evening I met several gentlemen at the house of Mr. Swanton, among whom was Dr. Donovan. He had just returned from a neighboring parish, where he visited a cabin deserted by the poor people, although it was known that some of its inmates were still alive, though dying in the midst of the dead. He related other cases too horrible to be published.

Presumptuous Scoffing.

A writer from the city of Washington for the New York Herald says:

You know that a comet has been visible for some time, and that the stranger has manifested a desire to pay us a flying visit. Now we are informed that Prof. Lieut. Maury, at the National Observatory, has cyphered it out that some time next week this gentleman in the long-tailed, flame-colored coat, will come so near to us that old mother earth will be compelled in her regular journey to brush by or through the aforesaid coat tail, which places us in somewhat greater danger than the proximity of Santa Anna to the American army: for be it understood that the earth is a shell, filled with liquid fire, and that if this straggling vagabond of a comet comes within the radius of the earth's attraction, it will be very apt to break the shell of this mundane terraqueous ball, and let out the lava, bringing about the day of judgment largely in advance of our calculations. If the Prophet Miller is still in the land of the living we respectfully call his attention, and that of his brethren, to this important revelation, and to the necessity of getting their ascension robes in readiness for the expected explosion, conflagration, and general resurrection, which, for all we know, may be a good deal nearer than the next Presidency.

"And I hope to die a shouting When the world's on fire."

Life and Death.

NUMBER VI.

The question that now presents itself for our consideration is, Are the dead conscious?

The very idea of death would at once forbid any other conclusion than unconsciousness, were it not that such liberties have been taken with the definition of the word, as to make it mean anything the theory of the individual demanded. Thus: when death is spoken of as the 'wages of sin,' it is understood to mean the death, not of the man, but of his hopes—the hope of all good, and the infliction of evil. Again, when death is spoken of as of the dust returning to dust and the spirit to God who gave it, it is understood to be not the death of the man, but a dissolution of the connection of the soul of the man with the body of the man. With such indefinite ideas of what man is and what death is, how can we ever come to any definite conclusion?

I remark: 1st. When the term death is applied to man, I can understand it to mean nothing else than the death of the man. I dare not take such liberties with the word of God or the meaning of words, as to make them teach something directly opposite to their plain etymological signification.

2d. It is doing the greatest violence to language to use the term man in such a latitudinarian sense. Thus: when it is said, 'the dead praise not the Lord, neither any that go down into silence,' it is understood to say, 'the dead bodies of men praise not the Lord, neither any of the dead bodies of them that go down into silence.' When Paul says, 'I have a desire to depart and be with Christ,' he is understood to say, not Paul, but Paul's soul. What authority have we for thus dividing a man? None at all. When man is spoken of he is spoken of as man, composed of body, soul and spirit. So far as the Bible teaches, or the etymological signification of words teaches, I have just as good authority to divide the man, reversing all these positions. How would those holding the opposite view, like this? Neither can be sustained. When man is spoken of as man, he is not spoken of as a part; when a part is spoken of it means a part, not the whole.

Keeping in mind these premises, we will now proceed to the inquiry, Are the dead conscious? Does the Bible teach it? Are our hopes based on the resurrection from the dead—the renewing of life by the power of God, or partly on this and partly on something else? Is there a plain, unequivocal declaration in the word, that the latter is the fact? If there is I have yet to find it. Having neither found it myself nor seen one quoted by the advocates of the affirmative theory, I shall in the first place examine those texts from which inferences are drawn to sustain the affirmation—and secondly, present the positive testimony of the word on the question.

1. The parable of the rich man and Lazarus, is the strong hold of all those who affirm that the dead are conscious. Some draw one inference from it and some another. The one, that it teaches the doctrine of an intermediate state, in which neither righteous or wicked are rewarded or punished; the other, that it teaches a positive and immediate reward to the righteous, and a positive and immediate punishment to the wicked. Both deny that it is a parable; both affirm it is a matter of fact case. Why then do they not agree in their conclusions? If it is a relation of facts, there is nothing ambiguous about it—no room for difference. The fact that their inferences are so diverse, ought, alone, to teach them that it is not a matter of fact case. Let us look at it in the light of the affirmation:

Ist. If it be a relation of facts, then it is plain and explicit, and we are bound to believe the statement of those facts, however incomprehensible they may be to us. We are bound to believe that Lazarus died—that Lazarus (not the soul of Lazarus, for according to the theory the soul did not die) but Lazarus—the MAN that died, was carried by angels into Abraham's bosom—that the rich man died and was buried, and in hell he, the rich MAN that died, lifted up his eyes, being in torment, and prayed to Abraham—suffered literal torment by fire, and thus go through the whole relation. It is therefore clear, according to the hypothesis, that both the poor and the rich man were there bodily, and in no other way. This, the relation is made to teach, and the last two verses, especially, confirm it. The rich man says, 'If one went unto them from the DEAD they would repent: but Abraham answers, They have Moses and the prophets, let them hear them; for if they hear not Moses and the prophets, neither will they be persuaded though one rose from the dead.' Either inference affirms that the soul is alive: if, therefore, one went unto them, he must go from the living.—Can I believe a theory that involves such a contradiction? Never!

2d. Thus either theory is contradictory, not only of itself but of the word of God. Both teach the separate state of soul and body—both teach that the body is in the grave—the one, of the soul in paradisos or Tartarus; the other, of the soul in heaven or hell—the one, of the soul waiting to be rewarded at the resurrection; the other, of the soul rewarded or punished in the separate state. The relation (if a matter of fact case) equally contradicts both. It contradicts the former, in that it declares Lazarus comforted in Abraham's bosom, and the rich man tormented in hadec. The former, also, involves itself in another difficulty: it holds the relation to be one of facts, (and I hold the advocates to their own principle of interpretation,) yet when it comes to Abraham's bosom, that means paradisos. Here the language is tortured back into parabolic. I cannot reason with any man, who will not abide by his own avowed principles of interpretation. Another Scripture contradicts both—declaring that 'we must all appear before the judgment-seat of Christ, that every one may receive the things in his body according to that he hath done, whether it be good or bad.' I omit the supplied word 'done' after 'things,' because it plainly does not belong there. Another, 'Behold the righteous shall be recompensed in the earth; much more the wicked and the sinner.'

These remarks may suffice on this point. Bro. Marsh having given so lucid an exposition of the parable, I shall be relieved from it. Thus much I have admitted for the sake of showing the absurdities of the opposite theories. I have admitted, also, that we are bound to believe every fact revealed in the word of God; but God no where requires us to believe absurdities. Every theory that thus involves us we ought to distrust. I admire the reverence of the old woman for God's word, who said that if the Bible declared that Jonah swallowed the whale, she should believe it; but I can have no fellowship for that faith that swallows down such monstrous absurdities, without ever examining the foundation for them. I have brought forward objections which no living man can reconcile with the theories considered, much less with other portions of God's word. If they can let them do it, or else abandon that parable as proving their theories. In my next I propose a further examination of some points connected with the parable—also some general remarks on the nature of parables.

Voice of Truth & Glad Tidings

"The wise shall understand."

ROCHESTER, APRIL 21, 1847.

Bro. J. PEARSON Jr. is on a visit to his friends at Newburyport, Mass. He expected, when he left, to be absent three or four weeks, and wished us to say, if any church on his route should desire him to call on them on his return, they may direct a letter to this effect, to him at Newburyport, Mass. He will act as agent for the "Voice of Truth" on this tour.

"The Wise shall Understand."

Having closed, in our paper for last week, our regular numbers on the Time of the Second Advent, we wish now to notice certain truths connected with the subject, but which did not necessarily fall within the range of our investigations. These gleanings will be presented without any particular arrangement as to order, but as they may occur to the mind, and as we may have opportunity to present them.—We will begin with "THE WISE SHALL UNDERSTAND."—Dan. xii. 10. No one who understands the true meaning of Daniel's prophecy will deny that this text, the chapter in which it is contained, and nearly the whole book, treats on the time of the coming of the Son of man and setting up of the everlasting kingdom of God. Hence the time is an important item which the wise were to understand. It could not be conversion or godliness in the heart, as some contend, which was to be understood: for Daniel was a godly man, and he did not understand that which the wise were to understand, as verse 8th clearly shows. Neither could it have been the nature of the events named in the prophecy: for those were explained, as all will see by consulting the whole prophecy. Therefore, it must have been the time, to which the angel chiefly referred when he said, The wise shall understand.

When were the wise to understand? 'At the time of the end,' is the ready answer of many, 'when the vision was to be unsealed, when many should run to and fro and knowledge increase, during the period of about forty-five years before the advent of Christ.' All very true. But were the wise to understand about the time of the advent named in the prophecies of Daniel, prior to forty-five years before the end? Most certainly they were. The grand vision covers the space of 2300 years, and during this long period of time different events at different times were to occur. The wise living at these different periods were to understand the times in which they lived. The following facts justify this conclusion.

Near the time of the fulfilment of the 69 weeks of Dan. ix, a wise Simeon, with others, was confidently 'looking for the Consolation of Israel.' The wise then understood the signs of their own times, and the time of the fulfilment of the prophecies which specially related to their day. Though they did not understand the day month or year of their fulfilment, they understood enough to constitute them the wise, and to cause them joyfully and confidently to wait for the Consolation of Israel, and one at least was sufficiently wise to obtain the assurance that he should not taste of death until he had seen the Lord's Christ. Then, at this important moment, the wise understood the time of their visitation. And the wise were told, when they should see the abomination of desolation spoken of by Daniel the prophet, standing in the holy place, or Jerusalem compassed with armies, to understand, and to flee to the mountains—and they understood, obeyed, and were saved from the dreadful destruction which fell upon the unwise Jews.

Near the time of the fall of Pagan Rome and the rise of the Papacy, the wise understood the time of the fulfilment of the prophecies of Daniel which related to those times.

Justin Martyr, who was beheaded A. D. 166, considered the Man of Sin named by Paul and the little horn mentioned by Daniel the same, and that he was then at the doors.

Tertullian, in the latter end of the second century, in expounding 'now he who letteth' &c., says, "It is the Roman State, the divisions of which into ten kingdoms will bring on Antichrist, the Wicked One—then the little horn shall be revealed."

Cyril of Jerusalem, in the 4th century, speaking on the the Man of Sin &c., says,—“This is the predicted Antichrist, who will come when the times of Rome pagan is fulfilled, and the consumation of the world approaches.—Ten kings of the Romans shall arise together, in different places,—the eleventh shall be Antichrist, who shall seize the Roman power.”

St. Chrysostom, who died in exile A. D. 407, asserts, "That when the Roman empire shall be taken out of the way, Antichrist shall come, shall seize the empire, and assume the power of God and man."

Jerome, who, it is said, witnessed the tearing to pieces of Rome pagan, by the barbarous nations, exclaimed,—“We consider he who hinders is taken out of the way.”

Thus we see that the wise understood near the time when the daily [or pagan Rome] was to be taken out of the way to set up the abomination [papal Rome] that astonisheth. Dan. xii. 11. It is true, we have no account that they understood the day hour or year when either of these stupendous events would occur; but for this reason no one will now say that they were not wise; but all admire their wisdom, and rejoice in referring to these worthies as evidence that God's people have ever understood the time of the fulfilment of the prophecies which belonged to their respective days. In a word, we think the wise in this case did understand, just as the angel said they should.

Down the stream of time near the termination of the 1260 years of the bloody reign of papal Rome, the wise were not blind to the signs of the times.—Martin Luther, who died A. D. 1546, not long before his death, expressed his conviction that the end of the world would come "within three hundred years."

Edward King Esq., F. R. S., A. S., of London, published an article on the fall of the Papal supremacy, A. D. 1798, in which he says,—“This is the year, 1798—and just 1260 years ago, in the very beginning of 338, Belisarius put an end to the empire, and dominion of the Goths at Rome. He left no power in Rome, that could be said to rule on the earth, excepting the ecclesiastical Pontifical Power.”

Dr. A. Clark, in his notes on Dan. vii. 25, viewed the fall of the supremacy of the Papacy, in the same light in which Mr King and very many other wise ones of those times viewed it. Then, near the time of the fulfilment of the different parts of the grand vision, or near the time of unsealing different parts of it, down to the time of the end, the wise have understood. And now, when the last seal is removed, or immutable facts mark the fulfilment of every part of the vision, excepting the crowning point,—shall not the wise understand? It would be an absurdity apparent to all, to say they cannot. That thousands who are now looking for the coming of the Lord about this time, have understood, and do now understand, according to the meaning of 'the wise shall understand,' we have not a doubt. They perfectly understand that 'unto 2300 days; then shall the sanctuary be cleansed,'—and that at the expiration of the 1335 days, Daniel will stand in his lot. And although they do not understand precisely when these numbers commenced, and consequently cannot exactly tell when they will terminate, yet they do understand, without an if or a doubt, that they end about this very time. And this is fully sufficient for all practical purposes, to the wise.

This understanding of the subject will lead the wise to discern the signs of these fearful times—will wake them up to watchfulness and prayer—will prompt them to a faithful discharge of every duty they owe to God and man—and cause them to make a full preparation to meet their daily expected Lord, with transports of joy.

There is as much danger of being wise above what is written, as in being ignorant of what is written: either is reprehensible if not criminal folly. True wisdom consists in understanding and obeying the truth. May we all be thus wise—be found with our lamps brightly burning at the return of the heavenly Bridegroom, that with the wise we may be admitted to the uninterrupted joys of the everlasting kingdom of our God.

The Mexican War.

The deadly strife between this country and Mexico still exists, and doubtless our readers are already informed that thousands of the combatants, the greater number Mexicans, have recently fallen on the fields of death at Buena Vista and Vera Cruz. The Americans in each case have been victorious—Santa Anna has been repulsed—and Vera Cruz taken.—And the design of our government seems to be to carry her victorious arms to the city of Mexico. But this must be done, if done at all, to say nothing of the expence of millions of dollars, at the sacrifice of thousands more of precious lives of men, and helpless women and children. And, as says a correspondent of the National Intelligencer, "what earthly advantage can compensate us for the loss of our fellow-citizens on these bloody battle fields?—Will the loud cries of 'glory,' 'honorable death,' 'extension of the area of freedom,' dry the tears of the mothers, wives, sisters, children, friends of those whose remains may lie mingling with the sands of Mexico, torn in pieces by the missiles of war? No, no, no. The mother who bewails her child, or the wife moaning for her dead husband and orphan children, will not be comforted by the huzzas over a successful feat of arms, or cease to weep when told of the great acquisition to national glory made by killing thousands of God's creatures."

And we may well ask, what will all this work of death avail either the victorious or vanquished, the living or the dead of these contending armies, in the day of righteous retribution? Ah, all alike will then fall beneath the avenging sword of Him who will destroy them that destroy the earth. Be wise now, therefore, O ye kings; be instructed, ye judges of the earth. Serve the Lord with fear, and rejoice with trembling. Kiss the Son, lest he be angry, and ye perish from the way, when his wrath is kind-dled but a little. Blessed are all they that put their trust in him.

Controversy.

There is some prospect of a friendly controversy being carried on in our paper between brethren B. Morley and H. F. Hill, on the state of the dead, and destruction of the wicked, &c. At this stage of the investigation for the truth's sake, we venture to offer the following thoughts for the consideration of our brethren during this controversy.

1. Let the glory of God, in the development of His truth, irrespective of self, or selfish opinions, be the apparent and ultimate object of this investigation. Self, poor imperfect self, is so liable to become the prominent actor in such disputes, that it is not only highly perilous to engage in them, but, we have sometimes thought, contrary to the will of God.

2. When brethren do engage in such disputes, they should carefully avoid censoriousness, inuendoes, witticisms, a disposition to ensnare each other, or to shun the truth, or the force of each other's arguments. Oh, how the cause of God has been made to bleed, when christian disputants have been influenced by such a spirit as this.

3. Christian disputants in the first place should be sure and have a Bible proposition, and in the second place strictly Bible evidences and arguments.—If they will do this, and if each possess a right spirit, their controversy will be of short duration, and will end in the glory of God: for most certainly both would come to the unity of the faith. But where self must be defended, by unqualified assumptions, affirmations, human inference, and metaphysical reasonings, there is neither light, sense, profit, end, praise, or honor to God or man, in such vain ramblings and unholy wranglings. Such a controversy we neither expect nor want in our columns. An experience of over twenty years has taught us the baneful influence of such christian squabbles.

4. When brethren will investigate the Bible, (not the opinions of men, nor each other), for the sake of obtaining a correct understanding of the Bible, for their own and others' good—and when each has christian frankness, grace, and meekness enough to see and freely acknowledge his own errors and mistakes, and the correctness of his brother's views, when the plain truth of the Bible demands—then, and not till then, should they presume to enter into a work like this. To all who lack these qualifications—we would seriously say, "Hands off:" for they are too impure, too rude, to handle the word of the Lord.

Finally, we say to Brn. Hill and Morley, we bid you as Christians, mutually seeking to know the truth, to our columns. The smallness of our sheet, and the variety of other matter which cannot be omitted, will require that your communications be short. Others will not interfere with your investigations, while you mutually have the field. May the Lord deeply imbue each heart with his love, and enlighten the head with all necessary wisdom, that you may promote his precious cause, and glorify his most holy name in this, we trust, your labor of love, to know the truth.

"CHRISTIAN OFFERING."—This is a small religious paper published at Rochester, N. Y. A clerical correspondent of Feb. 16th makes reference to us, which we quote. In speaking of the prospects of the Offering he says:

"It has certainly commenced its career at an eventful period. If it were so, however, (as represented by a celebrated Advent preacher from Boston, the last Sabbath,) if it were so, that the Protestant Church has hitherto made no successful aggressive movements against the kingdom of darkness (1) and that there can be no reliance placed on her future movements for the good of the nations; (2) and if (as was further represented) the only ground of hope, that the cause of truth will ever triumph, and the kingdom of righteousness ever be established, is based on the assumption that the Lord Jesus Christ must first appear personally, on earth, and take the work into his own hands, and accomplish it himself, (he did not tell how) (3)—then, Mr. Editor, the prospect of your doing much for the spiritual good of your fellow-men, is rather disheartening."

1. This is not correct. We made no such statement. On the contrary, we showed that an unparalleled aggressive movement was made against the kingdom of darkness by the great Protestant movement.

2. This also is without foundation. We believe that Protestantism is doing good, and will continue to do good while the world stands. We said that Protestants were not accomplishing what they proposed. They propose to convert the whole world. But we think with Dr. Anderson, that the Protestant Church with her present efforts, will not be able to accomplish the work in "ages on ages!" See his tract on the outpouring of the spirit. In a word, there is no hope of the world's conversion from Protestant christianity; but there is hope of good, much good;—and she can accomplish all the good to the nations that is practicable without cherishing unfounded hopes of the entire conversion of the world. So far from believing that they can do no good, or that they should slack their hands, we think they have the means and the ability to accomplish much—and if we could stir them up to give for Missions, the Bible Society, and kindred institutions as they ought, we would cheerfully bear the reproach of misrepresentation. The fact is, the Protestant world is half asleep, dreaming—actually doing nothing compared with their immense wealth and facilities. There is no denying this fact. May God arouse them to immediate action, that what little time remains for labor, may be well improved for the good of the whole church, and the salvation of men.

3. As to the manner in which the world is to be subjected to Christ, he says I did not tell them "how" it was to be done. True—that was not my subject: but if he will carefully read the third chapter of the second epistle of Peter, he will have my views on the question literally expressed.

SECOND ADVENT LIBRARY (New series). No. 2. "The duty of Prayer and Watchfulness, in the Prospect of the Lord's Coming. By James Haldane Stewart, M. A., Incumbent of St. Bride's, Liverpool."

"Mr. Stewart is a very pious and devoted minister of the English Church; and in the above work he has given us the results of his rich experience as a father in the ministry, and an ardent lover of the doctrine of the speedy coming of the Lord. We hope it will be extensively circulated. Price, 4 cts single; 37½ cts per dozen, or $2.50 per hundred."

The Lord's Coming a Great Practical Doctrin.—By Rev. Mourant Brock, M. A., Chaplain of the Bath Penitentiary.

"This tract forms No. 3 of the Library. Portions of it have been given in the "Herald" during the past year. We have had repeated calls for it, and now give it in a substantial tract form. It is the best practical treatise on the subject of the Lord's coming we know of. Our friends cannot fail to do great good by the circulation of this tract among those who disbelieve the Advent doctrine. Price, 4 cts single; 37½ cts per dozen, or $2.50 per hundred."—Adv. Herald.

The above tracts have just been published by J. V. Himes, Boston, of whom they may be obtained. We expect a supply soon at this office. They are valuable productions, and well calculated to do good at this trying hour. Let them be generally circulated and candidly read.

Bro. H. Heyes recently called on us—gave several interesting lectures—and pursued his journey westward. The Lord make him a blessing to the saints where his lot may be cast.

CORRESPONDENCE.

"Are the Dead Conscious?"

BRO. MORLEY—In your article in the Voice of Truth of March 24th, headed as above, you say, "In the first place, it is evident from the Bible that the dead are not to be rewarded or punished until their resurrection." You then quote much Scripture in proof, and you might have quoted much more. But what was your object? I humbly trust that all adventists believe that the dead are not rewarded or punished until the resurrection. But what has that to do with the consciousness or unconsciousness of those who have taken their departure? Did you design to place us in a false position that you might the more easily remove us? I do not believe that of Bro. Morley. Then why did you do so? We discard the idea that man enters into the heavenly kingdom at death; or that they are glorified with a crown before the appearing of Christ, as much as we do the idea that they sleep unconscious or cease to be at death.

The greater part of your article is in proof that the dead have not come in possession of their reward, which we confidently believe. You then come to the subject in question, and inquire, "Where, then, are they, and what is their state?" You say, "That they are not in heaven, the following passages prove: John iii. 13—And no man hath ascended up to heaven but he that came down from heaven, even the Son of man which is in heaven.' Also Acts ii. 29, 34." You then conclude, (if I understand you correctly,) from Dan. xii. 2, John v. 28, 29, 1 Thes. iv. 13, 14, that the whole man is sleeping in the dust, seeing they have not gone to heaven. Now brother, abide by your own teaching, "That no man hath ascended up to heaven," and I will remove the difficulty of a place for those who have with Peter put off this tabernacle their bodies, by showing you that some men have a conscious existence who are neither in the grave on earth, or in heaven: 'By faith Enoch was translated that he should not see death.'—Heb. xi. 5. Then he is not in the grave. We are also sure he is not left upon the earth: 'And Enoch walked with God; and he was not for God took him.'—Gen. v. 24. You have proved that he has not gone to heaven—neither has he got his reward yet, for Paul names him among them who 'without us should not be made perfect.'

Now as Enoch and Elijah who were translated that they should not see death, have not gone to heaven, is it not quite rational for us to conclude that these good men have gone to that other good place, which God speaks of in his word, (Paradise,) where our Lord said that the penitent thief should be with him the day they were crucified? but if you think not, "Where, then, are they?"

But is not Paradise Heaven? I think not. It is no where called heaven in the Scriptures. Paul, in those two remarkable visions he speaks of, in which he thought the man who saw them might have been out of the body, when he heard those 'unspeakable words,' makes Heaven and Paradise two distinct places. 2 Cor. xii. 1-4.

It also appears from Paul's account of these visions that he believed the spirit might be called away from its tabernacle, the body, and go off into another region and see visions, and hear words, before the tabernacle should fall by death, and then return again. Peter, when speaking of death could well call his body a tabernacle, that he was going to put off. When Paul expected his body would be sacrificed for his religion, he speaks of it to Timothy as though he was going to take a journey. He, understanding our Lord's teaching, 'feared not them which kill the body, but are not able to kill the soul.' Matt. x. 28. He says, 'For I am now ready to be offered, and the time of my departure is at hand.'

But I must notice your exposition of 1 Thes. iv. 14, before I close. I will quote your words: "The language of the Bible in describing the state of the righteous dead is, that 'them also which sleep in Jesus will God bring with him.' We are then informed how it will be done: 'The Lord himself shall descend from heaven with a shout, with the voice of the archangel and the trump of God, and the dead shall rise.' How much this looks like waking up the sleepers."

Brother, by what rule do you make the 16th verse an explanation of the 14th verse? There is not perhaps two verses in the whole epistle which appear more opposed than these two, without due consideration. And I think your application has made the declaration that God will bring the saints with him, an unmeaning declaration, or false. The way you explain how God will bring them with him is, He comes here first and awakes them from the grave. But, say you, I quoted Bible for it. You did truly quote Bible to show that the Lord will come, and that the dead will rise; but your text says, God will bring them with him. Suppose I come to Buffalo, and on arriving at the house you stop at, learn that your little girl is lost, and that you are out in the city looking for her. Soon she returns to your house and comes to me. When you come in you inquire, how I came by her? I inform you that I brought her with me. Would there be a shade of truth in my answer? All would say no. But you reply, God promises to call them from the grave when he comes. Yes, that is true; and you have quoted in your article ample proof. But the testimony of God's word is also equally clear, that when he comes he will bring those who have died in Christ along with him. Zech. xiv. 5—'And the Lord my God shall come and all the saints with thee.' Jude xiv—'Behold the Lord cometh with ten thousand of his saints.' The text which you seek to explain, declares most clearly that, 'Them also which sleep in Jesus will God bring with him.' Now what shall be done? I see you have provided a way to dispose of difficulties in the preliminary remarks to your article. You say: 'While we know in part our views of truth will necessarily be imperfect, yet we may collect the clear, literal, positive testimony on any Bible question, with the certainty of a manifest preponderance one way or the other; because there is in reality but one side to any question.'

Brother, your plan appears plausible, yet I think it a very bad one; for to weigh this 'clear, literal, positive testimony,' to find 'a manifest preponderance,' is to suppose the testimony which proves to be the lightest is useless and worse than useless, for it even bears down in the scale against the truth. But let us weigh this testimony above and see how it works: On placing the testimony in the balance, you find that it 'preponderates' in favor of God's 'waking up the sleepers' from the grave; so your theory is established. But Prof. Bush weighs and he finds that there is 'a manifest preponderance' the other way; so he declares that God will never raise the bodies of the saints from the grave, and his theory is established; so theories become contradictory and endless. I think your way of disposing of different questions has had a bad result for ages past. The light or the heavy testimony which God has given, must all prove true: therefore when we come to difficulties or apparent contradictions, we must believe, seeking an explanation, knowing that when understood it will all harmonize.

But what explanation can be given in this case? How can he bring the saints along with him, and then after he gets here call them from the grave where many of them have slept for ages? Turn to Gen. ii. 7, and you will find that God called the body, man, before it had life. This man turns to dust or goes into the grave at death we all agree. This dead man knows not anything. But now for that other part which cannot be killed by those who kill the body: Peter speaks of himself as a person separate and distinct from the body; he uses the personal pronoun, I, Peter. He says, 'I must put off this my tabernacle.'—2 Pet. i. 14. And that Paul, who, when that man, his body, was about to be offered, took his 'departure,' and the rest of the saints, whose bodies have fallen by death, 'will God bring with him.' Then at the voice of God those bodies, or men, who are in their graves shall come forth beautiful and glorious, and the saints shall re-enter their bodies, and then being made perfect, they shall have a glorious body like Christ's most glorious body. Praise the Lord! Amen.

Your brother in Christ,
H. F. HILL.

LETTER FROM BRO. M. CHANDLER.

EMERALD GROVE, W. T., March 20th, 1847.

DEAR BRO. MARSH—I received yours a few days since, of Feb. 22d, which contained $5, for which I feel very grateful to God and to you, for I was in great want; some of the time I have not known where or how I should get bread for my family in this land of plenty; but the Lord has opened some way, so we have not suffered: I feel to confide in his promises.

I have travelled what I could and preached Sundays. Last Saturday I rode about forty miles horseback, and preached in the evening and on the Lord's day, and returned home on Monday. We had a very good time. The way is opening on every hand to hear on this great subject. I think the prospect never was better. I have just received a letter from Bro. Daniels: he is still in Illinois, on his way to St. Louis. He has good success; many receive the word gladly. He finds a few brethren scattered through the country where he travels. My heart is in the work, and I love to be more fully in the field; I shall go as the way opens. I feel that the moments are precious; time is short, and what is done must be done quickly.

Soon after I came out here we sold one of our feather-beds and bought a cow; we had the benefit of her a short time, but soon after I was taken sick, she strayed away and we have not been able to find her. If we had a cow it would be a great help in the family. When I was at Indiana last August, the brethren said I must have a horse; so they raised about half enough to purchase one, and I bought one and have paid part of the balance due for it. If God has any stewards at the East who have the Lord's money, if they feel disposed to aid me, it would be gratefully received and expended in God's cause.

I think if there could be an extra effort made this season there could be much good done. If we could have the large tent to hold meetings in with a little aid on the start, I think the cause would sustain itself. If I can be aided, I shall travel constantly; if not, then I shall do what I can, and try to supply our wants with my hands. I feel to leave all in the Lord's hands.

I have made this brief statement of our wants and prospects agreeably to your request.

I am with you in your position on the time of the advent. The Lord sustain you in your work—he will, for the cause is his. Love to all the dear brethren. Yours in hope of eternal life,
MOSES CHANDLER.

LETTER FROM BRO. D. I. ROBINSON.

CLEVELAND, O., April 5th, 1847.

DEAR BRO. MARSH—I received your last letter and hasten to drop you a line in reply to your repeated request for a letter from me for your paper—and though I like your paper and some others, and scarce find any but what there is something good to like, yet I see so much written that had better never have been published, written or even thought, that it has for years disgusted and sickened me from being a correspondent of any paper. Though I write often and much, I meddle not with the papers. Sometimes I think this is wrong, and that I will amend; and perhaps I see in the very next paper so many sour or sharp or bitter spirits, that I expect I should only get a hooking from some of them, and so forbear. There are two subjects which have been most severely contested: 'The Time,' and 'The sleep of the dead and their unconsciousness.' Some have written ably and kindly, but others have written vinegar and gall. Such should pray before and after writing again, before they send for publication. You have administered a suitable correction to those on the first subject—allow me to say a word to one point of the latter: It is on calling their opponents' views of 'the conscious state of the spirit of man,' &c., 'heathenism!' Now such assertions prove nothing but the disposition of the person using them, viz: that for the want of more or better arguments they 'will call hard names.' Now all acquainted with the history of sentiment know that the heathen held both sides of the subject, just as christendom has done—so that the other side can use the same argument just as well, and thus hang in equipoise! I am aware that 'the sleep of the dead and annihilation of the wicked,' has been called 'heathenism' some centuries—and now our brethren of this other faith are zealous to pay back the coin; but to imitate a wrong is not good, and the truth of the question is to be settled by Scripture in harmony with reason, after all, and not by rash and offensive epithets to make up for better weights.

Now I can show from history that for 3000 years some of the leading heathen nations, sects, philosophers and people have believed and taught 'the unconscious state of the dead—the annihilation of the conscious being of the wicked.' Now nothing can be gained by thrusting at each other with such a dirk. We admit that some also believed and taught the other view, though I am confident the less number—but that is not material; we hope we shall neither read it or hear it more—the candid and intelligent will not—it can come only from the ignorant and bitter. I can read or hear, I can write or speak, in public or private, on opposing subjects with brethren in kindness, with interest and profit, both learn something, if not on the one point—but the railer neither profits or is profited; he is out of grace. If I can get time I should like to review one or two of your ablest writers on the question, if it shall seem duty—cannot say certain as yet. I have never seen one side done justice to yet, in its length and height—a great and good work for some one.

I have examined the history of 'False Christs,' 'Famines,' 'Pestilences,' 'Earthquakes' and 'Meteors,' and have been interested and profited by it, and the word and works of God illustrate each other. The result is but one false Christ before the destruction of Jerusalem, one famine, and no pestilence; several earthquakes; but the number, extent, magnitude and effect since, are astonishing. But no famine in extent, mortality and circumstances, equal to the present. Over 150,000 already have died, and many more must die. No pestilence equal to the cholera, yet in its progress. No earthquakes equal to those of 'this generation,' and no freshet equal to the one two years ago in China. No meteors equal to those of this same generation, and therefore we are right. I wish I had time to copy and send you an abstract.

Yours in love, D. I. ROBINSON.

LETTER FROM BRO. W. DEVERELL.

LONDON, C. W., March 29th, 1847.

DEAR BRO. MARSH—I am cheered weekly in hearing from you through the medium of the Voice of Truth. I confess that I entertained fears that have very happily proved groundless, with regard to your exposition of Bible time. I could write considerable on this point, but as you are presenting what I consider the truth, all I shall say, May the good Lord assist you still to go forward, giving to the household of faith meat in due season.

I am not altogether ignorant of the diversity of opinions entertained by some of my good brethren, on some points of theology; such as the sleep of the dead and the destruction of the wicked. Suffice it to say that on these points, my mind has undergone a great change; some tell me for the worse. For several years, as a travelling Methodist minister, I used to try to hold forth the endless consciousness of the damned, and the flight of the spirit to 'the spirit world'—some where beyond the bounds of time and space. But thank God for the Bible ground to stand on: Psa. cxlvi. 4—'His breath goeth forth, he returneth to his earth, in that very day his thoughts perish.' As it regards the wicked they have not got immortality and never can have. Die they must and die they will, because God's word says so; and I say amen to it.

I feel not to regret that I joined the Methodists and was a preacher so long; but I do feel truly grateful to my heavenly Father, that I am now the Lord's freemen, and have been free for about four years; and I feel that liberty from the Methodist handcuff is of some consequence to me—and I shall try by the grace of God not to abuse my liberty, but use it to the glory of God and the good of my fellow-creatures.

This part of the country was first visited by Br'n Read and Campbell; and there are some I believe that feel grateful to God that they ever proclaimed the glad tidings here, though the positive manner in which they presented the evidences for the world to end, even to the day, has done considerable harm; and how strange it is that these dear brethren should now give up the time altogether. May they take God's time, then they will not be exposed to those bitter disappointments. Yesterday, the Lord's day, in this place I preached two discourses. The one in the morning was on the metallic image—the one in the afternoon was on the seventh chapter of Daniel. I should judge that in the afternoon, there were present between four and five hundred; and for the first time I put up the old chart in the Universalist chapel, in this place. The chapel was obtained by the efforts of a dear brother and fellow-laborer in the gospel of God, viz: B. Gibson. After the morning service one of the proprietors of the house asked me if I would answer a few questions in the afternoon on a part of the morning's discourse? I told him I would. Accordingly after the sermon in the afternoon I told the gentleman that he might put the questions, and I would answer them if I could. He then proceeded, and the first was as follows: In the morning I said that there were ten kingdoms

—he proved from Gibbon that there were twelve. In reply, I thanked him for the evidence, and told him that he could not object to ten if he proved there were twelve. The congregation smiled. The next question was from Dan. xii. 11 about the daily—and he wanted to make it appear that its fulfilment was at the destruction of Jerusalem. In reply I told the gentleman that it would require about two hours to answer that question in the manner I should wish: therefore I should have to beg the use of the house again in two weeks, to which he very politely replied, that he should have no objection. So I gave out my appointment for two weeks, the Lord permitting.

Dear brother, let us do all the good we can.

O for a trumpet's voice on all the world to call,
To bid their hearts rejoice in him that died for all.

I do intend, if permitted by God, to visit some of my previous fields of labor, and I expect to go as far as the lower province. I expect to see Bro. Hutchinson then, and have a little chat about his labors in our mother country.

Yours in that blessed hope,
WILLIAM DEVERELL.

LETTER FROM BRO. W. PRATT.

THREE RIVERS, MASS., March 26th, 1847.

BRO. MARSH—I think you misunderstood my letter, by your note. You speak of giving up the 1335 days as though I intended to throw them away, or should have no confidence in them unless the Lord come this spring; and in this way I think you suppose I come to hazardous conclusions, which would be, certainly. You will see, brother, by reading my letter again, that I did not intend to throw away the periods, nor think they were not part of God's word; but the application we have made must be given up. To show you I am correct, let me refer to the letter where I speak of the application four times: 'They think they have the right application;' 'with the present application;' again, 'with the application we have made.' Then, I ask, 'If we are satisfied the application is correct, should we not look with deep interest for the Lord this spring?' Then I remarked, 'We must look for our Lord this spring or we must give up (the application of) the 1335 days.' I think this is correct. Hear me again: If the 1260 and 1290 days bring us to the time of the end, (which adventists as a body have believed) and the time of the end cannot be placed this side or later than the spring 1802, (if it can you would do a favor in giving light on this point,) shall we not have to give up the position or application that the 1335 days end 45 years later, which fall on this spring? I cannot see how this is such a 'hazardous conclusion,' or 'fearful position.' I say again if we believe in former application, (which I do) I must as an honest man look with interest for the Lord this spring; and if there is no data later than 1802 for the time of the end to commence, I am driven to this point, that we have been wrong in our application, and shall give it up (the application of 1335) providing the Lord does not come this spring. I hope our Lord will come and give us a humble seat in the kingdom.

I always feel grateful to be corrected, for truth is my aim; and I say let God's word, the whole word be true, 'and every man a liar.'

WALTER PRATT.

Bro. PRATT—We still think the ground you take on the 1335 days is unsafe. It would be safe, we think, (though not necessary to say it,) to say, if the Lord does not come at the time you name, that you will give up your present application of the 1335 days, if after a prayerful and thorough investigation, you can see no good reason for continuing the application you now make.

LETTER FROM BRO. HOPKINS.

ROBUS, N. Y., March 27th, 1847.

DEAR BRO. MARSH—I am with you on the time of the coming of our Lord. 'Nigh, even at the door,' is all that I ever could say I knew with regard to it. It is true I did think that we had sufficient evidence to believe that '43 would bring us to the time of our deliverance; but I was disappointed. Then again, it appeared to me that we had additional evidence for the 10th of the 7th month of '44; but in presenting the evidences to the people, it was always with this proviso: If I am not mistaken in this application of Scripture, we may look for the coming of Christ at such a time. But time showed me what our opponents and no one else could show, that we were mistaken; and if I was to travel the way over again, I should doubtless make the same mistakes—for it appears to me that God never requires us to go beyond our present light,—and if we were called upon to be expositors of God's word relative to the 'hour of his judgment,' the prophetic periods being a part of that word, we were called upon to say precisely what many of us did say; that we believed, according to the best calculations that could be made, that they would end at such and such times. It has always appeared too much like infidelity to me to disbelieve what I could not disprove. I know that the coming of Jesus is at the door. Here I place my feet as on a foundation which cannot fail. But I think with many of my brethren that we have strong reasons to look for the consummation of our hopes the present year, and for aught I can see the present spring. I believe that the 2300 years are stretched out as a great chain, reaching from a certain and given point to the coming of Christ; and that the 70 weeks, the 1260, the 1290, and the 1335 years are links in the chain interlinked with each other, especially the last three; not as a continuous chain, but the 1335 and 1290 commence at the taking away of the daily or paganism, that the 1290 end with the papal period, 1260, which commenced when the Bishop of Rome was officially constituted head of all the churches. Now to say nothing about the commencement of these two periods, I think we have their end so distinctly marked that we cannot fail to see that when the pope signed the concordat, that then was the time when his dominion was taken away according to Dan. vii. 26, and ends the 'time times and the dividing of time,' 25 ver. This took place in 1802; 45 years added to 1802 makes 1847, and 45 added to 1290 makes 1335, when Daniel will stand in his lot, and those that have waited for it will be blessed.

Now it does appear to me if the prophetic periods have any connection with the second advent, that Christ must come this year. Hence, I believe it is the duty of all who love the appearing of Christ, to lift up their voice and proclaim the acceptable year of the Lord—to say to the dear waiting, longing, suffering saints, far and near, the year of your deliverance has come. Amen.

I cannot close this without saying a word about the cause here. There is a little handful here, who are looking for and desiring the coming of the Lord, and are willing to do all they can to encourage others to embrace like precious faith. But as it regards the nominal church, this is one of the strong-holds of tradition; the watchmen are all blind—they will not preach the gospel of the kingdom, and those that would they hinder. I wish Bro. Pearson or some one would come this way and make one more effort to wake up the people. Yours waiting for the consolation of Israel, —HOPKINS.

FAST DAY.—Lord John Russell, in the Lords, on the 2nd, said that her majesty had been pleased to order the Lords of the Council to appoint a day of national fast and humiliation, in consequence of the present state of Ireland.

Again: Did he adopt the notion of the disciples, that his coming and the destruction of the temple were synchronous, because he did not tell them they were not? Did Peter mean to adopt and have us believe the mythological notion of the Greeks about tartarus, when he tells us, 2 Pet. ii. 4—'For if God did not spare the angels that sinned, but with chains of darkness, confining them in tartarus, delivered them over to be kept for judgment?' Suppose he did, and you will see what a contradiction he would be involved in:

Tartarus—that part of hades where the souls of the wicked are confined and tormented.—Greenfield.

Turtarus—one of the regions of hell where, according to the ancients, the most impious and guilty of mankind were punished. It was surrounded by a brazen wall, and its entrance was continually hidden from the sight by a cloud of darkness, which is represented as three times more gloomy than the obscurest night. According to Hesiod it was a separate prison at a greater distance from the earth than the earth is from the heavens. Virgil says it was surrounded by three impenetrable walls and by the impetuous and burning streams of the river Phlegethon. Its entrance is by a large a lofty tower, where gates are supported by columns of adamant, which neither gods nor men can open.—Lempriere's Classical Dictionary.

No one believes Peter meant to teach such nonsense; but might he not mean to adopt so much as was true? Well, how much is true? If because he uses that word, he teaches any part was true, he teaches the whole was. But he says, in tartarus, they were 'reserved'—'delivered over to be kept for judgment'—that the wicked are 'reserved unto the day of judgment to be punished.' Surely, then, they are not 'tormented'—'punished,' as the mythological theory teaches.

I most solemnly believe Christ and the apostles used words without reference to Greek, Latin, or any other classical signification; they attached their own meaning to them. Our business is to learn what it was by comparing Scripture with Scripture. This I believe is safe—but unsafe to resort to the philosophical theories of the ancients. Let any one read the criticisms of some of the learned who have adopted the latter method, and if they do not find 'counsel darkened,' I confess I do not understand my Bible.

2d. I come now to consider another point. But a few days ago, a minister urged the argument, that although the relation of the rich man and Lazarus might be a parable, yet a parable must be drawn from facts; consequently it taught two doctrines—one, the thing existing—the other, the thing illustrated.

Greenfield defines Parabolee thus: 'The relation of something real or fictitious by which another thing is illustrated.' Webster says: 'Parable, a fable or allegorical relation, and representation of something real in life or nature from which a moral is drawn for instruction.'

I will give some examples which I think all will admit are fictitious. Judg. ix. 7-15. I will quote only the 8th verse: 'The trees went forth on a time to anoint a king over them, and said unto the olive tree, Reign over us.' 2 Sam. xii. 1-4. This is the parable of Nathan to David. 2 Chron. xxv. 17, 18. This is the parable of Joash king of Israel, to Amaziah, king of Judah. These examples may suffice, to show that a parable is not necessarily founded on a fact. It may be fictitious or fabulous. Any argument, therefore, founded on the assumption that there must be a foundation in fact, may be but sandy. Let us plant our feet on rock and we shall remain unmoved, when 'the wicked shall not be.'

Geo. NEEDHAM.

A Letter

FROM SISTER PERKINS TO SISTER WHITNEY.

My retired moments have been much occupied with the theme of the beloved John. His whole soul appears to have been full of love to God and man—he was full to overflowing—it burst out in every act and expression. Beloved, (he says) if God so loved us, we ought also to love one another: If we love one another, God dwelleth in us, and his love is perfected in us, and this commandment have we from him, that he who loveth God love his brother also; he that loveth not, knoweth not God. We have all admired the character of the beloved disciple; then we should practice after his example. Religion is not merely a series of doctrinal truths, nor does it consist in obscure dogmas. I consider it a rational subject, addressed to the reason and the common sense of mankind. God has given us revelation (not mystery); I wish every person knew it, preachers in particular. The object in preaching should be to reform the life of the hearer. It is the great object of revelation to bring into practical operation the principles of love to God and man, and what was the main object of Christ and the apostles to accomplish, should be the aim of every Christian and Christian minister. It should not be merely to convert men to the belief of certain opinions or a set of creeds, or to induce them to embrace the doctrines of some party—but to lead them to a renewal of the spirit of their minds, that they may deny ungodliness, and live soberly, righteously, and godly in the present evil world, and be united together in love which is the bond of perfection. Much dwelling on the dogmas of religion have little tendency to soften the heart and produce kind and brotherly feelings towards those of different views from us, though of unexceptionable religious and moral character; they lead those whose foundation is on the purity of their faith and in the orthodoxy of their creed, to set others down as subverters of the gospel, because of some slight difference about a particular doctrine, while they have never cultivated heavenly dispositions or learned to display that charity which suffereth long and is kind, is not easily provoked and thinketh no evil.

There are certain doctrines which we never should lose sight of—such as the hope of the gospel, the resurrection of the dead, the return of our Elder Brother to gather all the saints home, and every thing that can encourage us to hold on our way rejoicing. I have come to the conclusion that it is no use for us to think that if the fundamental doctrines of religion be declared, Christian morality will follow as a matter of course. If this is so, then all the moral sermons of our Savior and all the directions in reference to moral conduct, detailed in every epistle to the churches, were vain. When Jesus was asked which is the great commandment in the law, he did not point to some abstract proposition in theory, but said, 'Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy mind. This is the first and great commandment, and the second is like unto it: Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself; on these two commandments hang all the law and the prophets.' The most of the parables and sermons of our Savior have a direct bearing on the life of Christians. If heaven be a place where love, peace and harmony prevail, and if the present world be a state of preparation for the enjoyments of a renovated world, then a principle of love to God and man should be interwoven through the whole mind, and brought into action in every situation in life. The great principle of forgiveness seems by many to be overlooked. A poor brother may be guilty of some outbreking sin, under some sore temptation, and he is hunted down ever after, notwithstanding he shows every sign of repentance. But another may be avaricious, deceitful, harsh and unfeeling in his conduct, proud, selfish and addicted to slander, and yet he is not thought a proper object of censure. Again, to conscientiously differ from our brethren is thought by some to be a great crime. A man will follow a prodigal son who has committed some criminal act to court, call witnesses, pay his money freely—aye, and forgive him too, take him home if cleared, and own him as a son. But let the same son read his Bible, search for its truths, and form his opinions independent of former teachings, cross the old man's track, and he is disowned, disinherited, turned out of doors; his sin cannot be forgiven. It is as true now as ever, those that will live godly must suffer persecution. Suffering was a legacy left the church. In the world ye shall have tribulation, but in me ye shall have peace; but fear not, I have overcome the world.

I am not looking for death as you have often heard me say, but for the coming of Christ. I have not altered my position on the time of that event. You all know that has not been with me essential. The glorious event is what I look forward to, and if you or I fall asleep while looking, expecting and desiring the coming One, we shall see him as soon as those that are awake, or remain unto his coming. Looking for death is a gloomy subject; but to look for the glorious appearing of the great God and our Savior, when he shall come with all his saints, is blessed. Oh blessed day! O glorious hope! it lifts the sinking spirits up! O joyful anticipation! there we shall see Jesus—there will be Moses and Elias—and all will be there who have not counted their lives dear unto them, but have finished their course amid the most cruel scourgings, and every suffering the invention of man can inflict—they too will be there and near Jesus, for they helped fill up the measure of his sufferings, and will shine as the brightness of the firmament forever. The redeemed of the Lord from every nation, kindred, tongue and people from under heaven, will assemble there. Countless numbers of sinless infants will claim their seats to sing their perfect praise before the throne of God and the Lamb. O brethren and sisters, as sister Carter so often sung, 'No broken bands are there'—oh, it is glorious to look for a new heavens and a new earth wherein dwelleth righteousness; for the heavens or the atmosphere shall be dissolved, and the elements melt with fervent heat. Yet, says Peter, 'We according to his promise look for new heavens and a new earth.' Fire does not annihilate but only changes the form of matter; so this globe on which we now live, and which bears the marks of the curse upon it, will come forth from the flames of a general conflagration, purified from all its evils, adorned with new beauties, and rendered a fit habitation for renovated man. In view of these things, we ought to break out in lofty strains, and say, Praise ye Jehovah, for Jehovah is good; he remembereth us in our low estate. I will praise the Lord my God with all my heart, and I will glorify thy name for evermore. Bless the Lord, O my soul, and all that is within me bless his holy name;—for he has so loved the world that he gave his only begotten son, that whosoever believeth on him should not perish but have everlasting life. He sent an angel from the celestial glory to announce his birth, and a multitude of the heavenly hosts to proclaim, Glory to God in the highest, peace on earth and good will to men. He spared not his own son but delivered him up for us all, and shall he not with him also freely give us all things? Yes, blessed be the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, who hath blessed us with all spiritual blessings in Christ Jesus. Under a sense of the unbounded love of God, the Psalmist felt his heart elated, and formed those pious resolutions: seven times a day will I praise thee, O Lord;—at midnight will I rise to give thanks to thee, because of thy righteous precepts. O how love I thy law; it is my meditation all the day. I will speak of thy testimonies before kings, and will not be ashamed of thy commandments.' If we should break out in such ejaculations as these, we should, to say the least, be thought very enthusiastic. To break out in vocal strains of praise to God, is far behind the times. But God who never left himself without a witness, has overflowing hearts that will burst out ever and anon, and give him all the glory.

Brethren, strive to be of the humble few who are but pilgrims and sojourners here, and declare plainly to all that you seek a city, where God will be the light of it, when his tabernacle shall be with men, when we shall have been re-animated by the voice of the Son of God, and appear each in his own person and identical body as subjects of the King which will sit on David's throne. May the spirit of God direct you into all truth and long-suffering, and gather you with the redeemed into the kingdom. Farewell.

Consciousness of the Dead.

HAS THE SOUL OR THE SPIRIT OF MAN A CONSCIOUS EXISTENCE WHILE THE BODY IS DEAD? YES.

"For he is not a God of the dead but of the living: for all live unto him."—Luke xx. 38.

This language of our Savior was addressed to the Sadducees, who denied the separate existence of the spirit from the body, and the resurrection: 'For the Sadducees say that there is no resurrection, neither angel or spirit.'—Acts xxiii. 8. Then the Sadducees were like the Materialist of these days, who deny the existence of spiritual substances. Materialists maintain that the soul of man is the result of a particular organization of matter in the body, and when the body dies all is dead: therefore the Sadducees denied the resurrection—for if man ceased to be at death, then there can be no resurrection. To bring into existence that which does not exist, is not a resurrection but a creation.

Our text is an exposition by the Savior to the Sadducees of the language of God to Moses at the bush, to convince them of a resurrection. Christ does not claim that God declared directly at the bush that the dead should rise; but 'Moses showed at the bush,' or as Campbell renders it, 'Moses hath suggested.' Had the Lord Jesus desired, he might have quoted the word of God directly upon the resurrection; but he looks deeper. He knew that they denied the existence of the spirit, and he aims a blow at their materialism—the cause of their unbelief. Perhaps no person would have ever thought that God even 'suggested' a resurrection at the bush, had not the Savior made the application he did to these Sadducees. What was that language to Moses? 'I am the God of Abraham and the God of Isaac and the God of Jacob.' Why does God, in the present tense, call himself the God of Abraham? I answer, because Abraham lives. No, says the objector, it is because Abraham is a going to live. Then we disagree. Who shall settle the question? Let the Savior speak. Why did God say 'I am the God of Abraham?' 'For all live unto him.' Then our Savior teaches these Sadducees that, at the time God addressed Moses, the Patriarchs had a conscious existence and an identity. They were still Abraham Isaac and Jacob: and God says not, I was the God of Abraham, or I will be his God—but in the present tense, 'I am the God of Abraham.' Now if Abraham had no separate conscious being from his body which constituted him still Abraham, but the whole being was dead as the Sadducees argued; then, says the Savior, God could not have thus spoken, because he could not have called himself God of that which is not—'For he is not a God of the dead but of the living.' But is not Abraham dead? Yes, to us he is dead; but not in the sense which you Sadducees hold death: he is still alive to God—'For all live unto him.'

But some suppose that the word of God from the bush teaches that the dead are unconscious. They say God taught a resurrection, by calling things which are not as though they were—and as he is not a God of the dead but of the living, there must be a resurrection. Such an explanation would have been plausible had not Christ said that the word of God on that occasion must be understood in the present tense. His reason is, because Abraham still lives to God—'For all live unto him.' Or, as Campbell has it in his translation: 'Now he is not a God of the dead, but of the living; for they are all, (though dead to us) alive to him.' But still the objection is urged, Did not the Savior in his explanation call things which are not as though they were? If so, then the Savior takes a difficult text, in which you say, God calls things which are not as though they were, and explains it by calling things which are not as though they were, and so leaves the text where he found it. Who will ascribe such folly to Christ? How unlike his plain teaching just preceding the text. If our Savior had wished it so understood, how easily he could have said, For God calls things which are not as though they were: but no, he confirms it in the present tense. So you see that Christ dug out the very roots of their error, by showing them that man did not cease to be at death; that God calls himself the God of Abraham, which he could not do if there was no Abraham; that they erred in supposing that Abraham had not a spirit which lived—for God was still his God though his 'tabernacle,' 'temple,' or body had fallen. A dead spirit! No, the spirit of man does not die; 'For all live unto him.' Ah, says the inquirer, then God taught the separate existence of the spirit at the bush did he? I thought it was the resurrection. Yes, he did most clearly teach that Abraham was still in being: the very Abraham, though his body or 'tabernacle' had fallen by death; and by teaching this fact plainly, he 'showed' or 'suggested' a resurrection. Originally this language was given to Moses, simply to teach him what that 'great sigh' was before him, and who was in the burning bush. 'And Moses said, I will turn aside and see this great sight, why the bush is not burnt.'—Ex. iii. 3. But Jesus tells the Sadducees that God spake to them. See Matt. xxii. 31. But as touching the resurrection of the dead, have ye not read that which was spoken unto you by God? This teaching 'showed' or 'suggested' a resurrection to these Sadducees by showing them that Abraham was in a state where he could be raised. Our Lord had just removed one objection. Now their chief and only objection left, that there was no Abraham to raise, is completely taken away—their mouths are shut. But could he not be raised from the dead, if the dead ceased to be? No. But are not all things possible with God? Yes: 'All things are possible with God,' yet 'it is impossible for God to lie.' Neither can God be inconsistent. To say God can cause that to rise again, or stand up again which does not exist is an absurdity; but to cause that to rise again which is fallen is consistent. The Sadducees could argue well that there could be no resurrection if man ceases to be at death; for a resurrection does not mean a bringing into existence something that had ceased to be—but a rising again of something fallen. 'Though he fall he shall not be utterly cast down, for the Lord upholdeth him with his hand.'

The Scribes, who believed in the separate existence of the spirit and the resurrection, were well pleased. They said 'Master, thou hast well said.' Why? Because Christ had not only answered that question of the Sadducees, Whose wife the woman should be in the resurrection? but he had by the application of the word of God from the bush, torn away the very foundation of their unbelief—their materialism—and with it went their whole fabric. Says Matt. xxii. 34—'He had put the Sadducees to silence.' Amen.

Geneseo, April 5th, 1847.

DEAR BRO. MARSH—As you have lately published in your valuable paper the parables of our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ, I have thought it might conduce to a spirit of searching the Scriptures to send you the Miracles performed by our Savior, as recorded by the Evangelists, for which if you can spare room in your next or some subsequent paper, you will oblige one who is waiting for the consolation of Israel, by the speedy coming of Israel's God and Jacob's King.

Your brother in love,

TEN DOLLARS PER GALLON FOR WINE.—We find the following advertisement in the Washington papers, and as the advertiser is a man of wealth, it may be of importance to those who know something about the article:—

"Ten dollars per gallon will be given for any quantity of wine, now in the hands of the trade, proved by chemical test to be free from the following poisons: Sugar of lead, logwood, green vitriol, capsicum, opium, tobacco, aloes, alum, essential oils, bitter oranges, oil of bitter almonds, India berry, poke-berries, elder-berries, Guinea-pepper, Brazil wood, gum benzoin, burnt sugar, brandy, laurel water, lamb's blood, dragon's blood, red sanders, salt of tartar, coculus indicus, poison hemlock, nux vomica, oil of vitriol, Prussic acid, henbane, &c., or any other foreign admixture. The attention of merchants and consumers is particularly requested to the above.

The emigration from Germany to the U. S. will be unusually large in the coming spring.—Entire villages are preparing to set out. Thousands will also pour into this country from Ireland. The aggregate accession to our population will be unusually large.

Voice of Truth & Glad Tidings

"The wise shall understand."

ROCHESTER, APRIL 28, 1847.

"The Wise shall Understand."

In our remarks on this subject last week, it was clearly shown that some, at least, in every age since the giving of the grand vision to Daniel, have understood that portion of it which belonged to their respective times. Our object now is to enquire who are the wise, and to what extent they have understood and will understand these things.

Who are the wise? Not those who simply understand the time of the Lord's coming: for though a man may have great knowledge, and faith to enable him to remove mountains, and have not charity, or love, he is nothing. Certainly such an one could not be wise. It is to be feared that some have fallen into a very hurtful if not fatal mistake here. With them the wisdom of the wise has seemed to consist in understanding a few abstract propositions on the time of the advent, in confident affirmations that they were among the wise, and that all were foolish and wicked who could not see and feel and act with them—when at the same time their spirit, words and acts were very far from corresponding with the revealed wisdom of God, his word. It will do us no more good to have a correct understanding of the Advent theory, than any other theory, if this knowledge does not lead us to possess the spirit and obey the precepts of its divine author. The entire wise economy of grace was designed to make men wise unto salvation—hence if our faith in the second advent, or any other fundamental doctrine of the gospel, does not tend to save us here, now, from our sins, we are not wise; but foolish, wicked, and liable to be lost any moment. For any man that has the hope of being like Christ at his coming, purifies himself even as Christ is pure.

There need be no dispute about who the wise are: the context will settle that question. "Many shall be purified, and made white, and tried; but the wicked shall do wickedly: and none of the wicked shall understand; but the wise shall understand." xii. 10. Thus reads the verse in which the words under discussion, are found; and all must see at once who the wise are. The wicked are those who do wickedly, and of course are foolish and void of understanding. While the wise are those who are 'purified, made white, and tried,' and as a matter of course have an understanding of that truth, in obeying which, they have been purified, made free from sin, and enabled to endure the fiery trials to which they have been subjected. This has been true of every age since the grand vision was given to Daniel, for God's people have ever been a pure, white, and tried people. This was their character under the old as well as the new dispensation—before the time of the end as well as since its commencement. To apply the purifying, making white, and being tried, alone to these days, of peace and safety, is contrary to facts and the plain import of the word of the Lord: for during the short period of forty-five years, the time of the end, instead of 'many,' as the context says, being 'purified, made white, and tried,' this in truth can be said of but few. But, during the entire length of the grand vision, it may justly be said that many have been thus purified, &c. In a word, the innumerable multitude, clothed in white robes, who will reign with Christ, all 'come out of great tribulation.'

To what extent were the wise to understand? The definite time of the Lord's coming, readily responds many a zealous brother; for, says he, the time was the chief topic of conversation when the man clothed in linen which was upon the waters held up his right hand and his left hand unto heaven, and swore by him that liveth forever and ever, that it shall be for a time, times, and an half; and when he shall have accomplished to scatter the power of the holy people, all these things shall be finished.' Dan. xii. 7. This oath, says our brother, has reference to definite time, and of course none can be wise who do not understand it. But why do you say definite time? Such a phrase is not in the oath, nor in the Bible. Let us be careful, lest in our zeal to be wise we become wise above what is written, and add words and a meaning to the truth of God which do not belong to it. It is a hazardous work for poor, ignorant, erring mortals, under the supposition that they are the wise, to persist in putting words or a sentiment into the mouth of the man clothed in linen, when under the most solemn oath, which he has not uttered. He has said nothing about definite time.

But, cries our greatly astonished brother, then you think the wise have nothing to do with time. You take the ground of our opponents who reject time altogether. Not so fast—hear us a moment, and we will try to explain the whole matter to your satisfaction, and we hope profit. Those who are tenacious for what they call definite time are on one extreme, and add words to the oath of the man clothed in linen—while those who reject all time, are on the other extreme, and take from the oath of the man clothed in linen. Both make the man clothed in linen swear to a sentiment which he has not uttered, and of course both are wrong and cannot be wise in this respect. We take the medium ground—or receive the words of the man clothed in linen, without a desire to add to or take from their true and full meaning in the least degree; and this we think is the only safe ground for all to take.

Instead of rejecting time we are very tenacious for time—Bible time, for the advent of Christ. This kind of time we fully believe the wise do now understand. All however have not the same degree of knowledge or understanding on this highly important subject. They differ in talents, acquirements and means of knowing the truth; consequently, they can be expected to understand only according to their ability and means of understanding. The time, like all other Bible doctrines is imperfectly understood by some honest, pious persons, while others no more honest and pious, have a correct understanding of the whole matter. Now, who are the wise in these cases? We unhesitatingly answer, both: for the knowledge in each produces the same happy result, viz: holiness, the end of all true wisdom.

The wise not only understand, according to their ability and means of understanding, the prophetic numbers, the meaning of historic prophecy and the signs which relate to the time of the advent, but they understand the moral and religious design of all these things, and profit by them. When they see or understand these things, they know that the kingdom of God is nigh, even at the door, and make, and constantly keep made, a full preparation to meet the Lord in peace. These are the wise whose lamps will be found brightly burning, and they ready to enter into the marriage supper of the heavenly Bridegroom at his coming.

To make the subject more plain, we will say that all true children of God in every age have understood the whole revealed will of God, doctrinally, practically, experimental and prophetic, according to their ability and means of understanding.

1. Doctrinal, or theoretical knowledge is not equally possessed by all, as everybody well knows; still, each child of grace knows or understands enough about the economy of redemption for his salvation, provided

2. He reduces to practice what he understands by theory. A practical understanding of the requirements of God, is indispensable in order to constitute him one of the wise, or wise unto salvation.

3. The truly wise have an experimental knowledge or understanding of the gracious economy of salvation. They not only have the theory in their heads, and practice its external requirements, but they possess the spirit of Christ—they 'taste,' they 'eat' by faith the bread of life, which is 'sweeter than the honey in the honey-comb—and rejoice with 'joy unspeakable and full of glory,' in hope of the fulfillment of the exceeding great and precious promises of their faithful Creator. A person in possession of this understanding, though a beggar, and incapable of reading or writing his own name is richer and wiser than Solomon in possession of all his earthly glory when fallen into corruption, and the favor of God withdrawn from him.

4. Persons thus wise have always understood the prophecies, the times and seasons and the signs of their respective times. They have done the will of God—have stood in the light of his counsel—have given earnest heed to the sure word of prophecy, and therefore have not been left to walk and stumble in darkness. That this has been strictly true of every age but that of our own no one presumes to dispute; and why this age should be made an exception none have been able to tell. We believe it is not an exception—but that in this very day, in these last moments of time, is the grand focal point where the effulgent light of prophecy and of the signs of six thousand years all centres: and most surely the wise see and rejoice in this glorious light. They do understand that the Lord is at the door, and rejoice in the blessed hope of soon being made like him. Some understand the theory of the glad tidings of the kingdom at hand more perfectly than others; but all understand what they can, enough to make them wise unto salvation, provided they do not become foolish, give up their faith, and join with those who oppose knowing anything about the time; or take the other extreme and become wise above what is written on definite time, meet with disappointments, and finally fall into unbelief, or run into some hurtful error. O let us cleave to the plain word of the Lord at this perilous moment, that we, like the wise man who built his house upon the rock, may be hid in the tabernacle of the Almighty, when the devouring storm of his fiery indignation shall indiscriminately fall upon the wicked.

CORRUPTIONS OF SHAKERISM.—The recent disclosures of the corruptions of Shakerism which we have published, we learn are attracting some notice in a certain quarter. Bro. J. B. Paine speaks of one brother who has just left the Shakers at Canterbury, N. H., and of himself as having narrowly escaped the snare they laid for his ruin. The account of the delusions of the Shakers of which Bro. Paine offers to furnish, we think might do good. Let us have it in brief; and others we think would subserve the cause of truth and philanthropy to tell what they know of the corruptions of this greatly deceived and deceiving people. Let that iniquity which has been committed in secret under the garb of sanctity, be proclaimed upon the house-top.

We print a few extra copies of this number for the benefit of those who may be troubled on the Sabbath question. The papers are free: let them be placed in the hands of those who need the light they impart.

The prominent design of our sheet is, the proclamation of the kingdom at hand. From this glorious object we cannot be diverted. Other subjects will however receive occasional attention, still they must be made subservient to the great work for which our sheet is issued. Our patrons need entertain no fears on this point, for our paper is not on any consideration whatever to be changed in character in this respect. THE APPEARING OF CHRIST AND HIS KINGDOM AT HAND is inscribed upon our banner, which we have no disposition to strike nor desire to change the motto until our Lord shall come.

It will be seen by a note from Bro. Bates that Bro. E. R. Pinney is quite ill. The Lord's will be done—yet we most ardently pray for the restoration to health of Bro. Pinney. It seems as though his faithful and efficient labors could not be dispensed with at this time. We hope he will write a word or two, if no more, for the satisfaction of his numerous friends and brethren scattered abroad—Or if he is unable to write, will some of his friends at Seneca Falls do it. We hope they will speak freely on a certain delicate point named by Bro. Bates, that the benevolent may more fully know what their duty in the case is: it will be their pleasure to act after a godly sort, if need be, when the good brethren at Seneca Falls shall call upon them to do it.

Seventh-Day Sabbath Abolished.

[As we have had repeated calls from different parts of the country, for our views on the Seventh Day or Jewish Sabbath, we have concluded to republish the following article on this subject, which we gave in our paper two years ago. The arguments in favor of the abolishing of the Jewish sabbath, we deem unanswerable. Let them be carefully read and compared with the word of the Lord, and let each abide the decision of that unerring book.]

1. What is the signification of Sabbath? Rest; and when connected with day, it denotes a day of rest. This will not be questioned, but those who may want proof can consult Ex. 16:2-25, 20:8-11, 31:13-17, & 35:1-3, Lev. 13:1-3 & Deut. 5:12-15.

2. For whom was the Sabbath instituted? The natural seed of Abraham, or Jews according to the flesh. Proof on this point is abundant. Those who wish to examine a part of it can read Ex. 16:22-25, 19:24 on to 20:11; 31:12-17, & 35:1-3, Lev. 13:1-3, & Deut. 5:1-15. The last we will copy in full.

“And Moses called all Israel, and said to them: Hear, O Israel the statutes and judgments which I speak in your ears this day, that ye may learn them, and keep, and do them. The Lord our God made a covenant with us in Horeb. The Lord made not this covenant with our fathers, but with us, even us, who are all of us here alive this day. The Lord talked with you face to face on the mount from the midst of the fire, (I stood between the Lord and you at that time, to show you the word of the Lord: for ye were afraid by reason of the fire, and went not up upon the mount;) saying, I am the Lord thy God, who brought thee out of the land of Egypt, from the house of bondage. Thou shalt have no other Gods before me. Thou shalt not make for thee any graven image, or any likeness of anything that is in heaven above, or that is on the earth beneath, or that is in the waters beneath the earth: thou shalt not bow down thyself to them nor serve them: for I the Lord thy God am a jealous God, visiting the iniquity of the fathers upon the children to the third and fourth generation of them that hate me, and showing mercy to thousands of them that love me and keep my commandments. Thou shalt not take the name of the Lord thy God in vain: for the Lord will not hold him guiltless that taketh his name in vain.—Keep the sabbath-day to sanctify it, as the Lord thy God hath commanded thee. Six days thou shalt labor, and do all thy work: but the seventh day is the sabbath of the Lord thy God: in it thou shalt not do any work, thou, nor thy son, nor thy daughter, nor thy man-servant, nor thy maid-servant, nor thy ox, nor thy ass, nor any of thy cattle, nor thy stranger that is within thy gates; that thy man-servant, and thy maid-servant may rest as well as thou. And remember that thou wast a servant in the land of Egypt, and that the Lord thy God brought thee out thence with a mighty hand and an out-stretched arm: therefore the Lord thy God commanded thee to keep the sabbath-day.”

Keeping the Sabbath is embraced in this covenant made with the children of Israel at Horeb. It was NOT made with their fathers' [the Patriarchs], but 'with us, EVEN US, who are all of US HERE ALIVE THIS DAY.' v. 3. This testimony, first negative, 'he made it not with our fathers,' and then positive, 'but with us,' is conclusive. It plainly tells us for whom the Sabbath was not, and then for whom it was instituted. It was instituted for the natural descendants of Abraham, the Jews according to the flesh. And not a single proof can be presented, from either the Old or New Testament, that it was instituted for any other people or nation.

Again, if we expect to obtain the promised inheritance, by virtue of the covenant which enforces the observance of the seventh-day sabbath, we cannot obtain that inheritance under the covenant made to Abraham; for Moses says the one embracing the sabbath, 'was not made with our fathers.' Let us be cautious lest we disinherit ourselves by seeking the inheritance under the wrong covenant. In speaking on the same subject, Paul says, 'Whosoever of you are justified by the law, ye are fallen from grace.' Gal. v. 4. Read the whole chapter, and the two preceding. The covenant of grace did not enforce the observance of the seventh day. We are under grace, therefore have nothing to do with this institution of the Levitical law. We will enquire,

3. What was the design of the Sabbath? It was made 'for man, and not man for the sabbath,' Mark ii. 27. When was it made for man? Not at the creation; for there is nothing said there about the sabbath on which man was to rest; but mention is made of the 'seventh day' on which God rested.—The only account we have of the sabbath being made for man, is the one given of its institution after the children of Israel crossed the Red Sea, and entered upon their journey to Canaan. Ex. 16:23-26, Deut. 5:2, 3.

It was then instituted as a day of rest, for the children of Israel. See Ex. 16:23-26, 20:8-11, 31:13-18, & 35:1-3; Lev. 23:1-3 & Deut. 5:12-15.

It was also designed as a sign or memorial to keep in memory the creation of the world in six days by God, and his resting on the seventh. 'Wherefore the children of Israel shall keep the Sabbath, to observe the Sabbath, throughout their generations, for a perpetual covenant. It is a sign between me and the children of Israel forever: for in six days the Lord made heaven and earth, and on the seventh day rested and was refreshed.' Ex. 31:16, 17.

It was also designed to keep in memory their deliverance from Egypt, and their duty to the poor among them. 'That thy man-servant and thy maid-servant may rest as well as thou, and remember that thou wast a servant in the land of Egypt, and that the Lord thy God brought thee out thence, through a mighty hand and an out-stretched arm; therefore the Lord thy God commanded thee to keep the Sabbath day.' Deut. 5:14, 15.

It was a feast or day of holy convocation. 'Speak unto the children of Israel, and say unto them, concerning the feasts of the Lord, which ye shall proclaim to be holy convocations, even these are my feasts. Six days shall work be done, but the seventh day is the Sabbath of rest, an holy convocation; ye shall do no work therein: it is the Sabbath of the Lord in all your dwellings.' Lev. 23:2, 3.

Finally, it was a shadow of things to come. 'Let no man, therefore, judge you in meat, or in drink, or in respect of an holy day, or of the new moon, or of the Sabbath, [days] is supplied by the translators, we therefore omit it], which are a shadow of things to come, but the body is of Christ.' Col 2:16, 17.

These are the only reasons we have been able to gather from the scriptures, for the observance of the Jewish Sabbath; and if Paul, or any of the New Testament writers, thought it binding on Christians, why have they been entirely silent on a question of this importance, with the exception of such expressions as these:—'Let no man judge you in respect of the Sabbath.' Col 2:16. 'One man esteemeth one day above another; another esteemeth every day alike. Let every man be fully persuaded in his own mind.' Rom 14:5. But this point will be more fully considered under another head. We enquire,

4. How was the Sabbath to be kept? 'Remember the Sabbath day to keep it holy. Thou shalt not do any work, thou, nor thy son, nor thy daughter, thy man-servant, nor thy maid-servant, nor thy cattle, nor thy stranger that is within thy gates.' Ex. 20:8-10: also, 31:14-16, & 35:2, 3, & Lev. 23:3, & Deut. 5:13, 14. This in part constituted the yoke of bondage, from which the Galatians had been freed. Paul, however, was 'afraid of them, lest he had bestowed upon them labor in vain;' because they observed 'days, and months, and times, and years.'—Gal. 4:10, 11, & 5:1. Read the entire book, and it does appear that there will be no question in the mind whether we are under the law, or under grace. If we are still under the law, and it must be as strictly observed as shown above, then it is our duty to enquire.

5. What is the penalty of breaking the law of the Sabbath? 'Ye shall keep the Sabbath, therefore, for it is holy unto you: every one that defileth it shall surely be put to death; for whosoever doeth any work therein, that soul shall be cut off from the people.' Ex. 31:14. 'Whosoever doeth any work therein shall be put to death.' Ex. 35:2. Death, then was the penalty of the law of the Sabbath, and death now is the penalty for the same offence, if this law is still in force. But some think the penalty was abolished, but the law was not. In this they are mistaken; for Paul, as we shall soon show, did not think so; and besides, when the penalty of a law is abolished, the law itself is also abrogated; for where there is no penalty there is no law.

6. How long was the Sabbath to be observed. 'Verily my Sabbaths ye shall keep, for it is a sign between me and you throughout your generations.'—'Wherefore the children of Israel shall keep the Sabbath throughout their generations, for a perpetual covenant.' Ex. 31:13-16. Observe, this 'covenant' made it the duty of the 'children of Israel' to keep the Sabbath 'throughout their generations.'—This leads us to the inquiry,

7. When was it abolished? Of course when 'their generations' ceased, which was when the law which constituted them a nation was abolished. When was that? Paul tells us when. Speaking of the sabbath day together with other institutions of the law, he says, 'Blotting out the hand writing of ordinances that was against us, which was contrary to us, and took it out of the way, NAILING IT TO HIS CROSS.' Col 2:14, 17. Christ was the end of the law—it had served the time for which it was given, and expired with Christ on the cross. 'For he is our peace, who hath made both one, and hath broken down the middle wall of partition between us, having abolished in his flesh the enmity, even the law of commandments contained in ordinances—having slain the enmity thereby'—viz: by the cross. Eph. 2:11-16.

That the Sabbath was embraced in that law which was nailed to the cross—slain—taken out of the way, and abolished, is clear from what Paul says in 2 Cor 3:7-16. He there tells us that the 'ministration of death, written and engraven in stones, was to be done away,' v. 7; and in v. 13, that it 'IS ABOLISHED;' and, v. 14, 'IS DONE AWAY in Christ.'

That the law of the Sabbath was a part of what was 'written in stones,' is evident from Deut 31:1-22. After giving in detail the ten commandments, in v. 22 Moses adds, 'These words the Lord spake unto your assembly in the mount, out of the midst of the fire, of the cloud, and of the thick darkness, with a great voice; and he ADDED NO MORE; and he WROTE them in two TABLES OF STONE, and delivered them unto me.' Also, see Ex 31:18.

To say that the penalty of the law of the Sabbath was abolished, and not the Sabbath, is as unreasonable as to say the penalty of every other command in the ten was done away. The whole as a code of laws, according to Paul's testimony, was abolished. For further proof on this point, consult Rom 7:1-6, Gal 3d 4th and 5th chs.; Eph 2:14-16, Col 2:9-17.

We will notice a few of the most prominent objections to this view of the subject, and close our investigations for the present.

1. It is said it was an everlasting covenant which enjoined the observance of the Sabbath, therefore it must be binding now. On the same principle, then, the institution of the 'wave offering,' 'new meat offering,' the 'atonement,' and 'feast of tabernacles,' should be observed now; for they are as expressly said to be 'statutes forever,' as is the Sabbath. See Lev 23:14, 21, 31, 41. Each was to continue throughout their (the Jews') generations, and all were to cease or be done away in Christ.

2. The Sabbath was given to the true Israel; therefore it must be binding on them to the end of time. The Sabbath was no more given to the true Israel, than any other part of the Levitical law; and if a part is binding on them now, the whole law is. See Ex 31:13, Lev 23:2, Deut 5:1. 'All Israel' are commanded to keep the 'statutes and judgments,' and by reading what follows, it will be seen that the Sabbath is only a very small part of those statutes.

3. Then all moral obligation is abolished. So far as the Levitical law is concerned, this is true; for it 'is abolished.' But the moral precepts in that law were always binding—they existed before the law was given—were incorporated in the law—and when the law was abolished they were incorporated into the New Testament, or law of Christ, and are now in force on Jew and Greek; not, however, because they were once a part of the Levitical law, but because they are just, and have, by our great Law-giver, been made a part of his perfect law. See Matt 22:35-41. Christ is asked what is 'the great commandment of the law.' He answers the question, but says nothing about the Sabbath; therefore it was not the great commandment in the law. The same is taught in Mark 12:28, 34. Also, in Luke 18:18-22, a question is asked, 'What shall I do to inherit eternal life?' Christ answers, 'Thou knowest the commandments: Do not commit adultery, Do not kill, Do not steal, Do not bear false witness, Honor thy father and mother.' Not a word said about the Sabbath.

Look at the conference held by the apostles at Jerusalem, named in Acts 15. The Gentile churches had been troubled with Judaizing teachers, and the apostles sent out their decree on the subject. In verse 24 they say, "Forasmuch as we have heard, that certain which went out from us, have troubled you with words, subverting your souls, saying, Ye must be circumcised, AND KEEP THE LAW; to whom we gave NO SUCH COMMANDMENT." They then tell what they should do: "For it seemed good to the Holy Ghost, and to us to lay upon you no greater burthen than these necessary things; that ye abstain from meats offered to idols, and from blood, and from things strangled, and from fornication; from which if you keep yourselves, ye shall do well." They gave no commandment to keep the law; but moral principles were strictly enforced, and we, 'shall do well' not to depart from their instruction. For further evidence on this point, consult Rom. 10:1-14; Eph. 5:1-7, and 1 Tim. 1-11, in all of which places moral obligations are enforced, but keeping of the Sabbath is not named. This is unaccountable if it was binding on the Gentiles.

4. The type of our promised rest is destroyed. Not so; for the law was a 'shadow,' (Col. 2:17,) or, 'our school-master to bring us unto Christ,' Gal. 3:24; that is, the law ceremonies all taught imperfectly—dimly—as a shadow, and pointed to the glorious rest. But this kind of instruction continued only to Christ. When he came, as Paul says, we are no longer under this school-master, (Gal. 3:25,) but are under the plain, direct teaching of Christ.

5. But it was only the ceremonial and not the moral part of the law that was abolished. This is incorrect; for the whole law was moral, just, and good; and when its ceremonies ceased, the whole code was dissolved, to give place to one more perfect. Destroy the ceremonies of the Jewish Sabbath, and the day, as a Sabbath, no longer exists.

6. But Isaiah 56:2-7; 58:13, 14, and other writers of the Old Testament, command us to keep the Sabbath day. Not 'us' but those who were under the law; we are under grace, and the law of grace no where commands us to keep the Sabbath.

7. Then one day is no better than another.—We admit it. Christ made no distinction, and the apostles enjoined none. Consult Luke 6:1-5, and 13:11-16; John 5:1-17; Rom. 14:5, 6, and Col. 2:16; and you will find Christ was accused of breaking the Sabbath; and instead of enforcing its observance, he pleads his justification by saying, 'The Son of Man is Lord of the Sabbath.' He had no right to, neither did he ever break one of the commandments; but he had a right, and did abolish the law; therefore he did not break the Sabbath, otherwise he did, and became a transgressor.

8. Then why keep the first day? Because Christ rose on that day, and the apostolic church have set us the example, that we should assemble on that day to commemorate his resurrection, by breaking of bread, and other duties belonging to the worship of God; Acts 20:7. John says he 'was in the Spirit on the Lord's day'—Rev. 1:10; the first day of the week, the day of Christ's resurrection, which was observed as a day of worship by the early Christians.

Hence Ignatius, bishop of Antioch, A. D. 101, only about half a dozen years after the death of the apostle, speaks of the Lord's day familiarly and without explanations, as if every body understood it. And he gives this title to the first day of the week exactly after the manner of the apostle himself. 'Let us (Christians) no more sabbatize,' he says, (that is, keep the seventh day, as the Jews did,) 'but let us keep the Lord's day.' 'Let every one that loves Christ keep holy the Lord's day, the queen of days, the resurrection day, the highest of all days.'

This shows what was meant by the Lord's day; it was the resurrection day; and also why it was called the Lord's day. It was the day when Christians assembled for public worship, and which they kept holy, as the Christian Sabbath.

Theophilus, bishop of Antioch, about A. D. 162, says, 'Both custom and reason challenge from us that we should honor the Lord's day, seeing on that day it was that our Lord Jesus completed his resurrection from the dead.'

Hence Irenaeus, bishop of Lyons, a disciple of Polycarp, who had been the companion of the apostles, A. D. 167, says, that the LORD'S DAY was the CHRISTIAN SABBATH. His words are, 'On the Lord's day every one of us Christians keep the Sabbath, meditating on the law, and rejoicing in the works of God.'

And Dionysius, who lived in the time of Irenaeus, in writing to the Romans, A. D. 170, says, 'We celebrate the Lord's day;' and he informed them that the Epistles of Clement, their late bishop, were read in the church at Corinth, 'while they were keeping the Lord's day holy.'

Clement of Alexandria, A. D. 192, says, 'A Christian, according to the command of the gospel, observes the Lord's day, thereby glorifying the resurrection of the Lord.' And again he says, 'The Lord's day is the eighth day;' that is, according to the Jewish reckoning, on the day that came next after the Jewish Sabbath, viz: the first day of the week.'

Tertullian, about the same time says, 'The Lord's day is the holy day of the Christian church.' 'We have nothing to do with the Sabbath,' (that is, the Jewish Sabbath.) 'The Lord's day is the Christian's solemnity.'

We are informed by Eusebius, that from the beginning the Christians assembled on the first day of the week, called by them the Lord's day, for the purpose of religious worship, to read the scriptures, to preach and celebrate the Lord's supper; and Justin Martyr observes, that on the Lord's day all Christians in the city or country, met together, because that is the day of our Lord's resurrection, and then we read the writings of the apostles and prophets; this being done, the president makes an oration to the assembly, to exhort them to imitate and to practice the things they have heard; then we all join in prayer, and after that we celebrate the sacrament; Then they who are able and willing, give what they think proper, and what is collected is laid up in the hands of the president, who distributes it to orphans and widows, and other necessitous Christians, as their wants may require.'

This testimony should forever settle this very clear question; and it does appear to us that it will do it in the minds of all who will carefully examine the subject, aside from the influence of prejudice, or preconceived erroneous opinions.—Let us abide in the truth, and remember, that 'whosoever seeks to be justified by the deeds of the law, is fallen from grace,' and nothing is more clear than that keeping the seventh day or Jewish Sabbath, was one of the prominent deeds of the law.

CORRESPONDENCE.

NEW BEDFORD, March 27th, 1847.

Our little band is still strong in the faith of the speedy coming of the Lord, and we have blessed good meetings. Bro. Turner is with us for the most part of the time. He is getting out a new chart, which I expect will be out the last of this week. Bro. Turner thinks that James was the first who was sent to Great Britain to preach the gospel; and if that be the case, how plainly we see chap. v. 1-11 inclusive, fulfilling between that nation and Ireland. The 4th verse reads, "Behold the hire of the laborers which have reaped down your fields, which is of you kept back by fraud, cryeth; and the cries of them which have reaped are entered into the ears of the Lord of Sabaoth." It does appear to me that these things have come upon these nations. We see that England is now obliged to feed the starving Irish—and the hand of the Lord I believe is truly in these things, for he does not suffer all the ships from this country to arrive there with provisions that are sent out. I believe we have an amount of fifty ships and barks that have been lost in carrying provisions from this country to Ireland. One from this port, and also one was lost on the 22d inst. on the Cape Truro beach with all her crew. She sailed from Boston the 21st. The officers and crew all lived in a little place near Boston, and their wives and children were in Boston the morning she sailed, and took their parting leave of their husbands and fathers, and within 24 hours they were all lost, with ship and cargo, and corn, flour, meal and for Ireland.

ORIS IRISH.

ATTICA, April 11th, 1847.

BRO. MARSH—I have met with a few brethren here to-day, and the Lord has blessed us. I wish to exhort the brethren every where to examine themselves, to see if they are in the faith. What! know ye not that Christ is in you except ye be reprobates, selfishness and worldly-mindedness need continually to be crucified, until a permanent victory is gained. This is possible with God: and we may gain it if we will.

If we obey 2 Cor. iv. 17, 18 and Col. iii. 1, 4, we shall become heavenly-minded.

Reader do you enjoy the religion of the Bible? If not, do you wish to? If you wish to, will you now consecrate yourself to God, without any reserve? Be sure to give up your will. Self-will is, perhaps, the greatest hindrance to communion with God. It is certain, at least, that if our wills are entirely submitted to Christ, we cannot be unhappy.

B. MORLEY.

PALMER DEPOT, Mass., March 27.

DEAR BRO. MARSH—I suppose the brethren out West would like to know what has become of Bro. Benson that was out West, crying, 'Behold the Bridegroom cometh, go ye out to meet him.' Well, I am still crying, 'Behold he cometh, and every eye shall see him, and they also which pierced him, and all the kindreds of the earth shall wail because of him. Even so, Amen.' But this I confess that after the way they (the churches) call heresy, so worship I the God of my fathers, believing all things which are written in the law and in the prophets. And having therefore, obtained help of God, I continue unto this day, witnessing both to small and great, saying none other things than those which the prophets and Moses did say should come. And I am still waiting for his Son from heaven whom he raised from the dead—even Jesus, which delivered us from the wrath to come.

I am still trying to warn the ungodly of his awful danger. The good Lord is still with us at Three Rivers: He converted one soul a few days ago. Our dear Bro. Himes was here last Thursday evening and gave one good lecture on the 4th and a part of 5th of 2 Cor. The saints were strengthened, but wicked entangled; they threw rotten eggs—but God blessed us and the children rejoiced. I am glad that God has raised up Bro. Himes for this work; I never saw him more engaged than now; he is in the work with his whole soul. Although some say he has become backslidden and worldly, yet the Lord is with him.

LEWIS H. BENSON.

BATTLE CREEK, Mich. March 30.

There are a few here holding on to the precious promises, and I hope that no one will take our crown. There has been a little moving of the Lord here; two have been immersed in the name of the Lord here in apostolic order, and I rejoice to believe that they are happy and ready to meet the good Shepherd at his return. I praise God for living faith that works by love and purifies the heart. The Scriptures cannot be broken, therefore iniquity abounds and the love of the greater number grows cool. O may the Lord preserve us in these perilous times unto his heavenly kingdom.

I bless God that I ever took my lamp to meet the Bridegroom; and I hope and earnestly pray that my oil may hold out until the glorious return. O brethren and sisters, let us be ready and waiting for the return of the Lord.

I love to hear the dear saints discuss Bible subjects, when it is done in the spirit of love. What if we do differ in some things? let us be honest and take the Bible, the whole Bible, with all of its connections and harmony, and compare and combine the different parts; with prayerful hearts—and let us love one another sincerely, and all will be well.

Yours waiting to enjoy immortality in the heavenly kingdom,

DAVID HEWITT.

"Perilous Times."

2 Tim. iii. 1-5.

When Time's career is almost run,
Then Peril's time will have begun.
When men shall not the truth regard,
They love 'themselves' and not the Lord.

They from the Lord shall go astray
And seek for ease in their own way.
They love themselves—they boast—are proud,
Their wicked hearts despise the good.

Their words are false, they break a truce,
They traitors prove, and false accuse.
The Great Jehovah they blaspheme,
And take in vain his holy name.

Affection's bond, and nature's tie
They disregard—their minds are high;
They heady are, and walk not low
As Jesus taught us all to do.

The children, too, are found so bad,
Their parent's word they do regard;
Unthankful hearts they do possess,
And walk in their unholiness.

The love of God they all profess,
And have a 'form of godliness';
But still they do 'deny the power,'
Which proves us near time's closing hour.

These, we read, are learning ever,
But the truth they get it never:
'From such as these, O turn away,'
We hear the apostle boldly say.

As some withstood the power of God,
When Moses lifted up the rod,
So these do all resist the truth,
Are reprobate concerning faith.

And have we now such 'perils' here,
And do such awful times appear?
Ah yes; and with resistless force
They tell us Christ is at the doors.

'Tis thus we're warned of Satan's power,
In these 'last days'—time's closing hour:
O may we all to Jesus fly,

The end is near,—the Lord is nigh!

Some would be thought to do great things, who are but tools or instruments, like the fool that fancied he played upon the organ, when he only blew the bellows.

Barry, Ill., March 12th, 1847.

This part of the country is full of Reverends, and D. D.s, Methodists, Baptists, Presbyterians, Christians, Freewills, Campbellites and Mormons—but among them all I hear nothing about the second coming of my Savior being near: no, no—but right the reverse: a millennium, world's conversion, return of the Jews, &c. &c., are topics that are harped upon by the nominal teachers of these last days, until they are entirely thread-bare and worn out. O that men were willing to embrace the truth, and would search the Scriptures for themselves and find the truth—thy word, O God, is Truth.

G. EMERSON.

BRO. PINNEY.

BRO. MARSH—In a late visit to Seneca Falls I found our beloved Bro. Pinney confined to his house, which he had been unable to leave for several weeks; and though his emaciated and feeble appearance seemed to indicate that his arduous and faithful labors for the world were finished, yet I indulged the hope that his disease would take a turn and result favorably to the health of our brother; but from a recent communication from him, written in answer to one inquiring into the state of his health, he says, "As to my health it is no better than when you saw me. I have been under the care of a physician ten weeks, and not a single symptom of my disease removed. I am weaker than when you were here."

In view of these facts I feel that it is but due to our brother who has not only spent his worldly substance, but his valuable health in the cause of God, to inform his numerous friends of his present condition, and ask in his behalf their united prayers, and also to consider his wants and those of his family, remembering that it is more blessed to give than to receive. A word to the wise is sufficient.

Your brother in Christ,

JABAN E. BATES.

CRIGGSVILLE, Ill., Feb. 13, 1847.

DEAR BRO. MARSH—I have nothing discouraging to say of the cause in this region. I thank the Lord that it appears to be on the advance. My health is now good. I have been laboring in this vicinity for several weeks—have had a good hearing, and much interest is manifested in the truths we advocate. There is a demand for publications on the advent, which I regret I am unable to supply, as thereby much light might be cast on inquiring minds. The end is fast hastening; may the Lord help his 'waiting' people to hold fast the confidence and the rejoicing of their hope firm unto the end.

JOHN DANIELS.

PHILLIPS, Mo. April 6th, 1847.

Most of the preachers and church members here expect the world to be converted, a temporal millennium, the Jews' return, &c.; but such preaching is no food for me, and I fear they will be greatly disappointed before the close of this year. Oh! what indifference to this subject—how can it be so! It seems they have closed their eyes and ears, and chose darkness rather than light. We want all the light we can get and hope you will continue to send us the glad tidings, so that we hear from the brethren if we cannot see them, and hope we shall be faithful to the end, and be in readiness to meet our coming King.

ISAAC F. HARDEN.

BRO. MARSH—In the last Voice Bro. Morley wrote a piece upon the state of the dead, in which he quoted a passage which is often referred to, to prove the same position, viz: 'And no man hath ascended up into heaven,' &c. Now I would ask if the meaning of this is precisely as Bro. M. and others would have it, what will they do with Elijah's case? I should like to have them explain 2 Kings ii. 11.

A. LEARNER.

COLBORNE, C. W. April 9th, 1847.

BRO. MARSH—Religion is very low in this part of the country, however, there are some who I trust have not laid down their armour, but are determined to fight the good fight of faith and lay hold on eternal life. I hear that there have been several souls brought to a saving knowledge of the truth under the labors of brethren Campbell & Thompson, in the Prince Edward district, to God be all the glory. I think if Bro. Preble or some other efficient lecturer could come to Canada, he would do much good, and be amply supported.

Political Tokens in Europe.

"Rev. Mr. Roussel," a correspondent of the New York Evangelist, under date of Paris, Feb. 23d, 1847, speaking on the affairs of Europe, says:

"For a long time two questions have occupied the press, and European diplomatists: these are, marriage of the Queen of Spain and her sister through French influence, and the occupation of Cracow by Austria, supported by Prussia and Russia. The former affair has embroiled England and France, through the fear of England lest the Duc de Montpensier, son of our king, might sooner or later, by his marriage with a sister of the Queen of Spain, ascend the throne of that kingdom. This misunderstanding between the two constitutional powers of Europe, has emboldened the three Northern Courts to strike a coup de main at Cracow. Things were at this point, at the date of my last correspondence. Since then a new step, a new encroachment has been made by Russia, Austria and Prussia, who have threatened Switzerland with their interference, if there is allowed in that republic a political change contrary to the treaties of 1815. Switzerland has replied to the three powers, by reproaching them with their own violation of the treaty of Vienna; and finally, Austria has already ordered her troops to march towards the frontiers of that country. There is not, therefore, a moment to be lost by France and England, if they would resist the three absolute monarchs: indeed, it is asserted that at this moment a reconciliation is in preparation, and that to effect it the Ministry at Paris and London will be modified; M. Guizot on the one side, and Lord Palmerston on the other, will be sacrificed; then France and England, re-united, will arise against Russia, Austria and Prussia.

A fact which interests the whole of Europe, is the famine which is felt in all quarters: twenty of our Departments have been disturbed by mobs, under pretext of the high price of grain; merchants have been robbed, castles pillaged, laborers assassinated, bands of mendicant robbers have levied contributions; finally, the disorders have been serious and numerous. They are at present diminished, but may perhaps be renewed in other quarters.

In Ireland, the misery surpasses all conception; mobs, pillage, resistance to magistrates, deaths from hunger, are common things; fevers are already prevalent, and a pestilence is soon to be feared. The English Government has made donations of money, but tardy and illy employed, so that the evil has scarcely diminished, and enormous offerings will still be necessary.

Germany, likewise, has had its tumults on account of the scarcity of food.

Portugal, when I last wrote you, was in the full tide of revolution; the insurgents have been completely routed, and though peace does not yet hold sway in that kingdom, the authority of the Queen is now recognized in all quarters."

Famine in Europe.

IRELAND.—Says the National Intelligencer, All the accounts agree that the distresses in Ireland and suffering of the people are unmitigated, and surpass all that the imagination can picture. And it is sad to learn that the spring sowing has hardly begun in a majority of the rural districts. No provision is therefore made for the ensuing year. The Cork Examiner says:

"From the melancholy accounts we receive, day after day, from gentleman of undoubted accuracy and intelligence, of the general neglect of this propitious season for cultivation of the land—of the extensive tracts of country that are still untouched by the plough, spade or harrow—of the rapid apathy and sullen despair that seem to hang like a dark cloud over the minds of all classes—landlords, middlemen and farmers—we are reluctantly compelled to believe that the present season of calamity is but the precursor of one more terrible, more appalling, more destructive to human life."

The tide of emigration, it is also said by the Liverpool Mercury, "continues to flow with a rapidity really fearful, when it is considered that the class of emigrants is altogether composed of the more sound and healthy portion of society. The comfortable farmers, the temperate, industrious and saving, the young and able-bodied, the possessors of a small capital—these are the individuals who are flying from their native country as if it were plague-smitten. What will be the end of it all, God only knows."

FRANCE.—Paris dates of March 17th say that the state of the public subsistence continues to be the object of the most anxious solicitude with all parties. The rise in all the markets is unceasing. Bread rose in Paris on the 18th even higher than was anticipated. The rise in flour is alarming. It had reached 123 francs per sack, equivalent to 31 shillings per one hundred weight, and it was expected that it would rise still higher.

SPAIN.—The dearth of subsistence in the capital has received the attention of the Senate, and on the 10th ultimo measures for relief were under consideration. The speculation of the French Government was drawing enormous quantities of grain from Spain; 6,000 wagons were employed in transporting grain to Santander for exportation.

GERMANY.—Accounts from Germany continue to speak of the scarcity of provisions and spreading desire for emigration, chiefly to America, not only among the poorer classes, but also among the small land-holders. A letter from Prague says that the destitution of the lower classes has suggested the erection of a steam-cooking apparatus of such a size that 30,000 basins of soup are served out in a forenoon. Accounts from Hungary speak of the most pressing scarcity, and give some details of crimes committed by the hungry people; and yet, says the Austrian Lloyd's Journal, such quantities of grain are now stored up in the country as might supply the whole population for some years; but the owners are waiting to send them by water to foreign markets rather than to send them over almost impassable roads to the distressed districts.

DREADFUL DISTRESS IN SWITZERLAND.—A physician writing from Schull, in the Canton of the Grisons, on the 28th February, says—The parish of Schull is one vast charnel-house. A frightful mortality reigns here. Each day from forty to forty-five dead bodies are interred. There is scarce a humble dwelling in the Canton into which fever, dysentery or death have not entered. Graves cannot be prepared in sufficient numbers, and the bodies are so hastily interred that the dogs, scraping off the dirt, draw them out and batten on their flesh. The feebleness of the inhabitants prevents them from digging deeper. The master of a public school who had a year since a hundred and forty scholars, now has not one! Half are dead, the rest incapable of raising themselves. The master, to support his family is working on the roads.—Jour. of Com.

Great Mortality among Emigrants.

Nearly 4000 emigrants landed at New York last week. A great number of these were ill.—There is not room enough in the hospital of that city to receive them. A committee of the Common Council has waited upon the Governor to request permission to erect a temporary building to accommodate 800 patients. A malignant fever is raging in some parts of Ireland, and so great is the mortality that hundreds die in but few hours after an attack. Several of the emigrants declare they were sick when shipped, but the Health officer at the place of embarkation reported them well. Hundreds die on their passage. The ships are generally badly ventilated, destitute of proper provisions, water, &c. The New York Gazette says:

"There are now in Bellevue one hundred and seven miserable beings, just between life and death, who have been placed there within a few days past, and many of whom are in the last stages of the fearful malady; nine died during the 24 hours ending on Saturday morning last!—Thirteen hundred of these poor unfortunates arrived on Thursday, and fifteen hundred on Friday, and the probability is that 4000 human beings, emigrant strangers, have been placed on our docks within the last four days. Of these, some die while being removed to the pier—some on their transit to Bellevue, and numbers in an hour or two after being entered on the books of the Hospital! The Globe, which gives some particulars still more appalling, says, that the hospital buildings are overflowing and it has been found necessary to transfer to the Alms House, very many patients who have been under treatment for months, to make room for the newcomers."

What will be the effect of this great influx of disease it is impossible to tell. The earth seems cursed. Europe is one great charnel house—Famine and pestilence are sweeping away thousands, and in this land of abundance the same work is going on through the agency of the demon of war. "What shall be the end of these things?"—Roch. Democrat.

"Who shall dwell in thy Holy Hill?"

Psalm xv. 1.

O Lord, who shall abide with thee,
In that most holy place?
Who shall ascend thy holy hill
And see thy glorious face?

II.
None only those who walk upright,
And works of love impart;
None only those who speak thy truth
And speak it from the heart!

III.
O Lord, prepare me for that place,
Help me thy truth to speak;
Give me thy spirit and free grace,
And help me to be meek.

IV.
Give me a garment white and clean—
A robe of righteousness;
On which no spot or wrinkle seen,
Prepared for endless bliss.

V.
Then Jesus come and take me home,
With all the holy throng;
There we will praise around thy throne,
And sing the new born song!

VI.
Then we shall dwell for evermore,
In Zion's holy hill;
And with the angels we'll adore,
Our harps shall ne'er be still!

Pre-millennial Advent.

BY CHARLES DECHER,

The canons of criticism I have shown to be logically necessary to the denial of the pre-millennial advent, are substantially explained in one, viz: "Whatever is for pre-millennial advent, spiritualise; whatever is against it, leave literal."

I now proceed to show the manifest infidelity of this principle. Not that I suppose, or would imply, that the opposers of the pre-millennial advent are infidel in heart. By no means. I mean to show that it is to the piety of their hearts alone, we are indebted for escape from general infidelity.

I have shown that of all passages relating either to advent, resurrection, judgment or conflagration, the largest part, and those most unequivocal, are to be spiritualized, while but a small class remains to be treated as literal. I now add that the course pursued in spiritualising the former class, and the liberties taken, furnish ample preparation for spiritualising the latter, and thus eradicating the obnoxious ideas of a "coming Resurrection" and "Judgment" from the whole Bible.

For there are no passages in the latter class more difficult to subject to this process than others already disposed of. And why not be consistent?

Take for example our Savior's words, Matt. xxiv. 30: "And then shall appear the sign of the Son of man, coming in the clouds of heaven with power and great glory."

Now Prof. Bush, the Universalists, et id genus omne, find all this to be spiritual. And how can you reprove them who have just been spiritualising the very same words in Daniel? You spiritualised the words to escape a pre-millennial—they to escape a post-millennial advent; and both with equal reason.

2. Will you cling to 1 Cor. xv.: e. g. "As in Adam all die, even so in Christ shall all be made alive," &c. &c. But Prof. Bush and the Swedenborgians, find in all this chapter no allusion to the resurrection of the body at all—it is all spiritual. And how can you reprove them when they apply the very process you furnish in Isaiah 25th, from which Paul here quotes? If Paul identifies the two passages as he does, and you spiritualise one, blame not Prof. Bush for being more consistent than you are willing to be and spiritualising both. And why should 1 Thes. iv. 16, give you any qualms of conscience? Having swallowed many a camel, are you now straining at a gnat? Having disposed of Isa. 25th, Hos. 13th, Rev. 20th, &c., shall this stand in your way?

3. But suppose we turn to 2 Pet. iii.: will you repose here? Does not Prof. Bush spiritualise all this with as much apparent satisfaction as you did similar expressions in Isaiah lxx. lxxvi.? Or in Psalm xxvii.? And why regard the mote in the Professor's eye?

4. And will you cherish a regard for the antiquated notion that there is ever to be such a thing as a "great white throne," Rev. xx. 11, and One sitting thereon, "from whose face earth and heaven fled away?" Has not Prof. Bush, aided by the principles by you furnished in the beginning of this very chapter, satisfactorily changed all that? When you have spiritualised the resurrection of part of the dead, called "THE FIRST RESURRECTION," why chide him for spiritualising what is said of "the rest of the dead," where no resurrection is mentioned?

And why cling to early prejudices here, you who have dissolved into mist, that throne which Daniel saw, whence came the "fiery stream," before which myriads ministered, where "judgment was set" and "books opened?" Are you now bent on literally interpreting similar imagery, and that in so dark and symbolical a book as in the first part of the chapter you pronounced Revelations to be? Will you now cast away that Allegoric wand which has been your sceptre of power from the beginning of the Bible, and which has dissipated more substantial seeming texts than this? By no means. Or if you piously prefer to halt here, you cannot stop others who have followed your leading. Rising generations of uncatechized scoffers will tread your steps and say, "Where is the promise of his coming?" And you can find no answer.

Life and Death.

NUMBER VIII.

Another passage sought to sustain the doctrine of consciousness is found in Luke xxiii. 42, 43 "And he said unto Jesus, Lord, remember me when thou comest into thy kingdom. And Jesus said unto him, Verily, I say unto thee, to-day shalt thou be with me in Paradise." The above is understood by the advocates of the intermediate state, and also of immediate rewards, to teach that Jesus and the thief, both, went that day into Paradise. Their views however are very diverse as to what Paradise is. The former believe it is that part of hades assigned to the souls of the righteous; the latter, the full fruition of glory at God's right hand.

1. To the latter, it is sufficient to say, Jesus declared, after his resurrection, that he had not yet ascended to his father. He had not yet entered the Paradise of this class of Paradisiacs.

To both I answer, the argument turns solely on the punctuation of the editors of our Bibles. Punctuate as I have and there is an essential difference. Put 'shalt' after 'thou,' and it would read, "I say unto thee, to-day, thou shalt be with me," etc. Translate it without any transposition of words, and it will read thus: "Verily I say unto thee, to-day, with me thou shalt be, in Paradise." Which gives the fairest construction to the sentence, compared with itself or with other arguments which may be adduced, I leave my readers to judge.

Again: what was the prayer of the thief? "Lord remember me when thou comest into thy kingdom." Is it not the most natural inference that can be drawn, that Jesus promised him in answer to and in accordance with his prayer? Surely there is nothing to contradict it. If he did, the penitent thief will be remembered as Job will, (Job xiv. 13) when Christ comes and his kingdom.

Again: what is Paradisos? Philology cannot settle it any more than it can the fabulous heathen doctrine of hades. Primarily it signifies, 'a park'—'forest, where wild beasts were kept for hunting; a pleasure park; a delightful grove.' The seventy use it in the Septuagint for the garden of Eden—we must resort to the usus loquendi. We will compare Scripture with Scripture. I know of but three texts where Paradisos is used in the New Testament. The first is the one under consideration. The second is in 2 Cor. xii. 4—where Paul says he 'was caught up (or away) into Paradison.' The third is in Rev. ii. 7, where Jesus says, 'To him that overcometh will I give to eat of the tree of life which is in the midst of tu Paradisou, tu Thcou—the Paradise of God.' Here it is affirmed, that the tree of life is in the midst of the Paradise of God. If we can ascertain where the tree of life is, or will be, we can ascertain what and where Paradise will be. Rev. xxii. 2—"In the midst of the street and on either side of the river, was there the tree of life"—ver. 14, "Blessed are they that do his commandments that they may have a right to the tree of life, and may enter in through the gates into the city." These Scriptures affirm 1st. That the tree of life is in the midst of Paradise. 2d, that it is in the beloved city—the New Jerusalem: therefore Paradise will be in the New Earth, when Jerusalem is created a rejoicing and her people a joy. The kingdom of God will be there; and there will the promise of Jesus be fulfilled—not to the penitent thief only, but to all that love his appearing.

2. Another portion of Scripture we will consider is in 2 Cor. v. 1-9. This is understood to teach that the body of man is the tabernacle of his soul—that the dissolution of the tabernacle or earthly house is his death—that the house from heaven is the immortal body—that the absence from Christ is while the soul is tabernacling in the mortal body, and the being present with the Lord is when the soul leaves the body and goes to be with Christ. This I believe is a fair statement of the case.

1. I answer, if this be true, the intermediate state is not true, or you must believe God and Christ are in hades! But it is said God is omnipresent. True; and therefore there is no such thing as being absent from him in this sense; but here is an absence from and a presence with Christ —the one the antithesis of the other. If it does not teach a personal presence of Christ to be enjoyed by the inheritor of glory, it teaches nothing more than every child of God enjoys here; consequently, nothing at all. 'Lo I am with you always, even to the end of the world,' said our blessed Lord. I affirm without fear of contradiction, that the personal absence and presence of Christ is here taught, not in hades! but in the kingdom.

2. That it neither teaches the intermediate state nor an immediate ascent to glory, is plain from the context. The argument of the apostle is one unbroken chain from 4th chap. 10th ver., where he speaks of the resurrection, to the 10th ver. of this chap., where he tells us we must stand before the judgment seat of Christ—and for what? To receive in our bodies our reward or punishment.

3. Having previously given my views of what these Scriptures teach, I will, in the third place, examine one more passage and close. Phil. i. 23. If the doctrine of consciousness is taught any where it is here. But is the separate, conscious state positively taught here? I answer, unhesitatingly, no! The inference may seem strong to many, yet we must never draw an inference at variance with positive declarations. If, however, it teaches consciousness, it teaches an immediate residence with Christ. This is plain. If Paul did not expect to be immediately with Christ, consciousness is not taught. It depends entirely on this fact, if fact it be. Does the text teach it? My inference is, it does not.

I will give my understanding of the context. Paul tells us in 12th ver. that his affliction (being a prisoner at Rome,) had turned out for the advancement of the gospel—that his imprisonment for the gospel had become known at court—thereby many had become bold to preach, some even of envy, that he might be the more afflicted—in this Christ was magnified and in this he rejoiced. What might be the consequence he did not know, but was confident that in nothing he should be ashamed—i. e. whether he lived to preach the gospel or laid down his life for the testimony of Jesus, and that in either way Christ would be magnified—that for him to live would be to magnify Christ; to die, would be gain—i. e. Christ would be magnified more by his death, under those peculiar circumstances, than by his living; still, if he lived in the flesh, (mortality) this, i. e. to magnify Christ, would be the fruit of his labor—yet if it was left to his own choice, he did not know what he would do, for he was in a strait betwixt the two modes of magnifying Christ, having a desire to depart, and also to be with Christ which would be far better for him, personally—yet to remain and preach would be for the good of the church.

The question now returns, Did he expect to be immediately with Christ? I infer he did not, but at the resurrection. I will give one reason only. If Paul expected to go immediately and be with Christ, he expected all believers would. Then all believers would go there to sleep—for he says, 1 Thes. iv. 14—'For if we believe Jesus died and rose again, even so, also, them that sleep in Jesus will God bring with him.' But if it be said 'he will bring them from the grave,' I answer, that is just what I believe. They sleep in the grave and God will bring them up and unite them to Christ, which is 'far better.' O for that glorious day to come! Let us watch, pray and possess the spirit of Christ, that we may stand when he appeareth. If we do not understand alike, let us love as brethren, and Christ will own us in that glorious day, which may God grant through Christ. Amen.

GEO. NEEDHAM.

"The fewer things a man wants the nearer he is to God." "God never takes anything from his children but with the purpose to give them something better." Thou hast contended with Satan, and hast been successful. Thou hast fought with him and he has fled from thee. But O, remember his artifices. Do not indulge the belief that his nature is changed. True indeed, he is now very complacent, and is, perhaps, singing the same syren song; but he was never more a devil than he is now. He now assaults thee by not assailing thee, and knows that he shall conquer when thou fallest asleep. U.

An Important Inquiry.

'Lord, who shall abide in thy tabernacle? Who shall dwell in thy holy hill?'—Psa. xv. 1.

These questions are highly important. As there are some that will be permitted to 'abide in the tabernacle' of the Most High, and 'dwell in his holy hill' forever, no doubt but the peculiar characteristics and traits that they must bear, in order to have a preparation that will admit them into the tabernacle and holy presence of a holy God, are pointed out in his holy word. My brethren and sisters, if we can find pointed out in the Scriptures the preparation, then we can all ask ourselves the question, Am I now prepared? Am I now ready to stand with my holy Savior, on his 'holy hill,' 'Mount Zion?' O let us see to it that we are among the number that will 'enter in through the gates into the city.' I am afraid that some of my good brethren are spending their time and talents too much in discussing and writing upon disputed questions among brethren, which serve, many times, to divide them in their feelings and fellowship for each other. We want at this trying and critical hour something that will encourage, unite, strengthen and comfort the tried followers of Jesus. O for the spirit of wisdom to direct.

Now let us see if we can find David's serious questions answered. If we do, let us compare ourselves with the word as we go along, and see if we are ready for Jesus to come any moment, and to 'stand before his indignation.' Nah. i. 6.

1st. 'He that walketh uprightly.' Now if we are required to walk uprightly, we want to get into the right way. Now let us find the way that leads to the Mount of God. Jesus says, 'I am the way'—and again, 'By me if any man enter in, he shall be saved, and shall go in and out and find pasture;' 'but he that climbeth up some other way, the same is a thief and robber.' It was not by the 'blood of goats and calves,' that this way was opened and consecrated, but by 'his own blood.' Heb. x. 19, 20. 'Having therefore, brethren, boldness to enter into the holiest by the blood of Jesus, by a new and living way which he hath consecrated for us through the veil, that is to say, his flesh.' Many are trying to 'climb up some other way' rather than come in by the way that will lead them to the port of endless rest. Many had rather grovel around amid paths of superstition and bigotry, being led on by tradition and the commandments of men, and travel in the fog and darkness, led on by blind guides, till they will find themselves in the ditch of eternal ruin, rather than set their feet in the 'path of the just, that is as a light that shineth more and more unto the perfect day.' O yes, that path that is lighted up by the esfulgent rays of the sun of righteousness shines brighter and brighter as we near the 'perfect day!' Soon the light of eternal day will burst upon us. O then, my brethren, let us 'walk uprightly.' Read Isa. xxxiii. 15-17. As we have therefore received Christ Jesus the Lord, so walk ye in him; (Col. ii. 6) and then we shall walk uprightly, and in the end be permitted to 'abide in the tabernacle' of the Lord and in the 'mountain of his holiness' for ever, even for ever and ever.' Amen.

2d. And he that 'worketh righteousness.' We have got to work as well as walk. It is not the hearing of the word only that will insure us a lot among the blessed, but we must be 'doers of the work;' and as Paul says, 'Let us labor therefore, to enter into that rest,' &c. Heb. iv. 11. Jesus says, 'Occupy till I come.' It will not do for us to bury our talent if it is a small one. We should appropriate all our time, talents and money, that is required of us, to the works of righteousness—so when Jesus comes we shall hear him say, 'Well done thou good and faithful servant, thou hast been faithful over a few things, I will make thee ruler over many things; enter into the joy of thy Lord.' Read Matt. xxv. 34-46, and there learn the works of righteousness.

3d. And he that 'speaketh the truth in his heart.' The carnal heart has always a great aversion to the truth. 'From it,' says our Savior, 'proceed evil thoughts, adulteries, fornications, murders, thefts, covetousness, wickedness, pride,' &c. &c.

Seeing then, that the 'heart is deceitful above all things and desperately wicked,' and is a receptacle for and from whence proceed all the 'works of the flesh,' it becomes us to 'search our hearts and try our ways,' and see if there are any of those sinful desires in our hearts. You know, brethren, that holiness and sin cannot abide in the same temple—truth and error cannot walk hand in hand peacefully together; for while one is sanctifying, transforming and renewing us in 'the spirit of our mind,' and preparing us for the kingdom of God; the other is conforming us to this world, to its unholy, unsanctifying and degrading influences, fashions, practices and degenerate customs, &c., and rendering us unfit to benefit our fellows around us, and above all, unfit for a residence in 'God's holy Mountain.' It is possible that a great many who make high professions, have some of those contaminating sins lurking about them. I speak not of the general mass of Christians (professedly so) at large, but of those who are looking for our Redeemer. I say it is possible that there are some who are indulging in high hopes of heaven, whose heart is set on some treasure of this world. If we have our hearts filled with the treasures of this world, how can the truth dwell there? how can we speak the truth in our hearts? O brethren and sisters, if by examination we find any thing there that will hinder the truth, let us eject it and that right early. The kingdom is near—the 'tabernacle' will soon be 'with men.' Lord, who shall abide in thy tabernacle? Let David answer in another Psalm, (xxiv. 3, 4,) in answer to the questions: 'Who shall ascend into the hill of the Lord? and who shall stand in the holy place?' Hear his answer: 'He that hath clean hands and a pure heart—who hath not lifted up his soul unto vanity, nor sworn deceitfully.' How necessary then it is that our hearts be pure, in order to admit us into the peaceful presence of God. Jesus says, Blessed are the pure in heart, for they shall see God.' If we would be 'pure in heart' we must love the truth—we must keep and speak the truth in our hearts, then the prayer of Jesus will be answered: 'Sanctify them through thy truth, thy word is truth.' Remember that it is written, 'If I regard iniquity in my heart the Lord will not hear me.' Psa. lxxvi. 18.

4th. 'He that backbiteth not with his tongue, nor doeth evil to his neighbor, nor taketh up a reproach against his neighbor.'—ver. 3. Here is instruction or a warning that we should not backbite nor reproach our neighbor. The great apostle says, 'Speak evil of no man.' Many of us I fear, do not always bridle the little 'unruly member,' the tongue. James says it is 'a fire, a world of iniquity;' and you, brethren, know how 'great a matter' is often kindled by a 'little fire.' The tongue often 'setteth on fire the whole course of nature; it is set on fire of hell.' Our words should be 'few and well chosen.' 'Who is a wise man endued with knowledge among you? Let him show out of a good conversation his works with meekness and wisdom.' 'But the tongue can no man tame.' But, my brethren, it can be bridled. We should learn from the example of our Savior that if we are reviled, not to revile again—if we are cursed, let us bless and curse not—and if any man offend not in word, the same is a perfect man, and is able to bridle the whole body.'

Let me conclude this article by repeating the rest of the Psalm; then I hope all will learn their duty and act accordingly: 'In whose eyes a vile person is contemned; but he honoreth them that fear the Lord—he that sweareth to his own hurt and changeth not—he that putteth not out his money to usury, nor taketh reward against the innocent: he that doeth these things shall never be moved.' We have a theory as perfect as an angel, but that alone never will admit us into the kingdom. We must have a preparation. O think how near we are to the 'world to come!' How short the time is we have to prepare, if we are not ready! O God, consecrate us anew. Amen.

Are the Dead Conscious?

I wish now to consider some of the objections urged against the negative answer to this question, as I think I have in a former article, shown that the negative is the correct answer.

The first text I will notice on this point is Phil. i. 23: 'For I am in a strait betwixt two, having a desire to depart, and be with Christ, which is far better.' This is understood by many to sustain the affirmative. But if Paul was actually conscious and in the presence of Christ immediately after he died, he must have been conveyed to the 'right hand of the throne of the Majesty in the heavens;' for Christ the great 'high priest' is there, and we have no information in the Bible of his being any where else (i. e. in hades or on earth) since he first (having overcome) sat down with his Father on his throne.

When Paul speaks of being with Christ let us not imagine that he means the Holy Spirit. The two classes of appellatives and the two descriptions of character are every where distinct in the Bible. See John xiv. 17, also, 2 Cor. viii. 6. But that Paul has not been conveyed to the throne of God is evident from the fact that he has not yet attained unto the resurrection from the dead, (which event he affirms will be realized when the Lord himself shall descend from heaven,) for neither will the living go before the dead, nor the dead before the living, but all the saints will be 'caught up together.' Further, David says, (Psa. xvi. 11) 'In thy presence is fullness of joy; at thy right hand there are pleasures for evermore.' Certainly Paul did not expect 'fullness of joy,' until the redemption of his body. But as the doctrine of the glorification of the saints at death, is generally abandoned by adventists, I shall offer nothing more to disprove it. Still it is argued that this text sustains the affirmative on the supposition that Paul, when he departed, went to be with Christ in the happy regions of hades. But what reason had he for expecting to meet Christ there? Acts ii. 31—'He, seeing this before, spake of the resurrection of Christ, that his soul was not left in hell, neither his flesh did see corruption.' Christ's abode in hades is shown to have been terminated by his resurrection.

While Paul 'abode in the flesh' preaching the gospel he realized the fulfillment of the promise, 'Lo, I am with you,' &c. Christ is with his people through the agency of the second comforter, sent by the Father in his name. But where is the promise of the presence of either in hades? What then does the passage mean? I understand his subsequent remarks on this point in this same epistle to be a full explanation of the meaning of this. What does he say? 'Our conversation is in heaven from whence also we look for thee Savior, the Lord Jesus Christ, who shall change our vile body,' &c. Phil. iii. 20, 21. In the 14th and 11th verses of this chapter he speaks of this prize of immortality to be obtained at the resurrection from the dead, as though it were received at the end of his earthly existence. So to depart—sleep in Jesus—die in the Lord, and then be with Christ at the next conscious moment, was in the apostles view far better than to suffer the constant toil and persecution of this life: no more danger of becoming a cast away—no more weakness, fear or trembling, but all is safe—he 'sleeps in Jesus.'

Perhaps if we partook more fully of the sufferings of Paul and of Christ we should consider sleeping in Jesus far more desirable than we now do. Consider the little child wearied with the exercises of the day—how anxious to sleep in its mother's arms or under its mother's care. Does not the child know there is no conscious happiness in sound sleep? Why then desire it? Ah! it is a cessation from toil and trouble, and in the morning it expects to awake refreshed. I understand the meaning of this passage to be further illustrated in 2 Tim. iv. 8, where nothing is noticed as transpiring between his departure and 'that day' when the Judge should appear to give him, with all the saints, a crown of righteousness. Confirmed also by Heb. ix. 27, 28. Here the intermediate state passes wholly unnoticed. The objector urges with the same confidence a similar passage found in 2 Cor. v. 8, 9: 'We are confident, I say, and willing rather to be absent from the body, and to be present with the Lord. Wherefore we labor, that, whether present or absent, we may be accepted of him.' But did Paul desire to be present with the Lord in a deformed state—mutilated, unclothed, a part at least of himself, corrupted in the grave? No, indeed—he desired to be 'clothed upon' with immortality. His mortal or 'vile body' must be swallowed up, or changed, before he could appear with Christ in glory. In the 10th verse he speaks of the judgment-seat of Christ as being the time and place where he should 'be with Christ which is far better'—when he should set upon the right hand, and be welcomed to inherit the kingdom.

Once more: In 2 Cor. xv. 55, we have an exhibition of the final triumph of those who sleep in Jesus. They shout, 'O death where is thy sting? O grave, where is thy victory?' In this passage the word grave is translated from hades. If it be contended that hades is not the same as the grave, it must, nevertheless, be admitted that it is a prison house—a place of captives—whose term of captivity expires only with the resurrection. How can a Christian desire to go into a state of conscious captivity for a thousand or six thousand years, or even for a day? If there be in hades a place of delightful, happy consciousness, enjoyed by all the righteous from death to the resurrection, why should they shout when delivered therefrom: 'O hades, where is thy victory?'

Many other passages might be noticed and many other things said, but let this suffice for the present. I do not feel so tenacious as I think many do on this subject. The day is coming when all who 'fear God and work righteousness' will 'see eye to eye.' BUTLER MORLEY.

Consciousness of the Dead.

Has the soul or spirit of man a conscious existence while the body is dead? Yes; for 'Jesus answered and said unto them, Destroy this temple and in three days I will raise it up.'—John ii. 19.

The same argument which makes us unconscious in death, makes Christ unconscious while his body was dead. I see that some teach it from what has been written in the Voice of Truth. It is also understood that those who believe that we are unconscious in death, do believe that Christ was unconscious during that time. If indeed an exception be admitted the theory falls. 'Thou wilt not leave my soul in hell nor suffer thine Holy One to see corruption,' is quoted to prove that Christ's soul as well as body lay in the grave. 'When thou shalt make his soul an offering for sin,' is also quoted to prove that the whole being of Christ was not only made an offering of, but absolutely died. If when our bodies fall under the power of death we have no conscious existence, then we freely admit that Christ was unconscious during that time; for I suppose that Christ did die as really as we die. But can a being that is dead in such a sense that it has no conscious existence, raise itself into life again? If so, then indeed Atheism may be true, and man may have come by chance. But did there ever such a thing occur? Yes; if Christ had not a separate conscious existence from his body. What says the text? 'In three days I will raise it up.' Then said the Jews, Forty and six years was this temple in building, and wilt thou rear it up in three days? But he spake of the temple of his body. Did he not fulfil his word? Again, hear Christ's testimony: John x. 17, 18—'Therefore doth my Father love me, because I lay down my life, that I might take it up again. No man taketh it from me, but I lay it down of myself. I have power to lay it down and I have power to take it again. This commandment have I received of my Father.' But says one, he received the power of the Father. Immaterial if he had the power. He says, 'I HAVE POWER TO TAKE IT AGAIN.' Then if Christ had not a separate conscious existence from his body, a dead unconscious thing may spring into life. Now shall we conclude that Christ did not speak the truth when he said, 'I have power to lay it down, and I have power to take it again?' or shall we conclude that a dead unconscious thing may spring into life? I conclude neither; but that Christ had a separate conscious existence from his body, and spake the truth when he said, 'I have power to take it again.'

Does the theory that the whole being sleeps unconscious in death, involve us in such absurdity? Holy Father preserve thy people! 'Sanctify them through thy truth, thy word is truth.' But you say that we must acknowledge that we had a separate, conscious existence from his body? Then there was as glorious and as mighty a work as was ever performed, done by a spirit while his body was dead, and that body, 'the seed of Abraham;' and shall we believe that there is no separate, conscious existence of the spirit while the body is dead? But, says another, I don't acknowledge yet, for the Scriptures declare that God raised him from the dead. Very well, suppose that another being raised him from the dead, how will that help the case? Does not Christ say, 'I have power to lay it down, and I have power to take it again?' Has a being dead in such a sense that it has no conscious existence, the power to take up its life again? How absurd! Hear again the voice of Christ: 'I am the resurrection and the life.'—John xi. 25. He was the Life; He was the Resurrection. These are two names he bears among the eighty titles given him in the word of God. The resurrection power was his. It lay in him; for he said, 'I have power to take it again.' If another being raised up Christ's body, then he did not raise it up himself, as he said he would: 'In three days I will raise it up.' But we freely acknowledge that there is an abundance of Scripture which declares that God raised him from the dead. Shall we quote it to prove that Christ did not speak the truth? or shall we seek a harmony? The Scriptures also declare, Gen. i. 1, that 'In the beginning God created the heaven and the earth.' But again, the Scripture speaking of the Son, saith, 'Thou Lord in the beginning laid the foundations of the earth, and the heavens are the work of thine hands.' Heb. i. 8-13. Also John i. 3—'All things were made by him, and without him was not any thing made that was made.' Therefore, while the Scriptures declare that God raised him from the dead, the apparent contradiction is gone when we read, 'But unto the Son he saith, thy throne, O God, is for ever and ever.'—Heb. i. 8. 'Then answered the Jews and said unto him, What sign shewest thou unto us, seeing thou doest these things? Jesus answered and said unto them, Destroy this temple and in three days I will raise it up.' The fulfilment of this sign fills us with admiration and joy. What a sign to the Jews!! What a sign to us!!! Heavenly Father, may it have a salutary effect upon our faith and life.

While some of my brethren whom I love, call this doctrine which I love and advocate a 'heathen doctrine,' they will bear with me when I say, I have as much confidence in its truth as Paul had when he said, 'We are confident, I say, and willing rather to be absent from the body and to be present with the Lord.' So I will conclude with Jude 25: 'To the only wise God our Savior, be glory and majesty, dominion and power, both now and for ever—Amen.' H. F. HILL.

Coming of the Son of Man.

The general sentiment of the following critical article we think is according to the truth of the Bible. We copy it from the 'Addenda' of A. Campbell's edition of the New Testament. The figurative comings of Christ, and the Jews hailing him as blessed, at his coming, we think incorrect. But the article contains so much valuable truth, we thought it duty to lay it before our readers. On 'this generation,' the article differs from the sentiments of many of our brethren. Let each imitate the noble Bereans, search the scriptures to know what is the truth in this case. Nothing but the truth will abide the day of trial, and much less the great day of the Lord Jesus.

"COMING OF THE SON OF MAN on the clouds of heaven." Matt. xxiv. 27, 37, 39, 30, xxvi. 64; Mark xiii. 26; xiv. 62; Luke xxi. 27. Whether this "Coming of the Son of Man" denotes a literal, or a figurative coming, is a question which has, recently, been much agitated. Since the days of President Edwards' History of Redemption till now, it has been a commonly received opinion, that there are four comings of the Son of Man spoken of:—of these, two are literal, and two figurative—his coming in the flesh: his coming to destroy Jerusalem; his coming to destroy the works of the Man of Sin, and to reign with his saints a thousand years on earth; and his coming to judge the world at the last day.—The first and the last are said to be literal and personal comings, the others figurative.

The question before us is purely a literary one: and for the following reasons it would seem to us that, however we may talk of a figurative coming, either at the destruction of Jerusalem or of the apostasy, the phrase, as it is found in Matthew and Luke, must denote a personal and literal coming of the Son of Man:—

1. On leaving the temple for the last time, Matt. xxiii. 39, he told the representatives of the Jewish nation that their house, or temple, was soon to be deserted, and that they should not again see him, till the day they would say, "Blessed be he that comes in the name of the Lord." After going out of the temple, this coming is made the subject of conversation between him and his disciples in private, chap. xxiv., and of course must be explained to them in the sense in which it was expressed in the temple; and there we learn it was such a coming, or return of the Savior, as could be seen by the Jews—"You shall not see me" till a particular day.

2. The Apostles ask, "What shall be the sign of thy coming?" and as they must have understood him in the sense he delivered himself in the temple, he would answer them in the same sense: for had they misunderstood him, he would have corrected them, as his manner was. The conversation was then about a personal, and not a figurative coming of the Son of Man.

3. As his going away, or his absence, was not figurative, but literal and personal, so must his return, or coming, be literal and personal, else there is an application of words in a double sense in one and the same period: and if so, rules of interpretation are wholly unavailing.

4. But the coming of the Son of Man introduced Matt. xxiv. could not apply to Jerusalem's ruin; for the Jews did not then see him, nor say to him, 'Blessed be he that comes in the name of the Lord,' which he declared would be the case when he would next come. As they have not yet thus addressed him, we are assured that he has not come in the sense of Matt. xxiii. and xxiv.

5. As the Lord addressed the Scribes and Pharisees as representing the nation, so he addresses his disciples as representing his body, the congregation of saints: and after telling them, in order, the things that must happen them and the nations before the coming of the Son of Man, he places that event (Luke xxi. 27, and Matt. xxiv. 27,) after the destruction of Jerusalem, the dispersion of the nation, and the long persecutions and sufferings of the real followers of the Lord.

6. When they should see these signs, they were taught to rejoice, inferring that their deliverance, or redemption, drew nigh. But this deliverance has not yet arrived; consequently, the Son of Man has not yet come on the clouds of heaven.

7. But this coming cannot be secret, or figurative, for it will be as visible and striking as the lightning which, breaking forth from the east, shines even to the setting sun—"so shall the coming of the Son of Man be."

8. Neither is it spoken of as if there were a plurality of events called 'comings of the Lord,' but as one and singular—The coming of the Son of Man.

9. Again, as Daniel the prophet is quoted in reference to the desolations coming upon the city and sanctuary, it is natural to suppose that the disciples would also remember that Daniel had placed the coming of the Son of Man at the destruction of the little horn, when the "thrones are cast down," and "the beast was slain, and his body destroyed and given to the burning flame," and therefore could not be led to think that "the coming of the Son of Man" was either figurative, or to be at the desolations which came upon Judea.

10. But as seven parables are introduced, in this discourse, to explain the coming of the Son of Man, or the Savior's return: and as the last of them is on all hands agreed to denote a personal, and not a figurative coming, we are compelled to the conclusion, that the coming so often mentioned and so fully explained, must always be one and the same, which the last of the seven parables certainly makes literal and personal. These seven parables, or comparisons, all found in one and the same discourse, relative to one and the same coming of the Lord, are, first, the parable of the fig-tree: from this he teaches them to know when his coming is near—second, the days of Noah and the deluge, sudden and unexpected by the world; "So shall the coming of the Son of Man be"—third, the parable of the thief; "Be ye also ready: for in such an hour as you think not, the Son of man comes"—fourth, the parable of the faithful and unfaithful servant; "The master of that servant shall come in a day when he looks not for him"—fifth, the parable of a marriage, or of the wise and foolish virgins; "Behold the bridegroom comes: go out and meet him"—sixth, the parable of the talents; "After a long time, the lord of those servants comes, and reckons with them"—seventh, the parable of the sheep and the goats; "When the Son of Man shall come in his glory," or in the clouds, he will gather the Gentiles, all the nations, before him, and separate the good from the bad. The coming of the Son of Man is always kept in view, in these seven comparisons: and if we regard any one of them as literal, we must so regard them all.

These are a few, and but a few, of the reasons which incline us to regard this coming of the Son of Man as not figurative, but literal; and not at the time of the destruction of Jerusalem, but at the close of the times of the Gentiles.

To this import of the phrase, the most plausible objection is drawn from the saying, This generation shall not pass, or fail, till all these things be fulfilled. But, as it will be seen under the word 'generation,' in the judgment of lexicographers, and some able biblical critics, the word genca signifies not only the race of living men on the earth at one time, but nation, people, or race, as a distinct and peculiar stock or family. Indeed, the word generation, at the time of the king's version, signified nation, or people, very frequently, as will be seen by examining the following passages: Proverbs xxx. 11-14; Psal. xxiv. 4-6; xiv. 5; xxvii. 30; cxii. 2; 1 Pet. ii. 9; compare Jer. ii. 28, 31; vii. 28, 30; Deut. xxxi. 29; xxxii. 5. "A nation void of counsel," is at another time called "a froward generation;" a peculiar people is also called a chosen generation. To this it may be added, that the word translated kindred is often, in the Septuagint, this same genca, at other times translated generation. From all which it appears that our Lord meant no less than that the nation, or race of people amongst whom, and in reference to whom, these things were spoken, should continue to exist, notwithstanding all their desolations and dispersions, till he came again, and they should hail him as blessed, coming in the name of Jehovah.

Fairs, etc.

This is emphatically a day of fairs. The secte, from the mother of harlots down to her youngest daughter, according to their pecuniary wants means and corruption, hold them. They are held to raise funds to build and adorn chapels, or, so called, churches; to feed and clothe ministers; for the benefit of orphans; for the famine stricken Irish; for the poor seamen; to aid discharged convicts; for home and foreign mission purposes; and for every moral benevolent and religious object which now moves the great and popular portion, and pleasure loving mass of the church and world. The moral, benevolent, and religious machinery of these times has become so costly and unwieldy—the covetousness of the people so great, and their love of pleasure so strong, that there is no other way to raise the money necessary to keep the machinery in motion, then to appeal to the unsanctified passions and unholy appetites of community. This has been done by fairs, donation visits, pic-nic parties, pleasure excursions, &c. &c., under the name of morality, benevolence, and religion.

The real character of ALL these last-days' feasts, fairs, parties, &c., for the 'lovers of pleasure more than lovers of God,' is too well known to need description. Suffice it to say, that worthless articles are sold at fairs for enormous prices; and not unfrequently, if not uniformly, deception, a species of gambling, vanity and mirth, are their characteristics. There can be no good but much hurt in all such gatherings and practices.

But the end, says one, may sanctify the means: that is, the money to be raised is for a religious or benevolent object, therefore there can be no harm in obtaining money in this way. But we ask, does God carry forward his cause by sin, or by an appeal to the unholy passions and appetites of depraved mortals? Does he do it by unjust gain? can a bitter fountain send forth sweet water, or a corrupt tree bear good fruit? does he call upon us to do evil that good may come? No, no, no; but assure us that the 'damnation is just' of those who say that his word justifies such a principle. Rom. iii. 8.

O may we all, who are looking for the appearing of our Lord, and all others, stand aloof from these bewitching sins of these last times. What we have to give for the cause of God, or suffering humanity, let us do it freely, out of principle, because we see and feel it duty; and not because we have been moved by the influence of a fair, donation or pleasure party to do it.

Horrors of War.

That the horrors of war are dreadfully horrible, no one seems to dispute, especially when their own countrymen, neighbors and dear kindred become its victims. But there are some other things which, if not as horrible, are, nevertheless, very horrible to the consistent conscientious christian. And some of these are, the contradictory doings and sayings of the great mass of the ministry, religious editors, and members of the church of these degenerate and strange times. In time of peace, they indiscriminately mingle with the military—become officers, chaplains, and soldiers, and give their influence and support to the system of war. But when a practical result of that system is realized at home, then these very persons are first and foremost in raising the cry—"Christianity shudders at the recital of these sanguinary struggles, and mortal combats. When will christianity, with its original peacefulness and love of man, put a final and eternal stop to the rage of wars, and the wholesale butchery of man."—Christian Herald.

When will christianity do this work? Never, so long as the world stands, and its professed advocates with their practice uphold the system of war: such dolorous words as the Herald and the whole editorial corps have recently uttered, will never do it. But, says the same Herald—

"Christians are bound to pray, and act as they pray, that peace may be restored to the world; that this continent may be delivered from the scourge of war, and from all the demoralizing, debasing, and distressing results, which always follow in its train. Sad is the comment on man's nature and disposition, that arises from the field of carnage and blood. It can never be allied to Christianity, but must forever be set down as the result of a want of the spirit of Him who came preaching peace to him that is afar off and to him that is nigh."

"Christians are bound to pray, and act as they pray"—very good words indeed, far better than the practice of that people whose organ uttered them: for they with their kindred sects are the supporters, the very bone and sinew of the system of war.

To present in their true light these horrible absurdities, we must understand that in time of peace, the church upholds the system of war; and in time of war, sends her members into the field to fight, and her ministry into the army and navy to pray for victory; but as soon as blood begins to flow in the deadly strife, then the cry is heard from every quarter—"horrors of war!"—"murderous!"—"when will christianity put a final and eternal stop to the rage of wars!"—"Christians are bound to pray," and "act" for the peace of our country.

If war is as abhorrent to the christianity of the Herald and similar papers, as they now pretend, why, in the name of consistency and humanity, do they not fearlessly hoist the peace, the non-resistant, the no war flag? Ah, they are the last ones to do this,—and instead of doing it they will, rank and file, take the field against the humble few of the non-resistant around them. And though they do not fight them with sword and ball, they deal out from the press of slander the hated epithets of disorganizers of all human governments, come-outers, disturbers of good order, &c.

Oh, what inconsistency! what blindness has come over the great mass of religionists of our world. Nearly their whole theory of religion is not only at war with the peaceful truths of the Bible, but it conflicts with itself: it at one time leads its advocates to create, and put the deadly engines of war in successful motion, and then immediately calls upon them to pray for their destruction! "O miseris hominum! oh, pectora caeca!" "How wretched are the minds of men, and how blind their understanding."

THINGS TO REMEMBER.—On controverted subjects let the proposition be distinctly stated, and then do not wander from the question. Let the following distinctions be clearly made in your testimony—1st. Positive and divine,—2d. human or historical,—and 3d. inferential. And let each disputant, and every reader remember that no point is proved, no position is sustained, where the first, the positive or divine testimony, is wanting. Remember these things, and you will escape many hurtful errors, into which writers and speakers, readers and hearers will most surely run if they do not carefully observe them.

CORRESPONDENTS.—W. Sheldon: As your article is a repetition of what we have frequently published, and as we are crowded with other matter, we have thought best to decline publishing yours.

S. J. R.—The reason we omit certain remarks is because the 'Queries' of 'Simon' seem to make it necessary. You will understand us.

A certain communication, from a certain place, 'in behalf of the church,' warning community against certain professed advent lecturers, we cannot publish without a signature. All such communications should bear the names of those concerned in sending them for publication, or be signed by the minister or some efficient member, and by order of the church.

We never should say, the Bible is untrue, Christ was a false teacher, if this or that doctrine, conclusion, opinion, or inference is incorrect. Let God, his word, his Spirit, and his well beloved Son, be true without an if.

Our receipts for a few weeks past have been very limited. We want them increased.

Corruptions of Shakerism.

A little more light, in the way of disclosures of their dark doings, will be shed upon the Shaker fraternity in our next. Let those who may be troubled with this delusion look well before they leap. Be patient, and hold on to the truth a little while longer, and we will, by the aid of truth and facts, so bring the hidden things of dishonesty corruption and darkness of that deluded people to light, as to cause you to flee with pious horror from the snare they have deceitfully laid for your feet.

We will now notice one or two of the many presumptuous contradictions of God's word, which appear in the Day Star, the organ of the Shakers, for Apr. 21st. This wandering star says—

"The Lord himself shall descend, not the man himself: or, if you please, the Lord (Christ Jesus) himself, not the man (Christ Jesus) himself."—But the Lord says,—"And they shall see the Son of man coming" &c. Matt. xxiv.

This Star of the Shakers says, "Our divine Savior was no more seen by Paul, in his manhood, I believe, than Moses or Joshua." But Paul says,—"I have I not seen Jesus Christ our Lord." ; Cor. x. 1.

This Star says, "Christ is not constituted of flesh and bones; and never was, nor never can be seen by the natural eye." Christ has said,—"Behold my hands and my feet, that it is I myself: handle me, and see; for a spirit hath not flesh and bones, as ye see me have." Luke xxiv. 39. "Then said he to Thomas, Reach hither thy finger, and behold my hands; and reach hither thy hand, and thrust it into my side: and be not faithless, but believing. Jno. xx. 27.

This blasphemous wandering star says, "God made the last Adam male and female [viz: Christ & Ann Lee] and called their name Christ. The elements of the New Creation were in disorder until the woman [Ann Lee] appeared—bearing the same cross, and living the same life that the man [Christ] did—she participated in the same mental anguish and travail of soul, and shared the same spiritual gifts. Such is the spirit developed in our Mother" Ann!!

Alas, what blasphemy! But few if any more daring and painful specimens can be found in the dark history of the Man of Sin, who has taken his seat in the temple of God, and most impudently blasphemed the holy and reverend name of the Omnipotent God. Beware, beware of these snares of the devil—Christ has told you, that false Christs, and false prophets would deceive, if possible, the very elect.—Take heed to yourselves, and shun their deceptive and wicked devices.

CORRESPONDENCE.

LETTER FROM BRO. B. B. BRIGHAM.

NORTH PLAINS, Mich., March 27th, 1847.

DEAR BRO. MARSH—Four weeks ago to-day I returned from a very interesting meeting of eleven days, which by request I attended, in the north part of Eaton county in this State. The settlers are scattered, but they attended from five to seven miles distant. Three or four other ministers of different orders were present; excepting one lecture, none of them preached. Such a general opening of the eyes, ears and mouth to receive the word with all readiness of mind—such searching the Scriptures daily whether those things were so—such a fullness of the blessings of the gospel filling my own soul—and such powerful manifestations of the spirit, I have never seen excelled. Six or seven, for the first time in their lives, came out boldly for Christ. Several more obtained faint hopes—many backsliders were reclaimed—and a goodly number of old soldiers concluded to take the whole armor of God and give up their creeds. The subjects discussed were the fallen state of the nominal church—the same sins in the Gentile, that the Savior exposed in the Jewish Church—grievous wolves in sheep clothing, catching and scattering the flock by their creeds and traditions of men—despising the laws of the king, such as 'Be not called Rabbi,' 'Break every yoke,' 'Thou shalt not kill,' not even the Mexicans—'Swear not at all.' The wicked 'close their own eyes and stop their own ears.'—Acts xxviii. 27. The day of Christ 'nigh, even at the doors'—'There is balm in Gilead and a Physician there.' The only charge yet brought against me is, for 'preaching new things.' Such I am ready to confess but not to forsake. I am now astonished that I have so long feared the reproaches of Christ. O what riches! Not even in the days of my first love and espousal had I such a rich flow of rejoicing, as in suffering reproaches for preaching the gospel of the kingdom. Paul took pleasure in reproaches, that the power of Christ might rest upon him. Says Peter, 'If ye be reproached for the name of Christ, happy are ye—for the spirit of glory and of God resteth upon you.' In relation to the same case Jesus says, 'Rejoice and be exceeding glad.' The primitive saints 'rejoiced that they were counted worthy to suffer shame for his name's sake.' Many of my dear brethren in the ministry I am persuaded are convinced that the advent doctrine in the main is, after all true. Some privately acknowledge it. O that they would come out and own Christ and his word before this wicked generation, perishing for lack of knowledge. In vain may we expect grain to bring forth fruit till it fall to the ground and die. Says a successful revivalist, 'I thank God, I die daily.' 'We are killed all the day long'—'In all these things we are more than conquerors.'

From advent brethren in this State I hear nothing. I am all alone in a waste howling wilderness. Can you not send some one to come over and help us? Such laborer may depend on a compensation preferable to the treasures in Egypt. I am as one born out of due time—know but little, can do but little. The last sands are running out, and we are on the verge of the period when he that is filthy and unjust must be so still. Some of the hitherto most sceptical now think some tremendous event is about to burst upon us. Unworthy as I am, my prayer is, 'Fly swiftly round ye wheels of time and bring the welcome day'—what I hope to see Jesus and many who have been with him in his temptations, looking for him to appear the second time unto salvation, among whom, I trust, is a precious family of believers near Yorkshire, who when I was a stranger they took me in, naked and they clothed me. They are known no doubt to yourself as well to Bro. Morley. I request that prayers may be made in the church without ceasing that efforts in my own neighborhood may be successful.

B. B. BRIGHAM.

LETTER FROM BRO. M. CHANDLER.

EMERALD GROVE, W. T., April 24th, 1847.

DEAR BRO. MARSH—I have now received ten dollars from you—five dollars at two different times. I would also acknowledge the receipt of four dollars from the church at Seneca Falls. I am making arrangements to spend my time in travelling every where I can to preach the gospel of the kingdom of God at hand. I feel, as ever, like devoting my whole time and my whole soul, and all I have in the cause, and am ready to comply with all the calls from abroad, as far as in me lies. I have no other interest but in God's work. I have sacrificed my all to God's care for a number of years, but I have nothing to mourn for in this respect except my unfaithfulness, and that I had no more to sacrifice; but the Lord pardon wherein I have been unfaithful, and help me to be more faithful in the future.

I think every sign speaks in thunder tones that the Lord is soon to appear. O! what manner of persons we ought to be in all holy conversation and godliness—looking for and hastening unto the day of God.

I have appointments four weeks ahead, then I expect to take a tour in Illinois, if the Lord will. I should be very happy to see some of the Lord's faithful servants this way; but the Lord direct. O how soon our labor will be done—and if well done we shall receive our reward. The Lord still give you wisdom in giving meat in due season to the scattered flock.

I feel grateful to the dear brethren who have aided me their free-will offerings. The Lord reward them at the resurrection of the just. I shall endeavor to spend all to the glory of God.

Your brother, as ever, looking the King of glory,
MOSES CHANDLER.

LETTER FROM BRO. J. Y. BUTT.

COAL RUN, O., April 7th, 1847.

DEAR BRO. MARSH—I have just laid down from perusing the last number of vol. 13th of your valuable paper, and I can truly say that it has been to me as cold water to a thirsty soul.—It is cheering to the hearts of the little flock that is scattered abroad in the dark and cloudy day, and who are looking for the speedy return of their Lord, to make up his jewels, to receive a word of consolation from those of like precious faith; and I have thought that perhaps, before another volume of the 'Voice' shall close, the dear saints may be freed from all their conflicts with the world, the flesh and the devil, and privileged with immortal tongues to talk over their fears and sufferings here, and raise their voices to swell the heavenly anthems.

I heartily approve the course you have pursued in conducting your paper; your position of 'nigh even at the door,' I believe to be the only scriptural position that can be taken as to time: maintain this, my brother, fearlessly, and God will be with you. From it our opposers never can drive us. It is a basis as immovable as his throne, and God will soon vindicate it by the appearing of Christ in his glory.

The fixing upon the definite point of time with dogmatical assurance, I regard as being dangerous in the extreme. I have seen its desolating influence, carrying with it the blight of death, and my prayer is, that God may save his scattered children from its withering influence. The design of the great enemy is to divide and scatter the true children of God. This he often does by creating unscriptural tests, this we have realized to our sorrow as a people in the past; and O my brethren let us not be ignorant of his wiles; he is yet the roaring lion that goeth about seeking to destroy. Let us mark and have nothing to do with those who are striving to sow dissensions, and make divisions among us. They are the enemies of our hope, and as such let us regard them, however flattering may be their profession.

Another subject demands our attention.—The present, and future condition of the soul. In regard to this, I perceive there is much difference of sentiment: none deny I presume but what on this point brethren may honestly differ. If this be so, let us not condemn one another for an honest difference of opinion. The spirit that cannot tolerate a brother because he sees a little different from himself, is bigoted in the extreme.—It is not the spirit of Christ. 'Therefore judge nothing before the time, until the Lord come, who both will bring to light the hidden things of darkness and will make manifest the councils of the hearts, and then shall every man have praise of God.' 1 Cor. iv. 5. My faith remains unshaken in the truths which we possess. Jesus may come to-day and he must come soon. This is my motto, and this to my mind the true word of prophecy clearly demonstrates. It is not from one chain of prophecy alone that I draw this conclusion, but from the whole combined: the prophecy of Dan. 2d, 7th, 8th, 9th, 11th, and 12th chapters, together with the seals and trumpets of Revelation, with the age of the world and fulfillment of the signs, &c. &c. fully prove the event to be 'nigh, even at the doors.' Let us heed, then, the exhortation of our blessed Lord: 'And take heed to yourselves, lest at any time your hearts be overcharged with surfeiting, and drunkenness, and cares of this life, and so that day come upon you unawares; for as a snare shall it come on all them that dwell on the face of the whole earth. Watch ye therefore, and pray always, that ye may be accounted worthy to escape all these things that shall come to pass and to stand before the Son of man.' Luke xxi. 34-36. I am still engaged in proclaiming the soon coming of the 'same Jesus,' that ascended, and expect to do so if God gives me strength and grace, until the trumpet ceases to be sounded in Zion and the watchmen retire from the walls.

The cause in this section of country is gradually progressing. On Lord's day last we had the pleasure of receiving four into the church, two of whom went down into the water acknowledging the Savior in his ordinance. We had a refreshing time. May the Lord continue to bless his word.

Yours in the blessed hope,

JOHN Y. BUTT.

GENESEO, April 26th, 1847.

DEAR BRO. MARSH—I have just returned from New York. I found the church where Bro. Jones is pastor, enjoying much of the good spirit. He has a large and intelligent congregation, who appear to be rooted and grounded in the faith. I gave them three discourses on Sabbath, the 18th inst.; and although I was sick with a cold, yet it was easy talking where so much of the good spirit prevails. I did not see S. S. Snow, but was informed that he is still preaching to quite a large congregation—that he still claims to be Elijah—and many believe in him. I saw a woman in Brooklyn, who claims to be doing the same work assigned to Elijah. I have seen a number of such persons of late, who, like Korah, (Num. 16th ch.) are seeking self exaltation, and are raising a loud cry against Br'n Miller, Himes, Marsh and others, some of them are already overwhelmed, not in the earth as Korah and his company, but in their own corruption and pollution. O may 'the censers of these sinners against their own souls,' 'be a sign to the true Israel.' Num. xvi. 37-39. May this unhallowed fire be driven away. Such persons can never receive Jesus. Hear Christ's testimony: 'I am come in my Father's name and ye receive me not; if another shall come in his own name, him ye shall receive. How can ye believe, which receive honor one of another, and seek not the honor which cometh from God only?' John v. 43, 44.

H. F. HILL.

Abide in me and I in you.—JOHN XV. 4.

These words are extracted from a parting discourse, delivered on a most thrilling and interesting occasion. The blessed Redeemer having concluded his public ministry and eaten the last supper with his disciples, gives them by example a lesson of humility by washing the feet of every one. He exhorts them to love—xiii. 34, 35:—'A new commandment I give unto you, That ye love one another: as I have loved you, that ye also love one another. By this shall all men know that ye are my disciples, if ye have love one to another.' He proceeds to comfort them: xiv. 1—'Let not your heart be troubled: ye believe in God, believe also in me.' He reminds them of the glorious reward laid up for them in heaven: professes himself the way, the truth and the life, and the only medium of access to the Father. He promises them in his absence, the visit and constant presence of the Divine Comforter, the spirit of truth; he bequeaths them peace and consolation: he then under the parable of a vine and branches goes on to show the union between the church and himself: He the vine and they the branches. Shows the possibility of members of that church, through negligence and unfaithfulness, being discarded and destroyed, and states the condition of our continuing therein, by our text and verses in connection, xv. 2, 3—'Every branch in me that beareth not fruit he taketh away; and every branch that beareth fruit, he purgeth it, that it may bring forth more fruit. Now ye are clean through the word which I have spoken unto you.' (The reception of the words of the Lord in an honest and good heart purifies the soul, and renders it productive of good fruits.) Abide in me and I in you. As the branch cannot bear fruit of itself except it abide in the vine, no more can ye except ye abide in me. I am the vine, ye are the branches: he that abideth in me and I in him, the same bringeth forth much fruit; for without me, (severed from me—margin) ye can do nothing. If a man abide not in me, he is cast forth as a branch, and is withered; and men gather them and cast them into the fire, and they are burned. If ye abide in me and my words abide in you, ye shall ask what ye will and it shall be done unto you. Herein is my Father glorified, that ye bear much fruit; so shall ye be my disciples. If ye keep my commandments, ye shall abide in my love; even as I have kept my Father's commandments and abide in his love. Now let us try to show

1. What doth the command 'abide in me' comprehend?

2. The blessedness consequent upon obedience to this command.

1. The injunction 'abide in me,' comprises an implicit, complete, and constant obedience to Christ's commands; a course of conduct and action in strict accordance with his rules and precepts; an imitation of his life in ours, faithfully walking in his heavenly footsteps, under every circumstance, adverse or prosperous, to our lives' end. The command is given to his disciples; they are already grafted into him, and it is to those only who have put on Christ that it is applicable. (This conversation was had when Judas had left them.) Now let us attend to what Jesus says to us, who have taken upon ourselves his name and profession; who have enjoyed his spirit's visitations; believed upon him and received pardon, and now rejoice in prospect of his speedy appearing to our full and eternal salvation. In order to spiritual progress here and sure reward in the heavenly kingdom, it is all-important, it is indispensably requisite and binding upon us, that we abide or stay in him according to the directions of his holy word. Here are some of them: xiv. 15—'If ye love me, keep my commandments;' 21 and 23 verses—'He that hath my commandments and keepeth them, he it is that loveth me; and he that loveth me shall be loved of my Father, and I will love him, and will manifest myself to him. If a man love me, he will keep my words; and my Father will love him, and we will come unto him, and make our abode with him.' xv. 12, 17—'This is my commandment, that ye love one another, as I have loved you. These things I command you, that ye love one another.' 1 John ii. 1-3—'My little children, these things write I unto you that ye sin not; and if any man sin, we have an advocate with the Father, Jesus Christ the righteous; and he is the propitiation for our sins—and not for ours only, but also for the sins of the whole world: and hereby we do know that we love him, if we keep his commandments.' (This evidence is a thousand times worth more than the most flaming profession.) 4, 5—'He that saith, I know him, and keepeth not his commandment, is a liar, and the truth is not in him; but whoso keepeth his word, in him verily is the love of God perfected: hereby know we that we are in him.' Bible perfection is perfect acquaintance with and obedience to the word: 6-11, 15, 17 and iii. 7—'He that saith he abideth in him, ought himself also to walk, even as he walked. Brethren, I write no new commandment unto you, but an old commandment which ye had from the beginning. The old commandment is the word which ye have heard from the beginning. Again, a new commandment I write unto you; which thing is true in him and in you, because the darkness is past and the true light now shineth. He that saith he is in the light and hateth his brother, is in darkness even until now. He that loveth his brother abideth in the light, and there is none occasion of stumbling in him; but he that hateth his brother is in darkness and walketh in darkness, and knoweth not whither he goeth, because the darkness hath blinded his eyes. Love not the world neither the things that are in the world. If any man love the world the love of the Father is not in him. And the world passeth away and the lust thereof, but he that doeth the will of God abideth for ever. Little children, let no man deceive you: he that doeth righteousnes is righteous, even as he is righteous.' Again, brotherly love: xiv. 18-24—'We know that we have passed from death unto life because we love the brethren. He that loveth not his brother abideth in death. Whosoever hateth his brother is a murderer: and ye know that no murderer hath eternal life abiding in him. Hereby perceive we the love of God, because he laid down his life for us; and we ought to lay down our lives for the brethren. But whoso hath this world's good and seeth his brother have need, and shutteth up his bowels of compassion from him, how dwelleth the love of God in him? My little children, let us not love in word, neither in tongue, but in deed and in truth. And he that keepeth his commandments dwelleth in him, and he in him. And hereby we know that he abideth in us, by the spirit which he hath given us.' The spirit which works in us to will and to do of his good pleasure. Many other Scriptures might be quoted where denial of self, the duties of unceasing prayer, fasting, the virtues of patience, &c., are inculcated; and acts of charity and kindness to all men, especially the poor and afflicted and despised; the possession and exhibition of meekness and humility, &c. &c.—with such Scriptures I will hope the reader is acquainted. The amount is, having once made a sacrifice of self and all we have upon God's altar, there they shall remain. Rom. xii. 1—'I beseech you therefore, brethren, by the mercies of God, that ye present your bodies a living sacrifice, holy, acceptable unto God, which is your reasonable service.' Let me interest the reader to take his Bible just here, and peruse the whole of this golden chapter. Have we begun well? Let nothing in the strength of grace divine divert us from the heavenly path. 'No man having put his hand to the plough and looking back, is fit for the kingdom of God.' Thus, abiding in Christ by patient and unwearied continuance in all well-doing, we have full claim to the glorious and inestimable promise, 'I in you,' which introduces the second part of the subject.

2. The blessedness consequent upon obedience to this command. Every thing needful and good and profitable for us here, is ours on asking for; for Jesus' words are true, and abiding in him—there is nothing in the goodness and wisdom of God to give his children, but is our own just claim: John xv. 7—'If ye abide in me and my words abide in you, YE SHALL ASK WHAT YE WILL, AND IT SHALL BE DONE UNTO YOU.' Is wisdom needed? James i. 5—'If any of you lack wisdom let him ask of God, that giveth to all men liberally and upbraideth not, and it shall be given him.' Is grace wanted or strength? His store is exhaustless, his power is omnipotent. Christ himself, who bore our burdens, who in all points was tempted as we, and who is ever touched with the feelings of our infirmities, but who overcame all—he dwells in us by his spirit. Crucified with him, dead to the world, these lives we live not ourselves, but he lives in us. Through him, we conquer as he conquered, and inherit life eternal. What words can we find to afford any worthy idea of the great salvation, wrought for the faithful disciple of Christ? The Son of God, whom angels adore, and by whom the heavens and earth were made, takes upon himself the form of man, suffers and dies to redeem a people from death. But this is not all: see Heb. ii. 1-5—'Therefore we ought to give the more earnest heed to the things which we have heard, lest at any time we should let them slip. For if the word spoken by angels was steadfast, and every transgression and disobedience received a just recompense of reward; how shall we escape if we neglect so great salvation; which at the first began to be spoken by the Lord, and confirmed unto us by them that heard him; God also bearing them witness, both with signs and wonders, and with divers miracles and gifts of the Holy Ghost according to his own will? For unto the angels hath he not put in subjection the world to come, whereof we speak.' Let us try, if we can, to fathom Paul's conception of the greatness of this salvation. Here is a world to come, to be in subjection to some; not to angels: 6-8—'But one in a certain place testified, saying, What is man, that thou art mindful of him? or the Son of man that thou visitest him? Thou madest him a little lower than (a little while inferior to—margin,) the angels; thou crownedst him with glory and honor, and didst set him over the works of thy hands; thou hast put all things in subjection under his feet. For in that he put all in subjection under him, he left nothing that is not put under him. But now we see not yet all things put under him.' We do not yet see all things put under man: but what do we see? ver. 9—'But we see Jesus, who was made a little lower than the angels, (like man was; in all things he was made like unto his brethren—amazing love!) for the suffering of death, CROWNED WITH GLORY AND HONOR,' the MAN Christ Jesus! and he, exalted, crowned now, is a pledge of man's future exaltation: ver. 11—'For both he that sanctifieth and they who are sanctified are all of one; for which cause he is NOT ASHAMED TO CALL THEM BRETHREN!' As Jesus is high exalted, his brethren will partake of his exaltation; we shall reign with Him if we suffer with Him here. From this chapter and other Scriptures we may form some idea of the transcendently glorious destiny of redeemed man: It is verily a GREAT SALVATION; a marvellous work of God in Christ which angels desire to look into. Oh! never neglect this great salvation; but, 'beloved brethren, be ye steadfast, unmovable, always abounding in the work of the Lord, forasmuch as ye know that your labor is not in vain in the Lord.'

H. HEVES.

Queries.

1st. By the life that Paul lives in the flesh, by 'faith of the Son of God'—did he mean his natural life, or had he reference to a spiritual life? If he meant his natural life, why need he have faith in the 'Son of God,' to live it?

2d. If the commandment, 'Thou shalt love the Lord thy God,' &c., does not demand death in any sense—what does Paul mean, when he says, 'I was alive without the law once, but when the commandment came, sin revived and I died?' And the commandment which was ordained I found to be unto death; for sin taking occasion by the commandment deceived me, and by it slew me.'—Rom. vii. 9-11. Is this death by the commandment in any sense? Was Paul slain by it and yet alive to it? Or did he use the terms 'life' and 'death' metaphorically or figuratively, when there can be (as some say) no such doctrine as spiritual life and death drawn from such metaphor or figure?

3d. How can an individual be 'begotten' and 'born of God,' and yet only have a 'metaphorical' life, which is just no life at all?

Will Bro. G. Needham solve those queries, and tell us how a person can be 'begotten' and born of God' and not have life, 'spiritual life?' SIMON.

EARTHQUAKE.—Our village was visited by a shock of an earthquake on Tuesday night last, April 13th, at about 12 o'clock. It was so severe as to awaken many of our citizens from sleep. Those who witnessed it, describe the phenomenon as first emitting a sound like that of distant thunder, which was followed by a strong vibratory motion of the earth continuing for about a minute. As might be expected, an occurrence, so unusual in our latitude, occasioned some temporary alarm. The sound appeared to come from the south, and it is probable that the shock was more severe in that direction. A few years since a similar shock was experienced in Genesee and Monroe counties.—Mt. Morris Spectator.

General Aspect of the World.

We have no great taste for terrors, and no sympathy with that morbid love of the marvellous and the horrible, which finds an appalling omen in every change of moon. But a dislike of prognosticators of evil should not carry us so far, as to lead us to shut our eyes upon the aspect of this world's affairs, and the tendency of events which are transpiring around us. And when at the safe distance at which we stand from the tumult and strife, we "peep at the Great Babel," there is no resisting the conclusion that something is about to happen. It is not from the prevalence of a vague apprehension, nor from the speculations of inexperience, which always sees its own day as the most extraordinary in the world's history, that we arrive at that conclusion. The times are eventful; facts already exceed every day experience, and things are in a position which render change unavoidable. The man of worldly wisdom who sees it with an uneasy apprehension which he dares not utter, and would fain escape; and the diligent student of Scripture, who traces the unrolling of the great vision of prophecy, and piously watches the dealings of God with his church and the world, are agreed in this, that something is about to happen. The Christian, the philanthropist, the philosopher and the statesman, are alike wound up to a point of wondering anticipation, and each feels that a year or a month may altogether transform the aspect of the world, and entirely change all its political and social arrangements. We are particularly struck with this in looking over the recent periodicals of Europe.

Politicians, who two years ago would have asserted confidently that a great war was thenceforth an impossibility, and whose principles are utterly repugnant to any resort to arms, are all waiting for the onset. The question with them seems to be, not "will there be a general war," that is settled, but "from what quarter will the note of battle break forth—on what occasion or pretext will the first blow be struck?" The Christian and the philosopher are sitting together in dread suspense, in expectancy of a mighty war of principle—a conflict of opinions. Rival forces are every where mustering, and all are girding on their armor for a desperate crisis. No one has any thing fixed and definite in view—no one knows what it may be, but every one believes that something is about to happen.

We are at a loss where to begin, in making a hurried exhibition of the prodigies with which the whole social atmosphere is teeming, or the portentous facts that have already been developed. Shall we look first at the national and providential manifestations of startling and ominous import? Look, then, for example, at the failure of the supply of food in old and densely populated countries—and look at it not in the superficial aspect of present suffering, terrible though it be. This is no occasional and temporary scarcity. It has long been tending to this, and now it demands extensive and thorough changes of some kind or other. The case of Ireland will show what we mean. There human existence was gradually reduced to the lowest possible scale. It was madly staked "on a single anchor, and that anchor has failed." And what then? Are we to apprehend nothing further than so much fearful privation, and so many fearful deaths, in the mean time, until relief shall be found in the next year's crop? And is all that we have to do to forward such temporary supplies as we can, to mitigate the present starvation? Let us ask one question and you will perceive that the case is much more alarming than this: Where is the next year's crop to come from? How is it to be produced? There are not sound potatoes enough for seed. If there were, they would not be planted. If they were planted, could the crop be depended on? Production there has ceased under old and existing arrangements, and so far as these are concerned, next year must be worse than this. And it is so to some extent in other countries. Not only are present supplies cut off, but to a greater or less extent the means of future production are diminished. What a prospect does this open to us! It is an unquestionable fact that amid present sufferings, preparations for the future are impracticable or neglected. In addition to this, look at the prospects of pestilence following in the footsteps of famine. Every mail we may look for the fatal tidings that the cholera is in Europe; nay, it need not surprise us if in a few months we read in the New York papers a daily bulletin from the cholera hospitals. It is travelling on more swiftly and deadly than before, in the track by which it formerly reached us.

Turn we now to the political aspect of nations, as indicating that great and radical changes are irresistible. And where shall we begin? Turkey, Egypt, China and Mexico stand prominently forward, but they are merely the most prominent, and not the only instances of nations waiting for the decisive impulse. Or shall we look at those international relations which threaten a general resort to arms. Are not the best cemented diplomatic relations in Europe thrown into irretrievable disorder? The Montpensier marriage—the infamous affair of Cracow—the schemes of Russia—the attitude of Turkey, like a chicken fluttering in helplessness, with a trembling consciousness that the hawk is making its preparatory gyrations over head, the very paternal look of Austria towards Italy, are so many circumstances which are influencing the future arrangement of the field, and settling the position of the combatants? We have not space even hurriedly to enumerate a host of such circumstances in the affairs of Europe, and in European relations to Asia.

We have not space at present to point out the signs of preparation for a universal conflict of opinion: but it is coming. What a conflict! Look at the state of the English Church, and the renovation of Jesuitical influence on the continent of Europe. The rising tide of infidelity in Germany and surrounding nations. The restless, agitated and impatient temper of mind generally, of which the German Catholic reformation, as well as the Scotch Free Church movement, and other movements of a kindred character are tokens—of which the king of Prussia's preparation to give his people a constitution guaranteeing the rights of conscience, is a fruit. All these are either mustering notes, or preparatory movements which the reflecting mind will ponder. We have not accomplished what we intended in this article. Our materials are too bulky to be compressed within our limits; but these few hints may provoke thought and inquiry. Doubtless they will enforce a conviction that this is no time to be supinely dreaming and slumbering. It is high time to awake—to gird on our armor—to plant our posts of observation—to watch and pray.—Mich. Christian Herald.

A Chapter on Mistakes.

1. Persons who write long articles for family newspapers make a great mistake, when they expect them to be generally read.
2. Writers who select subjects of controversy, are greatly mistaken if they suppose that a protracted discussion will interest a majority of readers.
3. Writers who extend obituary notices much over half a column, are greatly mistaken if they imagine that they secure the attention of one-half the general readers.
4. Those who write only a few lines to indicate respect for the deceased, are greatly mistaken if they suppose their brief notices will be overlooked.
5. Writers of careless habits are greatly mistaken if they suppose an Editor has nothing to do but to correct their miserable punctuation and orthography, and remodel one-half their clumsy sentences.

6. Writers of indolent habits are greatly mistaken if they think that printers can decipher scratches as readily as they can well-formed letters.

7. Writers of verses are greatly mistaken when they suppose that an Editor will always think as highly of their productions as they do themselves. His taste may be at fault.

8. A writer whose article may be declined is greatly mistaken when he charges the Editor with prejudice and partiality.

9. Any reader who may suppose we mean him in any one of the above paragraphs will be greatly mistaken, as we write not with individual preference.

10. Unless we are greatly mistaken, it will be well to stop at this point.—Methodist Prot.

Be not over curious in prying into mysteries; lest by seeking things which are needless, we omit things which are necessary. It is more safe to doubt of uncertain matters, than to dispute of undiscovered mysteries.

Eternal Life.

"I give unto them Eternal Life."—CHRIST.

I want to live always, I ask for to stay,
With Jesus my Savior, the Truth and the Way;
The few fleeting moments allotted us here,
Are given that we with our Lifemay appear.

I ask to live always, yet fear not the tomb,
For the smile of my Lord dispenses its gloom,
And soon His sweet voice would bid me arise
To meet him, my loved One, descending the skies.

I ask to live always, to dwell with my God,
On the earth when redeemed—the saints sweet abode;
To range with delight o'er its peaceful plains,
When Jesus in glory eternally reigns.

I ask to live always, and joyfully greet
The friends that I love, where in harmony sweet,
Our songs of rapture may unceasingly rise
To our Savior and King, in sweet Paradise.

I ask to live always to mingle in song
With seraphs and angels—a bright happy throng;
To join in the shout that through Eden will ring, Hosanna to Jesus our glorious King. M. D. W.

Pre-millennial Advent.

BY CHARLES BEECHER.

A writer in the Evangelist, Jan. 21st, 1847, confesses "that there is at the present day, particularly in England and in continental Europe, a wide-spread tendency to lax unscriptural notions respecting the duration of future punishment," and that in our own country, "in the non-evangelical or latitudinarian sects, and among those persons—wherever they may be found—who are not deterred from presumptuous speculation by the example they see of its result, there is a strong pre-disposition to get rid of the explicit testimony of the Scriptures respecting the awards of eternity." That this presumptuous speculation is not confined to non-evangelical sects the Evangelist is doubtless well aware. There is much importance then truly to answer the question he raises. "What is the cause of this universalist tendency?" To the causes he assigns, I will not object, viz: 1. "Materialist philosophy." 2. "Transcendental philosophy." 3. "Mechanical, or fatal philosophy." Doubtless these are exerting a vast though subtle influence. But I will venture to inquire whether there be not co-operating with these a fourth, far more unsuspected and fatal? viz: a false system of interpretation. Is not the system of interpretation logically necessary to the denial of the pre-millennial advent, directly calculated to accomplish the ends of Universalism? viz: eradicate from the Bible any "promise of his coming," any "day of judgment," any "resurrection?" Is it not a system insensibly conducting to what the writer calls "the earliest forms of Unitarianism," "Socinianism," "and the extravagances of Theodore Parker?" I will endeavor to show that it is, and that with no ill-will. But because I truly believe that the Evangelical Protestant Churches are not half so safe from skepticism on this and other vital matters as they think themselves, but are secretly, subtly, though surely, drifting down to infidelity. And it becomes every watchman to sound the alarm.

1. Take the parable of the tares. The millennium is a time of universal righteousness. Christ and the saints do reign, and Satan is bound, take it literally or figuratively. It is a day when Satanic agency ceases, "and he deceives the nations no more." It is also ushered in by the destruction of the Papal "Horn."

Now this parable of the tares shows us the enemy, the Devil, sowing tares among the wheat. And we are told that the tares and the wheat grow together till the harvest. And "the harvest is the end of the World." At that time the Son of man sends forth his angels, severs the wicked from the just, and the righteous shine forth.

Now either this "end of the world" is the end of the Gospel age, and the beginning of the millennium, or else you are reduced to one of two alternatives.

1. A millennium, during which the children of the kingdom and the children of the Devil grow together. Or,

2. To spiritualize the "end of the world"—the "sending forth of angels," and severing the wicked from among the just.

But what sort of a millennial reign would that be where the children of the kingdom and children of the Devil grow together? And how can the children of the Devil grow after he is bound? Are they literally the seed of the serpent, propagated by "ordinary generation" even after the "Old Serpent," himself is bound? Or are they his seed by his "working in the hearts of the children of disobedience?" How can he work when he is bound? And either way, what sort of a millennium does this make? "When ALL are to know the Lord, from the least even to the greatest?"

Apparently this millennium would be more unaccountable than that which Prof. Bush and the papists, locate some where in the dark ages.

Will it be said that our Savior's language does not imply an uninterrupted growing together?—that there may be a temporary separation, and a remingling? What a desperate resort is this! What hardihood? To call ten centuries a temporary cessation! And that our Lord meant not "until the harvest," but "until within ten centuries of the harvest." And furthermore, in the post-millennial apostasy there is no sign of the tares and the wheat "growing together." Satan goes up to deceive the nations, Gog and Magog, and they are deceived, and environ the camp of the saints, and are consumed. There is not a word of any "growing together."

Hence to avoid the pre-millennial advent, the only resort is to spiritualize the angel reapers—spiritualise the "severing of the wicked from among the just"—spiritualise the "casting into a furnace of fire," the "gnashing of teeth," &c.—even as Universalism would fain have it. And why should you not? You have spiritualised greater things. You who have muttered more potent charms of hermetic magic; have found no "promise of his coming" in Dan. vii, nor Isa. lxvi. No resurrection in Isa. xxv. xxvi. No judgment in Psalm xcvi. No advent in Psalm xcvii. Surely you should not be deterred from so simple a feat of spiritual legerdemain as this.

And you cannot eschew it while denying the pre-millennial advent. Hence I would suggest to the editor of the Evangelist, that the present popular system of interpretation in the Evangelical Churches is the logical parent of Universalism. It is a system every day enacting feats of exegetical wrestling and turning, in reference to the Return of the Jews and the pre-millennial advent, compared with which the performances of Bush and Swedenborg cease to excite wonder.

Life and Death.

NUMBER IX.

In giving the positive testimony, I shall do but little except quote from God's blessed word. I shall not dissect man to avoid a conclusion nor compound him to favor a theory. And I call on my brethren who dissect man, to maintain their theory without it if they can. When they will do this, I will believe they are right and I am wrong.

Job asks, iii. 11—"Why died I not from the womb? 11th verse—"For now should I been still and quiet, I should have slept: then had I been at rest,"—'or,' continues he, 'as an hidden, untimely birth, I had not been: as infants which never saw light. There the wicked cease from troubling, and there the weary be at rest; there the prisoners rest together, they hear not the voice of the oppressor. The small and the great are there, and the servant is free from his master.'

Here Job says if he had gone where 'the small and great are,' he would have been as infants which never saw light. I ask if such are conscious?

Job vii. 21—"And why dost thou not pardon my transgression, and take away mine iniquity? for now shall I sleep in the dust, and thou shalt seek me in the morning, but I shall not be." If Job were in Sheol could not the Preserver of men find him? and would he not 'be,' just as much there as if he were on earth? The fact is, if the man Job "returned to dust," he would not be.

Job x. 20—"Are not my days few? cease then and let me alone, that I may take comfort a little before I go whence I shall not return; even to the land of darkness and the shadow of death; a land of darkness, as darkness itself; and of the shadow of death without any order, and where the light is as darkness." Job xiv. 10—"But man dieth and wasteth away: yea man giveth up the ghost, and where is he? As the waters fail from the sea and the flood decayeth and dryeth up, so man lieth down and riseth not; till the heavens be no more they shall not awake, nor be raised out of their sleep."

Psa. vi. 5—"For in death there is NO remembrance of thee; in the grave who shall give thee thanks?" In the light of this plain, positive declaration, how can any brother say Christ told the thief they should both be, that day, where there would be 'remembrance of God?' Psa. xiii. 3—"Consider and hear me, O Lord my God: lighten mine eyes lest I sleep the sleep of death." Psa. xxx. 9—"What profit is there in my blood, when I go down to the pit? Shall the dust praise thee? Shall it declare thy truth?" To conform to the doctrine of consciousness it should read, 'When my body goes down to the pit and my soul to heaven or hades!' Psa. xxxi. 17—"Let me not be ashamed, O Lord, for I have called upon thee: let the wicked be ashamed and let them be silent in the grave." Psa. xlix. 15—"But God will redeem my soul from the power of the grave.' How could it be redeemed from the power of the grave except it had been under that power? Psa. lxxxviii. 10-12—'Wilt thou shew wonders to the dead? shall the dead arise and praise thee? shall thy loving-kindness be declared in the grave? or thy faithfulness in destruction? Shall thy wonders be known in the dark? and thy righteousness in the land of forgetfulness?' Psa. cxv. 17—'The dead praise not the Lord, neither any that go down into silence.' Psa. cxlvi. 4—'His breath goeth forth, he returneth to the earth: in that very day his thoughts perish.' To avoid this, it is said that 'thoughts' mean 'plans,' 'purposes,' etc. That is an easy way to dispose of a troublesome truth: but I should fear God would reprove me if I was to take such liberties with his word. If God meant 'plans,' or 'purposes,' why say 'thoughts'? I confess it does pain me to my very heart's core, to see such evasions of the plain teachings of God's word!

Eccl. iii. 19, 20—'For that which befalleth the sons of men befalleth the beasts: even one thing befalleth them.' What is that? 'As the one dieth so dieth the other; yea, they have all one breath, so that man hath no pre-eminence above a beast; for all is vanity.' 'All go to one place—all are of dust, and all turn to dust again.' Here it is asserted that man and beast both go to one place—to the dust, just as God told Adam it should be. How philosophy contradicts God's word! Eccl. vi. 6—'Yea though he live a thousand years twice told, yet hath he seen no good: do not all go to one place?'

Eccl. ix. 3—'Yea also, the heart of the sons of men is full of evil, and madness is in their heart while they live, and after that they go to the dead.' This undoubtedly is spoken of the wicked. But it does not affect the argument; for it is asserted by men that they do not go to the dead but to the living: i. e. it is simply a change from one state to another—all that now have a conscious agency still having the same. How opposite to the word!

Verses 5, 6—'For the living know that they shall die, but the dead know not anything; neither have they any more a reward, for the memory of them is forgotten. Also their love and their hatred, and envy, is now perished.' What can be plainer than the above? Shall we throw this Scripture away? Does any one say this is not the inspiration of God? If it is not, it is time we found it out, and that the writings of Solomon were uncanonized. This a certain Professor of Theology in Ohio did. He knew not how to meet the arguments on this side of the question without, so with one fell sweep of his magic wand, Job, Proverbs, and Ecclesiastes, were all hurled from the sacred canon. That was doing up the work quick. But a desperate cause requires desperate means. There is one other way to evade the last passage: 'It means,' says the objector, 'the dead bodies of men don't know anything!' Very well; have it so—then we will read it with your emendation: 'The living bodies of men know they shall die; but the dead bodies of men know not anything!' How much the living bodies of men do know, don't they?

Ver. 10—'Whosoever thy hand findeth to do, do with thy might; for there is no work, nor device, nor knowledge, nor wisdom, in the grave [Sheol] whither thou goest.' Some things here demand particular notice. 1. Man goes to Sheol. 2. Sheol is not the grave strictly, or place of deposit of the dust—but the word has the same signification in Hebrew, as Hades in the Greek. So Gesenius gives it, but in no case of the grave. 3. In Sheol there is no work, device, wisdom, or knowledge. Hence every assertion that there is consciousness in Hades, of righteous or wicked, is as baseless as air, and in direct contravention of Scripture. It has been admitted by an advocate for the intermediate state, that Sheol and Hades were one and the same, yet he says the dead are conscious there, and they have knowledge. Let me repeat: the Hebrew text has Sheol, and says there is no knowledge there. I hope if this meets that brother's eye, he will stop and ponder the truth well before he again asserts that Christ and the thief both went there on the day of crucifixion, in a state of consciousness. Here I take occasion to say there is not a single clear, positive assertion on the other side within the sacred canon. All the evidence on the other side is purely inferential; so that, as Bro. Morley well remarked, there is but one side to this question.

Isa. xxxviii. 18—'For the grave cannot praise thee, death cannot celebrate thee: they that go down into the pit cannot hope for thy truth.'

1 Cor. xv. 18—'Then they also which are fallen asleep in Christ are perished'—i. e. if there is no resurrection. 'This also is direct testimony. But some say 'their bodies have perished.' Well Paul must have greatly enlightened his Corinthian brethren then, to tell them just what they all knew and every body else knows. With or without a resurrection their bodies had already perished. 'But they do not have their reward without a resurrection,' says one—'that is the sense in which it is to be understood.' I know it; but they either go right to God where 'there is fullness of joy, or they go to Sheol, where there is no work, device, knowledge or wisdom, and the Bible tells us the latter. Then without a resurrection they perish. This makes me glory and rejoice in the faith of the resurrection! Christ has brought life and immortality to light by his resurrection! Glory to God in the highest!

Your brother and companion, waiting for a final deliverance from Sheol, Keber, Hades, Mnemion, Thanatos and every other foe.

GEO. NEEDHAM.

"Fasting and Prayer."

A day of fasting and of prayer has been appointed (March 24th) by the British Government, for the benefit of the suffering poor in Ireland and Scotland, where famine and pestilence are sweeping them off by thousands! A writer in the Boston Courier, April 1, '47, thus quaintly remarks:

"This cheap remedy has probably been suggested by the noble, self-denying lords, and the humble and pious Bishops. Now may it not be reverently asked, whether such an act might not have been advantageously preceded by some small curtailment of luxuries on the part of those opulent members of the Government? The slaughtering a few thousand of their fat horses* and hounds, would have done much towards saving from starvation the poor Irish and Scots.

"If one horse consumes as much as nine men of the products of the earth, there would be so much added annually to the food of the poor in addition to the flesh proceeding from the first sacrifice, and the dogs' food in proportion. But then, what would the sporting lords and Bishops do with their time?

This fasting and praying, coming as it does from rulers, seems to imply that they are exempt from all blame in this matter. They would have it understood that the sufferings of their poor subjects is a visitation of Providence. But why in the name of justice, human or divine, should that visitation come upon the poor and ignorant alone, and leave unscathed the opulent and powerful? Do they mean to say that Providence is partial, and visits the poor alone with its vengeance? Why not all indiscriminately, as with earthquake and plague? Perhaps the favor which Madame de Milbraie expected for nobility in Heaven, is expected by the noble Lords and pious Bishops on earth. That lady said once, (what a burlesque or blasphemy) in relation to a noble Lord in France noted for his wickedness, 'That God would think twice before he damned a man of his rank!'

* THERE ARE ONE MILLION THREE HUNDRED THOUSAND HORSES IN ENGLAND, EACH OF WHICH CONSUMES THE PRODUCE OF AS MUCH LAND AS WOULD FEED FOUR OR FIVE MEN. THE NUMBER OF POOR IS UNKNOWN; BUT LIKELY FAR EXCEEDS THE NUMBER OF HORSES; THE EXPENSE OF ALL WHICH, MUST FAR EXCEED THAT OF IRELAND IN THE SUPPORT OF BUT SIX MILLIONS OF INHABITANTS! AS WILL READILY BE PERCEIVED.

"Although I have often heard very devout prayers," continues he, "which seemed to me a great piece of impertinence, the prayers of the law-favored and wealthy rulers of England, is the greatest piece of hypocrisy, pious fraud, and blasphemy I have heard of since the prayers of the Holy Inquisition at an Auto da Fe."

"There is," says the Hampshire and Franklin Express, "trouble with Ireland that lies further back than the present failure of the potatoe crop. She is trampled in the dust by the British throne and aristocracy; priest-ridden by the Papal hierarchy; crippled by partial and oppressive legislation, and burdened with a war—debt—taxes, imposed by the angry conflicts of the British Lion for centuries past. The British Throne must take the case in hand, and do something for the permanent elevation of Ireland, or suffer the rebuke of the civilized world." The writer seems insensible that her end has come—that her wearied sun is going down in long and deep eclipse, and that it is now too late to redress the wrongs of centuries.

"Mr. Labouchere, secretary for Ireland, made the following statement in the House of Commons: 'Potatoe crop, ordinary produce, £15,000,000 sterling; loss this year, three-fourths, £11,230,000. Oat crop, ordinary produce, £14,000,000 sterling; loss this year, one-third, £4,666,000. Total loss, £15,896,000, or about $80,000,000 worth of food cut off from the ordinary supply of six millions of people! A people the worst fed, the worst housed, and the worst clothed of any in Europe.'

We believe it. What an appalling, heart-rending picture is presented us by our distinguished countryman, E. Ihu Burritt, an eye and ear witness of what he communicates from Ireland. Let every one read and weep, as did our Lord over Jerusalem, for the calamities that have come upon that poor, distressed country and other countries, and that are fast coming on the world. Lu. xxi. 26.

"After all, the distress in Ireland," continues the Express, "has not yet reached its limits, but from accounts appears only to have just begun. Before another crop can be raised, the granaries of the world must be opened to their relief, and their contents poured upon this starving nation." 'Another crop! Poor man! he seems little aware of the character and contents of that 'cup' of the Divine wrath which is now being poured upon this doomed world. Jer. xxv.

Starving nations! yes, alas, more than fifty thousand poor creatures have already fallen in the dark, deep waters of death! and others are falling, fast falling to rise no more. When or where the mighty current will be staid, none can tell! We believe the Lord is now 'doing his work—his strange work,' (Isa. xxviii. 21,) which will not end till the final consummation—till the earth is 'thoroughly purged' of the curse beneath which it is groaning, and 'all things are made new.' Rev. xxi. 5. That event, glory to God, is just upon us! Who is ready?

The London times, speaking of Ireland and its claims, says, "That the people of England have most culpably and foolishly connived at this national iniquity. They have ruled her with a savage and tyrannical sway, casting out age, infirmity, disease and every form of weakness and bereavement, to perish; while the fat of the land, the flour of its wheat, its milk and its honey, flowed from its shores in tribute to the ruthless absentee. It is all drain and no return.

The land owner is allowed to sweep away the produce of the earth without leaving even a glean- ing for them that are ready to perish. And Eng- land has stupidly winked at this tyranny. Ready enough to vindicate political rights, but not to avenge the poor, they have allowed Ireland to be crushed into a nation of beggars. Their blood will be required at the hands of their oppressors.

Rumbolt, in the time of Charles II. said, 'he could not conceive that the Almighty intended that the greatest part of mankind should come into the world with saddles on their backs and bridles in their mouths, and that a few should come booted and spurred to ride them to death.'

We once heard it remarked some thirty years ago, by one who was supposed to be well acquaint- ed with the history of that proud nation, its fraud and oppression, both at home and abroad, that he should not be sorry to hear that the Island of Great Britain was sunk, were it not that many innocent people must suffer! 'When England's account with God is settled,' says the American Family Journal, 'woe unto her.' Suppose ye that Eng- land, deep as is the stain of her guilt, stands alone convicted at the bar of God, of oppression and in- jured innocence? 'I tell you nay!' Luke xiii. Woe also to other nations and to the world when their account is settled.

How astonishing, that a just, avenging God, should have borne so long with such a nation, such a world! Is Providence partial? does he visit the poor alone with his vengeance? No; the op- pressor is only reserved for greater and more sig- nal punishment, according to his works. Matt. xvi. 27. The Lord will enter into judgment with the ancients of his people and the princes thereof—for ye have eaten up the vineyard, the spoil of the poor is in your house. What mean ye, that ye beat my people to pieces and grind the faces of the poor? saith the Lord. Isa. iii. 14, 15. Shall I not visit for these things? saith the Lord; and shall not my soul be avenged on such a na- tion as this? Jer. v. 9. I will get me unto the great men, saith the Lord, and will speak unto them. Jer. v. 5. Go to now, ye rich men, weep and howl for your miseries that shall come upon you; ye have heaped treasures together for the last days. Behold the hire of the laborers, which have reaped down your fields, is of you kept back by fraud, crieth; and the cries of them which have reaped are entered into the ears of the Lord of Sabaoth. Jas. v. He will speak unto the proud and lofty cedars of Lebanon, oaks of Bashan, whose head is full of silver, gold, horses, chariots, idols. As pride goeth before destruction and a haughty spirit before a fall, so the loftiness of those men shall be humbled, their haughtiness made low, and the Lord alone exalted in that day. Isa. ii.

Yes, as God is just, a day of retribution is com- ing. It is near; it hasteth greatly; called the day of the Lord of hosts, when he ariseth to shake terribly the earth.

As to a small curtailment of luxuries on the part of those opulent members of the Government, the slaughtering a few thousand of their fat hor- ses and hounds, as suggested by the correspond- ent of the Courier, seems to correspond better with the word of the Lord than that cheap reme- dy, 'hypocritical fasting and prayer.' Matt. vi. 16. Is not this the fast that I have chosen: to loose the bands of wickedness, to undo the heavy burdens, and to let the oppressed go free, and that ye break every yoke? Is it not to deal thy bread to the hungry, and that thou bring the poor that are cast out to thy house? when thou seest the naked, that thou cover him; and that thou hide not thyself from thine own flesh. Isa. lxxiii. 6, 7.

Much as we deplore the calamities which rock and oppress the earth from centre to circumfer- ence—war, famine, pestilence, earthquakes, tor- nadoes, fires, floods,—we find them so many di- vinely appointed messengers, fulfilling God's word—the wages of sin; chastising a wicked world; precursors of the great consummation, the world's catastrophe and final judgment!

Heaven and earth, says our Lord, shall pass away, but my words shall not pass away. Matt. xxiv. 35. However calamitous and distressing to this lost world, all must be fulfilled—the jots and the tittles not excepted. Matt. v. 18. So God hath greatly, wisely purposed.

Thrice happy he, who without a tear, the gather- ing storm can view, unmoved, amid the wreck of matter and the crash of worlds! Amen, even so, come Lord Jesus. Rev. xxii. 20.

Conference Meetings.

BRO. MANSU—I send you the following 'brief hints concerning the manner of conducting con- ference meetings,' from the Morning Star:

"1. Go to the Conference, or other meetings, for the purpose of honoring God and not yourself.

2. Let your exhortations be short and compre- hensive, and never speak unless you have some- thing to say of practical importance.

3. Let most of the time be spent in prayer, but let not the prayers be long. Always have some particular and definite object in view, and pray earnestly for that: do not seek to include every topic that can be thought of in one prayer.

4. Sing frequently, but not too long; usually not more than a verse or two at a time.

5. Avoid all coarse, quaint, and vulgar expres- sions. Speak sincerely and plainly, without af- fectionation. W. C."

To these let me add a hint or two:

1. Never try to pray to God over a guilty con- science—confess and you shall be cleansed. Sins need not be named or described before others un- less they are already known.

2. Exhort others instead of talking much about yourself.

3. Remember that 'the preparation of the heart and the answer of the tongue is from the Lord.'

4. Wait in patience and humility upon God, with no disposition to dictate concerning your feelings.

5. If slavish fear prevent you from enjoying the delightful exercises of conference and prayer, remember God is able and willing to take it away—but it will cost the sacrifice of your pride root and branch.

6. When you think of exhorting, let the idea of duty be as far from your mind as the Priest and the Levite were from the man who fell among thieves. BUTLER MORLEY.

The Judgment.

DEAR BRETHREN—When we reflect that if Christ be ordained of God to be the Judge of quick and dead, how miserable will Christless souls be at that day. They that are Christless now, will be speechless, hopeless and helpless then. How will their hands hang down and their knees smite together! O what pale faces, quivering lips, fainting hearts and biting consciences, will be among them in that day! Oh, astonishing sight, to see the world in a dreadful conflagration! the elements melting, the earth trembling, the thrones cast down, the Ancient of days come, the judg- ment set, a great white throne like the fiery flame, the books opened, and one like the Son of man coming in the clouds of heaven! these things should strike the mind with thoughtfulness. Ah, who shall abide this day but those that by union with Christ, are secured against its danger and dread.

Of all the business that mortals have in this world there is none so solemn, so necessary and important as to be prepared for the judgment. Surely it concerns us, seeing we look for such things, to be diligent that we may be found of Him in peace. O, let not that day come by sur- prise upon us! Is Jesus appointed Judge of quick and dead at his appearing and kingdom? then let us all look to it, that hope to be found of him in peace, that we avoid sin and daily practice those duties to which the consideration of that day pow- erfully persuades us. Do we indeed expect such a day? O, then, let us see that we are meek and patient under all injuries and abuses for Christ's sake. Avenge not yourselves, but leave all with the Lord who will take vengeance. Be patient, my brethren, unto the coming of the Lord. Jas. v. 7, 8. Be communicative, public-hearted Chris- tians; studying and devising liberal things for Christ's distressed members. Be watchful and sober—keep the golden bridle of moderation up- on your affections, and see that you be not over- charged with the cares of this present life. Luke xxi. 34, 35. But above all may God help us to be sincere in our profession. Oh that our hearts may be found in God's statutes, for this day will be the day of manifestation of all hidden things— nothing is so secret but that that day will reveal. Beware of hypocrisy, for there is nothing cover- ed that shall not be revealed, neither hid that shall not be known. Luke xii. 1, 2. We know that Christ was made a curse for us—but he did not come to be a cloak for sin. Oh keep your lives pure and clean! If you live in the spirit see that you walk in the spirit. Gal. v. 25. Now we, brethren, as Isaac was, are the children of prom- ise. Gal. iv. 28. Rejoice in the Lord always, and again I say rejoice. I. W. GOODWIN.

Signs of the Second Coming of Christ.

Some of which you will find recorded in Luke xxi. 11. And great earthquakes shall be in di- vers places, and famines, and pestilences, and fear- ful sights, and great signs from heaven. Also in the 25th verse of the same chapter: 'And there shall be signs in the sun and in the moon and in the stars, and upon the earth distress of nations with perplexity, the sea and waves roaring,' &c. These signs and many others were given by our blessed Lord, as indications of his glorious ap- pearing in the clouds of heaven, that his dear children might not be taken in the snare. Now! we ask, have not all of these signs appeared in these last days? It seems to me that every watch- ful Christian must say that they have—and that nothing remains now to be seen or heard but the powers in heaven to be shaken and the sign of the Son of man to appear, which I most solemnly believe should be looked for every moment, and then Jesus will come in great glory.

Now let us see if history does not record these great signs as spoken of by our Savior. Witness the four great earthquakes in the last century, from the years 1752 to 1756, destroying Lisbon, Cairo in Egypt, Adrianople and the city of Fez, burying beneath the ruins of these places 40,000 of their inhabitants: also, within a few years, the awful earthquake in St. Domingo, burying in its ruins 10,000 of its inhabitants; then, in 1846, we have it recorded of more than fifty earthquakes, as the Savior says, in 'divers places.' Surely this must be the fulfillment of his words. Then wit- ness that awful scourge, the famine, that has, since this century come in, prevailed nearly over the old countries—and now, in 1847, rages to an ap- palling degree in Scotland and Ireland, and in 'divers places.' Then witness the awful pesti- lences of these last days: the great plague of Lon- don and also of Constantinople and Egypt; and in 1832 the Asiatic cholera, which passed over our own land, and now this year is raging in Asia and is rapidly advancing toward Europe and Amer- ica. And great signs from heaven and fearful sights the Savior also said would be seen. In 1826 there was seen one of these fearful sights, viz: a broad arch of light spanning the whole heaven; another in Jan., 1837, the whole heaven having the appearance of fire. Now what do these things mean if they are not a fulfillment of the word of the Lord? Christ has spoken and his word will not fail. Look out, the Lord is coming—'be ye also ready.' I am looking this year for our Lord.

"The wise shall understand."

ROCHESTER, MAY 12, 1847.

We urgently request all who are indebted for their paper to make payment in part or in full, immediately. We expect to have some heavy bills to meet soon.

A quantity of No. 5 of our paper, containing our views on the Sabbath, is yet on hand. Let them be circulated where they are needed. They are free.

Great Apostasy.

NUMBER I.

That there has been a very great departure from the truth and simplicity of the gospel since the days of the Apostles of Christ, all admit. But since the Reformation commenced by Martin Luther has been going forward, the Protestant sects have generally supposed that they had returned to the primitive faith and purity of the gospel. Hence, any attempt to work a reformation among them has been met by the same bitter persecuting spirit which opposed Luther when first he began to correct the errors of the Catholic church. And should we attempt now, faithfully and kindly, to contrast the prominent fundamental doctrines and practices of the protestant sects with the plain word of the Lord, we shall doubtless disturb, to some degree, the repose of that same reform and truth hating spirit. But as the truth alone sanctifies and makes free, it must be told in love. . . faithfully, regardless of consequences.—It is our duty to proclaim the word of the Lord, in opposition to error, whether men like it or not.

The Protestant sects have repeatedly acknowledged their coldness, spiritual death, and moral corruption, and we as a people believe that they have told the truth in these things—but still neither we nor they, we apprehend, as a general thing, have really looked into the nature and depth of this corruption. It has been called a moral corruption—a spiritual death—a great dearth—a spiritual famine, &c. All this is very true when viewed in the light of effects of a certain cause. But the cause lies deeper. The sole, the real cause of all these evils is found in a departure from the faith, or the pure doctrine of God. As with an individual, so with a church, the works will correspond with the faith: if the one is impure the other will be corrupt.

Our object is not to notice all or any of the corruptions, or departures from the truth, peculiar to individual sects, but those which generally belong to the whole protestant church will claim our attention. And—

1. The being of God. With an exception or two, the sects all believe that "God is without body, parts, or passions." See Presb. Conf. of Faith, Meth. Discipline, &c.

What says the Bible on this point? It says that God created (not the moral man: for man creates his own moral character) the literal corporeal man out of the literal dust of the earth, in 'his own image' likeness or form. Gen. 1st & 2nd chaps. Christ is said not only to be 'the brightness of the glory of God, but the express image of his person.' Heb i. 3,

Col i. 15. Phil ii. 5, 6. Before man sinned, God walked and talked with him. In the new earth, 'the tabernacle of God will be with his people, and God himself shall be with them, and be their God.' Rev xxi Similar testimony to any reasonable amount might be offered; but this is sufficient: for it is plain and positive, and consequently makes the matter absolutely certain that the sects entertain very erroneous ideas about the being of God. Instead of believing him to be a real person, as the Scriptures abundantly teach, they hold him to be a spiritual, indefinable, inconceivable something, without form, parts, passions, or locality.

In this departure from the truth, we think we find the very germ of all the false doctrines now taught and believed by the church. When once they have taken the liberty to spiritualize away the real person or being of God, it has been an easy matter to spiritualize away his plain word, on any and every doctrine and practice, as circumstances seemed to demand.

2. The tri-personality of God. The leading or so called orthodox Protestant sects and the Catholics hold that God exists in three persons, or rather substances, relations, modes, offices, &c. They think that the Father is very and eternal God, that the Son is very and eternal God, and that the Holy Ghost is very and eternal God, yet, that these three very and eternal Gods constitute but one very and eternal God. Or in other words, the doctrine of the trinity forms the most conspicuous or important article in the creeds of all the 'orthodox' sects. But what is the plain scriptural doctrine on this point? We will quote a few texts.

1 Cor. viii. 4-7. 'There is none other God but one: for though there be that are called gods, whether in heaven or in earth (as there be gods many and lords many) but to us there is but one God the Father—and one Lord Jesus Christ' Eph iv. 6. 'One God and Father of all.' 1 Tim ii. 5. 'For there is one God, and one mediator between God and man, the man Christ Jesus.' These and other similar texts conclusively prove that there is one God. The following passages prove that this one God does not exist in a tri-fold sense, but IS ONE indivisible being.

Deut vi. 4. 'Hear, O Israel, the Lord our God is one Lord.' Mark xii. 29. 'The first of all the commandments is, Hear, O Israel; the Lord our God is one Lord.' Gal iii. 20. 'Now a mediator is not a mediator of one, but God is one.'

Wide indeed has been the departure of the church from the simplicity of the doctrine of the Bible relative to the being of God.

3. The locality of God. It is a common belief among the sects that God has no locality. They tell us that his 'centre is everywhere, and his circumference nowhere'—that he fills immensity, is as much in one place as another, &c.

But what say the Scriptures on this point? 'Thus saith the Lord, the heaven is my throne, and the earth is my footstool.' Isa. lvi. 1, Acts vii. 49.—Christ ascended to heaven, to his Father and God. Jno. xx. 17, Acts i. 10-11. Stephen saw the heavens opened, and the Savior standing on the right hand of God. Acts vii. 55, 56. He has sat down with his Father in his throne. Rev iii. 21. From whence God will send him, to this earth, in power and great glory, when the times of restitution shall come. Acts iii. 20, 21.

This testimony, about which there can be no reasonable dispute, conclusively proves that the church has widely departed from the truth relative to the locality of God.

4. The attributes of God. The 'orthodox' sects make the most prominent attributes of God to consist in hatred, wrath, anger, vengeance, or vindictiveness. They represent him as being so incensed on account of man's transgression, that nothing would appease his vindictive wrath but the death of his well beloved Son! But the blessed Bible is full of such strong assurances as these: God is love. 1 Jno. iv. 8. But God who is rich in mercy, for his great love wherewith he loved us. Eph ii. 4. For God so loved the world, that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in him should not perish but have eternal life. Jno. iii. 16.

Oh how wide the departure of the church from the truth in this respect. How this doctrine of vindictive wrath eclipses the lovely character of our kind and most merciful Creator. No wonder deceived millions have been led to hate instead of love a God of this character—and no wonder that so many who have professed to imitate him, have gloried in glutting their pious vengeance on those who have transgressed the rigid rules of their corrupt and superstitious dogmas.

We design to continue this comparison, the Lord willing, to the end of the long and dark catalogue of corruptions of doctrine and practice of which the sects are guilty. We do it, not because we rejoice in their wide departure from the truth, but because such painful things exist in the churches—and deceived thousands should know it, that they may timely escape these nurseries of error, cleave to the truth—be made free by it, and stand ready to meet their soon coming Lord and King in peace.

Pre-millennial Advent.

We are happy to see now and then men of talents and worth, in the different sects, making some important advances towards the truth. In addition to those previously named, we now mention Mr. Boynton, a Congregational minister in Cincinnati, O., and the Editor of the 'Watchman of the Valley,' a paper published in that city by the same denomination, who, if we understand them, avow their faith in the pre-millennial advent of Christ. It seems that Mr. Boynton is now delivering a series of lectures in Cincinnati on 'False Christs,' and expressing his warm approbation of these lectures, the editor of the Watchman says:

"It is one of the strong tendencies of human nature, in every age and country, to substitute false Christs and Saviors for that which is the only name given under heaven among men whereby men can be saved. This tendency is peculiarly developed by the circumstances of the present age, when everything seems rushing on with railroad speed—when expectation is on tiptoe, excited by the rapid succession of startling discoveries and inventions which are constantly springing up before it. For the minds of the best men to preserve their balance under such an influence, is no easy matter. Such signs and wonders as the present march of improvement develops, would deceive, if it were possible, the very elect, and lead them to trust to other resources than the power of the simple doctrine of the cross, to bring on the expected golden age of the world.

The watchword of the age in which we live is Reform. The great want of the age therefore is a Reformer Christ. This want, Satan—who is ever on the alert to rob God of glory and man of blessedness—promises to meet. He crosses your track everywhere with his busy agents—some of whom are men of real benevolence that are themselves deceived by his wiles—crying, Lo, here! or Lo, there! Behold, he is in the desert! or Behold, he is in the secret chamber! He anticipates the future works and purposes of God with his own counterfeit.—Before the first advent of the true Messiah, the expected redeemer of Israel, he was on the ground professing to be himself the promised Deliverer. So at the present time, when Christians are earnestly looking for the promised universal establishment of Christ's reign on earth, Satan is on hand, with his many inventions, by which he promises to usher in this glorious event. His great object seems to be to decoy the church of God into bye paths, away from the course which the gospel has marked out—to lead it to rely on other expedients than that which divine Wisdom has provided, and from which alone its hopes can be realized.

The millennial triumph of Christ is an event, which he would stave off, if possible; and what he cannot effect towards this end by force, he aims to secure by strategy. He professes to the hosts of the Lord the services of his own skillful leadership to conduct them to victory and glory, in order that he may betray them. To make the deception complete, besides professing the Christian's aim, he uses also his armor to some extent. He is the advocate of liberty, universal education, and of the glorious improvements of the age. These he magnifies into the very Christ of God, and thus by exalting the effect to the dignity of the Cause—the instrument to that of the Agent—the creature to the Creator—he subverts the true Christ, and with him the very source to which his boasted omnipotent agencies owe their existence."

AN IMPOSTER.—According to the testimony of Henry J. Shears and Bryant Sweet, Ameliasburg, C. W., and others, we say to our brethren in Canada, and elsewhere,—James McIntosh is unworthy of your fellowship as a minister or a Christian, on account of the pernicious doctrines he entertains and inculcates.

There is another man belonging in Canada who should not be countenanced as a lecturer. We shall give his name soon, if he does not desist from attempting to preach under the name of an 'Adventist.'

We say to all—let no man deceive you. There are misguided men now, in these days of perils and corruption, as there have been wolves in sheep's clothing in other days. They seek only to devour the flock.

Questions & Answers.

"Will you please to give an exposition of Matt. 23: 39. Also your views of the time the Jewish dispensation closed. J. Y. Butt."

"The time the Jewish dispensation closed," we think was when Christ on the cross said, "It is finished," and bowed his head and expired. He observed the law up to the night before his crucifixion; then the temple's veil was rent, and Paul tells us that the middle wall, the law, was then taken out of the way, by Christ nailing it to his cross. The law was then abolished; consequently the Jewish dispensation closed.

Matt. 23: 39 reads, For I say unto you, ye shall not see me henceforth, till ye shall say, Blessed is he that cometh in the name of the Lord.

These are the closing words of the Savior's last discourse to the unbelieving Jews, and immediately after uttering them he left the temple, and has not since then been seen by that stiff-necked people; neither will they see him again until he comes in power and great glory, when all who behold him will say, Blessed is he that cometh in the name of the Lord. Not that those identical persons who heard these words will see the Savior when he comes; but that portion of the nation or people who were addressed through their representatives, who will be living at his coming, will see him and make this acknowledgement. We do not understand that those who make this acknowledgement will be blessed: for many who will be lost, will then in that great day when they shall see the glory of him whom they have rejected, acknowledge him blessed; or say—Blessed is he that cometh in the name of the Lord.

'In the name of' means, by the authority of, At his first advent, Christ came not in his own name, was not self sent, but God sent him, hence he came in the name and by the authority of God. But the Jews rejected and crucified him, and looked upon him as stricken, smitten and cursed of God, or condemned to death by the law of God. Had Christ come in his own name, the blinded Jews would have received him, as they afterwards did false Christs, to their confusion. But the time will come, and we believe it is near, when not only Jews but Gentiles, all the living, good and bad, will see and acknowledge, some with joy, and many with the deepest anguish, that all that Christ has ever done has been in the name, or by the authority of God, and that he is the blessed of the Lord. O, may all humbly and joyfully acknowledge his righteous and saving power now, that in the great day of his majesty, power and glory, they may be accounted worthy an admission into his kingdom.

BRO. MARSH—Will you be so good as to answer in the voice of truth a few inquiries respecting certain portions of scripture. What is the heavens spoken of in Isaiah 34: 4. And all the host of heaven shall be dissolved, and the heavens shall be rolled together as a scroll, and all their host shall fall down as the leaf falleth from the vine, and as the falling fig from the fig-tree. Is it the same heavens mentioned in 2 Pet. 3: 12. The heavens being on fire shall be dissolved? [Note 1.] Is it what is called Babylon in Rev 19: 8, and she shall be utterly burnt with fire? [Note 2.] What will constitute the 'new heavens wherein dwelleth righteousness'? more than intimating that the old heavens had not righteousness. 2 Pet. 3: 13. [Note 3.] What is the heaven spoken of in 2 Thess. 1: 7 from which the Lord Jesus shall be revealed? and what is the fire spoken of in the 8th verse? is it literal or is it the word of God through his saints? [Note 4.] What kind of burning is that spoken of in Malachi 4: 1. [Note 5.] Is the new heavens mentioned in 2 Peter, the same as mentioned in Isaiah 65: 17? which is said in the 18th verse to be Jerusalem and her people. [Note 6.] How do you reconcile the coming of Christ or the day of the Lord as a thief in the night. 1 Thes 5: 2. As a thief disturbs nobody if he can help it, nor anything but the thing he takes. [Note 7.] Milton, N. Y., Apr. 7. C. DUBOIS.

Note 1. Both mean the literal heavens and earth.

Note 2. No. Babylon is an ecclesiastical body, of which the Catholic church is the mother, the whole of which will be destroyed or burned in the literal fire that will dissolve the literal heavens and literal earth, at the literal coming of Christ.

Note 3. The literal new heavens and earth.—Righteousness will dwell in them; not sin and oppression, as has dwelt in this old world ever since the fall of Adam.

Note 4. Literal heavens and literal fire. Mac-knight renders this passage thus, 'And to the afflicted rest with us, when the Lord Jesus shall be revealed from heaven with his mighty angels, inflicting punishment with flaming fire, on all them who know not God' &c. We may as well spiritualize the Lord, the heavens, the angels, the saints, the wicked, in this case, as the 'flaming fire.' Beware, brother, how you do either, lest you receive the doom of those who 'know not God.'

Note 5. Literal burning. If not, then the day, the proud, the wicked, the ashes, &c, are not literal: all are to be literally understood.

Note 6. Yes. But verse 18th does not say Jerusalem and her people are the new heavens. The plain meaning is, that Jerusalem and her people will be created a rejoicing in the new heavens and new earth.

Note 7. The thief comes 'to kill and to destroy,' and unexpected to his victim. Hence you and the Bible are at issue here. May we, my brother, not be among those on whom our Lord will come as a thief. I fear we shall, if we continue to tamper with his word in the manner that your questions lead me to fear you do. The Lord deliver you from the deceptive snare of spiritualism to which you are exposed.

The Cause.

Through this entire region, Western New York, the precious cause of the coming of Christ and his kingdom, is now actually suffering for want of faithful laborers to stand in its defence. The important field formerly occupied by Bro. Pinney, who is now sick, would furnish employment for one or more of the diligent servants of Christ. The extensive and highly important field till recently occupied by Bro. Bywater and Morley, is now without a laborer in it to do the work these active and worthy brethren have done.

We hope the scattered and tried brethren in these fields and elsewhere will do their duty—will keep up their prayer and conference meetings—will continue the faithful study of their Bibles—will read the advent publications—live lives of faith, prayer, and hope, and nothing shall harm them—and they will soon be gathered into the kingdom of their God, whom they now serve. But they have other duties to do: they should do what they can with their earthly substance to sustain a faithful laborer among them. There is wealth enough among our brethren in these rich and interesting fields to sustain two or more ministers of the everlasting gospel. And those who have the means, the Lord's money, should see that the cause of their Lord does not suffer on their account: they should bestir themselves—call a faithful minister among them, and then, so long as he fulfils his calling, they should see that his wants and the wants of his family are all supplied. Who among the Lord's stewards will take the lead in this good, this great and glorious work? and who among his ministers will come into these western fields, already ripe for the harvest? The Lord direct.

☞ We have concluded, the Lord willing, to enlarge our sheet at the commencement of next volume, without increasing the subscription price. Our expense however will be considerably increased.—Will our kind patrons aid us what they can in this work by paying what is now our due on subscription and by obtaining new subscribers? Who will respond to these requests?

☞ We are happy to learn by a letter on another page from Bro. E. R. Pinney, that his health is improving. May he soon be in the field again where his labors are much needed.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.—P. Hough: We have no recollection of using the words you think we have, relative to the 'parable of the ten virgins being the history of the advent' &c. We think you speak from memory, and are a little mistaken.—Please examine carefully, and inform us of the result.

G. W. B.—We think you will find by a careful examination that the predictions in Matt xxiv. 7; Mark xiii. 8, & Luke xxi. 10, 11, were fulfilled before the destruction of Jerusalem. Read the account given by Josephus of its destruction, and of the wars and fearful sights, signs and wonders, that preceded the overthrow of the Jews and their city, and we think you will see a literal fulfilment of these prophecies.

☞ Shakerism. The two communications on the corruptions of Shakerism, the one signed R. P. W., and the other J. N. B., we cannot publish without having the real names of the authors. All such disclosures should bear the name and residence of the person who makes them. We have long been convinced that there is no people on earth, more deceived, corrupt, hypocritical, and oppressive among themselves than the Shakers; and for the good of surrounding community, we have felt it our duty, at least to try, to bring some of their hidden things of dishonesty to light. And to aid in this work, we again call upon all who can, to give us well authenticated facts concerning them, or facts which the writers can authenticate, if necessary. And always let the real name of the writer accompany the communication.

CORRESPONDENCE.

Bro. B. Morley to Bro. H. F. Hill.
ON THE STATE OF THE DEAD.

BRO. HILL.—My object, in presenting the amount of evidence I did, to prove "the dead are not to be rewarded or punished until their resurrection, was, as requested by Bro. Marsh, at the time he published Bro. Lathrop's article, to give the Bible view of the state of the dead.

On this point you say, 'I humbly trust that all adventists believe that the dead are not rewarded or punished until the resurrection.' I should have been surprised at this remark if you had not qualified it, as you have by saying, 'We discard the idea that man enters into the heavenly kingdom at death; or that they are glorified with a crown before the appearing of Christ.'

Now, since the probation of both righteous and wicked ceases at death, and you believe they go immediately into a state of happiness or misery, I ask on what principle, except that of reward or punishment can they be thus rendered happy or be sustained in misery?

I argue, ~~on the other hand~~, that 'the dead (being in the grave) know not anything, neither have they any more a reward.' Eccl. ix. 5. In the 10th verse we have the exhortation, 'Whosoever thy hand findeth to do, do it with thy might; for there is no work, nor device, nor knowledge, nor wisdom in the grave whither thou goest.' Do not the pronouns 'thy' and 'thou' in this verse have the same extension of meaning? Can any valid reason be assigned for making 'thy' stand for the whole being, and 'thou' only a part?

In view of the obvious meaning of the two passages just quoted, I must still regard the two parts of my previous article as being very intimately connected.

Again; you say, 'Paul names Enoch among them who without us should not be made perfect.' Brother, let me request you to look again at Heb. 11 chap. Compare ver. 39 with ver. 13. Are they not parallel? 'These all died in faith.' This certainly does not include Enoch. So also the translation of Enoch and Elijah forms an exception to the otherwise universal rule of the two following passages: 'So death passed upon all men for that all have sinned,' and 'As in Adam all die,' &c. On the same principle 2 Kings ii. 11—'And Elijah went up by a whirlwind into heaven,' forms an exception to John iii. 13—'And no man hath ascended up to heaven,' &c.; besides Enoch and Moses I know of no other exceptions existing at the time John iii. 13 was uttered. You think 'Paul makes heaven and paradise two distinct places.—2 Cor. xii. 1-4.' Will you give some evidence that, 'caught up to the third heaven' and 'caught up into paradise,' do not mean the same thing? I understand paradise to be the same as 'the holy city, New Jerusalem.' It is so defined in the Revelation. 'The tree of life' is said to be 'in the midst of the paradise of God,' [ii. 7 compare xxii. 2, 14] where it is said to be 'In the midst of the street of the city and on either side of the river,' lining its banks. This city is declared by Paul to be above and 'the mother of us all.' John saw it 'coming down from God out of heaven.' Of course it is now with God in heaven. You will not say that Christ and the penitent thief entered into the New Jerusalem the same day of their crucifixion? I think the punctuation of this text is incorrect. The two following passages evidently are as they are found in most editions of the Bible. Matt. xix. 28—'Ye which have followed me in the regeneration.' Some editions have a comma after 'me,' which alters the sense very much. Also, Luke xiii. 24, 25, I think there should be nothing more than a comma between the two verses. So I think Lu. xxiii. 43 should be, 'Verily I say unto thee, today, thou shalt be with me in paradise;' or more literally—'Verily I say to thee, this day, with me thou shalt be in paradise,' which was an answer to the prayer of the thief, as New Jerusalem is to be the metropolis of Christ's kingdom.

You refer to 'Paul's account of these visions' as furnishing evidence of a separate, conscious state. But as he was not certain that he was 'out of the body,' the evidence is not positive. I suppose Paul's state must have been similar to that of Balaam's, when he made the remarkable prediction recorded in Num. xxiv. 17: also to that of Peter on the house-top. See Acts 10th chapter. But there seems to be no intimation of their being 'out of the body.' You quote Peter: 'I must put off this my tabernacle,' as evidence in your favor. When Christ showed Peter 'by what death he should glorify God,' he said, 'Another shall gird thee,' &c. This John interpreted to signify death.—John xxi. 18, 19. And Peter speaking of it says: 'After my decease,' &c. Now, brother, does not 'decease' mean death? But you emphasise 'my' in connection with tabernacle—'my tabernacle' as though Peter, 'the man proper,' continued living after his tabernacle was put off. If 'my' represents 'the man proper' in one of these passages, does it not in the other, viz: 'my decease.' Will you say that 'decease' does not mean death, or that death means continuation of life? I trust not. Stephen cries out when he is about to fall asleep, 'Lord Jesus, receive my spirit!' Did Stephen's tabernacle offer this prayer? On this point see the following: Luke i. 46 47 and ix. 25. You also adduce 2 Tim. iv. 6—'For I am now ready to be offered, and the time of my departure is at hand.' Here you seem to divide Paul into two parts, making the pronoun 'I' stand for his body, and 'my' for the other part which was a going to take a journey as soon as the 'I' was offered. Let me just say that 'dissolution is the primary definition of the word here rendered 'departure' which latter is used metaphorically. I understand the pronouns I, thou, he and she to stand for the person speaking, spoken to or spoken of.

You object to my exposition of 2 Thes. iv. 14. Mark the language—'Them also, [not only 'we' who 'believe' and 'are alive,' &c.] but them also which sleep in Jesus will God bring with him.' Brother, does that part which goes to paradise 'sleep'? You would answer, No! But is not the promise to 'them' (or as you would say that part of 'them' which sleeps? Yes. Now let us read the next verse: 'For (explanatory) this we say unto you by the word of the Lord, that they which are alive and remain unto the coming of the Lord shall not prevent (or ascend before) them which are asleep.' Mark the location! He does not say the saints who are up in paradise shall not come down with God, before we ascend, but 'we shall be caught up together with them in the clouds to meet the Lord in the air.' The two words rendered 'being with' in ver. 14th, are rendered 'gathered together' in Matt. xxiv. 28 and Luke xvii. 37. It might then read, 'Those also who sleep in Jesus will God gather together with him.' I think what follows ver. 14th fully justifies this translation. I understand Zech. xiv. 5, and Jude 14, to be spoken of the descent of the Lord and the saints from air to earth.

You said, 'When we come to difficulties or apparent contradiction, we must believe, seeking an explanation, knowing that when understood it will all harmonize.' This is just what I say; there is in reality but one side to any Bible question. You admit that there are 'apparent contradictions' in the evidences on this subject, and ask 'What shall be done?' You say, 'we must believe.' But what shall we believe? Must we believe, whether or not, the creed handed down to us by our ancestors? I think you would say no, indeed. But we should search the Scriptures and believe 'all things' therein contained as fast as we can understand them. I cannot see the great evil of taking 'the balances of the sanctuary,' casting in nothing but Bible testimony, and thus endeavoring to ascertain the true answer to any Bible question. Has Prof. Bush thus weighed the question of the resurrection of the dead? Do not condemn a good instrument or practice because it is abused. It is far from me to say that the light on inferential testimony, is 'useless' or 'false.'

Now Bro. Hill, let us have no pride of opinion in this matter. Let us daily 'humble ourselves' and keep near to God and the Bible.

Yours in bonds of love, B. MORLEY.

LETTER FROM I. C. WELCOME.

Hallowell, Me., April 11th, 1847.

DEAR BRO. MARSH—Permit me once more to speak to the scattered flock of God through the 'Voice of Truth;' for by this means we may speak often one to another and comfort each other though separated by the distance. For one, I have been much comforted and edified by the weekly reception of the 'Voice of Truth,' bringing the glad tidings of the coming kingdom, and laden with stirring exhortations from the saints, with other rich food for the hungry soul. Well, brethren and sisters, continue to let the light of approaching day shine out upon the world of darkness and warn the guilty of their danger—teach them the certainty of the judgment and the evidence of its near approach. O, continue to sound the alarm in the earth—let it continue to the sleeping millions of earth, and give no rest to those who promise themselves peace and safety. Let the cry continue, 'Behold he cometh,' until he comes for whom we look. Cease not to tell the scoffing formalist and world-loving professor of Christianity, that the Lord is at hand, the judgment is soon to be executed upon all. Let the spiritualizer be made to understand that we still look for that 'same Jesus,' whom they profess to adore, to 'so come' as he went up into heaven. Still proclaim that the 'hour of God's judgment is come.' Say not that the people will not hear—that they have been warned enough. Perhaps some may occupy this fearful position: yes, doubtless thousands do; but there may be many who are yet searching for truth and thirsting for the water of life. O, then, by the grace of God continue to walk in this way—be the light of the world, the heralds of truth and of salvation to lead those starving souls to the great Deliverer—to the fountain of life: continue to teach the word of life, the faith of the gospel—let your lives also bear the testimony to the truth you proclaim.

Remember John says, 'He that hath this hope in him, purifieth himself even as he is pure.' If the true hope is in our hearts it will purify our life. How careful should we be in this time of darkness and superstition that we follow the example set by the great Shepherd of Israel. How important that we keep his sayings, for if we profess to believe his gospel and do not the things he has taught us, we deny him and show to the world that our faith is a speculative one merely and sectarian, of worldly policy: such a faith is too often witnessed. Let us, my brethren, strive to be of those who are living epistles read and known of all men. May the Lord keep us from becoming of the character of those that 'profess that they know God but in works deny him: being abominable, disobedient and in every good work reprobate,' or void of judgment, (margin.) Let us be 'sober-minded, in all things showing ourselves to be patterns of good works, in doctrine, showing uncorruptness, gravity, sincerity, using sound words that cannot be condemned—that he who is of the contrary part may be ashamed, having no evil thing to say of us.' And though the tide of opposition rise still higher, the winds of persecution blow yet stronger, the fires of malice burn still more furiously, the victory is ours. God sees all things, and though wickedness prevails now, and oppression rules the world at present, the hour is hastening when the wicked shall cease—when God will have judgment without mercy, and justice will then prevail! Glory to God! this is enough to enable the weary pilgrim to endure to the end. There is glory enough clustering around the second personal advent of our blessed Lord, the resurrection of the dead and the everlasting kingdom, to eclipse all earthly glory, to outshine all other objects of attraction.

How thankful we ought to be that God has in his mercy given us the Bible, that we might learn his love to us and the redemption wrought by his Son, and the final glory that is yet to be revealed. O bless the Lord, for he is good! I love his service—I love his truth and his children—I love to bear the reproach of believing all that is spoken of Jesus, as well as the blessing for obeying him. O, it is good enough to be as our Lord and Master! If we suffer with him we shall reign with him. Who is ashamed of Christ and his word in this sinful generation? I hope it is not any one that professes to look for Jesus. If so, be assured that Jesus will be ashamed of you when he comes.

What though we be reviled for our hope and be called the base of the earth, fools, fanatics, deluded, insane, Beelzebub, babblers, &c., because we cherish the faith of Jesus' speedy, personal advent? Can all this injure us? 'Who is he that can harm you, if ye be followers of that which is good?' Surely God will vindicate his truth and justify those who honor him by believing and obeying it. Let us remember that our Lord was despised, rejected and cast out—and should we who 'walk as he walked,' expect to meet with better reception by a guilty world than Jesus did? O brethren, 'think it not strange concerning the fiery trials that await you as though some strange thing had happened unto you,' but be meek and submissive—'let the love of Christ rule your hearts.' Let all things be done in love, although wickedness is on every side and hypocrisy in our midst, yet we must let the principle of love rule all our doings. It is true we must 'cry aloud and spare not,' and 'show the people their sins,' and warn men to shun the vain philosophy of this corrupt age. We must expose the hypocrisy of the great mass of professing Christians and let the people see the fallacy of their hope, but it must be done in love, or it is not done as God leads his people to do.

Again, we must 'let brotherly love continue'; this we are taught of God, 'to love one another.' And 'by this shall all men know that ye are my disciples,' says Christ, 'if ye have love one for another.' I see by the writings of some of our brethren whose opinions differ on some points, that this love is much needed to keep them one in Christ. 'Beware, brethren, grudge not one against another, lest ye be condemned.' 'Behold the Judge standeth at the door.' Be patient, therefore, and forbear one another in love. Seeing such a variety of opinions among men I forbear to write on proof of doctrinal points, yet I am instructed by those who do. I am glad to see the light so truly and frequently presented by the brethren on the state of the dead and the end of the wicked; yet I observe some of them do not make a proper distinction between the soul and spirit of man, and thus their arguments are not as clear as they otherwise would be.

Yours in love, daily looking for Christ and his kingdom,
I. C. WELCOME.

LETTER FROM BRO. N. A. HITCHCOCK.

TYLER PARISH, Ill., March 20th, 1847.

DEAR BRO. MARSH—I know not whether the last communication I sent you is published or not, as I have not seen an advent publication for more than four weeks; but as I promised in that to give a little history of my labors in this Western country—I will now try and fulfil the promise:

After my little family became comfortably settled, I saw it clearly to be my duty to search out the scattered flock of slaughter, 'whose possessors slay them and hold themselves not guilty.' I accordingly bid adieu to my wife and little ones about 4 months ago, have seen them only a few days at a time occasionally since. But the thought is cheering to my wife as well as to myself, that where friends will meet to part no more, we shall soon meet if we endure to the end. Amidst my labors in this country I have felt that my call was from above. 'Who then is that faithful and wise servant whom his lord hath made ruler over his household, to give them meat in due season; blessed is that servant whom his lord when he cometh shall find so doing.' This has sounded in thunder tones to my heart, and I have felt a responsibility rolled upon me which I could not bear only in the faithful discharge of my duty in this matter: the promise is eternal life and there I look for my reward.

I know of two or three in this country who have gone to their merchandise or after the accumulation of the goods of this world, who have heretofore fed the flock; but they have left the field and in consequence of which the cause has suffered; and doubtless there are others in other places who have also ceased laboring for God. I wish they might feel somewhat as I have felt on reading this passage of Scripture: 'Who then is that faithful and wise servant,' &c., and instead of saying the Lord may not come perhaps in ten years or more, I say instead of occupying this position, be up and doing. If there ever was a time when God's ministers should be active, it is now. Their study should not be their own ease or their own profit here, but to rescue souls from the service of sin and the devil, and thus save them from the impending storm which thickens and hangs over this polluted world; a storm dreadful, fearful and final.

It seems to require a perfect consecration and a constant struggle to keep away from their polluted atmosphere. In Christ, who is the 'strong hold of the daughter of Zion,' there is safety and no where else; and we must have something more than, 'I hope and I guess I am a Christian,' or I awfully fear we are not one. My brethren, one and all, we must make sure work for the future, let the sacrifice be what it may. We are struggling for more than fading laurels, for more than an earthly crown. The work of God and religion must be the first and not a subordinate or secondary work with us: 'those who overcome will inherit all things.' O how little of the spirit of consecration is there seen—how little of the self-denial—how few who are willing to make a sacrifice for God and his truth! how few there are who are not in an undue manner attached to and striving for the things of earth! Here we are, standing upon the threshold of the eternal state, and too little concern, too little interest, and too little life! and still eternal consequences are pending upon our doings.

My mind has been led in a train of thought somewhat different from what I named at the commencement of this letter. I will now say that I have not been permitted, with a sense of duty, to take hold of any earthly possession here—the voice of the Lord has seemed to say, 'Feed my flock;' consequently, without waiting for a higher call or one different, I began to labor where God in his providence seemed to direct. I found a few tried brethren in Milwaukee with whom I have labored some and have seen a revival among them. I have preached from one to eight discourses in about twenty different places in the territory and in this State. In most of these places a few have been aroused and have commenced praying, and have confessed that the truth fed them. But the truth is, the mass of the people are profoundly asleep, and I fear there is nothing that will awake them but the clangor of Gabriel's trump. I find some, as I have visited from house to house, have conversed with fellow-passengers in travelling—I say I find none but what have heard something on the subject of the coming of the Lord at least. They seem to know that a time has passed, and this seemed to be a strong argument in their estimation, against the truth. A few only can be made to see a harmony and beauty in this to me sublime and glorious subject. I am satisfied God will justify this work in a little while, for this I am willing to wait and pray. I am sure this tarrying is almost at an end. Let me inquire of my brethren scattered abroad, Are you fully ready to meet the Lord?

In perilous times waiting,

N. A. HITCHCOCK.

LETTER FROM BRO. E. R. PINNEY.

SENECA FALLS, April 20th, 1847.

DEAR BRO. MARSH—For the information of those who may feel interested to know of my health, I would say, that by the blessing of my heavenly Father I am now and have been for the last two or three weeks upon the gain. For more than ten weeks however, there was no relaxation of a single symptom of my disease, and my physician said he could not heal me. I was willing to fall asleep with the fathers if it was the will of God, yet my faith was that I should live to see Jesus revealed from heaven. My faith is unwavering in his speedy appearing; and with such evidences as cluster about us at the present time—such bright signs as now appear, surely 'the wise can understand,' and I almost wonder the foolish cannot. The four winds must break forth soon in spite of the four angels efforts to restrain them, and then our God will come to save us and we shall take the kingdom—oh glory! Shout aloud ye saints, for your redemption is indeed near! Even ye who are upon your beds sing aloud, and let the high praises of God be in your mouth, &c.—Psa. cxlix. 5-9. I have felt during my illness, while watching the signs brought forth in the developments of God's providence, that I could rejoice and shout even in tribulation, and that it was my privilege while I saw the signs—there's no mistaking—declaring Messiah near! Oh blessed hope! oh blissful morn! I long for that day when I can lay my armor by and feel I am safe from all attacks of the enemy, and safe forever. I am now able to sit up much or most of the time and have rode out some, and last Sabbath, P. M., I was permitted to meet with the dear saints at the Hall. It was a precious season to my soul—a little foretaste of the joy we shall experience at the general assembly of all the redeemed in the New Jerusalem! Oh blissful day! oh happy meeting, when all the saints get home!

As to the suggestion of my dear Bro. Bates, I can testify to the faithfulness of God that thus far all my necessities have been met—sometimes we have come down near a comma, but when we got there the way has always been opened. His past faithfulness is to my soul an assurance for the future—I can still trust my God. I would take this opportunity to express my gratitude to my brethren for their kindness manifested to me and my family, in remembering us after a godly sort. May God reward you in the kingdom, is the prayer of your unworthy servant, waiting for the revelation of Christ in glory.
E. R. PINNEY.

CAMBRIDGE, April 17th, 1847.

Bro. Geo. W. Burnham holds a conference with us to-day and to-morrow—is strong in the faith that our hopes are about to be consummated. The brethren generally remain steadfast. There has been one converted and some reclaimed amongst us of late.
A. COLLINS,

Corruptions of Shakerism.

DEAR SIR—I will here give you the copy of a letter written by one who was one of the ministers at Union Village. He would not believe in their visions. They concluded to have him visit the Shakers at Waterliet and New Lebanon in the State of New York, to convince him of the reality of their visions; but the visit did not have that effect, but a very different one; for he was convinced beyond a doubt that their contradictory trash was nothing but a wicked deception.

PIQUA, O., March 16, 1847.

MRS. HOLLAWAY—I embrace the first opportunity to answer your requests about the visionists in New York. When we arrived at Waterliet we were soon introduced to the visionists. They, after singing and dancing awhile, appeared to swoon away and be insensible of every thing around them. When they would come to themselves they would relate what they had seen, and also name certain messages and presents they had received from Mother, especially—and others that were dead, they would bring news from them in some form or other—such as they had sent their love, or they were in heaven, in purgatory or hell, as the case of their standing might have been among the Shakers, or as their peculiar opinions might have been formed previous to decease, &c. In my first interview with them, they had the same gifts and messages to me, that they had to the most faithful believers in their new revelations: such as they had brought swords, gold chains to put around our necks—Mother Ann's love, &c.—declarations of our faithfulness as ministers of her gospel, &c., making no difference between me and the most enthusiastic believer in their visions.

We left Waterliet to visit Lebanon, where we found one Philamon Stewart, who had got one degree ahead of the visionists. He professed to have direct inspiration from the great Jehovah himself, but he was very intimate with the ministers and elders. He had a different revelation from 'Mother' to me, viz: that I was full of unbelief and had a reprobate spirit, and had not confessed my sins, &c. After these contradictory messages were delivered to me—the one at Waterliet testified that I was a faithful minister of Mother Ann's gospel; but the one at Lebanon, only thirty miles distant, that I was a reprobate, full of unbelief, &c., and after the leaders and elders had testified that it was Mother Ann or Jesus Christ, which are synonymous terms with them, which spake through these visionists, and through this inspired Philemon—well, after these things, orders were given that I should keep my room, and speak to no one except the elders, and not to go out on any occasion. Two elders with Philamon, visited me three or four times each day, and every time they came in I had to get on my knees and then bow four times to Philamon, twice to the elders! This was explained in this way: four times to Jesus Christ and Mother Ann, and twice to the elders; and every time I bowed I had to kiss the floor! The names of the two elders that attended on this occasion, were Rufus Bishop and Freegift Wells. The drift of all the testimony of the old residents was, that it was the same work of the spirit that operated on Mother Ann in her day!

When I look at the Bible doctrine on these subjects, I am confounded at my own blindness of the Scriptures. We read that when John the revelator, saw the majesty of the angel that was revealing things to him, he was about to fall down and worship the angel; but the angel said, 'See thou do it not, I am thy fellow-servant, worship God.' But those puffed up bigots would fain rob God—for God is the only object of worship—he has commanded us to worship him and him only. God will never consent to divide this worship with any created intelligence—no, not with the tallest angel before the burning throne; and certainly not with any of us poor unworthy worms of the dust. I have wondered many times how such an idolatrous people could hang together so long in this enlightened country; but one thing I think has been greatly to their advantage—that is, the peculiar manner in which they raise their young people. They make them believe there is no religion right on the earth but among them; hence the reason why so many who have left them, under this impression, have cast away all confidence in religion, and in a measure have lost all restraints in grace. I do believe if those who have left the Shakers, or a majority of them could have immediately joined themselves to some religious society, and had become way-marks of holiness, there would at this time have been but few Shakers in our country. JOSHUA WORLEY.

MUCH RESPECTED FRIEND—I have directed one sheet to you, but I feel dissatisfied with my efforts, I have told so little of what has been done by these wolves dressed in sheep-skins that I must try it again. I have told you that one deacon by orders from the king called Father David, took another man's wife and conveyed her out of the State. I will now tell you what was done by another church deacon; his name was Daniel B. He was a married man when he joined the Shakers, and his wife was still living; and though his wife was there, he placed his inordinate affections upon a girl who had been raised there from infancy. Her name was Rhoda H. He seduced her, and after her condition was discovered, they compelled her to go away from Union Village. She went to live with her sister; but after she had been with her sister a short time, the Shaker elders grew very uneasy for fear her honorable relatives would sue or persuade her to sue and recover something for the maintenance of her child. To prevent that, something must be done quickly. Accordingly Daniel B., the very man that seduced her, went to her sister's and told Rodah he had come to take care of her as he had promised. He put her clothes into his wagon and told her to get in; she did so. He travelled some distance, and she knew not where he was going until he got within two miles of a Shaker village on Whitewater. He then told Rodah that he was not going to marry her, nor do anything else he had promised; but she must get out of his wagon and hunt her way alone to the Shakers at White water. He put her out of his wagon at the roadside, a stranger in a strange land, without a friend to show her the way. This plot had been contrived between the seducer and the ministry at Union Village, in order to get her in among the Shakers at Whitewater, so that her relatives would have no chance to persuade her to sue. She was taken in and taken care of at Whitewater. When her child was some five months old, her brother John came down from Union Village to see her. The ministry there had some fears lest her brother should persuade her to sue. They then drew up an article—I cannot recollect all its contents, but the substance was, she was never to bring debt, blame or damage, against any person residing at Union Village. The ministers, those who stand as mediators between God and man, told me to go down and tell Rodah to come up into the meeting-house. I went and told her; she followed me up stairs. Calvin Morrell read the quit-claim in her hearing. They then told her to put her name to it. She said nothing for a while. They told her again. She kept her seat. They at length told her to come to the stand and sign that paper or she should leave that place and look out for herself and child. She then walked to the stand, wiped the tears from her eyes, and put her name to the paper as she was told. A few weeks after she was compelled to sign that article, there was a letter taken out of the Post Office in New Haven directed to Rodah, and instead of giving it to Rodah, it was taken up stairs, in the meeting-house, and there it was opened by the eldership; but finding nothing in the letter but what they were willing she should read, they closed the letter again, warmed the seal, and pressed it together. They then told me after this was all done, to go out and tell Rodah to come up to their room. I did so, and she presented herself. The elders gave the letter to Rodah, telling her to open her letter and read it so that we may hear what is in it. I was horror struck at such conduct and such deception, but I durst not say one word, for I was a stranger to liberty of conscience,—a mere dupe under a man-fearing spirit—a slave to idolatry, and crushed down by a despotism, set up in Warren county. It is no strange thing for those disciples of Ann or Lee Stanly to break and destroy letters which are sent to their subjects—yet they talk of the good fruits they show forth! Could the citizens of our own country have a fair statement of facts concerning the way they have treated their children, such an institution could not exist.

Yours with respect, J. HOLLAWAY.

Psalm lxxviii.

Jehovah! in thy might arise, disperse thy hated foes:
Yea, let them flee, as smoke is driven, where thou thy presence shows
As wax before the fire gives way, so let them all consume.
Or as the fat of lambs is lost, be such their righteous doom!
But let the saints be glad, let them rejoice aloud and sing;
Hosannas raise, in highest praise, to their Almighty King!
Extol Him on the heavens who rides in majesty sublime;
A father of the fatherless, unto the end of time.
God in his holy dwelling is a judge of widows low;
He sets the lone in families, and lets the prisoners go.
But rebels dwell in thirsty lands, and sinners find it ill,
To break the laws of God, and walk according to their will.

O God, when through the desert thou didst lead thy people forth,
The heavens did drop, old Sinai moved, and feared the trembling earth!

When thine inheritance was faint, a plenteous rain came down:
It was confirmed thereby and blessed—the Lord his people owned.
And of thy goodness God of love, thou hast provision made
For Israel's poor and desolate, making their bosoms glad.

The Lord did give the word, and great the preachers' host became,
Kings of great armies fled apace; captains renowned of fame.
Their chariots and their horse were nought, their purposes and toil,
While she who calmly staid at home, divided all the spoil!

Though ye have lein among the pots, yet as the silvered wings
And gilded feathers of the dove, ye shall come forth like kings!

Why leap ye, ye high hills? The hill of God appears!
This is the hill wherein the Lord will dwell through endless years.
The chariots of Israel's God are twenty thousand strong;
The Lord is with them; angels too, in thousands swell the throng.
Thou hast ascended upon high, and led captivity
Captive itself; and precious gifts for men, that they may see Thy goodness Lord, thou hast received; yea for the rebels too:
O! bless his name, whose mercies are, each morn and even new.
The God that is our God is He who brings salvation down
To men, and saves from death, and doth his saints with glory crown!
But God shall wound the heads of those who still transgress his laws
When he himself appears and comes to vindicate his cause!

The Lord said, I will bring again my people from the sea,
That in the blood of enemies, thy feet may dip-red be.

When in the sanctuary, Lord, thy goings were displayed,
The singers led, the damsels young aloud the timbrels played:
In rapturous notes, sweet music gave its sounds to all the praise-
Children of Israel! bless your God to everlasting days.
Benjamin, Judah, Naphtali, and Zebulun are there,
With ruler, prince, counsellors—all these thy goodness share.
Strengthen, O God, the gracious work, which thou for us hast wrought;

And presents from earth's kings shall be us to thy temple brought.
Rebuke the spearmen's company, the rebels near and far,
Till each submit; and scatter thou those that delight in war.
Princes from Egypt's land shall come: O! tell it all abroad,
And Ethiopia shall soon stretch out her hands to God!
Kingdoms of earth, sing unto God; in Him let all rejoice
That rideth on the heavens, and gives the mighty voice.
Ascribe ye strength to God, the power belongs to Him alone;
His excellency over us, his Israel, is shown.
Out of thy holy places, Lord, how terrible thou art!
But goodness, power, and blessedness, thou dost to us impart.
Redeemed from death, we'll sing anew, thy praises evermore—
Join heaven and earth, with one accord, Jehovah to adore!

SECESSIONS TO ROMANISM.—We see by the English papers that the secessions from the Established Church of England to Romanism, are still quite frequent. One of these papers says: "The number of clergymen who have joined the Church of Rome, in the course of the last eighteen months, is now about seventy;" while "the converts from the middle and upper ranks of society considerably exceed that number." The London Record, the organ of the evangelical portion of the Established Church, speaks quite despondingly in respect to the future. "Grounds of hope or of confidence," the editor says, "have been advanced from time to time—such as that the evil had seen its length, and was passing away—but we confess that we can see at present no ray of hope in this direction."—Boston Traveller.

Pre-millennial Advent.

BY CHARLES BERCHER.

I will offer one more illustration of the indispensableness of the following canons to the successful denial of the pre-millennial advent.

Canon I. All passages uniting the Advent, Resurrection, Judgment or Conflagration with millennial descriptions, must be spiritualized.

Canon II. All passages mentioning these events, without alluding to the millennium, may be taken literally.

There is to be a judgment day—a literal judgment day. However, this may distress the Universalist, the Swedenborgian, or the scoffing infidel, or the indifferent scientific theorist; to the Christian it is a matter of solemn joy. "God hath appointed a day in which he will judge the world in righteousness, by that man whom he hath ordained." So every Christian heart would have it. It will be a literal judgment. Christ, in person, will be present. "The Lord himself shall descend from Heaven." It will be a great day—the great day of the Lord. So we would have it. Thanks to God for the assurance! Creation is not always to groan. There is to be a winding up. There is to be a last Assize. The judgment shall sit and the books be opened. Concerning this we never feel disposed to cavil. We never think it derogatory to Christ. We leave that to scoffers. To us it is sublimely appropriate that the crucified should be revealed in flaming fire with mighty angels. No matter how small this globe is. No matter what astronomy thinks. No matter what geology is disposed to allow. God Incarnate has seen fit to be crucified here. We can believe him when he says he will here sit a judge upon the throne of his glory.

And yet how strange that we should discover his personal coming to judgment, before the millennium, to be highly derogatory and incredible! so incredible as that we must needs spiritualise most of the strongest descriptions of such judgment to be found in the Bible! How is this? What peculiar impropriety is there in Christ's coming to judgment before the millennium, rather than after? I confess that it has seemed to me as if some of my brethren were secretly opposed to ANY personal coming to judgment; so opposed that the only shield to their orthodoxy, was found in a millennial respite. Put far away the great day of the Lord, and make it literal as you will. Bring it nigh, so that it shall be possible for us really to do as St. Peter bids us, "Look for, and haste unto his coming," and then we will none of it. Then we discover its impropriety. We feel and act about it, if near, just as the Universalists feel and act about it anywhere. And thus, as I showed before, we secretly open the way to Universalism. Compare for example the two following descriptions of a day of judgment.

Matt. 25:

"WHEN THE SON OF MAN SHALL COME IN HIS GLORY, AND ALL HIS HOLY ANGELS WITH HIM."

"THEN SHALL HE SIT UPON THE THRONE OF HIS GLORY."

AND BEFORE HIM

NATIONS.

"And he shall separate them one from another as a shepherd divideth his sheep from the goats.

"Then shall the King say to those on his left hand, depart ye cursed into everlasting fire prepared for the devil and his angels.

"Verily I say unto you inasmuch as ye did it not unto one of the least of these my brethren, ye did it not to me."

Matt. xxiv. 30—Immediately after the tribulation of those days shall the sun be darkened, and the moon shall not give her light, and the stars shall fall from heaven and the powers of the Heaven shall be shaken.

Luke xxi. 28—"And when these things begin to come to pass, then look up, and lift up your heads, for your redemption draweth nigh."

Now I will ask any unprejudiced reader to compare these two descriptions of a day of judgment, and tell me which is most likely to be literal? Which would you most naturally attempt to spiritualize? turn into an allegory or parable? Would not that be as easily done with the left hand column as the right? How comes it then that this of Matthew has always been treated as the literal judgment day, and that of Joel allegorized? For no other reason than that contained in the canons

Joel 3:

"The Lord also shall roar out of Zion and utter his voice also from Jerusalem.

"Thither shall the Lord bring down all his mighty ones."

"For there, (in the Valley of Jehovah's judgment,) will I sit to judge all the heathen round about."

"I will also gather all nations, and will bring them down into the valley of Jehovah's judgment." "Assemble yourselves and come, all ye heathen, and gather yourselves together round about." "Let the heathen be wakened and come up to the valley of Jehovah's judgment." "Multitudes, multitudes! in the valley of decision, for the day of the Lord is near in the valley of decision."

"And will plead with them there for my people, and for my heritage Israel, whom they have scattered among the nations, and parted my land." "Behold I will raise them out of the place where ye have sold them, and will return your recompense upon your own head, but the Lord will be the hope of his people and the strength of the children of Israel.

"The sun and the moon shall be darkened and the stars shall withdraw their shining.—And the heavens and the earth shall shake."

"But the Lord will be the hope of his people, and the strength of the children of Israel.

at the head of this article, viz: It will not do to consider a literal judgment day under such connections. It is too closely wrought into the restoration of the Jews; which, whether or not is pre-millennial. It is "in those days and at that time when I shall bring again the captivity of Judah and Jerusalem." A literal judgment day here would be too alarming. People would really begin to "look for, and haste unto it." Which, however, it might do for Peter's intellectual age, is now plainly stupid and in controversion of all hermeneutical law. And this judgment, moreover, is too obviously followed by the millennium. "So shall ye know that I am the Lord your God dwelling in Zion my holy mountain; then shall Jerusalem be holy, and there shall no strangers pass through her any more and it shall come to pass in that day that the mountains shall drop down new wine and the hills shall flow with milk," &c. A vivid millennial picture.

To place a literal judgment here, would be too alarming. It might beget some strong excitements. We might be led to imagine that that great advent of our Lord in fire, to judgment, was really an advent of rational expectation. Hence, it is necessary to spiritualise this passage. To pour some deleterian wave upon it, and baptize it into somnolence.

As to that of Matt. xxv., however, the case is different. There, it is easy to neglect the important item of chronology furnished by Luke xxi. 24, by which we are brought down to modern times; there, it is easy to neglect Christ's obvious parallelism with Moses, Deut. xxviii. 29, 30. There it is easy wholly to forget the Jews, as if obliterated from the whole counsel of God. There, moreover, no allusion being made to any elapsed millennium, it is easy to take one for granted, and so arriving by one long logical leap, at the end of time, to permit the judgment to be literal. Thus gotten far enough away, thus safely sequestered behind a millennial mist, and seen through the rosy illusions of a thousand peaceful years—the dire phantom of a great white throne, no longer jars upon the nerves of a sensitive refinement. Polished compromise with worldliness goes on, and asks complacently "Where is the promise of his coming?"

The Fifth Vial.

In my former article I remarked that I saw reason to believe that the conquest of Constantinople by the emperor Nicholas, would be the drying up of the symbolic river Euphrates, and that the Lord would then come as a thief. The destruction of literal Babylon was accomplished in a literal night, to prepare the way for which the literal Euphrates was dried up, (turned out of its natural channel.) The spirit of prophecy has chosen the features of that literal destruction which were most prominent and impressive, to shadow forth the destruction of the world or mystic Babylon. And as literal Babylon was surprised and taken by Cyrus as a thief in a literal night, consequent upon the drying up the river Euphrates—so will be the coming of Christ to this world when the symbolic river shall be dried up, and this is certainly accomplished at the pouring out of the sixth vial.

I am aware that two opinions have generally obtained among adventists in regard to the true application of the vials. One view supposes that the vials nearly synchronise with the trumpets; the other, that none of them are poured out until after the saints are delivered. I have unwaveringly believed that the truth was between these wide extremes, and I feel quite confident that a little reflection will convince my brethren who are willing that God should speak for himself. It is very clear that the first vial is not poured out until the image of the beast exists—(see); for on those that have the mark of the beast and that worship his image, is the effect of the vial to be witnessed; hence, they must all be poured after the time of the end begins. Again, the sixth vial is witnessed before the great day of God Almighty begins—(see); for in close connection with the sixth vial the three unclean spirits do their work of preparing the nations for the battle of the great day; and as that day is confessedly ushered in by the revelation of Christ, his coming is evidently just where he has caused it to be recorded, viz: under the sixth vial. Thus much seems very plain on the very face of the text—and since these vials, being the last plagues, must be of recent application, I will not attempt to apply the first four in this article, but the rather confine myself to the solemn inquiry, have we the fifth? for if the conquest of Constantinople is the sixth vial, we may not yet look for the Savior unless we have good evidence that the fifth has been poured out. The vials can only be known by the effect which follows their pouring out, and that too in the very place to which the eye of the church is directed.

The fifth vial is to be poured upon the seat of the beast. The beast here brought to view is confessedly popery, not the image beast, neither a straggling beast introduced, about which nothing has previously been said, but the identical MOTHER OF HARLOTS. This book informs us that the waters where the woman sitteth are the people, and multitudes, and nations, and tongues. The effect of the fifth vial then must be chiefly felt upon those nations where papacy is the religion of the people, not every where—but on those countries especially are we to look for the effect of this vial. Its first effect, the kingdom of the beast is full of darkness: second, they gnawed their tongues for pain, (the natural effect of hunger): third, they blasphemed God by reason of their pain and their sores, (sores and rottenness or rotten plague is the handmaid of famine,) and they repented not of their deeds, (their darkness prevents them from discerning the hand of God in the calamities that are coming upon them.)

Let our eyes be turned to the seat of the beast, and may the Lord help us solemnly to inquire, have the marks of the fifth vial appeared? Let the reader take a modern map of the world and with it the accounts of famine for the last year, and learn for himself that this scourge is on the seat of the beast, and no where else but there to any considerable extent. Mark the disease that attends the famine—see where death by this scourge is approaching—the plague spot (or sore) appears in the forehead—this is the fatal omen. Do they repent? If so, this is not the vial; but they do not repent. Instead of fasting and prayer we hear of riot and murder; and if some of the wretched victims have a few shillings with which they might obtain a morsel of bread for their famishing children, instead of doing so they repair to the armory and with the last of their earthly substance purchase weapons of bloody warfare—they repented not.

But I need not be thus particular—these facts are before the world and we may all be saying it may and it may not be the effect of the fifth vial, and without a thus saith the Lord, we may remain undecided; but we have in point a thus saith the Lord that amounts in my feeble judgment to a perfect demonstration. 'This vial, let it be remembered, is the last plague on the seat of the beast, but not her utter destruction; that is in the seventh vial—(see.) Now, if this same book declares what the last plague of the beast shall be previous to her destruction, we may be safe in our conclusions in this matter. This it does in the most unambiguous manner. See chap. xviii. 7-8. While the old Mother of Harlots is saying (as all confess she is now saying) 'I sit a queen and am no widow and shall see no sorrow; God hath said in one day shall her plagues come—1st, death; 2d, mourning; 3d, FAMINE—and she shall be utterly burned with fire, for strong is the Lord God that judgeth her. Now then, as sure as the beast cannot suffer the plague of famine after she is utterly burned with fire, so sure is famine her last plague. Again, as the fifth vial is the last plague on the beast, as before shown, it must necessarily be famine—and I judge that we may not look for the marks of the vial to be but little more perfect.

I am aware that unbelief will say that all things remain as they were—we have always had famine, &c.; but although we have the history of many famines it is not true that all things remain as they were; we never had this famine before now, and had all things remained as they were, we should never have had it. It is not the mere fact that there is a famine that makes this famine so solemnly important at this crisis; but the chronology of the famine, its location, together with the foregoing peculiarity, making it the fulfillment of those portions of the word of God that stand closely connected with the revelation of the King of kings and Lord of lords, have the contents of the fifth vial. Are these things so? then it is high time we all awake and gird ourselves for the last campaign. 'We've but an hour to fight,' then shall the victors crown be given, and all his sufferings cease.

From recent accounts it is more and more obvious that Nicholas will soon make his sweep like a whirlwind if he has not already, and soon the effect of the sixth vial will be visible, then all will be over with this poor, ungodly world. What is done must be done quickly! O let us be awake! let us never think of building a city here. God help his servants to put away all their temporising, together with all the rudiments of the world and follow hard after Christ. What manner of persons ought we to be in all holy conversation and godliness. Blessed is he that watcheth and keepeth his garments. Amen. J. TURNER.

P. S. The substance of this article has been written some weeks, and has been delayed, hoping some more able brother would present this truth, having learned that many are convinced of the facts herein presented; but as no one has done so, I dare not longer hold my peace. I have just read with much satisfaction the article from the pen of Bro. Wells on the shaking of the powers of the heavens, and I do rejoice that another of the watchmen has observed the simple truth as it is in Jesus. The conclusion to which he arrives is the matter of interest with me, and should be to all who are looking for the Lord, viz: that the powers of heaven have been or are now being shaken. For myself I must say that I have no idea that there is in the declaration of the Savior even the most distant allusion to the atmospheric heavens, but as Mark records, the powers that are in heaven, (viz: Gentile governments,) shall be shaken; of course preparatory to their being dashed to pieces by the stone cut out of the mountain without hands; the simple mark of which when done, shall be upon earth distress of nations with perplexity—for the powers of heaven shall be shaken. The word for standing thus in the sentence gives it the following simple meaning: upon earth distress of nations with perplexity, because of the shaking of the powers that are in heaven. Again, when this is done, we are to know that the kingdom of God is nigh at hand. We are not to guess or hope merely, as Bro. Wells has said, but when ye see, then know—know by seeing the latest portions of the word fulfilled that can relate to this age, that the kingdom is at the door—is the next to come. May the Lord arouse us all; time is dying! O Lord revive thy work—in the midst of the years make known, in wrath remember mercy! J. T. Poland, Me., April 21st, 1847.

Life and Death.

NUMBER X.

I wish in this number to make some general remarks on the subject under consideration.

1. I will consider the question, Is the soul and spirit one and the same? I answer, they are not. I admit that psuche is often used to signify life which also signifies soul; but I deny that pneuma ever means soul. It is the animating, life-giving power from God which distinguishes organic from inorganic matter. It is a well known physiological fact, the moment the life-giving spirit which God gave man at the first leaves him, that beautiful fabric, with all its wonderful machinery crumbles back again to dust—to unorganic, inert matter. Inorganization often commences in the extremities of a person, while the mind is just as active and energetic, all the ramifications of thought as distinct, clear and vivid as in the most perfect state of health. The same power of mind has continued even when the work of dissolution has progressed so far that life in the man has well nigh become extinct. How could this be if psuche is the seat of life? It seems clear to me it could not; but that the psuche (soul) itself must be wasting away—receding from its seat—being contracted in its sphere of action not only, but in its power to act at all until itself is completely powerless—prostrate. Where then is its independency of action? But you say it will now be released from the body, and will, disencumbered, act again. But it has become powerless—how then can it act? Besides, this concedes the question in dispute, whether he psuche, (the soul) is something independent of, and on which the body depends?

On the other hand, if there is another something called pneuma, i. e. breath or spirit of life, which animates or gives life to us, we can see very clearly how that principle of animation may be retroceding before a more powerful rule of reaction, and corruption or decomposition moving upward toward the centre of vital action, and yet the organs of thought remain unimpaired. So long as the vital organs do their office and those of thought remain untouched, no matter what is going on in other parts—no matter how much obstructed action may take place in the extremities, the man is still a knowing, thinking being. An assertion is often made that here demands notice. It is said that instances have been found of obstructed action in every part of the brain and yet the mental faculties were unimpaired. Admit it and it proves nothing. The question is, how far or how long can healthy action be obstructed and the mental faculties remain unimpaired? The fact that we are unconscious in sound, healthful sleep shows that the soul is, to say the least, entirely dependent on the uninterrupted action of our whole organization. Another: Strike a man on the head a heavy blow and you render him unconscious. Where then is the always conscious soul? You say, perhaps, 'the organs of action are obstructed by the effect of the blow.' Then I have gained my point, viz: the soul cannot act without material organs. What then becomes of the separate state? The truth is there is none. To assume that the soul is independent in its action of organic life, and not only so, but that inorganic matter is dependent on it for life and action, is not only the thing to be proved, but known facts prove the exact reverse. Persons have been known to remain in such a state for a length of time and yet life remain. A man therefore, may be unconscious yet not dead—now much more unconscious when he is dead.

The conclusion is, soul is the result of spirit, breathed into inert matter, arranged by the hand of the blessed God, giving life, sensation and action to the same, and not the cause. It may be asked, how can matter so arranged and so inspi-rited, think, reason, know, understand, love, hate, etc. etc.? I ask how can spirit do the same? When a man can tell me how the latter can be, I can tell how the former can be likewise. God can as easily effect the one as the other.

2. I come now to consider some passages of Scripture, often urged as teaching that soul and spirit are one.

Eccl. xii. 9.—'Then shall the dust return to the earth as it was, and the spirit shall return to God who gave it.' 'As it was.' How was it? Gen. ii. 7th tells us: 'And the Lord God formed man of the dust of the ground and breathed into his nostrils the breath or spirit of life, and man became a living soul.' Here it is; what we call death is the departure of the spirit or breath of life from the material or organic man and a crumbling of the organic man back to inorganic matter. How much is left after this? If there is anything except earth let a man find it.

Acts vii. 59.—'Lord Jesus receive my spirit.' What does this prove? Why just nothing at all. The thing sought to be proved by this text is the very thing in question. It was what gave life to the man Stephen that he committed to the Lord Jesus. But soul did not give life to him: therefore it was not his soul, but just what he says—his spirit he committed to Christ. Paul in 1 Thes. v. 23 makes a plain distinction. He says, 'And I pray God your whole pneuma, (spirit) and psuche (soul) and soma, (body) be preserved blameless unto the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ.' This includes the whole of a living man. So this also agrees Ezek. xxxvii. 4-10. Here is a vision, in which at the first, he was nothing but bones—afterwards, bone coming to his bone, then sinews and flesh covering them, and last of all breath entering them and they rising up and standing on their feet. The explanation of this vision, from the 11th to the 14th verse, is the resurrection. In this we shall all agree. But what does he mean by breath in the vision? The 14th ver. in the explanation tells us: 'And shall put my spirit in you and ye shall live,' etc. It is the putting God's spirit in his sleeping saints. This gives life to them the second time. 'But if the spirit of him that raised Jesus from the dead dwell in you, he that raised Christ up from the dead shall also give life [To-o-poi-e-sei] to your mortal bodies, by his spirit that dwelleth in you.' Rom. viii. 11.

Here we have Moses, Solomon, Ezekiel, Stephen and Paul, in perfect harmony. All of them teach that spirit here is a power from God, which returns again to the giver when it has done its office on the receiver; and when God shall remove the curse, this same divine power will return to the believer and make him equal to the angels.

The case of the Sadducees questioning Christ is often resorted to, to prove the spirit is something rational, and may exist as an intelligent agent, in a separate state. Now I would as soon undertake to prove, (what Adam Clarke undertook to do) that Judas Iscariot died of excessive grief instead of the halter, as to prove such a hypothesis by such evidence. There is not the least shadow of evidence to sustain it! Not the most distant allusion or hint is had in the whole conversation as recorded by Matthew, Mark or Luke to the denial by the Sadducees of the existence of spirits. When Jesus refers to Moses, it is not to prove the existence of spirits, for that was not the question in dispute, but to prove the resurrection of the dead. Hear Matthew: 'But as touching the resurrection of the dead, have we not read,' etc.? Mark: 'And as touching the DEAD, (not living spirits,) that they rise, have ye not read in the book of Moses,' etc.? The spirit of the whole matter is this: 'I do not ask you, Sadducees, to take my word—I will prove to you the resurrection by your own acknowledged Moses.' We will therefore hear the testimony of Luke: 'Now that the dead are raised, even Moses [emenuen] declared, made known at the bush, when he calleth the Lord, the God of Abraham, and the God of Isaac and the God of Jacob—for he is not a God of the dead but of the living, for all live unto him.' Is there anything in the last clause to prove Abraham Isaac and Jacob were then living? or their souls? Not a word. Because 'live' is used in the present tense, it no more proves some part of them was then living than the phrase above, 'are raised,' which is in the present tense proves that the dead or some part of them was then raised. Both are general declarations of a fact yet in the future. The preposition 'unto' is supplied in our version. I supply 'by' or 'through,' as more in harmony with the doctrine taught by Christ, viz: the resurrection.

Another objection I have to believing Christ even hinted at the doctrine of the separate state is, I can find no evidence that anything was said about it pro or con. The only text affording any ground for it is found in Acts xxiii. 8.—'For the Sadducees say there is no resurrection, neither angel nor spirit.' Does this teach the doctrine of the separate state of the spirit of man after death? If it does, the Pharisees did not confess all. The text says they confessed both. So the original word. But according to that theory, here are three things, and three are more than both. If it does I see not but it will continue for ever; for we are told, Heb. xii. 22-24.—'But ye are come unto Mount Zion and unto the city of the living God, the heavenly Jerusalem, and to an innumerable company of angels, the general assembly and church of the first-born which are enrolled in heaven, [who but the angels were the first born sons of God?] and to God the judge of all, and to the spirits of just men made perfect, and to Jesus the Mediator of the new covenant,' etc. Now compare these Scriptures. The Pharisees confessed two things—1st. The existence of angels, and 2d. Of resurrection saints. If the word 'spirit' has anything to do with the man or any part him, it has to do with him in his resurrection state. The denial of the Sadducees then was not of three separate things, but simply of angelic and spiritual existences. These the Pharisees confessed. These I understand the apostle to teach Heb. xii. 23, quoted above. These I confess, and glory in so doing. But if by 'angel and spirit' is meant two classes of intelligences, independent of man, then we have no concern with it in this discussion.

3. Christ tells us, Matt. x. 28.—'Fear not them that kill the body but are not able to kill the soul, (psuche); but rather fear him who is able to destroy both soul (psuche) and body in hell, (Gehenna.) Where in the Word is there an intimation that the spirit can be destroyed in hell? No where! No, it returns to God who gave it. It is from God and of him—has neither intelligence nor moral character—cannot be comforted or tormented. It gives life to us, and thus in God we live and move and have our being.

I have done. I have no more to say at present. If the Lord will I may write one No. on the end of the wicked. If any brother or sister has been benefitted, I rejoice. If any have been harmed it has been unintentional. May the Lord bless us all and preserve us unto his heavenly kingdom. GEO. NEDHAM.

Albany, May 5th, 1847.

We can but be deeply interested in the awful scenes of the present time! we are approaching the end! the harvest! the rest and glory of scattered Israel! But painful as it is, we too are nearing swiftly the fiery doom of the poor sinner—yea, the everlasting destruction of all the uncircumcised in heart who have rejected the commandments of God. G. W. BURNHAM.

Voice of Truth & Glad Tidings

"The wise shall understand."

ROCHESTER, MAY 19, 1847.

The Proposed Enlarged Sheet.

With much reluctance we have relinquished for the present the idea of enlarging our sheet. The fact is, we had not fully looked into the expenses of enlarging, until a few days since, when a worthy brother, a practical printer, who well understands such things, called on us and decidedly dissuaded us from engaging in the proposed enterprise. He thought it would be incurring an expense which our present subscription would not be likely to meet. And besides he thought the paper sufficiently large as it now is. Bro. D. I. Robinson has called on us and also gives the same counsel.

The advice of these brethren, together with the uncertainty of the future, has caused us to conclude that it may be the part of wisdom and duty to run no needless hazards in these things now. We know not what to-morrow may bring forth. We will therefore do all the good we can with our present sheet, until our Lord shall come, or we shall be called from our labor, or the way may be more clear for giving an enlarged sheet. We hope at all times to be found ready to act in the counsel of our God.

☞ We will kindly remind those who owe for their paper, that unless payment is more liberally made than has been for a short time past, the expenses of issuing our sheet, in its present size, cannot long be met. We do hope this matter will be attended to without our having to say another word about it.

Great Apostacy.

NUMBER II.

5. The character of Christ. The so called orthodox sects hold that Christ is the 'very and eternal God.' But God, Christ, angels and inspired men call him the Son of God. We will name a few of the many passages which call him thus.

Matt. iii. 17. 'This is my beloved Son.' God.

Jno. x. 36. 'Say ye of him whom the Father hath sanctified, and sent into the world, thou blasphemest; because I said I am the Son of God.—Jesus.

Luke i. 35. 'Therefore also that holy thing which shall be born of thee shall be called the Son of God. The angel Gabriel.

Matt. xvi. 16. 'Thou art the Christ the Son of the living God. Peter.

Jno. xx. 31. 'These things are written, that ye might believe that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God; and that believing, ye might have life through his name.' John.

Acts ix. 20. 'And straightway he preached Christ in the synagogues, that he is the Son of God.' Paul.

No apostacy from the plain simple truth of the Bible, is more wide and apparent than in this case; and the evils which have followed in its train have been numerous and painful in the extreme, as the unholy controversies and bloody persecutions since the formation of the Nicene creed clearly show.

6. The nature of Christ. With a few exceptions, the sects hold that Christ possesses 'two whole and distinct natures, human and divine'—and that in his human nature he is truly very man, and in his divine nature he is truly very God.' But the Bible teaches no such doctrine, either directly or indirectly; consequently they must have had their origin somewhere in the apostacy of the church. But the Bible does teach that Christ, instead of possessing two natures, verily took not on him the nature of angels; but he took on him the seed of Abraham. Wherefore in all things it behooved him to be made like unto his brethren, that he might be a merciful and faithful High Priest.' Heb. ii. 16, 17. The nature of that seed is holy: 'for that holy thing which shall be born of thee shall be called the Son of God.' Luke i. 35. The nature is divine. 'That ye might be partakers of the divine nature.' 2 Pet. i. 4. Christ is one.—'For as 'all the members of that one body, being many, are one body; so also is Christ,' 1 Cor. xii. 12. And 'there is one God, and one mediator—the man Christ Jesus'—'one God and Father—and one Lord Jesus Christ.'

Alas, how sad are the evils which have been produced by this error—this fearful step in the great apostacy. The indivisible Christ, the Son of God has been divided into different parts, characters and natures. And then the false theory has been baptized in the holy waters of the church, and set up in the temple of God, to the shrine of which all have been called upon submissively and reverently to bow, or suffer excommunication, persecution, and sometimes death.

7. The death of Christ. With a few exceptions, the sects hold that Christ died 'to reconcile the Father unto man.' (See Meth. Discipline.) But the Bible says, 'And all things are of God, who hath reconciled us to himself by Jesus Christ, and hath given to us the ministry of reconciliation; to wit, that God was in Christ, reconciling the world unto himself, not imputing their trespasses unto them; and hath committed unto us the word of reconciliation. Now then we are ambassadors for Christ; as though God did beseech you by us, we pray you in Christ's stead, be ye reconciled to God.' 2 Cor. v. 18-20.

The legitimate fruit of this fearful step in the great apostacy is, Universalism: for if Christ died to reconcile God to man, most certainly God has been reconciled by that death, and all men are now restored to his favor, and consequently will be saved, irrespective of their faith, works, or character, as Universalism falsely teaches.

8. The atonement. The great majority of the sects view the atonement in the light of a legal purchase, paying an equivalent, &c. Or more plainly, they hold that Adam contracted a debt for the whole human family, and Christ paid that debt, and not only that original debt, but every debt of sin which might be contracted by the whole human family was fully cancelled by the death of Christ. Hence the fundamental principle of salvation on this hypothesis is made to be that of purchase, or paying an equivalent, when the Bible makes it of grace, love, &c.—'For God so loved the world that he gave his Son'—'With his great love wherewith he loved us'—and 'by GRACE are ye saved.' Eph. ii. 8.

Oh, how this step in the great apostacy has eclipsed the love, mercy, benevolence, and transcendent glory of the economy of grace. It has changed it from the character of full and free grace, to that which exacts a full equivalent for all the crimes committed, and blessings or benefits bestowed on perishing and helpless mortals. It presents the character of the benevolent God more in the light of an unmerciful extortioner, than of boundless love and mercy, as his word clearly presents Him. It also deceives thousands by creating in them the delusive hope of being saved by the imputation of the righteousness or merits of Christ, when the Scriptures plainly say, 'Without holiness no man shall see the Lord'—'Blessed are they who do his commandments, for they shall have right to the tree of life'—'By grace are ye saved, through faith'—'If ye do these things ye shall never fall'—'And he that heareth these sayings of mine, and doeth them' will be saved.

9. The pre-millennial advent of Christ. The sects generally hold that the coming of Christ before the millennium will be a spiritual coming. Whereas the Bible tells us that it will be the 'coming of the Son of man'—the descent from heaven of that 'same Jesus,' who was crucified, rose from the dead, and ascended into heaven, or the 'Lord himself.'—Matt. xxiv., Acts i. 11, 1 Thess. iv., and numerous other passages equally clear and explicit, which we might quote.

The apostacy in this case has taken away the highest motive to repentance and holiness, and placed in its stead the peace and safety doctrine of the world's conversion, or of a temporal millennium of peace and happiness, previous to the personal appearing of Christ. By this strong delusion the church and world are now blinded to the fearful doom that is rapidly approaching all who know not God, and their everlasting destruction will soon most surely come upon them, unless they see and obey that truth which alone can make them wise unto salvation.

10. The object of the second advent. The church hold that one great end of Christ's coming (when he will come, as they suppose at the close of their fancied millennium,) will be to remove the saints from this earth, to some unknown, undefined, and undescribed heaven, and to destroy forever or annihilate the place of their present abode, viz; this earth. Alas, how wide from the exceeding great and precious promises of the Bible, has this fearful leap in the great apostacy, landed deceived millions: for the Bible assures us that the glorious design of Christ's second advent is to bring about the 'restoration of all things which God hath spoken by the mouth of all the holy prophets since the world began.' Acts iii. 21. The kingdom is what was lost by the fall of Adam, and will be restored at the second advent of Christ: for he will then say, 'Come, ye blessed of my Father, inherit the kingdom prepared for you from the foundation of the world.'—Matt. xxv. 34. Then, all things will be made new, 'new heavens and new earth, wherein dwelleth righteousness,' will be created, or formed from this earth, when the curse shall have been removed by the renovating fires of the great day—Then the kingdom restored will 'fill the whole earth,'—will be 'under the whole heavens'—the saints will take and forever possess the kingdom, and 'reign with Christ on the earth,' 'whose dominion shall be an everlasting dominion,' and shall extend 'from sea unto sea, and from the river unto the ends of the earth.' Well has the Savior said, in view of the transcendent glories of the kingdom, the saints eternal abode, 'Blessed are the meek: for they shall inherit the earth.'

11. Time of the second advent. The sects unanimously hold that nothing is revealed in the Bible by which we may know anything about when the coming of the Son of man is near. But the Savior plainly tells us, 'When ye shall see all these things, know that it is near, even at the door.' The prophetic numbers also point with divine correctness, and unmistakable clearness to the same time. Historical prophecy sheds its effulgent unclouded light upon the same point. And now there is being witnessed in these last moments of expiring time, the most astounding signs, in the character of earthquakes; atmospheric convulsions; roaring of the seas; destructive storms; breaking up of national friendly alliances; the warlike attitude of the nations; the increase of crime; the corruptions of the church; the giant tread of the fearful and fatal cholera; the terrible famine, and in its train the dreadful pestilence. In view of all this sure evidence that the advent is near, fatal in the extreme we fear will this step in the great apostacy prove to thousands. Now, that day will come upon them as a snare, or a thief, to their own destruction; whereas had the church stood in the counsel of the Lord, in this case, her warning voice would have aroused many to a sense of their danger, and to a preparation to meet their Lord in peace. O that they had known this their day of gracious visitation! But alas, they have closed their eyes to the true light, to their hurt, and many, we fear to their everlasting ruin.

Some other things in this category will claim our notice next week. Let those already named be carefully examined in the light of the Word, and the facts in the case, and irrespective of former opinions or future consequences, decide the case accordingly. There is safety in no other decision.

CONFERENCES.—It is now a favorable time to hold conferences in different places in Western N. York. Where shall we commence the good work? The Editor and some others are ready to do what they can in this way, to build up the cause of the Lord among us. Send in your requests, if you want such meetings, and we will try to comply with them as soon as circumstances will admit.

A Fearful Crisis Approaching.

Such are the signs of the present times, that very many who are not identified with the advent faith are constrained to acknowledge that some fearful event is just before us. What it is they know not; but they think it will be something dreadful. So talked a religious editor in our office a few days since; and so many who profess to be believers in a temporal millennium feel and talk. Notwithstanding all their faith in the immediate ushering in of their fancied glorious millennium, they are troubled with fearful forebodings about the future. And these very fears show that they have not much confidence in their own theory of a millennium. The signs of the times speak in trumpet tones that the church has been turned aside unto fables, and that the great and terrible day of the Lord is near.

If their millennial theory is according to truth, why should they have evil forebodings of the future, on account of the increase of crime in our world—the moral death that is prevailing in the church—the warlike attitude of the nations of the earth—the rapid and sure approach, and devastation of the terrible Cholera—the destruction of millions by the dreadful Famine—and the numerous and portentous signs in the heavens above and in the earth beneath—we say, why should these things cause certain ones to look for some fearful crisis, if they really believe their millennium is soon to be ushered in? They are inconsistent: their fears and faith do not agree.

But if the evidences which God has given, and is now presenting, are so clear and overwhelming as to cause an unbelieving world and very many of the church who have not embraced the advent faith, to fear and tremble on account of what is coming on the earth, what should the effect be on the minds of those who understand the true import of these things? Ah, it should cause them to give earnest heed to the Savior's most solemn and faithful warning, given in reference to these very times. 'Take heed to yourselves, lest at any time your hearts be overcharged with surfeiting, and drunkenness, and cares of this life, and so that day come upon you unawares. For as a snare shall it come on all them that dwell on the face of the whole earth. Watch ye therefore, and pray always, that ye may be accounted worthy to escape all these things that shall come to pass, and to stand before the Son of man.'

By a letter bearing date, Tonawanda, April 28, we learn that Bro Ongley & wife have been faithfully laboring in Collins, Hamburg, and other places; and that in some instances a deep interest has been waked up to know more about the glorious truths proclaimed. Many of the scattered flock have been fed and strengthened by the word preached by these faithful servants of the Lord. The Lord continue to make them a rich blessing to many who may listen to the instruction they may impart.

Thoughts for the Judaizer.

All will admit that the promise made to Abraham, that in him and his seed all the families of the earth should be blessed, embraced Gentiles and Jews, without any regard to their national distinction, which existed after the promise was given. It will be admitted also that the Mosaic law was the middle wall of partition between Jew and Greek; or its observance constituted the distinguishing mark between them. Now, Paul tells us 'the law was added because of transgression.' Added to what? The promise made to Abraham, or covenant that he should be the heir of the world. Well, when the law which was added, and made the distinction which existed between Jew and Greek, was taken 'out of the way,' we ask if that distinction could any longer exist. It could not. All know or believe that the law was abolished, or taken out of the way, at the crucifixion of Christ. Then, as a matter of course, there is now neither Jew nor Greek, as Paul has said: and consequently no more promise to the one than the other, in the original covenant made with Abraham.

The simple facts, that the law was first 'added,' and then 'taken out of the way,' throw an immovable barrier in the way of that theory which promises to the Jew, according to the flesh, the land of Palestine, or any blessings more than are promised to an unbelieving Gentile. And be it remembered that 'indignation and wrath, tribulation and anguish,' will be the sure portion of both Jew and Greek, unless they become children of God, by faith in Jesus Christ.

CORRESPONDENCE.

Corruptions of Shakerism.

DEAR FRIEND—I will here give you the copy of an article written by one who was brought up with the Shakers at Union Village, who was appointed to the office of an elder in the church, which office he filled honorably until, by the mercy of God, he was able to see that he was a servant to idolatry—a slave to bondage and base ignorance:

Franklin, O.

March 1st, 1847.

FRIENDS AND FELLOW CITIZENS—After many years are past and gone, I have come to the conclusion to offer to the public a few facts. In the year of our Lord, 1805, the people, called Shakers, arrived in our county, called Warren, and began their horrid delusion. Unhappy to relate, my father was among the first who were taken in by those deceivers. My mother opposed for a time, but she was at length overpowered by their delusion. Their children were small, and strictly obedient to our parents, we obeyed them and followed on until what property they had was sacrificed to the interest of the Shaker society. We were taken from our parents and put into what was called the school family, where I received about four months' schooling, which was all I ever received. We were taught to be industrious for the support of Mother Ann's gospel, whom we were taught was equal with Christ: and farther, that all who did not obey her gospel would lose their day of salvation—must taste the second death—be banished from the presence of God and his holy angels. The poetry we were taught to sing had the stamp of idolatry; read one verse:

"Since Mother sent the gospel, and spread it in the West,
How many sons and daughters are nourished from her breast—
How many more conceived and travelling in the birth,
Who yet shall reign with Mother, like princes on the earth."

They always taught us that all the professors of religion were anti-Christians—that the priests were designing men, who preached only to rob their hearers and deceive the ignorant, and that all classes of professors are priest-ridden but Shakers. But alas, I have found by sorrowful experience that the most priestcraft I have ever witnessed is with the Shakers.

After they had got our parents to join them they began to teach their disciples that they had now entered the stream that Ezekiel saw in his vision; that it was first to the ankles, and as they travelled in the gospel the river would be deeper and deeper, and they must strip off and be able to swim, for they could not swim with a farm on their back or with money in their pocket, but must give up all to the gospel; or they would sink to eternal woe, and never be able to rise or swim in Ezekiel's river of salvation. The teaching of their gospel is, be obedient to the elders, think not for yourselves: reasoning is carnal and devilish. Reader, strange as it may appear to you, we believed that those who lived in the upper part of the meeting-house, who came from the State of New York and were our ministers, were infalible beings. David Darrow who was the chief, came down to our meeting on the Sabbath and raged and stormed, saying he had seen spirits hovering around his room the night before. This was done to keep us in fear and ignorance. I was convinced beyond a doubt that their organization was corrupt and I left them; and although I had worked hard for them fifteen years, they would not give me a few carpenter's tools to help me make a living—but a stout-hearted monarch locked my tools up in my chest and kept chest and all. O consider and examine and judge the tree by its fruits and not by its name only. A. HILL.

A Word of Exhortation.

DEAR BROTHERS AND SISTERS—I praise the Lord that although separated far from each other we have a medium through which heart may speak to heart and thoughts be freely interchanged. Distance may separate and thus prevent 'the assembling of ourselves together,' but we may nevertheless obey the injunction, 'Exhort one another, and so much the more as ye see the day approaching.' Let us be careful that we 'strive not about words to no profit,' and avoid 'foolish and unlearned questions, knowing that they do gender strifes.' We are near the judgment—the sands of time are fast ebbing out, and we ought to spend its last fleeting moments in benefiting others and preparing ourselves for the eventful scenes before us. With what a jealous eye ought we to watch over our hearts, and aided by the enlightening influences of the spirit we should often explore its hidden recesses, lest there be something there concealed that will not bear the final test. We must be pure in heart if we would see God. Is this our state to-day? Not, have we been pure in heart in days past, but are we thus now? this moment? Have we a present consciousness that the blood of Jesus Christ cleanseth—not may or has cleansed, but cleanseth us from all unrighteousness? Does the spirit of God testify with our spirit that we are his children? If children, then are you heirs; heirs of God and joint-heirs with Jesus Christ; but if you have not the spirit of adoption, you certainly have no right to reckon yourself an heir of God. We must have in possession the seal of the spirit—the earnest of the inheritance, and produce this seal when the 'purchased possession is redeemed or we have no title thereto and shall not be acknowledged as rightful heirs. We see then the importance of always reading our title clear to an inheritance in the new earth. None but the meek, the pure in heart can do this. Let this character then be ours. Have we by some means grieved away the Comforter and lost its blessed witness? Let us at once humble ourselves before God—covenant anew with him by sacrifice—throwing ourselves upon the broad atonement with faith unwavering in the promise: 'If we confess our sins, he is faithful and just to forgive us our sins and to cleanse us from all unrighteousness.' Do this, and you rejoice in the possession of a present and full salvation from sin, and 'being justified freely by his grace you will have peace with God thro' our Lord Jesus Christ;' a peace that passeth understanding—and the rest of faith also—the earnest of that which remaineth, 'for we who believe do enter into rest.' When this is our state we can 'rejoice with joy unspeakable and full of glory,' in view of the speedy coming of the 'King of kings'—hail with rapture every sign which betokens his approach, and contemplate the glory and surpassing loveliness of the New Earth with that interest and hope which springs from the earnest of an inheritance there. Is there a trembling misgiving one, who, while he peruses these lines, exclaims, 'Would that such were my hopes—my expectations? To you I reply, the feelings above described may be yours, and it will be unto you according to your faith.' Live in the exercise of unreserved consecration, and simple, unwavering faith in Christ, and 'full assurance of hope' is yours. Without this, be not content.

My heart adores the boundless benevolence of God in providing for us such a Savior. He saves to the uttermost, and such a fullness—the fullness of God.' In this Savior let us constantly trust—for this fullness earnestly contend, and fully believe, 'tis faith will make it ours. Freely let us partake of all the blessings offered to us in the gospel for our present benefit; we need them all to fit us for the reception of those that are reserved for us until the appearing of our Lord. If our minds are spiritual they will not be earthly and grovelling—if our affections are on things above they will not be on things on the earth—if our treasure is in heaven it will not be here. If we add to our faith virtue, and to virtue knowledge, and to knowledge temperance, and to temperance patience, and to patience godliness, and to godliness brotherly-kindness, and to brotherly-kindness charity—if these things be in us and abound we shall neither be barren nor unfruitful in the knowledge of our Lord Jesus Christ; and if we do these things we shall never fail, for so an entrance shall be ministered unto us abundantly into the everlasting kingdom.

Your Sister in the hope of the gospel,
M. D. WELCOME.
Hallowell, Me., April 17th. 1847.

The Prophetic Light.

The sure word of prophecy is yet light to our path, and will be until the glorious day of rest is ushered in by the coming of our Lord. And while we are surrounded with perils of every kind, on the land and on the sea and among false brethren! we ought to take the more earnest heed to the prophetic word, for it is that and that alone which shines in the dark place, which is the future. Nothing aside from revelation has ever taught us the existence of the supreme God, or that the world was ever made, or the creation of man, or the destruction of the first heavens and earth which were of old, standing out of the water and in the water. Nature would never teach us that that the second heavens and earth which are now are kept in store, reserved unto fire against the day of judgment and perdition of ungodly men—and much less the time when we should look for them to pass away, and the new inheritance to be given. We thank God that he gave his revelation unto Jesus Christ, that he might show unto his servants things which were shortly to come to pass.

We have the undisputed testimony of men and women now living, that the sun became black as sackcloth of hair and the moon became as blood, and our own eyes have seen the stars fall unto the earth as the fig-tree casteth her green figs, when she is shaken of a mighty wind. These are the same signs the Savior has given us, and for the benefit of his people who should live in the last generation were they given. They have been fulfilled in the same chronological order the prophet saw them—and as the prophetic light shines in the future, we boldly say that the departing of the heavens as a scroll and the removing of every mountain and island out of their places is the next event in prophecy, and that event is nigh even at the door. By many this position is condemned. Well, let them condemn it and us too if they will—it is a safe position, for our Lord has told us to take it. It was not only safe in years gone by, but it is safe now, and would be safe for years to come if any more were to come. We say that the prophetic periods harmonise with this position and we will not give up either. We know that the prophetic periods have not yet ended, for the event to which they reach has not come. The probable evidence is that they will terminate this year, and the positive evidence is that the event connected with their termination, is NEAR, EVEN AT THE DOOR.

The positions we have taken in years past are no guide for us now—positive evidence will admit of positive faith and none other. All who believe the Lord will come this year are liable to be disappointed, for there is no positive evidence that this is the true '47. Our era commenced before or after the birth of our Savior or at his birth. Time has proved that it did not commence four, three, two, nor even one year before he was born, and hence our era is incorrect, and who in the nineteenth century can show us where the mistake is? Unless this can be done it cannot be proved in what year of the vulgar era the true '47 will fall, and consequently, it cannot be proved in what year of the vulgar era the prophetic periods will terminate. If our era commenced exactly at his birth then this year must end in order to complete the 2300 days. If it commenced precisely one year from his birth, then '48 must pass—but our opinion is that it will never commence. The probable evidence is that our Lord was born not over eight months, at the outside, before our era commenced—and consequently, it is our opinion that he will come within eight months from the present month of April; and this is the only position taken by those who say that our only safe position is erroneous. Now I ask if the Lord comes within eight months, is he not NOW nigh, even at the door? We say he is, and his word declares it: 'The great day of the Lord is near; IT IS NEAR and hasteth greatly. The day of the Lord cometh, it is nigh at hand. Alas, for the day! for the day of the Lord is at hand, as a destruction from the Almighty shall it come.'

Justice to the church and even to the world, seems to demand the immediate coming of our Lord. The nations are distressed and perplexed and angry. Thus saith the Lord unto Jeremiah, (Jer. xxv. 15, 16) Take the wine cup of this fury at my hand, and cause all the nations to whom I send thee to drink it; and they shall drink, and be moved, and be mad. Babylon hath been a golden cup in the Lord's hand, that made all the earth drunken—the nations have drunken of her wine, therefore the nations are mad. Jer. li. 7. The horsemen lifteth up both the bright sword and the glittering spear and there is a multitude of slain, and a great number of carcasses, and there is no end of their corpses; they stumble over their corpses because of the multitude of the whoredoms of the well-favored harlot, the mistress of witchcrafts. Nah. iii. 3, 4. 'And the nations were angry and thy wrath is come, and the time of the dead that they should be judged.' Perilous times are these indeed, both to the church and world, and they are becoming more so every day. All these are but the beginning of sorrows. Our only hope is in the speedy coming of our Lord.

Since I have commenced this communication I have thought I would destroy it instead of sending it for publication. Why should I make known to thousands the weakness of my own mind? Is it because we have none amongst us who possess great powers of mind and are discerners of spiritual things? Certainly not. No, no: it is because they have ceased to wield their pens as well as their tongues to defend the best of all causes. Why have they done so? Do they think the gospel needs not to be defended as much now as ever? Does it not require as many to defend it now as ever? and are there not as many ways to defend now as ever? Who will answer?

There is now great need that meat in due season should be given to the household of faith, and who is best qualified to perform this responsible work? Certainly not the ignorant and inexperienced part of the watchmen. Suppose we all should neglect our duty in this respect what would be the consequence? The paper would stop immediately, and our editors, who stand in the entire front of the battle, would be obliged to leave their work and perhaps travel on foot thro' storm and mud, day and night, to warn their fellow-beings of their approaching destruction, or to return to their work-shops and farms, while at the same time surrounded with professed advent believers, dwelling in their fine cottages, with thousands of dollars worth of property around them. Oh, let me be a Lazarus in this world, and have my good things in the next. Let me discharge my duty faithfully to God. Let us all be found ready, when the Master comes to reward all his servants. Let us be found among the faithful and wise. Amen, even so, come Lord Jesus.

CHAS. CRAWFORD, JR.

Queries of "Simon" Answered.

1. "By the life that Paul lives in the flesh, by 'faith of the Son of God'—did he mean the natural life, etc.?"

Ans. yes. How could he live any other life in the flesh? A man can have no spiritual life in his flesh until the resurrection. "If he meant his natural life why need he have faith in the 'Son of God' to live it?" Ans.—He does not need it. Simon has confounded the procuring cause of man's salvation with the receiving cause—and then quoted Scripture in conformity to his want of discrimination. I did not tell Simon that I lived by 'faith in the 'Son of God,' but 'by the faith of the Son of God. 'Faith in,' is the receiving cause; but 'the faith of,' is the procuring cause of our salvation. I will give a few specimens of the meaning of the phrases 'faith' and 'the faith,' as used in the Bible:

1. It is taken for Christ. Rom. ix. 32; Gal. iii. 23, 25.
2. It is put for the gospel or great remedial scheme. Acts xxiv. 24; Gal. i. 23; ii. 20; iii. 2; Rom. i. 5; xiv. 1; 1 Tim. iii. 9; iv. 1; vi. 10; 2 Tim. iv. 7; Tit. i. 4; Jude 3.
3. It is put for a profession of faith. Acts xiv. 22; James ii. 1; 1 Tim. i. 19; 1 Cor. xvi. 13.
4. It is put for faithfulness. Deut. xxxii. 20; Matt. xxiii. 23; 1 Tim. v. 12; vi. 12.
5. It is put for the faithfulness of God and Christ. Rom. iii. 3, 22.
6. It is put for the grace of faith in us; i. e. justifying faith. Rom. iii. iv. and v. ch. et al.
7. It is a gift of the spirit. Rom. xii. 3-6; 1 Cor. xii. 9; xiii. 2.

It was by 'the faith of the Son of God;' i. e.

he was the 'author' of it, (Heb. xii. 2) that I had life—by it, (the gracious scheme) I now live.

2d Query. "What does Paul mean when he says, 'I was alive without the law once, but when the commandment came,' &c.?" Ans.: I mean that I had no understanding of the law—and without an understanding of it I verily believe I should attain unto life, eternal life, by the deeds of the law: but when I came to understand the law, I saw that though 'ordained' unto life, it failed in the case of Adam to preserve life, how much more in me would it fail to give life? for I have declared in chap. vi. 23, that the wages of sin is death; but the gift of God is eternal life, etc. It was by this light I saw myself a dead man; and by the same precious light I saw 'hope of eternal life,' Tit. i. 2; and believing the promise of God I, by faith, received eternal life, the glorious boon of the immortal God.

Simon will recollect that Bro. N. did not say threaten but demand. Bro. N. has not denied that the law threatened death. That was just what some of his articles went to prove. Still he does not believe that under the remedial scheme men will be punished, primarily, for breach of law, but for the enormous sin of unbelief—the treading under foot the blood of the Son of God and counting that blood an unholy thing. Sin is also a transgression of law, says John. Disobedience to law is a result of unbelief, and obedience a result of faith. Cannot Simon see that the object of the remark to which he demurs, was to show that it is obedience, which the law demands and not the penalty? That the penalty inflicted on the principal cannot satisfy the demand? Therefore substitution cannot pay it, like the paying a debt? If otherwise, surely Origen was right and the law was satisfied.

One question to Simon: Was Paul spiritually 'alive without the law once,' and did he spiritually die 'when the commandment came'?

3d Query. Should Paul attempt to answer this he fears it would revive a discussion on a subject which has been discussed and laid aside by mutual consent of all the brethren engaged in it. I will however propose that Bro. Simon first tell us how Paul could be spiritually alive without the law, which was ordained unto life, (spiritual of course) and when the commandment came how he died a spiritual death? I think a correct answer would open the way to a correct understanding of the 3d query.

Your brother in hope of eternal life, PAUL.

LETTER FROM BRO. P. H. HOUGH.

EDWARDSBURG, C. W., April 6th, 1847.

DEAR BRO. MARSH—I am still in the field telling of the glorious news that Jesus is soon coming! It is now about six months since I left the city of Toronto and came to this vicinity, and have been lecturing to crowded houses every evening, and talking every day with an unbelieving world—and I must say that the Lord has given much fruit in these parts and the people have been very kind to me, although many in the church think I am wrong—but when they hear candidly, they always form quite a different opinion.

Bro. Dixon is with me—is quite a help to me in laboring with the dear mourners. There have been revivals in some places, but the sealing time is drawing to a close as we approach the end. I am strong in the faith that Christ will come in this present generation. This whole region is now being wakened up, whereas six months ago there was not an advent believer in all these parts! It is the Lord's doings—we can work through his word. The ministers seem to oppose as usual, but they seem to keep at a distance and not to come face to face. I think if they would hear candidly before they judge, it would be better for them. I have labored hard this winter, and now I wish to return to the city of Toronto. If some good brother could now come here he would find some friends very much in need of help; who will come?

I have one fault to find with advent preachers. They get well used among their friends, so they keep among the people where there has been much labor bestowed, and neglect other places where they are starving for lack of knowledge. Last winter I was laboring in Prince Edward district and could hardly see the face of an advent preacher; but as soon as I took the steamer and came to the Trent, I found about a dozen preachers in a place where the doctrine has been preached long ago. It is well known that in those old places they have made up their minds, and but little more can be done, while in new places I have crowded houses and all I can do. I have always felt it my duty to go where the people have had no chance to hear on the subject. But I will refrain lest I should hurt some of my brethren's feelings—some cannot go out on account of their families. But I hope those to whom this charge will apply, will take courage and go out into the world and let the light shine. The Lord has raised up one here that I think will not hold his peace. Yours looking for Christ,
PHILIP H. HOUGH.

COLLINS, April 17th, 1847.

BRO. MARSH—I am on my way to Ohio with my wife and child, and if the Lord will we may visit Illinois and Wisconsin in the fall. I think of visiting Cleveland and Akron, but hope to find a place for my family to board that I may travel continually. My general sentiments, I suppose, are understood by those who read your paper. I wish to say however, that the 'power and coming of our Lord Jesus Christ,' with holiness, the sister truth, is and shall be my theme. With this theme I claim the fellowship and sympathy of all Christians. I am willing God should send by whom he will, and do rejoice that he is raising up, (in the churches) instrumentalities by which I trust good will be accomplished. 'When one member is honored all the members rejoice with it.'
BUTLER MORLEY.

LITCHFIELD, April 22d, 1847.

MR. EDITOR—I am much pleased with the few numbers of your paper that I have been favored with. I believe it breathes the right spirit; I have had no acquaintance (only through their columns) of the advent doctrine, never having heard a lecture on the subject and seen an advent lecturer in my life. I preached for the M. E. Church about eight years, till I became satisfied that the influence of all sectarian churches was to promulgate the religion that Paul speaks of: "After the strictest sect of our religion I lived a Pharisee," &c. I took letters two or three years since from said church, and since that have been trying to live alone, with none whose feelings are congenial with mine, except my companion. I feel to bless God that she is no sectarian. I wish I could enjoy the company of advent brethren, if they are not tinctured with sectarianism; for I have become perfectly disgusted with that spirit of anti-Christ so popular now-a-days. I feel I have a duty to do, and should be glad to do it if I knew where and how to begin; but the churches are so shielded in self-righteousness, and their influence so potent, that it seems as if nothing short of the interposition of an all-wise and merciful God, could affect anything.

Z. J. BROWN.

NOTE.—The reason we omit certain parts of Bro. Brown's letter is, much has been said in our paper on the subject on which he speaks, of which Bro. B. was not aware. His remarks were more his opinion than Bible evidence. The latter is what is called for on this very intricate subject.—

OBITUARY.

DIED, in Cherry Valley, Otsego county, N. Y., on the 4th inst., Mr. Nathan Sutphen, son of Bro. J. P. Sutphen of that place, aged 22 years and 8 months. He had been in a feeble state of health for more than nine months, but for the last six months of his life he suffered exceedingly, there being scarcely an hour when it could be said that he was free from pain. He was naturally of a modest and retiring disposition, and much beloved by all with whom he associated. But until about four months previous to his death he remained a stranger to the religion of the "meek and lowly Jesus; nor did he sympathize at all with his parents and other relations in the "blessed hope" till about three weeks before his death. At that time his perception became clear that the end of all things was at hand. He conversed freely with the family and others on that subject—said "Whether we live or die, if we love Jesus, we shall soon meet him and each other, at his appearing, to part no more." After a little respite from severe pain, he would often say, "O praise the Lord for the prospect of speedy deliverance from pain, and final redemption from sin, corruption and death." He finally died a peaceful and happy death, without the least apparent struggle or pain. Before his death, with a cheerful smile on his countenance, he could say in the language of another, "I know that my Redeemer liveth, and that he shall stand in the latter day upon the earth—and though after my skin worms destroy this body yet in my flesh shall I see God. Whom I shall see for myself, and mine eyes shall behold and not another, though my reins be consumed within me." Job. xix. 25, 26, 27.

SAM'L CHAPMAN.

Cherry Valley, April 30th, 1847.

BRO. MARSH—At the request of our afflicted brother and sister Bronson, I send you a notice of the death of their youngest child—a daughter, aged four years and ten months, who fell asleep in Jesus April 8th. For several years she had been subject to sudden attacks which have been extremely distressing, and the patience and calmness which she always manifested in these seasons of suffering was but an index of her natural disposition. She was a lovely and promising child, and though the wound has been deep in the heart of her parents, yet they sorrow not as others which have no hope, but believing with all the heart that Jesus died and rose again, they were comforted with the cheering and consoling reflection that their beloved child who sleeps in Jesus with four others who died still younger, will soon bloom in immortal youth, and that the associations which were so dear on earth, though broken up, will in that blessed state not only be perfected but perpetuated for ever.

L. E. BATES.

Martinsburg, N. Y., May, 1847.

Fell asleep in Jesus on the 16th inst., near Hamonsport, Sarah Ann, wife of Bro. Josiah Lewis, 38 years of age the 9th of January last, with the strongest confidence of a speedy resurrection with the blessed, having been strong in the blessed hope since '43. Within the last two years, his beloved companion, eldest son and mother have fallen by death, leaving the husband and nine children to mourn their loss; but while they mourn, they look for Him who will destroy death, their last enemy. Sister Lewis was the daughter of Sumon Richardson of Long Island.

Condition of Ireland.

From the Dublin Nation.

THE LAST RESOURCE—It is calculated by the English Ministry, as the English Spectator declares, that this year's famine will kill two millions of the Irish people. Two millions! Do men realize to themselves that tragic fact? Do they know what it means? Does it picture to their minds one man out of every four living in Ireland when the British Parliament met to legislate for our "safety" as dead or doomed to death? One out of every four! Of every hundred, twenty-five; an entire fourth of all this Irish race dying in the unspeakable pangs of hunger. No, we believe they do not know it. A vague feeling of the enormous calamity floats in men's minds, but a full sense of that desolation and its consequences no man seems to have realized.

Two millions! If all the human beings living in Scotland—men, women and children—had died of some sudden plague, and left that populous kingdom one wide wilderness, without the face of man, the loss of human life would only equal what has fallen on us. If death had swept over some other main branch of the British empire—over Wales or over Canada—Canada, so strong that men watch to see her spring into the attitude of a new Western Empire, another self-manumitted slave of England—the loss of life would but amount to half what we sustain. The Swiss Republic, the kingdoms of Denmark, Norway, Saxony, Hanover, Tuscany, Greco—any one of all these sovereign States might be depopulated to the last man, and still fewer of God's creatures be lost than we have flung into the grave, with accused apathy, in this single year. The plagues which made fearful epochs in the history of the human race—the wars which men regarded as visible scourges of God—the revolutions which shook to pieces forever some ancient and formidable tyranny—none of them all swept, over a single land with such desolation as English rule has brought upon us in this one fearful season.

And the fever is coming in the track of the famine—the fever which strikes dead the rich, not the poor. It kills, says Dr. Corrigan, in language of terrible significance—it kills one out of ten of the wealthy, for one out of ten of the poor. This scourge is coming, and which of us all can promise himself immunity for a month? Who can be assured that he will not be the next victim of England?

To the proud merchant and the upright trader there is, truly, "something more terrible than death itself—the loss of credit." Is not this, too, come or coming? The inevitable progress of scarcity and confusion from the low to the high, has followed its appointed course, and, aggravated by ignorant laws, it threatens to wrap us in a common ruin. Poor laws, Bentick clauses, and Gregory clauses, the natural alarm of English merchants, the spring-tide of emigration drawing an enormous capital and labor from our shores, the thousand confusions that fall like curses on a state without a Government, come to make this ruin complete and signal.

Two millions of our workers dead—fever coming like an avenging angel among our slothful rich—commercial panic and ruin begun—priests and physicians wanting the necessaries of life in the midst of quadrupled labor—our landed gentry beggared by public works over which they had no control—our rural shopkeepers about to be robbed of their natural customers, henceforth to be fed and clothed by English contractors at their cost—a time fast coming and inevitable, if we do not stop and forbid it—when this ancient Island, robbed of its gentry, its clergy, its professional and mercantile classes, its industrious farmers and skillful artisans, shall present to the eye of the stranger one wide gang of paupers and pay-clerks, slaves and slave-drivers.

Oh, God of Justice and Mercy! to whom our fathers were faithful in peril and persecution, must we endure this? "Out of the depth we have cried to Thee, oh Lord; Lord, hear our voice: let Thy ears be attentive to the voice of our supplication."

When God led His people out of the land of bondage, through such terrible vengeance, their sufferings had not equalled ours. When the Romans meditated abandoning their noble city after its sack by the Gauls—when the brave Dutch nation prepared to go into their ships and sail away from their country forever, rather than endure the desolating dominion of a foreign conqueror, their cause was not more desperate than ours at this hour. But still, in the last extremity, some brave voice was heard, exhorting them to one more struggle—one more struggle for their dear country; and the one more struggle, nerved with a last desperate hope, was still triumphant. Oh, if some potent voice awoke our people to their condition, the same success is still to be won. Men would hail it as the voice of one commissioned of Heaven to speak a divine truth. Why should not such a one now—now, in this hour of our extremity, say for Ireland what Ireland will fiat—"In God's name this has lasted too long; we cannot endure more, and we won't. You may send your lawyers to persecute us, or your soldiers to kill us; but, by Heaven's justice, our people shall die tamely of your law no longer. First take our lives. You drew away our resources to your own country; you feed your soldiers plentifully among us, while the native people of the land starve; you leave us pensioners on the alms of a foreign country, your enemy and conqueror; you scold at our wants, our hopes, our ancient nation—by God's eternal justice, this must end now."

For resolute men there is always hope, and sure deliverance. Always! if not to-day, to-morrow; for justice comes as certain as death. There is a resource in God's Providence of which England takes no account. If our cause be just—and, oh Heavens! is it not just and gray with patience?—a power fights on our side to which ultimate victory is never denied. As sure as God rules this universe, so surely must right prevail in the end. Israel in Egypt were weak in chariots and horsemen to the host of Pharaoh, but it is not recorded that their slavery was without an end.

And if we were silent slaves—if we suffered another year like this to come, and kill its other two millions in slavish silence—the triumph of England, looking complete and irrevocable to human eyes, would, in truth, be but the beginning of defeat. For if our deliverance is not at hand—if our slavery still continue—whether our famished people are to be flung in hideous nakedness and precipitation into their million graves, or to lie stark corpses on the plains conquered from them again by the ruffian sword of violence, a voice will assuredly be raised, calling on Heaven for vengeance on the murderers who slew them in their own land. And children will grow up in the trodden nation, to pray to the Lord that no peace, no rest, no prosperity, may be vouchsafed to England till God's justice to suffering Ireland prevail, and be made manifest to all men.

One more effort, then, for dear Ireland, now, while this generation may still be saved. Let us meet together—all ranks and classes of Irishmen—in some National Council, and take measures, once for all, for our redemption; that we, too, may not be flung into coffinless graves, amid the bitter scorn and contemptuous laughter of all mankind.

Bro. MARSH—Through God's rich mercy we are yet here, enjoying what millions of our race are suffering and groaning for. Tokens every day gather bright on our sky of Jesus near! Yes He is coming! but every purpose of God—all His long-suffering must be accomplished. The burning wrath on the Jew was proof of their national corruption: they fell. His universal rebukes poured out upon the Gentile world, are awful proofs of their filled up measures of crime—and now what look we for, reasoning from past example? Ah, the same hand that wrote the tribulation and fall of the former, as plainly reveals the speedy overthrow of the latter—when His immortal kingdom shall rise and stand forever.

Do not faint my brethren; look up! what tho' the waters, (people, nations, &c.) rage and break in confusion around us, and cannot work out their own cure, nor rest—it speaks for us! Soon, O vary soon, will the end be thundered from the temple of heaven, and great voices proclaim the final victory of the precious Lamb of God. May we all appear before God in His likeness. Amen.

GEO. W. BURNHAM.

BUSINESS NOTES.

J. P. Sutphen—Your paper was discontinued last fall by order of the postmaster here, who informed us there was no such office in the State as "Koeboom." We have entered your name again to the same office.

D. B. Wyatt—We think the letter of which you speak was not received, as we find no account of it, or the money it contained on our books.

Philip Hough—We have none of the 'Locker.' We therefore sent the 'Voice of God.' They were sent by express to Toronto, to save expense of transportation, and as the only safe way of sending them. Are doubtless at express office, Toronto. Such bundles of books cannot be sent by mail into Canada. Note by telegraph duly received.

Will some brother in Toronto find these books, pay freight, and see that Bro. Philip and Peter Hough have them, to whom they are directed.

A. Penfield—We have balanced your account, and entered your name again. The mistake about the $2 was probably ours.

S. Brackett—The $2 for L. H. Stone were credited on book.

Sitting at Jesus' feet.

In like manner also, that women adorn themselves, &c. 1 Tim. ii. 9. —the ornament of a meek and quiet spirit &c. 1 Pet. iii. 3, 4. And she had a sister called Mary, which also sat at Jesus' feet and heard his word. Luke x. 39.

Methinks I see her now,
In simple garb arrayed;
While meekness o'er her brow
Its quiet ray doth shed:
Her beaming eye and listening ear,
Attesting well her love sincere.

She follows not the train
Of Fashion's giddy throng.
Her garments, neat and plain,
No gaudy hues adorn;
No diamond glitters on her brow,
Nor pearls upon her bosom glow.

No 'brodered hair' appears,
Nor useless ribbons wave;
No ornament she wears,
Save one which Jesus gave;
That oen of meekness on her brow,
Doth more than diamond beauties show.

Dear Sisters—let us here,
Like Mary ever sit,
Our Savior's voice to hear,
And worship at his feet;
Ne'er with the crowd aspire to shine,
Or sacrifice at Fashion's shrine.

In rich or vain attire,
O let us ne'er be found,
Nor e'er our forms appear
With 'gold or pearls' adorned;
The gems our Savior doth approve,
Are meekness, quietness, and love.

They all Slumbered and Slept.

This expression is found in the parable of the ten virgins. It may be used to represent the condition of professors of religion in a time of spiritual declension. In this sense it is applicable to the present time. Christians are asleep. But sinners are awake. Infidels are awake. Errorists are awake. And the great enemy of souls is wide awake, and as busy as he can well be. The affairs of his kingdom are in a prosperous condition, and business presses hard on every hand. Every department of his affairs is full of life and activity. All hands are at work. From the Prince of devils down to the meanest of his subjects, not one is idle or asleep. The world is led captive at the will of the Prince of darkness. The entire world was never in so active a state as at present. Devotees of honor, of riches, and of pleasure, come laden with their offerings to their respective shrines. The tumult of war is heard, and the bands of oppression are strengthened. The victims of crime multiply, and the wicked wax worse and worse. The tide of human affairs never before rose so high or moved with such rapidity. How the mighty stream swells, and foams, and rushes on to the ocean—the stream of time, pouring into the ocean of eternity. Whither tend the millions of souls that float on its bosom? Solemn question! What are the disciples of Christ doing in this wondrous scene of activity? Are they asleep, or awake,—active, or indolent,—laboring for the salvation of sinners, or indifferent to their state? Surely this is no time for a Christian to sleep. Reader, how is it with you?—Watch, Val.

Pre-millennial Advent.

BY CHARLES BEECHER.

The denial of the Pre-millennial Advent involves other assumptions besides those relating to time. Certain grand eras are promised of God in the future, and connected with them certain mighty works, full of majesty, sublimity and glory, wherein His honor, the hopes of man, and the peace of the Universe, are bound up. These are five:

- | | | | |
|--------------|-------------|---|---------------|
| 1. PAROUSIA, | COMING. | 4. ANASTASIS, | RESURRECTION. |
| 2. CHILIAID, | MILLENNIUM. | 5. { Palingenesia, or, Regeneration, or,
Apokatastasis, Now Heavens and Earth. } | |
| 3. KRISIS, | JUDGMENT. | | |

Of these, two arrangements are, at least, possible.

I. POST-MILLENNIAL VIEW.

Papacy	MILLENNIUM	Satan let loose.	Advent.	New Heavens over-	1000 years	Apostacy.	Resurrection.	and thrown		Gog and Magog.	Judgment and Conflagration.	Earth.

II. PRE-MILLENNIAL VIEW.

BATTLE OF THE GREAT DAY. FALL OF ANTI-CHRIST. RETURN OF JEWS.	MORNING.	1000 years.	EVENING.	LAST APOSTACY. ETERNAL STATE.
	M	J	I		L	L	E	N	N	I	U	M

{	D	A	Y	O	F	T	H	E	L	O	R	D.	}
	MORNING.	1000 years.	EVENING.

Not only has the first of these been quietly assumed to be true, (even by many who discountenance the study of unfulfilled prophecy,) as to Chronology, but also as to the Nature of the things themselves.

1. MILLENNIUM. This may be either (a.) an era wholly preceded, or wholly followed by the other events; or (b.) an era filled up, and constituted, and measured by them. The former has been quietly assumed.
 2. JUDGMENT. This can mean either (a.) a mere act of pronouncing sentence of reward and punishment, or (b.) a long period of administration of justice, as in case of the JEWISH JUDGES. The former seems to have been assumed.
 3. RESURRECTION. This can mean either (a.) a simultaneous RESURRECTION OF BODIES, of just and unjust; (b.) resurrection of SOULS AND BODIES, in successive ranks. The former has been assumed.
 4. REGENERATION. This can mean either (a.) a work begun after the conflagration is ended; (b.) a work beginning with the conflagration, proceeding with it, pari passu, through successive stages, and consummated after its close. The former has been assumed.
 5. PAROUSIA, or Coming, may mean either (a.) act of arrival, or (b.) Prolonged PRESENCE. The former has been assumed.
- I propose to inquire a little concerning these assumptions.

Remarks on Prayer.

BY CALVIN E. STOWE, D. D.,
Professor of Biblical Literature in Lane Seminary, Cincinnati, Ohio.

In respect to prayer the Scriptures plainly teach us two things:
I. That it is our duty and privilege to pray for the things which we need with the expectation of receiving them.
This truth is taught in such texts as the following: 'He shall deliver the needy when he crieth; the poor also, and him that hath no helper.' Ps. lxxii. 12. 'And it shall come to pass before they call I will answer; and while they are yet speaking I will hear.' Isa. lxx. 24. 'If any of you lack wisdom let him ask of God, who giveth to all men liberally and upbraideth not; and it shall be given him.' James i. 5. Open the New Testament and read attentively our Savior's declarations recorded in Matt. vii. 7-11; Luke xi. 5-13; xviii. 1-8.

II. The Scriptures also clearly teach us that the general promises above quoted have actually been realized by those who, in a right spirit, have availed themselves of them.
This truth is taught in passages like the following: 'The Lord hath heard my supplication.'

Ps. xxxiv. 4-6. Open the Old Testament and read the whole narrative: 2 Kings xix. 14-37. 2 Kings xix. 20—'Then Isaiah the son of Amoz sent to Hezekiah saying, thus saith the Lord God of Israel, that which thou hast prayed to me against Sennacherib, king of Assyria, I have heard. Ver. 33—'By the way that he came, by the same shall he return and shall not come into this city, saith the Lord.' Vs. 35, 36—'And it came to pass that night that the angel of the Lord went out and smote in the camp of the Assyrians an hundred four score and five thousand; and when they arose early in the morning, behold they were all dead corpses. So Sennacherib, king of Assyria, departed, and went and returned and dwelt at Nineveh.'

But we are not confined to Scripture for the verification of these promises. Many a Christian, in every age, has known and felt that his prayers for particular blessing have been heard and answered; and such instances in the life of a Christian are numerous, just in proportion to the simplicity and uniformity with which he relies on God. A few insulated cases of this kind might be explained on the ground of accidental coincidence; but when they occur uniformly and thro' a series of years, it is contrary to all the laws of sound reasoning to explain them in this manner.

I will illustrate my meaning by a few well authenticated examples. Henry Young Stilling was an eminent physician in the service of the Grand Duke of Baden. He died in the year 1812, and consequently was well known to many persons now living. His career was an extraordinary one.

By his skill as an oculist, he restored more blind persons to sight than there are miracles recorded of our blessed Savior himself. I have been acquainted with some of his children and grandchildren, and feel no doubt of the entire accuracy of the facts about to be related. Stilling was an intimate friend of the German poet Goethe, who will not be accused of credulity or superstition, and it was at Goethe's suggestion that he published the account of his own life from which the following incidents are taken. Goethe, in his autobiography, says of Stilling, "he had a sound understanding, and an enthusiasm for all that is good, right and true, in the utmost possible purity. His course of life had been very simple, and yet had abounded with events, and a manifold activity. The element of his energy was an impregnable faith in God, and in an assistance immediately proceeding from Him, which obviously justified itself in an uninterrupted provision, and an infallible deliverance from every distress and every evil. He had experienced numerous instances of this kind in his life, and they had recently been frequently repeated; so that, though he led a frugal life, yet it was without care and with the greatest cheerfulness; and he applied himself most diligently to his studies, although he could not reckon upon any certain subsistence from one quarter of a year to another. I urged him to write his life, and he promised to do so."

Such is the unequivocal testimony of Goethe, who was most intimately acquainted with him; and surely no one will say that Goethe was a man to be beguiled by religious fanaticism, especially towards the latter part of his life, when he wrote the sentences I have just quoted.

In youth, Stilling was extremely poor, destitute of the common comforts and necessities of life. After a long season of anxiety and prayer, he felt satisfied that it was the will of God that he should go to a University and prepare himself for the medical profession. He did not at first make choice of a University, but waited for an intimation from his heavenly Father; for as he intended to study simply from faith, he would not follow his own will in anything. Three weeks asked him whither he intended to go. He replied he did not know. "Oh," said she, "our neighbor, Mr. T., is going to Strasburg to spend a winter there—go with him." This touched Stilling's heart; he felt that this was the intimation he had waited for. Meanwhile Mr. T. himself entered the room, and was heartily pleased with the proposition. The whole of his welfare now depended upon his becoming a physician, and for this, a thousand dollars at least were requisite, of which he could not tell in the whole world where to raise a hundred. He nevertheless fixed his confidence firmly on God, and reasoned as follows: "God begins nothing without terminating it gloriously; now it is most certainly true that He alone has ordered my present circumstances entirely without my co-operation. Consequently it is also most certainly true, that He will accomplish every thing regarding me in a manner worthy of himself." He smilingly said to his friends who were poor as himself, "I wonder from what quarter my heavenly Father will provide me with money." When they expressed anxiety, he said, "Believe assuredly, that He who was able to feed a thousand people with a little bread lives still, and to Him I commit myself. He will certainly find out means. Do not be anxious, the Lord will provide."

Forty-six dollars were all that he could raise for his journey. He met unavoidable delay on the way, and while in Frankfort, three days ride from Strasburg, he had but a single dollar left. He said nothing of it to any one, but waited for the assistance of his heavenly Father. As he was walking the street and praying inwardly to God, he met Mr. L., a merchant from the place of his residence, who says to him: "Stilling, what brought you here?" "I am going to Strasburg to study medicine." "Where do you get your money to study with?" "I have a rich Father in heaven." Mr. L. looked steadily at him and inquired, "How much money have you on hand?" "One dollar," says Stilling. "So," says Mr. L. "Well, I'm one of your Father's stewards," and handed him thirty-three dollars. Stilling felt warm tears in his eyes; says he, "I am now rich enough—I want no more." This first trial made him so courageous that he no longer doubted that God would help him through every thing.

He had been but a short time in Strasburg when his thirty-three dollars were again reduced to one, on which account he began again to pray very earnestly. Just at this time, one morning, his room-mate, Mr. T—, says to him: "Stilling, I believe you did not bring much money with you," and offered him thirty dollars in gold, which he gladly accepted as in answer to his prayers. In a few months after this, the time arrived when he must pay the Lecturer's fee, or have his name stricken from the list of students. The money was to be paid by six o'clock on Thursday evening. Thursday morning came and he had no money, and no means of getting any. The day was spent in prayer. Five o'clock in the evening came, and yet there was no money. His faith began almost to fail; he broke out into a perspiration—his face was wet with tears. Some one knocked at the door. "Come in," said he. It was Mr. R—, the gentleman of whom he rented the room. "I called," said Mr. R—, "to see how you like your room." "Thank you," says Stilling, "I like it very much." Says Mr. R—, "I thought I would ask you one more question; have you brought any money with you?" Stilling says he now felt like Habakkuk when the angel took him by the hair of the head to carry him to Babylon.* He answered, "No, I have no money." Mr. R— looked at him with surprise, and at length said, "I see how it is, God has sent me to help you." He immediately left the room, and soon returned with forty dollars in gold.

Stilling says he then felt like Daniel in the lion's den, when Habakkuk brought him his food. He threw himself on the floor and thanked God with tears. He then went to the College and paid his fee as well as the best. His whole College life was one series of just such circumstances. He was often in want of money, but he never asked man for it; for he had no man to ask; he asked God for it, and it always came when he needed it. Was he authorized to enter on a course of study with such prospects, and such expectations? The leadings of providence were such that he had not a shadow of doubt that it was his duty to enter on this course of study; he prayed fervently for divine guidance, and felt that he had it; he availed himself of all the lawful means in his reach for the supply of his own wants—and when he had no means of his own, he asked help of God—and never failed to receive what he asked for. He became one of the most useful physicians, and one of the greatest benefactors to the poor that the world has ever seen. He restored sight during his life to nearly five thousand blind people, most of whom were very poor and unable to render him any pecuniary reward.

What stronger proof can we have that God was his guide? Let us take a series of events of the same kind from the life of another person who lived a century previous, and was of a calling and character quite different from Stilling. Augustus Heman Franke was a parish minister in the city of Halle, with a small salary, barely sufficient for his own support, and no property except his books. He was a man of cool deliberate judgment and extensive learning, and was benevolent on principle rather than impulse. His heart was affected with a view of the wretched condition of the children of the uneducated poor, in Halle, and was determined to do something for their relief. In process of time he had a large orphan establishment, containing between three and four hundred children, entirely dependent on his exertions for their education, their clothing and their daily food. His means, of course, were continually running short, and he had no other resource than prayer to God.

This was a resource which never failed. Hear his own testimony as it has been confirmed by a thousand witnesses: "In the month of April, 1696, our funds were exhausted, and I knew not where to look for the necessary supplies for the next week. This caused me great distress; when some person who is yet unknown to me, put into my hands a thousand dollars for the orphans. At another time when our funds were exhausted, we laid our case before the Lord, and had scarcely finished our prayer when there was a knock at my door and a letter was handed in with $50 in gold: $20 soon after came, which completely supplied our wants, and we were taught that God will often hear prayer almost before it is offered. In the month of October, 1698, I sent a ducat to a poor and afflicted woman, who wrote me that it came to hand at a time when she greatly needed it, and she prayed God to give my poor orphans a heap of ducats for it. Soon after, I received from one friend two ducats; from another twenty-five; from two others forty-three: and from Prince Paul of Wertemberg five hundred. When I saw all this money on the table before me, I could not but think of the prayer of the poor woman, and how literally it had been fulfilled. In February, 1699, I was almost entirely without funds, though much was needed for the daily wants of the children and other poor. In this state of difficulty, I comforted myself with the promise of the Lord Jesus: "Seek ye first the kingdom," &c. When I had given out the last of our money, I prayed to the Lord. As I left my room to go into the college I found a student waiting for me, who put $70 into my hands. Soon after we were in the greatest want, but I trusted in the Lord, and determined to go to my closet—and while on my way, a letter was put into my hands from a merchant, informing that he had received a check for a thousand dollars, to be paid me for the orphan house. How forcibly did I feel the truth of the promise, "Before they call I will answer."—Isa. lxxv. 24. I had no reason to ask for assistance, but I went to my closet and praised the Lord for his goodness. At another time, the superintendent of the building came to me and asked me if I had received any money for the payment of the laborers? "No," said I, "but I have faith in God." Scarcely had I uttered these words when some one was announced at the door. On going to him, I found he had brought me thirty dollars. I returned to the study and asked the superintendent how much money he needed? He replied, "thirty dollars." "There they are," said I. At another time of great need, I prayed particularly, "Give us this day our daily bread." I dwelt upon the words this day, for we needed immediate aid. While I was yet praying, a friend came to my door and brought me $400. At one time I was recounting to a friend some of our remarkable deliverances from want, by which he was so much affected that he even wept. While I was speaking, as if to confirm my statements, I received a letter containing a check for $500. At another time I was in need of a large sum, but did not know where to obtain even ten dollars. The steward came, but having no money for him I asked him to come again after dinner, and in the mean time gave myself to prayer. When he came, all I could do was to ask him to come again in the evening. In the afternoon I was visited by a friend with whom I united in prayer to God. As I accompanied the friend to the door, on his departure, I found the steward standing on one side, and on the other a person, who put into my hands $150.—On another occasion, the superintendent began to pay the laborers with only $14, but before he got through, he received enough to complete the payments. One of my orphan children who was about to go on a visit to his friends, came and asked me for two dollars to bear his expenses. I told him I should be glad to give them to him, but that I had not more than a half dollar in the world. This he could scarcely believe, as he had never discovered the least signs of poverty at the orphan house. I told him to return to me again after a short time. I thought of going to borrow the money, but being engaged in a piece of business which could not be postponed, and knowing that the Lord could easily send me the sum, if it was his will, I kept my seat. In less than a quarter of an hour, a person came in bringing me twenty dollars. I was now able to give the boy his two dollars, which I did most cheerfully.

So uniformly did this assistance come, just when it was most needed, and through so long a series of years was it continued, that the old steward, instead of desponding, got into the habit of saying, when any great difficulty occurred, "Now we shall have reason again to admire the manner in which God will come to our aid."

This institution has become one of the largest and most useful in Europe. It frequently has from 2,700 to 3,000 pupils, and when I visited it in 1836, it was, in all respects, one of the most delightful schools I saw in the whole progress of my tour. Franke also instituted a Bible press to furnish Bibles cheap for the poor. This press has issued over two millions of copies of the whole Bible and more than a million of the New Testament. He also established a large apothecary's shop, for furnishing medicines to the poor, which is still in active operation; and a benevolent book-store, which is now the largest in Germany.

So much for the faith and prayers of one man!

If any one can believe that such a long series of answer to prayer can be accounted for on the ground of accidental coincidences, such a man would scarcely be persuaded, though one should rise from the dead.

May EVERY Christian expect such answers to prayer as those which we find in the lives of Stilling and Franke?—Oberlin Evangelist.

Bro. B. Morley to Bro. H. P. Hill.

"CONSCIOUSNESS OF THE DEAD."

BRO. HILL—With this caption and Luke xx. 38 for a text, you take the ground that "Abraham lives." You say he is dead to us, but all that is essential to constitute him Abraham is in reality alive. The conversation (of which your text forms a part) was commenced upon the doctrine of "the resurrection," as ver. 27 will show; and I think the Savior confined himself strictly to the difficulty proposed. Hear his answer: "The children of this world marry, &c.—but they which shall be accounted worthy to obtain that world and the resurrection from the dead neither marry nor are given in marriage." Ver. 36—"Neither can they die any more: for they are equal unto the angels: and are the children of God, being children of the resurrection." Is there any reference here to an intermediate state? Was it not the idea, that, in "that world" beyond "the resurrection from the dead," the relation of husband and wife ceases, which "put the Sadducees to silence?"

"Neither can they die any more." This implies that those who are to be equal to the angels had been dead. Now will you limit the personal pronoun "they" to that part which you say is not essential to conscious being, and then confine the word "die" to that? If so, where is your warrant that that part which you call "the soul" will ever be made equal to the angels, or that it cannot "die any more." God says, "The soul that sinneth it shall die." Ezek. xviii. 20. The 21st verse shows clearly that this death is the second death. The word "soul" is evidently used in the same sense here as in Rom. xiii. 1, and in many other passages. Now if the "I myself," or "the man proper" does not really die, then this passage is really no warrant against the second death—for it declares, "Neither can they die any more."

Again, you say, "To bring into existence that which does not exist, is not a resurrection but a creation." I do not believe that death is extinction of being. The primary meaning of the word death is, "extinction of life"—extinction of the life of being leaves the being as really in existence as it was before death. As "man" had an existence before he had life, so he has existence after that life is taken away. The resurrection, however, is sometimes spoken of in the Bible as a creation. [See Psa. cii. 18; civ. 23, 29, 30.]

In your second paragraph you say, "Let the Savior speak." I say, amen! We will hear him and try to understand his language. He says: "Now that the dead are raised, even Moses showed at the bush, when he calleth the Lord the God of Abraham, and the God of Isaac, and the God of Jacob. For he is not a God of the dead but of the living: for all live unto him."—Vs. 36, 37. Here the present tense is used—"are raised," to announce a future resurrection. And you must admit that Christ here speaks "of things that are not as though they were," or take the ground that the dead were then raised. Evidently, the idea is, that the dead are [to be] raised. You seem to rest a good deal of weight in the new translation, which gives "suggested" instead of "showed." The primary meaning of the word [manuo] is "to indicate, declare, show." This word is found in three other passages in the New Testament, viz :

after he had come to this determination, a friend John xi. 57; Acts xxiii. 30 and I Cor. x. 28, and rendered "discover," "told" and "showed." A change is not always an improvement.

Christ further says that Moses "calleth the Lord the God of Abraham," &c. Now to those who do not believe that Abraham is really dead, there would appear to be a very faint suggestion of the resurrection of the dead. Christ attributed the error of these Sadducees on the subject of the resurrection to their "not knowing the Scriptures nor the power of God." Then from "the Scriptures" he quotes a proof text, not for the purpose of proving anything concerning men between death and the resurrection, but to prove, "show" or "declare" that "the dead are [to be] raised." Then to set the proof text home, he adds, "For he is not a God of the dead but of the living: for all live unto him."

Now let us hear what Moses says of the death of some of the patriarchs: "Then Abraham gave up the ghost, and died in a good old age, an old man, and full of years; and was gathered to his people. And his sons Isaac and Ishmael buried him in the cave of Machpelah, in the field of Ephron the son of Zohar the Hittite, which is before Mamre."—Gen. xxv. 8, 9. The "ghost" was not Abraham, for he gave it up. I understand it to be the "spirit" or "breath of life" which goes to God who gave it. Its absence left Abraham dead; and I do not think that that "ghost" will ever be returned to Abraham again. But God says "I will put my spirit in you—and I will be your God."—Ezek. xxxvii. 27, 28. It is also said of Jacob: "And when Jacob had made an end of commanding his sons, he gathered up his feet into the bed, and yielded up the ghost, and was gathered unto his people."—Gen. xlix. 33. Where were his people? [See xlix. 5.] "Bury me," he says, "with my fathers in the cave," &c. Inasmuch as they are really dead, having "died in the Lord," and since the Savior has introduced (just before) the present tense with a future reference, may it not be that he speaks "of things that are not as though they were," when he says, "For all live unto him." Instead of marrying and giving in marriage, "the children of God" and of the [first] resurrection, in "that world" will all live unto him. But you contend that Abraham in being gathered to his people was taken to paradise, where you suppose them to be. I think Ezek. xxxvii. 11-14, is positively against you here. This is given in explanation of the vision of dry bones, and, of course, is literal language: "O, my people, I will open your graves and cause you to come up out of your graves, and shall put my spirit in you and ye shall live," &c. See also Rev. xxi. 7—"He that overcometh shall inherit all things; and I will be his God and he shall be my son."

If "Abraham lives" in what sense has he fallen? What do you mean by "spiritual substances?"

ANOTHER MASSACRE OF THE NESTORIANS.—That monster Turk, Bederkhan Bey, has renewed his massacre of the Christians with horrible ferocity. "A letter from Mosul, dated March 15th, 1847, says he had just beheaded a bishop and a priest, and put several other Christians to the most atrocious tortures. The Chaldeans were in hourly expectation of a massacre. Nothing has yet been done by the General Government to suppress these appalling scenes. The Porte has flattered Bederkhan with presents, endeavoring thus to ensnare him; but the barbarous monster is too cunning, and now the Sultan promises to send 40,000 men to rescue those poor Christians who are yet alive."

Great Apostasy.

NUMBER III.

13. Character of the Holy Spirit. Though the sects do not now generally teach that the Holy Spirit is 'very and eternal God,' yet this doctrine is a fundamental article in most of their creeds. But a very different doctrine is taught in the Bible: for instead of the Spirit being called God, it is repeatedly called 'the Spirit of God'—'the Comforter'—'the Spirit of truth, which proceedeth from the Father.' Jno xv 26.

This step in the great apostasy has been the necessary consequence of the erroneous belief in the tri-personality of God.

13. Personality of the Spirit. It is a very strange inconsistency to hold that it requires the Father Son and Spirit to constitute the very God, then say that 'God is without body or parts, and yet believe that the Holy Spirit is a person. Yet strange and inconsistent as these things are, they are held by the 'orthodox' sects as most sacred truths of the Bible. But relative to the personality of the Spirit (which it is our object now to notice), the Bible teaches no such doctrine. It speaks of the Spirit as an emanation, a power, an influence of God; or something that can be poured out, as, 'I will pour out of my Spirit.' It is compared to water, 'Come unto me and drink.' To oil: 'With my holy oil have I anointed thee.' 'GOD anointed JESUS of Nazareth WITH the HOLY GHOST and power.' Acts x 38.

The apostasy in this case has aided in veiling in thick darkness and inexplicable and contradictory mysticism, the simple doctrine of the Bible, so that deceived thousands have rejected the whole book as spurious. Without an examination of the matter, they have supposed that the Bible taught these absurdities; and as a matter of course the only successful way to avoid their bewildering influence has been to turn away from the Bible altogether. Alas, countless thousands have stumbled into perdition over this and similar errors of the church!

14. The work of the Spirit. The sects, with but few exceptions, hold that an important work of the Spirit is to reveal unto man his duty, in things of religion. Hence the minister prays for a knowledge (by the teaching of the Spirit) of his duty where when and what to preach. The church member importunes God for the Spirit to tell him when and what to speak and pray in conference and prayer meetings. God is invoked day and night by ministers and people, to convict and convert sinners, to reclaim backsliders, and awaken to action cold formalists, by the influence and power of the Spirit. In short, one would suppose, from very many of the sermons exhortations and prayers of the church, that the redemption of man was the exclusive work of the Spirit—that God and Christ have nothing directly to do in the great work, and that man, in order to be saved, has nothing to do but to be passive in the hand of the Spirit. We do not say that this doctrine forms an article in the creeds of the sects, but we do aver that their practice shows that it holds a very prominent position in their faith.

But what does the Bible represent the work of the Spirit to be? To inspire holy men of old to reveal the truth—To teach the apostles all things which Christ had spoken unto them—To reprove the world of sin, of righteousness and judgment—To bear witness with our spirit that we are the children of God—To help our infirmities—To comfort the saints —To seal them unto the day of redemption—And to be in the children of God an earnest of their inheritance, until the redemption of the purchased possession, and other like glorious works.

It would require volumes to describe the sad effects of this step in the great apostasy. Suffice it to say, it has laid the foundation of no small portion of the religious fanaticism with which the church and world have been cursed. The deluded have taken their own human impulses for the movings and teachings of the Spirit, and every evil work has been the sad fruit of their mistaken doings. It has doubtless been the ruin of thousands of the impenitent, the backslidden, and cold formalists. They have been taught that the work of reformation was the immediate work of the spirit, or, that reformations never commence, and sinners can never reform, without the special movings of the Spirit; and as they have felt no such special movings, as a matter of course no special efforts are put forth, on the part of the sinner and ungodly, to save himself from his sins, consequently he has died in his iniquity, and must be forever lost!

15. The Bible. With few exceptions the sects acknowledge in word, but deny in practice, that the Bible is an all-sufficient rule of doctrine and discipline of the church. But the Bible says the 'word of the Lord is perfect'—calls it 'the perfect law of liberty'—and says that 'all scripture is given by inspiration of God, and is profitable for doctrine, for reproof, for instruction in righteousness: that the man of God may be perfect, thoroughly furnished unto all good works.' 2 Tim. iii. 16, 17.

Here again it would require volumes to tell the sad tale which might be told, of religious strife, persecution and blood, the legitimate fruits of this presumptuous step in the great apostasy. It has virtually said that the 'perfect law of liberty' is imperfect, is not competent to govern the church of God; and in its stead has substituted the conflicting, unjust and offensive laws of men. It has virtually said that the Head of the family or church has either been incompetent to give a law for its government, or has neglected to do it, and left this great, this divine work to be accomplished by uninspired men; It has opened wide the door of human expediency,* assumption and presumption, through which has been introduced into the distracted church, swarms of senseless creeds, more destructive of the peace of Zion, than the locusts or hail to the vegetation of Egypt. In a word, this fatal error has been the moving cause of the martyrdom of millions of the children of God. Let us who are daily looking for the 'Author and Finisher of our faith,' shun every appearance of this fundamental error, viz; human creed making, and cleave in all things to the BIBLE, THE PRECIOUS BIBLE.

"OBJECT OF THE GOSPEL."—We see in a recent number of our once favorite paper, the Christian Palladium, from one of its corresponding editors, D. Millard, the following question and answer:

"What is the object or design of the gospel? What is it designed to accomplish? This may be answered in a few words. 'The design of the gospel is to reform men and make them better—to reconcile the sinner to God.'"

Had 'Professor'! Millard said, that these things were a design or a subordinate object of the gospel, he would have spoken according to the oracles of God. But to say that they are the design, or the ultimate object of the gospel, falls infinitely short of the truth in the case. For the object or ultimate design of the gospel is to 'bring life and immortality to light through the gospel,' and to cause all who love and obey it to 'look for that blessed hope, and the glorious appearing of the great God and our Savior Jesus Christ.' For this glorious hope of the gospel was Paul bound in chains—For it Abraham became a stranger and pilgrim, for he 'looked for a city that hath foundations' and for 'an heavenly country.'

The difference in the case is, the 'Professor'! places the 'object or design of the gospel' all this side of the grave; but the divine writers carry it into the new earth, into the kingdom of God, where those who become reconciled to God (in this life) will shine as stars or the sun in immortal glory forever and ever. O how glorious is the design of the gospel: it is worthy of the infinite mind of Him who is its wise and gracious author.

American Evangelical Alliance.

If we correctly understand the matter, this body was fully organized a few days since in the city of New York. As in the parent or London convention, so in the New York Alliance, the subject of slavery troubled them. It seems that between three and four days were spent in trying to dodge, modify, or so dispose of this question as to redeem their pledge to their English brethren to do something on slavery, and at the same time secure the good graces of southern slaveholders, and still not render themselves obnoxious to the fellowship of the worthy abolitionists of the north. But to make a cement that would cause the iron and clay to unite, was a very difficult task; but difficult as it was, their learned wisdom, at length, in their judgment, made up the compound—and here it is, in the light of a resolution, sixteen voting for, and eleven against it. What an august body! What a representation from all the evangelical sects to form an 'American Evangelical Alliance!' But wisdom is seldom found among the multitude; and whether the few possessed it in this case is yet to be decided. We will hear the resolution:

"That while the Evangelical Alliance admits into its bosom such persons only as are respectable members of evangelical churches, we are nevertheless persuaded that the great object of the Association, the promotion of a larger Christian union, may be furthered by a frank expression of our sentiments on the subject of slavery. We therefore declare our deep, unalterable opposition to this stupendous evil, and we hold it to be the duty of all men, by all wise and Christian means to seek its entire extirpation and removal from the land. Still, the one object of the Alliance shall be steadily kept in view, which is the promotion of Christian union and brotherly love."

Let us analyse this compound, this anodyne.

"While the Evangelical Alliance admits into its bosom such persons only [the Unitarians, Christians, Disciples, 'Millerites,' &c &c, we do not admit, but only such] as are respectable members of evangelical churches."

Who, in the eyes of the Alliance, are looked upon with more respect, or are considered more 'respectable members of evangelical churches,' than slaveholding church members of the evangelical churches of the south? None: for it was for the good graces of this very class that the American delegation in the London Alliance sacrificed the cause of Christian union at the bloody shrine of slavery. Then of course 'respectable' slaveholders of evangelical churches, in common with others of other respectable evangelical churches, are eligible for membership in the American Evangelical Alliance.

"We are nevertheless persuaded that the great object of the Association, the promotion of a larger Christian union, may be furthered by a frank expression of our sentiments on the subject of slavery."

That is, the discussion of slavery shall not be entirely excluded from the Alliance, but equal privilege shall be granted to respectable members of slaveholding and non-slaveholding evangelical churches, to make a 'frank expression of sentiments' either against or for the 'stupendous evil' [not sin] of slavery, without the least breach of our Christian fellowship.

"We [sixteen!] therefore [claiming our right frankly to express our sentiments] declare our deep [but no so deep but we can fellowship respectable slaveholders] unalterable opposition to this stupendous evil [we do not consider all evils sins], and we [sixteen] hold it to be the duty of all men, by all wise and Christian means [such as a frank expression of sentiments against the 'evil,' without a breach of fellowship between us and respectable slaveholders] to seek its entire extirpation and removal from the land. Still, [though we thus express ourselves, and though slavery may never cease,] the one object of the Alliance shall be steadily kept in view, which is the promotion of Christian union and brotherly love" in the respectable orthodox or evangelical churches, of every name and nation, whether holding slaves or 'unalterably opposed to this stupendous evil.'

This we think is the true light of this dark affair; and in view of it we can say in the words of Jacob, 'O my soul, come not thou into their secret; unto their assembly, mine honor, be not thou united.'

☞ We should have stated in our notice last week about not enlarging our sheet, that we design at the commencement of next volume to use some smaller type, and make some other improvements in our paper, so that our readers will have an increase of matter, if not an enlarged sheet, without increasing the subscription price.

Another Time Passed.

The 18th inst. was the most extreme definite point fixed upon with much tenacity by Bro. Gross and others for the advent of Christ. We rejoice not in their disappointment, and do not refer to it out of any other motive than to impart the word of counsel and comfort in this hour of trial. It has not been dishonesty in sentiment of our brethren, nor any radical defect in their general faith in the advent theory, that has led them at this time, and many others at former times, to come to unwarranted definite conclusions on the time of the advent, but following a wrong principle of interpretation of the plain word of the Lord has done the mischief. 'Of that day and hour knoweth no man.'—In such an hour as ye think not the Son of man cometh—and their kindred expressions, have either been overlooked, or explained to mean something different from what they most clearly teach.

Time, if nothing else, has repeatedly shown us that we have been wrong in this one point, viz: setting precise definite time. Let us profit by the experience of the past; settle down upon the sure foundation of our faith and hope, the plain word—and joyfully wait the triumphant return of our long absent Lord and King. Let no one on account of a disappointment in precise definite time, give up his blessed hope. With this one exception, your precious faith is accordidg to the immutable word of the Highest; and if you hold it fast without wavering firm unto the end, the crown of unfading glory will soon be yours forever. That we are near, very near the consumation of our hope, there can be no reasonable doubt: the most immutable and numerous evidences justify this conclusion. O, then, we say to one and all, 'He that endureth to the end shall be saved.'—'Behold I come quickly: hold that fast which thou hast, that no man take thy crown.'

☞ But little from the editorial pen may be expected in one or two of the succeeding numbers of our paper: our absence from home will make it impracticable to write much. Will correspondents aid what they can to make the paper both interesting and useful. Sometimes they kindly flood us with valuable matter, then again a drought ensues. The latter seems to be indicated now. Let a plentiful shower of the sweet waters of life constantly fall upon our pages, that the refreshing streams of salvation may continue to cheer every part of our beloved Zion where our sheet is read.

☞ Several questions on different subjects were designed for this number; but as our preparation to leave for Boston has prevented our giving the necessary answers, they will therefore be deferred until our return.

THE CHRISTIANS—were once a pure, humble, spiritual, Bible, and persecuted people. But they have widely departed from their first love, purity, and strict adherence to the Bible, which they could once lawfully boast was their only rule of faith and practice. We are reminded of their apostacy by the following frank acknowledgement of Elder J. Ross, recent editor of the Christian Palladium, found in that paper for May 15th. Under the head of 'Conferees,' Elder R. says,

"Our conference organization grew out of the necessities of our condition."

Then it did not grow out of the Bible: and of course, if the Christians endorse this declaration, they will no longer contend that they are strictly, or to any considerable degree, a Bible people: for destroy their anti-christian conference organizations, not unfrequently hot beds of jealousy and unholy strife, and you destroy no small part of that organization which constitutes them a religious sect.

Alas, how has the once fine gold become dim, where it recently shone most brilliantly. May those among the Christians who still sigh and cry for the abominations committed in the land, and still love the precepts and examples of the precious Bible, faithfully wash their hands from all the corruptions around them, cleave to the truth, and be ready to meet with joy their soon coming Lord and King.—And may such cases of early departure from the truth as we see in this people be a warning to us not to fall after their example. Let nothing that pertains to the faith, government, or conduct of the church of God, 'grow out of the necessity of our condition.' This doctrine of human expediency crucified the Son of God—gave life and perpetuation to the Man of Sin—has put to death millions of the saints—has filled the church with anti-christian laws, doctrines and ordinances, and countless other evils we cannot now name. Oh, let us shun it in all its deceptive forms.

CORRESPONDENCE.

Short Sermon on Time.

"And he spake to them a parable; Behold the fig-tree and all the trees: when they now shoot forth, ye see and know of your own selves that summer is now nigh at hand. So likewise ye, when ye see these things come to pass, know ye that the kingdom of God is nigh at hand."—Luke xxi. 29-31.

I shall notice three prominent ideas suggested by this parable:

1st. The event referred to here, which is the personal advent of our Lord from heaven, as all common sense would dictate at the reading of this chapter. Further remarks on this head are unnecessary.

2d. Character and degree of the knowledge we may have in relation to the time of that event.

3d. Means of said knowledge.

On the second proposition I remark: our knowledge of the time is to be positive in character, but not perfect in degree; so the parable indicates: When the trees begin to put forth leaves, we know that summer is approaching—and are as positive of this as we are of any fact addressed to our senses in the material world. The parable authorises us to be equally positive, that the coming of Christ is at the door, when we see the things he had mentioned come to pass. But though Christ designed that we should know positively when the event was at the door, it does not appear that he anticipated that our knowledge would extend to the precise hour or day. What man can put his finger on the hour or day when the spring ends and the summer begins, though he knows that summer is hard by? So the parable and all the Savior's teaching confirms the fact, that the day and hour would not be known even to his children, until it occurred.

In the third place, our knowledge of the time of the advent is to be derived from prophetic events, periods, and signs. Literally, a man must have some knowledge of the seasons of the year, and of events connected with those seasons, or he would not know that summer was nigh though he saw the leaves putting out; but if he knows the autumn has been succeeded by winter, that the chains of winter are broken, and the earth is freed from that bondage, he then knows that the next thing in the order of seasons and events is the summer. The events to which I shall chiefly refer are those revealed to Daniel, consisting in the rise and fall of earthly powers, political and ecclesiastical. It seems to me that no person who has carefully studied the prophecy of Daniel, especially those who have had the assistance of those who have written on the subject recently, can have any doubt but that the four successive kingdoms have existed, the fourth been divided, and when in that state papacy arose, and had the dominion for a specified time, and then his dominion was taken away: all these events most strictly answering to the prediction of the prophet. To doubt that the above events have transpired in the order above stated, would be to set aside all past history, down almost to our own day. No consistent mind can doubt.

Again, the careful student of the above mentioned prophecy, must also see that the events referred to were to reach down to the end of the world in its present order—to the end of all earthly governments, for they are to be succeeded by God's everlasting kingdom, which is to make all earthly kingdoms like the chaff of a summer's threshing floor and no place to be found for them—and the dominion under the whole heaven is to be given to the saints of the Most High, who are to possess it for ever and ever.

How positive is the knowledge we derive from the prophecy and events referred to above, that the kingdom of God is soon to be set up. Every event that was to make up the drama of this world has transpired. Could we doubt that Daniel ever lived, or that he was a prophet? or doubt that Babylon, Persia, Greece or Rome ever existed? or that Papacy has ever existed? then we might doubt that the kingdom of God is at the door; but no informed man can doubt the facts mentioned above, nor can they consistently doubt the last consideration.

Periods.—I refer to those recorded in the 7th, 8th, 9th, and 12th chapters of Daniel, but shall not stop to argue that the periods constitute a per-

LETTER FROM BRO. D. B. WYATT.

STANFORD, C. E., April 30th, 1847.

DEAR BRO. MARSH—I am now about closing a meeting of several successive days in this place. I found the brethren here generally strong in theory on the doctrine of our coming Lord; but the spirit and power of truth was much wanting—and indeed this great deficiency still exists in many instances. But what are names, modes or forms, when not accompanied by the sanctifying influences of the Holy Spirit of God? They cannot avail in that day when God shall deal with us. Then will all external show vanish before solemn realities, and every person disrobed of the drapery of forms and systems of truth, which, however orthodox, only serve as a channel of divine communications, and every person appear in their true, internal character. The grand object to be attained by all truth is one—the restoration of the divine image in the soul here, and in the body at the first resurrection. Then will the whole person awake in the likeness of Jesus, who is our great and heavenly standard.

Some of the brethren here stand fast in the liberty wherewith Christ has made us free, and are contending not only for the form of faith once delivered to the saints, but also for the power. O how much grace we need in this holy warfare that our weapons be not carnal, but mighty through God to the pulling down of strong holds. The contest was first a grapple of truth with errors of argument with argument; in the main it was controversial and the blessing of God followed in the conversion and satisfaction of souls up to '45—since which the general form of encounter is varied, and now it is emphatically a war of spirit with spirit. Spirits blend together in the closing struggle and this makes the present a perilous and trying position. Lord strengthen thy tried and tempted children.

The Lord has mercifully awakened many of the cold and lukewarm in this town, and they are coming up to the help of the Lord against the mighty. They see the importance of oil in the vessel with the lamp. A few unconverted are awakened, but I fear they will lose their serious impressions through the artifice of hell and wicked men, before they find the Savior. But it is truly like the gleanings of the harvest when the vintage is done.

Two were baptised last Sabbath—a father and daughter. It was a holy, happy season on the banks of Jordan, while the blessed Spirit brooded over the waters. May the father and family be prepared for the kingdom. The Lord is evidently drawing the line of division between the pure kingdom and defiled Babylon. Human beings have set their stakes and passed their judgments; now the Lord, the Judge of all, is forming the separation on the principle of oil. The Holy Spirit in the vessel, or the mind of Christ must be in us, or we are none of his. The true Bride is showing herself more to view as she robes herself for the marriage, and washes her wrinkles and spots away in the blood of the Lamb. The broad seal of heaven is forming upon the heart of waiting Israel. The work will soon be done, and a voice will be heard from the throne, saying, "Praise our God all ye his servants, and ye that fear him, both small and great. And I heard as it were the voice of a great multitude, and as the voice of many waters, and as the voice of mighty thunders, saying, Alleluia, for the Lord God omnipotent reigneth. Let us be glad and rejoice, and give honor to him, for the marriage of the Lamb is come, and his wife hath made herself ready."

O let us be ready every moment to hear the commanding voice of heaven, saying, It is done! Soon, dear brethren and sisters, if faithful to the end, we shall take the kingdom under the whole heaven. Then our sufferings will be over, and fect chart of time, or measure the duration of the events with which they stand connected—for it would be charging the angel with folly and sin to suppose he would interrupt and abuse the sublime revelation that he was making to Daniel, by references to periods which had no connection with the subject. When Daniel had been shown the successive beastly powers that were to tread down the earth, also a power called the daily and another the abomination that maketh desolate, at the sight of which were to tread the host and sanctuary under foot for a long period, his soul must have been deeply affected—and nothing would be more natural than to inquire, "How long to the end of these things?" This inquiry was anticipated, and the answer was given, "Unto 2300 days." Then shall these oppressive powers cease to tread down the earth, the host and sanctuary. This will be when the times of the Gentiles have run out, for until that time Jerusalem, the glory of the earth, and typical sanctuary, is to be trodden down by them; but the Gentile rule will not cease until the stone cut out without hands, shall smite the image or earthly powers, and they become as chaff. The sounding of the 7th angel introduces this work as accomplished; when he sounds, those who have corrupted, trodden down or destroyed the earth, shall then have been destroyed. How clear that the 2300 days reach down to the time when God shall bring this earth into judgment. The lesser periods were most evidently designed to assist us in understanding the larger one; one of them commencing, and another terminating with this large one, and all relating to events within the 2300 days or years. We know that these periods are about expiring: 1st. Because the united testimony of a large majority of historians and chronologists in fixing the dates of the events which these periods were to cover, bring their termination about this time; and 2d. By the well known fact that the events embraced in those periods have transpired.

Signs in the sun, moon and stars a means of our knowledge.—These have been numerous and there are but few now living who have not witnessed some of them. True, the unbelieving say these things are trifling and have been always occurring, not considering that their own sayings constitute a sign; for Peter tells us that this kind of scoffing would exist in the last days, in relation to evidences of Christ's coming. Trifling as these signs have been the wise of this world have not been able to account for them, but very many were at the time of their occurrence exceedingly terrified. But could God give a sign that would be acknowledged as such by the unbelieving? Impossible. When the indiscribably sublime and awful presence of God rested on and shook Mt. Sinai, the thunders and lightnings filled the heavens around—the earth shook continually: Israel soon ceased to fear and adore and made a calf in sight of, and surrounded with all this Majesty! Let God blow out the sun, moon and stars, and envelope this earth in chaotic darkness for months, and if men lived through it they would soon ridicule the man that would think it a sign from God. Or let Gabriel fly through heaven to-day and every eye see him, and his trumpet reach the deepest caverns of earth—to-morrow men would make derision of him who would retain any fear. In fact when Christ appears in power and glory, though the tribes and kindreds of earth will mourn and wail, yet soon they will get over their fright, and I think the Bible clearly proves that they will concert measures to make war on Christ and his saints. The truth is, if they hear not Moses and the prophets neither will they be persuaded though one rose from the dead—or in other words, if men are not convinced of truth by sober reason and the word of God, no physical sign that omnipotent power can put forth can do them any good. I also look upon the several descriptions, found in the New Testament, of the peculiar state of the church at or near the end, as signs. Peace and safety doctrine, mentioned by Paul, goes the length and breadth of the land. Scoffers are saying, "where is the promise of his coming?" The evil servants say, "My lord delayeth his coming"—they smite their fellow-servants and eat and drink with the drunken.

The state of the church answers in every particular the description given by Paul to Timothy, 2d epistle, chap. 3d; and I think all that is said of the moral and religious state of the world is now being fulfilled, and soon the Lord will come. I also look upon the present distress of the earth as the last sign, and immediately connected with the coming of Christ, answering to a part of the 25th and 26th verses just preceding the text. Thousands have seen their earthly all carried away by sweeping inundations—other thousands have seen their all consumed by fire—fearful storms have destroyed the hopes of as many more. The cholera is destroying thousands—intestine feuds and wars have laid many villages and cities in ruins and destroyed their thousands. Even now our own people are robbing and killing men, women and children of a neighboring people. Last in the train is famine, and what heart can look at its ravages and not weep.

The above is but a glance. To form anything like a correct idea, we should go to the hundreds of thousands of families made wretched by the above causes. Look at the kind and degree of suffering—add the amount of suffering from causes which have existed for years, such as oppression, crushing millions in the dust—look this all over and who can doubt that this is a time of "distress of nations with perplexity." If time should run on to any length these troubles will increase—as yet they have fallen mostly on the poor, but God will continue to chastise until the rich and proud shall taste the bitterness of the cup, and men's hearts generally will fail them for fear. Christ will come before these troubles shall come to an end; for when they occur we are to see the Son of man coming in a cloud with power and great glory. When we take a view of all the facts relating to Christ's coming, how clear it is that we may know, positively, that that event is now at the door. I can have no doubts on the subject, but such as are most fearfully related to infidelity. I am glad that I live at this eventful period, and that the Lord has given so much light on the time of the advent. Time has been meat in due season—it is so still to me, and I am thankful for every article I find on that subject, and hope that those who have the mind and means will continue to search for light on time. Although the numerous sayings of Christ most clearly show us that the exact time or day and hour will not be known until it occurs, yet it does appear to me that God designed we should have definite time, at least so far as the year and perhaps the season of the year is concerned. God gave the time to Daniel in years, and the marked definiteness of the periods clearly indicate that God designed them to be understood. I suppose there are many things which God designed to be understood, which perhaps are not understood because sin has deranged the light of this world and blinded the minds of men. The Savior very well knew the difficulties there would be in understanding, and hence did not give the time, for he knew it had been given in as plain a manner as it could be; but he gave signs to assist us in understanding, for it was his will that we should know when he would come. Let us put away a dogmatical and censorious spirit—search for truth, and love one another though we differ. May the Lord soon gather us all into his eternal kingdom.

LETTER FROM BRO. N. A. HITCHCOCK.

SENNETT, W. T., April 20th, 1847.

DEAR BRO. MARSH—I have recently returned from Winebago county, Ill., where, in six or eight different places, I have given from one to ten lectures on the glorious subject of the second and speedy coming of the Lord Jesus in the clouds of heaven. More or less interest has been manifested in these several places on this subject, and I want to witness that I have the plainest reason for believing that a goodly number there will rejoice in the day of God for having heard and acted in reference to this most thrilling subject. In one place especially the Lord was pleased to bless the preaching of his truth in raising up a lovely company of fifteen or twenty, who publicly expressed a willingness to identify themselves with this precious truth and to consecrate themselves entire and anew to the service of God. Among these were several who were reclaimed from a backslidden state and several who before the commencement of these meetings were thoughtless and unconcerned. Perhaps some of my dear brethren who may espy this may be in doubt upon this point, still, if I ever had reason to believe a revival genuine I have witnessed here in this country true and genuine conversions, deep and pungent concern of mind, and this anxiety turned to gladness and rejoicing in the Lord, and this was in the midst of determined opposition on the part of the Episcopal Methodists, and Universalists, and such a union of effort as was made by this class to destroy the influence of God's truth was truly astonishing. Such foul slang and allusions to "crazy Millerites," filling up the mad-houses, and the assension robes, and the passing of the time; (what arguments these!) but enough to show their blindness and darkness so deep, so rooted, nothing will move it. Who can but sigh amidst such a state of things as this.

This same Universalist minister, who resides some 20 or 25 miles from this place, was sent for some time since to hold a public controversy with the former Methodist minister—but now he could be sent for and unite his strength (or weakness) with the present circuit minister to put down God's truth. The Methodist minister appointed a meeting to be held on the 3d and 4th inst. I attended this meeting on the Sabbath: sermon in the morning by the circuit minister and in the afternoon by the Universalist. Their subjects were the 24th of Matthew, and nearly agreed in sentiment on this chapter, and fully with regard to Millerism as they called it, that it was a delusion. At the close of their remarks I told the people that there was an agreement between these two ministers, but a wide difference between them and myself, and a difference manifestly essential—that there was much at stake—an eternal interest, and this must not be trifled with, and entreated them to accept of nothing as evidence on this subject but Bible argument—cautioned them against yielding to the influence of scoffing and ridicule, as there was no argument in it. I had an appointment at the same place in the evening and presented my views of the 24th of Matthew as I understand it. The Lord gave me great liberty on this occasion. O how precious the fulfillment of his promise, "Lo I am with you," &c. (Matt. xxviii 20,) and "My grace shall be sufficient for you."—Paul.

I think nothing could have made these two ministers so friendly on this occasion but a deadly touch upon their favorite expositions of Scripture, and a fear that their Zions were in danger. But amidst this vowed hostility to the advent view, the Lord moved upon a number of hard hearts and softened them before him. One man and his wife who had been Universalists for years, renounced the system, gave their hearts to God, embraced his truth and erected the family altar. Another, the wife of an Universalist, experienced religion on Friday following the meeting referred to. She told her husband in the evening she saw it to be her duty to pray with her family. He told her he would not have any of her praying, not a word of it. She still said to him she must pray, and did so. The Lord blessed her and softened the heart of her husband, so that he told her that he would not oppose her any more. I preached here on the Sabbath, the 11th inst., and baptised three happy children of the Lord.

Help seems to be needed in this country. Where, O where is a Paul or a Peter who is willing to leave their fishing nets, boats, father and all, for God and his truth, (and trust him who feeds the ravens and clothes the lilies,) and engage in the work of gathering the remaining scattering gleanings in the great harvest-field? I hope the good Lord will call such ones along. I will tell you, my bretheren, for your encouragement, hitherto I have had enough to eat, drink and wear, and I am sure if I do the will of God I shall have to the end, then everlasting life.

My love to all God's faithful ones scattered abroad.

LETTER FROM BRO. S. CHAPMAN.

COOPERSTOWN, N. Y., May 4th, 1847.

DEAR BRO. MARSH—I left Hartford, Ct. one month since, expecting, should time continue, to travel and lecture during the present season in the State of New York. Shall probably visit and perform some labor in the counties of St. Lawrence, Jefferson, Wayne and Cayuga. We hope and trust the Lord will direct us to such portions of the vineyard as will best please himself. I hope to be found "giving meat in due season" "when he cometh." On our way to this place we visited the few friends in Adams, Centreville and North Adams, Mass—spent a week in each place to good effect: the brethren were quickened—backsliders were reclaimed, and we hope that a few souls were converted to God, also to our blessed hope. Spent a short time last week in Albany; assembled with the friends on Thursday evening at "the house of prayer;" the season was delightful. Those dear brethren remain steadfast in the faith, expecting speedy redemption. Bro. G. Needham is now with that devoted people. They hope he will remain with them for a season. I thank God that I was permitted to meet that dear brother there, and for the first time enjoy a personal interview with him; it was truly a feast to my soul. Came to this place on Saturday last; had a refreshing season with the brethren here on the Sabbath. At 5 P. M., there being several present who had heard but little on the subject of our "blessed hope," at the request of a brother we gave an exposition of Matt. 24th. The word was effectual in many hearts. A young man was present who confessed that he had been a scoffer, he and a few others were especially benefited. While we were remarking upon the signs in the sun, moon and stars, (comparing Matt. with Mark and Luke) and showing by the Savior's own words that the generation witnessing them should not pass away till he came again, this young man wept aloud, and as soon as opportunity was given he and several others rose and earnestly requested an interest in the prayers of the saints. They also during the season of prayer "called on the name of the Lord for themselves, and it was very manifest that the "young man" and two or three others were "delivered" agreeable to the promise. Joel 2 32. Such a pentecostal season or universal baptism of the spirit I have not witnessed for many months. Last evening the house was filled—our subject was, "repent ye, for the kingdom of heaven is at hand."

Good attention was given to the word—the brethren were comforted—others were instructed concerning the kingdom, and the converts retired, "looking up and lifting up their heads." We intend to spend the next Sabbath with the brethren in Norwich, and then proceed to the West, making a short tarry in Manlius, Fayetteville and Syracuse, after which we intend to make our way to Wolcott in Wayne co., where we propose to remain and labor for a season. Expect to arrive there in about three weeks. The friends who are disposed to make communication will be particular to do it seasonably: they need not be told that "cold water to a thirsty soul" is indeed refreshing.

Yours, my dear brother, in the blessed hope of speedy and final redemption,

SAM'L CHAPMAN.

AKRON, O., May 5th, 1847.

Spiritualism has made terrible havoc in all this region. The few who remain feel that they cannot give up the blessed doctrine or the blessed hope. We had an interesting meeting at Cleveland last Sunday. Bro. Robinson preached morning and evening. I pray the Lord to direct and bless that dear brother, and enable him still to endure hardness as a good soldier.

I would request my brethren with whom I have labored in the State of New York to pray for me, that I may be "a good minister of Jesus Christ." And I would exhort them not to forsake the assembling of themselves together, and not to leave their first love. But do not trust in meetings—trust in the living God. If you do this, you shall be like Mount Zion. Amen. B. MORLEY.

ALBANY, May 17th, 1847.

DEAR BRO. MARSH—I have been to conference and am, on the whole, pretty well pleased with the proceedings. There was so little difference between us that there was not room to differ. Our meetings were characterized by great unanimity throughout—our conferences were of the most refreshing character; I know you would have enjoyed them. These seasons were melting, tender and heavenly; they seemed like old 743 times. Life, power, animation and liberty, without fanatical outbreking or abuse of that liberty which was enjoyed. I felt myself perfectly at home with the brethren as soon as I became acquainted. I must say, taking all things together, I am disappointed, agreeably so.

Yours waiting for the Lord,

GEO. NEEDHAM.

MOSES CHANDLER.

MARIPOSA, April 6th, 1847.

The little church in this place is gradually increasing in numbers and piety. On time they stand upon the oath of him that stood upon the waters of the river, and the promise of him that cannot lie that the wise should understand. With this position they have met with no disasters by time passing. When disappointed they have always been prepared to search the word with fresh courage and confidence that the promises will not fail. They expect with confidence, suitable to the evidence, their deliverance this year. Yours in love, PETER HOUGH.

Morals of Hayti.

Rev. Mr. Graves, one of the editors of the Reflector, in a late letter from Hayti, gives the following dark picture of the state of morals there:—

To the influence of the religion of Hayti on the morals of the people, we have already adverted.—The Sabbath is the great business day of the week to the middle and lower classes, while the rich employ it as a holiday. It is the day especially devoted to military parade and to marketing. The public squares are crowded with buyers and sellers, and all the shops thronged as on no other day of the week, with customers. The marriage relation is, for the most part, sustained without a marriage contract, and divorce and polygamy are too common to excite attention. 'The faithful husband of our wife' is a character so rare as to be marked 'exception to the general rule.' The President has several wives—one at Cape Haytien, it is said, to whom he has been lawfully married, and whom he acknowledges and supports, though he seldom sees her. His wives in Port au Prince reside in different parts of the town and are said to be severally proud of their share in his attentions. Respectable merchants boast of the number of their amours with exultation. In a word, the institutions of the Sabbath and of marriage are alike prostrate. Both have a name, but the divine object of neither is secured, with a vast majority of the population. As a legitimate consequence, intemperance, profaneness, and vulgarity extensively characterize all classes of society.

ITALY.—A most diabolical plot to murder the Pope has been discovered. It was first found out by the French ambassador, and he revealed the names of the conspirators to the Pope. Their intention was to assassinate him whilst giving audience to one of them who was, by lot, to be appointed to kill him. A Capuchin presented himself for an audience of the Pope. His Holiness requested his name; this he gave boldly, but before being admitted the Pope looked over the list of the conspirators and found the name of the Capuchin there. He immediately called for and concealed six carbiners, who, on the Capuchin's entrance, seized him, and on searching him found he had a brace of loaded pistols and a poisoned dagger about his person. The Capuchin was conveyed to prison. Many arrests have taken place. The plot is no doubt a concoction.

IRELAND.—The people still suffer. What famine has spared, disease is preying upon with a destructive and unrelenting hand. Fever rages in the country districts of Cork. Capt. Drury, R. N., Government officer at Kinsale, has fallen a victim to the disease, and at Dunmanway two men were found dying of disease who had crawled into a dyke, whence the guardians, as they returned from the work house, had been removed to the hospital. At Innishannon the lady of the doctor had died of fever; and the Cork "Constitution," remarking that fever was "filling the graveyards" of the county, illustrates the truth of its statement by adding, that one gentleman in Kilmore lost "seven tenants in one day." In the City of Cork, on the 6th ultimo, three children of one family died within an hour of each other and the only remaining members, father and mother, are in the same disease, and considered hopeless. In a parish in the county of Roscommon, Rookskey, the priest, in a letter to a weekly paper (the 'Register,') states that a townland in his cure, on which seventy families resided a brief time since, is now entirely desolate and not a house remains. The people had either drooped under disease and famine, or had fled through fright. The reverend gentleman complains also that a system of proselytizing his flock had been put into operation, and forty-one of them who, on Sunday last, had attended at the service of the Established Church, were, he says, rewarded with a suit of clothes each on the succeeding day. The master of the work-house at Parsons-town had fallen a victim to fever, and the clerk of the union lay sick of the disease. In Castlebar, the Rev. Mr. M'Manus, a Roman Catholic clergyman, had died of fever caught in the goal while attending on the prisoners. At Belturbet, in Cavan, several "respectable inhabitants" have fallen victims to fever and dysentery.

The system of plunder has again commenced in the country, which we regret to find, is of a very heartless character. In Westmeath, the house of one man was broken into and robbed by a large armed party, and five cwt. of oatmeal, together with some articles of clothing and linen yarn, were taken away; while, in another instance, in the same county, one cwt. of oatmeal was forcibly taken out of a poor man's house, and a sum of 24s., which he had gathered to purchase seed oats for his land. In Yougal, county Cork, an organized attack was made upon the bakers' shops, but little mischief was done; yet it is a further proof of the frightful progress of disorganization. Another fact we may mention, which we find stated in a Cork paper. A man in that city committed three deliberate crimes in one week in order to get himself maintained at the public expense. Twice he escaped from disinclination of the parties aggrieved to prosecute; but he said "He was determined not to starve." There are several cases of death by starvation recorded in the journals; in one of these cases, at Maryborough, the jury agreed to the following special resolution, which they appended to the verdict: "That vast numbers have lost their lives from destitution, more or less prolonged, and many others because they could not procure food suited to their state of health." Of 2,800 paupers in the North Dublin Work-house, 1,400 are not natives of, or have had any claims for residence upon the union; the relief committee have decided upon making the rate under the new act uniform, a resolution strenuously opposed by those having property in the rural divisions of the union.

The police inspectors have got instructions to report on the quantity of arms held by the peasantry in Ireland, and on the characters of those who generally possess them. This would seem to point towards renewed legislation against their indiscriminate possession.

The papers still teem with murders and attempts to murder. We take the following as one of the most recent: A few nights ago, two murders were perpetrated at Kiltankin, in this county, within eleven miles of Caher, at the Mitchelstown side. The facts are these: A man, named Michael Brien, went to Clogheen to sell oats, and having disposed of them, he returned home in the evening. Two acquaintances of his, named William and Lawrence Cull, came to his house, and after remaining some time they departed. Brien and one of his daughters went to bed, and another daughter, about ten years of age, remained sitting at the fire. In some time after the Culls entered the house and took their seats by the fire. The daughter who had gone to bed meanwhile fell asleep, but was soon aroused by the crackling of fire. She immediately got up, and found her sister burned to death; she then called her father but he made no reply, and being almost suffocated with the smoke, she left the house. In a short time it was ascertained that the father was also dead. The money for the oats was taken off. An inquest was held on Monday, the 12th ultimo, before William Ryan, Esq., coroner. Dr. Bagwell, after examining the bodies, stated that he found two severe fractures on Brien's head. A verdict in accordance with the facts was returned and both the Culls have been committed.

STATE OF THE COUNTRY.—Generally, in most of the counties, the tillage of the land has been well attended to; but there are vast tracts totally neglected. Many landlords have supplied seed on loan; but in parts of Mayo, Roscommon, Sligo, Tipperary, and other counties, cultivation is still very backward. There appears to be much less of actual famine, although extreme destitution still prevails in various districts, but generally throughout the country pestilence is at work, and in the workhouses typhus fever exists to an alarming extent. The Kilkenny "Journal" says, "There are about 700 paupers in the hospital of the work-house, 600 of whom are in fever. Seventy-seven fever patients were admitted from the last board day to this."

Gospel Faith.

BY MRS. A. C. JUDSON.

How potent is its spell! With mystic chain
Of adamant strength, it binds to things
Beyond, invisible—reveals a world
Of such transcendence, that this lower sphere
Loses its brightness, and recedes to nought
But a dim speck, while life's ten thousand charms
Are made to vanish like those beautiful gems
'Neath morning's fervid rays. A radiant light
It sheds upon the dreariness of earth—
And softens down its woes: Mid fierce storms
Dispenses sunshine—On the darkest cloud
Paints a refulgent bow—Ay, takes the dregs
From sorrow's bitter fount—And brings to view
O'er sin's sad ruins rising walls and towers.
With lightning's speed Temptation's fiery darts
Fall powerless beneath its mighty shield.
Thus, more than victor, girt anew with strength,
The soul may triumph o'er its deadliest foe.
It penetrates the dungeon's massive walls,
And pours in floods of such celestial rays
That those in chains sing joyous notes of praise—
Makes dismal dens and caverns to resound
With strains melodious—Writes most precious words
On all around to stay the sinking soul
When danger threatens—Shuts the lion's mouth,
Subdues the raging fire, and lends a charm
E'en to the martyr's faggot, and his stake!
A soothing cordial to disease it brings,
And, 'mid the strife of earth's rude elements,
Peace, like a gentle rill—Yea, more than all,
Irradiates the tomb, and scatters flowers
Upon its pathway—takes from death its sting,
And from the grave its final victory.

O sovereign antidote for ruined man!
Star only that can light his devious way—
Blest golden wing! on which with eagle flight
From these dark vales of sin, and death, and wo,
He soars to heights of purity and peace!

Pre-millennial Advent.

BY CHARLES BRECHLER.

Having exposed the tendency of the principles necessary to the denial of the pre-millennial advent, I proceed to illustrate the assumption which I conceive to have been tacitly involved in the application of those principles. I shall take five great points of the future, and exhibit side by side on each, two different opinions. The one generally maintained, the other generally unknown.
And I will request you to observe whether any fair issue has ever been taken and properly discussed between them. And whether the first is held because it has been proved the more Scriptural of the two, or because it has been taken for granted, and the other never even examined.

I. MILLENNIUM.

1. Common view. The millennium is part, by progress of the present dispensation, ushered in by the operation of the Holy Ghost, through the ministry of uninspired men, Christ remaining at the Right Hand, without miracle, and without additional direct Revelation.

2. Another view. The millennium is a new dispensation, ushered in by miracle, through the operation of the Holy Ghost, in the body of the Man, Christ Jesus, conveying an additional and final direct Revelation.

II. DAY OF JUDGMENT.

1. Common view. The day of judgment is a simple day of ordinary length, appropriated to the mere act of passing sentence on all mankind, and executing that sentence.

2. Another view. It is a millennial day during which that man, whom God hath ordained, shall appear in righteousness, to judge the living nations in the morning, the dead in the evening.

The Personal Logos, he shall by simple use of language, as with a two-edged sword, smite the nations. Earth's millions shall behold standing among them the once crucified, uniting in himself the perfection of power intellectual, moral and physical, and by his spoken law the self-sustained executive of the race. A speaker clothed with immortality. Whom they cannot again kill for his truth, but whose irresistible words shall slay them. Earth needs but one such man to dwell therein to produce a day of judgment. By the breath of his lips, he will slay the wicked. Simple truth, irresistibly spoken, will destroy life.

III. RESURRECTION.

1. Common view. At the end of the millennium; the saints from glory, and the lost from torment, are summoned to receive bodies, which, earth being no longer their abode, they carry back respectively to Heaven or Hell.(!)

2. Another view. In the millennial morning Christ, the second Adam, descends and stands in Eden restored. The Elect, their number then complete, rise from Hades, and stand the second Eve by his side. Sons of God, by resurrection, crowned heirs of a regenerate earth, they are married, and spend together the Sabbath of the world's great week, the rest that remaineth for the people of God. This is the "Exanastasis," begun in regeneration, sealed in sanctification, and consummated in redemption of the body. "The first Resurrection," or "The Resurrection, which is from among the dead." Luke xx. 35. The simple "Anastasis," or Resurrection of the rest of the dead, is different in origin, nature and end.
Begins in no spiritual renewal, confers no eternal life, occurs in the evening of the great day, and ends in the second death.

IV. PAROUSIA, (coming.)

1. Common view. Christ's parousia, is a very uncertain phrase. It may mean (a) His coming by the Roman army to set up the abomination of desolation and destroy Jerusalem. (b.) It may mean His coming to the believer at death.
(c.) It may mean His coming by the Holy Ghost, to destroy the Papacy. (d.) It may mean his coming after the millennium to judgment.

2. Another view. Christ's Parousia, has, in the New Testament, but one simple, uniform and consistent meaning, viz: "Bodily presence." It is never used, nor any form of its parent verb, to signify the presence of the Holy Ghost; but relates in every instance to that visible and glorious Epiphany of the Savior descending from heaven;
not to supercede the operations of the Holy Ghost, but personally to conduct them; not to supercede truth by force, but to unite both in himself, and destroy, not Papal only, but all error. To accomplish by the Holy Spirit in the manifest body of himself and his risen elect, that entire logical annihilation of error, which God has not vouchsafed to be achieved by agency of the elect while yet unredeemed in body, and sinful, and militant, and dying.

V. CONFLAGRATION AND REGENE- RATION.

1. Common view. The entire dissolution of the globe by fire, and its dissipation in space, or its reduction to some unknown and uninhabited condition. And the transfer of the race, to other abodes. All occurring in some short space, in the evening of the millennium.

2. Another view. A process of purgation by fire, dissolving a portion of the globe, to re-construct the same as first-fruits of the New Earth, in strict analogy with first-fruits of the Resurrection. Immanuel was the first fruits of that. Im-manuel's Land shall be the first fruits of this.
Proceeding with assigned limits of prophetic earth, during the millennial era, and after the last and greatest mundane apostacy, embracing the remaining portions of the globe, which being reconstructed, the New Heavens and Earth are complete, and become the eternally undisturbed abodes of righteousness.

Now, in regard to these views, I remark, either is a priori, possible, both depend on interpretation, and one or the other must of necessity be false.

Hence, there are but two ways that either can be held. (a.) By evidence. (b.) By assumption But rightly to hold either by evidence, the following things seem necessary.

1. The evidence on which both rest, must appear to have been familiarly considered and compared, the arguments properly analyzed, classified and weighed.

2. That view, which departs most widely from the literal sense of Scripture, is bound to assume the labor of proof. The other stands rightfully on the defensive.

3. Until the argument has been fairly made out, according to the above admitted principles, no practice should be entered upon, tacitly involving the truth or falsehood of either.

If, then, it should appear that, in either of these views, a contrary course had been followed; that one has been familiarly asserted, without comparison with the other, and without analysis and classification of the evidence on which the other rests—if, further, that one be the furthest removed from the literal sense of Scripture, and yet instead of assuming the positive labor of proof, when challenged, it be found standing on the defensive and challenging the other for the whole positive argument, and if, meanwhile, in such a posture, it is made the basis of a wide-spread and vigorous system of practical enterprise, in such circumstances I should say, that view was justly liable to the charge of assumption.

But what are the facts? The former view is, perhaps, generally entertained. And the entire system of modern benevolent enterprise, is, if not based upon it, at least strongly modified and influenced. At the same time, it undeniably throws itself upon the defensive, and either disregards the other view with considerable disdain, or else challenges her to assume the positive labor of proof, and vindicate her right to a hearing. And this, notwithstanding its own confessed wide departure from the literal sense of Scripture.

And, finally, this has been done, too often, with but little acquaintance with the second view, and without even the ability to state, or to refute her principal lines of argument.

Of the few who profess to have examined both sides, many seem to have done it for the purpose of refuting the latter, thus showing a pre-judgment of the case, while of the many who do not profess any such examination, the oracular decision is still more emphatic.

There are those that consider the study of unfulfilled prophecy prejudicial to mental sanity; others, useless and vain.

With such, rhetoric stands for logic, impossible interpretation is wrested into possibility, possibility adopted for probability, and probability preached for certainty.

Avowed hostility to the study of unfulfilled prophecy, joining hands with confessed neglect, has pronounced definite decree, upon the entire merits of the question.

Such decisions, as they cannot rest on evidence always seem to betray a confidential acquaintance with divine counsels, precluding the necessity of Scriptural research.

The happy possessors of this intimacy with God's private views, no longer need slavishly to bend opinion to interpretation. Theirs is the lofty prerogative of controlling interpretation by opinion, and teaching the submissive multitude what the Bible ought to mean, to be worthy of God. But such questions ought not thus to be decided, especially when assumption goes hand in hand with the principles of interpretation, as before shown, of infidel tendency. The day which is opening calls for something better than rhetoric, something stouter than assumption. The Papal Hierarchy is a reality towering in living iniquity before our eyes. Blood is sprinkled all over her from turret to foundation stone. Her doom is near. If Rhetoric and Assumption are of any avail she might stand, for she is perfect mistress of those weapons. But her fall will be sudden, vivid, terrible. And with her all who are fighting with her weapons. That fall will be caused by the Parousia of the Son of God. Is it well, then, to base all our expectations of that Parousia, that glorious Epiphany, and all its sublime concomitants, upon assumption?

I would earnestly inquire, by which word of Scripture such a posture of mind is best described?

1. "Looking for, and hasting unto the Parousia of the day of God, wherein the heavens, being on fire, shall be dissolved, and the elements shall melt with fervent heat."

2. "Saying, where is the promise of his Parousia, for since the fathers fell asleep, all things continue as they were from the foundation of the world."

Religious Maxims.

Let the time of temptation be the time of silence. Words react upon feelings; and if Satan in the time of our trials can induce us to utter a hasty or unadvised word, he will add by so doing to the power of his previous assaults, and increase the probability of his getting the victory.

It is one of the surest signs that the natural life still exists and flourishes in us, if we have what may be called an outward eye; and, instead of looking inwardly upon our own feelings, are prone closely to watch and to judge others. "Judge not that ye be not judged." One of the first inquiries arising in the mind of a truly humbled and sanctified person when he sees another in transgression is, "Who maketh me to differ?" And one of the first supplications which he offers is, "Lord, have compassion upon my offending brother!"

He whose life is hid with Christ in God, may suffer injustice from the conduct or words of another, but he can never suffer loss. He sees the hand of God in every thing. He knows that every thing which takes place has either a direct or indirect relation to his present state and is designed for his benefit. "All things work together for his good."

It is a sign that our wills are not wholly lost in the will of God when we are much in the habit of using words which imply election or choice—such as, I want this, or I want that; I hope it will be so and so, or I hope it will be otherwise. When our wills are lost in the will of God, all our specific choices and preferences are merged in God's preference and choice. The soul truly loves the arrangements of God whatever they may be. In regard to whatever is now and whatever shall be hereafter, its language is, "Thy will be done."

Confession of sin is an important duty; but there is no true confession of sin where there is not at the same time a turning away from it.

When Satan cannot prevent our good deeds, he will sometimes effect his evil object by inducing us to take an undue and selfish satisfaction in them—so that it is necessary if we would not convert them into destructive poisons, to be crucified and dead even to our virtues.—Life of Faith, by T. C. Upham.

Transubstantiation.

In the New York Observer, Mr. Kirwan, formerly a Catholic, has been giving his reasons why he cannot return to the pale of that Church. His letters are addressed to Bishop Hughes. On the subject of transubstantiation Mr. Kirwan very ably remarks:

Transubstantiation is another of the peculiar doctrines of your Church. By this you teach, that, in the Lord's Supper, the bread and the wine is converted into the real body and blood of Christ, by the consecration of the priest. The thing is so absurd as to confute itself; and as, therefore, to require from me but a brief statement. Chaloner, chap. v., thus states the doctrine. "The bread and wine are changed by the consecration into the body and blood of Christ." "Is it then the belief of the church that Jesus Christ himself, true God and true man is truly, really, and substantially present in the blessed sacrament? It is, for where the body and blood of Christ are, there his soul also and his divinity needs be. And consequently there must be whole Christ, God and man; there is no taking him to pieces." And all this is proven to demonstration by the quoting of the words of Christ at the institution of the Supper, "this is my body," "this is my blood."

Now, Sir, if you and your Church had only the common sense to look for the true meaning of the two little words "is" and "this" in the above sentences of the Savior it would have saved you a world of trouble. Look at one or two similar passages. "The seven good kine are seven years—and the seven good ears are seven years." Gen. xli. 26. "The seven stars are the angels of the seven churches."—Rev. i. 20. "The seven heads are the seven mountains."—Rev. xvii. 9. The sense is plain here. They signify those things. So the word "is" may mean to signify. Now for the word "this." It obviously refers to the bread. I will have none of your nonsense about "the substance contained under the species." It is darkening counsel by words without knowledge. So that the simple, natural, reasonable, scriptural sense is, "This bread signifies or represents my body." "This wine signifies or represents my blood." Just see how a little common sense simplifies every thing!

Now turning back to your interpretation, permit me, in view of it, to ask you a few questions. Did the apostles at the first institution of the Supper eat the real body and blood of Christ? So your church must, and does teach! What power have you more than I have, to work such a miracle as to change a little wafer into the real body and blood of Christ? If you stickle so much for the letter in your interpretation of "this is my body," "this is my blood," why withhold the wine from all but the priests? Why give up the bread for a wafer? If some wag should mix arsenic with the wafer before consecration would you be willing to take it after you changed it into the real body and blood of Christ? You place great dependence on John vi. 56. You take it literally. Will you take the whole connection literally? Then he that eateth this bread shall live forever. He that eats this bread will never hunger. All that you have to do if your principle is true, is to give your wafer to the poor, famishing Irish, and they hunger no more!

But the thing is too outrageously absurd to dwell upon! Nothing equals it in absurdity in all paganism. If a man should mumble a few words over a stone and tell you it was converted by these words into bread; what would you say to him? If, against all the evidences of your senses, he should seriously assert that it was bread; and if, in addition, he should seriously assert that unless you believed that stone to be bread you must be damned, would you not be for putting him in a straight jacket?

But I must bring this letter to a close. These are but a few of the illustrations of the way and manner in which you teach for doctrines the commandments of men. And without at all exhausting the subject, I must here close my statement of the reasons which forbid me to return to the pale of your church. When I give up my Bible for the commandments of men, they must have learning, or genius, or wit, or something to recommend them. They must be, at least, good nonsense, which, you know, to an Irishman, is quite interesting. With great respect yours,

KIRWAN.

Evangelical Alliance.

Speaking of the American branch of the Evangelical Alliance, recently held in the city of New York, the Watchman of the Valley very appropriately remarks:

Union efforts, we have long observed, are very apt to prove a failure. Such will be the result of the late grand London effort, unless wisely conducted.

1. One cause of failure is the directness of the effort itself, which overlooks the philosophy of the human mind. The natural repulsion of the heart is not to be overcome by trying to love. The semblance, rather than the reality, is all that is produced by such direct effort. It can make hypocrites but not true brethren. Affection is a thing to be drawn, not driven. Before you can bring "jarring sectaries" into union, you must place before them a common object; distinct from that of union itself, to which their hearts will be virtually and spontaneously drawn.

2. Hence, efforts at union often fail for want of a proper object to concentrate upon. Union for the sake of union is not sufficient; the mind must have a higher and holier aim to hold it fast. Nor is union for the sake of the pleasure it affords a sufficient object. Such an object is a bond of selfishness rather than of love. Touch a single match to this selfish principle, and it will often blow the whole of your beautiful fabric to atoms. Illustrations of such a fragile, explosive union are not wanting. You may see brethren felicitating themselves upon the delightful harmony that reigns among them, and fancying that their assembly is a little heaven begun on earth; when lo! a sudden change comes over them! anger has taken the place of love. A fire-brand has been thrown in among them, in the shape of some practical principle of the law of God, and these loving brethren are pouring the vials of their wrath upon the man who introduced it and thus broke up their harmony. A union of which the law of God is an explosive fire-brand, will secure no valuable object for God; the fiery ordeal of the judgment day, if it could last till that time, would scatter it to the four winds. And who does not see that such is the character of much of the Christian union that is sought at the present day? The door of the Church must be closed against the law of God itself, because some of its stringent precepts would mar this delightful union. Such a union Christ never prayed for. He would have his church united in receiving him, in all his holy attributes and requirements, not in shutting their door against him. A church that is united in excluding a single principle of essential truth or practical holiness from its fold, is just so far united against God, in one solid phalanx.

The object of union should be identical with that for which Christ came among us and toiled and suffered,—to save a lost world. He did not come here to see how happy he could make himself in the family of Joseph and Mary, or in the circle of the chosen twelve. His church should be of the same mind, aiming at the same high and holy object—to execute the will of their Father. This object will of itself unite them, especially if they will commingle their efforts in its prosecution. They will soon see and feel too, that

*Their fears, their hopes, their aims are one,
Their comforts and their cares.*

Their ardent pursuit of this object will teach them moreover the necessity of union to give them strength and efficiency in their work. Just so far as this plan of union has been tried in the Christian church it has produced the happiest effect. The benevolent enterprises of the age, in scattering Bibles and Tracts, and in promoting Temperance and Bible morality, invite the co-operation of Christians of every name; and just so far as they have seconded the call, they have experienced and admired its harmonizing effect. Let this plan of union be extended in all the departments of Christian labors of love, and it will perform its perfect work. It is a plan which has wrought wonders within the period of our own recollection.

3. Efforts at Christian union will fail, if based on any other than holy principles. You may form an alliance on other principles, perhaps a powerful one, but it will not be a true Christian alliance. Compromise a single principle of holiness, spiritual or practical, and the union which you secure by it will not be worth having. It will secure no valuable object, either for Christ or itself. "Brotherly love" even cannot be perpetuated on such a basis. The brotherly love that rejects any part of God's law, in order to cement it, is every moment liable to be turned into virulent hatred. A union based exclusively on holy principles is one which will draw holy hearts, as to a gravitating centre. Let sinful compromises form a part of its basis, and you repel such hearts. You may get a combination of numbers and strength and influence, but not for a holy object; and it will be a combination from which the best part of the church will stand aloof.

"The Lord is thy Keeper."

Psalm cxxi. 5.

Like as a faithful shepherd watches over, guards and keeps his flock, so doth the Lord them that put their trust in him. Dost thou, reader, believe in God? Dost thou fear him, love him, and keep his commandments? Then thou hast nothing to fear, for "the Lord is thy keeper," and he will keep thee safely. "The angel of the Lord encampeth round about them that fear him, and delivereth them." Be of good courage, therefore, my brethren, and ever remember that "thy help cometh from the Lord which made heaven and earth. He will not suffer thy foot to be moved: he that keepeth thee will not slumber. Behold! he that keepeth Israel shall neither slumber nor sleep. "The Lord is thy keeper; the Lord is thy shadow upon thy right hand."

"Have faith in God," and be diligent to "continue in the faith," and he will surely "keep thee by his power unto salvation, ready to be revealed in the last time." "He is able to keep thee from falling and to present thee faultless before the presence of his glory with exceeding joy." O, trust ye in the Lord unreservedly, universally, and perpetually—for he is faithful and mighty in strength, "and no man shall be able to pluck you out of his hands." "As the mountains are round about Jerusalem, so the Lord is round about his people from henceforth even for ever."

If thou hast made the Lord thy refuge, even the Most High thy habitation, then thou hast no need to be "afraid for terror by night nor for the arrow that flyeth by day, nor for the pestilence that walketh in darkness, nor for the destruction that wasteth at noon-day." "The Lord is thy helper;" therefore, although a thousand shall fall at thy side and ten thousand at thy right hand, yet be not afraid, for it shall not come nigh thee. Only with thine eyes shalt thou behold and see the reward of the wicked. If thou hast set thy love upon God, depend upon it he will deliver thee. If your trust is in the living God, and if you are "serving him acceptably, with reverence and godly fear," then with the prophet you can with propriety say that, "Although the fig-tree shall not blossom, neither shall fruit be in the vines; the labor of the olive shall fail, and the fields shall yield no meat; the flock be cut off from the fold, and there shall be no herd in the stall: yet I will rejoice in the Lord, I will joy in the God of my salvation."—Hab. iii. 17, 18.

You see, indeed, on every hand, fearful tokens of the approach of that great day of the Lord, which must surely come very soon, when "all hands shall be faint, and every man's heart shall melt, when God will punish the world for their evil and the wicked for their iniquity; when he will cause the arrogancy of the proud to cease, and lay low the haughtiness of the terrible; when he will shake the heavens and the earth, the sea, and the dry land;" but be not afraid, for in that day "the Lord will be thy keeper;" in that time of trouble "he shall hide thee in his pavilion; in the secret of his tabernacle shall he hide thee." "And at that time thy people shall be delivered every one that shall be found written in the book." Then "He that scattereth Israel will gather him, and keep him, as a shepherd doth his flock." Then the "Lord will redeem his people from death and ransom them from the power of the grave." They will then be delivered from temptation, pain and sorrow. Then "they shall sorrow no more all, but God will turn their mourning into joy, and will comfort them and make them rejoice from their sorrow." He will then also redeem the land even the land of his people, the land of Israel, which now groaneth under the curse, and "his people shall inherit it for ever—the branch of his planting, the work of his hands, that he may be glorified." "Then judgment shall dwell in the wilderness, and righteousness remain in the fruitful field; and the work of righteousness shall be peace and the effect of righteousness quietness and assurance for ever. And his people shall dwell in a peaceable habitation and in sure dwellings, and in quiet resting-places." Then the "waste places of Jerusalem will break forth into joy and sing together, for the Lord will have comforted his people." "Be glad and rejoice for ever," my brethren, "for, behold, God will create Jerusalem a rejoicing and his people a joy—and he will rejoice in Jerusalem and joy in his people: and the voice of weeping shall be heard no more in her nor the voice of crying." Rejoice, O ye saints of the Most High, rejoice: "for he will avenge the blood of his servants, and will render vengeance to his adversaries, and will be merciful to his land and to his people."

"But Zion said, The Lord hath forsaken me, and my Lord hath forgotten me. Can a woman forget her suckling child, that she should not have compassion on the son of her womb? yea, they may forget, yet will I not forget thee. Behold I have graven thee upon the palms of my hands—thy walls are continually before me."

"Lift up your heads and look up," ye waiting remnant of God's elect, for "He is your keeper," and your redemption is NIGH, EVEN AT THE DOORS. Amen. W. BURNHAM.

Fairs.

"The ladies of the . . . Church, in this city, with a hope of liquidating the debt they incurred in the erection of their place of worship, are now holding a Fair, for the benefit of said church."

A "Fair," "holding a fair?" For what? to glorify God, to please him well? O! to pay off a church debt; a splendid church, perhaps. In building this church did you count the cost—pay as you went? You have no right to involve yourselves. God says, "Owe no man anything but to love him." Have you sinned? repent in dust—repent, confess your guilt. Go, sin no more.

But, to the "Fair." What is it? "Vanity fair?" worse, infinitely. Look at it; strip the veil, off with it.

1. Time—what is it? Gold, seven times purified. "Redeem it," says God, "REDEEM it." How? on trifles, light as air? Many of these articles on which weeks of golden time have been squandered, are mere toys, gew-gaws, worse than useless!

2. The excitement during this period is intense, all absorbing, even to the exclusion of high and holy duties. The poor thought of—the soul's salvation? Hardly. The "Fair!" "the fair!!" is the ultimatum.

3. Come a little nearer. The sales, how conducted? On gospel principles? Look at those who preside, conduct the sales, etc. Frizzled? yes, "frizzled, tipped off gaudily. O, how pretty! "pretty butterfly," dance about! For shame! Modesty blushes, hides her face! Is this the adorning which God himself enjoins so strenuously on females professing godliness? Well might angels weep tears of blood!

4. The conversation—how is this? Chaste, edifying, spiritual? Rather, is it not vain, frivolous? oiten earthly, sensual, devilish?

5. Raffling or gambling, is often introduced—games of chance. Can this be? Horrible! God-defying!! O! the end sanctifies the means. The object is to pay off a church debt! perhaps cushion the pulpit! Hurra! Hurra! Never mind, we shall get the church debt payed off, then we will be a little more sanctimonious, perhaps have a "meeting of days."†

6. Are "Fairs" opened and closed by prayer? Prayer in a theatre, a gambling-house! who ever dreamed of it? May be Satan can preach pretty well, sometimes, sermons quite systematic, well arranged!

7. Intemperance prevails, gross—fairly "stuffing;" this, too, of stimulating indigestibles, often at a late hour. Beastly! Meek and lowly disciple of our blessed Lord, can you retire from these scenes of hilarity, of feasting, revelling, raffling and wicked nonsense, at a midnight hour, with pure conscience, with heart prepared to hold

* See 1 Tim. ii. 8, 10.

† A church come to this? Disband, we say, disband! burn up your church; scatter the ashes to the four winds of heaven; let your ministers go to the plough, or the arill. Better do this a thousand times than thus dishonor God.

sweet and holy converse with the Father of our spirits? Think so? You deceive yourself greatly.

8. But, says one, "Our object is gained; we have drilled out the cash; is not this ominous of good?" Gained your object? How? at what expense? Of being shorn of your locks, like Samson; blind, naked, spiritually, shamefully! When bent on lust, God gives us up to our own folly, till we are sick of it. No wonder so many churches are like the scorching Zahara! "dead, twice dead, plucked up by the roots." The whole concern, from first to last, is evil and only evil; a blighting curse to the church—a death-blow to elevated holiness. From such scenes, good Lord deliver us. O! our soul, come not thou into these secrets!—Watchman of the Valley.

Voice of Truth & Glad Tidings

"The wise shall understand."

ROCHESTER, JUNE 2, 1847.

Great Apostasy.

NUMBER IV.

16. The church. According to human usages, with its prefixes and adjectives, 'church' has a great variety of significations. Each sect and religious party apply it to their respective ecclesiastical organizations. Hence we have Catholic church, Episcopal church, Lutheran, Presbyterian, Methodist, and Baptist church, and so down to the end of the category. But the Bible recognizes as the true church, none other than the CHURCH OF GOD, as is said in Tim. iii. 15, and many other places in the New Testament. "The house of God, which is the CHURCH OF THE LIVING GOD, the pillar and ground of the truth."

The apostasy in this case has robbed God of the glory which alone belongs to him, by calling his children, people or church after other names than His. It would be a sure evidence that a woman did not love her husband as she should, to see her carry his name in secret, and wear that of one of her lovers, another man, inscribed in capitals on her forehead. It is so with the different sects, they acknowledge God in word, but bear to the world a name that is not his. And if this act is not a fearful step in the great apostasy, then it is impossible to tell what is.

17. Foundation of the church. With but few if any exceptions, the sects, though they have professedly built upon the word of God, have nevertheless laid other foundations, on which to erect their party churches. They have their creeds, confessions, and articles of faith; covenants, disciplines, platforms, &c &c, as the acknowledged basis of their ecclesiastical organizations. But the Bible plainly says—"Upon this rock will I build MY CHURCH; and the gates of hell shall not prevail against it," Matt. xvi 18. And 'other foundation can no man lay than is already laid, which is Christ Jesus.' 1 Cor. iii. 11.

Alas, to what presumptuous rebellion against Christ, and party divisions among his children, has this bold step in the great apostasy led those who have blindly taken it. The work of the sects in this case may be compared to disaffected members of a kingdom; who divide into factions, acknowledge allegiance to the law of their king, but at the same time lay foundations of their own, or form laws for the governance of their respective divisions. And such an infraction of human laws would be viewed in the light of high treason, and the offenders would be punished accordingly. What will be the doom of those who have thus trampled under foot the law of the King of kings and Lord of lords; the great day of his wrath will soon determine. We hope many will find mercy at his hand on account of having done these things ignorantly. But we who know these things, should we commit such offences cannot reasonably expect to meet anything less than the frowns of our offended Judge. Therefore, though we have comparatively but a moment more before our Lord shall come, to build up the CHURCH OF GOD, let us be exceeding careful that we build upon no other than the only sure foundation. All other foundations are like 'wood, hay, and stubble,' and will not abide the great and burning day, which is soon to try every man's work.

18. Doctrines of the church. It is not necessary to go into details under this specification. A statement of some general and well known facts will clearly show to all that the apostasy here has been most fearful. The facts are, that the sects hold a great variety of the most conflicting doctrines, and as a matter of course, contrary to the 'doctrine of God,' or the 'sound doctrine,' or 'good doctrine' taught in the Bible. This no one will understandingly deny. The conclusion then is unavoidable, that a most fatal step in the great apostasy, in point of doctrine has been taken by the church.

Painful indeed to the lover of Bible doctrine, has been the departure from the truth in this case. It has contributed in no small degree in laying the foundation of all the apostasy of which the church is guilty. The prominent sins of ancient Israel were, a departure from God, 'the fountain of living waters,' and 'hewing to themselves broken cisterns which could hold no water.' And we think it will not be disputed that the same sins may justly be charged upon the Gentile church. She has most fearfully departed from the plain and simple doctrine of 'God our Savior,' as may easily be seen by comparing with his word, the Catholic, Greek, Mahomedan, Heathen, and any or all of the Protestant creeds of past or present days.

From this step in the apostasy we trace all the unholy tests, the selfish controversies, malicious persecutions, and cruel martyrdoms with which the church has ever been cursed. It has also been a fruitful source of infidelity; for thousands looking at the absurdities and contradictions of the church, and taking it for granted that the Bible was the author of the whole, they have rejected that precious book as unworthy of their confidence. O, let us who are looking for the immediate coming of him who is the Author and Finisher of our faith, be exceedingly cautious how we follow in the steps of this apostasy: for when a person or church has once departed from the doctrine of the Bible, to follow the doctrines of men or devils, the end is most disastrous. Unguarded and unguided by the truth, we are like a 'city broken down, and without walls,' constantly exposed to the deadly assaults of the enemy.

19. Laws of the church. With few exceptions the sects hold that the church cannot be governed without the aid of human ecclesiastical laws. How readily and harmoniously have the 'orthodox' pulpits and presses of our world, when a Bible people have attempted to arise, joined in the cry of no order, they cannot deal with refractory members, nor keep imposters and error out of the church, nor hold a church together, without a written human law, creed, discipline or covenant. But Christ the Head of the church has said, 'Take my yoke upon you.' Paul tells us, that 'all scripture is given by inspiration of God, and is profitable for doctrine, for reproof, for correction, for instruction in righteousness; that the man of God may be perfect, thoroughly furnished unto all good works.' And James assures us that 'whoso looketh into the perfect law of liberty, and continueth therein, he being not a forgetful hearer, but a doer of the work, this man shall be blessed in his deed!

Sad indeed have been the consequences which have followed this step in the great apostasy. 'The law of the Lord, which is perfect,' has been set aside, and human, imperfect and sorely oppressive laws have been substituted in its stead. The saints have been divided into numerous belligerent parties, and in many cases placed under burthens more intolerable to be borne than the unjust laws of Egypt. It has restricted the fellowship of the respective parties to the narrow limits of their contracted folds. It has said to the enquiring mind, 'Thus far shalt thou go in thy researches for truth, and no further: for it is heterodoxy, punishable with expulsion from the church, if not exclusion from heaven, to persist in looking for light or truth, beyond the sacred boundaries of our creed. It has thrown an immovable barrier to the union of God's divided flock—has raised a wall of adamant around the errors and corruptions of the church, and so excluded from her vision any further light, that her reformation and redemption is painfully hopeless. Like the incorrigible Jews before their overthrow, the church, or different sects cleave with blind tenacity to their ecclesiastical laws, in preference to fully submitting to the law of Christ. We know the fate of the Jews: but who can tell the doom of the enlightened Gentile church! It will be fearful beyond description or conception. 'For if the word spoken by angels was steadfast, and every transgression and disobedience received a just recompense of reward, how shall we escape, if we neglect so great salvation?' The Lord enable us all so to love and obey his word only, that we may be enabled to escape, or be enabled to stand when the Son of man shall appear.

National Sins.

There have ever been national sins, against which God's true servants have faithfully proclaimed. As proof of the correctness of this statement, we refer to the history of Noah, Lot, Jonah, Jeremiah, all the prophets, John the Baptist, Christ, the apostles, Luther, and many a worthy herald of the cross since his day.

Are there any national sins now? The unanimous testimony of every sect and party says there are, and that they never were more aggravating than now. Well, who is proclaiming against them?—Echo answers, Who? It is true that many of the ministry of the church talk and write very many pretty fine condemnatory articles against the sins of the day; but they neither offend nor reform the perpetrators of the evils against which they speak. Old plants of iniquity continue to spread their luxuriant branches all around, and new plants are thickly and rapidly springing up within and without the church, despite of all the fine literary sermonizing of these strange times.

The fact is, the precepts and practice of the ministry and church do not agree. They say war is a sin; but countenance and support it. They say slavery is an 'evil'; and then fellowship slaveholders. They say that intemperance is a sin, and then hold in their very bosom thousands who uphold this wicked practice. And so we might say of every prominent sin of the world. Hence, instead of the ministry and church bearing a living, practical testimony against the crying sins of the day, they are indirectly upholding them: for the influence of example always outweighs that of precept.

Well, what will be the end of these things? The answer is easy. God will either soon raise up a host of servants who will faithfully, effectually and fearlessly cry day and night, in every lawful manner, and in every suitable place, against the sins of the times, or He will sit in judgment upon the wicked doings of the world: for it is unreasonable to suppose that he will long suffer things to remain as they are. We fully believe the latter will be done: for the cup of this world's iniquity seems already full to overflowing—the vintage appears to be fully ripe for the winepress of the Lord's just indignation. And in view of the judgment that is rapidly approaching, we say unto all, 'Cry aloud, and spare not, lift up your voice like a trumpet' against the sins of these fearfully degenerate times. But what you do, let it be done in the spirit and love of Him who wept over fallen Jerusalem, and then you will receive his gracious smiles here, and the eternal reward that he will bestow at his coming.

Effect of New Truths.

Many honest Christians are constantly troubled because they do not feel that degree of joy now in reading hearing and contemplating certain precious truths, which they did when first they became acquainted with them. In consequence of this wide difference in their feelings, they fear they are not Christians, or that they are losing their faith, and such like things. To illustrate:

A very poor man once found a diamond. He knew its worth, and of course was filled with ecstasies of joy when first he saw and knew the treasure was his. A few days passes, and the once poor but now rich man feels none of that ecstasy which first he felt. He looks at the diamond, and though he may in his calmer moments prize it higher than when he first found it, yet it does not produce that ecstasy of joy which filled his soul when he knew the diamond was his.

Under these feelings, does the man conclude that the diamond is worthless, or that he does not prize its real worth? No: he does neither. He does not judge of the worth of the diamond by his sudden ebullitions of feeling, but by the price it will fetch in market.

So with the Christian: new truths filled him with high ecstasies of joy. But now because they do not have that effect, it is no evidence that he has lost his love for them, or that he has backslidden from God, or that they are worthless. If you will examine the matter a little, we think you would find that those sudden burst of joy, or those fluctuating joys, were chiefly experienced during the time when you were doing just what the Bible commands us all to do, viz: to become 'grounded and settled in the truth.'—This we hope is your present happy condition, in reference to those truths which once filled you with such flights of joy. We trust you are established in the truth.

To know whether you are a Christian, you must not consult your feelings merely; but the word of God. If you obey that, and possess the spirit of its Author, you are a child of God, an heir of glory; and under a sense of these high privileges, your joy should not be fluctuating, flighty and volatile, but calm, even, rational, 'inexpressible and full of glory.'

Vitiating Appetites.

The following extract is from Fowler's Universal and Mental Physiology, and being in accordance with our own experience and observations, we insert it for the benefit of "whom it may concern." After a brief allusion to the inconvenience and pernicious tendency of a perverted appetite, the author remarks:—

The fact of this abnormal condition of the appetite is rendered apparent by this cause. That a most intimate inter-relation exists between the stomach and Alimentiveness, is rendered perfectly clear both by Phrenology and Philosophy. The latter is the organ of the former, and therefore the inter-relation of all their states with each other is perfectly reciprocal. This reciprocity must be perfect, in order that when the stomach requires food, it may excite the feeling of hunger in Alimentiveness. But for such inter-relation, the stomach could never make known its requisitions for food. The perfection of the nutritive process demands such reciprocity, that it may be perfect. Whatever therefore inflames the stomach, thereby excites Alimentiveness and creates cravings akin to hunger. Excess of food necessarily inflames the stomach, and of course always provokes those hankerings after food, which most of us mistake for real hunger. Yet such cravings are caused not by hunger, but by surfeiting. This shows why dyspeptics generally have such enormous appetites. They have inflamed their stomachs, and this renders their appetites morbid, and its cravings insatiable. And the more such eat, the more they crave. Let them eat, and eat by the hour together, they still feel what they call hungry, though it is to true hunger what fever is to circulation. Eating, so far from satiating this morbid craving, only enhances it. True, they feel weak, gone, faint, and ravenous—feel that they shall drop down unless they can get something to eat soon—yet the more they eat, the more they crave, because the more they inflame the stomach, and of course its cerebral organ, Alimentiveness. Cannot such see that they eat twice as much as men in general, and four times the quantity of many around them who enjoy uninterrupted health? How can they require so much when others get along so much better with so little? What can more conclusively prove that their craving and diseases proceed from their gluttony? And what establishes this fact beyond a doubt, is that protracted abstemiousness will diminish these stomach gnawings. Make trial, ye thus afflicted, and you will be surprised at their decrease. And in general those who feel faint in the morning till they eat, ravenous before dinner, and hungry before supper, should attribute these cravings to an overloaded stomach, instead of an empty one. And they who suffer much from omitting a meal, may depend upon it they are over eat. Fasting gives but little inconvenience to a healthy stomach; nor is there a more sure sign of gluttony than this faintness when a meal is omitted. Contradictory though it seem, yet of all such cravings, persevering abstemiousness is a perfect cure, because it allays that irritation of the stomach which causes them, and which full feeding enhances, and thereby re-inflames appetite. Only try its virtues, ye thus afflicted. Fast instead of feast: and keep fasting till you can like those in health, omit meal after meal with little inconvenience or prostration.

CORRESPONDENCE.

Shakerism.—Further Developments.

DEAR FRIEND MARSH.—I wish to give you a few items which I would like to make known to the public.

In the year 1805, my parents joined the Shakers. I was eleven years of age, and was then going to school. I had just commenced taking paper to school, and was learning to make straight marks. The Shakers told my parents that it would not do for believers' children to go to the world's school; and it was about four years before they commenced one in their society. I was permitted to go three days. I was then taken from school to chop saw-logs, and was never allowed to go any more. In this ignorant condition I was raised at Union Village. When I had grown to manhood, I could not write, nor could I read one word of writing. I knew nothing about figures. Having been set to work at the carpenter's business, and finding the use of figures necessary, I determined to apply myself to the study of them, in the evenings, after I had finished my day's work. For that purpose, I went to Nathan Sharp, and said to him, "Nathan, be so kind as to get a slate and an arithmetic for me, that I may learn figures. But he treated my humble request with contempt. Sharp was the church deacon. Thus I never was allowed to own a slate or an arithmetic, until I left them, in my thirty-eighth year.

At this advanced period of my life, I became convinced that I was a servant to an idolatrous superstition; and I could plainly discover that cruel oppression was daily increasing among the deluded followers of Ann Standly or Lee. I could also discover that if any one dared to say a word against any absurdities practised there, they were treated with such cruel abuse that they could not endure it. They must then leave their home and the labor of a whole life-time, because like Daniel of old they have discovered the footsteps of those who devoured the sacrifice made to Bel, and will no longer cry, "Great art thou, O Bel, and within thee there is no deceit at all." I could see, my friends and acquaintances who had worked hard for many years, going away one by one in ignorance and poverty; and as soon as I let reason and conscience have their proper place, and govern my decisions, I became convinced that God had nothing to do with building up and establishing an institution so unjust, cruel, and oppressive. And when that matter was decided, I raised courage to leave those scenes of cruelty.

Though ignorant as I was, and poor as I must have been, I then told the elders and deacons, I was about to leave, and thought they must give me something. They told me that when my father gave his farm to them, he made a request that each of his sons should have one hundred dollars when they became of legal age, and they would now give me that much, but not one cent for my whole life's labor. Sharp drew a paper from his pocket and told me if I would sign it, he would give me thirty-five dollars, and a young mare and saddle. The mare was unsound, and was probably worth about thirty dollars. When Sharp gave it to me, I was told by Boyd that Sharp's books, which were then in his hands, had me charged with one hundred dollars. The paper which he gave me to sign, I signed, but am not able to tell what it was, but suppose it was a receipt. I should not have known a receipt then, if one had been presented, for I knew nothing of the force of any article of the kind. In this ignorant condition, I blundered out into the world to make a living.

Before I left, I took down my clothes that were hanging up and laid them in my chest, and left them so. And I have been told by some who were there for some time after I left, that the news of my departure was soon made public, when my sister, my cousin, and some others, going into the clothes-room to see if I had taken my clothing, and seeing my chest and clothes, burst into a flood of tears; and one said, "Look at his clothes, and consider he has worked hard until he is nearly forty years old, and here is the best coat he has—it is father David's old coat altered for him."

These facts cannot be contradicted without violating every principle of truth; and I now humbly ask all whose eyes may fall upon this page to consider how they would feel to be placed in such a condition—to be raised without learning, and to know at the same time that the Shakers invite the lawyers, the judges, and other prominent citizens of Lebanon to visit their schools, filled partly with the children of drunkards, who have squandered their substance, and partly with the children of abandoned women and such like characters. They want the prominent and influential part of mankind to see how charitable they are to those children, while it can be proved beyond contradiction that their own children were raised many of them, without even an ordinary education, and in this ignorant condition compelled to put their names on every thing that was presented to them to defraud them out of their own rights. They did every thing that was possible to keep us in ignorance. They would not allow a newspaper to be seen among us in these days. Some complained of being kept in ignorance, and to silence such complaints Mr. Nemer told us in church that we had no right to complain, for we could get as much information out of our almanacs as a good believer needed.

I will here tell of another effort that was made to keep us in ignorance. Father David, the chief monarch, gave a command that all the books that could be found in the society which did not accord with their doctrine should be gathered together and burned. His laws must be obeyed—they accordingly appointed a day to do this great work. It was in the evening of a beautiful Sabbath, in the summer of 1825. We were ordered to assemble in the street leading eastward, on the north side of the church. A fire was made and the books were brought from every direction and heaped upon the flames; and as each one committed his book to the flames they would read the title. I will name some of the books that were burned on this occasion: The Methodist Discipline, the Presbyterian Confession of Faith, the Kentucky Revival, the Life of Washington, the Life of Franklin, the Young Lady's Companion, and such like. At intervals our savage yells would echo through the air, and at other times the audience would dance around the flames and sing.

Now in the valley we will prance,
And round old Babel's treasure dance;
And here we draw the final score
To touch the cursed thing no more.
From Father's gift we will not part,
We love, we love it in our heart—
Let books and shows for ever go,
That Father's gifts may freely flow.

The Father we were singing of was David Darrouz. He was seated at the window in the upper part of the meeting-house giving his cheers to applaud the scene, while the enthusiastic yell resounded through the air; and remember it was on the Sabbath. Gentle reader, were you to witness such a scene as I have described, would you not be led to exclaim, Surely these are heathen, and I am on missionary ground.

I will here relate some of their charitable actions and leave the reader to judge the tree by its fruits. We who have left the Shakers have sometimes been induced to go back to see some of our friends, and have often on such occasions been treated with cruel contempt.

I went back to Union Village to see my mother. I was not permitted to see her alone, but agreeably to their order a guard was set to hear all that passed between us. Mother becoming very irritated thereat, she arose and bid me follow her to the gate. I did so and there she spake freely in a low tone. I often think of my tender mother, who was drawn into the delusive snare of Shakerism. Every thing was taken out of her hands, her farm and her children, seven in number. She had to see her daughters, who had worked hard until they were over thirty years of age, leave the abodes of despotism and oppression without a bed or anything of the kind except a straw bed-tick, which was given to my oldest sister. Sister Sarah was about 35 years of age and had been with the Shakers 29 years. When she was about to leave, a sister, whose heart had not yet been cased with steel, felt that it was cruel to send her away without a bed, but could not give her anything of the kind because the elders overruled such matters. After considering the matter she got an empty bed-tick and put it with Sarah's clothes, and charged Sarah to keep it secret, for if it was known she would be abused. Such are the fruits of that benevolent institution.

I am confident that if the truth were fully known in relation to the way they are often treated, even helpless females, for nothing more than refusing to be subject to every nod of those in power, their charitable institution, as they call it, would be considered by every true-hearted American, a modern Inquisition; and could it be clearly known to the public how they have treated the orphans for whom they profess to have so much charity, they could no longer prevail on the trustees to bind helpless orphans to them. I would far rather have my children laid in the tomb than to have them raised in such bondage, superstition, ignorance and idolatry.

Reader, examine these things in the light of reason and revelation.

My mother, whose heart has been rent, at seeing her children leave the village in poverty after spending the best of their lives in slavery to the Shakers, could no longer retain her reasoning powers, and she has for some years been suffering under derangement. Her children have not the privilege of seeing her. One of her daughters went to the village to see her and made her request known, but the sisters belonging to the fraternity told her she could not see her mother, for it made her worse to see her children or hear anything about them. This fully explains the cause of her derangement. Others of my acquaintances have been denied the privilege of seeing their parents, and when they called to see their near relatives have been ordered out of the house in the most brutal manner. My brother-in-law went to Union Village to see his mother who was then lying on her death-bed; he was repulsed from the gate and not suffered to see her. She died and had been buried some time before he heard of it, although he lived only two or three miles from her residence. Thus they could brutally treat him although he is an honest upright man and merits respect wherever he is known.

If this and such like is what the editor of the Western "Star" calls "hewing up to the line of justice," I will never ask him to "hew for me," but leave him to hew for such as believe it right to raise children in such ignorance that at the age of thirty years they do not know a 12½ cent piece, or how many such would make a dollar. Who, in the name of goodness, can "hew" to such a line of justice.

My sister, when in her 32d year, had been on a visit down to the Shaker village on Whitewater. Previous to her leaving home some one gave her a little money. On her return she went into a store in Hamilton to buy a handkerchief. The clerk told her she could have the handkerchief for 37½ cents. She did not know how much 37½ cents was, so she gave the clerk all her money and let him take 37½ cents himself. My sister was not an idiot, but had as much natural sense as is common; but alas, many others were as ignorant as she. I would ask those who have visited the schools at Union Village, to take a little pains and inform themselves in relation to the way they raised their own children. We will give you a dinner if you will come over to Franklin and examine and see what education those disciples of Ann Lee give them.

Let such as lend their aid to lengthen the cords and strengthen the stakes of the oppressor—who take a reward against the innocent, think of these things; for the Psalmist says, "When he maketh inquisition for blood, he remembereth them; he forgetteth not the cry of the humble." And if we who were raised in ignorance, robbed of every thing like liberty of conscience, and made to believe we must be subject to them and their nod in every thing, or be eternally damned—if we possessed the same spirit of revenge and retaliation that they manifest to us, we would turn like the serpent upon the heel that tramples it in the dust, and send poison hissing through every vein of the body.

Dear sir—I have not told you the half of what mine eyes have seen. I must here close, feeling much dissatisfied with my efforts, for I have not told you anything about some of the minister's drinking and such like things. Open your Bible and read Isa. xxviii. 7. Yours truly, E. HOLLOWAY.

WESTFORD, Ct., May, 1847.

BRO. MARSH—I feel impressed with the great importance of being prepared to meet the coming Lord, and wish to say to the brethren scattered abroad, in the language of Scripture, "Let your loins be girt about with truth and your lamps burning." And notwithstanding we still groan on in this sinning world in these vile bodies, yet we hope and believe we are nearing the port of endless rest. O brethren, are you fully prepared to come into the presence of him who knoweth all hearts and judgeth righteously—who cannot look upon sin with allowance or approbation—in whose presence all will stand in their own proper character? Are you fully prepared to inhabit in the holy place in the city of our God, where none but holy ones can enter? O, how awful is the thought of having it said to us, "Depart, ye workers of iniquity. Better never to have had a knowledge of the truth—better to have been born in heathen lands, or better never to have been born, then after all to come short at last. If there will be foolish virgins to whom it will be said, I know you not, may the Lord help us to search our hearts and see that we are not of this character.

It may be that some will be deceived in expecting, because they have believed in the soon coming of the Lord, and have been doing much to spread light and truth, that they shall be accepted and saved. But be not deceived in this: none but holy ones can enter there; the mouth of the Lord hath spoken it.

If you love the world, if you are seeking your own glory, if you love to be called Rabbi and love the highest seats, if you are unjust, unthankful, unholy; if you have unsettled difficulties with any in which you are in the wrong—if your own conscience condemn you in anything, or if you are lukewarm, neither hot nor cold, O may the Lord have mercy on you and help you to improve this tarrying time in making thorough preparation to meet the holy and blessed Lord, and be found of him in peace, without spot and blameless at his coming. And you whose hearts are warm, whose souls are clean, let your prayers go up to God for the sanctification of his people, and that his kingdom might come and the days of our mourning be ended—Abraham receive the promises—Job stand upon the earth and see God in his flesh—Isaiah's dead men live—Daniel stand in his lot—Paul receive his crown—Peter inhabit the New Earth, and John's day of rewards to prophets, saints, and all that fear the name of God small and great, be come, the marriage of the Lamb be celebrated, and the kingdoms of this world become the kingdom of our Lord and of his Christ, and he shall reign for ever and ever.

"Oh, may thy kingdom come!
All power and dominion;
Bring now thy faithful home,
On bright seraphic plinion—
We're tried, oh come and take us home,
And give us crowns of glory.
We feel like those who weary roam
About some ruin hoary.
Oh may thy will be done,
On earth as it is in heaven,
May now the glorious sun
Of righteousness be given!" H. C. ROBBINS.

EMERALD GROVE, May 12th, 1847.

Doors are open on every hand to spread the glad tidings of the kingdom. The state of the cause is assuming a favorable aspect and we have reason to thank the Lord and take courage. It appears much more than probable that this year will reveal our coming King to the joy of his waiting ones. May he find us all in the full enjoyment of that spirit which insures to us the glorious promises.

JOHN DANIELS.

PITTSBURG, Pa., May 18th, 1847.

DEAR BRO. MARSH—Bro. Buck, a German brother, arrived here last week. He was well nigh worn out with fatigue, hardship and privation. We never saw or heard of him before, but administered to his wants as the Lord hath given us means, and made his heart glad. He went to a small village across the river, (Ohio, at its head,) on Sunday evening, to a school-house occupied by the Wesleyan Methodists, when a brother who went over with Bro. Buck informed the Wesleyan brother of Bro. Buck's desire to speak on the second personal advent of our Lord. The minister in charge opened the meeting by singing and prayer, and then stated to his people that he had understood that there was a person here who wished to speak on the second advent, and for his part he had no objection, and would leave it to the meeting to say if Bro. Buck should preach or not that evening; and I am glad to say there was only one voice said no—all the rest said "aye." So Bro. B. was invited up, and spoke two hours to an attentive assembly as he ever spoke to. After meeting many of the Wesleyan brethren took him by the hand and invited him to speak next Sunday afternoon in a grove, where there would be many to hear him. Bro. B. is a kind, mild, humble follower in the footsteps of his Master.

I often feel wounded when I see the harsh manner in which many of the brethren write and feel toward each other on account of some little differences in our views. I think Christ is often wounded in the house of his friends, and it makes me give all diligence to add to other Christian graces "brotherly love" and "charity," for if these things be in us and "abound," they make us that we shall be neither barren nor "unfruitful" in the knowledge of our Lord Jesus Christ.

Yours in hope of immortality,

WALTER F. FAHNESTOCK.

EAST RANDOLPH, May 20th, 1847.

BRO. MARSH—The subject of the coming of the kingdom of God is one that is full of interest and full of glory. Around it clusters the hope of the Christian. It has been looked for with deep interest and with the deepest anxiety by the saints of God in all ages; and how interesting to live in a day which is to witness the resurrection of the dead in Christ, and the changing of the living—when Christ will bring in or set up his everlasting kingdom—to witness those soul-cheering promises to the righteous, of glory, honor, immortality and eternal life. Yes, glory! then we shall be crowned kings and priests, to have these vile bodies fashioned like unto his most glorious body to die no more.

There are a few in this place and in the vicinity that are looking, watching, and praying for the everlasting kingdom to be set up, and strong in the faith that deliverance will soon be witnessed.

Yours in hope,

IRA WYMAN.

P. S. Preaching brethren who pass through East Bethel and East Randolph and wish to have meetings on their way, can give the notice in the Voice or Herald or Advocate, and inquire in East Bethel for Samuel Bean and in East Randolph for Ira Wyman.

COPENHAGEN, N. Y., May 6th, 1847.

There is a small remnant in Copenhagen who are still looking for the lovely Jesus and are waiting for deliverance—believing this generation shall not pass before the Lord will come. Time still continues—probation lasts—but oh, what a solemn moment is this! Our present duty seems to be that of readiness—'nigh, even at the door.' Oh, my soul! perhaps another moment, and the Lord will come. In this community and elsewhere so far as I am acquainted, moral night is upon the people; but here and there a pilgrim, seeking the kingdom by the way of the cross—professors of religion seem only to be active to oppose the Lord's speedy coming and to obtain the earth's golden dust. Oh, how many times I have thought of what my Lord has said: "When the Son of man cometh, shall he find faith on the earth?" "Remember Lot's wife." The Lord grant that we who have been aroused to the faith of his speedy coming may quicken our pace—keep our eye on the mark—continue in expectation until the bright glory of our God appear. May the dear brethren and sisters who were once so full of glory and animation, receive the truth again—come back to the standard of truth and believe the record God has given of his Son. Have you been decoyed and deceived? oh, come back—Jesus will soon come. I cannot endure the thought without the deepest emotions of soul, that you should sell your birth-right for a mere mess of pottage. Oh be not deceived, God is not mocked: whatever a man soweth that shall he also reap. The Lord bless and wake us all up to a preparation for his coming, is my prayer,

H. D. GOODENOUGH.

BRO. MARSH—I have been of late much delighted with the following passages recorded in Isa. lvii. 15, 16: "For thus saith the high and lofty One that inhabiteth eternity, whose name is Holy; I dwell in the high and holy place, with him also that is of a contrite and humble spirit, to revive the spirit of the humble, and to revive the heart of the contrite ones. For I will not contend forever, neither will I be always wroth: for the spirit should fail before me, and the souls which I have made." They have long been precious to me, but peculiarly so as we rapidly near the day when the Lord Jesus shall be revealed from heaven to be glorified in his saints and admired in all them that believe. It is now nearly ten years since my mind was first awakened to consider the probability of Christ's coming "about the year 1843." It was then I first saw Bro. Miller's nineteen lectures and a brother J. W. who believed their doctrine. I hoped that I might live to see the year, and that my Savior would then come. Although the probable year was absent by the space of half a dozen years, the time seemed near; and the thought of that awful and glorious scene, was truly a startling and thrilling one. What! the end of the world so near, when the righteous, dead and living, should be made immortal and receive their reward! Will the earth indeed be purified! The idea seemed rather visionary, (in consequence of my former teaching,) but the impression upon my mind was real and lasting. O, that those impressions may be renewed and deepened.

B. MORLEY.

COLLINS CENTRE, N. Y., April 20.

It is evident that the time is at hand when he whose right it is will take to himself his great power and reign, from the fact that almost if not every sign which was to precede the coming of our Lord has been witnessed. The four universal empires have arisen and we live in the time of the last form of the fourth, and the fifth empire will soon be established which will extend from sea to sea and from the river to the ends of the earth. Many glorious promises are left on record to inspire the way-worn traveller with new courage while on his way to the land of rest. The promise that he should be heir of the world was not to Abraham or his seed through the law, but through the righteousness of faith. If we are of faith then are we blessed with faithful Abraham; and if ye be Christ's, then are ye Abraham's seed and heirs according to the promise.

Abraham died in the faith not having received the promised inheritance, but by faith saw it afar off, and it is quite certain he can never receive it without a resurrection; (if the dead rise not then they also who have fallen asleep in Christ are perished;) but life and immortality are brought to light in the gospel, and the time is soon coming when all that are in their graves will hear the voice of the Son of God, and come forth: they that have done good to the resurrection of life, and they that have done evil to the resurrection of damnation; and it stands us in hand to be diligent that we may be found of him in peace—that when the many shall come from the north, south, east and west to sit down with Abraham Isaac and Jacob in the kingdom of God, that we too may have a part in this matter.

D. JOHNSON.

RICHFORD, N. Y., May 13th, 1847.

My treasure in this world is very small, but I am strong in the faith that very soon every true child of God will possess an inheritance incorruptible, undefiled and that never will pass away—Lord hasten the time.

The good cause in this place is very low—nothing like as prosperous as it was last season—every thing has been done to divide and distract us and draw away disciples after popular peace criers. Some have returned to their house from whence they came out. This is the effect of pride, love of applause, ignorance and sectarian influence. Here is a large tract of country where the glad tidings of the kingdom nigh at hand has not been heard. It has appeared to me if some faithful laborer in the Lord's vineyard could come this way and spend a few days, some souls might be gathered into the fold of Christ. Soon the door of mercy will be closed for ever and the faithful watchmen will enter into rest. O may they all watch for souls as those that must give account of their stewardship. My heart was pained when I learned that Bro. Pinney is again deprived of health. Truly the ways of God are mysterious, but his grace is sufficient for all who put their trust in him. My brethren and sisters scattered abroad in the world, having no continuing city, let us rejoice in God knowing that our redemption is nigh. The signs of the times give strong indications of approaching judgment. Are not the sea and waves roaring? has not a fearfulness spread over the minds of men looking for some great event? are not the nations angry?

O how thankful ought we to be to our heavenly Father for a revelation of his holy will to mankind. O let us live with our loins girt with truth.

Yours waiting,

AMZI NORTON.

OBITUARY.

It becomes my duty to record the death of my oldest sister's second husband, Clark Stow, Jr., of Weybridge, Vt., who died April 18th, after suffering extremely, from the slow but fatal disease, consumption. He has left a large circle of friends to mourn his loss, but most of them mourn not as others that have no hope, for they believe them that sleep in Jesus, God will bring with him. The subject of this notice embraced Christ in the days of his youth and joined the Episcopal Methodists, with whom he walked as a worthy member until 1843, at which time he embraced the advent faith. His eyes were opened also to behold the evils of slavery, and its connection with the church of which he was a member; and being opposed on these two points by some of his brethren, he with a large number of kindred spirits withdrew, and organized a Wesleyan Methodist Church, with whom he remained until his death, which took place as above, at the age of 48 years. And by an even, untiring, and conscientious course, together with his testimony, during the last sickness, he manifested his strong confidence in God and in the speedy coming of Christ.

In this stroke of death the wife is deprived of a tender husband, and children of an indulgent father, the church of a valuable member, the world of one of its lights, the earth of some of its salt.

An affecting discourse was preached on the occasion by Bro. Foster from Psa. xiii. 1.

Yours waiting for Christ,

J. D. MARSH.

State of Things in Ireland.

Our columns present some mournful evidences of the fearful progress of destitution and disease in this unfortunate country. The terrible fever scourge, so justly apprehended, is becoming alarmingly severe. Thousands of the poorer classes have sunk under it; and, whilst more and more of them are daily attacked, it has begun to assail those in better circumstances, of whom several have already fallen its victims. In Galway, some of the gentry of the county have died of fever, and more are suffering under it. The city of Cork is in a dreadful condition. The people of Cork have become afraid, lest they may be utterly borne down by the flood of pauperism and disease, which is setting in upon them; and steps have been taken to establish a sort of barrier of health, with a view of preventing the influx of paupers.—Belfast Northern Whig.

Five magistrates of the county of Galway died last week of malignant fever, and the following are seriously ill: Messrs. Darcy, Ball, (Crown solicitor,) Leonard, Kirwin, (Blindwell,) Morris and Robertson. Mr. J. Nolan, a magistrate of the county Galway, has also fallen a victim to typhus fever, in addition to Mr. Martin, Mr. Gregory and Mr. Jones, R. M.—Limerick Chronicle.

The Waterford Freeman states that three hundred destitute persons are relieved daily, and receive rations from the limited resources of the monks at Mount Melleray.

The Mayo Constitution states that one-half of that country is now "a barren waste," and that a deep, unchangeable apathy seems to have taken possession of the minds of the farmer classes.

Sir Henry Winston Barron says, the poor are using the Indian meal without boiling it sufficiently, and thereby dysentery is promoted to a frightful extent. The meal should be put to steep over night, and then boiled in the morning for three hours.

An idea of the deaths from famine in this country, says the Cork Reporter, may be formed from the statements of three Roman Catholic Clergymen, whose testimony we are accidentally able to adduce in this day's impression. The Rev. Mr. Mahoney says, that in his parish of Coachford, the population of which is 6000, the average of deaths from famine is fifty weekly; and Rev. Mr. Barry, V. C., states that nearly four thousand persons, if not more, have fallen victims to famine in Bantry alone; and the right Rev. Dr. Walsh, Bishop of Cloyne and Ross, states on the authority of a parish priest of his diocese, that in one of his parishes, containing a population of 2,700, the number of deaths for the last month was two hundred and eighty; and that "in one of the sea-coast villages, which six months ago contained a population of 250 persons, there are now standing but three hovels, with about a dozen persons;" he adds, "the other hamlets have been entirely depopulated."

The Cork Examiner contains the following shocking statement: "We this day witnessed a most horrid and appalling spectacle at the Shandon guardhouse, at the foot of Malrow-lane. Under the sheds attached to that building lay some thirty eight human beings—old and young men, women, children, and infants of the tenderest age—all huddled together, like so many pigs or dogs, on the ground, without any other covering but the rags on their persons, and these in the last stage of filth and hideousness. There they lay—some dying—some dead—all gaunt and yellow, and hideous with famine and disease. We have seen many sights of horror within the last month, but never anything equal to this congregated mass of human debasement. The smell that came from the unfortunates was offensive in the extreme, and was sufficient of itself to propagate disease. Two of these wretched people died this morning —a man and child. How many will follow them before the evening to their home of eternal peace we may not calculate. Several dead bodies—principally of children—were found this morning in various parts of the city. Hundreds of wretched objects lie about under sheds, without food or covering."

The Lord Lieutenant of Ireland was dangerously ill, and not expected to recover. Lord Lurgan died on the 30th April.

CANDID ADMISSIONS.—"This truly is an age of wonders, changes and revolutions. No thinking man can open his eyes upon the great events which are passing before us, without being impressed with the signs of the times, and constrained to admit that important scenes are about to be opened to the view of an astonished world. The seals are opening, the trumpets are sounding, the nations are shaking, signs are seen in the heavens and on earth, which plainly teach us the fact that the coming of the Son of man draweth nigh. The wisest philosophers, and the most enlightened theologians who have lived upon the earth, have desired to see the day in which we live, and have died without the sight. Many of the governments of our world are shaking to the very centre. The tyrants of earth tremble on their thrones. The light of science and liberty is progressing, and the cry of reform is becoming general. In many countries tyranny and slavery are giving way before the light of the gospel of Jesus Christ, and we think the time is not far distant when the kingdoms of this world shall become the kingdom of our Lord and his Christ."—Christian Luminary.

WHAT THOU DOEST, DO QUICKLY.—Quick, young man! Life is short. A great work is before you, and you have no time to lose. If you would succeed in business, win your way to honor, and save your soul, you must work quickly. The sluggard dies. The wheels of time roll over him while he sleeps. Aim high and work hard. Life is worth the living, death is worth the dying, because heaven is worth the gaining.

Quick, ye men of might in the road of life!—Your life is more than half gone already. You are going down the hill, and the shadows begin to fall around you. If ye have ought to do before ye die, do it quickly. The morning is fled, mid-day has passed, and night cometh.

Quick, ye aged men, quick! Once you thought three score years and ten an endless time, and that they could never pass away. They have come, they have gone, and what have they left? The days of pleasure are passed, and the days of darkness are here. Have you left any work undone? Have you come to infirmities and trembling with no preparation for death? Ah, quick, ye aged fathers and grey-bearded sires! Already are the messengers of death beginning to tender their services, to bring you to the sepulchres of your fathers. With the feeble remnants of existence, strive for heaven. Work, pray, seek, while life lingers, mercy waits, and God is gracious!

CONSTANT PIETY.—In a family in the north of Ireland, a pious woman was engaged as a servant. The poor girl was much ridiculed for her religion by the young ladies, but did not render evil for evil; on the contrary, she would allow them to laugh at her, and then mildly reason. She made it her study to be attentive and useful to them; took opportunities to speak to them about religion, and would offer to read the Scriptures to them when they went to bed. They commonly fell asleep while she was reading, but she was not to be discouraged. Having exemplified Christianity in her life, Providence sent a fever to remove her to a better state. The young ladies were not permitted to see her during her illness, but they heard of her behavior, which did not lessen the impression which her previous conduct had made upon them. Soon after the two elder ones began to make a profession of religion, the little heaven spread; and now all the young ladies appear truly pious. Nor is religion in this highly favored family confined to them. Other means were employed by God in producing this great change, but one of the two who became serious, declared that she chiefly ascribed it to the life and death of her servant-maid. Be not weary in well-doing—never be ashamed of Christ or his gospel. Always try to bring others to a knowledge of the truth as it is in Jesus. All can do some good, if they are only willing.—New York Evangelist.

PROSPECT OF THE WORLD'S CONVERSION.—Prof. Seagar, of this city, in his missionary address at New York, stated as follows:

"After all that Christianity has achieved there remain 600,000,000 in the darkness of idolatry. Myriads of human beings are hastening to the judgment and will meet us at the bar of God. Alas, their heathenish ignorance will afford them no passport and will ensure them no protection against eternal wrath. And in spite of all we are doing heathenism is gaining ground in the world, by the natural increase of population, which far exceeds the conversions to Christianity.

On the Death of Charlotte Elizabeth.

When in the records of the dead,
Elizabeth's dear name I read,
My heart in sadness moved.
A pang so sore I seldom knew,
'That cruel Death should take her too,
'The one so much beloved.

II.
Beloved by those of kindred hope;
Loved by the poor, and treasured up
Is her sweet memory.
My Albion's girls who sigh and weep,
Whom hard oppressors daily keep
In heartless slavery.

III.
But not to her own sex confined,
For every soul of human kind,
Subject of wrong; she felt.
'Should she have moved quick as desire,
'To each, from youth to aged sire,
A portion she had dealt.

IV.
'The rose leaf dead, its odor gives;
And Charlotte, tho' entombed, still lives,
And speaks, in volumes prized:
Their contents rich with truth impart
To mind a feast, and joy to heart:
Such treasure there comprised.

V.
Her race is run, her toils are o'er:
She sleeps, like worthy ones of yore,
And those of modern date,
Until the resurrection day
Shall call them from their bed of clay,
And God shall recreate!

VI.
'She saw the day of Jesus near—
'O then, methinks she will appear
In brightness round the throne:
Pangs that she tasted here shall gain
No entrance there; for woe and pain
And death shall be unknown!

Pre-millennial Advent.

BY CHARLES BRECHER.

THE MILLENNIUM A NEW DISPENSATION.

The nineteenth chapter of Revelations sets forth the manner in which Christ will introduce the Sabbath of Ages. It is difficult to grasp all the elements of that great crisis; justly to estimate the changes then to be effected, the kinds of power by which produced, and the relation of existing causes to those then introduced. On the one hand, there is a tendency to consider the operation of present causes, viz: The Holy Spirit acting invisibly through partially sanctified men, evolving and applying truth, with augmented purity and power. And, as falsehood is Satan's great means of holding the world in bondage, there is a tendency to reduce within the limits a logical conflict the whole "Battle of the great day of God Almighty;"—to make it a vast Debate conducted by preachers, editors and books, under the invisible conduct of the Holy Ghost on the one side, the Devil on the other. On the contrary, there is a tendency equally marked, to consider the operation exclusively, of a new style of causes—the manifestation of Christ as a creative being—bringing a second Genesis—altering the course of nature—destroying life—overwhelming his foes by fire and sword, and terrible exercise of omnipotent vengeance.

On the one extreme, physical power is sedulously excluded. It is jealousy watched under the name of "brute force." And the mind acquires insensibly an impression that the only way Christ can conduct a true logical annihilation of error, is by keeping his glorious form within the veil, and working unseen through mortal men. On the other extreme, Christ's intellectual and moral power is lost sight of, and his true aim, viz: To destroy Satan who is the Father of lies. Hence he is contemplated as attended by earthquakes. Mountains melt at his presence. Dead rise. Flames blaze. Lightnings devour. And the terrific developments overpower the imagination. The idea of truth then manifested, the Holy Ghost then energising and falsehood exposed, becomes secondary. Thus, in one or the other of these ways, there is danger of an imperfect or one-sided view.

1. In order to avoid this danger let us reflect that Regeneration is complex. Man consists of intellect, emotion and body. The sin of the human race has produced intellectual, moral and physical evil. This is true of the individual, and of nations, and of society. Regeneration then, whether of the individual or of the mass, must be co-extensive. The regeneration of the individual begins in the intellect by the power of truth, proceeds in the heart, by the power of love, ends in the body by the resurrection from among the dead. The regeneration of society, en masse, must be analogous; involving intellectual, moral and physical renovation. Hence Christ in the regeneration will wield three kinds of power, logical, emotive and physical.

2. PHYSICAL. (a.) To punish. There can be no question that that territory of the earth, which has been the centre of the world, embracing a web of lies, will be physically sunk in fire. Not because such proceeding will be directly of the nature of argument, though indirectly it will, as in case of the "cities of the plain." But Christ will sink Babylon like a millstone in an ocean of fire, as a solemn sign and signal of his intense hatred of her foul corruptions, which for ages have centered there—as if the very blood-drenched soil herself were guilty.

(b.) But Christ will wield physical power for another reason: to prepare a proper stage or theatre for the development of truth and the refutation of error. Not because he intends to force the nations to believe without evidence; but because he will be ready then to bring out and exhibit that evidence which for six thousand years he has been developing and preparing. When he comes to apply all the results of history to the mind of the human race, he will introduce among them a new order of speakers. And, preparatory to this, will work certain physical changes of the earth's surface.

(c.) These physical manifestations, however, will be limited and progressive. A thousand years are with him but as a watch in the night. The action of fire will probably be confined within the territories of the Roman Empire, the centre of corrupt civilization and apostate Christianity. Hence, in other portions of the globe, though there may be modifications of the physical laws, ameliorations, improvements, it is probable they will not be visited by the exterminating shock of divine indignation until the close of the millennial era. For it must not be lost sight of, how great, how stupendous an apostacy that must be, which can ensue after a thousand years of approximate perfection; nor how all before that must be considered incomplete.

Now to object to the expectation of such physical manifestations as inconsistent with God's gospel system of operating by truth and the Holy Ghost, seems to me unscriptural and against all analogy. If there be not some unusual physical display of Christ's power indicated in those clouds of language that hang dark and lowering round the dawn of that millennial brightness, then am I at loss to know how physical interposition could be shown. Then it is that "the heaven departed as a scroll, when it is rolled together, and every mountain and island were moved out of their places." Then, that "they hid themselves in dens, and in the rocks of the mountains, and said to the mountains and the rocks, Fall on us and hide us from the face of him that sitteth on the throne, and from the wrath of the Lamb, for the great day of his wrath is come, and who shall be able to stand?" Then we hear it said, "the nations were angry, and thy wrath is come, and the time of the dead that they should be judged." "And the temple of God was opened in Heaven, and there were lightnings, and voices, and thunderings, and an earthquake, and great hail." Then "every island fled away, and the mountains were not found; and there fell on men a great hail out of Heaven, every stone about the weight of a talent, (114 lbs.) and men blasphemed God because of the plague of the hail, for the plague thereof was exceeding great." "And a mighty angel took up a stone like a great millstone and cast it into the sea, saying, thus with violence, shall that great city, Babylon, be thrown down, and shall be found no more at all." "For she saith in her heart, I sit a queen, and am no widow, and shall see no sorrow; therefore shall her plagues come in one day, Death, and Mourning, and Famine, and she shall be utterly burned with fire, for strong is the Lord God that judgeth her." (Compare Rev. vi. 12-17; xi. 15-19; xvi. 17-21; xviii. 5-24. Four parallel prophetic pictures.) While we admit, that these descriptions do not exclude the logical destruction of the Papal system of lies, by intellectual power, we see no warrant for supposing there is nothing there but logic. Other elements there will be. Rome will sink in surges of fire. Alps and Appenines shall melt before the presence of their Maker.

(d.) It is to be borne in mind that such physical manifestations, however vast, so long as they are considered secondary to the perfect triumph of intellectual and moral power, are in strict accordance with analogy. It has been said that force is becoming obsolete, and intellectual power rising; which in some sense is true, but in no such sense as to preclude secondary manifestations of physical power, which shall as much surpass all former, as the intellectual manifestations to which they are secondary, surpass all former. In this respect force is rising, not sinking in the scale. It is, indeed, increasing secondary to truth. But is also increasingly developed in proportion as the truth itself is more expanded. Christ made prodigious display of physical power in Egypt,— piling miracle on miracle;—at Sinai, where the whole mountain blazed;—through the desert and in Canaan;—all however, secondary. The intellectual power Christ then exerted, was the mightiest part of his dealing. In the Moral law, and the Levitical system, he embodied an amount of intellectual power, which will be operative thro' eternity.

Now when this intellectual and moral power was to be still more fully developed, and augustly embodied in the Gospel system, did physical manifestation rise or fall in the scale?

Compared with the truths exhibited, the physical was more obviously subordinate than before. But compared with the amount of previous physical manifestation, it was as much higher in the scale as the intellectual development was more perfect. Before, Christ had been visible by fire and cloud, and talked with Moses face to face. Now, however, he "was made flesh." Here was a mode of physical manifestation altogether unprecedented. Before, there had been miracles; rather of a stupendous, awe-inspiring sort. Now, miracle became the familiar household element. Tempests were hurled by a word. Demons fled howling. Dead rose. Diseases vanished, and the man, Christ Jesus, walked forth familiarly toying with the profoundest secrets of the entire physical system. An amount of physical manifestation was quietly and unconsciously put forth, transcending all that the former dispensation had witnessed.

So then, when Scripture portends that the "powers of the world to come," will be as much superior to all past physical manifestations, as the intellectual and moral revolutions then to be effected, are mightier, to characterize the same as "brute force," and object thereto, must appear a violation, not only of Scripture, but of analogy. In my next I propose to consider Christ's manifestation, in an intellectual and moral point of view.

The Lust Days.

AN EXTRACT FROM AN OLD SERMON.

Time grows old! The Dread Majesty of the heavens arises to shake terribly the earth! The day is near that shall burn as an oven, and all the proud and them that do wickedly shall be stubble!

The prophet Daniel, speaking of this very period of time says, that many shall be purified and made white, and tried—probably in time of great persecution; but the wicked shall do wickedly—go from bad to worse with long and rapid strides—yea, glory in their shame and proud ignorance, and, therefore, none of the wicked shall understand; but the wise shall understand.

Before the evening of the great and dreadful day of the Lord, there shall be, according to St. Paul, a departure from the faith. Those also that retain the form but deny the power of godliness that they may gratify their lusts and cloak their carnality, will heap to themselves teachers, complimentary and waxy images of men having itching ears that cannot bear the truth. In these perilous times men shall be lovers of their own selves: covetous, boasters, proud, blasphemers, disobedient to parents, unthankful, unholy, without natural affection, truce breakers, false accusers, incontinent, fierce, despisers of those that are good, traitors, heady, high-minded, lovers of pleasure more than lovers of God.

And St. Peter says that in the last days shall come scoffers walking after their own lusts, and saying, Where is the promise of his coming? for since the fathers fell asleep all things continue as they were from the beginning of the creation. For this they are willingly ignorant of, the destruction of the antediluvian world, and deny and despise the future certainty of the conflagration of the present heavens and earth, which we know by the word of God continues to be left in store, reserved unto fire against the day of judgment and perdition of ungodly men.

As infidelity increases, the times will be more strongly marked, and voluptuousness and security among the wicked make an additional sign of the coming of the Son of man: For as it was in the days of Noah so shall it be also in the days of the Son of man. They did eat, they drank, they married wives, they were given in marriage, until the day that Noah entered into the ark, and the flood came and took them all away. Likewise also as it was in the days of Lot. They did eat, they drank, they bought, they sold, they planted, they builded, but the same day that Lot went out of Sodom it rained fire and brimstone from heaven and destroyed them all. And a cautionary direction is given to the believers that in this general security they should watch, lest at any time their hearts should be overcharged with intemperance and worldly cares, and so that day which shall come as a snare on all them that dwell on the face of the whole earth, should overtake them also by surprise.

At some period not long before the great day, there shall be signs in the sun, and in the moon, and in the stars—and upon the earth distress (revolutions,) of nations with perplexity, the sea and waves roaring—either literally or symbolically, to express tumultuous combinations of people mad to throw off every restraint, civil or religious—men's hearts failing then for fear, and for looking after those things which are coming on the earth—for the powers of heaven shall be shaken. And then shall appear the sign of the Son of man—some portentous display understood as we said before by faithful believers. And when these things begin to come to pass, says the evangelist, then look up and lift up your heads, for your redemption draweth nigh.

Lo! the hour is come! the mystery of God is finished! It is the determined counsel of the Eternal Three. What voice is that I hear from the dread throne, as the sound of many waters? "I am Alpha and Omega, the beginning and the end, the first and the last, saith the Lord. Behold, I come quickly, and my reward is with me, to give every man according as his work shall be!" I see the Eternal Son approaching to the throne of majesty in the heavens. I saw, says the prophet Daniel, in the night visions, and behold one like the Son of Man came with the clouds of heaven, and came to the Ancient of Days and they brought him near before him. And thus he moves his Father: O Father! the year of my redeemed is come—the day of vengeance is in mine heart. Long has my Spirit strove with men. All that love and wisdom infinite can give has been bestowed to effect their salvation. And now the ingrates vainly imagine that they shall efface thy remembrance, a sense of thine existence and their obligations to love and worship and obey thee, from the face of the whole earth. Come, therefore, let me get down, for the harvest is ripe, the press is full, the fats overflow! for their wickedness is great—that I may wipe away the reproach of my people, and perform my faithful promise, which their steadfast faith has long expected, in bringing them home to these fair realms, to behold the glory which I had with thee before all worlds, and with me to enjoy thy smiles and love eternal—and that I may condemn and banish the impenitent rebels of mankind and the disobedient angels to their own place, as vessels of wrath fitted for destruction. And there was given him, continues the prophet, dominion and glory and a kingdom, that all nations and languages should serve him: his dominion is an everlasting dominion which shall not pass away, and his kingdom that which shall not be destroyed.

And now he ascends the great white throne, raised on "the chariot of paternal deity." Above, beneath and round about him pour the marshalled hierarchies of angels and the innumerable company of the souls of just men made perfect: for them also who sleep in Jesus will God bring with him. The brightest military spirit of heaven leads on the angelic hosts: down through the regions of space, by unnumbered worlds they mark their rapid way, till they descry far off this poor terrestrial, sin-polluted orb, at once for their impenitence and rejection of the Savior, the disgrace and scorn of all created worlds. The mighty angel whom St. John saw standing upon the sea and upon the earth, at the signal given lifts up his hand to heaven and swears by him that liveth for ever and ever, who created the heavens and the earth and the sea, and the things which are therein, that time should be no longer.

What shout is that I hear? It is no other than the bursting joy of angels attendant on the Lord from heaven—from ten thousand thousand strong lunged cherubs breaks the glad peal:

"The joy, the shout, the harmony,
"Flies o'er the everlasting hills,
"Loud as from thunders without number,
"Sweet as from best voices uttering praise."

The jubilee begins! Hark! hark! do you hear that awful sound? It is the trump of God. Louder and louder the great archangel swells the tremendous roar! The awful peal reverberates thro' continents, through seas and islands! The steadfast earth reels to and fro like a tempest-beaten cottage! See, the opening graves! the earth teems with resurrection! Behold those glorious forms! how sweetly they ascend! what love and joy in their resplendent countenances! these are the saints of God—these are they that slept in Jesus! For the dead in Christ shall rise first. Then we which are alive and remain shall drop our dull mortality—for we shall all be changed in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye at the last trump, says the apostle—this corruption shall put on incorruption, and this mortal shall put on immortality. By the ministry of glorious angels, both the living and resuscitated saints ascend to meet the Lord in the air: for, Behold he cometh! "Far off his coming shines!" Nearer and nearer the bright pomp approaches!

Behold, he cometh! and every eye shall see him, and they also that pierced him, and all kindreds of the earth shall wail because of him. The angelic hosts dispart on either hand, and the King immortal appears in all the glory of his Father with the holy angels. The judgment is set, and the books are opened. Lift up your eyes, ye saints of the living God, and behold on the seat of judgment enthroned your Judge and Savior! Around him through the vast concourse are spread innumerable animated forms, beaming angelically bright. Is this the babe of Bethlehem? Is this the manger's weeping care? Is this the man arraigned at Pilate's bar? Is this the bleeding astonishment of Calvary, whose death the blushing heavens refused to behold? Yes, this is he—that man of grief. But O, how changed! And I saw a great white throne, says St. John, and him that sat on it, from whose face the earth and the heaven fled away and there was found no place for them.

Dr. Tyng on Daniel.

The third great kingdom is described in the vision of the image as the belly and thighs of brass, and in the vision of the beasts as the leopard with four wings of a fowl upon its back. This too, is the "He-goat that came from the west, on the face of the whole earth, and touched not the ground; and the goat had a notable horn between his eyes. And he came to the ram that had two horns, which I had seen standing before the river, and ran unto him in the fury of his power. And I saw him come close unto the ram, and he was moved with choler against him, and smote the ram, and broke his two horns: and there was no power in the ram to stand before him, but he cast him to the ground, and stamped upon him; and there was none that could deliver the ram out of his hand." This is a description of the rise of the Grecian Monarchy, and the fall of the Persian. Alexander, of Macedon, at the age of twenty, left the wooded province of his nativity, and with only 35,000 men set forth to conquer the earth. So impetuously did he drive forward, that nothing could withstand his approach. Monarchs laid their crowns at his feet, and in five years he was master of the whole Persian Empire, having extended his conquests beyond the Indus. Nothing but the irresistible solicitations, prayers, and touching appeals of the scarred veterans that accompanied him from Greece, prevented him from pushing on to the Ganges. Thus did the "He-goat wax very great," but "when he was strong, the great horn was broken; and for it came up four notable ones toward the four winds of heaven." The four which succeeded were four kings among whom the empire was divided. The conqueror died while yet a youth, in his 32d year, and in the 11th year of his monarchy.

These four finally settled into two great divisions, and ruled the world, until finally came the fourth and last monarchy of mankind. The Grecian Empire controlled the destiny of the earth about 300 years. It succeeded the Persian, and took its place.

The legs of iron in the image, and the feet of iron and clay supported the brazen Grecian trunk. In the vision of the beasts one came up from the sea "dreadful and terrible, and strong exceedingly, and it had great iron teeth; it devoured and brake in pieces, and stamped the residuc with the feet of it; and it was diverse from all the beasts that were before it, and it had ten horns." Does not history decide that Rome is here indicated? Does not this point to Roman conquests? About 30 years B. C. Augustus finally established the supremacy of the Roman Empire; Cleopatra then yielded to his power, and Rome was mistress of the world. All nations were subdued and became her tributaries. From the Indies to the Atlantic extended the Fourth Great Monarchy, which was divided into two divisions, the Eastern and the Western. For six hundred years this vast territory remained under the Empire of Rome, and was subject to the power of the beast that had ten horns. The iron legs and ten toes of iron and clay, indicated that these resulting kingdoms should be partly strong and partly broken. How correct does history stamp the sacred record!

But nothing of an earthly origin was to supercede Rome. The only effect of the Roman conquests was to weaken and divide, and they became an easy prey to the Goths and other rude northern tribes, who divided the empire into ten distinct kingdoms, which, in the language of the prophecy "were partly strong and partly weak." Some, of the weakness of clay, have been trodden down; and some with the durability of iron, remain. Before the close of the sixth century, these ten distinct governments had been formed out of the wreck of earth's Fourth Great Monarchy; three of these in accordance with Daniel's prophecy, were consolidated, and formed the Papal States. This is also the present condition of Europe, and from these ten countries the inhabitants of America have proceeded. All attempts to bring these fragments together and consolidate them under one government have signally failed. Who was more likely to have accomplished such a result than Napoleon, yet all his vast schemes were crushed, and he died a captive in a lone rocky isle of the Atlantic. Agitated Europe was restored to order and quiet, like the calm of the ocean after a storm, to prove and confirm the unchanging faithfulness of God. No Fifth Monarchy is to arise over the earth of human origin; but there is to be a Fifth of another character, different from any which man has seen, and derived from another source.

Having asked God in his own predictions what was to be, we have been answered. We have asked history, and she has answered us, as if she had said, "Ye know it already, why come ye to me?" Predictions made 2500 years ago have been fulfilled in their appointed order up to the present time in the most wonderful manner. Have we not a right to ask, Will not that which remains to be accomplished as certainly be fulfilled?

The lecturer then took a "characteristical" view of the subject, which was interspersed with many fine descriptive passages in regard to the magnificence of Babylon, surrounded for fifteen miles on every side with walls on which chariots could pass with ease—the career of Cyrus, who for twenty years slept on the tented field, and during which period he had no time to sheathe the sword of conquest and of power—the powerful and brilliant Empire of Greece, with its multitude of schools; its poetry, painting, sculpture, and architecture; its scientific and philosophical pre-eminence; giving to the polite and civilized world its language, after it was itself destroyed, which is even now studied and considered a requisite for an educated man—and Rome, who overturned all nations, included all nations, consolidated all nations, and made them all provinces of its own great empire; when to be born a Roman citizen was considered a great privilege, and kings willingly gave up their empires to be numbered among her citizens.

A chronological view next followed, which we are compelled to omit. If we rightly understood the lecturer, he made the year 1864 the time when the Fifth Great Kingdom is to be established, intimating at the same time that it might be fifty years later. On this subject he felt unwilling to dogmatise.

This was succeeded by a geographical view, in which the learned doctor detailed the manner in which the star of empire had gradually made its way towards the West. Of the Roman Empire nothing now remains but "the stump of the roots in the earth, with a band of iron and brass" around it. Her jurisprudence is still felt in all the courts of law in Western Europe and in this country, and her fame and principles of government continue to exert a powerful influence in the civilized nations of the present day. In the various departments of literature and science, her former supremacy is not now lost to the world, her language is still externally studied, and even in the habits of men and the arrangements of social intercourse, her impress remains.

The Fifth abiding Empire, an which "the Ancient of Days" shall sit, is near at hand. While all human appearances indicate the approach of changes more important than any man has ever seen before, God's word lays before us just what that change is to be. A stone that has been cut out of the mountain without human hands is to smite the image upon its feet of iron and clay, and break them in pieces; then will the whole become like the chaff of the summer threshing-floor; and the wind will carry them away; and the stone that smote the image shall become a great mountain, and fill the whole earth.

The last view is prospective—What is there before us? The Fifth Universal Monarchy remains to be established upon the earth. While the others were human, this last is to be wholly Divine. The self-moving stone will roll against the standing image, crushing the feet, and destroying all which they supported; and then the stone will become a majestic mountain. There is not to be a gradual improvement of men as they are, but a change of the whole frame-work of human government. The king that is to rule is the Son of Man, who will make a personal manifestation of himself. The political states of earth will crumble into ruin; lawless infidelity be crushed in the dust, and the children of Israel, delivered from their long captivity, will be gathered from all countries, and restored to the land of their fathers. The covenant made by God to Abraham remains to this day utterly unfulfilled.

The last great Kingdom will extend over the same geographical field; it will have the same human subjects—but its origin will be heavenly, and its principles Universal Righteousness and Peace.

The lecturer gave an eloquent synopsis of the history of Jerusalem, and closed with some remarks in regard to the present state of the world, the existence of slavery, the prosecution of wars of aggression and conquest, and the happy change soon to take place, when nations shall learn war no more, and the "earth shall roll its rapturous hosannah's round."—New Haven Palladium.

COMPLETE UNION.—There is but one point in which Christian union can be complete, and that is in Christ. There may be partial union on some ground less than this. Thus the friend of the slave, or the friends of peace, may unite in one principle, and be heaven-wide apart on all others. Thus those who hold the same doctrinal sentiments may have a kind of union, and seem to harmonize; while yet they have but one thing in sympathy. But souls filled with the love of Christ, have in him a complete union. Nothing less than this furnishes a medium for perfect union. Christ is the fullness of salvation. He is the true magnet that draws all souls together. His love is not addressed to one of the social principles, leaving all the rest uninfluenced, it enters into, and pervades the whole being. It creates a perfect brotherhood, a perfect oneness, complete in all respects, and enduring forever. For this union the blessed Savior prayed in that night of his dreadful agony, "That they all may be one, as Thou Father art in me, and I in thee, that they also may be one in us." The union of the Father and of the Son is complete. And here the Savior prays that we may be joined in heart as he and the Father are joined. This is a union that reaches to the finest fibre of the being, and brings all into harmony with the very heart of God, because it includes all the principles of true holiness.

CAN IT BE TRUE?—The following paragraph, confirmatory of the recent news from Santa Fe, we find in the St. Louis Republican:

"The Superior Court for the District of Taos, was still in session, for the trial of the rebels.—Six men, as we have already stated, had been tried and were hung; twelve more had been found guilty, and condemned to the same fate. Except from causes resulting from so extraordinary scene of punishment, all was quiet in the territory."

We sincerely hope the above report may turn out to be incorrect. It cannot be possible that Gen. Kearney would do so infamous a deed as to hang citizens of Mexico for treason against the United States—a government to which they do not owe the slightest allegiance. Gen. K., it will be remembered, marched an army into Santa Fe, took possession of the province of New Mexico, and without the least shadow of authority, and in violation of the Constitution and laws, annexed it to the United States. The War Department was obliged to concede that he exceeded his powers. The people of that country, regarding the Americans as usurpers, seized the first opportunity to rebel. This they had a right to do—a right consistent with the laws of war and the nature of things. We should have done the same under the same circumstances. As military governor of the country, Gen. K. has a right to imprison offenders, but where does he find the power to try them as traitors to the United States, and murder them in cold blood for a crime of which they could not be guilty?—*Roch. Voice of Truth & Glad Tidings

"The wise shall understand."

ROCHESTER, JUNE 9, 1847.

Perilous Times.

Never have we viewed the Christian in more imminent danger than now. There is but little genuine revival influence to cheer and strengthen him: the altar is not crowded with weeping penitents, nor the courts of the Lord with joyful converts, as they once were. The soul-stirring and life-reviving sermons are now seldom heard from the minister, nor the stirring and melting exhortations and fervent prayers from the church members. But a coldness, an indifference, a spell, a charm, a deathlike apathy has come over the church. They seem to slumber, or act like those who dream. The very atmosphere, morally speaking, appears to be impregnated with the vapors of death. The Christian necessarily lives or dwells in this atmosphere, and is constantly exposed to the stupefying circumstances around him, and unless he constantly take heed to himself, he will breathe this deadly atmosphere, and be overcome by these fatal influences and forever lost.

At such a time as this we need often to be found in fervent prayer, supplicating the constant aid of our gracious Lord and Savior, to keep us from falling, in this hour of temptation which has come upon the whole world. We should also omit no duty, but cheerfully and faithfully do all the Lord requires at our hand, whether at home or abroad. His word, too, should be made our every day study. Our spirit should be deeply imbued with the spirit of Christ.—Our faith should be unwavering, and our hope as an anchor to the soul. If we live thus, nothing shall harm us—we shall never fall—But shall safely escape the perils around us, and the still more dreadful things which are coming upon the earth, and shall be enabled to meet our glorious Lord at his appearing.

Successful Ministers.

"The old ministers," said Mr Williams of Wern, "were not much better preachers than we are, and in many respects they were inferior to us; but there was an union about their ministry, and success attendant upon it, that can now be but seldom seen. And what is the cause of the difference? They prayed more than we do. If we would prevail and 'have power with men,' we must first prevail and 'have power with God.' It was on his knees that Jacob became a 'prince,' and if we would become princes, we must be oftener and more importunate on our knees." He was very fond of relating the following anecdote respecting the late Rev. J. Griffith, of Caernavron: "Mr. Griffith was to preach one night in a farm house, and he desired permission to retire to a private room before the services began. He remained there a considerable time after the congregation had assembled. As there was no sign of the preacher making his appearance, the good man of the house sent the servant to request him to come, as the people had been some time waiting. On approaching the door, she heard what she supposed to be a conversation between two persons in rather a subdued tone of voice. She stood listening at the door, and heard one say to the other, 'I will not go unless thou come with me.' The girl returned to her master and said, 'There is some one with Mr. Griffith, and he tells him that he will not come unless the other accompany him. I did not hear the other make any reply, so I conclude he will not come from there to-night.' 'Yes, yes, he will,' said the master; 'and I'll warrant the other will come with him, if matters are as you represent them. We shall begin the service by singing and reading till the two come.' At length Mr. Griffith came, and the 'other' with him, and they had an extraordinary meeting that night. I proved the commencement of a powerful revival in the neighborhood, and many were converted to God. 'Nothing, brethren,' Mr. Williams would say, by way of applying the anecdote, 'is necessary to render our ministry as efficient and successful as that of our fathers; but that we should be brought to the same spirit and frame of mind.'—London Magazine.

"A Devoted Christian."

A certain religious paper in noticing the death of an officer of the American army, who fell in the siege of Vera Cruz, among other traits ascribed to him, says, "He was a member of the Episcopal church, and a devoted Christian."

Our idea of what constitutes a devoted Christian is far from including in its category of excellencies the bravery and daring of the warrior with garments rolled in blood, and we think that we have not only the mind of the Spirit, but also the moral sense of all who have a correct view of true Christian character. Ask any man familiar with the genius of Christianity, to give you a true description of a devoted Christian, will he bring out as the result a military officer, equipped for battle, ready for the conflict of arms, and thirsting for scenes of blood, where not only the groans of the dying soldier may be heard, but also of defenceless women and innocent children!

But it is said of this officer that his 'last words' were, "Tell the Major that our shells were doing their work nobly." What work? Such as a devoted Christian can rejoice in seeing done? Are these the dying words of a devoted Christian? The heart sickens at such a libel on the Christian religion.—What a strange delusion the war spirit brings upon the minds of men!

The fact here recorded is enough to justify all we have ever said against the war. But we are condemned even by men professing godliness for venturing to speak against this monstrous evil!—Strange!—Watchman of the Valley.

Correspondence of the West India Mission.

{ St. Johns, Antigua, West India.
April, 1847.

DEAR BRO. MARSH:—Your paper bearing date March 3d, with the three previous numbers, came to hand on the 3d inst., one month from date. I was glad to see from that and the previous number (Feb 24th) that you feel so deep an interest in this mission, and that you sympathise with me in my desire to have it sustained, and that an additional laborer should be sent to this field. I was highly gratified with your remarks upon the subject, and hope ere this something decided has been done in the matter, and that such a co-worker, as you very judiciously suggested should come, will soon be here to labor for the Lord.

My heart was never more in the cause of God than now. And inasmuch as the aspect of the times indicates a speedy termination of our labors and cares, I feel that we should 'do with our might what our hands find to do.'

Surely, the state of things in Europe, is such as to create expectation of a momentous crisis in the history of those nations which occupy the old Roman world. And what crisis does prophecy designate but that in which 'angry nations' lose their power, through the assumption of his rightful sovereignty by the Son of David? I am sure I know of no other. The famine and cholera, come into the dark picture of these gloomy times, to indicate that the Kingdom of God approaches, by showing us 'distressed and perplexed nations.' As in one of Wesley's beautiful hymns—

"Thy tokens we with joy confess:
"The war proclaims the Prince of Peace,
"The EARTHQUAKE speaks thy power,
"The FAMINE all thy fulness brings,
"The PLAGUE presents thy healing wings,
"And nature's final hour."

In alluding to earthquakes, I am reminded of three shocks which we had a few days since, and in order that you may have the impression made by them at the time, I will copy from my journal.

"Monday, 7 o'clock A. M., Apr. 5th, '47.

"Last night, after returning home from meeting, I felt the first shock of an earthquake I ever experienced. Being quite tired by the labors of the day, we were preparing to retire for the night, and stood by our bedside when we felt a sharp movement of the house as if some Herculean hand had laid hold of the foundations and shaken it. The posture we were in—standing upon our feet—would make the sensation most acute and distinct, and yet unwilling to believe it an earthquake we sought for some other cause of the phenomenon, but nothing would account for the violent movement—even of our own house, but an earthquake. An inquiry of our neighbors satisfied us that we were quite too unbelieving, as they felt it in most distinct manner. My dear wife said she did not like to retire to rest under the lofty towers of the Cathedral, as they would inevitably bury us in case of a severe shock; but upon reminding her that we were quite safe in God's care in any place, and remarking that we did not know there would be any more shocks, we laid ourselves down quietly, confiding in God. This shock seemed to consist in a quick vibration from north to south and lasted only a few seconds: it occurred at 10 minutes before 10 o'clock. After placing some of our garments where we could catch them up in a moment, should a severe shock follow, we retired to rest, and I had just fallen into a drowse, when I felt another more severe shock, and speaking to my wife I sprang from the bed, went to the door, and she followed, but as nothing more was felt, we returned again to our bed, and suffered nothing worse from earthquakes during the night than by dreaming of the most awful scenes, in which the heaving earth was rolling a flood of waters over the country, before which I, with many others, was endeavoring to flee. I found in the morning that this shock was distinctly felt in the city, and some arose and dressed themselves, fearing a more severe shock.

There is something awfully sublime and terrific in these slight shocks even, in a city which has once been nearly destroyed by such visitations, and also when we reflect that islands have been swallowed up in these fearful spasms of nature, and numerous cities and extensive and fertile districts have been laid waste by these prophetic harbingers of the day of God. To feel the 'firm earth' move to and fro, without prophetic ken, to discover to what extent it will be permitted, by Him who says to the undulating earth, as well as to the boisterous ocean, 'Thus far shalt thou go, and no farther'—is calculated to inspire feelings of solemn awe, and give us a sense of man's impotency, which very few things in nature can do, and lead him to inquire on what terms he is, with that God who tosses the mountains at His pleasure, as a child would a pebble, and overturns its cities, and hurls into ruins the works of ages of human toil, as an infant would overturn the miniature town, which childish ingenuity had arrayed upon the floor of the nursery. I am thankful that I am enabled to look from all secondary causes of these fearful visitations—to the Great First Cause, and confide in him, feeling that he will do nothing haphazard, but will accomplish all in wisdom and in love.

* Our little domicile is located upon the same eminence occupied by the Cathedral of the Established church, and should the towers of it be hurled down by another severe earthquake, and share the fate of the edifice which fell in 1843, on the same site, we should hardly expect to escape, were it in the night, for a party assembled on the day time to celebrate the marriage ceremony—and the officiating clergyman narrowly escaped from the church edifice before.

Never could I realize before, what an earthquake was, and what sensations it would inspire in the breast, and I doubt if it can be appreciated, without feeling in some degree its influence. So, how little can we realize the scenes of the last day, when no thing in human experience furnishes any faint resemblance to the coming of Christ and the dissolution of the earth. Therefore, as we believe in earthquakes which we cannot appreciate, so we may believe in the coming of Christ, and the scenes of the last day, when 'God will shake the sea and the dry land, and the Desire of all nations shall come'—without being able to realize the awful grandeur of that day of days.

Monday, P. M., Apr. 5th.

"About 20 minutes past 12, at noon, I was sitting in the house of one of our friends conversing, when we were startled by another earthquake, which shook the house so as to cause me instantly to spring upon my feet, and seek a place of security beyond the walls of the house, but there was no other shock. This was a more severe vibration than the one last night: the lamp shades and glass ware upon the side-board rattled, and the whole house shook with a sensation peculiar to earthquakes.

The previous severe earthquake in 1843 was preceded by several shocks like the present, and the Lord only knows whether these are not precursors of a more fearful calamity than has hitherto occurred. Surely, the wickedness of the people is such as to call loudly for judgments; and even while this earthquake was shaking the earth, a tumultuous mob was refusing submission to law, and threatening violence to the magistracy and the police—in the court room and in the open street. So it will be when the Lord comes in all his glory!—The thoughtless rabble full of angry passions—The giddy throng forgetful of God, whirling in the mazes of the dance—The debauched gambling club around the billiard or card table—The guilty violator of the seventh commandment, in the libidinous bed—The man of business at his accustomed employment in the counting room, workshop, or field—The sailor tossing upon the wild billows of the ocean—All, all, from the mightiest potentates at whose nod millions bow, to the starving peasant on Erin's isle—are startled from earthly dreams, by the introductory scenes of a more fearful drama, than earthquakes—famines—pestilences and floods have ever occasioned, from the Creation until now. These may give us some faint conception of that day, but the reality will only show the extent of God's power, and the terribleness of his justice! Oh, who shall stand when he appeareth? 'He that hath clean hands and a pure heart,' is the Bible answer. And I have been made solemn while meditating upon the query, 'Nevertheless when the Son of man cometh, shall he find faith on the earth?' which inferentially teaches us, that although his elect will be heard which cry day and night unto Him, yet few will be ready for that day, when he comes 'to avenge his elect.'

I believe a goodly number in this city have been led to seek a pure heart. Since I last wrote you, several youth, some of dissolute habits, have been led to turn unto the Lord, who had never previously known anything of experimental religion; and many professed christians have been aroused from lethargy, which unfitted them to meet the Lord as truly as open impenitence. Other persons who had been more respectable sinners than the former class, have felt that they needed the pardoning blood applied; and now give evidence of having 'passed from death unto life.' O, that they may 'endure unto the end,' and be saved in the day of the Lord.

Although many who once visited our place of worship have, through fear of reproach, and various other causes, forsaken our meetings, yet a goodly number still attend, and there have been fruits of our efforts sufficient to compensate for all our trials.

Yesterday, (Sabbath,) I administered the ordinance of baptism, which is a strange thing in this island, for although the gospel was introduced here more than a century since, no person (so far as I am able to learn) ever administered this ordinance in accordance with the import of the word 'baptizo,' but have perpetuated the errors of the dark ages upon that subject. I was educated with all the false notions in reference to that ordinance which commonly prevail, but being convinced from the Bible that I had been in error on this subject, I submitted to that ordinance, and received it at the hand of our dear departed brother Barry, while he was with you at Rochester; since which time I have never felt at liberty to tell that which is false, by saying, 'I baptize thee' &c, when I only applied a few drops of water to the subject, which is no more 'baptism,' or 'immersion,' than it is any other conceivable thing. The ministers, or at least one of them, calls 'baptism' another of the 'strange doctrines,' which endanger the people.

The ordinance was administered to five persons, all of whom, with one exception, were in their sins a few weeks since. One of these brethren has been connected with the Wesleyans, but when convinced of the truth, he has followed after the blessed Savior, willing to suffer shame for Christ's name. He now opens his house to us for meetings, and has stood by us, when many who made fair speeches at first have in a cowardly manner shrunk from avowal of the truth, and have left our meetings. The others are young men, whom God in great mercy has snatched from the jaws of perdition. One of these, who has been a very wicked youth, much addicted to intemperance, now says he feels himself quite 'a new creature,' which he certainly appears to be. Yet the Superintendent of the Wesleyan Mission, to whom he went to find the total abstinence pledge, endeavored to turn him from our meetings, and told him 'he should not meddle too much with the prophecies.' What better is such an adviser than papal teachers, who call all other portions of the Bible, than those embraced in their catechisms and breviaries, 'pernicious,' & calculated to 'mislead the common people?' Such men, instead of rejoicing that any scriptures which they have neglected, and of course have been profitless to the people, are so exhibited as to constrain men to break off from their sins and turn to God, thus becoming as the apostle says—'profitable for doctrine, reproof, correction, and instruction in righteousness,' rather attempt to divert the minds of the people from those subjects altogether. I am more and more persuaded that those 'who cannot endure sound doctrine have heaped to themselves teachers having itching ears, and have turned away from the truth and are turned unto fables' which the apostle Paul said (2 Tim iv 4) should be the case.—The Lord have mercy upon these professed ministers of Christ, who are calling divine revelation a mystery so incomprehensible as to make it a waste of time to study it. And yet one of those ministers tells the people in one breath that prophecy cannot be understood until its accomplishment, and in the next tells them the world is to be all filled with the glory of the Lord before Christ comes, and his coming will not take place for two thousand years. This is orthodox consistency! How is it possible for him to know that the earth is to be filled with God's glory, until it is accomplished, according to his principle? And how consistent it is to talk of the fanaticism of those who fix upon a near point of time, and at the same time declare that a long period of two thousand years will elapse, before the event! Common reason would suggest that at least it was more consistent with his own logic—that we should understand prophetic events and prophetic chronology, near the time of their fulfillment, rather than two thousand years distant.

Many, I regret to say, who once were convinced of the truth of the Savior's being near, or at least were strongly impressed with the subject, are now indifferent to it, or are open opposers. This, however, I expected, but I hardly expected that some who have forsaken the truth, would have done so, but the same experience through which we passed in nearly all places in America, and the same vicissitudes through which the gospel has passed in all ages—we must expect to characterize our efforts in proclaiming the truth here. But I praise God for what he has wrought, and believe, that the work will still go on.

I am happy to hear of your prosperity in this blessed cause in America, and pray God to be with you still. I hope to greet some fellow laborer from my native land upon these shores very soon. Sometimes I feel sad, in this island of strangers, and long to see some one from home, but God's will be done. I thank him for the many friends he has raised up for us here, for we have many lovers of the truth, and many who love it for the truth's sake, which under God we have been instruments in bringing to their ears.

Our health is still excellent—indeed, better than in America, and although the sun's rays are now nearly vertical, yet we feel less inconvenience from the heat than in our own land. I do not think temperate and careful persons who understand the laws of health, need suffer more from illness here than in America where I have resided; but retribution for recklessness of health is undoubtedly visited upon the heads of those who are dissipated and careless, sooner in this climate than in the North; so that it is my conviction that a brother coming from America now would not suffer any ill effects from the change of climate. God is afflicting some of our dear brethren at home with the loss of health and friends, I perceive from your paper. I sympathize heartily with dear Bro. Tanner in his severe affliction. God comfort and bind up the broken heart! It was painful to hear of dear Bro. Porter's illness—I hope, if it is God's pleasure, that he may be preserved for the church's and his family's sake. I commenced a letter to Br'n Porter and Tanner some time ago, but did not send it; however I remember them with great affection, as I do indeed many dear brethren and sisters in America to whom it is impossible for me to write. The aid which some have rendered to the mission has been very acceptable, and did I suppose it necessary, could multiply expressions of gratitude, but I doubt not they have done what they have "unto the Lord," and therefore they expect their recompense from him. God speed the time when "he that soweth and he that reapeth shall rejoice together." Dear brethren and sisters, pray for us as well as send means—for without God we can do nothing, and your prayers if "servent and effectual" will avail much. I value the prayers of those who are waiting for the Savior's coming.

I am very truly

Yours in the blessed hope,

Our return from Boston, Mass., was too late to afford time for writing much editorial for this number. The Lord willing, a good supply will be given next week.

ERRATUM.—In the versification of Psalm lxxviii., published in no. 8, first page, the following omission occurs. Seventh line from bottom, for 'rideth on the heavens,' read, 'rideth on the heaven of heavens.'

Fashionable Religion in New York.

"The correspondent of the National Era, an anti-slavery paper published at Washington, gives the following truthful and pungent sketch of the religion of New York." But like almanacs of the present day is adapted to all the latitudes of Christendom :

NEW YORK, April 23, 1847.

If numerous and elegant churches afford any evidences of superior godliness, New York may be justly regarded as a city greatly abounding in grace. Costly temples are springing up in all directions. The different religious denominations are rivalling one another in church building, and the grand struggle appears to be, not so much which can be most faithful to their professed Lord and Master, as which can erect the most magnificent places of worship. Almost all the old, plain, and unpretending edifices, in which the pious citizens of the last generation prayed and dozed, have been torn down, and their places are now occupied by the stores and ware-houses of the children of Mammon, whilst, up-town, in the fashionable faubourgs, new churches, decorated inside and outside like the palaces of kings, open their gates to the genteel children of Zion.

These churches have their various degrees of respectability and gentility, just as the millinery establishment of Broadway and the Bowery have theirs. A fashionable lady would no more patronise one of your vulgar, plain, religious edifices, in a side street, than she would think of ordering a spring bonnet Chelsea. "Dr. Smith is a very zealous preacher?" "Oh! as for his zeal, I don't know: but he is such a nice, genteel sort of a man; and his church is so very genteel—very fashionable, I assure you—quite select and exclusive!" "Do you still worship at Dr. Brown's church?" "Oh! dear me! no! It's rather vulgar, you know; and Mr. Jackson succeeded so well in Wall street last year, that we joined Dr. Muphine's church, up-town!" "And how do you like him?" "Well, the congregation's uncommonly genteel, I declare. Why, the Thompsons, and the Johnsons, and the Murphys, and the Van Blixens, go there. Oh! it's none but the tip-top, I assure you!" And so, my dear friend, on every Sabbath, in this godly city, the genteel churches are well filled; silks and satins rustle bravely in the crowded aisles; in soft and sleepy tones, the rounded periods drop like honey from the lips of the oily preacher; and the fashionable congregation is as cold, as formal, and as dead, as worldly-mindedness can make it! Heaven pities, hell laughs, and the angels veil with their wings their saddened faces and their weeping eyes! Yes, enter one of these 'uncommonly genteel' churches, where the members attempt to rival their fellow-men, not in faith, love, purity and virtue, but in the splendor of the building in which they affect to worship, and in pretensions to fashions and exclusiveness, and you are at once struck with the cold, wordy, Pharisaic character of the whole scene. A common-place, inflated harraugue from the pulpit; a jingling hymn, sung by a well-paid choir; a formal, heartless prayer, an eager interchange of compliments and recognitions, as the relieved congregation hurry through the vestibule, and the melancholy scene is over. The sons and daughters of Mammon, the votaries of fashion, go home to dinner, more satisfied with themselves and farther from God than ever, without having heard anything to disturb or alarm the conscience, with sins unrebuked, follies unproved, minds unenlightened, hearts as frozen, as far removed as ever from the purifying and ennobling influences of true religion.

Ah! my friend, in vain do we seek in these splendid temples, where cushioned wealth and pride imagine that they worship God, for that pure religion which was promulgated in all its sublime simplicity on the shores of Galilee and in the streets of the Holy City! Christianity, amongst certain classes here, has become a mere thing of fashion, like the box at the opera, or a drawing-room at the 'Springs.' It reminds one of the corrupt state of the church in the days of St. Chrysostom, when his fashionable hearers defiled the temple of the living God, by making it the theatre of vain conversation and meretricious display. In vain would the poor and needy seek admission to these magnificent churches. A very fashionable lady of this city, whose mamma enjoyed for many years an enviable reputation for superior industry and energy at the wash-tub, it is said, once replied to a worthy divine, who was exhorting her to be less arrogant to the poor, as they were of kindred blood, and would, through the Redeemer, share equally with the rich the glories of the celestial abodes, that she 'had no idea that genteel people would mingle there with the poor, as there would be for the latter back seats in the Kingdom of Heaven!' Many of our professors of Christianity appear to be very much of the same way of thinking, and, indeed, go a little farther; for they will not allow the poor a back seat even in the earthly temple, building for themselves exclusive houses of prayer, where no vulgar aspirations are permitted to mingle with the increase of elegance, refinement, fashion, and fancy stock, fortunate lot-holding aristocracy!

The notices which are appended to this article will inform you that our genteel disciples, even in the house of prayer, do not forget the "main chance!" Mammon does not doze. Church stock is among the best in the market. Not for nought is this modern Christianity served by godly stock-jobbers in Wall street, holy directors of banks, and spiritually-minded speculators in "the indigo and tobacco line!" Shares in these church-building enterprises are sold like those in the Long Island railroad; and, as you perceive, pews are set up at auction and knocked down like so many lots of tea, coffee or sugar. A thing hardly dreamed of in the days of the Apostles!

PERNICIOUS PAPERS.—A contemporary very justly remarks that there is vastly more of corrupt literature issued and devoured in newspapers than in books. And the forms in which this corrupting literature in newspapers steals into a reading, are more insidious and deceptive. Here it comes in, it may be, in the ordinary vehicles of intelligence—in the family newspaper in connection with the news, which every body must read. And then the quantity of bad papers published and read, is many fold more than what goes out in the form of books. It would take many such establishments as that of the Harpers, to supply in books the same amount of corrupt material that now goes forth in the hundreds of thousands of newspapers and periodical pamphlets which every day sends forth.

EVANGELICAL ALLIANCE.—"The slavery question is likely to prove fatal to this association. The following paragraph from the Christian Reflector, the organ of the New England Baptists, will show the state of feeling on the question:"

AMERICAN BRANCH OF THE EVANGELICAL ALLIANCE.—The meeting in New York for completing an organization as above is reported to have been thinly attended, and to have failed in exciting much enthusiasm in the objects which it proposes. We see, or seem to see, a sufficiency of reason for this failure. The world is becoming tired of pleas of Unity rather than for Righteousness and Humanity. Unity, we may hope, is fast losing its talismanic power, except as it is founded in the great principles of social and moral rectitude. There is a just dread of any organization to promote Union, whose first aim is not to benefit Man and glorify God. This dread, as we have seen, will be keenly manifested whenever plans for Union shrink sensitively from an utterance and a basis that contemplate the rights of God and of Man as paramount, and as elemental in every endeavor that aims at human good and the Divine glory.

The whole history of this movement, and the spirit especially of the protracted meeting and discussion in New York, all go to make plain a growing feeling of the great Evangelical Community. They declare an unwillingness, with some exceptions, to give sanction to an object that has more zeal for an ideal Union than for Humanity. It is too late in the day to override Man for the sake of ecclesiastical harmony. The thing may be done metaphysically, but the popular feeling will be made to recoil at so unnatural a process.

Something to be always Remembered.

It is, "the power and coming of our Lord Jesus Christ." [See 2d Peter, i. 15, 16.] In the 5, 6, and 7 verses, Peter describes the steps by which we may be certain of an abundant entrance into "the everlasting kingdom of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ." The first step is "faith," and the last is "charity" or love, which is the bond of perfectness.

These steps must be taken in exact order they are laid down. We can not leap from "knowledge" to "patience" nor from patience to "charity." Those who set at naught the principles of temperance in eating, drinking, laboring, studying, or in the gratification of any of the appetites or propensities, can never (while living thus) possess the lovely grace of patience. Neither can those who violate the law of brotherly-kindness, possess at the same time, the bond of perfectness.

This golden chain connects those who hold it, to the new Jerusalem, and we may say, to the throne of the Son of David.

In view, it would seem, of the blessings to be dispensed from that throne and enjoyed in that kingdom to come, Peter, well refined by the grace of God, gives his dying charge, performs his last solemn though pleasing duty. And it is, that "the power and coming of our Lord Jesus Christ" be kept always in sweet and sacred remembrance.

Peter once said, with an oath, "I do not know the man." At another time somewhat disposed to neglect his duty to "the flock" for the sake of securing personal interests, he said, to some of the brethren—"I go a fishing." But being effectually reclaimed from his last resort of selfishness, and being advertised of the manner of his death, his love, already kindled to a flame, seems never to wax cold again. But he blesses God from the fulness of his heart for the prospect of an incorruptible and unfading inheritance in the new Heavens and Earth promised to the righteous. He rejoices with joy unspeakable and full of glory, in view of the time when he should see the Chief Shepherd and receive a crown of glory which fadeth not away.

He says "This second epistle, beloved, I now write unto you: in both which I stir up your pure minds by way of remembrance."

And then as if to justify his great earnestness on this enrapturing theme, he says—"Our beloved brother Paul also, in all his epistles speaks of these things:" Concerning the power and coming of our Lord Jesus Christ. Peter had before declared that all the prophets that had spoken, had likewise foretold of the days of the restitution, and the coming of Jesus Christ.

So long as we have the love appropriate to our relation to Christ, as our wisdom, righteousness, sanctification and redemption, we can never lose our interest in his coming again. We can never forget his promises of grace and glory to be fulfilled at his appearing. If he is to us the one altogether lovely, and the chief among ten thousand, we can not reckon the day of his appearing to be far away without the clearest evidence, to that effect, drawn from the sure word of prophecy.

The doctrine of the speedy ushering in of "the millenium" is generally admitted by protestants. The great question now to be decided, by those who have not understandingly decided is, Is Christ to introduce the millenium by his own glorious Advent, or is the church to do it? The constant and rapid retrograde movement of the latter, must, it would seem, compel all christians to look entirely to the second advent of Christ, to introduce that state of things which will precisely answer to the order and purity of Heaven. Lord may we remember thee in thy power and coming, and wilt thou remember us when thou comest into thy kingdom. Amen.

CORRESPONDENCE.

LETTER FROM BRO. J. C. BYWATER.

HARTFORD, Ct., May 21th, 1847.

DEAR BRO. MARSH—I have recently visited the brethren in Toronto, C. W., and found them still looking for that blessed hope, full in the faith that they shall soon see the King in his glory! and although they have had but little preaching for the last year, still they have kept up their meetings stately and have enjoyed a good degree of union. Some few have embraced the faith there during the last year, and I had the privilege of baptising three in the likeness of the Saviour's death and administering the Lord's supper. I had the privilege of forming an acquaintance with Bro. G. J. Morgan, of Nelson, C. W., who preaches the glad tidings of the reign. He is a brother beloved in the Lord. They very much need some brother to break stately to them the bread of life, and with what aid they have pledged from the brethren in the surrounding country, will, without doubt, be able to sustain a brother with a small family or without a family. Who will go? Are there not some of God's faithful servants that will heed this call?

I also visited the brethren in Niagara, at the Cross Roads. There are a few still holding on to the faith. They are passing through some trials which I hope and pray may be of short duration. I preached twice there and broke bread. I also met with the brethren in Lewiston on Sunday evening and preached to them the word of life. There are but few there looking for the Lord, but they stand firm in the truth, and meet together stately for the worship of the Lord and exhort each other to steadfastness in view of the approaching day. The few brethren in Attica are still holding on the blessed hope, expecting soon to get deliverance. I preached in Leroy on the first Sunday in this month. I baptised one; had a very good time. The brethren here are strong in the faith, and have no idea of giving up the ship until she is moored safely in the harbor of eternal rest.

As it regards my future course of labor and the field I shall occupy, I cannot now say definitely, though I expect, (unless my wife should regain her health) my labors will necessarily be more local than they have been. I leave the matter entirely with the Lord; if it is his will that I should locate where I can be more with my family, I should say amen; but if it is his will that I should be more general in my labors, then he can and will restore the health of my wife, and situate us so in his providence that I can go. I have quite a family, and it costs a good deal to take care of them—but I can say to the praise of God and the honor of my brethren, that our wants have been supplied, and I have no doubt they will be as long as my brethren have two loaves or even one, and two coats. Yours in the blessed hope,

J. C. BYWATER.

LETTER FROM BRO. S. SWEET.

ORRINGTON, Me., May 22d, 1847.

DEAR BRETHREN:—Let us search and see if our zeal is according to knowledge, and if we do anything that brings condemnation, we will be zealous and repent. For as many as the Lord loveth, them he rebukes and chastens. Behold I stand at the door and knock; if any man hear my voice and open the door, I will come in to him and sup with him and he with me. And then he has the promise, if he overcomes, he shall sit with Christ in his throne, or kingdom, which will be under the whole heaven, and shall be given to the people of the saints of the Most High, whose kingdom is an everlasting kingdom and all dominions (or rulers) shall serve and obey him. O let us all search God's word, and see that we are the good seed which are the children of the kingdom; for as the tares are gathered and burned in the fire so shall it be in the end of this world. I believe it—and then God will have a clean universe, and there will be nothing o hurt or destroy in all God's holy mountain.

The Son of man shall send forth his angels and they shall gather out of his kingdom all things that offend and them which do iniquity, and shall cast them into a furnace of fire, there shall be wailing and gnashing of teeth. Then shall the righteous shine forth as the sun in the kingdom of their Father. Who hath ears to hear let him hear. And to you who are troubled rest with us, when the Lord Jesus shall be revealed from heaven with his mighty angels in flaming fire, taking vengeance on them that know not God and that obey not the gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ. Who shall be punished with everlasting destruction from the presence of the Lord and from the glory of his power. O what shall I say to the little, down-trodden, cast out, despised children? I say to one and all trust in the Lord, for in the Lord Jehovah is everlasting strength. O let us be always found at the feet of Christ, asking for heavenly wisdom to know and do the will of God that we may be accounted worthy to escape all those things that are coming upon the earth, and to stand before the Son of man.

I think that I know that Christ is coming upon this generation; we have had the signs of his coming, and he has told us to know that he is nigh, even at the door. And then he tells us that this generation shall not pass away, but they will see the Son of man coming in a cloud with power and great glory. O children, hold on, God has not led us out here to destroy us, but to fit us for his coming and kingdom.

Let us remember Lot's wife and not look back, but look unto Jesus who is the author and finisher of our faith, and contend earnestly for that faith that was once delivered to the saints; for the word says it is impossible to please God without faith, for every thing that is not of faith is sin—for if we sin willfully, there remaineth no more sacrifice for sin, (for I do believe we have received the knowledge of the truth,) but a certain fearful looking for of judgment and fiery indignation which shall devour the adversaries.

O let us be looking and waiting for Christ, and then when he shall appear the second time, we shall appear with him in glory, and this mortal will put on immortality, and this body will be fashioned like unto Christ's most glorious body, and then we shall be satisfied. Death will be destroyed—no pains, no aches, Jesus' soft hand will wipe away all tears; and I can say with the poet

"Fly swift around ye wheels of time,
And bring the welcome day!"

Yours in the blessed hope, SOLOMON SWEET.

PITCHER, N. Y., May 15th, 1847.

The day of the Lord I am sure is at hand. My faith is as strong as ever, and I look forward with delight to the time of our deliverance. I can say fly swift around ye wheels of time and bring the welcome day. Yes, verily, it will be the jubilee of all jubilees, to be delivered from every trouble and affliction we have to endure in this sin-cursed world, and to be admitted into the presence of our blessed Savior to enjoy his society and friendship with all the holy saints on the New Earth.

I well remember the first sign; it was a dark day indeed.

LYDIA FOULT.

CONCORD, Mass., May 23d, 1847.

DEAR BRO. MARSH—It is food to my hungry soul to read the stirring epistles from my beloved brethren and sisters. I do and will praise God for what he is doing for us. "He is doing great things for us, whereof we are glad." There have been in this place since last October five converted to God and the truth. Praise the Lord! Oh, that men would praise the Lord for his goodness, and for his wonderful works to the children of men!

Your unworthy Sister,

E. L. A. HEMENWAY.

OBITUARY.

DEAR BRO. MARSH—Our common enemy has entered my peaceful abode and carried off my nearest and dearest friend. Clarissa, my dear companion, has fallen by the hand of death. Yes, it is too true, my companion, the mother of my children, is dead; and four motherless children mourn with me. After eleven days' sickness with fever she died the 25th inst., at 6 o'clock in the morning, being nearly 34 years of age. Her spirit took its departure, but her body is placed in the ground to await the resurrection morn.

Clarissa followed peace with all, and I trust her spirit is at peace with the spirits of the just. I think she had not an enemy on earth. I believe at the coming of Jesus her body will be raised and glorified like Christ's most glorious body, and the spirit take possession of it again to be separated no more by the iron arm of death.

No doubt some of my brethren and sisters have had the tender fibers of the soul broken by the plucking away of dear friends and companions, and they know the vacant place I find in my family; and they know how to weep with a brother as Jesus wept with Mary and Martha. Am I afflicted? then how truly are my children afflicted! No one can bear with the petty feelings and notions of children like a mother. No near relative, no kind heart, can melt with theirs like a mother's heart. As did their mother, so do I commend them to God. I promised my companion that I would train them to meet her in the kingdom. My health is rather poor. Perhaps I too may soon be called away and leave them orphans. They take my time, my thoughts, my affections, such as I give to human beings. My oldest is not yet ten, my youngest fifteen months. And though they are so young they are much society to me. They are blessings to me indeed! May the spirit of their mother rest upon them! and may the Holy Spirit take the things of Christ and show it unto them, and not only to them but to the other dear youth of our land, that they may be gathered with the chosen of God when he maketh up his jewels. But I will not mourn as those who have no hope.

H. F. HILL.

Geneseo, May 30th, 1847.

☞ We deeply sympathise with Bro. Hill in the recent severe loss of his very worthy companion, Sister Hill. It is our privilege in such cases to weep with those who weep. The Lord abundantly comfort the deeply lacerated heart of our brother, with the blessed hope of soon meeting her, who now sleeps in Jesus, in the kingdom, where there shall be no more death. May the blessing of God also rest upon his motherless children, that they too may share in the reward of eternal life.

MISCELLANY.

THE FAMINE AT MADEIRA.—The New Bedford Mercury learns by authentic advices from Madeira, received by Rev. Mr. Howe, Pastor of the Seamen's Bethel in that city, that many hundreds of the inhabitants of Madeira have already perished by starvation. Flour has sold as high as $27 a barrel, but most of the inhabitants were unable to purchase at any price. The Mercury gives the following extract:—"We have had no potatoes for two years, on account of the potato rot. For God's sake send us some Indian corn, or we must all perish. A little rice will be thankfully received. Oh, that we might have a portion of that which the highly favored Americans throw to their animals, to keep us from the grave."

THE IMMIGRANTS AT NEW YORK—TERRIBLE PICTURE—A man and his wife were taken from the steps of a house in New York, a few nights since, and conveyed to the Almshouse. They had lately arrived from Ireland, lost three children on the passage, and when taken charge of by the officers, the father had a dying child in his arms, while the mother was holding another already dead! without sufficient clothes hardly to cover their backs, without one cent, without home or friends, they had laid themselves down to die! And this is a specimen of the pictures almost daily presented in that city!

AMERICAN SEAMSTRESSES!—A New Orleans paper says there is a large clothing establishment in that city, the proprietor of which employs 500 females, and that they receive only eight cents for making a shirt and other articles in proportion.

THE NUMBER OF SLAVEHOLDERS.—The National era says, that in Kentucky, where the number of small slaveholders is greater in proportion than in the Southern States, there are, according to the auditor's books, but 31,000 slaveholders, out of a population of 275,000 whites over twenty-one years of age. The estimate is not low, which reckons the whole number of slave owners at 250,000. The total white population of the South, over twenty-one years of age, must be, at least, 1,500,000 souls. But, according to Mr. Calhoun, the 1,250,000 Southern non-slaveholders are nonentities—the only real persons are the 250,000 slaveholders.

OUR COUNTRY LAST.—Abolition of Slavery in Egypt.—The Impartial, of Smyrna, states that the Egyptian Government has recently promulgated a law for the abolition of slavery after the space of fifty days. At the slave mart there was in consequence a decline in prices of sixty per cent. No sales could be made, as after this interval of fifty days, every slave will be free to stay with or to leave his present owner at pleasure.

COST OF THE WAR.—The following estimate shows that we have paid a terrible price for our successes in Mexico. We have lost, including some of the ablest spirits in the country—

Table with 2 columns: Description of loss and corresponding number. Includes 'Killed and wounded around Monterey, 500', 'At Matamoros, 500', 'At Buena Vista, 800', 'Taylor's incidental skirmishes, 200', 'Operations in New Mexico, 200', 'In California, 250', 'At Vera Cruz, 50', 'Com. Conner at Alvarado, 10', 'Lieut. Hunter, 00', 'Scout at Cerro Gordo, 500'.

Total killed and wounded, 3010
Died of the climate, 2500
Grand total, 5510

We have killed, wounded 10,000 Mexicans and occupied 800,000 square miles of their territory, equal to fifteen of our States.

SUNDAY WORK.—"The battle of Palo Alto was fought on Sunday, the 8th day of May."

"The Mexicans arrived and took position in front of Monterey on Sunday, the 20th day of September—the battle commenced the next morning."

"The battle of Del Norte, New Mexico, was fought on Sunday, the 24th of January."

"The battle of Buena Vista commenced on Sunday, the 21st day of February."

"The surrender of the city and castle of Vera Cruz was made to Gen. Scott on Sunday, the 28th day of February."

"The battle of Sacramento, Chihuahua, was fought on Sunday, the 28th day of March."

"The battle of Cerro Gordo commenced on Sunday, the 18th day of April."

GERMANY.—A few days ago not fewer than 2,000 emigrants sailed from Hamburg for New York. In some parts of the country emigration is carried on almost to an alarming extent; whole villages go away en masse and entire districts become depopulated.

BURNING OF FACTORIES.—The New Bedford Mercury says, that within the last four months, 129 factories and mills of various kinds, have been destroyed by fire in the United States.

Five children, two boys and three girls, aged from eight to fifteen, have been arrested in Boston for stealing furniture and opening an untenanted house on their own hook.

There is in the British Museum an almanac, written on papyrus, nearly 3,000 years old, which having been used by some Egyptian of the olden time, was buried with him.

The whole amount of the annual products of the United States is about one thousand millions of dollars.

The Swedes with only 3,000,000 of inhabitants, have 160,000 distilleries, which furnish 40,000,000 gallons of liquor, most of which they export to other countries.

The expense incurred by the New York police department during the last year, for carting drunkards, was $1336 30.

Great Britain possesses the sovereignty of forty colonial governments. The yearly cost of these colonies to the mother country is £3,171,646, of which £2,630,804 is for naval and military purposes.

The strength of the English war force is 30,000 cavalry, 180,000 infantry, 14,000 artillery, 30,000 mariners, and 100,000 militia.

ANOTHER DREADFUL SHIPWRECK.—The ship Exmouth, of Newcastle, England, from London-derry, with 168 passengers and crew, for Quebec, was wrecked on the rocks at Ballanaxie, on the west coast of Islay, with so great a force that she went to pieces in ten minutes after she struck. The captain, crew and passengers were all lost, with the exception of three sailors, who were in the shrouds, and who were thrown upon the rocks, and were subsequently taken off by a vessel passing by.

AN UNFAITHFUL MOTHER.—The mother of a rising family was visited by her pastor. Considerations drawn from time and eternity, from heaven and hell, failed to reach her conscience, which seemed to be incased in a triple shield of adamant, until the clergyman, as he arose to depart, exclaimed "Well madam if you, a mother, be indifferent to the welfare of your children, and do not pray for them, who will?" The right key was touched. "Very true," said she, her eyes filled with tears, "if mothers monsters prove, what can be expected from others?" By her request he was now detained to address the throne of grace in behalf of her family: "remember my children," said she, "and oh! remember their unfaithful mother."

STRANGE DISCOVERY.—A short time ago the Chief Justice of Gibraltar had some workmen employed at his house; and while one of them was digging near the dining-room window, he perceived an opening, which he found was very deep. He with some others and the Chief Justice himself, ventured down the aperture, and after descending about forty feet almost perpendicular, came to a very narrow passage, which led to a most beautiful cave, stalactites hanging about as white as snow, and of various forms—some like cauliflowers. In the midst of all this was a human skeleton, sticking fast to the rock, and the bones of a dog beside it, having become putrefied. The bones of the right hand were fastened to the right side of the head, so that the poor creature has the appearance of having laid down and died, very probably of starvation, with his hand under his head, which is half turned round, as if he had been looking up. The bones of the dog lay beside the human bones.

Psalm lxxiv.

Hear thou my voice, O God of might,
And to my prayer give ear;
Save me from all my enemies—
My life from slavish fear.

Hide me from the secret counsel,
Of those who hate thy name;
Keep me from all iniquity,
While I thy truth proclaim.

Hide me from those whose tongues are sharp,
For bitter words they speak,
They bend their bow, their arrows pierce
The bosoms of the meek.

In evil they delight themselves,
And privily lay snares;
A den of thieves they make thy house,
All striving for their shares.

The Lord of hosts shall at them shoot
His arrows thick and fast,
And suddenly they all shall be,
Down from his presence cast.

Then shall the righteous shout and sing
A new salvation's story,
Then shall the meek, upright in heart,
Share in Immanuel's glory.

From the West India Mission.

{ St. JOHN'S, Antigua, West Indies.
April 30th, 1847.

DEAR BRO. MARSH—Having another opportunity to write you, I embrace it, although there has nothing of importance occurred since the date of my last. The converts appear well and give good evidence of a radical change of heart, and there are some new cases of awakening, and persons heretofore careless are anxious for their souls. Some of our social meetings remind me strongly of similar ones in America; and it is really cheering to hear the voice of some in prayer who a little while since employed their tongues in profanity and bacchanalian revelry.

Some persons who have been associated with the churches are becoming more firm and unwavering in their adherence to the truth, and seem to be willing to follow truth rather than a party; while others seem to act in religion according to the political maxim: "Our country, right or wrong." New hearers are coming in, as those who "cannot endure sound doctrine" absent themselves from the place of worship. We have recently been compelled to change our location and have secured a less attractive place in outward appearance, and yet it is more airy and much more capacious. This place is kindly granted to us by the "Mechanics' Institution," who have removed into it. The liberality of the gentlemen of this institution merits a grateful acknowledgment, and I hope they may receive the reward of having done to Christ what they have done to a disciple of his; but for their liberality we could hardly have had a hearing in this city—therefore, I feel a degree of gratitude which I cannot easily express, for their favors.

Much effort has been made by the Superintendent of the Methodist missions to induce those who have adhered to the truth and attended our meetings to abandon them, and to have nothing more to do with me; and this course has been pursued by him especially with those who can render me service in my circumstances of trial. So that had his influence been very weighty with the "Institution," I might have been deprived of their comfortable room—for I am aware that he has endeavored to induce one of the officers of the "Institution" to forsake our meetings. This is, in his estimation, liberality, I suppose! It is equivalent to saying, "If you do not think just I do, but teach the people to look for Christ, and be ready for the event now, I will do all I can to induce the people to keep away from so dangerous an influence as that which leads men to be continually looking for the Lord." But his well known character for proselyting, in which work he "will compass sea and land," prevents any astonishment at his course.

I have been much comforted by reading the accounts in the New Testament of the trials and opposition of our blessed Lord and his apostles; nothing is more remarkable than that the persecutions through which they passed were chiefly from the Jewish people who constituted "the church." So we find that "the disciple" of the 19th century "is not above his Lord" of the first century, but is called to conflict with the same bitter opposition with which he did, and from the same source, "the church," or rather "the churches." However I have none but kind feelings toward the opposers of our hope, and can pray as in the Episcopal prayer-book: "Have mercy upon our persecutors and slanderers and turn their hearts." It seems to me if they could or would come into our meetings and see and hear for themselves those who were a little while ago reckless sinners, now heartily engaged in prayer and praise, they would think it possible that some "good thing might come out of Nazareth;" for I can truly say I have never seen young converts give better evidence of a hearty work than these have manifested; not simply a theoretical admission of the truth of the advent near, but a deep sense of sin and a most thorough and determined change in reference to all sin. It has been my simple object to secure the salvation of souls, and therefore I have preached the most discriminating Bible truths, that they might see what is requisite to true religion. I have therefore combined, according to the wisdom bestowed upon me, the truths of the Bible in such a manner as to secure awakening and conversion, and then lead them to renounce all sin and follow Christ fully.

Our social meetings have been exceedingly interesting since I last wrote, and it is really cheering to see those who never spoke in any public place now speaking with a full soul of the change which they feel has been effected in them, and to hear their ardent prayers for their own preservation and sanctification and for the salvation of others. They meet with many trials in their way, for they are the subjects of continual remark and are harassed by the revilings of the rabble, and of some who are making such professions as should at least prevent their being scoffers. This they generally bear meekly so far as I know, yet it would hardly be strange, though a great sin, if some should be made irritable by incessant scoffing through which they pass, for the people here are naturally of a passionate disposition, and much faith and prayer and watching will be requisite in order to overcome it.

I believe there will be found some fruit in Antigua of our labors in the cause of God, and I hope some brother will speedily come on to assist in this field, so that other islands may be visited. I have not yet felt disposed to leave the brethren here to go to any other island, hoping that some one would be here presently to assist me, and then I could leave without jeopardizing the cause here. "Faith cometh by hearing and hearing by the word of God; but how shall they hear without a preacher?" saith the word of God, and my observation has satisfied me of its truth, so that I feel anxious to have the flock here "fed with the sincere milk of the word that they may grow thereby." "I have kept back nothing which would be profitable to them," and have insisted sharply upon—1st. The immediate coming of Christ to judgment. 2d. That the saints are not rewarded in any Scriptural sense until that event. 3. That "immortality," which constitutes an essential element in the Christian's reward, is not attained until the resurrection of the dead. 4th. That "the dead praise not the Lord neither any that go down into silence." 5th. That the resurrection and not a disembodied state is the object of the Christian's hope. 6th. That the "first resurrection" precedes the millennium and is immediately at hand. 7th. That the historical prophecies of the Holy Scriptures are nearly fulfilled. 8th. That the signs of the times and the signs in the heavens which our Savior predicted, are fulfilled, so that Christ is "near even at the door." 9th. That the prophetic periods of Daniel are so nearly accomplished that we should expect the end continually; and that if our chronology of the Christian era be correct, the end must come within a few months. 10th. That "without holiness no man shall see the Lord," and that "repentance toward God and faith in the Lord Jesus Christ" are indispensable to salvation. God has blessed me in my labors, for which I give thanks and take courage to go on still, "preaching the word, instant in season and out of season." I have endeavored to keep my "eye single" and "do with my might what my hands find to do," and am firmly settled in the truth of the doctrines we have proclaimed respecting our glorious hope, and have great anxiety for the salvation of my fellow-men who are in the road to death, and shall make every thing subservient to this end. I am determined, in view of the shortness of time, not to allow any other object than this to influence my efforts, and pray God to gird me with that strength which will sustain me in this holy work.

I feel I have no partisan interest to secure, and am left therefore to preach such truth as seems adapted to the end I have in view, viz: to save men from perdition. The motive which I doubt not animates the churches of Christendom generally, is that of securing numbers to the particular sect with which they may individually be connected; but while a Christian minister is at liberty to preach, and not only at liberty but is called upon to preach what he believes to be truth, he must nevertheless keep his eye upon the one object, the salvation of souls, because for this one purpose has gospel been given. O! is it true that our labors will soon be ended? Will all the wicked of the earth soon be cast into the "everlasting fire prepared for the devil and his angels!" So it seems to me. O! that I had a trumpet's voice which would reach my impenitent friends in America as well as here, and I would cry, "Escape for your lives!" "the day of the Lord hasteth greatly!" seek the "Rock of Ages," and find shelter before the storm of wrath shall come upon this guilty world!" My heart is pained for "my brethren, my kinsmen, according to the flesh," and I marvel at the unbelief and stupidity which characterizes many in my native land, who have heard the "glad tidings of the kingdom." Alas! alas! "They have been often reproved and they have hardened their necks, and will suddenly be destroyed and that without remedy," unless they speedily turn to God.

"O! sinner turn, why will ye die?
God your Saviour and ye why?
He, who did your being give,
Died once, if that you might live,
He the fatal cross denounce,
Ask the work of his own hands,
Why, ye thoughtless creatures, why,
Will ye scorn his love and die!"

I often pray for my dear brethren and sisters in my native land, that God may enable them to "hold fast the beginning of their confidence steadfast unto the end," and I trust we are remembered in your prayers, also, that we may endure unto the end. Great God, save us all from apostacy, and enable us to be holy and blameless until the day of Christ!

Permit me to say to my brethren in America, that I hope they will not deprive us of a co-worker in this field by withholding funds; some of you are able to do much for the salvation of souls by your contributions, if you act conformably to your faith. May you act as faithful stewards of the Lord. My desire is that some faithful minister of this gospel may come to this Island and labor here awhile, that we who have now become somewhat acquainted with the character of the people of the West Indies may go to some other islands, that as far as possible God may "send to every nation the knowledge of its end."

The amounts which I have received of my brethren in America which have been used upon this mission, (exclusive of Bro. Livingstone's aid, Bro. Himes' recent donation, and amounts expended in America for travelling, clothes and other necessaries) does not exceed $75. I mention this that our brethren may be aware of the true state of the case, and because they will feel more interested to do what they can if they see that little comparatively has been done. I hope therefore you will literally supply any brother who may come to this field that our hands may not be tied for want of funds. A conscientious economy is practiced by us, and we have "learned (we trust) both how to be abased and how to abound," and "are willing to suffer all things for the elect's sake." I do not expect any further assistance from Bro. Livingstone, who wrote me not long since that he was leaving for America, and could not now say what he might do for the advent cause as his future expenses will be very considerable. His contributions to this work have been very liberal, and my prayer is that he may receive the reward of those who do what they engage in "heartily unto the Lord and not unto men."

The weather is now very fine and the island healthy, however the crops of cane are suffering much from want of rain, and should rain be deferred much longer, not only will the crops suffer but man and beast must suffer much for water, there being no fresh water springs and wells. The only reliance is upon the clouds of heaven, and when they withhold rain for a long time we are compelled to export water from neighboring islands. Large ponds are dug to receive water for cattle and for washing, while capacious cisterns supply the place of wells and springs. The price of provisions has been much raised here by the exports from America to Europe, as we are chiefly dependent on the American vessels for supplies; but prices are moderating very much in Europe which will turn the channel again in this direction, so that we do not expect to suffer any particular inconvenience from scarcity. May we soon be gathered into the "land of rest" where "we shall hunger no more, neither thirst any more, neither the sun light upon us nor any heat."

With much affection I am yours in Christ,
L. D. MANSFELD.

Address of Boston Conference.

The Elders and Brethren, believers in the Second Advent of Christ at the door; assembled in New York, May 11th, 12th, 13th, 14th, and in Boston May 25th, 26th, 27th, A. D. 1847, to their Brethren of like precious faith scattered abroad, send, greeting:

BELOVED IN THE LORD:—Under the kind and protecting hand of our heavenly Father, it has been our unspeakable privilege to assemble ourselves for the mutual edification of each other, and growth in grace, and knowledge of our Lord and Savior; for the strengthening of our faith; for the comforting of our hearts, by the precious words of inspiration; for the confirmation of our hopes to the end, that we may be rooted, grounded, and established in Christ, and blameless in the day of his appearing; and for devising means to carry forward the great and glorious work of God, in proclaiming the hour of his judgment at hand, and calling on men to "fear God and give glory to him, and worship him that made heaven and earth, the sea, and the fountains of waters."

Assembled as we are from different, and widely separated portions of our land, many of us never having seen each other's faces before; gathered from the different sects of Christendom; having been educated under influences diverse from each other, and different religious teachers; and retaining as we do, and influenced as we are, less or more, by our early associations and training: we have cause of gratitude to God for the openness of heart and mind which has prevailed in all our deliberations, affording, at the same time, a most happy illustration of the blessed effect of the maxim—"In essentials, unity; in non-essentials, liberty; in all things, charity." It also affords a pleasing illustration of another fact: that love of the truth will triumph over love of opinion, and bind our hearts in one sweet and heavenly bond, however diverse our views may be on minor questions.

After all the heart-rending scenes through which we have passed; the conflicting views which have been put forth; fanciful expositions of God's word, calculated to weaken the faith of the household; the extravagance of some, who were once with us, but who have gone out from us, because they were not of us; the multitudinous and oft-repeated attacks of foes without and foes within, upon the glorious doctrines which are the foundation of our hope; the moral obliquity of some, the hypocrisy, back sliding, and luke warmness of others; the contempt and scorn of foes, and neglect of professed friends; these, these great and fundamental truths, which called us out and distinguished us from the world, remain, like a mighty rock in the ocean, around which the winds have howled, against which the angry billows have dashed and foamed, and over which they have sung their solemn dirges, unmoved, mocking at all their efforts, unharmed.—Or like the bright orb of day, unscathed, unsullied, unobscured, bright, burning, and glorious, wheeling their course in the moral heavens, emitting light, heat, strength, and comfort to the waiting pilgrim, and around which we still rejoice to gather, as the only ground of hope for time or eternity.

We rejoice, too, that there is a precious remnant left, who have stood fast in prosperity and adversity; amid flatteries and frowns, who have not been turned away from the hope of the gospel, and to whom it is still dear, as when they first heard the news of the coming King. To these we delight to send our fraternal ALL HAIL, and invite to a continued co-operation with us in the good work, and a participation in our sorrows and joys.

A solemn and fearful, yet glorious crisis is approaching. A day of joy to the saints, but sorrow to the sinner. So far as our present light shines from the prophetic periods,—we can see nothing beyond the present year. Every intelligent exposition of God's word goes to confirm us, that probationary time will soon terminate. So far from being disheartened by disappointments, they have only served to nerve us up to a close and more careful examination of the "sure word of prophecy," and a more scrutinizing search for the reasons for such failure; and every examination serves to strengthen the conviction and fasten it firmer on our hearts, that the foundation of our hope is invulnerable. The sure word of prophecy still sheds its cheering light on our pathway, and instead of diminishing, it grows clearer and brighter as we approach the end of our journey. Who can lift up his eyes to the present aspect of the nations, especially those belonging to the east, and not see signs of dark and direful import gathering over and around them. Already the red arm of the Almighty is stretched forth. "The pestilence that walketh in darkness, and the destruction that wasteth at noon-day," are devastating those portions of the earth, a sure prelude to what is to follow. The Cholera, too, that dreadful scourge of the world, is marching with fearful and rapid strides over this fated earth, sweeping off its thousands, pointing with a sure and unerring hand to the day, when "they shall not be lamented, neither gathered nor buried, but shall be dung upon the ground." Al ready "distress is upon the nations, with perplexity," and in spite of themselves, men are entertaining fearful apprehensions of something dreadful to come on the earth.

The statesman, the philosopher, and the theologian, each in turn, with anxiety, inquire what these things mean? Each, in turn, are confounded. The diviners are mad. Their Urim and Thummim have ceased to respond. But the humble child of God, who reposes in his word, turns to the prophetic page, and there he sees it written, in living characters of light, that "God hath a controversy with the nations,"—"that there are "signs there's no mistaking," proclaiming Messiah near. "When these things begin to come to pass," says our Savior, "then look up and lift up your heads, knowing your redemption is near." But "when ye see these things come to pass, know ye that the kingdom of God is nigh at hand." Now we see prophecy fulfilled, about which we had misgiving in 1843. Every doubt is now removed. The year of recompenses for the controversy of Zion is approaching. The unprecedented number of earthquakes during the past year, we view as premonitions of that great and dreadful day, when "the earth shall reel to and fro like a drunkard, and shall be moved like a cottage." The attitude of the nations towards each other, gives signs that they will not long be restrained from war and carnage. Our own country has already broken peace with a sister republic, and as yet refuses, what she has often heretofore accepted, the meditation of a friendly power. How long ere the winds will be loosed in the territory of the fourth great monarchy, God only knows. When that is done, we bethide him who is not sealed with the seal of the living God. Every thing in the heavens above, and the earth beneath, gives the more certain evidence.

that our redemption is near.

But, brethrer, with all the cheering prospects we have before us, with all the clear and decided testimony of the inspired word and its certain fulfillment, as we have seen, and still see, in the infallible signs of the times, affording us the very best evidence that our redemption is nigh; while there is nothing to dishearten us as to the final result, we must remember, we are yet in a world of trial, that we are surrounded by temptations on every hand. We walk by faith, not by sight.—We have a subtle foe with whom to contend.—He has grown no less wise by six thousand years experience; his enmity to the seed of the woman has not decreased by six thousand years of toil to supplant him in his kingdom; his ardor and devotion to the bad cause in which he is engaged, has not cooled or abated in the least; as fruitful in expedients to cast down the followers of Jesus as he was to cast down Jesus himself.—New tricks, new devices, new plans are continually concocted to cast down and destroy, if possible, some child of God. We need, therefore, brethren, to be awake; to gird on the whole armor of God, and fight valiantly the fight of faith. If we have the wisdom and experience of six thousand years, we have also the wickedness of six thousand years upon us. We need to guard every avenue. We are surrounded by danger. With all the wisdom of this world, it is still dark; and he who walks only in the light of it, will surely stumble. He who trusts to his own wisdom, or the wisdom of his brethren, will assuredly fall. We have passed through many trying scenes within three years past. We may pass many more before our final deliverance. But we need not fear. God is for us. Who can be against us? Let us profit by the past. Some of those dangers past we may encounter again.—We have seen our errors. To avoid them, let us not diverge to an opposite extreme. Because my neighbor falls in the fire and burns to death that is no reason why I should perish by frost.—The abuse of truth is no reason for its disuse.—We need more of the hallowed influence of God's Spirit. We are in danger of neglecting to pray and seek for the hallowed fire to burn on our hearts, because we have seen the unhallowed fire of fanaticism burning on the hearts of some who once were our brethren. O! let us not be deterred from seeking the influences of God's blessed Spirit, because the precious doctrine has been abused. There is great danger here. Already have the cold and freezing effects of a soulless theory followed the scorching, blighting effects of fanaticism. These are the two extremes. Avoid either. Let us have a correct theory, and then seek to have the Spirit give life to it.

Nearly allied to this, is the danger of throwing away the word, and pretending to be taught of the Spirit. Never has this doctrine prevailed, except it has produced the worst of consequences. It is no less than infidelity in disguise. If a man throws away God's word in practice, what better is it than to do the same in theory. In truth, if he does it in practice, he does it in theory: for no man acts without some theory, crude or digested. Wonder not, then, at the fall of some, who have made the highest professions of spiritual attainment. There is a so-called spirituality, which is infidelity in disguise. Take the Word, then, for your counsellor, till the Lord shall come and deliver us from the darkness of false theology and science.

Another danger to be avoided is, that of believing we can do but little more for our fellow men. Said a brother, "It is about as much we can do to take care of ourselves, in these times." Our answer is, Obey God, and that will be taking care of ourselves. Do this, and we have the assurance God will be with us. "Go ye therefore into all the world—teach all nations—turn them to the faith," and what? "Lo I am with you a'way even to the end of the world." This, then, is the way to take care of ourselves—do as Christ has commanded us, and he will protect and defend us unto the end.

Another danger is, that we shall be drawn away from our hope, by attention to the great enterprises of the day. Never was an age so fruitful in inventions, either for the temporal good of man, or for his destruction. All these schemes, which are designed for the good of man, aim directly or indirectly at the perfectibility of the universe, and of man, without the aid of Jesus Christ.—Transcendental philosophy, the most spacious shade of infidelity, is the basis of all these conclusions. They strike at the doctrine of restitution, both of man and the earth, their most fatal blows. Adopt these views, and if consistent with themselves in their conclusion, they sweep the Bible hope of the Christian from the universe. We entreat you, then, brethren, while you avail yourselves of any of the improvements of the day for the present good they minister to you, not to be carried away by the delusive hopes that they may hold out for your embrace.

In maintaining our views, we should be careful not to imbibe a harsh and denunciatory spirit, neither should we do it for the sake of contention and strife, or for the mastery. Our sole and alone object should be the love of the truth itself. If we do this, we shall save ourselves, and peradventure them that hear us. We can not convert a man by wounding and lacerating his sensibility. Give him the truth in the love of it, and if he reject that, his blood will be on his own head, and we shall be clear in the day of the Lord Jesus.

We have no sympathy for the popular opposition to the great reforms of the day. We deeply sympathize with them—we rejoice in their success. And we wish it distinctly understood, that if we do not unite with particular societies, for the purpose of carrying them forward, it is not because we do not love the truth they inculcate, but because we choose to do the common work of our Master in our own way. We deem it our duty in meekness to instruct those who are with out, if peradventure God may bring them to repentance. We esteem all thus engaged in love, for their work's sake; but we do not, we can not hold out to our fellow men the delusive hope of the final triumph of the truth, by the power of truth alone. There is a power, revealed in God's holy book, which is to " tread down the truth," and prosper, until the indignation be accomplished." Christ, in his second personal appearing, will give the final victory. This then, is the day of preparation, and we should kindly point out this fact to all who are engaged for the renovation of the world. His kingdom is an everlasting one—of course the people will live eternally—can die no more—must therefore be made immortal. Then will banners of victory fill the broad arch of Heaven, from the white robed millions of ransomed saints, to Him that loved us, and washed us from our sins in his own blood, and who are about to reign on the earth.

We view the judgment day near. What we do, must be done quickly. Our business like the apostle, is not to aim at what God has no where promised in his word, but by all means "save some." For this, dear brethren, let us still labor, knowing the promise of Christ is sure, "Lo I am with you always, even to the end of the world." Amen.

In what way may a Preacher sink his audience?

The following anecdote, which the writer of this article had from the lips of the concerned individual, may aid your readers. Mr. Editor, in coming to the proper answer. It may even benefit the venerated incumbents of the highest office in the sublunary gift of God; it may prove salutary to many, as it has to some of the commissioned ambassadors of Jesus Christ. To them the question is practical, and every man shall kiss his lips that "giveth a right answer."

I was once designated, said the narrator, to preach the annual election sermon, in the metropolis of my native State. (Hartford, Ct.) and before its Governor, its Legislature, and other professional dignitaries. The weather was fine, the concourse numerous, and composed of the intellectual nobility, civil and ecclesiastical, of the whole commonwealth, including strangers of distinction, and constituting an audience of the highest respectability. I, of course, tarried with the pastor of the place, the late Rev. Dr. Strong.—As the bell began its monitory tolling, I left the study and descended to the parlor. There I was ushered into a circle of clergymen, few of whom I knew, and none of whom at that moment I rejoiced to see. The conversation turned upon my feelings in view of the speciality of the service. Some sympathized, others prophesied, others encouraged, and others counselled, how many prayed for me I know not. At last one said, "fear nothing; be bold and independent; just imagine them a patch of cabbages, and treat them as such, and my word for it, you will succeed." O, tho't I, "if I could sink them upon this principle, and bring my feelings just there, it would do! but, at this instant Dr. Strong entered the room, and informed those present that it was time to proceed to the church. As the preacher and pastors are ever partners in the procession, according to our good habits, I had the privilege of walking with the doctor. He soon inquired the state of my feelings, having learned their perturbation, and wishing to assuage them, thus accosted me:—"Well, my brother, can you not sink them?—You have not forgotten the advice of Mr. —, which I overheard just before I summoned you to move? No, I replied, but they are such a select assembly, and will expect so much, and criticize so sternly! and what if I should fail! The doctor rejoined; "I am not surprised that you find it difficult to adopt that counsel and preach under the inspiration of a lie. It is folly, falsehood, and stupidity! and to which of these ingredients the poisonous composition is most indebted, it were hard to resolve. They are not cabbages, nor cannibals, but a collection of cultivated men and immortal souls; and to you pertains the responsibility of addressing them as such and propounding to them their duty under the sanction of their Creator's will. You must face them and " speak boldly as you ought to speak." And you need not fear their faces. Take my counsel; when the sun rides at his meridian, the stars are lost in the glory of his beams; and when God is exalted, his creatures are forgotten. Fill your throats with a sense of his presence, and your obligations; think of his goodness and his promises;—let God fill your whole field of vision, and man will appear in his proper diminutiveness. This is truth and grace; this will sink your audience without injuring them, or inflating you; and in truth I know of no other mode of sinking an audience legitimately, than that I have suggested. He paused; and I was relieved. His counsel pervaded my willing soul. I was enabled to magnify my office and my Master, and I have since retained it, and practice upon it with the happiest and most durable satisfaction.

Believing, as I do, Mr. Editor, that every audience must be sunk, and God exalted, where the preacher is free and fearless, and the preaching effectual; and that the above counsel of an illustrious preacher may benefit his successors and juniors in office—perhaps private Christians, and even editors—I have sent it, with my respects, as a contribution to your valuable miscellany.—Religious Chronicle, for 1840.

Voice of Truth & Glad Tidings

"The wise shall understand."

ROCHESTER, JUNE 16, 1847.

☞ We shall have some quite heavy demands to meet soon: will those who have not paid for their paper, aid us in meeting them. We feel assured that we do not make this request in vain.

Eastern Tour—Boston Conference—
Bible Advocate.

Our recent visit to the cities of Albany, Boston, and Hartford, afforded a very good opportunity to form a tolerably correct opinion relative to the state of the cause abroad. We spent a Sabbath in Albany: spoke twice to the saints who worship in the House of Prayer; Bro. Needham spoke once, and we joined with the church in eating the Lord's supper. It was a good day to the faithful. Bro. Needham has located with this tried people. His health is much improved, and he is evidently doing good in this new and important field of his labors.

No church in our ranks has had more and severer trials, or endured them better, than the church in Albany. It is true that many who at first appeared to be heart and hand in the good work, for various causes, have gone out from among them, yet there is a goodly number who have not departed from the faith, and who are now, with some who have recently been added, rejoicing in hope of soon seeing their Lord. In a word, we consider the cause in Albany in a very good condition. May it prosper more abundantly until the Lord shall come.

Bro. Needham accompanied us to Boston, where we found our brethren, from the surrounding country, far and near, assembling for their annual conference. As the names of ministers present were not taken, we are not prepared to say how many attended this meeting; it was thought however, by Bro. Himes, that from thirty to forty were there, besides many private brethren and sisters, and all apparently were grounded and settled in the precious faith and blessed hope of the gospel.

All appeared happy in having the privilege of meeting each other in love, but especially in being favored with the opportunity of again shaking the friendly hand of Bro. Wm. Miller. Incessant labors, disease and old age have impaired his naturally good health and strong constitution; still his mind appears clear, active, and powerful as ever. He frankly acknowledges his mistake on precise definite time, but believes the general theory on the time and objects of the Lord's coming, is substantially correct. He justly concludes that our disappointments on the precise time of the advent are accounted for on the principle of the well known discrepancy among the best chronologists, relative to the commencement of the prophetic numbers. His discourses at this conference, as usual, were full of instruction and comfort; and his able and fatherly counsel was timely, and such as is greatly needed at this time of conflicting opinions among ourselves, and perils on every hand. May the Lord enable Bro. Miller to endure unto the end, that his reward may be a crown of righteousness at the appearing of the Lord of glory.

The conference commenced on Tuesday, May 25 and continued until Friday of the same week. The most of the time was taken up in meetings of worship, which were harmonious, instructing, reviving, and highly interesting. As we were necessarily absent most of the time during the transaction of the business of conference, and as we have not yet (June 5th) seen the full minutes of the acts of the meeting, we are not prepared to speak of their character now. The address of the conference, to the churches, written by Bro. Needham, we heard read, and joined with many others in requesting its publication. We hope to receive it in time for the paper for which this article is designed: it is a word in due season, fitly spoken, and will do good to many who love the truth.

This meeting served to strengthen our convictions in the truth of the following things.

1. That our brethren generally were never more understandingly and innovably grounded and settled in the faith than now. We thus judge from their own frank, warm and decided declarations on these things. It is true that we heard no one speak with any degree of confidence on the precise definite time theory; but we did hear many express their unwavering confidence in the correctness of the general theory on the time of the second advent, and in the evidences which prove that event to be nigh, even at the door. In a word, as a general remark, we saw no indications of discouragement, or of giving up this precious faith among the many who attended this meeting, but we did see exhibited a settled determination to hold fast the good profession without wavering, unto the end.

2. That with few exceptions, the great body of ministers and people, among us, are fully determined in all things which pertain to life and godliness, or their faith and practice as Christians, or as the church of God, to adhere most strictly to the word of the Lord. This we must do or the blessing of God will be withdrawn from us, and we shall be left to follow our own folly down to destruction. The doctrine of human expediency, in things of religion, should be most cautiously shunned: for the word of God is perfect, and 'thoroughly furnishes the man of God unto every good work.' Hence we need no human laws, rules, policy, expediency, or resolutions, to dictate to us what to believe or to do in divine things. Should time continue, we do most fervently pray that instead of there being an increased desire manifested among us to pattern after the apostate sects in their worldly or human policy, that it will be seen that we more and more detest such things; and love to be governed by the Bible, 'the perfect law of liberty.'

3. That there is great danger at this time, of our departing from the simplicity of the gospel in things pertaining to the organization and order of the church. Many of us have been brought up under human organizations, and it is reasonable to suppose that our former religious training would have some influence over us now, and that we should be led to a certain degree, to follow our former teachings in these things. But this should be avoided unless that teaching was in accordance with the oracles of God. Our object now should be to know, not what is expedient, or what have we or the sects done, but what does the word of God require of us on this or that thing—If we thus act, we shall abide in the truth, but if not, then we shall be found aiding the great apostacy in which a fallen and corrupt church has long been engaged. The Lord fully deliver us from these sore evils which seem now to threaten us as a people.

4. Though this conference served to strengthen the faith and confirm the hope of many, in the near advent of Christ, yet we became confirmed or greatly strengthened in our former convictions that such large, stated, occasional, or annual gatherings are not the Scriptural or the best means to advance the interests of the Redeemer's cause. They are attended with a great waste of time and expence of money, on the part of those who attend—They throw almost an intolerable burthen upon the church where they are held—And at such large gatherings there are so many old acquaintances to renew, and new ones to form—Such a variety of matters to attract the attention—So much hurry in the dispatch of bu-ness, that of all the places in the world, such a place is among the poorest, tho most unsuitable, for careful and critical thinking, deep research of God's word, and just conclusions on things pertaining to the faith and practice of the church.

We candidly believe that the facts in the case will fully justify the statement, that similar ecclesiastical assemblies have opened wide the doors, through which have flowed nearly all the foul waters of error, which now pollute the church. At such times, resolutions, propositions, advisory or authoritative, pertaining to the doctrine or practice of the church have been introduced. Time would admit of but few speaking on the question, and that few could say but little to the point because they had not looked into the matter—A few have urged the measure forward as a matter of expediency—Some for peace' sake have been silent—others could see no harm in the proposed measure, and concluded to let it go into effect—And thus the matter has passed by the vote of the few. At first the measure appeared harmless, but growth and maturity tell the sad tale that the 'Man of Sin, the son of perdition,' has sprung from just such apparently harmless and small beginnings.

These remarks are not designed to oppose any particular measure adopted at the Boston conference; for we know not but all that were adopted there are right; neither are they made to oppose the assembling of ministers and brethren, as many as are disposed, at any time and place where opportunity offers or duty may call, for the purpose of worshipping God according to the dictates of his word—but they are designed to oppose those conferences or ecclesiastical assemblies which meet annually, or at any time, to enact laws, devise plans, or pass resolutions, advisory or authoritative, relative to the faith or practice of individuals, or of the church. All the laws and plans necessary for the 'man of God,' are 'thoroughly furnished' in the word of inspiration, which if we implicitly obey, will make us perfect—and that is all we need to constitute us happy and useful here, and to fit us for the society of the blest in the world to come. The numerous examples of an apostate church on these things, for more than a thousand years, and the convincing evidences that we are near the judgment of the great day, should cause us to cleave with unyielding tenacity, to the Bible, and NOTHING BUT THE BIBLE. Amen.

Finally, from what we saw and heard at this conference, we are enabled to say that that the wild extravagancies, which in some instances have hitherto troubled us, have measurably given place to sobriety, things wholesome and according to sound doctrine. Our brethren, too, have learned to 'endeavor to keep the unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace,' though differences between them may exist on minor points. This most heavenly principle we need to cultivate more and more: for without it we are nothing that we must be to qualify us for an admission into the kingdom of God. But in nothing were we more pleased than in witnessing an increased desire on the part of ministers and brethren in general, to attain unto a higher state of Christian holiness and perfection, which are indispensable to a preparation to meet the Lord in peace. The Lord increase the desire, through our entire ranks, to abound more and more in these Christian graces. And may we soon meet the faithful whom we saw at the Boston conference, with all the saints, in that better country, the New Earth, wherein dwelleth righteousness.

At Hartford, Ct., we enjoyed several interesting meetings with the church in that place, which we should judge is in a healthful prosperous condition. Bro. T. Cole is their stated minister, and a successful defender of the truth. He also has the editorial charge of the Bible Advocate, which is published in that city. This paper, as its conductors freely admit, was commenced under unfavorable circumstances, yet, as they avow, with no wrong design on their part. Their object now is to proclaim the truth as they understand it, chiefly on those points which pertain to the near coming of Christ and his kingdom. And forgetting the past—so far as the 'Advocate,' or any other paper, faithfully pursues this work, we bid it God speed. A friendly feeling should be manifested by the several conductors of our papers towards each other. The peace of Zion and the glory of God demands it. We need not endorse each other's sentiments, but we should love as brethren, and show our love by works of forbearance and kindness towards one another. We may speak on points on which we differ, with freedom, but our communications should be deceply imbued with the spirit of Him who has said, By this shall all men know that ye are my disciples, if you have love one for another. The Lord forgive us all wherein we have lacked this heavenly and most lovely principle, and enable us in the future to possess it in all its divine fullness.

Great Apostacy.

NUMBER V.

Absence from home prevented our saying in last week's paper, anything on the great Apostacy of the church. The subject is too important to dismiss without first giving it a thorough examination; we therefore resume it again this week. Why we attach so much importance to this subject is, if the church has not generally and irrecoverably apostatized from the primitive purity and perfection of the gospel, then we are most assuredly not living in the last days—the coming of the Lord is not near: for in the last days, according to the word of inspiration, this was to be the condition of the church, viz: turned aside unto fables, not loving sound doctrine.—See 2 Tim. 3d and 4th chapters. We fully believe this is her present condition, which furnishes a conclusive evidence that the coming of the Lord emphatically draweth nigh. We proceed therefore to present this painful matter in its true light before our brethren, that their precious faith in the near advent of Christ may be strengthened. Our next specification in order is

20. The organization of the church. The sects, though they may differ on some minor points in the manner in which they organize or acknowledge churches, yet in the essentials of the matter they are agreed. They consider before a company of faithful believers can be a church, they must enroll their names on a church record, under a certain long or short covenant, formed for the occasion, and be acknowledged or pronounced a church, by the minister, elder, or bishop, as the case may be. Now we say, without fear of contradiction, that such a practice has neither precept nor example to justify it in the word of the Lord: and this fact alone is sufficient to give the whole work the character of a wide step in the great apostacy.

The Bible has authorized no man or body of men, since the days of the apostles, to organize or acknowledge a church. This work was done by Christ and the Apostles. By them the foundation was laid, and the one true church built upon it. Since then nothing more nor less than simply adding to this one true church could be done. It is true that local bodies are called churches, but still they are only members of the one body, and all constitute the one church.—These local bodies however act independent of each other, and consequently, so far as they are concerned in obeying the law of Christ, they are a church.—Such churches have been gathered and have existed ever since the one gospel church was first called together.

The manner in which this work was done by the apostles and primitive ministers of Christ, was very simple, as all may see by consulting the Acts of the Apostles. In every instance named, the power of, and love for the truth, made disciples of Jesus, and united them in the capacity of a church, or congregation of God. This principle moved them to obey all the ordinances and commands of Christ, to appoint all the necessary officers of the assembly; in a word, to 'set in order' all things necessary to bring the new congregation into full subjection to the perfect law of the one body. Instead of organizing, it was coming or submitting to the order of the house or church of God already organized. There were no such acts practised by the apostles, as are practised by the sects, such as enrolling names, joining hands, &c., and then being pronounced a church.—But they did preach the truth, and if enough in any one place loved and obeyed it, to sustain their regular meetings of worship, they as a matter of course became a true church or congregation of God.

If the sects, without an exception, have not, in this respect, taken a step in the great apostacy, then we misjudge. And the act has so blinded them to the simplicity of the primitive order of things, that they cannot understand it: it has become foolishness to them. Let us who have the true light beware how we imitate their example, and how we depart from the simplicity of the gospel, in these things.

21. The practice of the church. The manner in which the sects receive, deal with, and expel members, is anti-apostolic. We have not the least warrant in the Bible for persons to request the privilege of joining the church, for the very good reason that when they were converted, they were added to the Lord. For the same good reason, we hear nothing about calling for the relation of an experience, or catechizing persons before receiving them into the church. And voting them in, and such like things, were not practiced by the primitive church.—True faith and obedience, brought them into the church or congregation of God. Hence all this receiving the children of God into the church is mere human nonsense; we might as well talk of receiving a man into our dwelling after he was there.

The manner in which all the sects deal with disorderly members, is anti-scriptural, and highly pernicious in its tendency. When with our former brethren, we said there was a wrong somewhere here: but where we could not tell. We have seen church trials commence out of mere trifles, and before they were disposed of, church meetings had been repeatedly held, witnesses had testified—pleas had been made—feelings wounded—friends separated—churches nearly destroyed—and the whole community thrown into an unholy excitement, and all for what? Why, because a man or a woman had to be turned out of the church!

How different from this course is the rule as presented by Christ in Matt. xviii. 15-17. The simple meaning of this counsel, as we understand it, is, if your brother has done wrong, settle the difficulty between yourselves, if possible, and there let the matter end. But if not, then take two or three understanding, impartial, spiritual brethren with you, that if possible the erring one may be restored to the divine favor. But if you fail in this attempt, then tell the whole matter to the church or congregation, that the erring brother may have the prayers and counsel of the church, (not that a church trial may be got up), 'and if he hear the church, well, but if not, then let him be unto thee as a heathen man or a publican.'

Nothing like what is called by the sects a regular church trial, is justified by these words of the Savior, neither is such a practice anywhere taught in the Bible, consequently the step in the great apostacy in this case, has been wide, and attended with sad consequences, as every church of the sects very well knows. Let us who have seen and been freed from these evils, take heed how we suffer ourselves to be brought under their influence again, or how we lend our aid in introducing such unscriptural practices among us, or any measure that will directly or indirectly lead to such things. We have effectually tried the Bible rule on these things, for several years past, and know it to be altogether the more excellent way; and mean, by the grace of God, to cleave to the same infallible guide unto the end; and we most ardently pray that others may do the same.

Further remarks on this specification must be deferred for next week.

Bro. J. Pearson Jr. having closed his labors in this city, has removed to Newburyport, Mass., where his friends will address him.

The Cause—its wants.

Never, during the history of the advent cause, have we known a time when faithful laborers were more needed, in the entire Western New York, than now. In the large field east of us, where Bro. E. R. Pinney, and J. D. Johnson used to labor, there is no one of this faith, to preach the word. Bro. Pinney is yet unable to preach, and Bro. Johnson has returned to his friends in Worcester, Mass., to regain, if possible, his health, which is very feeble. The section of country west of us, where Bro. Bywater, Morley, and Porter have faithfully labored, is now deprived of their help. Bro. Porter is yet unable to preach, Bro. Morley has gone farther west, and Bro. Bywater is on a tour east, with the object of moving his family there, if a favorable opportunity offers for him to locate.

There is a duty, an important duty, to be done by the brethren, in these destitute places, and unless it is faithfully attended to soon, leanness will come upon them. You should not let these important fields lie unoccupied. You should pray God to send laborers among you, and then when they come you should remember that they are 'worthy of their hire.'—Your heart, and tongue, and purse should be in this best of all causes. You have wealth enough to amply support all the faithful laborers which are needed among you.

Who of the servants of God will venture out into these highly interesting fields, now ripe for the harvest. We believe several might do good, and be well supported, provided they would faithfully do their duty, and as faithfully tell the people their duty. We do not like to hear a minister frequent, or ever, dunning, scolding, or fretting, about a support, but we do think it is his duty at suitable times frankly to let his wants be known, and kindly, but faithfully to tell those for whom he labors their duty to him and family in this respect: then if they shut up the bowels of compassion or benevolence against him, great will be his reward for his sufferings—but woe unto those who through covetousness have been the cause of his sufferings. May the good Lord of the harvest overrule all these things to his glory, and soon gather his scattered children into the everlasting kingdom, where we shall not need to be taught by one another, for all will then know the Lord from the least unto the greatest. "Let thy kingdom come," we do most earnestly pray.

Bro. Mansfield's letters in this and the previous number of our paper, speak well for the cause where he is laboring: the Lord has been with him.

We hope he will not suffer for the want of pecuniary aid: let those whose duty it is, see to this matter after a godly sort.

The help Bro. Mansfield calls for, we hope will be furnished soon; but we want the Lord, not man, nor men, to make the selection, then the right one will go and good will be done by him. The Bible way is the better way to provide for such cases. 'Pray ye the Lord of the harvest to send forth more laborers into his harvest.' Let us observe this rule, in faith, and peradventure a native of a West India island may be raised to proclaim the everlasting gospel, in his own country: if not, then let him whom God may call elsewhere, go without delay to this important field, trusting in Him who has said, 'Lo, I am with you always, even unto the end of the world,' and so long as you do your duty, all your wants will be supplied: the Lord's stewards will not withhold from such, the treasure committed to their care.

☞ We learn by a letter from Bro. J. W. Roberts, Eric, Pa., that Darius Crouch is lecturing on the second advent a few miles from that place. Mr. Crouch recently lived at Fredonia, N. Y., whom we published as a man entirely unworthy of the fellowship of Christians or lovers of good morals. We do hope that community will be deceived by him no more, especially our brethren now they know his true character.

Astonishing Accuracy of the Bible.

An astonishing feature of the word of God is, that notwithstanding the time at which its compositions were written, and the multitude of the topics to which it alludes, there is not one physical error—not one assertion or allusion disproved by the progress of modern science. None of those mistakes which the science of each succeeding age discovered in the books of the preceding; above all, none of those absurdities which modern astronomy indicates in such great numbers in the writings of the ancients—in their sacred codes, in their philosophy, and even in the finest pages of the church, not one of these errors is to be found in any of our sacred books. Nothing there will ever contradict that which after so many ages, the investigations of the learned world have been able to reveal to us on the state of our globe, or on that of the heavens.

Peruse with care our Scriptures from one end to the other, to find there such spots; and whilst you apply yourself to this examination, remember that this is a book which speaks of every thing which describes nature, which recites its creation, which tells of the water, of the atmosphere, of the mountains, of the animals, and of the plants. It is a book which teaches us the first revolution of the world, which also foretells its last; it recounts them in the circumstantial language of history; it extols them in the sublimest strains of poetry, and it chants them in the charms of glowing song. It is a book which is full of oriental raptures, elevation, variety and boldness. It is a book which speaks of the heavenly and invisible world, while it also speaks of the earth and things visible.

It is a book which nearly fifty writers, of every state, of every condition, and living through the course of fifteen hundred years, have concurred to make. It is a book which was written in the centre of Asia, in the sands of Arabia, and in the deserts of Judah, in the courts of the temple of the Jews, in the music schools of the prophets of Bethel and of Jerico; in the sumptuous palaces of Babylon, and on the idolatrous banks of the Euphrates: and finally, in the centre of the western civilization, in the midst of polytheism and its idols, as also in the bosom of pantheism and its sad philosophy. It is a book whose first writer had been forty years a pupil of the magicians of Egypt, in whose opinion the sun, the stars, and the elements were endowed with intelligence, re-acted on the elements, and governed the world by a perpetual alluvium.

It is a book whose first writer preceded, by more than nine hundred years, the most ancient philosophers of ancient Greece and Asia—the Thalesia, and Pythagoras, Zalucuses, the Zenophens and the Confucuses. It is a book which carries its narrations even to the hierarchies of angels—even to the most distant epoch of the future, and the glorious scenes of the last day.—Well, search among its fifty authors, search among its sixty-six books, its eleven hundred and eighty-nine chapters, and its thirty-one thousand one hundred and seventy-three verses, search for only one of these thousand errors which the ancients and the moderns committed, when they speak of the heavens or of the earth, of their revolutions, of the elements, search—but you will not find one.

CORRESPONDENCE.

"Consciousness of the Dead."

BRO. HILL—In your article dated April 23d. you say, "If another being raised up Christ's body, then he did not raise it up himself, as he said he would: 'In three days I will raise it up'—but we freely acknowledge that there is an abundance of Scripture which declares that God raised him from the dead. Shall we quote it to prove that Christ did not speak the truth? or shall we seek a harmony?" [Brother, does not your manner need a little chastening?]

Of course we should seek a harmony. Not, however, by making the "abundance of Scripture" conform to one or two passages. That would be forcing, or attempting to force a harmony, instead of seeking the real harmony of divine testimony.

In speaking of his body as a temple, Christ evidently designed to perplex the Jews. Even his disciples did not seem to understand him until after his resurrection. [See John ii. 22.]

Christ says, "I lay down my life that I might take it again." Here let me state an important yet very simple principle of interpretation, to wit: 'We never should depart from the literal sense of Scripture without an obvious necessity.' The same may be said of the primary meaning of words; for to depart from the primary meaning of words without an obvious necessity, would be the first step in departing from the literal sense of Scripture.

Will you say in reference to the text last quoted, that it means, I, the soul, will lay down the life of my body, that I, the living soul, might take the life of my body again? If not, then let us take the literal sense of the passage: which is that "I (Jesus Christ, the Son of God,) lay down my LIFE, that I might take it again."

Did the Son of God thus lay down his life? Hear the testimony of Peter, (1 Pet. iii. 18) "For Christ also hath suffered, being put to death in the flesh, but quickened by the spirit: by which also he went and preached unto the spirits in prison, which sometime were disobedient, when once the long-suffering of God waited in the days of Noah while the ark was preparing.

This same being came in the flesh and "in the flesh" was put to death. Now how was Christ raised from this death? The Father "loosed the pains ['cords' or 'bonds'] of death" by the life-giving power of his spirit. Christ received the spirit of life, arose and came forth from the sepulchre, an angel from heaven having "rolled back the stone."

How was Lazarus raised from the dead? Our Lord called him: Lazarus, come forth! And he that was dead came forth. Christ raised him from the dead, and yet he arose and came forth from the grave himself.

Thus we may harmonise the saying of Christ. "In three days I will raise it (his body) up," with the many declarations that "God raised him from the dead."

The cases of Jonah and Christ in natural sleep, being called up by another and rising up themselves, illustrate the same point. See Mark iv. 38.

So we see that when the two clauses of testimony are harmonised, the foundation of your argument for consciousness, (in this case at least,) is destroyed.

Now, Bro. Hill, let us keep to the question: Are the dead conscious? Never before have I been so fully persuaded that they are not. I have now given you a considerable amount of positive testimony on this question—yet I think I am willing to understand my errors; and if I should be convinced that I am in error on this subject, it will be my privilege publicly to acknowledge it. Let us both bear in mind the words of David: "For ever, O Lord, thy word is settled in heaven."

Affectionately yours, in the hope of the gospel,
BUTLER MORLEY.

"Where is the Promise of his Coming?"

The following is an extract of a Poem in the Democratic Review for the present month. The whole is similar in character:

"Earthquakes affright the world, and whirlwinds howl,
Floods in their fury rise,—volcanoes blaze,
And terrify creation. Ignorant man,
Believing trembles, that the Almighty wrath
Sends these for signs of the eternal doom.
O, idle fear! Far distant is the end."

And thus will men sing and thus will they be willingly ignorant, until the day shall overtake them. Here we have the admission of signs, or rather occurrences that affright mankind, for the writer will not admit of these things being signs of approaching judgment. While upon this, my mind reverts to an article appearing in Willmer's European Times of May 4th. The article, as a whole, to me seems an eloquent comment upon those words of Christ "mistress of nations" &c. I will just quote a very few words—"Pauperism threatens, like a pall, to cover the land with mourning and sorrow. Altogether the general feeling is gloomy and desponding." Perhaps I may say a little more on this subject when I have a better opportunity. H. H.

Shakerism Again.

BRO. MARSH—I have for some time felt a desire that all who were truly looking for and loving the second coming of Christ, knew the errors of the Shakers in respect to that event. I am not in the habit of writing for the public eye, neither am I capable for that task—yet with the help of the Lord I will try to give a few facts by way of experience:

The first of Feb., 1846, two advent brethren and two sisters came from New Boston, N. H., to my house on their way to the Shakers at Canterbury, N. Y. They had got into the belief that Christ had come the second time, and that the saints were to be gathered into the "land of unwalled villages."—Ezek. xxxviii. 11. They invited me to go with them. I went, and found a people that appeared beautiful outwardly. But the doctrine: They said to us, "You are right in your belief; Christ came the second time about 60 years ago in the person of Ann Lee, and you have been wandering in the wilderness like the children of Israel. The advent movement was to prepare you for this pure way, which is Mount Zion, the city of the New Jerusalem," &c. But, said I, that city was to descend out of heaven from God: Rev. xxi. 10. But they said that was spiritual, and that the 9th verse, the Bride, the Lamb's wife, had reference to Ann Lee, and that the Lord Jesus being revealed from heaven in flaming fire, &c. (2 Thes. i. 7, 8,) is these burning truths, and that coming into their order was the resurrection from the dead; they were living in the resurrection.

This I know does not correspond with the word of God: 1 Thes. iv. 15-18—"For this we say by the word of the Lord, that we which are alive and remain unto the coming of the Lord shall not prevent them which are asleep: for the Lord himself shall descend from heaven with a shout, &c. Wherefore comfort one another with these words." Praise God for his blessed word which is truth! The manner of coming into their order is by the males confessing their sins to the Elder and the females to the Elderess, and we are made the scape goat to bear the sins of the people into the land of forgetfulness, said the Elder, and this is the door into the kingdom. But, said I, Christ said He was the door, (John x. 7-10) by me if any man enter in he shall be saved, &c.; but to this he gave me no definite answer, but said that "after I had taken up a full cross and left my wife and all fleshly connections, and joined them all these things would come right." They quote Luke xx. 34, 35 as applying to them: "The children of this world marry and are given in marriage; but they which shall be accounted worthy to obtain that world and the resurrection from the dead, neither marry nor are given in marriage." But the 36 verse, first part, they say nothing about, which says, "Neither can they die any more;" but the latter part of 36 verse belongs to them. This looks to me like handling the word of God deceitfully, because the words, "Neither can they die any more," proves their deception, for they are sick and die like the world around them.

I asked them how they would reconcile their doctrine with St. Paul to the Ephesians, (Eph. v. 21-23) which shows, (to my mind,) the connection between man and wife to be as sacred as that between Christ and the Church, and many other passages of like import. I was told it was right then but they had got into a third dispensation—therefore, children of the resurrection; and that they had intercourse with saints and angels, and could see them come into their meetings. I was urged to join them, but told them I wanted to investigate their doctrine by the Bible, but they either spiritualised or put into a back dispensation all that did not answer their purpose. I went into their meetings a number of evenings and on Christian the Sabbath; their exercises were travelling, dancing, singing, shouting, bowing, stamping, whistling, some for half an hour or more at a time, and then talk in tongues and have revelations. Two I understood to be for me—one from the prophet Elijah and the other from the prophet Daniel, telling the seeker after truth, this is the way of God, and exhorting to join this holy people without delay.

After I returned home I received a letter from one of the Elders, dated March 1st, 1846, from which I make an extract: "Friend John, the prophet Daniel came into our meeting one week since, and requested that we should all unite in solemn prayers for John Paine. We were willing to comply with the request and unite with the prophet in praying for you." I was confused with such doctrine and asked my companion if it was possible that the Bible was all fulfilled? but before receiving an answer, I said I will look at it again before I believe it. I took it, and opened, without turning a leaf, and my eye was directed to the 4th chap. of 1 Timothy. I read, the light broke into my mind—I said, praise God, this is his word! I will doubt it no more; I have not since. From the 1st to the 8th verse of that chapter I believe applies to the Shakers. I hope all my brethren and sisters will read it and stand on God's word.

Your brother looking for that blessed hope,
JOHN B. PAINE.
Suncook, Me., May 12th, 1847.

IMPORTANCE OF THE WESTERN FIELD.—Thousands upon thousands of foreigners continually arrive, and are pouring into the Western country. I hope this fact will serve as an additional stimulus for our Eastern lecturing brethren to visit the rapidly peopling territories of Iowa, Wisconsin &c. By proclaiming the tidings of the approaching reign of Christ in those regions, you may hasten the accomplishment of the prediction that the Gospel shall be preached as a witness to all nations. Swedes, Danes, Norwegians, Germans, &c., &c., are there, some of whom may embrace the truth, and carry it to the lands they have left. Preachers speed to the West! Time is short. H. H.

A WORD ABOUT CONFERENCES.—I doubt the propriety of our brethren laying out much money in travelling a great distance to attend Conferences, especially in places where the community have been favored with Advent preaching for years. Let every proper means be employed to do good, and to speed the Gospel far and near. Would it not serve such an object better, to devote the money expended by attending conference, in sending missionaries to the hundreds of places in this land, (to say nothing about Europe, West Indies, &c.) where no Advent preaching has yet been heard? The expense of a single conference would suffice for the mission of a number of Lecturers to the Western States. The fact that as a body of people, we are poor, is a cause of thus much being said. Let our friends consider these things, and act as duty demands. H. H.

Bro. Marsh—Providence permitting, I shall attend the conference at Oran to commence June 18th. I thank God that my health upon the whole is much better than in the winter. I hope my journey eastward will be the means of a perfect restoration. I think I may give the friends at Little Falls a call by the way, but I cannot say when, exactly. If our dear brethren in Oswego desire me to visit them particularly, (a sister from that place having mentioned them to me the other evening,) they will please direct to me at Manlius, N. Y. before June 20th.

Rochester, June 8th. H. HEYES.

Kind Words.

Kind words do not cost much. They never blister the tongue or lips. And we have never heard of any mental trouble arising from this quarter. Though they do not cost much, yet they accomplish much.

1. They help one's own good nature and good will. Soft words soften our own soul. Angry words are fuel to the flame of wrath, and make it blaze the more fiercely.

2. Kind words make other people good natured. Cold words freeze people, and hot words scorch them, and sarcastic words irritate them, and bitter words make them bitter, and wrathful words make them wrathful.

There is such a rush of all other kinds of words, in our days, that it seems desirable to give kind words a chance among them. There are vain words, and idle words, and empty words, and profane words, and boisterous words, and war-like words.

Kind words also produce their own image upon men's souls. And a beautiful image it is.—They soothe and quiet and comfort the hearer.—They shame him out of his sour, morose, unkind feelings. We have not yet begun to use kind words in such abundance as they ought to be used.

A WORD.—Say not a word you had better leave unsaid. A word is a little thing we know, but it has stirred up a world of strife. Suppressing a word has saved many a character—many a life. A word unsaid, and Hamilton would have lived, a pride of his country. Who can tell the good or bad effects of a single word? Be careful what you say. Think before you speak, and you will never be mortified with yourself, or cause a thrill of pain to flash through the heart of a friend.

THE SPIDER'S THREAD.—That any creature could be found to fabricate a net not less ingenious than that of the fisherman, for the capture of its prey—that it should fix it in the right place, and then patiently await the result, is a proceeding so strange, that, if we did not see it done daily before our eyes by the common house spider, and garden spider, it would seem wonderful. But how much is our wonder increased when we think of the complex fabric of each single thread, and then of the mathematical precision and rapidity with which, in certain cases, the net itself is constructed; and to add to all this, as an example of the wonders which the most common things exhibit when carefully examined, the net of the garden spider consists of two distinct kinds of silk. The threads forming the concentric circles are composed of a silk much more elastic than that of the rays, and are studded over with minute globules of a viscid gum, sufficiently adhesive to retain any unwary fly which comes in contact with it. A net of average dimensions is estimated by Mr. Blackwall to contain 87,360 of these globules, and a large net of fourteen or sixteen inches in diameter, 120,000; and yet such a net will be completed by one species (Experia apoclica) in about forty minutes, on an average, if no interruption occurs!—Introduction to Zoology.

PUEBLA.—The city of Puebla, which is about one hundred and sixty miles from Vera Cruz, on the way to the capital, is one of the most remarkable places on the Western continent. Its population is estimated at 80,000, and its churches are noted for their elegance and wealth. The chandeliers and lamps which adorn it are of massive gold and silver. The building was completed in 1808, and is said to have cost $6,000,000. There are ten chapels attached to it—all richly decorated. Besides this, there are several churches of magnitude and great wealth.—Rock. Dem.

THE POWER OF THE PRESS.—In the year 1272, the wages of a laboring man were just three half pence per day; and at the same period, the price of a Bible well written out was £30 sterling. Of course a common laborer in those days, could not have procured a Bible with less than the entire earnings of thirteen years! Now, a beautifully printed copy of the same book can be purchased with the earnings of half a day!

DURABILITY OF OAK.—The durability of oak may be known from the fact that the throne of Edward the Confessor is 800 years old; and the oldest wooden bridge of which we have any account is of oak—and which existed 400 years before Christ.

TEMPERANCE STATISTICS.—At the recent anniversary meeting of the American Temperance Union, Rev. John Marsh, Chairman of the Executive Committee, said that 70,000 American seamen had signed the pledge—that 500 distilleries have been closed in Sweden—that there were 1,200,000 members of temperance societies in Germany, and 2,000,000 in England, Scotland and Wales.

EMIGRATION.—From the 1st of January to the 17th of May inclusive, 44,627 steerage passengers have arrived at this port.—New York.

The Famine in Europe.

LONDON, May 15th, 1847.

How to begin to give you a history of the state of things at present existing in this country I really am at a loss. It certainly is most unprecedented and critical. They are on the verge of bankruptcy and famine. Money terribly tight, and food of all kinds terribly scarce and high, and the lower classes as near starvation as they can be. The people are alarmed, the government also, at the short supply of food on hand.—They now begin to think we cannot keep up the supply till the next harvest. The Queen has set the example, and ordered that all her household are to have but a pound of bread per day, and that to be made of second quality flour. All pastry is recommended to be omitted,—and all the people are charged to use the strictest economy in food. Riots are becoming frequent in England, as they have been and are in Ireland. Fever is worse than ever in Ireland, and has been brought to England by the swarms of Irish coming over here, and it is feared that it will be worse, which I do not doubt. There is not at this moment ten days supply of food in London.—a city of two millions of people. Small supplies are coming forward from the States, to which point they must look, but they are in a worse state than they dare publicly admit. You may recollect what I wrote you by the Cambria during the panic which occurred soon after my arrival, that flour would be 60s here before the 1st of July. It has sold today at 52s a 53s, and one party I heard ask 56s. No orders have gone to America from here since the 1st of April of much importance, and the supply will be very limited for some time. They will want all we can spare. They admit that they want a large amount from us another year, and not one only, but many years. I tell them their farmers are done,—for we shall lay down food of all kinds here cheaper than they can grow or produce it. They look wild at that—yet would not object to it if we could do away with our Tariff and take their manufactures, for they would give us a rushing quantity of goods, and all the domestic commission merchants would be looking after English accounts, instead of domestic. Their farmers' and our manufacturers' occupation would be gone. They will urge the free trade system, as it would give them a tremendous trade with us—but it cannot be, so long as our Tariff is even as high as now.

MONDAY, May 17th.—I have been into the corn market here to-day. Every thing higher, corn 64s; wheat 120s a quarter of 8½ bushels, and flour 55s; and instead of being 60s by the 1st of July, as I said on the 1st of April, it will be so before the 1st June. The state of affairs here is awful. The papers to-day give accounts of several riots for bread in Exeter and other towns,—which is only the beginning. The all absorbing theme is food, bread, bread! I see it estimated that two millions will perish by famine in Ireland, and that by an Irish Catholic Archbishop. Fever is raging there fearfully. Murders and riots are of every day occurrence.—The same Priest is very severe upon England, but speaks of the noble spirit of the Americans in coming forward to the relief. I don't know what is to become of this country. They evidently look to us for the future, and even begin to speculate upon our coming crop with a good deal of interest. They hope we shall have a good one this year, for they will want a great deal. But now all business is at an end almost; and the state of the country engrosses all attention. They fear the consequences of a continued scarcity of food, and are looking to us to avert what they so much fear. I think you will find some surprising changes soon. The steamers of 4th and 19th of June, for Boston, are full already.

Europe at large is suffering under the dire calamity of scarcity of food. The laboring class in several of the continental cities and towns, as well as many residing in the United Kingdom, have lately exhibited symptoms of outrage and plunder. The accounts of the 8th May, from Herrenberg, Urach, Ludwigsburg and Gopdingen, in Wirtemberg, state that great anxiety was felt at those towns for fear of outbreaks. Precautionary measures had been taken by the citizens. An attack was made on the shop of a baker in Brussels, whom they forced to make a distribution of bread; and, subsequently, the rioters proceeded to the premises of a corn-merchant, which they proposed plundering, but were prevented by the military and police. Private letters state that there have been riots in Kommtan, and also in Eger and Lietzmeritz, directed against foreign corn-dealers. The rioters were pursued out of Eger with showers of stones as far as Wuldsassen; and in Lietzmeritz a speculator in corn had both his ears cut off! Several houses and shops were plundered at Posen on the 29th ult., and many carts, laden with corn and flour. Considerable excitement prevails in Nottingham, in England, where some contributions have been levied off several bakers and provision dealers.

THE FAMINE AND FEVER.—In some of the English towns near the Irish coast, fever is mowing down its victims daily. Liverpool, now the greatest port in the world, is, unhappily, from its local, the principal recipient of Irish destitution and disease. Astounding as the numbers appear, since the commencement of the present year nearly 200,000 human souls have been thrown into that town, the debris of the sister country. The local taxes, which must provide for this enormous amount of wretchedness, have been swelled to an extent that shocks the nerves of that alarmingly sensitive biped, "the oldest inhabitant." The pressure thus created ought not to be a local, but a national burthen; yet the Executive, who think that the Liverpool public ought to pay in kind for the advantages of their position, decline to interfere.

The people have at length stirred to prevent the inevitable swamping that must accrue from this immigration of the poor, the diseased and the helpless from the "far west." They have insisted that the wretched Irish paupers, in a state of disease, shall not be permitted to land; the steamers bringing such are treated as vessels arriving from foreign ports without a clean bill of health, and are subject to the quarantine laws. This has stopped the nuisance for a time—whether permanently remains to be seen. In the meantime fever rages violently. Temporary sheds have to be erected in different parts of the town, in addition to the accommodation afforded by the regular hospitals; and, as in all such cases, the middling and better classes are occasionally the victims of the disease as well as the poor and the expatriated.

IRELAND.—The accounts from Ireland are very awful. A Dublin correspondent of the morning Chronicle, says: "There have been further tumultuary proceedings and processions of the peasantry in various parts of the country, and the military and police have been in general requisition to keep this spirit of insubordination in check. The reports of the progress of pestilence are quite disheartening, and, notwithstanding all the imports of food, and the immense exerting in relief in food and money, great destitution still prevails, and the markets are advancing. All accounts concur in showing that the mortality is still very considerable. According to some calculations, the population has already been diminished to the extent of nearly one million, from deaths and emigration. But I should suppose that this estimate, for which there can be nothing like certainty or accurate data, is greatly exaggerated." Kerry Examiner says: "The Catholic clergy of this county have been obliged to suspend their usual Conferences in consequence of their inability to attend, owing to the heavy duties that devolve on them in their respective parishes in these times of famine and death."

The pestilence is as nearly destructive in some parts of Ulster, as in any of the southern or western districts. In the southern county of Fermanagh the mortality is frightful. The Cork Examiner contains details of the ravages of pestilence in various parts of that extensive country. In the famed district of Schull the extensive relief afforded has caused some alleviation, and the mortality is decreasing. In the Cork workhouses, the deaths last week, were 95—an increase of 12 over the preceding week.

APPOINTMENTS.

A conference is appointed to convene at Slabcity, in the town of Livonia, Liv. Co. N. Y., Friday, July 2d, at 10 A. M.—A general attendance is solicited. Friends will call on E. Lee, and C. Goodwin. Bro. H. P. Hill, the Editor and others may be expected to attend. Bro. Galtzha is requested to attend this meeting.

A Grove meeting is appointed by Bro. N. A. Hitchcock, at Tyler Prospect, Washington Co. Ill., to be held June 10th and 26th. A general attendance is solicited.

A Grove Meeting will be held, the Lord willing, in Macomb, Macomb Co., Michigan, in a Grove of Bro. Taylor's (in Crawford settlement) commencing July 31, 1847, to continue over the Sabbath.

The design of this meeting is to do good to all who may come, by the preaching of the Gospel of Christ. We intend to give a careful presentation of our notes in the advent of Christ at hand, by giving a course of lectures on the Visions of the Prophet Daniel. Ministering brethren in the vicinity are respectfully invited to attend, and labor as the Lord may direct though they may not profess to be Adventists. Shall we not love and pray for the coming of the Lord? I should be glad if one of our advent Preachers from across the Lake would come over and help us. Brethren will you come? But very little advent labor has been bestowed upon this part of God's Vineyard. We shall be happy to see as many of our advent friends at this meeting as possible. S. CLARK.

All the brethren from a distance, intending to help in the above meeting, will please inform me by letter, and I or some brother will meet them at the Temperance House in Detroit, or at Bro. Osborn's, (the Baker,) on the 5th of June. STEWART TAYLOR. (Direct, S. Taylor, P. M. Vienna, Mich.)

Why art thou sad?

To —.

O why that sadness on thy heart,
That cloud upon thy brow I
Thou dost not well to act the part
Of him that doubteth, now.
Sure Christ hath trod the thorny way,
Was tried, and tempted, night and day,
Insulted, mocked and tortured, slain,
That all the saints with him might reign.

Why art thou sad? Be of good cheer,
Thy worldlings on thee frown,
While thou canst read thy title clear,
To an unfading crown.

The price is paid, the prize is sure,
To all who to the end endure,
Gird up, and tread the heavenly road,
Ready, always, to meet thy God.

Soon Paradise will be restored,
The just with Christ shall reign—
Earth, like the garden of the Lord,
Will yield her fruits again.
No tear-drop, then, shall dim thine eye,
No heart shall mourn, no breast will sigh,
'This world, is but a wilderness;
'The World to Come—a home of bliss.

The Lord's Coming a Great Practical Doctrine.

BY MOURANT BRUCE, M. A.

Our object, is to give a PRACTICAL VIEW OF THE LORD'S SECOND ADVENT. Many have heard of this subject, whose attention has not been decidedly drawn to it. Many have theorized on the event, who have never applied it for useful purposes; and many regard its consideration as speculative and imaginary, wholly unconnected with the daily walk of the Christian, and of no particular benefit.

It is proposed to show that the subject of the Lord's Advent demands the most serious attention; that it is anything but speculative—nay, on the contrary, that it is of the most solemn, practical, and useful character.

May it please God that the arguments now to be brought forward from his Holy Word, shall bring home this conviction, fully and clearly, to the minds of all who read.

Omitting the Scriptures of the Old Testament, it is from those of the New only that we propose to show the practical character of the doctrine of the Second Advent. We begin by

I. STATING THE SUBJECT.

1. As to the fact, itself, that the Lord will come in his glorious majesty, all professing Christians are agreed. Whether he will return to the earth, and, in the words of the prophets, "His feet shall stand on the mount of Olives," (Zech. 14th), or whether he shall only come to the region of the air, are subjects much debated, and on which it is no part of our plan to enter. Suffice it here to say, that all professing Christians agree in the fact of the glorious coming of our great God and Savior, to judge the quick and the dead.

2. The prominence given in the New Testament to this coming of our Lord, and to subjects connected with it, is very remarkable.

(a). This shall be shown from his own words. It is thus that our Lord himself draws the attention of his church to his second coming.

First, by his DISCOURSES on the subject.—Amongst these, stands prominently that remarkable description of his return, which the Lord gave his disciples when on the mount of Olives. They asked him, "What shall be the sign of thy coming, and of the end of the world?" or age.

Again, by his PARABLES, he presses the same great truth. These amount in all to twenty-seven the greater number of which point to his Second Advent, or events connected with it.

The Lord's EXHORTATIONS, also, to preparedness for that great event are very forcible:—"Watch, for ye know neither the day nor the hour wherein the Son of man cometh." "In such an hour as ye think not, the Son of man cometh." What I say unto you, I say unto all, Watch."

In these exhortations, our Lord brings this great subject prominently forward, and urges it on his Church to the end of time.

(b). Passing from our Lord's teaching to certain remarkable passages in his life, we notice first His TRANSFIGURATION.

In this event, we have a representation of the glories of the Second Advent. The witnesses of this surprising fact were Peter, and James, and John; the former and latter of whom thus allude to it; the former in his second epistle:—"We were eye-witnesses of his majesty . . . when we were with him in the holy mount." And the latter, apparently, in the first chapter of his gospel:—"We beheld his glory, the glory as of the only begotten of the Father.

In this transaction, our Lord gave a manifestation of his own future glory, and of that of his saints in the resurrection state; and this was according to a promise, which "about eight days before" he had given to his apostles; namely, that there were some then present who should not taste death till they had seen the Son of man coming in his kingdom. Accordingly, he takes with him into the mount the three forenamed witnesses, and there they behold that glory which the Lord and his saints will possess in his kingdom. Elijah had in his flesh been translated, and his glorified humanity was there beheld radiant with light. Moses had died, and was buried. He might, or might not, have seen corruption—Of this we are not informed, But this we know, that for his dead body, angels of light and darkness contended; and here we see the fact and fruit of the Archangel's victory. Moses dead, buried, and raised again in glory, is a pledge to dying Believers, of their own glorious resurrection; whilst Elias, and our Lord himself, are, in this transaction, types of the sudden glory of those who shall be "caught up" alive from the earth at our Savior's advent, "to meet the Lord in the air."

The INSTITUTION OF THE EUCHARIST is another event in the history of our Lord which calls the attention of his church to his future Advent. "As often as ye eat this bread and drink this cup, ye do show the Lord's death till he come." (1 Cor. 11th). Hence, in this monthly, or, which is better, weekly celebration, believers are habitually reminded of this great doctrine.

The ASCENSION of our Lord is also used to direct the eyes of his people to his return. The Apostles gazed on Him whom they loved, whilst "a cloud received him out of their sight."—(Act 1st.) But, behold, from an ascending Savior their attention is called to a coming King; for, "whilst they looked steadfastly toward heaven, as he went up, two men stood by them in white apparel; which also said, Ye men of Galilee, why stand ye gazing up into heaven? this same Jesus, who is taken up from you into heaven, shall so come in like manner as ye have seen him go into heaven."

Thus, both from the teaching of our Lord, and from these several passages in his life, we see the fact of his Second Advent prominently brought before his Church.

(c). From the teaching and life of our Lord, we pass on to show that equal prominence is given to this great subject in the writings of his Apostles. It is thus noticed by them:—

ST. PAUL.

Rom. 8th.—I reckon that the sufferings of this present time are not worthy to be compared with the glory that shall be revealed in us. For the earnest expectation of the creature (creation) waiteth for the manifestation of the sons of God; i. e., at the resurrection.

1 Cor. 1st.—Ye come behind in no gift, waiting for the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ.

2 Cor. 5th.—Earnestly desiring to be clothed upon with our house which is from heaven.

Eph. 1st.—Until the redemption of the purchased possession.

Philip. 3d.—Our conversation (citizenship) is in heaven, from whence also we look for the Savior, who shall change our vile body.

Col. 3d.—When Christ, who is our life, shall appear, then shall ye also appear with him in glory.

1 Tim. 2d.—Unblameable in holiness before God, at the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ with all his saints.

2 Thess. 3d.—The Lord direct your hearts into the patient waiting for Christ.

1 Tim. 6th.—Keep this commandment until the appearing of our Lord Jesus Christ.

2 Tim. 4th.—A crown of righteousness, which the righteous Judge shall give me at that day.

Titus 2d.—Looking for that blessed hope, and the glorious appearing of the great God and our Savior Jesus Christ.

Heb. 9th.—To them that look for him, he shall appear the second time.

JAMES.

Jas. 5th.—Stablish your hearts, for the coming of the Lord, draweth nigh.

PETER.

1 Pet. 5th.—When the chief Shepherd shall appear, ye shall receive a crown of glory.

2 Pet. 3d.—The day of the Lord will come as a thief in the night.

JOHN.

1 John 3d.—When he shall appear, we shall be like him.

JUDE.

Behold, the Lord cometh with ten thousand of his saints, to execute judgment upon all.

REVELATION.

Beginning with—Behold, he cometh with clouds.

Ending with—Even so, come, Lord Jesus.

Thus, all the Apostles, and that in almost all their writings, bring forward this doctrine, a few specimens only of which are given above. For further evidence, the reader is referred especially to the Letters to the Thessalonians, and to those by St. Peter.

The prominence given in Scripture to the Second Advent having been thus noticed,

3. We proceed to point out its importance.

To the RIGHTEOUS, how important is it! Believers are now pardoned, their sins are blotted out, for they are justified by faith in the Son of God. At death they go to Him, and "rest from their labors." But they do not then receive their reward, or fully enter into the joy of their Lord. Death is never mentioned in Scripture as the period when the saints are to be wholly blessed.—This is always referred to the Second Advent.—It is at the resurrection only, when they shall be clothed upon with their new bodies, and when the whole church shall be perfected, that they shall enter into their state of complete felicity.—Most deeply momentous, therefore, to the saints, is that coming of the Lord, which alone shall bring to them their "perfect consummation and bliss, both in body and soul."

And if to the righteous this event is important, is it not especially so to the WICKED? The ungodly man dies. His soul goes to its own place. His body lies in the ground. But, at the coming of the Judge, that body is raised. In that body he stands before the dreadful tribunal, and so in body and soul enters into that dreary abode, at the contemplation of which soul recoils with horror.

To CHRIST, also, as well as to his people, the period of his coming is one of no slight interest. For it is not till then that He will assume "his many crowns." It is not till then that he will fully see of the travail of his soul, and take possession of that kingdom stipulated to Him in everlasting covenant.

To SATAN, Christ's great adversary, that day is of equal importance; for not till then, having been first chained in the abyss, will he be cast into the lake of fire and brimstone, his final prison-house. (Rev. 20: 3, 9, 10.)

To those EVIL SPIRITS, whether abroad on the earth, or "reserved in chains under darkness unto the judgment of the great day," there is the same dreadful importance in the Lord's appearing, "Art thou come hither to torment us before the time? I know thee who thou art," was the significant cry of one of these wretched spirits. And no marvel; for he dreaded that which, by some divine oracle, he knew; namely, that at the appointed time, he was to be plunged into everlasting fire, reserved for the devil and his angels.

And GOOD SPIRITS, as well as evil, look forward also to this grand period. As intelligent beings, they are desirous of knowledge, and these are among "the things which the angels desire to look into;" for they give the fullest development of the mysteries of redemption. Whilst, as benevolent beings, they must anticipate with deep interest that blessed period, when those "heirs of salvation," over whom, as ministering spirits, they have carefully watched, shall receive the happy reward of their painful conflict.

Nor can we doubt, that to the WHOLE OF CREATION, the consummation to be effected at the coming of the Lord will be a subject of the deepest interest. We may reasonably suppose that all God's creatures located in their appointed regions throughout the immensity of space, are, or will be, made acquainted with the stupendous fact of the incarnation of the Eternal Word, and of its full effects, at his appearing. Nothing, I presume, will so manifest the character of God as the atonement, and its future results. Thus, as it is said in a figure, that "the earnest expectation of the creature (i. e., of this lower creation) waiteth for the manifestation of the sons of God;" (the glorious appearing of the saints at the Second Advent:) so we may suppose, that event will, to the rest of God's creation, be one of the deepest moment, as manifesting in the grandest possible manner God's justice, mercy, wisdom, faithfulness, and all the other attributes of his adorable character.

As, therefore, the Second Advent of our Lord thus concerns the Church and the world, Christ and Satan, angels both of light and of darkness, and (we may add) the whole rest of God's creation—since it is an event so vast and comprehensive in its results, it cannot be denied that it is thus proved to be a subject of the greatest moment.

4. From the importance of the Second Advent we shall, in further stating the subject, proceed to notice only, the aspect of the Church respecting it.

And this we show from the letters of the Apostles. In them we find believers constantly described as WAITING for that event. The faithful are spoken of as "looking for that blessed hope, and the glorious appearing of the great God;" "Looking for him," &c.

And for this we find they are CONDEMNED.—For example, the Corinthians; "Ye come behind in no gift, waiting for the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ." And the Thessalonians: "Ye turned to God from Idols, to serve the living and true God, and to wait for his Son from heaven." And again: "But ye, brethren, are not in darkness, that that day should overtake you as a thief."

Other examples might also be given: and we might likewise, notice passages in which the strongest censure is passed on those who neglect, or despise, the day of his coming; thus clearly showing what is the will of the Lord on this subject, and what is the proper aspect of the Church concerning it.

Having thus stated the subject of the Second Advent—the fact—its prominence in the New Testament—its importance—and the aspect of the Church respecting it, the way is now opened to show. (To be Continued.)

The Use of Tobacco.

"The habit of smoking, snuffing, and chewing this weed is not so lamentable in its consequences as rum-drinking, but then it is a matter of intemperance—expensive—disgusting—and a great cause of rum-drinking.

The least important item in the account is its expense. Yet this is worthy of attention. In the year 1810, after thorough investigation, it was ascertained that in the city of New York alone, there was consumed during that year $80,000 worth of cigars. The present consumption in that city is not less than $200,000 annually. A very careful investigation has been made relative to the cost of this article to the whole nation, and it has been found to exceed 10,000,000 of dollars per annum. More than ten times as much as is paid to all the benevolent enterprises of the day together. How much suffering and poverty that $10,000,000 would relieve—how much light and truth it might scatter. $10,000,000 wasted for cigars! and by a people continually complaining of 'Hard Times.'

It is a dreadful filthy habit—either in its chewing, smoking or snuffing. What an uncleanly nose is the snuff-taker continually poking in your face,—and then, if you have seen a regular snuff-taker spit, you have looked upon a sight too filthy for decent eyes. Think of the chewing of this weed—polluting the mouth with that which no animal in creation, save the dirty goat, and the tobacco worm, will ever touch. The mouth was evidently made to be kept clean, and fit to contain food during mastication; but the use of tobacco makes it the very foulest spot beneath the sun. How is that poor man's stomach to be pitted, that is compelled to receive all its food from a vessel so unclean! What a lip and chin the poor tobacco chewer is obliged to carry about with him wherever he may go, always besmeared with the boilings over of the filthy caldron within. Who does not pity the tobacco chewer, the victim of a most debasing and tyrannical habit?

The use of tobacco in any form is exceedingly injurious to the health. It is the opinion of the ablest physicians in the civilized world, that a more deadly poison cannot be infused into the system. Its terrific effects upon life have been shown in hundreds of instances, by experiments on various kinds of animals. A drop of the oil of tobacco, applied to the tongue of a cat or dog, causes immediate death.

Dying at the hands of tobacco! Strange that men will take the same means to kill themselves, that they do to destroy the vermin on their flocks and herds. The prayer of the tobacco user seems to be, "let me die the death of lice and sheep-ticks."

But then, tobacco is used 'as a medicine.'—The same blindness in our physicians, which once supposed ardent spirits necessary, both as a preventive and restorative, led also to the use of tobacco. And what at first was used to allay the distress of tooth-ache, became at length almost necessary to very existence. The father used it to cure his teeth, and the sons to prevent theirs from aching, and and thus they all agreed to eat that which would nauseate a well-bred dog.—Others had 'watery stomachs.' They must use it to induce spitting, that the surplus fluid might be drained off through the mouth. As philosophical as to turn a brook into your cellar to make a drain necessary. This watery stomach malady, like some other troublesome diseases, generally went through the entire family. And it spread from neighborhood, until whole communities of men were converted into boiling springs, the water of which resembled the polluted fountains which supplied the sea of Sodom.

The use of tobacco is a great cause of drunkenness. Its tendency upon the system is to produce a morbid thirst which simple water does not allay, and in time must be treated with some intoxicating drink. We know this from the fact that, go where we will, we shall almost invariably find tobacco in some form or other,—generally in two forms—the everlasting companion of the drunkard."—Mass. Cataract.

Corruptions of Shakerism.

DEAR BROTHER MARSH:—The following statement was made by Bro. James Boggs, about one year ago, and by me at the time reduced to writing, with a view of publishing it, if thought expedient, to advance the cause of truth. Bro. B. was formerly a Presbyterian or Congregational Minister, till he embraced the doctrine of the speedy coming of Christ, when his connection was dissolved; after which time till the winter of 1846, he labored as a Lecturer in Ohio and Pennsylvania, and from the Autumn of 1844, till Feb. 1846, he labored most of the time in Norwalk and vicinity. At the end of which time he measurably embraced the doctrine that the Lord had come, &c. In the spring thereafter, went to Cincinnati accompanied by his wife and four children; while there he visited the Shakers and spent sometime with them (how much I do not remember.)

He said, he "very soon found the glowing accounts of Mr. Jacobs as published in 'The Day Star,' respecting their (the Shakers') piety and Christian graces and virtues, all a fabrication.—That from the best information he could obtain both from acquaintance and inquiry of those who had been for a considerable time with them, and also, from the candid part of the inhabitants residing in the vicinity, he was constrained to say that there was far less of the Christian graces among them than the Catholics. That he found them deceitful, overreaching, and had reason to believe them grossly lascivious. That infidels were held in quite as good reputation amongst them, (provided they conformed to their rules,) as the most devoted Christians.

He also stated, that many honest humble Christians had been induced through Mr. Jacobs' statements to go amongst them, and had spent every thing they possessed in removing themselves and families there, and upon their arrival had found things so entirely different from their expectation that they could not possibly join them, and were thereby brought into circumstances of great destitution, the Shakers declining doing an iota for any one who did not unite. He likewise found that those who had joined them, (that is, Adventists,) very soon lost that sweet communion with and love for the Savior, they previously enjoyed. That it was not possible to enjoy much of the presence of the Lord, while associated with such a people. And he wished to warn all honest hearted friends against giving credence to Mr. Jacobs' statements, and also to keep away from the Shakers, if they desired to glorify God and enjoy his presence and love. He also stated that Mr. Jacobs engaged with them in their dances, their whirlings, their rollings upon the floor &c., and when they receive their showers of love and simplicity,—he with the rest gets down and scopes up hands-full of those graces, and swallows as though he was eating and swallowing something desirable."

I consider Bro. Boggs a man of truth, and fully competent to arrive at correct conclusions from evidences that may have fallen under his observation. He now resides near Marysville, in this State.

NORWALK, O. June 5th, 1847.

The Second Death.

1. Second implies a first. This is too evident to need proof. It is a fact that none will question.

2. It implies an intermission of, or resurrection from the first. A continued state called death, however varied, could not constitute a second. To illustrate: The different dispensations are but further developments of the one great plan of salvation, and cannot be called the first and second plan of salvation, but first and second dispensations of the same plan. So with death, it cannot be called first and second because it is inflicted in different degrees or in different worlds.

3. If the second death means a miserable eternal life in future state, the first death must be a state of misery in the present life. This would force us to the conclusion that, from that state of misery they have been raised, or at least been relieved from it by being rendered unconscious.—Either of which conclusion would be avoided as death itself by those who plead for endless misery.

The first death is brought about by disease, the hand of violence, or the natural dissolution or decay of the human system. The second by having a part in the Lake that burneth with fire and brimstone. This cannot be executed on any until the resurrection at the end of the thousand years, Rev. xx.

I have not made direct appeals to the Bible because it appears to me that every passage has been brought forward that can throw any light on the subject, and many that have no bearing at all. Yet one will I give. Isa. xxvi. 14.—"They are dead (that is the enemies), they shall not live (no not even in eternal anguish), they are deceased, they shall not rise:" (that is from the second death). Paul had the fullest confidence in the resurrection both of the just and the unjust. "Therefore hast thou visited and destroyed them, and made all their memory to perish." Their memory, not our memory of them.

Hence they cannot be the subjects of conscious punishment. Rewards and punishments always suppose a recollection of that for which we are punished: Let God be true, but every man a liar.

DAVID DAVIS.

SPRING MILLS, N. Y. May 30, 1847.

Shaking of the Powers of Heaven—Sign of the Son of Man.

Matt. xxiv. 29. "The powers of the heavens shall be shaken." Mark xiii. 25; Luke xxi. 26; (Camp. trans.) Men "expiring with the fear and apprehension of those things which are coming upon the world; for the powers of heaven shall be shaken; then shall they see the Son of man coming &c." Paralel is Joel iii. 16. "The heavens and the earth shall shake." Hag. ii. 6. "For thus saith the Lord of Hosts, yet once more, it is a little while, and I will shake the heavens and the earth, and the sea, and the dry land." Paul says, Heb. xii. 27, "This word once more signifieth the removing of those things that are shaken." 2d Peter. The heavens shall pass away with a great noise—the heavens being on fire shall be dissolved." Rev. vi. 14. "And the heavens departed as a scroll when it is rolled together; and every mountain and island were moved out of their places."—These things are to occur in the day of the Lord according to 2d Pet. iii. 10. "But the day of the Lord will come as a thief in the night; in the which the heavens shall pass away with a great noise." As those things are not removed yet, nor the day of the Lord come as a thief, of course the shaking of the powers of the heavens is yet future: although but a step ahead and the next event to be witnessed in the chronological order of prophecy.

"Then shall appear the sign of the Son of man in heaven." I understand, that in connection with the shaking of the powers of Heaven, Christ will appear, or be seen (as they are rolled together as a scroll,) sitting at the right hand of the Almighty, and coming on the clouds of heaven, Matt. xxvi. 64; (camp. trans.) Mark xiv. 62. There seems two points, or divisions in these words, 1st. He is seen sitting at the right hand of God. 2d. Then he is seen coming on the clouds. Why is it not said he shall be seen coming only, unless it is that he is first seen as a sign? At last it appears to imply something more than his coming. That must be the time when all the tribes of the earth shall mourn and wail because of him, or as Camp. renders it, "When they shall see the Son of Man coming on the clouds of heaven, with great majesty and power."

One reason why I cannot think there is to be, or has been some remarkable sign aside from the Son of Man, is, that his coming would not be as it was in the days of Noah, viz: some in the field in bed, and in the mill. Another is, the Bible does not tell us what that sign is to be, hence some have supposed one thing, and some another. Now it appears to me it is contrary to analogy of Scripture to tell us of something to come, and then leave us all to conjecture how, where, or what it will be; "Well, suppose we understand the Son of Man will be a sign, is there any Scripture that justifies such a conclusion? and what is he to be a sign, or token of? Turn to Jer. viii. 18. "Behold I and the children whom the Lord hath given me are for signs and wonders in Israel, from the Lord of hosts which dwelleth in Mount Zion. Heb. ii. 12, 13. It is applied to Christ as the one speaking. Also Matt. xii. 39. "Save the sign of the Prophet Jonah."—What was it but Jonah himself, being three days and three nights in the stomach of the great fish? (Camp trans.) So will the Son of Man be seen sitting at the right hand of God, as a sign to those who have not his spirit, his love in the soul, that the harvest is past, the summer is ended and they are not saved. Mercy with them be clean gone forever!

Some have spiritualized away his coming personally: some have denied his existence, others have put far away his coming, scoffingly asked, "where is the promise of his coming?" But when the heavens and earth shall be shaking, the heavens departing as a scroll, opening to their affrighted vision the Son of Man, this same Jesus—coming on the clouds of heaven with great power and glory, then they will raise that mighty wail, with all the kindreds of the earth because of him. But those who love and wait for his appearing, then will say, "Lo, this our God we have waited for him, we will be glad and rejoice in his salvation." My desire is that I with all of the saints may be kept by the power of God through faith unto salvation. My soul says, "let thy kingdom come"—and Lord Jesus come quickly. Amen. STEPHEN E. MABEY.

CLARKSON, May 8th, 1847.

LETTER FROM BRO. P. ALLING.

NORWALK, O. May 12th, 1847.

DEAR BRO. MARSH—I am sorry you can not find time to give us an exposition of the 13th of Rev. This subject continues to rest with weight upon my mind, and I feel a great solicitude to understand fully what is meant by the beast, the image, &c. I think if brethren could see and keep the following distinctions in their minds, the principal obstacles to arriving at a correct conclusion of the matter would be removed &c.—That the head mentioned in verse 3, denotes imperial Rome. The deadly wound was made when imperial power was taken away to make room for the papal or 42 month beast. The healing under the 2 horned beast in verse 12th, is the resting of the imperial or absolute power of the head in verse 3. Verse 3 and 12, go together. The killing by the sword and living again as mentioned in verse 10 and last clause of verse 14, applies to the papacy, consequently verse 10 and 14 denote a different power and must be kept distinct from verse 3 and 12. Also that the two horned beast is a separate power from the image. The former denotes the secular, which causes the dwellers upon earth to make the latter, i. e. an image to the beast that had the wound by the sword, viz to the papacy.

The republishing of your article upon the Sabbath was to myself and wife, and many others truly meat in due season. From the light we had prior to that time, we felt it our duty to observe the 7th day, but are now satisfied that the 1st day is the proper day to be observed. My faith continues firm that deliverance is at hand. Praise the Lord for the hope.

Affectionately your brother in Christ.

P. ALLING.

P. S. I send you the following extract taken from the N. Y. Observer of the 15th inst., which is copied by that paper from the Washington Union, and is an extract from a European correspondent. Says the writer in speaking of the probability of an alliance between the Pope and the Grand Turk, "The measure has been repeatedly entertained, but was never placed on so secure a basis as at present, when the effect produced by Magnetic Telegraph and Rail Roads and Steam Power is penetrating and astonishing the most benighted regions. I saw it beautifully stated in an English paper at the Casino yesterday, (March 29th 1847,) that Franklin drew the lightning down from the clouds, but Morse gave it voice and bade it go forth and speak to every nation and kindred and tongue. It is the Voice under the superintendence of Him who never acts, but in wisdom which is to enter the darkest recesses of the heathen heart, and teach it how degradingly it contrasts with the genius which gave it utterance."

From the foregoing and other evidences that might be adduced, we see I think a fulfilment of verses 13 and 14 of the 13 chapter of Rev. Are not these the signs or wonders, by which the dwellers upon earth are, and were to be deceived? Look at it carefully. Yours. P. A.

ROCHESTER, JUNE 23, 1847.

Advent Harbinger.

This will be the title of our sheet hereafter. Reasons for the change will be given under the new title.

We really want our dues, or a part of them, for present use: we are indebted for paper, and desire to pay for it immediately. Do not delay in sending the necessary means to meet our urgent calls at this time.

We kindly solicit our worthy correspondents to resume their pens again, on all or any of the sanctifying, strengthening and soul-reviving subjects which pertain to 'the blessed hope, namely the appearing of the glory of the Great God, and our Savior Jesus Christ.' There has been rather a lack in this respect, for a short time past. A full supply of good original matter, on different subjects, constantly on hand, is indispensable in making a religious paper what it should be at this day and age of the world. Come then, you who have a talent to write: give us a 'portion of meat in due season,' that the board may be filled with a rich variety of heavenly bread and the water of life, for the hungry household of faith.

A True Test.

The numerous sects have their different rules by which they test, or pretend to test, the christian character of those whom they receive into their communion. Some are required to subscribe to a few abstract propositions, drawn up in the form of a creed, covenant, discipline, or articles of faith. Others must tell a good 'experience,' and be immersed—of others, a christian experience only is demanded, and with others christian character will answer.—Now there may be some very good things presented in these and other tests which have existed and now exist, but that they are all more or less defective we have not a doubt: for a person may subscribe to the whole creed, tell a very good experience, be baptized, and bear many of the external marks of a Christian, and still be deficient in a very essential pre-requisite of such a character: he may not love the appearing of Christ.

We would not present any abstract text or principle of the Bible as an exclusive test of christian character: the Bible, the whole Bible must fully decide that important point. Still there are fundamental principles taught in that Book by which we may very well if not infallibly determine whether a person is a child of God or not; and one of these principles is love for the appearing of Christ. No one destitute of this principle can be a Christian: for if he loves and obeys Christ, he will most certainly love his appearing.

The angels were actuated by a strong love for the appearing of Christ, when they 'desired to look into the glory of his coming and kingdom. The same principle caused Abraham to look for the heavenly city and better country. The same may be said of the holy men of old, who, by the spirit of inspiration, testified about the time and manner of time of the first and second advents of Christ. The primitive saints were comforted in the blessed hope of the glorious appearing of their adored Lord. Peter desired and hastened unto the day of God; Jude looked for the mercy of the Lord; Paul loved the appearing of Christ; John prayed 'Come, Lord Jesus,' and James waited patiently for the glorious answer to this every Christian's prayer.

Do you thus look, haste, desire, pray and wait, and do you thus love the appearing of Christ? If not, then all is not right with you; but if you do, then all is well: you are a child of the Lord, and ready to meet him at his coming. Each one may test him or herself by this principle, which we seriously recommend all to do, impartially, without delay: for soon it will be forever too late: the Lord is at hand.

Oh, how many professed Christians would not stand this simple test. Weigh them in this balance of the sanctuary and they would be found most fearfully wanting. They have so much love for the world, are so sinful, unholy and unprepared in nearly every necessary qualification to meet their Lord, that they cannot bear to hear anything about his coming yet, or in their day. The Time of his coming, especially if it brings that event very near, is unpleasant to them. In a word, instead of loving, they in reality hate the appearing of their Lord!—Miserable creatures! we pity them most sincerely. May they see their wretched condition, speedily and effectually seek the love and favor of their Lord, that they may truly love his appearing, and with his tried waiting children, now look up, and lift up their heads, under the joyful assurance that their eternal redemption is nigh.

Great Apostasy.

NUMBER VI.

The practice of the church. In resuming this subject we say, the practice of the church in forming separate organizations, for moral, benevolent, and religious purposes, is without a divine warrant. We do not say that it is unscriptural for missionaries, evangelists, or ministers of the gospel to go into all the world, and preach the gospel to every creature—nor that it is wrong to distribute the Bible throughout the world—neither that it is not right to do all we can to make men temperate, moral, abolitionists, and lovers of every good doctrine and practice—These and all good things the Bible enforces. But we are opposed to the church forming separate societies in order to carry forward the good work taught by these different moral and benevolent principles: for such organizations were unknown in apostolical times. They are entirely superfluous things: for all the good they can possibly do, can be done by the church, without the aid of such human appendages. And besides, their evil tendency we conceive to be very great: for they are calculated to destroy confidence in the sufficiency and perfection of the scriptures as a guide in matters pertaining to the practice or work of the church. And further, the principle that justifies such organizations, opens the door for the church to form as many societies as there are abstract principles of the gospel.

In these things the apostasy of the church has been fearfully great. She has been dissatisfied to act in the humble capacity prescribed by her Lord. The great and glorious works of love and benevolence which she should have cheerfully done, as her Lord has directed, she could not perform without the noise, parade and worldly show, of a Missionary Society, home and foreign—a Bible Society—a Tract Society—Moral Reform Society—Anti-slavery and Temperance Societies—Sunday School Unions—Evangelical Alliance—and so down to the end of the category. These societies have had to create their Presidents, Secretaries, Treasurers, Board of Directors, Executive Committees, &c., &c., with other necessary appendages to keep the human machinery in motion. Money from small sums up to thousands of dollars have been freely given, begged, persuaded, bequeathed, urged, and forced into the treasuries of these societies, to create, if possible, a permanent fund ('to lay up treasure on earth!'), in order to make the cause respectable in the eyes of the world, and to meet the necessary expenses in carrying out the objects of the fraternity. In a word, the church and the world, in these last days especially, to a great extent, do business on the same principle, viz: by incorporated bodies, or monopolies, and on the principle of receiving in dollars and cents, an equivalent for what is done. And each must have good security for their services before doing the work.

These mammoth societies may have done much good, but all, and we think much more good than they have performed, might have been wrought by the church in another way, viz; by a strict adherence to the simplicity of the gospel; and then these popular combinations would not have existed, as they now do, to oppose the doctrine of the near and pre-millennial advent of Christ, and to hold out the delusive hope that through their potent influence the millennium is soon to be ushered in! Alas! how sad have been the consequences of this step in the great apostasy. The Lord save us, as a people, from imitating the fatal example, and enable us to do the work of his bidding in the manner he has prescribed in his word, viz; to go forth to the work necessary to be done, when and where duty may call, trusting in God for the necessary means to carry it forward.—'Go ye into all the world and preach the gospel to every creature, and lo, I am with you always, even to the end-of-the-world.' is as true now as when uttered by the blessed Savior. And to realize its strict fulfilment, as did the apostolical ministry, and as we did at the commencement of the advent cause, we must have the faith and works which they and we had; then we shall lack nothing needful for the furtherance of the good work of our calling.

22. Their places of worship. In but few things of the present age is the folly, pride, sin and extravagance of man more strikingly exhibited than in church building: the sects seem to vie with each other in this respect. Thousands on thousands of dollars are lavished on the so called churches (meeting houses) of these degenerate times, and for no other object than for an outward show: to please the eye of the world. Instead of erecting suitable houses for the accommodation of the poor as well as the rich, the latter, with few exceptions, are only provided for, especially in our cities and large towns. The leading object of church building, in these days, appears to be to provide for the rich, or those who are able to purchase a seat, or 'a good place,' while the poor are turned away, or told, as James says, to 'stand there, or, sit here under their footstool.'

We pretend not to say that the New Testament gives the specific or any general rule to be observed by the church in building or providing a place for worship, but we do most solemnly aver that it does prohibit extravagances in everything; and if the sects have not been guilty of this sin, in erecting very many of their houses of worship, then we know not how that sin can be committed. Hence the apostasy in this case has been very great. Our Lord and King had his birth in a manger, and during his ministry had not where to lay his head. He taught or worshipped on the green grass, by the sea-side, in private dwellings, in the synagogues, and in the open air. The apostles imitated their Lord, and the primitive saints to the days of Constantine, did not depart from these examples. How wide the contrast between them and the sects of these apostate times!

23. Worship of the church. With few exceptions the worship of the church consists in the strict observance of certain arbitrary rules, adopted by common consent, to regulate the singing, praying, exhortations—and entire worship of the church. The preaching consists in an oration on an abstract word, sentence, or verse of the scriptures, without giving the meaning of the context, or shedding any light upon the inspired word: it is any thing but apostolical preaching or teaching, viz; expounding the Word. The praying, especially in the pulpit, is generally studied, cold and mechanical, and evidently designed to be heard of men, more than to please God: it is not with the 'spirit and understanding.'—The singing is vocal and instrumental, and with scarcely an exception, the unregenerate, either wholly or in part, perform this part of the worship of the church. And who will say that such worldly, mechanical and hypocritical performances are according to the order of the New Testament? no one acquainted with that perfect Book: for it tells us that 'the true worshippers shall worship the Father in spirit and in truth: for the Father seeketh such to worship him,' and 'I will pray with the spirit, and with the understanding also: I will sing with the spirit and understanding also.'

The apostacy in this case must be apparent to every lover of the Bible, for he must clearly see that the true worship of God has been exchanged by the church for cold and spiritless prayers, dry mechanical sermons, and hypocritical singing; with no hope of the primitive worship ever being again restored to her temples. There may be exceptions, but they are few. These things are true, to the spirit and letter, of the great body of the sects, as all very well know. And if the church had departed from the truth in no other case than the worship of God, her apostacy would be most fearful, and of a character peculiarly calculated to incur the high displeasure of an insulted God. O let us, who expect soon to appear before him, see that our worship is strictly in accordance with his word: "in spirit and in truth."

A Word of Exhortation.

"Exhort one another, and so much the more as you see the day approaching."

If ever it was duty for Christians to heed this command, it is now: for the day, the great day of the Lord is rapidly approaching—it hasteth greatly; and the watchful child of God sees its approach, with a certainty that will admit of no doubt. The fulfilment of historical and chronological prophecy, the signs in the heavens above and the earth beneath—the terrible famine; the dreadful pestilence; the fearful storm; and mighty earthquakes, and many other evidences, all, all, in clear and trumpet tones proclaim the day of the Lord near. And in view of its sure approach, the dreadful judgments which it will bring upon all the ungodly, and the exceeding great and transcendantly glorious rewards, that it will bring to all the righteous, we do most seriously and urgently exhort all to 'take heed lest, at any time, your hearts be overcharged with surfeiting and drunkenness, and cares of this life, and so that day come upon you unawares: for as a snare shall it come on all them who dwell upon the face of the whole earth. Watch ye therefore, and pray always, that ye may be accounted worthy to escape all these things that shall come to pass, and to stand before the Son of man.'

In view of these things—and also in view of the wicked moral influences that surround us, the numerous temptations to unbelief and sin on every hand—and the chill of spiritual death that has come over the church, we not only exhort the waiting saints to faithfulness, and steadfastness in the faith, but we exhort them to exhort one another, and so much the more as the perils of the way increase, and you see the day approaching. Do not neglect these things at this momentous hour—shake off the slumbers of death, that seem insensibly to be stealing over many, by fervent and incessant prayer, diligent and prayerful study of your too much neglected, but precious Bible; by assembling more frequently, with those of like precious faith, and when assembled be sure and do your duty cheerfully and fully, in prayer and exhortation. Let the benevolence of your soul be moved at the wants of the poor, the minister who labors for your spiritual good, and for the aid of the good cause abroad—see that you die daily to sin—that your words, thoughts, acts, appetites, passions and desires are all brought and kept in full subjection to the will of Christ.—If you faithfully observe these things, your faith will grow exceedingly, your hope will become as an anchor to the soul, and will reach within the veil—your joy will be constant, like a river, and full of glory; and as a matter of course, you will be accounted worthy to escape the dreadful judgments that will soon fall upon the ungodly, and be fully qualified to stand acquitted, in immortal life and unclouded glory before the Son of man at his appearing.

Questions and Answers.

We do not object to our correspondents asking questions, but we had much rather they would correctly answer a thousand that we could ask but can not answer, than to answer one of the many difficult ones, which we may be requested to answer; for all very well know that it is much easier to ask than to answer difficult questions. We seldom turn aside from other duties to attend to such things, neither do we feel under any obligation to suffer a reply or a controversy to grow out of any answer we may give. If our answer does not suit the one for whom it is specially designed, why, he must give a better one, or seek some other person who can. With these preliminaries, we will proceed to dispose of the questions which have for some time been accumulating on our hands.

1. Br. R. R. Y.'s several questions are important, yet they have in part been fully answered in some previous numbers of the Voice, in our review of Sister Clemon's views on the first resurrection. Those relating to other subjects, we may notice at another time, when we can do better justice to the questions than we now can.

2. Another brother enquires,

"1st. What are the duties of deacons?"

"2d. Is it their privilege to administer the ordinances of baptism and the Lord's Supper?"

"3d. Are the offices of elder and bishop the same? An answer to the above queries will gratify many."

We kindly solicit Br. E. R. Pinney to answer these important questions. We think his mind is informed on the same.

3. Another brother asks,

Is the 6000 years theory correct? or is it not? If the theory is correct, that the six working days are a sign of 6000 years of probation, and the seventh or Sabbath a sign of "the rest that remains for the people of God!" how can we reconcile the practice of keeping the first day of the week as a sign of the seventh thousand years?

2d. If the theory is not correct, please point out its defects.

T. M. PREBLE.

The 6000 years theory we consider correct: also that the seventh day was kept by the Jews, a typical people, as a type of the seventh thousand years, or millennium of rest which awaits the people of God. That type, with all others under the law, was to be observed so long as the typical people existed whose duty it was to keep the Mosaic law. When that law of types ended, the typical people ceased, and of course the types were no longer to be observed. You correctly call the seventh day a sign or TYPE. Are the Gentile Christians a typical people, or are they required to keep the law of types? Certainly not, then they are not required to keep the seventh day, or typical Sabbath.

We do not keep the first day as a type of the promised rest; neither do the Scriptures require us to keep it or any other day for that purpose; but we think we are justified by Scripture and the best church history in observing the first day of the week as a day of worship, and to "eat the Lord's Supper" to "show forth the Lord's death until he come." See proof in our remarks on the Sabbath, in Voice of Truth, vol. 14, no. 5.

More next week.

☞ We call special attention to Br. Armstrong's letter in this number. Who will respond to the urgent call it makes, and go to the far west to preach the glad tidings of the kingdom at hand? And who will aid in the expenses of such a work? Let him whose duty it is to do either, not delay—for the work is important, and what we do must be done quickly: for the end of all things is at hand. Donations to aid those who are spreading the cause in the west, or other destitute places, may be forwarded to this office, or to the office of the Advent Herald, Boston, Mass., and the same will be appropriated as the donors may direct, or when no direction is given, as those may think most advisable, into whose hands the offering is committed.

☞ Bro. D. I. Robinson is faithfully laboring in this city. The church and Sabbath school under his care, are in a prosperous condition.

☞ Bro. P. A. Smith, of this city, has been laboring in the good cause a few miles west with success. We understand that a number have embraced the faith, and that others are waked up to a consideration of the important subjects presented before them. May fruit unto eternal life be the happy result of this enquiry among the people.

CORRESPONDENCE.

LETTER FROM BRO. L. ARMSTRONG.

MILWAUKEE, Mich. May 21th 1847.

DEAR BRO. MARSH—The interest of the cause of Truth, in this section of the country, induces me to address a few lines to you, asking your advice and co-operation in any special effort which you and the friends (who feel an interest for the spread of the truth in the west relative to the speedy coming of Christ,) may deem advisable. I believe Bro. Chandler and others have written to you upon the subject, but I am not aware as yet that the call has met with a suitable response. There is a large and interesting field of labor in this Territory, and there appears an anxious desire manifested by many to hear upon the subject, and many open doors have been found where much good might be done, if some faithful and intelligent brethren, capable of presenting the subject in a proper manner, and in a becoming Christian Spirit, would only come and occupy them. The lecturing brethren who are already here, are as far as I know doing what they can to supply the calls to hear upon the subject.—Bro. Chandler, Bro. Daniels, Bro. Sherwin, Bro. Hitchcock, and Sister Parks are about the only ones who have labored in this Territory to any great extent. Bro. Daniels and Bro. Sherwin are both young brethren who have lectured but a short time, and whose knowledge of, and ability to present the subject before the people as it fully ought to be as we would naturally expect limited, they nevertheless have done well, and their labors appear to be owned and blessed of God. Bro. Daniels has gone to St. Louis to lecture, and our Sister Parks is laid aside from labor, for the present at least, if not altogether; by reason of an affection of her lungs, brought on by constant and unceasing labor in the cause. From present appearances, I hardly think she will ever be able to resume her labors. But while she feels grieved to think that she is unable to respond to the many calls and invitations for her to lecture for the present, it is no doubt a source of consolation to her that her former labor in the cause has not been in vain in the Lord.

Meeting houses belonging to different denominations have been freely opened to her and the lecturing brethren, in many places. At one time Sister Parks delivered a course of lectures at the Methodist Institution for educating young men for the ministry. There were several ministers present, besides most of the Students, some embraced the truth, and a disposition seemed manifested by many to search the Scriptures to see whether these things were so.

It does seem to me that if some of our able and experienced brethren at the East would come, who are preachers of the Gospel, and sound in the truth, and withal men possessing the spirit of the Savior, (which is very foreign to the denunciatory spirit as manifested by not a few in times past among us,) I think many would receive the truth. More may be won over to the truth by love than can be driven into it by a harsh, censorious and denunciatory spirit. I accuse not any one particular brother of possessing this spirit, for I feel it a failing we all have, I fear, more or less imbibed, as we have seen the truth rejected and scoffed at by those from whom we expected better things.

The brethren, so far as I have heard from them, seem desirous that Bro. Pearson should come, and Bro. Robinson, or any other brethren whom you and the brethren may think the most proper persons. We hope that the brethren at the east, will as far as consistent, help these lecturing brethren on their way, and we will do what we can when they arrive here, in assisting them. The brethren here have done what they could for the cause, and at present are not able to do much, but we feel I trust that we are God's Stewards, and what we have to give shall be freely laid upon the altar.

O that all who profess to love the Lord and are looking for his speedy coming, might examine themselves as to whether they have consecrated themselves, together with all they have, to God and to the spread of his truth, in view of the account they will soon have to render to the returning Husbandman. Have we not reason to fear that many (Ananias and Saphira like,) have kept back at least a part of the price? My prayer is, Lord search us and help us to search and try ourselves by that unerring standard of truth (the Bible,) with reference to this matter.—We hope the lecturing brethren who come will bring as many books as they conveniently can of the most appropriate character, as there is a great many calls in the country, especially, for papers and books upon the subject.

A word with regard to the Voice of Truth.—We take great pleasure, dear brother, in the weekly perusal of your truly valuable paper, and we are desirous that it should continue to be sustained by the brethren and friends of the cause. We hope that yourself as well as your correspondents will continue to feed the household of faith with the bread of life, which is the word of God. Let it not be the medium of scattering fanciful interpretations of the Scripture. Let us learn experience from the past, and advance nothing but what is based upon the immutable word of God. May God direct and aid you in the faithful discharge of your responsible duty, is the prayer of your brother in the faith and hope of the Gospel.

LUZERNE ARMSTRONG.

P. S. The brethren here are so situated that they would be unable to accommodate lecturing brethren who come with their family; we are sorry that it is so, but it cannot be helped. Let those who come, make their calculations accordingly.

LETTER FROM BRO. ST. JOHN.

NEW YORK, May 19, 1847.

BRO. MARSH—I am still looking for that blessed hope, the "glorious appearing," and expect it will be realized to all the "Israel of God" before the end of the present year: indeed I do not now understand why the saints (both the living and the dead) have not before this taken the kingdom, in fulfilment of the promise made to David, why all the people of God have not experienced "THE GRACE" that is to be brought unto them at the appearing of the Lord Jesus Christ, who is to change these vile bodies and fashion them like unto the glorious body of our risen Lord and Savior, I know not; for the periods seem to me to be up, the prophetic numbers full, and a period has now arrived when we may confidently expect soon to hear the voice of that mighty angel, who is to stand one foot on sea and the other on land, and with hands uplifted to heaven, swear by him who liveth for ever and ever, "there shall be time no longer."

But though I have no longer any data beyond this year to which to look for the accomplishment of the exceeding great and precious promise, even ETERNAL LIFE, when this corruptible shall put on incorruption, this mortal immortality, when death itself shall be swallowed up of LIFE; yet I have the most unwavering faith and trust in the Bible as the word of God, and most fully believe that not one single iota of all that is promised will ever fail of its accomplishment, and at the time appointed, for God hath appointed a day in the which he will judge the world by that man (the man Christ Jesus) whom he hath ordained.

My hopes all centre in the resurrection to Eternal Life; and until that event transpires, the saints can not inherit the promises, but must continue subject to the sway and power of death.

Yours in the patience of hope.

B. G. Sr. JOHN.

LETTER FROM BRO. B. MORLEY.

ARRON, O. June 11th, 1847.

DEAR BRO. MARSH—I spent the last Sunday in May with the Brethren in Norwalk, O., where I met Bro. E. Miller, from York, Medina Co.—I think I never attempted to preach when I had so little bodily strength, yet the Lord seemed, in some degree, to own the effort. The brethren and sisters were comforted and blessed under the "foolishness of preaching." Some of them came fifteen miles to the meeting. The "Lord's Supper" was observed. Bro. Miller preached in the evening, but I was unable to attend. He was to preach for them again in two weeks.—Several who have been spiritualizers are now on good ground, their hearts seem to overflow with gratitude to God, that he kept them from going any farther into error, and that he has at last shown them their great mistake. I think kindness is much more likely to affect that class of erring brethren favorably, than severity. They are constantly on the look out for a bad spirit;—and if a person has the appearance of evil only, he can do them no good.

I was much pleased and blessed in the interview I had with Bro. and Sister Alling, and her mother and grand-mother. They all seem to be living to God. May the Lord cause their faith and love to abound yet more and more.

O, it is refreshing to the way worn pilgrims' soul, to find here and there a kindred spirit.—Some who possess that "Charity" which "seeketh not her own." A great blessing is in reserve for all such. Our King will say to them "Come ye Blessed of my Father inherit the kingdom—inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these my brethren, ye have done it unto me."

Returning from Norwalk to this place, I called on Bro. Howe in Clarksfield, where there are a few others still looking for the Lord. In company with Bro. Howe, I called at the house of the Congregational minister (a graduate from Oberlin) but did not find him at home. We had conversation with his wife and found that she was tolerably well informed as to our views of the Advent, and not a believer in the "Spiritual Millennium." Bro. Todd is considered an intelligent, honest minister and a devoted Christian.—I requested the brethren there to furnish him with Beecher's letters on the "pre-millennial Advent," which they agreed to do. I think he will not reject the doctrine they teach.

At Wellington, I found an advent brother and sister by the name of Couch. This place is only eight miles from Oberlin, and I should think was almost entirely under that influence. President Mahan preached there the Sunday before. Bro. Couch is a young man, but was converted from infidelity by the Advent doctrine. I hear of several other similar cases in that region. One of them while reading Bro. Miller's lectures, used to say to Christians, "If your book (the Bible) is true, the Lord is near at hand."

At York, I called on Bro. E. Miller's aged parents. They seem to love the Lord, and desire his coming. I should have preached at these places, but I was not able. My health is now improving. I hope to meet all my appointments. Next Sunday I am to preach at Mogadore, seven miles from here, and Sunday after at Cleveland. I preached at the former place several weeks ago to a large congregation. We had the "Disciple's" house; We are to have the same house next Sunday.

There is room for doing a great deal of good in Ohio by preaching the Advent Doctrine.—The door of "access" is not shut even here.—May the Lord direct those who lay plans for missionary labor.

There are large villages and thickly settled places where very little is known concerning our blessed hope. Such places should receive attention if any thing can be done. I shall try to do all I can, but some one must labor to keep alive the things which remain.

Your remarks on "Perilous Times" in No. 11, are timely and important. There is our great danger at the present time, of losing the power of religion—losing the rejoicing of the hope, and finally losing the Crown of glory.

Will the Lord have mercy upon us, for his great name's sake.

BUTLER MORLEY.

LETTER FROM SISTER SEYMOUR.

LAPORTE, Ia., June 3d, 1847.

DEAR BRO. MARSH,—I have often thought of writing a few words of comfort to the dearly beloved ones at the east, but have as frequently concluded to delay until now, as we are returning to Michigan from a journey of 800 miles through northern Ind., Ill., and as far into W. T. as Milwaukee. Perhaps an abridged account of the cause this way might be interesting to those who love as brethren. We held nine meetings in M., found some precious souls here who love the second appearing as well as the first, and as we know the word to be true which says, "The Lord loveth a cheerful giver," we are confident he must these children, who not only feast on truth, but delight to sustain it. Brethren Hitchcock, Daniels, Sherwin, (and Hall, lately converted from Universalism to the truth) and Sister Parks, devote about all their time to the cause which to us is so precious. Br. Chandler's labours have been mostly confined to the Sabbath. We lectured in eight places in the Territory, and found it very common for people to beg for a few crumbs of truth, and many invitations pressed us which we could not supply, because we could occupy only one place at once. A number of the brethren said one dozen faithful laborers would find employment enough, and be sustained in this western field. They need more faithful servants whose hearts, heads and hands are immersed in the glorious work. Br. Virgin, of Rock Prairie, said he was willing, or would board a faithful brother and his horse one year. The brethren here and some other places, have been sorely tried. The Lord help that thy precious cause be no more injured, and the lambs of thy flock no longer scattered.

Leaving the Territory, we went to Winnebago co., Ill., where the Lord made use of Br. Hitchcock early in the spring time, to tell the people to break up their fallow ground, he mean while sowing the good seed, showing the harvest was speedily coming; and we found that the seed had not only sprung up, but the fruit was actually almost ripe. Oh! blessed Jesus keep thine arms around this little loving band of babes of this until thou shalt come to be glorified in them. O! if the anticipation of home is so sweet here while with his loving disciples, what will it be when all, all of Father's children are with their Redeemer and made like him.

From this place we went through McHenry to Woodstock, where we found Br. and Sister B. Carter, formerly from Mendon, N. Y. They have not heard a lecture since they came west two years since. Their hearts are warm, and could they have a pittance of the privileges which some enjoy, it would be like apples of gold in pictures of silver. Next day took dinner with Elder Sears and family. They have had much of the western sickness, but are looking for life and immortality speedily.

I am sorry the Voice is not better sustained: there are so many poor that want to read, but have not the means. I am afraid that some professed adventists love the world better than Jesus, and will be found with their treasures hoarded up instead of being spent in publishing the truth of the Lord's speedy coming. As for the churches, their lights are almost obliterated for want of oil, yet they say, "is not the Lord among us?" The ministers are so dull, the most of them, that they can hardly bark, except it be at something they call Millerism, then they are ready to growl, and not only beat the men-servants but the maidens also.

They charge us with ignorance, foolishness, infidelity, and puerility, but none of these things move us; for we have long since learned that no bible argument could be brought to even fracture the position on which we stand. So, friends or foes, sink or swim, scolding or applause, we mean by grace divine, to obtain the blessing promised to those who are watching and giving meat in due season. While the enemies of our blessed hope have not light enough to discern the signs of this time, which it seems the blind might see, we have not only the cloud by day, but the pillar of fire by night; its rays are very effulgent now, and they cannot be put out: they all seem to point to the true '47 for the time when will come the glory, immortality, the tree, the river, the crown of life, the Bible Millennium, not over the blood and bones of fifty millions of martyrs, but they all will be there. Ride on, Jesus, O ride on, and take thy waiting people home.

MARY A. SEYMOUR.

LETTER FROM SISTER B. NEWTON.

HOLDEN, MASS. APRIL 25th, 1847.

DEAR BRO. MARSH—We receive the Voice of Truth from week to week and love to hear from the dear brethren and sisters scattered abroad. It does us good to hear of their strong and unwavering faith in God, and in the speedy coming and kingdom of his dear Son. Praise God, he is still converting sinners from the error of their ways, as we read in your paper. There have also been a few converted in this town in a few months past, we believe, but oh how changed the scene since 1843; then the preaching of the coming of the Lord shook as it were, the town; many were converted, and many more convicted, but how few there appears to be now, who are looking for the speedy coming of our blessed Lord, or loving it. It is truly painful to see the pride, covetousness, and worldly mindedness of professors of the religion of the meek and lowly Jesus. Oh that they would turn from their wicked ways speedily before the Lord shall come, when it will be forever too late; for he will reward every man according to his works.

We were edified and comforted by reading on the time of the second advent as recently published in the Voice. Thank the Lord, he always provides in every emergency, that our faith fail not. We have great need of trusting in God with our whole heart, that we may be kept thro' the perils of these last days. See 2d Tim. iii. 1, 6. We believe the evidence increases greatly, that the end of all earthly things is at hand.—How solemn is the position we occupy, and yet how glorious the prospect that so soon all the saints will take the kingdom and possess it forever even for ever and ever. Amen. Even so, come Lord Jesus. My heart rejoices in view of it while I am writing. God grant that all who love his holy name may be careful to depart from all iniquity, and that we may realize that we are standing on holy ground. I do pray that we may have clean hands and a pure heart, and that we may humble ourselves greatly before the Lord who will exalt us in due season if we faint not.

There are a few here who meet weekly, and exhort one another, but I fear some of us are not so strong in the Lord and the power of his might, as we ought to be. We have had severe trials to pass through, but I trust the Lord will bring his own off conquerors through Christ who hath loved us, and given himself for us.

I feel interested in the West India Mission.—I thank the Lord that those who have so lately been delivered from the iron yoke of Slavery, now have the gospel of the kingdom preached to them, and they are taking heed to it. Blessed be God, he is warning this world by mercies and by judgments, that he is speedily coming to reward every man as his work shall be. I hope we shall not stop to praise each other by the way, but give all the glory to God now and evermore. Amen.

Yours, looking for, and hasting to the coming of the day of God. BETSEY NEWTON.

LETTER FROM BRO. N. A. HITCHCOCK.

AZTALON, WIS. T. MAY 29, 1847.

DEAR BRO. MARSH—The Lord will provide. His purposes ripen fast, unfolding every hour.

I have travelled considerable during the few months past, but have been subject to trial and inconvenience in consequence of being obliged to travel in the Stage, and on foot, not having a conveyance of my own, but the Lord by his providence has not only provided a conveyance for the present, but has raised up a young man from the labyrinth of Sin and Universalism, to see and feel the power of his truth, to travel and labor with me in the glorious work of sounding the "alarm." Gal. ii. 1; Rev. xiv. 6. On the 6th of May we started from Summit;—that evening, set forth our hope before a small congregation collected in a private house in the town of Warren. Here are a few believers in the speedy coming of the Lord. Friday evening, May 7th, attended a meeting with a few, who love the coming of the Lord, 6 miles west of Milwaukee. Here are a small number of brethren, who I trust will "endure unto the end," even amidst all the trials that thron the present path which we are called to travel. In the after part of the day Bro. Hall, (the brother referred to above,) gave a short but interesting account of his recent experience; then presented his present hope, and the reasons for it, before a large congregation, and in the place of his former labors as a school teacher, in the vicinity of Milwaukee.

From this place we started to attend the two day's meeting appointed to be held in the State of Illinois. On our way we stopped at Johnstown. Things here have been in a better state than at present. I do hope the cause of the evil existing may be removed and prosperity again be witnessed. Here are at present only two or three who can do for the cause; these few have done and are still willing to do all in their power;—they seem willing to show their faith by their works. This should be understood in its true light: I think the cause of truth demanded that I should speak thus far, with reference to the state of things in that place. From this point we passed on to the place of meeting in Ill. Here we met with Bro. and Sister Seymour, who assisted in the labors of the meeting; there is much interest felt here on the subject of the coming of the Lord, and a preparation for this momentous event. On Sunday it was thought only about half of the people could get into the house, still they crowded around the outside of the house and listened with attention. Several manifested deep and heartfelt penitence; as many as two or three "believed with all their hearts," Acts, viii. 37, and three obeyed the Lord in baptism.

In returning from the State we took a circuitous route through the middle of the Territories, and preached the coming of the Lord in several places where the people had not heard before, still we found a few who had heard, and had partially investigated this important subject. It seems very clear that our work is about done.—I can not see the least possible evidence that the coming of the Lord will not take place this year. Indeed the evidence is abundant that it will, there is safety only in being ready every moment.

Still looking for the Lord.

N. A. HITCHCOCK.

PORTHOPE, C. W. May 20th, 1847.

DEAR BRO. MARSH—I feel very much satisfied with your explanation of the prophetic numbers, and it gives comfort to all the friends that I have conversed with. A statement was made in the Voice of Truth by Bro. Wm. Deveril, that I had gone back on time. If you please you can inform the friends that I believe in time, as much as Bro. Miller or Bro. Marsh. I met Bro. Deveril in Toronto, and he informed me that he had written to the friends at New London, to inform them that I was still in the faith. For the information of our brethren generally, please say, that I never was stronger in the faith of soon seeing the King in his Beauty than now.

Your Brother in hope of soon seeing our Lord. DANIEL CAMPBELL.

LAGONA, N. Y. May 25, 1847.

We have good meetings and an increasing interest in our ranks. One of late has embraced the truth, and is now rejoicing in hope of soon seeing Jesus. We take courage and thank God. Peace, love, and union pervade our ranks; but yet we sigh for home, sweet home.

Newspaper Postage.

Important Violation of the Law by the Postmaster General.—Being sure that the Postmaster General was violating the Post Office Law in the instructions he had given to his subordinates, we have awaited with some anxiety the official publication of the Laws of the United States. The pamphlet came to hand yesterday: and we take this, the first opportunity, therefore, to show what the law is in the matter of newspaper postage, and to advise the public no longer to submit to an imposition. That part of the new Post Office Law which relates to newspapers is officially published, as follows, punctuatum et literatim:

Section 13. And be it further enacted, that it shall not be lawful to deposit in any post office, to be conveyed in the mail, two or more letters directed to different persons enclosed in the same envelope or packet; and every person so offending shall forfeit the sum of ten dollars, to be recovered by action qui tam, one half for the use of the informer, and the other half for the use of the Post Office Department: Provided, that this prohibition shall not apply to any letter or packet directed to any foreign country; and all newspapers conveyed in the mail shall be subject to postage, except those sent by way of exchange between the publishers of newspapers, and except those franked by persons enjoying the franking privilege, and newspapers not sent from the office of publication; and all handbills or circulars printed or lithographed, not exceeding one sheet, shall be subject to three cents postage, each, except those franked by persons enjoying the franking privilege, and newspapers not sent from the office of publication; and all handbills or circulars printed or lithographed, not exceeding one sheet, shall be subject to three cents postage, each, to be paid when deposited in any post office to be conveyed in the mail.

This is the official law, published by authority, with the punctuation preserved in every respect. It will be seen, it enacts that all newspapers are free except those sent from the office of publication; that in no case can pre-payment be demanded except for circulars and handbills as are composed of one sheet each.

This law, as we have mentioned, has just been published. To show to what extent the Postmaster General has carried his outrageous violations of this law, before its publication, we copy the following from his circular of instructions issued on the 13th of March, four days after the adjournment of Congress. It will be recollected that he had the law before him officially at that time:—

"8. Transient newspapers (he says), or those not sent from the office of publication to subscribers, handbills or circular letters, printed or lithographed, not exceeding one sheet in size, will pay 3 cents upon delivery at the office, and before they are put in the mails, and all such will be charged by deputy postmasters as pre-paid matter in the way bills, and upon their accounts of mails sent, and stamped or marked 'paid,' with the name of the office from which sent."

The Postmaster General here directs the following gross violations:—

1st. That transient newspapers, or those not sent from the office of publication to subscribers, shall be subject to three cents postage. The law says, that newspapers not sent from the office of publication are excepted from payment of postage; and in no case demands pre-payment of postage upon them, whether sent by publishers or others.

2d. The Postmaster General directs the postmaster to demand postage on all papers not sent to subscribers from the office of publication.

This is another usurpation. The law does not require, as will be seen above, that newspapers shall be sent to subscribers. Neither the word nor the substance of the law authorizes any such exaction. It is a gratuitous usurpation, then. Let the reader compare the law and the instructions, and he will justify our conclusions.

And now the public will ask for a remedy; and if they will act, they will have it speedily. Let every postmaster who withholds a paper not sent from the office of publication, be required to deliver the paper free; and in case of refusal, let him be prosecuted before a Justice of the Peace for the paper. Whenever a paper is sent from the office of publication, and more than the old rates are demanded, let the postmaster be prosecuted in the same manner.

Let every postmaster who refuses to receive a newspaper be also prosecuted before a Justice of the Peace, and we shall soon see whether Mr. Cave Johnson is to make laws, or whether they are to be passed by Congress.

The newspapers of the interior, by circulating this article extensively, will soon put a stop to the general system of imposition upon the newspaper press.—N. Y. Express.

Beware of Bad Papers.

An article has recently gone the rounds of the religious newspapers, under the head of "Beware of bad books." It is set forth, in faithful lines, the evils of reading bad books. But there is more occasion to beware of bad newspapers.—There is vastly more of corrupt literature issued and devoured in newspapers than in books. And the forms in which this corrupting literature in newspapers steals into a reading, are more insidious and deceptive. Here it comes in, it may be in the ordinary vehicles of intelligence—in the family newspaper, in connection with the news, which every one must read. He who reads a bad book, takes it for what it is, and generally knows something of its character before he commences. But the bad literature that is smuggled into business and family newspapers, is really under our eye and demanding a reading, before we have sought for it; and it stands ready to catch us when we are off our guard, or in our moments of relaxation. Getting admission into a thousand families where a bad book would be proscribed, it is more than a substitute for bad books. It comes in parcels, renewed every week or every day, and renews the temptation to every person and every child in the family.

And then the quantity of bad papers published and read, is many fold more than what goes out in the form of books. It would take many such establishments as that of the Harpers, to supply in books the same amount of corrupt material, that now goes forth in the hundreds of thousands of newspapers and periodical pamphlets which every day sends forth. While, then, we would say nothing to make any one less aware of bad books, we would invoke more attention to what is done through bad papers.—N. E. Puritan.

GERRIT SMITH AND THE PRESIDENCY.—Gerrit Smith declines peremptorily a call on him to be a candidate for next President. He says he has all his life been weighed down by the charge of a great landed property left by his father, which has deprived him of a chance to fit himself for the Chief Magistracy; and, though there would be no prospect of his election if nominated, he does not consider it right to run for an office without the qualifications for worthily filling it. If he were President, however, he would first stop the Mexican war, and ask pardon of God and Mexico for our wholesale murders of the Mexican people, returning the territory we have taken by force; 2. Utterly abolishing the Army and Navy; 3. Abolish all Customs or Commercial Restrictions whatever; 4. Establish a system of Direct Taxation alone; 5. Urge liberal expenditures for Light-Houses, Harbors, improving Rivers, &c. but none at all for Fortifications, Ships of War, &c.; 6. Interpret and apply the Constitution as at deadly war with Slavery; 7. Stop selling Public Lands, allow every man who needs, to take a portion of them without pay, and render the Homestead Inalienable; 8. Discourage distinctions between Native and Adopted Citizens; 9. Appoint no man to office who bases the Rights of Suffrage on Property or Color; 10. Give no office to a Slaveholder, any more than to any other pirate; 11. Nor to any man in favor of the traffic in Intoxicating Drinks; 12. Nor to any adhering member of a Secret Society.—Tribune.

☞ The latest reports from the Quarantine Station at Grosse Isle are unfavorable. There are thirteen hundred sick, and about thirteen thousand in 40 vessels at the station. According to all accounts death and starvation are nearly as bad at Grosse Isle as in Ireland. The number of orphans is now about a hundred.—Quebec Gazette of Monday.
